Now we go to the twenty-second. 'My brother called me from Boston about my cousin. She nearly died, but her heart somehow survived. I'm stunned by what she's going through. My own fly-spotted ills seem unmentionable. Krishnaji is greatly concerned and sad. He "puts his hands" to heal twice a day. I stayed in bed except for sitting with feet up at the desk for a while. Krishnaji has his lunch on a tray in my room. Today, we reminisced about Aldous Huxley. He remembered his saying to Krishnaji, "It is nice to hear English spoken again after all these years in California."' [M and S both laugh.] 'He remembered visiting Aldous and Maria'—that was his first wife—'at…' um, at somewhere, 'and once in Rome when Aldous came to a World Health Organization meeting. "We used to walk in the Borghese Gardens in the morning. Then, Aldous had to go to the WHO. I think it bored him." Krishnaji was very sprawling, elegant, and turning on the chair he sat on, and laughing at the remembrance.'

On the twenty-fourth. Well, I have a long thing about my cousin. She nearly died. 'Only her own resources can pull her through. I was stunned at the contrast between Lorna's desperate plight and my good news. I felt a pouring of strength to her.'

'Krishnaji was to have gone to Ojai yesterday, but wished to stay here another day to do my leg. In mid-morning, he drove to Ojai with Alan Kishbaugh, and held a teacher-parent discussion at Arya Vihara, and will hold another tomorrow in the cottage, so he will stay the night in the cottage. I remained in bed in Malibu. Amanda came to see me, and I did a lot of letters on the dictating machine.' I didn't like dictating. I've never been good at dictating.

Anyway, the twenty-fifth. 'My stepfather called saying there is a belligerent change in my mother's character. I think she is getting Alzheimer's. Krishnaji telephoned from the cottage, and said he is not too tired. Amanda and Phil came over in the early afternoon, and Philippa and David came later. Alan K. brought the just-made blueprints for the cottage as it now is.'

On the twenty-sixth, 'I got up and dressed for the first time. Krishnaji arrived with Theo in time for lunch. At 3 p.m., Charles Moore arrived to start considering how to change the cottage. Krishnaji spoke of austerity born out of harmony. Various ideas were considered. It went well. Earlier at lunch, Krishnaji had talked very seriously to Theo about my having an absolute right to live there throughout my lifetime. He wishes to ensure this. He seemed pleased by what the architects have said. The conversation led toward an adobe or otherwise thick-walled house, small patio, a little fountain, tile floors, possibly solar heat and radiant heating. In evening, Krishnaji did my leg. He told me later that he felt a presence as he did it, and it remained in my room instead of following him "as it usually does."'

S: So, the presence usually follows him?

M: Yes.

S: Oh, how nice.

M: Isn't that nice? But, he left it with me.

S: It stayed with you. Yes. [Laughs.]

M: That's lovely.

S: Yes, that's very sweet.

M: Yes.

S: Where was this fountain supposed to be?

M: Well, the fountain was a flop. It's where those flowers are, over there under the dining room. It was a nuisance.

S: On this side?

M: On this side, where all those flowers are.[5]

S: Right.

M: That was a little pool with a little fountain.

S: Ah, yes.

M: But it didn't work. It was messy, and I didn't want it. I got rid of it and put flowers instead. But, it was there for a while.

Now, we go to the twenty-seventh. 'Elfriede was off, and I was able to get one breakfast. The leg seemed definitely better today. Amanda came and took to the secretarial service two cassettes of letters I've dictated. Krishnaji came in and talked seriously. He said, "My life is uncertain and because it is uncertain, it is enduring."'

'"You must carry on."'

'He said, "There is something more in my life than K, and if that operates, it will do what it wants. No one can prevent it." And he said, "My love for you is without attachment, and therefore it will endure."'

'"I am coming with you to talk to Blau." (Thursday) "I want to tell him this property in Ojai is to be yours; I may be there, but it is yours."'

'"Because you have taken the responsibility for K, you must be protected." He said that he had felt I should not be alone here now without him. He felt it on the weekend. He wants to come with me even on errands for a while, and with me when I go to the doctor on the ninth. He feels this place is no longer safe—the city, violence is spreading. This house is no longer the refuge it was. He spoke of the possibility of his "going off." He said, once at Brockwood, only Whisper's presence prevented it. I asked what it meant. Did it mean he would die? Maybe, he said, but it seems to be as if he dismissed that as minor—the "going off" seems the point and a different sort of disappearance.' He used to talk about disappearing a lot.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'But he spoke of the body living another ten to fifteen years. He spoke of the importance of Balasundaram and Sunanda carrying on the work in India. He said Pupul is finished, too pulled by "selling cloth."'

S: Mm, hm. Yes. She started the Indian government cottage industry…

M: Yes. 'Her being able to spend only three days at Rishi Valley showed her boredom. It is important that Sunanda be around Krishnaji here and at Brockwood to learn. Then, Fritz Wilhelm, Alan K., Mark Lee must be in on discussions between him and David Bohm regarding what a center is to be. "It will come out. It always does." He spoke about rescuing "those two" (Rajagopal and Rosalind) from damnation. Why? Because they had been close to the teachings and had rejected it, and therefore, the greater damnation.'

'Mar de Manziarly is still in Ojai because her sister Yo had a car accident. We spoke to her this morning on the telephone. Krishnaji dismissed Mima and Yo as selfish people, and seemed to find that petty alongside the evil of Rajagopal and Rosalind. The larger the sin, the more he seems to feel they should be saved from damnation. Later, after lunch, he said he was tired, his head hurt. It began when he talked seriously.' Then I put in a p.s.: 'Krishnaji also said that if it were not "for K," my operation and its healing wouldn't have gone as well as it did.'

S: Now, hold on. Let's just go back for a moment.

M: Hm?

S: So, one thing was that he said that at Brockwood he didn't "go off" once because of Whisper. And we have to just say for the record that Whisper was the school dog, a golden Labrador.

M: Yes.

S: So, somehow the presence of Whisper, the school dog, prevented him from going off.

M: Mm. Yes.

S: Could you read from that point on? Because I think it's a bit confusing.

M: I do, too.

Well, I'm cutting in when he said that this house, meaning the Malibu house, was no longer the refuge it was.

S: Yes.

M: 'He spoke of the possibility of his "going off." He said once, at Brockwood, only Whisper's presence prevented it. I asked what "it" meant'—meaning "going off"—'and did it mean he would die? "Maybe," he said, but it seemed as if…'

S: Because he also used the expression "going off" for when he fainted, and also during "the process."

M: Yes, yes. It's an expression that he used…

S: …for all those different things.

M: He used to alarm me with his talking about "going off," and I always had the feeling that if he went for a walk by himself off in the grove or somewhere, he mightn't come back.

S: Yes.

M: Anyway, shall we go on?

January twenty-eighth 'was a quiet day. Krishnaji washed the green car with Sidney Field and waxed it.'

'Krishnaji at lunch said, "I've had two things going through my mind all morning. One, a Buddhist temple at Adyar with a pond where he"'—Krishnaji as a boy—"'used to go. And no other. Do you remember the rooms where I used to live?"'—this is when he was a boy at Adyar. '"Below that, by the river, the boy used to go there, when he first lived there, in the early mornings and stand there, vacant, lost."…"I wonder why this memory has drifted up?" He had looked a bit "off" all morning. He picked up the biography in my room, opened it, and stood smiling faintly at a very early picture of him and his two brothers.'

January twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji and I went to Beverly Hills, I driving the grey Mercedes slowly and without too much effort. For two-and-a-half hours we talked in his office with Louis Blau about Krishnaji getting immigrant status in this country, meaning a "green card." We'll try under the special category of a religious leader. There are endless forms to fill in. I will undertake to give all the necessary information. Then, Lou went into a strong statement which sounded like ones Krishnaji had come to make, i.e., that I must be in the position where I can live in the new proposed Ojai house for the rest of my life with privacy, protection, etcetera. To that end, Lou and his office will advise on how to bring the cottage and the land to be a total property legally vis-à-vis the Foundation, and also how to dovetail the sale of the Malibu house, including tax matters. He needs three years of income tax papers. I was rather taken aback by all this. Presumably, it will result in expert professional advice, but it seems to be a rather elaborate investigation, not one that I had contemplated. I've had moments of thinking of this going a bit far, but there is the old phenomenon of seeming one with things developing around Krishnaji. Things start to move, and then comes the curious phenomenon of going with them. A month ago, I wasn't thinking of selling Malibu, and then the sequence of things enveloped it with a logic that doesn't even have a demarcation of decision in it. Krishnaji was rather amazed at the complication of the "business," but he likes and has confidence in Lou. It was after 7 p.m. when we got home.'

January thirtieth. 'I recounted yesterday's meeting with Lou to Amanda. I went to the secretarial service to fetch thirty-six letters I had dictated. Then, in the green Mercedes, with Krishnaji driving, we went to Ojai. Charles Moore met us at the cottage where we lunched with food provided by Michael Krohnen from Arya Vihara. We figured out the floor plan for remodeling the cottage. Rusch joined us later. We made a lot of progress.'

January thirty-first. 'Another perfect, cloudless day, warm and beautiful, and disturbing—the last of January and no rain has fallen. Evelyne Blau came. Erna has a touch of the flu so couldn't go with her, Theo, and Mark to the Happy Valley school board meeting. Krishnaji talked to the three of them. "We are the righteous, they are the unrighteous," he said.' [M and S chuckle.] 'But if there is any opening of their wanting to be more friendly and our getting some of the land, we must meet it.' You see, the land had been stolen by…

S: Right. So, this was looking at the Happy Valley land, too?

M: Yes, yes. We weren't sure where to build the school in the beginning, and eventually it was clear that we had plenty of land, but we were looking for land at this point.

S: Yes.

M: 'They went, and I had a meeting with Charles Rusch and Carey Smoot on the monumental difficulties the local authorities are piling on our plans for the West End. Evelyne, Theo, and Mark returned. Uribe'—that was the lawyer for Happy Valley—'held forth. He claimed that Rajagopal and Rosalind are more friendly. Our position was that we are starting at the West End but are interested in the Happy Valley land for a future high school, and have presented a lease drawn up by Blau for them to consider. Uribe objects to parts of it and so we will consider his points, but generally the matter is open on both sides. Both Erna and I take a dim view of all this. It is a waste of time and energy dealing with Rosalind and what will we do with the land if we have it? We have enough problems with the West End plan. "We'd hold it," says Krishnaji.' Krishnaji rather liked a lot of real estate.

S: I'm completely with him on that. [Both laugh.]

M: 'Evelyne and Theo lunched with us in the cottage, and at 2:30 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion for teachers and parents at Arya Vihara.'

S: Alright. If I may ask some questions here, because I didn't know that the Happy Valley School land was still in question, that the K. Foundation of America could have it?

M: Well, according to history, before my time, Annie Besant bought it for Krishnaji.

S: I know, I know. That was all part of what was stolen from Krishnaji.

M: Yes, it was part of what was stolen.

So, we go on to February first. 'It is as hot as summer. Not a cloud. "Another beastly day," says Krishnaji. Kishbaugh lunched with Krishnaji and me in the cottage. Meals are now supplied by Arya Vihara, Michael Krohnen doing the cooking. At 3 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion in the cottage with Kishbaugh, Evelyne, Ruth, Albion, Mark, Asha, Dr. and Mrs. Marx'—they were people who lived here and were interested in the school—'David Green and his wife, Michael Krohnen, and David Moody. We discussed the mind being within the field of knowledge. Much review, but a good one. Krishnaji, Alan, and I walked. I rested. We had our usual supper and each was deep in a book.'

February second. 'It was a sunny, quiet morning. We lunched alone in the cottage, then we drove home to Malibu. Krishnaji is concerned about my leg, and will not let me carry anything, or drive too far. There was a letter from Wooge saying that Mother's mind is now gone and she is very belligerent.'

For February third, all I have is: 'Home all day, except when Krishnaji and I drove down to get some papers notarized.' And there's even less for the next day: 'Home. Worked on Krishnaji's papers.'

S: Krishnaji papers would've been correspondence?

M: Yes. Also, we were preparing papers to get him a green card.

For February fifth, there's a small notation: 'Rain! The first sprinkles since early December. Light but there. We drove in the grey Mercedes to Ojai in the afternoon. Krishnaji asked, "Do you feel the atmosphere here?" I spoke to my stepfather and also to my cousin in the hospital in Boston. She says she has turned a corner.'

Friday, the sixth. 'There was light rain in the morning. We walked down the driveway to look back through the orange trees, heavy with fruit, to the mountains crowned with snow. Topa Topa and the whole northern range were white. Later, clouds re-gathered, and it rained on and off all day. Erna and Theo lunched with us in the cottage. Krishnaji brought up "saving the souls" of Rajagopal and Rosalind. I said earlier that I was without hatred for them but, personally, wanted or preferred to have nothing to do with either.

Krishnaji said they had both spat on the teachings, which was such a dreadful thing that he feels they should be given a chance before they die to expiate it. All of us seem to feel that Rajagopal is incapable of it, but Krishnaji feels he should have one more chance. I pointed out that Erna, Theo, and I had gone to long considerable efforts to extricate Krishnaji from the swamp he was in with those people, and that even a touch of it again was repugnant. Krishnaji said it was not a question of that, but because they'd been close to the teachings, and betrayed it, they are damned—the word I began and now he uses. Later, when we were alone, I told him that everything I said for myself personally, I meant it all the way, but these are things that he must decide, and in responsibility to him, I will do things I would not do on my own. We left it at that. We worked on forms for Krishnaji's immigration.'

For the seventh, there is nothing in the big book, but in the little book it says: 'Rain continues. Architects are here for the weekend and came to the discussion Krishnaji held in afternoon at Arya Vihara. We walked with Kishbaugh.'

So, we go on to the eighth. 'It rained on and off all weekend. Five of the architects are here. We conferred, and came at noon to settle priorities. We are to start and ask for permits to build: 1. pavilion, 2. residences, 3. permanent classrooms, 4. an assembly hall. This means thirty day-pupils can study in the pavilion, and another thirty in a permanent classroom building, with Mark living in the residence. They showed us interesting designs that were inventive and suitable. Chuck Rusch told Krishnaji that he would be responsible for the building and so will other architects, but he will coordinate it. He said he had cleared his life of everything but two things, his teaching in the school of architecture at UCLA, and seeing Krishnaji's school built. Krishnaji was pleased. Everybody lunched at Arya Vihara. Evelyne and Cynthia Wood were there. In the afternoon, Krishnaji held a discussion with Evelyne, Cynthia, Theo, Ruth, Albion, Mark, Asha, the David Greens, the Marxes, David Moody, Michael Krohnen, and me. Erna was with relatives, so that's why she wasn't there. Krishnaji spoke on seeing without reference to anything, without comparison, the energy of that. In the evening, Krishnaji played a tape of Doraiswamy Iyengar on Veena recorded a year ago at Bangalore. It is still raining.'

On February ninth, 'Rain lessened. We left and drove back to Malibu. I was tense in the car. I'm leaving forty minutes behind schedule; and the schedule was tight. Krishnaji intended to drive the second lap as usual. When I said we had to hurry, he said I was irritable, and he didn't want that. "All right, anything for peace."' [Laughing.] 'He wouldn't drive, which shocked me, and I stopped in the usual place and gave him the wheel. He drove back beautifully and swiftly. We ate lunch at home, and he came with me to the UCLA Medical Center and waited in the car while I saw Dr. Miller, who kept me waiting, but said the leg is healing properly. Be cautious for another two weeks, and then I can do anything, he said. Krishnaji and I then did errands. We bought detective stories, a Michelangeli recording of Haydn concertos, some jersey shirts, things at Lindberg's and got home by 6 p.m. Amanda says we've had two inches of rain over the weekend. Ojai had six. Evelyne rang to say that Cynthia Wood would give another donation to the school. Krishnaji and I watched the skiing Olympics in Innsbruck on TV. The ocean made a fine, growling sound.' [M and S both chuckle.]

Nothing of significance for the tenth, and for the eleventh, my diary says only, 'Desk in the morning, and went to town in the afternoon for errands. At home by 6 p.m., and Krishnaji met me near the gate.'

The twelfth of February. 'I worked at biographical materials of Krishnaji for his resident's permit according to forms Louis Blau gave us. Krishnaji and I lunched and drove to town, and a new barber suggested by Alan Kishbaugh. Krishnaji had an excellent haircut while I went to get car wax in the sleazy pornography of Santa Monica Boulevard near Fairfax. On the way back, we stopped to look for floor tile at Kneedler Faucher'—that's the store that sells them. 'They have our Malibu pattern in Italian tile, which Krishnaji likes, but they expect new ones in March. On our return, Erna telephoned that Cynthia Wood had sent a check for $200,000 toward the school building.'

February thirteenth. 'The Dunnes nicely ignored my birthday.' [S laughs.] 'But Alain Naudé telephoned. Krishnaji, of course, doesn't remember such things. We got off for Ojai before my family could telephone. We lunched in the cottage with Erna and Theo, and went out to look at the Oak Grove land, where Carey Smoot had cleared up trees, bracken, etcetera. and an entrance from Lomita Avenue. It looked very nice. We walked around and back on Besant Road. My first real walk since my operation, and it made my leg feel better. Supper in the cottage and early to sleep.'

February fourteenth, 'Alan K. is away, so I recorded on the Nagra the discussion at Arya Vihara for teachers, parents, etcetera. Cynthia Wood brought a Margaret Mallory from Santa Barbara, who was enthusiastic. It was a very good discussion. She said we had met in Rome, at the American Academy. She spoke of Sam, Varnum Poor, Ingrid Bergman, and my father. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went for a walk in faint rain.'

S: Can you explain what is the American Academy in Rome?

M: It's an academic, I think, university for art and all those things.

S: And she had met you and Sam there?

M: Apparently.

S: And she'd also met your father and Ingrid Bergman?

M: I don't really know.

The fifteenth, 'Erna, Theo, Evelyne, Cynthia Wood to lunch in the cottage. There was the usual Sunday discussion for fifteen people at 3 p.m. I taped it on the Nagra. Another good discussion. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went for a walk afterwards.'

The following day we drove back to Malibu.

February seventeenth. 'Krishnaji said, "I feel as if something were expanding in my head. It has been going on for a few days, a new feeling. If I shut my eyes, it is there." And then, "Your responsibility is to look after K. Therefore, you must be healthy. I will live a long time, ten or fifteen years." I worked on Krishnaji's immigration papers. We waxed the green Mercedes together, and then went for a beach walk, taking some Ojai avocados to the Dunnes.'

Then, the eighteenth…god, these diaries go on forever. We'll have to live to be 105!

S: That's good. I'm planning on it. I'm planning it for you, too.

M: [laughs] Alright, the eighteenth, 'Desk. We waxed the grey Mercedes. At 6 p.m., we went to the sheriff's station for Krishnaji to be fingerprinted for the resident's permit. Mark and Asha lunched with Rosalind and Beatrice Wood. Rosalind said she will never forgive Krishnaji for refusing to see her in Rome.' She had gone to Rome to try to see him when he was staying with Vanda, and he refused to see her.

February nineteenth, 'It was my brother's birthday and I had a phone conversation with him and I told him about moving to Ojai. Krishnaji and I drove to town on errands. I got him some nice jeans at Bullock's he likes, and soft walking shoes. We had a picnic lunch in the car. We each had our teeth cleaned at Dr. Christensen's. I delivered all the forms and documents for Krishnaji's residence permit to Louis Blau's office. We also bought an herb, hyssop, suggested by Amanda Pallant for Krishnaji's catarrh. We were home by suppertime.' She's an herbalist.

On the next day, 'We went to Ojai for lunch with Erna and Theo. In the afternoon, we went for a long walk around the block.'

February twenty-first. 'Charles Moore and Charles Rusch came with the cottage plans for Krishnaji and me to see. It was rather disappointing and the model they brought was ordinary, but the meeting was useful. Later, Krishnaji said that he and I could draw what we want and present it to them to improve and make professional. They lunched here. At 3 p.m., Krishnaji held a teacher/parent/etcetera discussion at Arya Vihara. I taped it. We walked later with Erna and Theo. From Krishnaji, "I will talk to your body, not you, on a quiet face and quiet hands."…"I am aware of gestures as I talk; why aren't you?" said he.' [Both chuckle.] Well, he sits on his hands. I never could. I move my hands much too much, and I realize it. Krishnaji was always bothered that my hands were not quiet. It bothered him always. Bothers me still.

S: I know. I do it too much, too. [M chuckles.]

M: On the twenty-second, 'Krishnaji walked in his sleep last night. I must've heard him bump into something in his room, for I woke up suddenly and totally and alarmingly.' [Seems to explain:] I was sleeping here, on this sofa.

S: Here being, this is Krishnaji's little sitting room? I'm just saying that for the tape, because when you say "here"…

M: Oh, of course. I'm sorry. 'He came into the sitting room, where I was sleeping on the sofa. I spoke to him, and he said, "Maria?"' That's the name he called me. 'I put on the tiny Dutch flashlight Dorothy gave me a year ago and saw Krishnaji was standing against the wall facing it.' That means he would've had his back to me. 'He woke up with the light and went back to the bathroom and bed, falling immediately deeply asleep. I could hear his breathing was that of sleep. I stayed awake a long time. In the morning he said, "I must've walked in my sleep. I have never done that." The morning was quiet. Erna and Theo lunched with us, and at 3 p.m., Krishnaji had a private group discussion. I taped it. A very interesting one. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I drove to the Oak Grove land, which had been plowed and disked. Carey Smoot has put up six wooden gate posts, which none of us like or knew he was doing.' It doesn't say anything about who was at the meeting.

February twenty-third. 'Krishnaji at breakfast said, "My head, here"—he indicated the back part—"feels as if it were expanding—great stillness, air, and light." He gestured and laughed. Last night he seemed to have walked in his sleep again. I was instantly awake around 1 a.m. when I heard him walking in his room. I spoke and he responded, and came in. "I wonder why I do this." He went back and slept immediately. Erna and Theo are upset about the posts, and talked to Rusch. Smoot refused to change them and will walk out if we do.' [Laughs.] 'Discussion. Krishnaji had Smoot come in the afternoon. Meanwhile, Moorhead telephoned from England on his arrival from India. He says that Balasundaram has hepatitis, and may not be able to come to the conference. Krishnaji talked alone with Smoot, and then called in Erna, Theo, and me. Krishnaji had smoothed it all out.' [Laughs.]

'And so, we didn't get off till about 5 p.m. in the car. Krishnaji said his head was suddenly bad. He asked me to drive between fifty and fifty-five m.p.h.' That means slowly. 'Suddenly he said, "I almost fainted just now." Several times, he put one hand over his eyes and groaned. "It's pretty bad," he said. Along the coast road near Decker Road, he fainted for about two minutes. The seat belt held him gently so that he didn't fall into my lap as in past faintings. When we reached the house, he said he was alright, and jumped out and opened the garage doors. We carried things into his room. When I asked, he said, "I'm alright. Don't worry. I never faint when I'm alone." So, I went to fix our supper. Going to bed and saying goodnight later, he said his head was bad.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji's head is better but he is still in some pain. The trust deed for the new Krishnamurti Trust in Madras came, the entity formed to receive and function in Vasanta Vihar as a result of the court case against Rajagopal in Madras. Krishnaji signed it; we went to the bank to have it notarized, and mailed it to Radha Burnier, who was one of its trustees now. Then, we took a beach walk. It was beautiful after a small .15 inch rain in the night. Krishnaji was tired so we returned. We got a cable from Balasundaram that his hepatitis makes his coming to the U.S. impossible.'

February twenty-fifth. ‘I worked at the desk all morning. In the afternoon, there was a meeting of all the trustees except Alan K. Krishnaji also saw Rusch and Carey Smoot. We enlarged on Monday’s decisions. Tea afterward. Krishnaji had a stomachache after lunch, but felt better later.’

On February twenty-sixth there’s almost nothing. ‘I spend almost all day at the desk. We waxed the grey Mercedes, then we walked over to see Amanda and Phil.’

February twenty-seventh. ‘We left at 11 a.m. for Ojai in the green car, Krishnaji driving. Along Zuma Beach, he asked, “Have you any paper?” I found a scrap in my bag and wrote what he said. “A strange thing happened this morning. I was sitting quietly, a sort of meditation, and suddenly, there was absolute silence, a withdrawal of everything, and it was like death; there was this body sitting quietly and this truth of not existing anywhere; complete death. And if I hadn’t felt, by Jove, this is getting too far, I don’t know what would’ve happened. It was absolute nothingness. It felt as though, if that state continued, the body would die. There would be an end of everything.”’

‘Then, I asked, “Was it similar to the times on a walk alone when you felt like going away?”’

‘Krishnaji replied, “It was much more intense this morning.”’

‘I asked, “When did it happen?”’

‘Krishnaji said, “After I’d seen you.” Which was about 7 a.m.’

‘I said, “Before breakfast?”’

‘He replied, “Oh, long before breakfast. There was a period when the back of the brain was tremendously ventilated, as though taking deep breaths and being filled with air. It went on for some time.”’

‘“How long?” I asked.’

‘Krishnaji said, “May have been two or three minutes or more. I don’t know.”’

‘I asked, “When you felt it was getting too much, was it then instantly out?”’

‘Krishnaji replied, “Oh, instantly out.”’

‘“What do you think it is?” I asked.’

‘He said, “I’ve had it before, but it was in the sense of going away, withdrawing is the wrong word. It was absolute stillness. I think it has to do with what happened in the brain, the expanding, getting ventilated, really air going into it: a slight strain, as though a new fresh brain had been put into it. It sounds so damn silly." Then he laughed. "A totally uncontaminated…"' I didn't finish the sentence.

'He drove in silence after that for a ways, and I watched the ocean for a while: then I tried to describe what is for me the wholeness of seeing, which is somehow with all the senses. Color, its depth, the line and movement are felt not only in the eyes but with the body and it comes when there is no thought going on. It is the same with listening to music, to wind, to sea, to a voice. Krishnaji listened carefully and seemed to understand and say I was right. We drove past the posts by the school entrance. Carey Smoot had stained them darker; they were' [laughter in voice] 'less intrusive. At the cottage, there was a mad, nasty telegram to Krishnaji from Patricia Gilbert, in New York.' Patricia Gilbert was a woman who used to come to Saanen and I spent wasted hours trying to persuade her that Krishnaji didn't want to marry her. 'The telegram was venomous. Erna and Theo lunched with us, and we walked around the block.'

FOOTNOTES:

[1] This is degrees in Fahrenheit, which is 7.22 degrees Celsius.

[2] This was not to be a school, but rather what would later become known as an adult study center.

[3] The Krishnamurti Foundation of America had received Pine Cottage as part of the settlement with Rajagopal, so legal arrangements had to be made for Mary to build on to Pine Cottage and have use of it as though it were her property while at the same time ensuring the property would for Krishnaji, should she pre-decease him, and that it would eventually go to the Foundation.

[4] There is further discussion of this in at least one later interview.

[5] Mary is indicating a small area just to the left of the front door.

Issue 40: February 27, 1976 to April 26, 1976

This issue contains a recalled discussion between Mary and me that occurred off-mic, and this is interesting because it is one of the few examples of a great many discussions we had off-mic. The recording took place in July of 2004, so this is after twelve years of our having these on-going discussions; and we were still discussing this same topic which we had even begun discussing before we started our recording: how much of Mary and her reactions should be part of our recorded discussions. If she had had her way, she would have been invisible in these accounts, and I was always insisting that without her, there would be no account.

She folds into this discussion Krishnaji's sensitivity to people, and his need to be protected; and the very intense form this took at the end of his life.

Mary tells us of very interesting discussions that occurred at Arya Vihara, and which were recorded, but are still not available on line.

This issue also sees a very interesting approach Krishnaji proposes for dealing with a difficult child at the Ojai school.

Mary: I think I've gone through where he was describing what happened to him on February twenty-seventh, 1976.

Scott: Yes. I think it was just the very end when we ran out of tape. Some…

M: …demented lady.

S: Right, the demented lady.

M: Well, anyway, she was in New York and we had not heard from her since the morning in Gstaad when at 6 a.m. she was outside the chalet, and Krishnaji had me go out and do something about the demented letter she had sent asking him to marry her. [Chuckles.] 'The telegram was venomous. Erna and Theo lunched with us, and later we walked around the block.' That's that day.

S: May I just stop and ask a question here?

M: Sure.

S: It has to do with our discussion yesterday. I was thinking about this last night. It has to do with what Krishnaji said about "the face."

M: Yes.

S: When did Krishnaji first mention "the face" to you?

M: I can't give you an accurate date, because he had talked about "the face," but when he talked about "the face" and when I saw it isn't in my present memory unless it comes to light in these discussions, because it just happened. I think I told you yesterday that he once said…

S: That he wished he could see it.

M: He wished he could see it.

S: And Krishnaji asked me about it because I'd seen it. And when I first saw it I thought it was just my imagination…

M: I know. You've told me.

S: …playing a trick. And it was…so…

M: No. We've both seen it, and he spoke of it. But when it was…

S: Okay, alright.

M: It may turn up in reading these discussions.

S: Alright. That's fine. Now, the twenty-eighth.

M: February twenty-eighth, nothing much happened. 'I typed letters, Krishnaji had a discussion at Arya Vihara for teachers, parents, etcetera, which I taped. It doesn't say who was there. Mr. Schwartz'—that's the curtain man—'installed some of the curtains for the upstairs apartment[1] and the carpet was installed too. Time is moving on, and the Bohms will be here in a fortnight. Krishnaji held a teacher-parent-etcetera discussion at Arya Vihara, which I taped.'

So, the next day is Sunday the twenty-ninth. 'I typed letters. Evelyne Blau went to see Rosalind about a piece of land with a ranch house on Besant Road, which she and Lou would like to buy for their daughter. Rosalind talked in a dozen directions in her confusion, and it went nowhere. "You can't deal with her," said Evelyne. Cynthia Wood and Evelyne lunched with us, and Cynthia Wood told Krishnaji afterwards that she was willing to become a trustee. Krishnaji will now bring it up with the other trustees, who have not yet been consulted.' He did that on his own.

'At 3 p.m., Krishnaji held a private discussion in the cottage on thought, realities, that of nature, of objects created by thought (machines, etcetera) and that of thought itself (ideas, imagination). Understanding the illusion of thought is truth. Krishnaji in this began a dialogue with himself, and said, "Since you won't question, I will do it," and he did both ends of dialogue. "I say to my friend, etc." He was pleased with this device, and in the evening said he was going to do that in future discussions.' [M and S both chuckle.] 'He is annoyed with Patterson. Not annoyed, he said, but "I'm jolted" by him and his comments. He feels Patterson is interrupting, and has "the beginnings of a high priest." Also, Krishnaji said he has been thinking of Rosalind and Rajagopal and no longer thinks an attempt to help them "repent," undo the evil they have done, will work. "I think I will leave it alone." Evelyne's daughter and Mark's meeting with Rosalind last week seem to have brought the picture of the same petty, conniving woman. He described her anger when he used to heal. "Why do you do that!?" she would say.' And her walking out when he would talk to the Happy Valley teachers. She didn't come to discussions. '"She was too stupid to understand," and he retold her query when the Commentaries were published, "Did you write that? You couldn't have. It must've been Rajagopal."'

S: So, she questioned whether Krishnaji wrote the Commentaries?

M: Yes, yes, she couldn't imagine his having written them. 'Priscilla Teiry told Erna that after many conversations with people in the Valley, including Martha Crego, she thinks Rosalind's and Rajagopal's aim has been to destroy Krishnaji and the teachings. Krishnaji was struck, somehow, by her thinking this, and said that evening that it was probably true. He came in before going to bed and told me to write down, "When there is understanding of reality, there is infinite order, and love and justice are inherent in reality."'

The next day is the first of March. 'Erna and Theo lunched with us. Krishnaji feels Albion Patterson is becoming an interpreter. He had Ruth come over and talked to her about it. She suggested Krishnaji talk to Patterson. We drove home to Malibu. On the way, Krishnaji said his head was bad most of the time now. It had been that morning. Then he said, "I feel like doing something extravagant. What shall we do, Maria?"' [S chuckles.]

'I replied, "Shall we go to a movie? Go dancing? To Las Vegas!"' [S laughs.]

'Krishnaji laughed and said, "That would be punishment."'

'I asked, "What would be extravagant?"'

'He replied, "I don't know." He was tired after supper.' [M laughs.]

On the second of March, 'my brother telephoned about business things. I went to town on errands and had my tooth filled. Krishnaji rested and was waiting in the driveway as I arrived home at 4 p.m. As the rain began, we couldn't walk, but tried a new gadget for doing a headstand on a shoulder stool.' Do you remember that thing?

S: Yes, I remember that.

M: The third of March is short. 'Desk, work on house costs, telephoned Ruth Carter'—that's the real estate woman—'and she came to estimate the value of the house. Krishnaji and I walked on the beach.'

On the fourth, 'my brother telephoned on business matters. I spoke also to my stepfather, Wooge, and mother. My cousin is better, still in the hospital, but able to take food by mouth. Worked all day on the Malibu house costs. Carol Rapf'—that's another real estate person—'came to give an appraisal. Krishnaji and I waxed the green car.' We seem to be forever waxing cars!

S: I know, I know. I think that was a form of entertainment. [Both chuckle.]

M: So, we go to March fifth. 'We were off at 11 a.m. with Krishnaji driving. After a while, he said, "The curious thing is happening. A new thing is being added to it. This morning it was so easy—it has become quite ordinary—it is there, nothingness, a vast space of nothingness. The new thing I felt a few days—something—that word sacred; something totally holy—sacred—I don't know what it is." We came around the big rock, and then there was Topa Topa, white with snow. Krishnaji said, "What a country this is, real California. I wish I could remember what it was like in 1922." Then, "Darling Maria, we must have that house a jewel, austere, holy, nothing extravagant, showy." There was a pause. Then, "Thank you for having me here."'

'Last night, I went to bed tired and distracted by searching in papers of Sam's estate for something showing the value in the inheritance of the Malibu house, which I will need as a tax loss. I never found it, and the papers were sad. Krishnaji must have felt it, for he said in the car that he had felt very close to me, and when he spoke of the Bohms' arrival next week and my going to the airport, he said he must come too. "I must be with you as much as possible."'

'I asked, "Do you feel a danger to me?"'

'He replied, "No. But it is good for me to be with you."'

'At lunch with Erna and Theo in the cottage, Krishnaji talked about the house we will build and how someday we may live only here and Brockwood. Not India, he said. He asked if, "When we have K & R[2]," if Rajagopal's names can be removed from the Commentaries? "It doesn't belong there."'

'He mentioned again that Priscilla Teiry has remarked that the two Rs were out to destroy him and his teachings. And then he said, "I think that is so." Then, he told Erna not to worry about anything—it is all worked out. Everything will come right. He laughed as he expounded on this exuberantly.'

'At 4 p.m. he saw Mark, David Moody, Chuck Rusch, Katie Marx, David Greene about how to handle a child who doesn't respond to two approaches they use, creating an atmosphere and by dialogue. The child is self-centered, gets attention by behaving badly. Krishnaji said, "Can you move his attention from himself by creating another attention which he will want, instead of giving him the personal attention which he wants, you move his attention away from him with the same intensity, divert his energy."'

‘“I will talk to 8,000 people in Bombay about things that are the opposite of what they want. This is my problem, how to reach them. I point out something that is true, get them to look at it, not as opposed to something else. I appeal to their unconscious.”’

‘“There may be an unconscious movement for change. And this may affect parents to send the child to the school. The same quality may affect the child.”’

‘“There may be an unconscious demand, urge, that we cannot go on living as we have in violence.”’

‘“So, there are two things, to direct his attention and talking to his unconscious.”’

‘“You mustn’t put him in the position of resisting. He may be here because something else sent him, not his parents. Therefore, my responsibility is much greater.”’

S: So, Krishnaji is saying that…first of all, not to resist needing attention.

M: No, but to divert the attention.

S: But to divert it. And Krishnaji uses as an analogy what he does with the 8,000 people in Bombay.

M: That’s right. Yes.

S: And he feels that people may have an unconscious wish…

M: …to be different.

S: …to be different because things are just not working the way they are, and people know that. And then, he further goes on to say that the student who comes to one of the schools may be “sent”…

M: …by some unknown something.

S: Right, and not really sent by the parents, although ostensibly sent by the parents…

M: Yes, but something else.

S: There may be some other either intelligence or force…

M: Yes. And, therefore, his responsibility is much greater.

S: Right. And the educator’s responsibility is much greater because of what sent the child.

M: But, his, Krishnaji’s, responsibility is involved in this.

S: Right.

M: On the sixth of March. 'At 11 a.m. there was a meeting with the architects. Gammel and'—somebody—that's the architects—'presented drawings of the administration building and residence of director of the school. The Sweeton family, who built the garages at Brockwood, are here, and Al, the father, sat in on the meeting. Everyone lunched together at Arya Vihara. They resumed the meeting in the afternoon, and we walked late.'

Saturday, the seventh of March. 'Evelyne and Cynthia Wood to lunch. Krishnaji held a discussion at 3 p.m. with the usual group, which I taped. It was an absorbing one.'

The next day, 'I shopped for supplies for the guest flat and the Bohms' arrival. Krishnaji talked again to Mark Lee, Katie Marx, and David Moody about children, and then cause and effect. After lunch with Erna and Theo in the cottage, Krishnaji saw Albion Patterson, alone at first, and faced him with his speaking against Erna Lilliefelt and against himself saying a religious leader should be gentle and patient. Patterson said, "You are impatient."'

'Krishnaji replied, "I'm not impatient, but you repeat over and over things I've already said." He told Patterson he criticizes Brockwood Park and the Ojai School to others. Patterson denied it all and said it's just his way of talking—hyperbole, exaggeration, picked up from his years in Latin American countries. Krishnaji told him that he was setting himself up as an interpreter of the teachings. When he denied saying things about the school and the Lilliefelts, Krishnaji called them, and they all had it out.'

S: So, Krishnaji called in the Lilliefelts, and they had it out with Albion?

M: Yes. 'Afterward, we drove them to Malibu.' That's interesting.

On the ninth of March, 'There was a cable from Balasundaram: Vasanta Vihar, by court order, now belongs to the K. Trust, Madras. Erna read a letter to Krishnaji from the prime minister of Canada's wife, Mrs. Margaret Trudeau, about her wish to attend the scientists' conference as an observer. I spoke to her in Ottawa; she will come under her maiden name of Sinclair. Krishnaji and I drove to town, had a picnic lunch in the car in Beverly Hills, did errands, and he got his hair cut.'

On the tenth, there isn't much: another real estate appraisal, Krishnaji and I walked on the beach, and we stopped by briefly at the Dunnes'.

On March eleventh, 'I telephoned my stepfather on his eighty-seventh birthday. My mother isn't well. I worked on the house costs all morning. After lunch with Krishnaji, I went to town to Lou Blau's office, where he, Evelyne, Erna, Theo, and I discussed KFA finances, also, my buying the land.' This was a device that Lou thought up to try to minimize my capital gain tax when I sold the Malibu place. Lou was explaining all that to me. So we discussed my buying this land, which I did, actually, before enlarging the cottage. ‘Lou thinks I should buy the whole of the McAndrew Road property, including Arya Vihara. Erna will have it appraised. I came home late. I found Krishnaji waiting in the dark at the turn in the driveway in his white bathrobe…’ [Long pause.] ‘It shook my heart,’ it says here.

S: How nice. Why did you hesitate before reading that last part?

M: Turn off the recorder for a minute.

[Tape cuts out, then back on.]

S: Alright. So, we’ve just been saying that you are reluctant to have personal things in these discussions. And I’m saying that there are things about the personal relationship which are wonderful to know and important to know. And you brought up the issue, for instance, of Krishnaji sometimes needing someone close to him as a kind of protection, almost.

M: Yes. He spoke in terms, for instance, when he was forever saying to me that I must look after my health because I had to outlive him…

S: Yes.

M: …and that was a sort of duty he expected of me. And I felt strongly that my role was a protective one to smooth his life as much as I could, to protect him, to serve him in whatever he needed, see that he had the right food, and he was in the right place so that it would be comfortable and clean and all the things that you do for a person; and that he wouldn’t have had unless it was done. And I happened to be the one there to do it. And he did seem to need…he was very sensitive of the presence…

S: …of different people.

M: …of different people.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And certain people, it was very bad; he didn’t want…that.

S: Yes.

M: And other people, he was sensitive to the good of whatever that was.

S: Yes. Now, for instance, you brought up before, when we had the tape recorder turned off, that when Krishnaji was dying, he wanted us…

M: Yes…

S: …and he did not want to be left alone even for a minute.

M: No.

S: And it's not that he was frightened.

M: No. Never.

S: So, it was nothing like that, but there was something about people who…I don't know… who loved him, or I don't know what…so you and I were there…

M: Yes.

S: …and never left him alone. And there was some type of protection in that.

M: Yes. And he said, we'll get to it much later, but you remember that when he came back with you and Parchure from India, and I met him at the airport in the green car.

S: Yes.

M: And he came with me. And when I got into the car, he said that in the next twenty-four hours I mustn't leave him at all, because it's…it's…

S: Touch and go.

M: …touch and go. He didn't use the words "touch and go," but it was necessary, as though he was close to death, and the fact that you and I both, as I recall, slept on the floor in his room…

S: Yes, yes. One of us was always here.

M: Yes.

S: Twenty-four hours. But now, Mary, I want to come back to this because…and again, this funny thing, and I don't know if this will come up, but when I started giving Krishnaji massage, and I started on his hands, if I remember, and Krishnaji wasn't sure, and this is just to say how sensitive he is to presence, he wasn't sure his body could stand my touch.

M: What did he mean by that?

S: He wanted to just try it in a small way because he just didn't…I think he was just so sensitive. Anyway, it turned out that my touch was fine. And so, then I continued, but it was just, even though I had the relationship with him that I did, there was just some peculiar, call it a chemical thing, you know, just some kind of a personal chemistry or something.

M: Yes.

S: And part of that is why it is…you see, your relationship with him was so singular, and so special, which is why I know that you are reluctant to…well, you're reluctant to talk about yourself full stop. [Chuckles.] Which makes this project all very difficult!

M: No one's going to believe that if they listen to any of this interminable saga!

S: But we happen to know it's true. So, but that also means that you can't take out, I don't think, your own responses. So when you see, you drive around the corner, and there's Krishnaji in the dark in his white bathrobe…

M: He's standing there.

S: He's standing there to meet you, and your heart kind of leaps, it's just…it's wonderful, it's as it should be. And it's also…

M: I was so touched by it.

S: Of course! And the fact that you were touched by it speaks mountains about the wonderful relationship that you had looking after him, that he was able to live and enjoy. And so, anyway, my plea, again, is not to take things out unless you absolutely have to. And that you don't have to worry about people thinking, "Oh, she's just self-indulgent, or sentimental, or sloppy, or…you know…too romantic…or…

M: I know that when I wrote ages ago and told Mary L., I guess, and she wrote it, that when he fainted in the car, the first time it ever happened, he was sitting on my right, I was driving, and he fell sideways into my lap. People were shocked that I'd said that.

S: You see, I think that's absolutely horrible.

M: What was I supposed to do? I mean, he fell over in a faint.

S: Exactly.

M: And, where was he going to go?

S: Exactly. Stop at a forty-five-degree angle? [Laughs.] That's silly. So, I think that you mustn't censor yourself out of worry of other people's reactions. Now, if there's things that you don't want anyone to know, that's fine. But people are going to be stupid and have reactions to anything. You know, so anyway, we can go on. That's just my little…[M chuckles]…alright, my little rant.

M: Good.

So, the next day was March twelfth. 'The architects Moore and Rusch came at 11 a.m. and with two floor plans, neither of which we liked. But they are turning one of the plans around, and it's beginning to take shape. The new building is separate from the cottage. They lunched with us, and we continued to work until it was time for Krishnaji and me to go to the airport to meet Saral and David Bohm, having flown in from London. We brought them back to Malibu for the night.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji, David, and Saral, and I drove to Ojai at 9 a.m. We installed them in the just-enlarged guest apartment. At 11 o'clock, there was a trustees meeting of KFA. Cynthia Wood is elected as the ninth trustee, and she attended. The meeting lasted all day, with time out for lunch at Arya Vihara. I absented myself while the board considered selling me all of the McAndrew Road property, so that I can enlarge the cottage for Krishnaji's use and my own during my lifetime. Krishnaji spoke for this, and he later told me that Erna was twice in tears explaining my help to the Foundation.' That was nice of her. 'Everyone agreed that it could be sold to me. The meeting ended after 5 p.m., and we all went for a walk.' That was nice of Erna. She wasn't an outwardly emotional person.

S: No. She wasn't.

M: March fourteenth, 'Krishnaji spent the morning in bed, but talked to David Bohm of what the center should be. The Bohms and the Lilliefelts lunched with us in the cottage. At 3 p.m., Krishnaji held the Sunday discussion with the Bohms attending, and which I taped. Krishnaji said in the discussion, "All causation is mechanical," and "All thought leads to sorrow." We had a long walk down Thacher Road.'

March fifteenth, 'I typed letters all morning. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Then, Krishnaji and I drove home to Malibu.'

The next day, 'I got up at 5 a.m. to work on income tax. Went to town alone and to the dentist. Then I went to the airport to meet Sunanda Patwardhan and her husband and bring them back to stay at Malibu.'

March seventeenth, 'Up at 5 a.m. again, and finished income tax data. After lunch with Krishnaji and the Patwardhans, I went to Bamberger'—that's the accountant—'with it. I was home in time for supper, years younger because it was done." [Both chuckle.] Krishnaji came up the driveway to meet me as I drove in seeming to know I'd be there.' [Seems to make an aside:] He would know, you know, when people were arriving. He did that once with Alain Naudé in New York. We were walking around a reservoir, and as we came near where the apartment was, he said, "Alain's just arriving." And he was. We couldn't see it but he knew. 'Krishnaji and the Patwardhans had walked on the lawn. I telephoned my cousin who is still in hospital in Boston.'

March eighteenth. 'We drove to Ojai, taking the Patwardhans with us. We lunched at Arya Vihara. While Krishnaji rested, I did errands in the village. A conference table was set up in the Lilliefelts' long living room very nicely, and the scientists began to arrive for the scientists' conference. Krishnaji and I had a quiet supper in the cottage.'

On the nineteenth. 'The first day of the scientists' conference began at 10:30 a.m. David Bohm was the chairman and asked Krishnaji to speak to begin with. The theme of the discussion is: In a disintegrating society, what is right action for survival. Krishnaji said the essence of religion is to discover what is truth and reality. When that doesn't exist, there is degeneration. The transformation of the individual is the transformation of the world, using the word "individual" in the sense of whole, indivisible. During the discussion, Sudarshan asked: Is there such a thing as another state? Krishnaji replied, "I would say there is but not to be experienced." Krishnaji said that all thinking leads to suffering; all religion is based on thinking; does death lead to immortality; can a human being learn what death is; a state of timelessness? He said, "A man who suffers lives in darkness." He said there is a quality of mind which is free from thought; everything based on thought is time-binding; time is the essence of suffering. If thought spills over into timelessness, then it is illusion. So, thought must see its limitations and stop there, without any effort, compulsion. If I see the limitation, then begins real meditation; then, I can explore what suffering is." If I see the whole, it is not suffering." Concerning thought leading to suffering, David Bohm said that you cannot control what mathematical thought will lead to. Thought cannot take place in an isolated context, and you cannot control the context.'

'Krishnaji easily dominated the meeting, without wishing to. Most of the group was silent. He spoke with force and eloquence. In forceful emphasis, he made a gesture of his fist with his thumbs up, moving out and down. The morning meeting stopped at 12:30 p.m. and moved to Arya Vihara, where the Hookers and Michael Krohnen had lunch on the patio ready. I washed dishes. Margaret Trudeau, as Ms. Sinclair, arrived having walked from Ojai.' Walked from Ojai? 'Erna and Theo asked her to stay with them. She attended the afternoon session. Very blue eyes, creamy skin, listened attentively, and took notes in a small book. Krishnaji, Erna, and I walked later.'

The next day was 'the second day of the scientists' conference, Dr. Anthony Wilden, a professor at Simon Fraser University in Canada, arrived with a young woman and man. Erna explained that no more observers could attend, but since they were there, they could stay but only sitting by the door. Wilden seized a folding chair and stormed in, planting it and his girl just behind Krishnaji, next to Margaret Trudeau, saying, "Hello, Maggie," to her. He then went to his place at the table and sat looking baleful.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji began the conference, talking about the mind, and consciousness not separate from the mind. After a short time, Wilden made a lengthy, scornful speech about all present consciousness is the result of socio-economic conditions since 1720-something. There was no ego, apparently, before that!' [Laughs.] All of this was recorded; it must be somewhere in the archives.

S: I'm sure it is.

M: [laughs] 'No ego apparently before that, and we were all middle-class materialists. That was what should be discussed, etcetera. His behavior continued, increasingly scornful, rude, and he told David Bohm, who disagreed with one of his statements, that he didn't know a god-damned thing about what the hell he was talking about.' [S laughs.] He was a charmer! 'Krishnaji was gentle, firm, and tried to lead him into reason but without much success. Luckily, he was not present at the afternoon session. Margaret T. said she had never met him, and no one ever called her Maggie.' [Chuckles.] 'Seems she was interviewed on television some weeks ago, and when asked about influences in her life, she mentioned Krishnamurti. Wilden heard, telephoned her saying he was going to a Krishnaji conference and invited her. She wanted to come, but was uncertain about the invitation, hence her letter to Krishnamurti which caused me to telephone her and clear her.'

'In the afternoon, it was calmer. Krishnaji spoke of the part of the mind that is mechanical, because that which has cause is always mechanical. Is there a part of that, that is not mechanical? He said: Understanding pleasure and ending fear and sorrow is necessary to go beyond thought. He asked if living without ego is possible. Can we act without conclusions, images; can we prevent image-making, and wipe away ones already there? Thought is always limited, and because of that, creates images. He said: If I were whole, I would be the whole of mankind, the global sense of a human being. "It is insanity that creates images," (in the sense of whole equals sane, healthy, holy). A question was raised of why perception doesn't always work the first time. Krishnaji asked if we are conditioned to the process of gradual seeing, and if we gave conflict attention, but we don't. "We are not willing to give our lives for this." We are concerned with our own clarity, not clarity itself. If you listen with no resistance, if there is no barriers, you will have it, you've seen it. "In total listening, the problem is finished."'

'We rationalize first, and then try to perceive. Perceive is direct insight. "Let the question answer you, not you the question." Perception is timeless, correct action is always timeless.'

March twenty-first, 'was the third day, Anthony Wilden turned up for the morning session. He met Margaret Trudeau and spoke to her aggressively, so that when she came in, she was shaking, etcetera, and in tears. "I'm frightened," she said to me, and before I could speak, the conference began. Krishnaji commenced by asking, "What is correct action?" Not born of ideas. Is there perception without idea? And what follows when there is action in people? Wilden listened for only a few minutes, and then began a tirade about his having been met by violence when he arrived yesterday—he was told his friend couldn't attend. Others had wives there. Margaret Trudeau spoke up and said she thought she was his observer, and he had invited her. I said he had brought two people uninvited. Because of the size of the room, we had been unable to admit them. Many who wanted to attend, couldn't, etc. He said he didn't know the man who was there. I said he had come with them, and that he, Wilden, was here as a guest of the Foundation and was asked to go along with the circumstances provided. He ranted on, refusing to calm down, began stuffing his papers into a briefcase, putting on his jacket, and shook a book at everybody, saying something about: if you want to learn, read this! It was his own book.' [S laughs.]

‘And then defiantly pulled out a cigarette and lit it. David pointed out that no smoking had been requested. “That’s what I mean,” said Wilden, then, threw up his hands and said, “Let me go!” There was a small chorus of, “Well, go!”’ [both chuckle] ‘went up, and he left. Erna drove him to Ojai, and it took most of the rest of the morning for the conference to settle down. Shainberg, it turns out, had thumbed through one of his books, and from that got the impression that he was interested in Krishnaji. On that sliver, Shainberg had invited Wilden.’

S: Oh dear. So this was Shainberg’s doing?

M: Yes, Shainberg’s doing. [Laughs and S laughs, too.] I’d forgotten some of that.

S: Somehow that sounds like David Shainberg. [Laughs.]

M: Yes.

Now I only have entries in the little book until sometime in April, so each day will be short.

S: That’s better than nothing.

M: So, the twenty-second. ‘The fourth day of the conference. Globus beforehand proposed to Krishnaji that Margaret Trudeau be admitted as a participant. This led to all observers being considered as participants. The tables were rearranged. Someone urged more discussion of each person’s problems.’

So, we go to the twenty-third, the fifth day of the conference. ‘Globus and Franklin tried to reduce it to personal discussion of “violence” at the conference, causing the departure of…’ Somebody with a name beginning with D—don’t remember his name.

The sixth day of the conference was on March twenty-fourth. ‘David Bohm came to the cottage to talk to Krishnaji about Globus and how to proceed.’ Globus was the one who—he insisted on wearing a hat of power! [S laughs, then M laughs.] ‘The meeting began with Krishnaji discussing silence. And then fifteen minutes of silence ensued. Then, Krishnaji asked if Globus, who had raised personal things, wanted to go into that. Globus said he had seen that it was in him, and so the discussion was released and went on to some extraordinary depth by Krishnaji. All ended favorably and warmly. In the afternoon, most of the scientists left, including Margaret Trudeau.’ All that will have to be listened to in the archives because it was recorded.

S: But, the whole conference was a shambles, it seems.

M: It was a shambles.

S: The 1974 scientists’ conference at Brockwood was really well-behaved and…

M: Compared to this!

S: A great success. Yes, this is a shambles.

M: Shambles! [S laughs heartily.] Well, you see, you had two: Globus was a psychiatrist, so I assume, though, I don't remember directly whether it was Shainberg's suggestion that Globus come, or what, but I suspect it was because they're both psychiatrists.

S: The first conference at Brockwood was arranged by David Bohm. And this second one was arranged largely by Shainberg?

M: Well, I'm guessing. I don't really remember who invited who. I mean, it was David who was the originator of having scientists' conferences. And, of course, he and David Shainberg were friends. So, the cast of characters emanated from one or both of them.

S: Right, okay. Alright, let's go on.

M: We didn't know any of these people. We knew the KFA people.

S: Yes.

M: So, that's what happened! [Both chuckle again.]

March twenty-fifth, 'David Bohm and David Shainberg came to the cottage at 8 a.m. to discuss the proposed videotaped discussions that are to be held at Brockwood in May, and things they would do at Brockwood in May. Erna came in after a while. We had breakfast. Then, Mrs. Ellis came afterwards. At 12:30 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview to Dr. Renèe Weber'—she had been in the conference—'who teaches philosophy at Rutgers. She had stayed to lunch at Arya Vihara with us, the Bohms, and the Patwardhans, Erna, Theo, Mark, and Michael Krohnen. We discussed the conference and, in certain human concepts, Krishnaji described the Theosophical hierarchy, etcetera. In explaining it, he realized he was describing a version of his own. "Mustn't mix it," he said. There was a certain atmosphere as he spoke. At 3 p.m., we drove to Malibu. He said "that" is inexhaustible. The body is tired, but never "that." "Silence is original, untouched by the human mind."'

The next day 'was just a lovely quiet day at home. Deskwork for me. Krishnaji rested.'

March twenty-seventh. 'Desk. Amanda came over at lunchtime, and David and Philippa came. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji and I went into Santa Monica to see a movie called Three Days of the Condor. We were home in time to see Solzhenitsyn in a BBC interview on TV.'

March twenty-eighth. 'I went to the Dunnes' in the morning. We sat on the terrace and talked. I was home for lunch with Krishnaji. I had a long talk with my brother in New York on business matters. Sunanda arrived at 5 p.m., to stay until we go back to Ojai. All three of us had supper on trays and watched Kojak.' Kojak was a big fixture in our lives [S chuckles] in those days. Krishnaji liked to watch Kojak.

S: I remember.

M: Kojak for those who don't know…

S: No, we all know!

M: We all know? Well, future generations may not know Kojak. [S laughs heartily.] You better explain it.

S: Alright. It was a television program with a bald New York detective by the name of Kojak, and it was very funny and it was a good program.

M: Yes, yes. And I will insert my own comment, which is that Krishnaji would laugh because it was very funny, but he wasn't quite sure what he was laughing at because he didn't quite understand the New York accent! [S laughs.] And as a New Yorker, I was called on to translate! But he still caught on that it was funny because he would ask me, but he'd be laughing as he asked.

March twenty-ninth. 'Home all day. Chuck Rusch came in the afternoon about the cottage plans. Krishnaji, Sunanda, and I watched the Academy Awards on TV.'

The next day, 'I had a 9 a.m. appointment with an immigration lawyer, George Rosenberg, about Krishnaji's residence in the U.S. and whether to apply from here or from abroad, and did miscellaneous errands on the way back. In the afternoon, I walked over to visit the Dunnes. Krishnaji, Sunanda, and Sidney Field came over, and we all four walked down to the beach.' I think that was the immigration lawyer who had been the head of immigration, and he was retired, and working as a consultant on immigration. We were trying to bring Krishnaji in as a religious leader, and he said to me, your organization is not a religious one.

S: Ah yes, because there was no god?

M: Yes. And I said, why? And he said because there's no deity. So, rather smugly, I said, would you consider Buddhism a religion? "Oh, yes!" I said, there is no deity in Buddhism, and he just glared at me! [S chuckles.] Anyway, he wasn't much help, but anyway and so forth. We were paying him for this, by the way, and he was against it.

So, we now jump into March thirty-first. 'I went to an eye exam and came back to Malibu. And then Krishnaji, Sunanda, and I drove to Ojai to stay through Krishnaji's talks. Sunanda and husband, Pama, had supper with us in the cottage.'

April first. 'The Patwardhans and the Lilliefelts lunched with us. Shakuntala and Natasha arrived to stay at Arya Vihara. Narayan arrives tomorrow. At 10 a.m. I went to the Ventura County courthouse conditional-use permit hearing. We got the permit for the school, but they want the KFA to put in curbs and gutters and paving, on Lomita Avenue.'

Nothing much the next day.

On April third, 'there was a sudden cold wave. Krishnaji gave his first public talk of that year in the Oak Grove at 11 a.m. We lunched outside, nearby, organized by Alan Hooker. There were lots of Brockwood people there. It's very cold. We walked nevertheless. And it rained in the night. The Vigevenos were at the talk, and Krishnaji greeted both of them nicely.'

April fourth, 'It is still very cold. Rain held off during Krishnaji's second Oak Grove talk. The lunch was held in Nordhoff High School cafeteria. Jackie and Joe Kornfeld came to tea.'

The next day, 'Reg and Mavis Bennett came to tea at the cottage.'

The sixth of April. 'Krishnaji held a public discussion in the Oak Grove. Rajagopal was there. Lunch was at Arya Vihara. The trustees met to go over plans for the school buildings before the architects' meeting tomorrow.'

The next day. 'There was an architects' meeting all day with the trustees, and there was also a meeting with Moore and Rusch in the cottage about the cottage. Asit Chandmal appeared and dined with Krishnaji and me in the cottage. Sunanda, Pama, and Mark came in later. Krishnaji stayed up till 11 o'clock.'

April eighth, 'it rained. There was no public discussion.'

On the ninth, 'At 11 a.m., Sunanda, Pama, Asit Chandmal, Erna, Theo, and I went to the K & R office to see the archives.' We were supposed to have the right to go, according to the settlement agreement with Rajagopal, any time we wanted, and Erna always gave at least a week's notice. 'Erna, at the Ventura meeting, nine days ago, had told Mrs. Vigeveno we were coming. Mrs. Vigeveno had said it was necessary to ask Mr. Christensen.' That was Rajagopal's lawyer.

'Erna said we are coming under the settlement agreement and that there was no need to ask Mr. Christensen. Erna spoke to Cohen'—that was our lawyer in the case—'who said that we should go ahead. We arrived, and the office was locked, and there was no one there. We all walked to the Vigevenos'. Agitated, Mrs. Vigeveno opened the door and said Christensen had tried to reach Erna and couldn't (Erna was at home and in the office all day, and there was no call), and said we couldn't see the archives. We introduced the Indians with us briefly, trustees of KFI, etc. Erna suggested her telephoning Christensen then and there since he had "tried" to call her. Very reluctantly, Vigeveno let us in, and it was a long time getting the number and dialing it. Erna spoke to him first, and then I did. It is not convenient for his clients, he said. Reasonable rights and visiting must be settled before we can go. I asked what they'd consider more reasonable than nine days' notice, and for an 11 a.m. weekday visit? He repeated it is not convenient. I said, convenience defined by him could prevent our ever going, and it was a continuation of obstacles put in our way a year ago. He said we will settle this. And I suggested he be more responsive to Cohen's letters and telephone calls, so we could end this charade. Erna got back on the phone, and was much gentler.'

We departed, and got back in the Mercedes parked outside K & R. Then, the Indians suggested going over to Rajagopal's. I said I wouldn't go, and Erna wouldn't either, but urged Theo to go with them. They went. Unshaven, dilapidated, in a bathrobe, Rajagopal met them. He greeted Sunanda enthusiastically. They talked on the porch. He said he was helpless. His lawyer's advice was preventing him. Then, he invited Sunanda to come the next day, and he would show her. Asit said he was leaving today and would like to see his aunt's, "Pupul's account" of the Ootacamund events. Rajagopal said he didn't quite know where anything was. They didn't stay. Sunanda said she would let him know. She came back, and over lunch at Arya Vihara, recounted it to Krishnaji. Sunanda, Asit, and Pama were shocked by what they had seen. Sunanda at lunch became tearful. Krishnaji said Rajagopal was a scoundrel, and it was insulting to invite her but refuse entry to the rest. It was awful to see a man so deteriorated, Sunanda said. She was sorry for him, as a tragedy. I said it is always a tragedy when someone behaves evilly; Hitler was a tragedy, but my sympathy goes to the victims of such people. Rajagopal has consistently, in the past and continues, to spit on something and someone we all consider sacred. That is what one sees. Sunanda later telephoned Rajagopal and said she wasn't coming.'

'Mrs. Mathias arrived and is staying with Mrs. Porter.'

April tenth. 'Krishnaji gave his third public talk in the Oak Grove. We lunched near the Ranch House Restaurant. In the afternoon, Krishnaji held an education discussion in the cottage which included the Siddoos, Tapas, Sunanda, Pama, Shakuntala, Narayan, etc. Later, Mrs. Mathias came and talked to Krishnaji.'

On April eleventh, 'Krishnaji gave the fourth Ojai talk. Lunch again near the Ranch House. Sunanda and Pama left after lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held another education discussion on one who touches intelligence, and giving it to a student, which I taped. Mrs. Porter brought Blanche Mathias at 5 o'clock.'

For April twelfth, it just says, 'Desk. Dictated letters. It rained and was cold. Lunched at Arya Vihara. Mrs. Mathias came again in the afternoon.'

The next day, 'It was cold, but rain held off from the Oak Grove while Krishnaji held a public discussion. Mrs. Mathias again came to see Krishnaji.'

On April fourteenth, 'I left Ojai at 9:30 a.m. and drove to Los Angeles where I met Charles Moore at the Pacific Design Center. I looked at tiles, appliances, etc., and went over plans at his office in Westwood. Then I got some books from Winky's, and got to Malibu at 5 p.m. There I had supper with the Dunnes, plus Miranda, Philippa, and David, and Schlesinger's son. I left at 7:20 p.m., and drove back to Ojai, reaching the cottage by 8:40. Krishnaji had talked to the Siddoos, Tapas, Narayan, etc. Fritz Wilhelm has arrived.'

April fifteenth. 'Krishnaji gave the fourth public talk in the Grove. It was very cold. Krishnaji tried to have a dialogue with Fritz, Narayan, and David Moody, with the public allowed to join in. The subject was the same as at the scientists' conference: In a disintegrating society, what is correct action? They also discussed: what is correct action to survive in freedom? Then, there was lunch at Arya Vihara. I talked futilely to Al Blackburn after lunch.' I don't know what about. 'At 3:30 p.m., Krishnaji held a meeting in the cottage on the activity of the Educational Center for adults. Present were the trustees, and Mark, Fritz, and Narayan. The walk was down Thacher Road, and around, with Krishnaji, Fritz, Alan K. and me.'

April sixteenth was Good Friday. 'Krishnaji talked to Narayan, the Siddoos, and Tapas at 9:30 a.m. Narayan is to join the Siddoo school in Vancouver. Erna and I talked to Stanley Cohen'—that's our lawyer—'about Rajagopal and whether to sue him for non-compliance of the settlement agreement. He should try for compliance first through Christensen, and with an implication of a suit. At 11 a.m., I saw Bill Angelos and a young Englishman, Mark Sayre, who might give videotape equipment. We lunched at Arya Vihara. At 3 p.m. there was a trustees meeting, then we were joined by the staff, Mark, David Moody, Katie Marx, and Michael Krohnen.'

On the seventeenth of April. 'At 11 a.m., Krishnaji gave the fifth Ojai talk. It was a large crowd, 3,000 to 5,000 people. Krishnaji felt it was a messy crowd. We ate in the field in Hooker's arrangement, and left. At 3 p.m., Krishnaji saw Mr. Camarge.' I don't know who that is. 'I talked to Shakuntala about Narayan going to Vancouver. Natasha'—that's Narayan's and Shakuntala's child—'would be at Brockwood. At 3:30 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion about what should go on at the Educational Center. David Bohm, Fritz Wilhelm, Narayan, the Siddoos, Tapas, and the trustees were there. Krishnaji, Alan K., and I went for a walk.'

April eighteenth, 'Krishnaji gave his sixth and final Ojai talk for this year. Over 5,000 people were there. He spoke on religion, meditation, and duty. After the talk, we ate with the audience in the Grove briefly, then came back to the cottage. I packed. Krishnaji held a meeting with David Bohm, Fritz Wilhelm, the Lilliefelts, and Alan K. to discuss the center plans. Fritz is to move to Ojai either in October, or if Krishnaji goes to India, he will go there and come to Ojai in February to direct the Adult Education Center. We left Ojai and came home to Malibu in time for supper.'

April nineteenth, 'Home all day. Worked on Krishnaji's immigration papers. Bill Angelos came by about the videotape plans of his for the Foundation. Krishnaji and I walked in the garden. I spoke to my family in the east.'

The next day, 'We went to town, had a picnic in the car near UCLA, and met Alan Kishbaugh at the Bruin Theater to see a movie, All the President's Men, the Watergate story. Earlier, Bill Angelos came with a letter to Krishnaji about his videotaping, etcetera. I talked to him at some length. Blackburn is in the scheme, possibly Carl Marcus. He then came back as Krishnaji and I were leaving for town, and while walking to the car, again I said that he must see and talk to Erna and the Foundation members.'

April twenty-first. 'Chuck Rusch came with the revised plan and roofing samples. Charles Moore is ill. Krishnaji spent the morning going over the plans with Rusch. Erna said Angelos telephoned her that Krishnaji had authorized him to go ahead with his plan. Frances McCann then called with the same story. I telephoned Angelos and told him he had no right to say this. Krishnaji had authorized nothing. We both simply told him to speak to Erna. Erna says Marcus is not putting up the money for it.'

The twenty-second of April. 'I went to the lawyers and fetched the package of papers to present to the U.S. consul about Krishnaji's residence permit. Did various errands. Went to Lailee'—that's my doctor.—'for scar inspection before leaving. I was home by 3 o'clock. Krishnaji and I walked in the garden.'

April twenty-third. 'I began packing. Shakuntala, Narayan, and Mark Lee to lunch. Narayan is interested in Vancouver with the Siddoos and Tapas. Discussed it with Krishnaji, and it was decided he'd go with the Siddoos and create a school and center in Vancouver. Krishnaji also discussed the Rishi Valley problems.'

The next day. 'Packing. The cars were put on blocks[3]. Alan K. came at noon for lunch. Then he drove Krishnaji and me to Century City where we all saw the Hitchcock movie Family Plot.' Don't remember that one. 'Back for tea. Then, Chuck Rusch came with the revised plans for the cottage. Both Krishnaji and I began to feel enthusiastic about them.'

April twenty-fifth. 'More packing. After lunch, I went over to spend the afternoon with the Dunnes. Betsy came. Krishnaji came too for a short time on the way to the beach for a walk. We had supper as usual, and then I finished packing and putting things away.'

April twenty-sixth. 'Up at 5 a.m., as it became light on a clear marvelous morning. Calm after some wind in the night. I washed my hair, wrote a letter, fixed breakfast, then put things in the safe. Alan K. came at 7 a.m. I had brought the Dunnes' VW back yesterday afternoon, and I had loaded it with the large bags. Now, Alan took the rest. Krishnaji went with him, and I went with Amanda to the airport after goodbyes to Phil and Philippa. Narayan and Mark came to see Krishnaji off at the airport. Narayan flies back to India tonight after agreeing to join the Siddoos in starting a school in Vancouver. Krishnaji and I flew on the 9:15 a.m. TWA to New York. My brother sent a car to meet us, and we reached the Ritz Tower by about 6 p.m.'

FOOTNOTES:

[1] The apartment mentioned is above the office next to Pine Cottage.

[2] The Krishnamurti and Rajagopal Foundation was one of many organizations Rajagopal founded to hold and transfer property and copyright.

[3]The best way to look after cars for long storage at that time was to lift them off of their suspension by putting them on blocks.

Issue 41: April 27, 1976 to July 10, 1976

The two most significant events for Krishnaji's work that occurred during the period covered by this issue is the video recording of his discussion with David Bohm and David Shainberg, and the publication of Krishnamurti's Notebook, both of which were remarkable and singular. Otherwise, Krishnaji and Mary are following their well-worn path of New York, England, and Switzerland. But we are increasingly allowed access to the extraordinary inner life of Krishnaji as he tells her and sometimes even dictates things to her about that remarkable inner life.

Mary: Well, we start with Tuesday, April twenty-seventh, 1976, and we're in New York. 'Krishnaji's nephew, also named Narasimhan, is a brother of Narayan, and he came to see Krishnaji that day. He has a thin, sharp face, no resemblance to Krishnaji. He's an engineer who has been in the U.S. for 10 years, and is now looking for a new job. Then I went to the market for supplies. My brother came by at 12:30 p.m. Then, Krishnaji, he, and I walked to the Côte Basque for lunch. Bud spoke of Krishnaji's biography and the large impression it made on him. He sent it to all the members of the family, and he asked Krishnaji about the communications reported between Theosophy and the Masters. Krishnaji explained the beliefs that were held by the Theosophists, and way back, before that, by the Hindus and Buddhists. He said he has no memory of those days. Bud noted that Krishnaji had always spoken and written of what is amiss in human thinking, but not directly about the Other. The book gave Bud some glimpse into that. I mentioned the about-to-be-published Krishnamurti's Notebook. Bud asked if Jesus figured in the Theosophical hierarchy. Krishnaji said Jesus was considered to be "a disciple," [S laughs] not an original. We walked back, stopping at the Belgian Shoes, where we each bought a pair.' [M laughs.] That's these flat shoes—this is one of Krishnaji's shoes that I have on now…

Scott: Right, right.

M: He liked them, and I wear nothing else. So, we went in there and made some shoe purchases. 'Krishnaji had his hair cut. He then rested.'

S: Where did he have his hair cut in New York?

M: There was a good barber, a block away, at the Hotel Lombardy.

S: Hm.

M: I think my brother must've advised that, or somebody did. 'I walked to Bergdorf Goodman to send my mother a birthday present. We made our supper, and so to bed. Krishnaji is thinking he can put questions to the psychiatrists tomorrow.' We were going to that psychiatrists' meeting that Shainberg arranged.

S: Yes.

April twenty-eighth. ‘At 11 a.m., we went to the psychiatrists’ conference organized by Shainberg. Krishnaji and I took the Patwardhans to lunch’—they were there—‘at the Madras Woodlands on 44th Street.’ You must know the Woodlands restaurant in Madras. You may have been there. If you ever went to a restaurant in Madras, you went to Woodlands. There’s a branch of it in New York. ‘Narasimhan came by.’ This is the UN Narasimhan.

S: Right.

M: He’s also the cousin, I think it is, of Mrs. Jayalakshmi in Madras. Anyway, ‘Narasimhan doubted that Krishnaji should go to India.’ Krishnaji was concerned, you know, because Mrs. Gandhi still had martial law in place. ‘Sunanda and Pama came back with us to the Ritz Tower, and we talked at length. They left, and my brother came by again to talk to me about business.’

Now, there’s nothing for the twenty-eighth, and very little for the next day. I think those were the days of the psychiatrists’ meetings, so I’ll have to do that from memory. First of all, they weren’t all psychiatrists; there were psychologists, too. They were sort of unintelligent [chuckles] about asking good questions of Krishnaji. I think it’s at this one that the subject of fear came up; and everybody had anecdotes about patients with trouble with different fears, fears of death, fears of illness, fears of mothers-in-law, endless fears they trotted out. But they never were interested in discussing what fear itself is.

S: Right, right.

M: Krishnaji tried to cope with that. But they were, I don’t know…that’s partly why I feel they were trivial, just being critical of a lot of people.

S: Right. I seem to remember those talks not being very successful.

M: No, no, they weren’t.

S: And this again was arranged by Shainberg.

M: Oh, yes. He was head of some psychiatric organization in New York, and so he whistled in all these people. I don’t know, but I felt it didn’t produce much, but maybe it did.

S: Well, who knows.

M: So, there’s nothing either on the twenty-ninth or the thirtieth in either books. I don’t know why I didn’t write it up, but I didn’t. But that’s my memory of it.

S: That’s okay.

M: I think we lunched with the Shainbergs. I think I asked David Shainberg once in the taxi going to lunch about why the psychiatrists wouldn't examine what fear is, and he said, "Oh, they'll never do that!" [Both chuckle.] Dismissing it.

S: They'll never really look at the nature of fear itself. They want to…

M: No, no. They want to talk about their patients' problems. Anyway, so we have to rely on my…

S: Thirty-year-old memory.

M: Thirty-year-old memory. [Both laugh.]

We go now to May first, where there is something in the little book. It says 'we arrived at Heathrow at 7:30 a.m., and Dorothy, Doris, and Ted Cartee were there to meet Krishnaji. We drove to Brockwood on a lovely, sunny day. The trees are just beginning to leaf. The school turned out for his arrival. I unpacked, took a nap, and spoke to Mary Links.'

The next day, 'The weather turned cold. I put luggage away and tidied things. Telephoned to Filomena, Vanda, the Digbys, Ginny Travers'—that's Virginia McKenna. 'We went for a short walk. David Bohm gave a report of the Ojai scientist conference to the school. Aditi Mangaldas, Nandini's granddaughter, arrived from India for a three-day visit.'

On the third of May, 'I got the Mercedes out of Mr. Morton's barn, where it had been all winter, and took it to be put in order. I worked at the desk. It was cold. Britain is having a drought. We had our walk in the afternoon. Krishnaji decided to have meetings alone with students one day a week, starting Thursday.[1]' You might remember that.

S: I do.

M: So, next day, May fourth, 'Krishnaji talked to the whole school. Mary Cadogan came to lunch, and we talked over things. We walked, but it was cold.'

Wednesday, the fifth. 'The car was delivered. It now lives in the new garage. After lunch, Krishnaji and I drove to Chandler's Ford to find a charger for his Philips razor. [S and M chuckle.] He was always looking for the latest thing in razors!

S: I remember.

M: 'Krishnaji slept little last night, he said. We walked across the fields.'

The sixth of May, 'Krishnaji spoke alone to the students, no staff were present, and no tape recorder. Mary Links and Amanda Pallant drove down in the morning and spent the day with us. We discussed the Krishnaji and Bohm dialogues for publication and/or cassette sale. Mary was against it.' She was very resistant about the Bohm dialogues.

S: I remember.

M: She felt—she misunderstood, I think—that Bohm might give the impression of being too dominating in the discussions. But that was because most of these dialogues between them were held as Krishnaji got up from his nap, and he was sort of still a bit fuzzy, waking up. So, David would reprise a little bit of where they'd left off. But Mary felt that it sounded like he was telling Krishnaji what he should say.

S: But also, I'm quite sure, because I remember these as they were going on, and at the end of these, Krishnaji didn't like them. I was listening to them every day as they were being done—I think it was the year before—every day as they were being done, and I thought that they were fabulous. You could say that David dominated, but in a way, it was just the form that they had. Krishnaji and he were going back and forth.

M: I never feel he dominated, and I was there at every one of them.

S: Yes, but toward the end, I remember Krishnaji saying that he also didn't think they should be published.

M: Well, I think that was Mary's influence.

S: It may have been Mary's influence, but I remember Krishnaji saying that too, and I remember thinking, well, I understand why. It's one thing to probably hear them, but when you see them written, it looks a very different thing, which is why I was a little disappointed when these actually did come out as a book, because Krishnaji himself had said he didn't think they should. And I can't remember if I heard him say it, or what. I wasn't close enough to him in those days to have been told anything special by him. But, Krishnaji himself did not want these things disseminated. He didn't think that they were fruitful, or he didn't think that they were useful, or something like that.

M: He didn't want enough to say "No. Don't." He usually, when things were over, he sort of—they were over. I do remember Mary objected to it.

S: Right, right.

M: And Mary wasn't too interested in the intellectual aspect of things.

S: Yes.

M: Which is Bohm's contribution.

S: Yes. And David was very disappointed that they were not being done.

M: Yes.

S: I might even have heard it from David because I was seeing him a lot in those days.

M: There were…to this day, or the last time I saw Saral, there were some early ones before Brockwood…

S: I remember those.

M: And those were not published till later.

S: I remember.

M: And there's some, Mary Cadogan had some—I've forgotten the rationale for it, there was some publication committee and I sat in on all the discussions, but I don't remember exactly—it was something to do with publishing, and eventually, they were published. But that was a different batch.

'We walked, Dorothy, Krishnaji, and I.' And it says there was a big earthquake in Udine. Udine is in northern Italy.

On the seventh, 'it was Filomena's birthday. I tried to telephone but couldn't get through. It was a hot summer day.' And that's all it says.

And then the next day is even less. 'Another hot day. We walked in afternoon.'

Then, on the ninth, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school at noon. He talked to the Moorheads about Rishi Valley. Another hot day.'

May tenth, 'The weather cooled. I went to Petersfield for plants, etc. Walked. At 9 a.m., Pascaline Mallet came and I met her at the Petersfield station. She's staying in the West Wing until Friday.' That was a Monday.

On the eleventh, 'Krishnaji talked to the students only. The staff held a meeting at the same time. We walked in afternoon. Cold!'—exclamation point.

May twelfth, 'Krishnaji, on his eighty-first birthday, came in as I was ironing in the pre-exercise dawn. "Oh," he said, in dismissal of his birthday.' [Both chuckle lightly.] 'He was joking in the kitchen while we made breakfast. Later, the Guardian book review department rang up asking to interview him about the Notebook. Its publication date is the twentieth. The BBC is sending down a Radio 4 interviewer to interview him. Krishnaji asked, "Why are they interested?" He brushes aside the obvious replies.' [Chuckles.] 'He spent the morning in bed reading and sleeping. He greeted Dorothy with a "Happy Birthday, Happy Birthday." And kept going, saying to Doris, too, "That takes care of that." It is Dorothy's birthday, too. I had no present for her, and hence a quandary. I gave her several of the photos of Krishnaji I took in the cottage last month. In a great wind, he, she, and I walked our way four miles across the fields. Krishnaji was glowing with vitality. In the evening, we watched a long Kojak on TV.'

May thirteenth, ‘Krishnaji talked to the whole school at noon. We walked. I had a long talk with Ted Cartee.’

On the fourteenth, ‘Pascaline Mallet, who has been staying in the West Wing, left. I took the 9:45 a.m. train to London, did errands, then went to the U.S. embassy. I filed Krishnaji’s application for an immigration visa and permanent residence in the U.S., a green card. Then, to Morgan-Guaranty, where I opened an account and transferred the balance from both Morgan-Paris and Chase-London accounts, thereby closing them. Jackie Kornfeld arrived at Brockwood and I put her up in the West Wing, where she will stay during the videotaping.’ She was paying for that, as you well know.

S: I remember, I remember well.

M: The next day, ‘the video producer and director, David Hoffman and Harry Wyland’… Do you remember them?

S: I do. I remember them both.

M: …‘arrived. So did the Bohms and David Shainberg. There was a meeting in the afternoon to discuss the project.[2] There was a walk. Aditi Mangaldas’—that’s Nandini’s granddaughter—‘danced in the evening for the school.’

On May sixteenth, ‘Krishnaji spoke to everyone. It was very good, regarding the religious life. The video equipment was set up in the drawing room. We walked, but came back a little sooner so Krishnaji could appear at the end of a musical recital. After supper, I talked video business with Jackie Kornfeld, D. Hoffman, and H. Wyland.’

On the seventeenth, ‘At 11 a.m., Krishnaji, David Bohm, and David Shainberg did a one-hour videotaped discussion. There was an excellent, very professional crew of nine people, plus Hoffman and Wyland. Three color cameras, and recorded on two-inch tape. Krishnaji had a large clock off-camera, so he kept pace, and cut off at the right moment. I watched on a monitor in the hall outside the drawing room, where the director’s set-up was.’

Then, it is Tuesday, the eighteenth. ‘The second day of videotaping. They recorded discussion number two in the morning and number three in the afternoon. It went well. Krishnaji stayed in; no walk this week as he has signs of hay fever beginning. He said to me in the evening, “I had the most extraordinary meditation while sitting at breakfast. I went off. I must be very careful. You know, death is very close. You mustn’t look like that when I mention death. It isn’t that; it is complete emptiness, nothingness.”’

May nineteenth, ‘Krishnaji and the two Davids did discussions four and five, and number four was particularly good.’

S: Yes, it was.

M: 'Krishnaji is still not going out because of hay fever. He does his exercises in his room.'

May twentieth. 'Videotaping of discussions six and seven, both of which were marvelous. The videotaped discussions are now finished. I went to a staff meeting.'

The next day, 'At 11 a.m., they videotaped an introduction to the discussions, then it was finished. Hoffman and Wyland left. John Hawking of Zoom Television went over things with Jackie Kornfeld and me. I am buying two-inch quads for KF Trust and a set of cassettes for Brockwood. Joe Kornfeld, Jackie's husband, joined us for lunch, and then they both left. By mid-afternoon, all was back in place, clean and peaceful. But a very fine record was well-made, professionally and of greater depth than any discussion so far recorded visually. Krishnaji is still staying in bed as the pollen count is high. There's no rain in sight. Dorothy and I walked with Whisper. There was a school meeting.'

S: Is there any point in saying that probably Krishnaji encouraged you to go out for a walk without him? In other words, if he couldn't go out for a walk, he still wanted you to go out and walk.

M: He would want me to go out for a walk in a snowstorm!

S: [laughs] I know!

M: Many was the day it was raining, and I looked rather bleak at the prospect, and he said, "Come, come. Walk!"

S: [laughs] Yes, and just because he couldn't walk doesn't mean that you could get out of it!

M: No! And, it's not worth noting [S laughing] because it was just standard procedure.

S: Yes, well, the standard is also worth noting sometimes.

M: [laughs] So, that's that.

The twenty-second. 'Nelly and George Digby came for lunch. Krishnaji didn't walk, but Dorothy and I took both dogs.[3]'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school,' and that's all it says.

On May twenty-fourth, 'from the BBC, Monica Furlong and James Priestland came to lunch, and then interviewed Krishnaji about Krishnamurti's Notebook for the program Chapter and Verse, which reviews books with a religious bent. Krishnaji saw them alone, but he said they hadn't asked any intelligent questions.'

On the next day, ‘it was a half-term holiday. Krishnaji rested and stayed in bed to avoid hay fever.’

And on the twenty-sixth, ‘A Ms. Angela Neustater came from The Guardian newspaper to interview Krishnaji about Krishnamurti’s Notebook. She saw him for one-and-a-half hours, took copious notes, and went off with two other books and the biography. Krishnaji said she was more intelligent than the BBC pair.’

On the twenty-seventh, ‘Krishnaji spoke to the school reassembled after the half-term,’ and that’s all.

On the twenty-eighth, ‘I took the Mercedes for its 15,000-mile service to Chichester. I spent the morning, while it was being done, pleasantly wandering in Chichester, and the cathedral. I found small turquoise earrings, and I bought them’ [chuckles]. ‘I did errands in Petersfield on the way back. I sent copies of the newly printed Krishnamurti’s Notebook to my brother, Amanda, Evelyne Blau, and Cynthia Wood. Suzanne and Hugues van der Straten arrived for the weekend and were staying in the West Wing.’

For May twenty-ninth, there is almost nothing. ‘Desk. Went to a meeting David Bohm held for the school. Walked with the van der Stratens.’

May thirtieth, ‘Krishnaji spoke to school, and it was one of the best; on images, and the self. Tura’—remember her, the student?

S: Oh, yes.

M: …‘an Israeli student, sang and played the guitar for Krishnaji, Bohm, etcetera, in the afternoon in the West Wing. The van der Stratens left. The BBC book review of Krishnamurti’s Notebook was broadcast in the evening. A nothing.’ I guess that’s what I thought. ‘Priestland didn’t seem to have read the book’ [chuckles] ‘and asked nothing but pointless questions about Mrs. Besant and Leadbeater.’

Monday the thirty-first. ‘Desk mostly. In a light rain, Krishnaji took his first walk in two weeks with Dorothy and me and the dogs. Even in the rain, he felt some hay fever afterward.’

The first of June. ‘I went early to London and to India House, for the police clearance from India necessary for the U.S. immigration application. Narayan, who was on the train, offered to come with me and was very helpful. We saw a Mr. G. Vettakhan, secretary for education, who took me to see a minister, Mr. Abrams. After comic to-do in which pompous minister—’ [stops mid-sentence].

S: Go ahead, read it. [Chuckles.]

M: She’s very critical, this woman.

S: Well, she should be, undoubtedly. [Both chuckle.]

M: …'after comic to-do in which pompous minister who was oh-so-tactfully corrected by deferential Sikh underling, with elastic under the chin,' [chuckling] 'offering all submission gestures and jugular vein to his superior,' [both laugh] 'it was found the clearance could be given by the minister and didn't have to be referred back to India. All well in the end!' [More laughter.] 'Thank you, smiles, etcetera. Then, Mr. Vettakhan invited Narayan and me to lunch in an Indian restaurant nearby, which was accepted. I escaped later, went to the bank and to Air France for our tickets, and caught the 3:50 p.m. back to Petersfield.' [More laughter by both.]

S: Yes, we want these details!

M: Well, we had some there. [More laughter.]

June second. 'Krishnaji and I went to London, to Huntsman'—naturally [chuckles]—'looked at patterns. Mary L. lunched with us at Fortnum's. Then back to Huntsman for me to get some tweeds to be made into a skirt and trousers by a new tailor, Mr. Pitts on Cork Street, as my previous tailor at Rowe's has gone elsewhere. Then to Hatchards for reading matter. To Waterloo train station, but our train was delayed, and we only got home at 7 p.m.'

June third. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. I sent Krishnaji's papers to India House, and did errands in Alresford. Erna telephoned about the videotapes.'

So, we go to June fourth. 'There was a publication committee meeting at 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji and I were both there. They all stayed for lunch. I walked with Dorothy and the dogs. Krishnaji is still staying in.'

For June fifth my diary says, 'A desk day. Went to the Bohm discussion. Walked with Dorothy and the dogs. Telephoned Erna about donors for the videotapes.'

S: Now, we should probably just say that when you refer to the Bohm discussions, Bohm used to have discussions…

M: …with the school.

S: …with staff, I think.

M: Staff or something. It wasn't Krishnaji discussing with Bohm.

S: No. No. I think at one point he discussed with the whole school, or anyone who wanted to come, but eventually it was just the staff.

M: Well, you would know that better than I because I didn't go to them.

S: Yes, I went to them all.

M: You went to them all, and I don't have any notation about those.

S: Yes, so I'm just saying for the record what they are.

M: June sixth. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school about being hurt. There was a walk with Dorothy and the dogs. I telephoned my mother on her birthday, but she was beginning a nap and couldn't come to the phone. I talked to my stepfather, who said…' Well, we don't have to go into that.

'Shortly afterward, my brother telephoned from Paris. He and his wife Lisa had been in Europe twelve days, Paris and Bonn, but were unable to reach me. He also told me that Dr. Wolf died last Thursday, age 93, in the Janker Clinic in Bonn. Bud wants to have Dr. Sheef at the Janker become his and Lisa's doctor, and arranged for their and Krishnaji's and my records to be transferred. He's more than ever impressed with the clinic'—that is my brother who is impressed. My sister-in-law, his wife, she had all sorts of things wrong with her.

Dr. Wolf was the old German doctor in White Plains that, you will remember, Krishnaji and I and my brother went to.

S: Right, right.

M: He's the one who came up with Krishnaji having gout in his finger, left hand, fourth finger, and that gout is caused by too much uric acid in the system. Based on that, at some point, I must've told Parchure about it, and he looked in an herb book and found that nettles are very good for too much uric acid.

S: Right, it gets rid of it.

M: So, he went out…[chuckles]

S: Oh, I remember, and collected vast sways of …

M: …and then had to dry it. Do you remember?

S: I remember, I remember, all over the West Wing landing.

M: So, I thought, where in the world can I dry a ton of green nettle, but the stairs that we never use…

S: I remember, [chuckling] I remember.

M: …had sheets put down on them, and that was covered with nettles. It's much easier to buy it in a health food store, but we didn't know that. Anyway, that's what happened with that.

June seventh, 'A hot day. Oh, for some rain. The drought in southern England and the northern half of France is severe. We went to London. I left a skirt to be copied at Huntsman. Then we walked to Fortnum's, where we lunched with Mary and Joe. Mary took Krishnaji to the dentist, Mr. Thompson, while I took the Huntsman tweed and models of skirts and slacks to be copied at Hillier's on Cork Street. I got a pair of shoes at Ferragamo, joined Krishnaji at the dentist, and then we caught the 3:50 p.m. train back to Petersfield. It was a hot day.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to students at noon, while the staff had a staff meeting. It was a hot day.'

The ninth, 'It was another very warm day. Krishnaji stayed in. I went to Winchester on errands, but was back in time for lunch. In the afternoon, I did letters.'

There's even less for the tenth. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school.'

June eleventh, 'Krishnaji did letter dictations. Jean Michael de Bloos did a fine job of washing and waxing the Mercedes.' I remember him.

S: Yes, he was a very nice chap.

M: Yes, he was nice.

On the twelfth, I drove to the Meyers' in Sussex for lunch.

S: Who are the Meyers?

M: The Meyers are Fleur and Tom. Fleur was known by her first husband's name, Cowles.

S: Oh, yes, the painter.

M: She's a painter. I have one of her paintings in the other room. Her first husband owned and ran Look magazine. She divorced him; then she started a short-lived, but very eccentric and interesting magazine called Flare. When you opened it up, things blossomed out of the book; it was very interesting. It cost quite a lot of money, and didn't last long. [Both chuckle.] So, she then went off and traveled a lot. She met Tom Meyer, who lived in London, and he was in the lumber business or something in the Far East, and they married. We met them, we being Sam and myself—my husband and me—met them in Madrid once when we went for the weekend. Fleur had tremendous taste, and she found all sorts of lovely objects and decorated places beautifully. She wrote books and painted, and she's still painting and showing all over the place. She and Tom had this really extraordinary flat at Albany[4]. You remember Albany?

S: Yes, indeed.

M: Well, they lived there, and then had in the country a beautiful, old, Elizabethan-era farmhouse down in Sussex. And again, she had done it wonderfully inside. She would find extraordinary bits of furniture and things, and it was always a pleasure to visit her. And she knew everybody in the world! So, if you went there, you would likely meet interesting people. She talked about herself, [chuckles] as though she was describing her life in an Alice in Wonderland way, but it wasn't affected, which made it very interesting. [S chuckles.] It was sort of name-dropping, but with substance—interesting people, what they were doing and saying. Anyway, I still am fond of her, and think of her as a friend, though I haven't seen her in ages. Now, where was I?

'I drove to the Meyers' in Sussex on the 272'—that's the route—'through Midhurst and Petworth to Fleur and Tom's for lunch. It was a warm, lovely day, and pleasant to drive unhurriedly through southern England. The only other guest was a John van Astin, an Englishman who does films. It was, as usual, a good lunch: a first course of broad beans in a delicate sauce that might have had ground mushrooms in it. We talked mostly of the mess in the world. Fleur goes on the twenty-fourth to a hospital, where a specialist will try to find out why and what to do when her heart goes into fibrillation, as it does, or has as much as six times already this year. She said that her heart is okay, but that'…well, you don't want to hear…I don't want to go on about my friends' medical problems.

S: Okay.

M: Anyway, I drove back at 3:30 p.m. That was that day.

The thirteenth simply says, 'Krishnaji spoke to school. I worked at the desk.'

There's even less for the fourteenth, 'Desk. Walked with Dorothy in the afternoon. A hot, dry day.'

Then there's really nothing until the sixteenth when, 'I took the 8:45 a.m. train to London, and got Krishnaji's Swiss and French visas. He took the 10:45 a.m. train alone and taxied to Huntsman, where Mary L. and I met him. That was a big discussion of whether that was alright.' [S chuckles.] 'We all walked for lunch to Fortnum's. I had a fitting at Hillier's, the new tailor, on skirt and trousers. Krishnaji insisted on coming to Hillier's because he felt that he only could judge the length of trousers. He felt they should break in a certain…'

S: Right.

M: You know all that.

S: Yes, yes. [Both laugh.] I remember well, yes.

M: And if he didn't okay it, it wasn't right. He was very particular about those things.

So, he obviously came back with me…

S: To make sure that you got it right.

M: Yes. So, Krishnaji vetted the length of my trousers in the fitting. We then bought jerseys for Vanda, and caught the 3:50 p.m. back to Petersfield.

S: Would you have gotten the jerseys in the Burlington Arcade?

M: Yes. At that shop at the top.

S: Uh, Neil's?

M: Yes!

S: As you're coming back onto Piccadilly, on the left-hand side, at the top?

M: Yes, that's where we would've bought it, and walked through. We always walked through the Arcade to go on to Fortnum's from Huntsman.

June seventeenth, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. I did deskwork. There was a light, drizzly rain. So, Krishnaji took his first walk in weeks with Dorothy, Whisper, and me. The hay fever is better because of the rain.'

The next day just says 'Desk.'

June nineteenth. 'Rain! Desk. The Guardian review of Krishnaji's book by Angela Neustater is undistinguished.' I'm very fussy. 'Krishnaji didn't read it through, but gathered it was nothing much; and said, "I will review it," and he dictated a splendid review, laughing all the way as he went along.' [Both chuckle. M laughs more.] Do you remember that?

S: Yes, I do.

M: June twentieth. I went to Petersfield with Narayan to meet Mr. Vettakhan and Mr. Sundaram, head of passports in the embassy in London. They attended Krishnaji's talks with the school and stayed to lunch. Krishnaji walked down to the main road and back. In the evening I attended a cello and piano recital by M. Russell and Alan Rowlands.'

On the twenty-first, 'Krishnaji and I went to London. At lunch with Mary at Fortnum's, Krishnaji gave her the book review that he wrote of Krishnamurti's Notebook without telling her who wrote it. He watched with a merry look' [chuckles]. 'Mary didn't guess, though I thought she would. At the end, she asked, "Who wrote this?" and laughed a very great deal when she was told. She and Joe, Amanda, and the children are going to spend their summer holidays at Brockwood[5]. Krishnaji took a taxi to dentist Thompson and returned by himself to Huntsman, where I met him. These solo flights of his make me nervous. I am a fusser, apparently. He fitted some trousers. A man came up to me while I waited, and said, "How do you do?" Out of context, I didn't recognize him as John van Astin, whom I met at Fleur's a week ago. Krishnaji and I took the 4:50 p.m. train back to Petersfield. There was a school meeting in the evening.'

June twenty-second. 'I worked at the desk most of the day. Krishnaji spoke to the students. In the afternoon, there was a staff meeting. It was a hot day. I walked a little with Whisper. The cows got into the grove.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated letters. I met Cynthia Wood's friend, a Ms. Dale Duff, at the Petersfield station, and returned her there after she had lunched at Brockwood.'

June twenty-fourth, 'Krishnaji talked to school, a good one,' underlined. 'It's very hot.'

June twenty-fifth, 'The temperature was 104 at Wimbledon. Krishnaji dictated letters, and I typed.'

June twenty-sixth, 'London is ninety-five degrees[6]. Highest ever recorded. I started packing. I got a letter from Lorna, my cousin.' Oh, dear. She had an awful life. I'm not putting this in.

So, to the twenty-seventh, 'The heat is unchanged. Krishnaji spoke to school and guests. Very interesting. On registering only at the biologic or technical level but not at the psychological level. A "thin, thin" surface registering without reaction of the psychological me. Packed.'

June twenty-eighth, 'It is still over ninety degrees. There is a drought and a withering sun. I spent all day packing, and putting things in order.'

June twenty-ninth, 'Another broiling day. I was up early, and put all in good order. Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to Heathrow, leaving Brockwood at noon. We stopped for a picnic brunch at Virginia Waters, where we found some shade and a gentle breeze. We took British Airways to Paris, landing for the first time at the new Charles de Gaulle airport. Paris is even hotter than England. Only the lobby at the Plaza Athénée is air-conditioned. We had our usual rooms, but on the fifth floor. In spite of the heat, we took a walk around to stretch our legs and then had supper in our rooms.'

S: Where were your usual rooms at the Plaza Athénée?

M: Well, I forget which floor, but I can see them, sort of at the end of the hall, and Krishnaji had one here, with bath, and I had the one next door.

S: What was the view out the window?

M: Courtyard, with a funny…they put trellis on things, another building.

S: Right. So, it looked off onto a courtyard.

M: It looked off, yes. It was quiet, you see. It was quiet back there. They were very nice. And we had dinner in either bedroom. Didn't matter which one. I brought the tray in, and the table and all.

June thirtieth, 'the temperature was in the nineties. We stayed in all the hot morning. Then lunched in the hotel garden on melon gazpacho, tiny haricots verts, tagliatelle au gratin, and fraises des bois. Nadia Kossiakof joined us for a cup of coffee.' Do we have to identify Nadia?

S: I think we have but we could do it again.

M: Nadia was a very nice woman. She was Egyptian. She had beautiful turquoise eyes. She was large, but she had this beautiful, nice face and beautiful eyes. And she was married to a Russian, Nicolas, and she would've been part of the Krishnaji people in the Paris world.

S: Way back in the '30s and '40s?

M: I don't know how far back she went, but when I came along, they were all one group. And she dealt with the publishers.

S: Right. I remember that.

M: Yes. I don't think she came to Brockwood, but we always saw her in Paris.

S: She came to Saanen, didn't she?

M: She would, I'm sure.

S: Yes. I'm sure I met her there.

M: She had beautiful skin and a lovely face, these eyes, and sort of skin that is faintly colored but smooth, and lovely complexion. 'So, she joined us for coffee. Nadia reported that she needs to have an operation soon, for gall bladder, etcetera. Madame Duchet, who has a slow cancer, is working nonetheless on three translations: Krishnaji's Notebook, Tradition and Revolution, and Krishnamurti on Education. Suarès is terminally ill'—that's Carlo Suarès—'of cancer. I later asked Krishnaji if he wished to do anything about the Suarèses; he said, no, he didn't want to contact him. After lunch, we went to Charvet, Krishnaji minus his jacket, and me in the least possible. We saw some nice shirting. I couldn't replace my yellow shirt that disappeared in May, but ordered four others.

Krishnaji ordered two. After Charvet, we came back to the Champs-Elysées and went without knowing what it was to a Japanese movie called Super Express, a suspense bomb on a train.' [Laughs.] That was the plot. 'Krishnaji was pleased. "As good as an American film," he said. We had supper in the rooms. The heat was in the nineties all day. I took three showers before going to sleep.'

S: If I may just ask you to explain something here. Would you say a little bit more about when you asked Krishnaji if he would like to do anything about the Suarèses—what did you mean?

M: I meant telephoning and commiserate or communicate with them, in some way.

S: Right.

M: Yes. The Suarèses had behaved very badly toward Krishnaji.

S: Right. Okay. I know, but I'm just trying to have it all explicit here.

M: The Suarèses made Krishnaji, the last time he stayed with them, don't ask me when it was because I can't remember, but you and I discussed it in these memoirs.

S: They made Krishnaji feel uncomfortable or unwelcome there.

M: Yes, she, Mrs. Suarès, said something like, "Oh, there's so much to do when you're here"—so that he felt he was imposing on them. And that was when Marcelle Bondonneau—do you remember her?

S: Yes.

M: …who was sweet lady, nice lady, and a great, close friend. They were all sort of old, old friends from the ancient days, but she was the one who suggested to me that I rent a place in Paris for him to stay because the Suarèses made him feel unwelcome, and that he was…

S: Right, I remember. I remember now.

M: …imposing. Which is what I did.

S: Right, right.

M: And with the help of Marcelle, because I didn't know how to rent a place in Paris, as I was going to be in California. So, she and Elmenhorst, they were friends…

S: Giselle Elmenhorst.

M: Giselle Elmenhorst. And they found the little house that I then rented…

S: Near the Bois.

M: …in the Boulogne-Billancourt, down there, south of the Bois.

S: Mm, hm.

M: …which was very nice, I must say. We took it two years, at least.

S: I remember.

M: But, of course, the Suarèses, then, were furious because they didn't have Krishnaji staying with them, in spite of having made him feel uncomfortable.

S: So, they felt offended that he didn't go back there?

M: They were offended that he didn't go back. And that started the disagreeableness.

S: Right, okay. Alright.

M: So, anyway 'we had supper in the rooms again that night.'

The first of July. 'The heat is withering. We went around the corner to Courrèges for jerseys and to Dior for little things.' That means handkerchiefs and little things like that. It's across the street, so it was close. 'We lunched again in the garden, which manages to seem cool with flowers, awnings, parasols, shrubbery, climbing vines, birds, and impeccable service run by Roland'—that was the maître d'hôtel—'and good food. Krishnaji had a sorbet au fraises for dessert. Obviously the good food agrees with him.' If it didn't, he couldn't keep it down.

S: Yes.

M: 'After a small rest, we walked to Butch Cassidy and Le Kid. [M and S laugh.] I thought Krishnaji had seen it, but if he had, he'd forgotten. So, it was a success. I saw it all over again for the first time.'

S: In French, probably?

M: Well, it had subtitles, but yes.

'In the evening, we had vichyssoise. The garden was very popular, with people who seem to have walked off the pages of the nonsense thrillers we read.' [Laughter.] 'We had supper in the rooms as usual. The upholstered style of the Plaza makes it seem hot. Air conditioning is only in the lobby, and there's no cross-ventilation in our rooms. I kept taking showers instead of sleeping.' [Laughs.]

July second. ‘We are delighted to leave Paris. It is as if the air hadn’t ever been changed in the city. Breathing is oppressive, like being inside a vacuum cleaner. Both Krishnaji’s and my legs and feet are like cushions. We went to Roissy and the Charles de Gaulle airport again. We sat in what felt like a wasteland of idiotic pretentiousness,’ [chuckles] ‘passengers are fed along moving walkways, up through plastic tubes and tunnels like blood cells,’ [chuckling] ‘and exhorted by peremptory loudspeakers to go to one’s satellite,’ [S chuckles] ‘not gates. The language of promotion, like operation so-and-so, or the pompous seriousness of cabin attendants who will now go to their stations for takeoff.’ You know, those announcements?

S: Yes, yes.

M: ‘We were on Air France this time and were given a surprisingly good vegetarian lunch. But, we were charged $20.00 overweight for the luggage that British Air allows free.’ [Both laugh.] ‘A fifty-minute flight, and we were in the plain, simple airport in Geneva. Hertz provided a screamingly green Opal instead of the expected BMW. As the luggage fitted in, we took off into town. Parked underground and walked to Patek.’ This was the ritual, every year…

S: Yes, I know, I know.

M: …we have to go to Patek, and they look at the watches and adjust them a little bit. ‘…and then to Jacquet where Krishnaji chose six ties for himself plus two for Joe Links. Choosing material for ties took a great deal of discussion and attention, and my advice was respected.’

S: Indispensable! [M laughs.] I know, in the matter of ties, it was indispensable.

M: Well, he had a theory that I knew about clothes because I had known about Huntsman before I knew him.

S: Yes, I remember that wonderful story of your first meeting in Gstaad.

M: ‘After Jacquet, we went to Grand Passage for’—what did we do this time—‘odds and ends. And then, we drove along the lake and on to Gstaad.’

S: Oh, so you didn’t stay in the hotel then in Geneva?

M: No, we didn’t. We were hoping it would be cooler in the mountains, I guess. ‘So, we set off on the Route du Lac, and it was not like Paris. One could breathe. The country is dry for Switzerland, but not the scorched look of France. Krishnaji was thirsty, so we stopped for apple juice and drove on. The country above Lausanne is as beautiful as ever, and the air tasted of mountains. Finally, Gstaad: cool, green, rained upon. Vanda and Fosca were in the chalet. And, oh, oh, oh, how good to be here, cool, clean, quiet. The mountains have snow imperturbably. I unpacked, and disappeared into sleep.’

S: Nice.

M: July third. 'How narrow the limits in which the body can function properly. Krishnaji and I are both revived by the cold climate. The edema is gone'—that's our feet—'we feel renewed and normal. It rained a little. Oh, luxury. Did a few errands in the village, and Krishnaji had his hair cut by the good barber Monsieur Nicolas.'

S: Where did Krishnaji have his hair cut in Gstaad?

M: Monsieur Nicolas. He was in Gstaad on the main road. You know where the…what was the name of the grocery store? Oh…

S: Yes, yes, I can see it.

M: Well, it was a block or so toward Saanen, on that side of the street. Remember, there was a shoe place?

S: Yes.

M: Well, it was in the block before that.

S: Okay.

M: It was a barber shop. I think we always went around in from the back; there was a parking area in the back. And he was very good, Monsieur Nicolas. How can I remember that, when I can't remember…

S: [laughs] This is why we're getting it all down, here.

M: Well, yes.

S: The important things.

M: July fourth. 'The Israelis rescued a hundred hostages hijacked in Uganda.' Do you remember that?

S: I certainly do.

M: Well, anyway, they got rescued most dramatically. 'And then the Siddoo sisters, Jackie and Sarjit, with Tapas, came in the afternoon with mangoes to see Krishnaji. They have bought thirty-two acres and a house on the sea on Vancouver Island for a school. They showed us photos. They want to open it in September. We discussed the pros and cons of Narayan being the director. Krishnaji has received a letter from Sunanda saying that Balasundaram presently is thinking of relinquishing the principal-ship of Rishi Valley. Later, I joined Krishnaji in the woods for a walk.'

On July fifth, ‘Mar de Manziarly came for lunch. Krishnaji eats now in his room alone, but joined Vanda, Mar, and me for coffee. I did errands and walked in the woods. The heat continues in France and Britain.’

July sixth, ‘Krishnaji rested, and then he saw Mr. Russu in the afternoon, who claims that he had been at the point of death in hospital several months ago, and Krishnaji came to him for eight hours and saved his life. He also claims that he met the Lord Maitreya. Krishnaji says he’s getting a little gaga.’ You knew Mr. Russu, didn’t you?

S: Yes, I did, very well. He was the person who suggested I apply to Brockwood.

M: ‘Krishnaji went for a walk, and I drove Mr. Russu home. I saw Graf about videotapes. The tent is up. Then, Krishnaji told me in the morning of a “strange happening,” and then while at his lunch, he spoke of it again to Vanda and me, and dictated the following: “Before beginning asanas, he generally sits quietly, thinking of nothing. But this morning, a strange happening took place, most unexpected and in no way invited. And besides, you can’t invite these things. Suddenly, it appeared as though in the center of the brain, the head, right inside, there was a vast space in which was unimaginable energy. It is a part, or it is there that nothing whatever is registered, for that which is registered is a wastage of energy. If one can call it, it was pure energy in a limitless space, a space that had nothing but this sense of immensity. One doesn’t know how long it lasted, but all during this morning, it was there. And as this is being written, it is as though it was taking root and becoming firm. These words are not really the thing itself.”’

‘“Basta. I better go ahead and eat.”’ [S chuckles.]

That’s interesting.

S: Yes, it is.

M: July seventh. ‘Krishnaji has a letter from Pupul, saying that she had just met the prime minister, and “have arranged everything regarding your visit here this winter. I told her that the Krishnamurti Foundation of India was anxious to invite you to come and hold discussions and talks in India this year, and we wanted to talk it over with her so that there would be no embarrassment on any side. She assured me warmly that ‘Krishnaji is most welcomed to come and speak here.’ I then told her that you would be holding discussions and public talks, and she said that would be no problem and that this arrangement would be ‘perfectly alright.’ She knows of your talks and has read several of your books. I have also told her that if any local arrangements have to be made in Bombay and Madras, where the public talks will be held, I will tell the chief ministers that this matter has been cleared up with her, and she has asked me to do so. There is, therefore, no problem of any kind, and you should go ahead and fix your program to come to India accordingly. I am prepared to stand absolute guarantee.” This was dated the second of July, 1976.’

S: The letter?

M: The letter, yes.

S: Just to say, this was because Indira Gandhi had imposed martial law, and there was uncertainty as to whether Krishnaji could get away with saying the kinds of things he normally said, without being arrested.

M: That's right. 'Krishnaji also received a separate letter from Pupul dated the twenty-fourth of June from Bombay, saying she and Nandini had been writing all they could remember about the incidents at Ootacamund in May and June of 1948. This is an attempt to fill in the missing parts of the record written by Pupul at the time, given then to Rajagopal, but missing from the photocopies he provided KFA in the spring 1975. Pupul states that she wrote down every night what had taken place during the evenings that she and Nandini were living at a hotel nearby, and Krishnaji was staying with Ms. Hilla Petit and Maurice Frydman. She describes Krishnaji's pain in spine, nape of neck, and tooth. Krishnaji had asked Pupul and Nandini to sit quietly, not interfere and not be afraid, not to touch him except to close his mouth if he fainted, and on no account to leave the body alone. He would toss on the bed, have fits of shivering and would call out for Krishna, and then put his hand to his mouth and say, "I must not call him." The body appeared to be only a shell. In this state, the voice was frail, childlike. "Then, suddenly, the body appeared to fill with a vast presence, Krishnaji would sit up, cross-legged, his eyes closed, the fragile body would appear to grow and fill the room, and there was a palpable, throbbing silence that poured into the room and enveloped us. In this state, the voice had great volume and depth." They remembered one incident vividly: Krishnaji in great pain, stomach swollen, tears streaming down his face, suddenly fainting, and the body becoming intensely still. "The traces of pain and fatigue were wiped away. The face was greatly beautiful. There was a radiance, a light that illumined it and a stillness, and a sense of vastness that we had never witnessed. A quality of sacredness filled the room."…"For moments, he lay unmoving. Then, his eyes opened. He saw us, and after some time said, 'Did you see that face?' We said, yes, but could not say anything else as we had no words. Krishnaji lay silently, and then, 'The Buddha was here.' And then after some time, 'You are blessed.'…"Most of the time in the room, we had no part to play in what was happening, and yet, we had a role we could not understand. We questioned him during the day, but he became vague and would not explain…On most occasions, while the pain rocked him, he spoke of trees and wind, rain, nature, its storms, and vast silence. There was nothing personal in him during the incidents, no emotion, no relationship to us. The ordeal appeared physical, and yet the next day it left no traces on his face or body. Not a word that was said by him had psychological overtones. What he spoke was totally impersonal. The sense of the sacred permeated the room and the atmosphere on every occasion." It is signed by Pupul Jayakar and Nandini Metha, dated 23-6-76. Krishnaji didn't read it for quite a while. He said, "We'll read it together later," and then put it off. When I asked about it later, he said, "I've seen it. I'd be shy to have it read out loud."'

S: Hm. Where is that letter now?

M: Well, you see, she's quoting…Rajagopal shortchanged us[7], as we now know…

S: Right, yes.

M: …on the account that they had written.

S: Right.

M: And then, in talking about all that…I forget how Pupul saw what we had, she realized it was incomplete. So, she was filling it in, in this letter to Krishnaji.

S: Right. Yes, but where is that letter?

M: Where is that letter? It must be in the Brockwood archives. I don't know.

S: You have a file here of Pupul, but I haven't looked at it.

M: It wouldn't be in my file. I would've handed it in.

S: Okay.

M: Or maybe. We'll look, but have you already looked?

S: No, I haven't. I didn't look at Pupul's file.

M: Oh. I don't think it's here, but we'll take a look later.

S: Okay.

M: The rest of my entry for that day is, 'Krishnaji is absorbed in All the President's Men. He didn't go for a walk, but I did.'

July eighth, 'Edgar Graf lunched with Vanda and me. Later, I went down to tea with the Siddoos and Tapas. Krishnaji's idea is that I should talk to them informally. I didn't bring up the subject of Narayan, one of the situations I would sooner stay out of. They should work it out for themselves.'

'Krishnaji put his hands on Mr. Russu.'

'Vanda has been urging Krishnaji to see Iyengar, who is in Gstaad for a few days. Krishnaji wants nothing to do with him. He wouldn't take a lesson from him. Vanda showed Iyengar the yoga stool that Krishnaji is using for head stands. He said it was alright for Krishnaji, but to avoid the blood it gives to the head, something should be placed so part of the weight is on the forearms. He said it's not good for anyone with high blood pressure. Vanda persuaded Krishnaji to let Iyengar come by to greet him before leaving today. I wasn't in then, but Krishnaji said he is a man full of arrogance and self-importance. Iyengar has given Frances McCann exercises to relax her, lessen her odd sensations. Krishnaji is disgusted at this approach. It is amazing how much effort will be put into useless therapy and avoiding psychiatric help.' Iyengar, of course, was put out because Desikachar had replaced him. But Iyengar came every year to teach yoga to Menuhin.

S: Right.

M: And he was put up by Mrs…what was her name? At the downstairs flat in Tannegg.

S: Ah, right.

M: Anyway, Vanda was always friendly with Iyengar. Vanda never took lessons from Desikachar. She was an Iyengar student, and she thought that Krishnaji should try to make a kind of peace with Iyengar.

S: Right.

M: So, she got Iyengar to come and pay his respects.

July ninth. 'Evelyne Blau rang. She, Lou, and her mother, Mrs. Kraft, arrived last night, and are using a friend's chalet near Eggli. Lou leaves on Tuesday. They all came for lunch, plus Vanda's guest, Chloe Murdock'—that's the woman who lives here in Ojai. 'Krishnaji quizzed Lou on Jimmy Carter. Lou gave a good report'—Lou was a staunch Democrat—'and Krishnaji was pleased and said later, "I would vote for him." At 4 p.m., Krishnaji saw the Siddoo sisters alone. At the station, I ran into Shakuntala and Narayan, who have just arrived, and Sue Radowich…

S: Oh, Radowich, she used to work in the kitchen.

M: Yes, yes. 'I drove them to Lauenen, where they share a little chalet with the others from Brockwood: Ricardo, Frode, and Denise. Dorothy, Montague, and Doris arrived in Saanen, camping.' So, Frode materializes. [S chuckles]

On July the tenth, 'A quiet day. Krishnaji saw Mr. Russu for a treatment.'

S: We have to end here. We've run out of tape.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] These meetings were Krishnaji's response to the students' reluctance to speak in the meetings Krishnaji held with the whole school to which any visitors to the school were also invited.

[2] This series of videotaped discussions between Krishnaji, Bohm, and Shainberg were eventually titled The Transformation of Man.

[3] Dorothy had by now acquired another dog.

[4] An apartment complex in Piccadilly made from a mansion built in 1770 for the Viscount Melbourne.

[5] For many years, Mary L. and Joe and her daughter and grandchildren spent the summers at Brockwood during the period it was empty except for a skeleton crew, as everyone else was at Saanen. Mary L. always reported it as idyllic.

[6] Thirty-five degrees Celsius.

[7] When Mary and Erna asked to see this account, they were only given one page.

Issue 42: July 11, 1976 to September 22, 1976

Mary: We begin this discussion on July eleventh, 1976, and we're in Switzerland. 'A lovely morning for Krishnaji's first Saanen talk of the year. I have exchanged the fearful green Opal for a smaller, quince-colored Fiat.' [Chuckles.] 'I sat in the car waiting for Krishnaji.' I want to say there was a delight in waiting for him outside the chalet to drive him to his talks, because it was usually a beautiful, alpine, sunny morning just at that hour. I had to have the car right there, and time it so the motor was running as he came through the door, and got into the car.

Scott: Right.

M: Not a single extraneous something should happen. And then drive, not fast and not slow, just the proper speed, down the hill, through the village, and so to the tent, arriving at 11:30 a.m., when the talk was to begin.

S: Right.

M: In other words, nothing interrupted anything. And I didn't speak or anything. Waiting was a lovely moment in the sunshine, sitting, knowing he was about to come out and there was about to be a talk.

S: Yes. How nice.

M: It was lovely. So, back to the diary. It reads, 'it was the alpine summer, light silvered with brightness, a time of wonder come again in another year. The marvel of that, to be here, waiting to go with Krishnaji to the tent, a sense of such quiet blessing and yet memory wasn't really in it, or more to the point, attachment wasn't there. The sunlight is something that one floats in, dazzled, quiet; and then Krishnaji came out the door, all grace, beautifully dressed. The tent was just about full. I found a chair by the tables where they sell books where I sat with mumps last summer.' [Laughs.] Do you remember the summer I had mumps?

S: [laughing] Yes.

M: The Siddoos that summer were warning everyone not to come near this woman, who had mumps at that age. It was ridiculous. [S laughs.] 'Scott Forbes for the first time was using a new Sony video camera donated to Brockwood by Frances, Shainberg, Maris Lindley, and Alan Hooker.' They must've all chipped in. 'In black and white, all of Krishnaji's talks will be videotaped. Unfortunately, today's went amiss as somebody interfered with a wire. But the camera wasn't injured.' Do you remember that?

S: Only too well.

M: Yikes. Well, anyway, it's now a matter of history. [Laughs.]

S: Just to say also, I don't remember Lindley contributing to the video equipment, but Jackie Kornfeld did.

M: Did she?

S: Yes.

M: History, are you listening? [Both laugh.] 'In the evening, Vanda and I went to the first showing in the tent of the Krishnaji-Bohm-Shainberg color videos done at Brockwood in May. The cassettes have been mismarked, so we began with Number 2, and it showed only in black and white because someone again had tampered with the player.'

S: Yes. May I just say something else that's not part of your record, but part of all this initial video ridiculousness?

M: This is a collaboration if there ever was one. [Both chuckle.]

S: Well, for the video equipment, we had decided that we needed to get NTSC, which is American standard video equipment, because all over the world, you could get equipment to play the American standard video tapes and the local standard.

M: Yes.

S: Well, in England, to buy NTSC video recordering machines, you had to order them directly from Japan. Previous to this, I had never operated any video equipment in my life. I knew nothing about it; I was just, you know, trying to teach myself, etcetera. So, I'd ordered everything from Japan (cameras, video recorders, monitors, etcetera), and they didn't come and they didn't come and they didn't come, and finally they arrived in the morning of the last morning I could leave Brockwood to arrive at Saanen in time for the first talk, if I drove straight through without stopping. I had Doris's mini, which I had hoped would take all the equipment.

M: You were to drive all across Europe in a mini with all that?

S: Exactly.

M: Without stopping?

S: Without stopping. [M chuckles.] I had no choice; it arrived just before I had to leave. So, I packed it into the mini, took off, and I arrived the day before the first talk in Saanen, which gave me just enough time to set it up. And, of course, I thought, well, I'll figure out how to do this by reading the instruction manuals. [Pause.] All the manuals were in Japanese!

M: In Japanese! [Laughing.] I could feel it coming. [Both laugh heartily.] In those days, it was a common occurrence.

S: Right. It came from Japan, so they only had Japanese instructions.

M: Of course.

S: So, the fact that Joe Zorski was there helping me, and there was a small mishap, or that we didn't get the color right on the first night of showing videos, was really nothing. Believe me, it's a miracle we got anything! [Laughter.]

M: But, we still had the Nagra doing the audio.

S: Exactly.

M: July twelfth: 'Desk mostly. In the evening I saw the third of the Krishnaji-Bohm-Shainberg discussions. The color is working well. Vanda was tired and didn't come.'

The thirteenth, 'Krishnaji gave his second Saanen talk. At 2 p.m., Ortolani brought a young man from Torino who will help him with the work. I never got the young man's name, something like Tioki?'

S: It was Turchi, wasn't it?

M: Maybe it was. Must've been Turchi. 'Introductions are very vague around here. Cragnolini is too ill to continue as president of the Italian committee. I went alone to the showing of the fourth Krishnaji-Bohm-Shainberg video in the evening. I am absorbed in it, unable to be critical.'

A photo of Mary at Pine Cottage (Ojai, CA) taken by Krishnaji

July fourteenth, 'Topazia arrived in Gstaad and came to lunch. At 2:30 p.m., Evelyne came to see me about KFA work, and at 3:30 p.m. Mary Cadogan joined us. They met for the first time. I tried telephoning Erna in Ojai, but could only get through at suppertime. I explained the good of Harry Wyland's[1] offer to present the videos to WGBH in Boston. Jackie Kornfeld and Erna are not hitting it off (not surprising).' [Both chuckle.] 'And so, there are misunderstandings about the tapes. In the evening, I went to the showing of the fifth video. Afterward, Scott showed me bits of what he had shot with the black and white camera of Krishnaji's talk yesterday. It is surprisingly good in spite of the very low light.'

The fifteenth of July. 'Third Saanen talk, an extraordinary one on seeing with all the senses, completely, a total seeing that is without psychological registry. He was shaking afterward. Vanda's brother, and sister-in-law, and Suad al Radi came to lunch.' Suad al Radi was an Iranian lady who lived in Beirut. She was very cosmopolitan, and she used to come to the talks in Saanen. 'Krishnaji questioned Suad on the Near-East situation. In the evening, I went to the video showing of the sixth discussion between Krishnaji-Bohm-Shainberg, taking Frances McCann and Carol Allwell with me.'

July sixteenth, 'In the morning, Krishnaji gave me Vanda's news that Carlos Suarès died this morning in Paris of cancer. "Poor man," said Krishnaji. At 11 a.m., there was the annual meeting of all the Krishnamurti foreign committees. Krishnaji began by telling them about Suarès. Scott Forbes then gave information about the new videos and answered questions. Evelyne spoke of the Ojai school, and Jackie Siddoo spoke of the Canadian one. Madame Duchet came in a wheel chair. According to what is said, quietly, she has cancer, but hopes to complete the translation of three of Krishnaji's books, the Notebook, Krishnaji On Education, and Tradition and Revolution. The Notebook is the hardest, she says. She asks, "How do you put 'Otherness' in French?"' [S chuckles.]

S: Just an aside: Madame Duchet was a lovely lady.

M: Yes, a lovely lady.

S: Gracious, and old-school, really lovely.

M: She was. She had that—I suppose it was part of her generation and her class—she went to finishing school in England, as they did in those days, so she spoke beautiful English-English.

S: Right.

M: And yet, she was thoroughly French, and an ideal person to translate Krishnaji into French, and did, as we know.

'After the meeting, the Siddoos and Tapas stayed to lunch. Later in the afternoon, I talked to the Siddoos and Narayan. A Peruvian allergy specialist, Dr. Drassinower, a friend of the Puerto Rican group, came to prescribe for Krishnaji's hay fever. He took his blood pressure, which was 130 over 75.'

Saturday, July seventeenth. It says, 'sun in the morning, rain and a thunderstorm during the day. Simonetta di Cesaro brought a French boy, Jean-Phillipe, to lunch.' Simonetta was Italian, obviously; lived in Rome, was a friend of Vanda's, and she had spent quite a lot of time in northern India, in Hardvar—in the, what was the headquarters there?

S: Dharamsala, the Dalai Lama's place, the Tibetan center?

M: No, no, not the Tibetan place. There is a Hindu…I went there, but I can't remember, when I was in India. Anyway, she was friend of the head guru or something and spent a lot of time there and worked with the lepers. She came to lunch, bringing some French boy.'

The eighteenth. 'Krishnaji and I watched the opening of the Olympics in Montreal. Suzanne and Hugues van der Straten came to lunch with Marjolaine and Patrice.' Do you remember Marjolaine, our student, their child? Patrice, I think, was his nephew.

S: I thought Patrice was their son.

M: Was he?

S: I think so.

M: He had an older son, who I don't think you ever met.

S: Oh, yes, yes, they had…

M: They had ten children.

S: Exactly, and I met some of them. I think Patrice is one of their sons.

M: I know there was a nephew in there somewhere, but it doesn't matter.

The nineteenth, 'I fetched more mangoes from the Siddoos. Drove with Marjolaine and Patrice to lunch with the Brockwood group in Lauenen: Shakuntala, Sue Radowich, Ricardo, Javier, Denise, and Natasha. Very nice lunch. Madame Duchet came to see Krishnaji at 4 p.m. She has a malignancy, the doctors say, and four to five years left.'

July twentieth, 'it's Krishnaji's fifth Saanen talk. After the talk, a Dr. Drassinower came about Krishnaji's allergy medication. Mar de Manziarly lunched with Vanda and me. Mr. Russu came for hands'—as we called it. Krishnaji was trying to heal him. 'Mr. Mirabet came with his annual donation.' A lovely man. 'The Siddoos and Narayan saw Krishnaji about the school. And well, also, the Viking robot, after an eleven-month space voyage, landed on Mars and sent back photos.' [S chuckles.] You can see we had interests all over the universe! [S laughs again.]

July twenty-first. 'Vanda left for Firenze.' She did that every summer. She'd come and open the house, stay for the opening of the talks and for a certain number of talks, and then she went back to Florence because her daughter, who was married and lived in Toronto, would come back to Florence in the summer to stay with her. So, she left. 'I went to talk to Evelyne about things, but was back for lunch. At 2:30 p.m., Dr. Colón brought two Spanish-speaking donors to see me; one, a Mr. Ugo Baldini, gave $1,000 toward the video fund, and another will give 400 pounds sterling. I took the check to Dorothy in Saanen. We had difficulty with a student, Ricardo.' I don't remember much about that…you probably do.

S: I do. [Both laugh.] Not voluntarily, but I remember.

M: Yes, well, it's not terribly important.

July twenty-second 'was a cold day and wet. Krishnaji gave his sixth Saanen talk on death. Self is the product of thought, which is matter, and so is destroyed in physical death. A very interesting talk. Krishnaji was exploring the subject. Dr. Drassinower came to check Krishnaji before lunch. Mary C. and Edgar Graf came to lunch. At 3 p.m., I went to see Madame Duchet.'

Friday, the twenty-third. 'I spoke to Mr. Breitschmidt of the American Fletcher Bank about Isabel Biascoechea's investments.' Enrique had set things up…

S: You told us.

M: Yes, I did. And the idea was that she should get it for her lifetime, and then it would go to Krishnaji. 'Giselle Elmenhorst came to lunch. Krishnaji stayed in bed. Later we watched the Olympics on TV.'

July twenty-fourth. 'At 7:30 a.m., a girl calling herself Christiana came to the door to see Krishnaji.' Oh, this is the woman who lay down in the driveway. I haven't told that story, have I?

S: No, I don't think so. Read through it first, and then you can…

M: 'She came to the door to see Krishnaji, was refused, lay down in the driveway, and had to be sent off to the doctor in a taxi, where there was nothing wrong with her. Otherwise, a quiet day.' [M and S laugh.] It began when I was in my room doing yoga and Fosca came to the door and tapped and said, "Signora…" She said, in Italian, that is, "…there's a signorina to see Signore Krishnamurti." So, I obviously had to cope with it. I went to the door, and there was [chuckling] this rather pretty blond girl. She had on a dirndl skirt. Do you know what that is? They were full pleated cotton skirts; they were very popular.

S: Yes.

M: And, above she had on a very diaphanous blouse with nothing underneath at all. [Both chuckle.] And she said in a peremptory voice to me that she was here to see Mr. Krishnaji and she had an appointment. I said, "I'm sorry but Mr. Krishnamurti is not awake yet, and besides, you haven't an appointment because it's my function to keep track of appointments. I'm very sorry."

She said, "Well, go and ask him."

I responded, "We never disturb Mr. Krishnamurti until we know he's awake, and I cannot do that." Well, anyway, I talked to her in this fashion for quite a while [chuckling], got nowhere, and ran out of things to say to her. She was German but she spoke very good English. So I eventually said, "Well, I'm awfully sorry. I've explained all I can, so excuse me," and I closed the door. This took place on the door sill.

S: Yes.

M: I went back to my yoga, and then I started thinking, "I wonder if she's gone." And I could see from the kitchen window…

S: Yes, which bowed out a little bit—a bay window.

M: Yes, I could see what went on on that side of the chalet. So, I went there and looked out, and sure enough, there she was, flat on her back in the middle of the parking area! And I thought, my god, the milkman, who came swinging up the hill in a hurry to deliver milk at that hour of the morning, will…

S: …run over her.

M: …yes, won't expect a woman lying [S laughing heartily] on the ground and he'll hit her.

S: Right.

M: What to do? So, I went out and spoke to her, and she had staring eyes. I thought that maybe she's had some sort of a fit, epilepsy or something. So, I put my hand across her eyes, and she blinked, of course. So, I figured she was just not answering me. At that point, Madame Matti, who was the concierge who lived in the downstairs flat in Tannegg, and was a perfect casting for the role—she was stout, firm, had her hair pulled back in a knot, and she was very efficient.

S: Yes. [Laughs.]

M: She came over, and asked, "Quest-ce qu'elle fait?" What is she doing? [Chuckles.] I said I don't know. Madame Matti looked at her and then said to me, "Elle fait du théatre," she's acting. So, we tried to get her up, but she was dead weight, and impossible to move.

S: Of course.

M: At that point, the owner of the chalet—this is an intricate housing development. [S laughs.] The owner always had the top floor to live in, and he was a German gentleman who came and went, and he was there then. He came out. And so, Madame Matti said that she would call a taxi and send her down to the maître de ville, a person in charge of the town.

S: Kind of like a mayor.

M: Like a mayor, but in this case he was also a medical doctor.

S: Right.

M: So, Madame Matti went to the telephone and summoned the taxi, and it took the three of us to get this woman, in dead weight, into the taxi. The taxi had a woman driver, and I thought that was a good thing. And so, she took her down, and apparently, what happened, we learned later, was that on arriving at the doctor, the unconscious woman stepped out happily and said, "There's nothing wrong with me. You cannot detain me." But the wife of the doctor persuaded her to come in, and they gave her a tisane, or I don't know what, but that was the end of the story. Then, and I might as well, since we're telling this story…

S: Yes.

M: …tell you that there was another chapter. And it occurs in Ojai several years later. Krishnaji was talking. Fortunately, as we always did in the Oak Grove, Alan Kishbaugh escorted him out of the grove, so people wouldn't mob him, so to speak…

S: Right.

M: …to my car, which was out on the road.

S: Besant Road.

M: Besant Road. And I would try to get to the car beforehand, but anyway, I didn't…I mustn't have been delayed because I didn't see what happened, which was that suddenly from some trees and bushes, this same woman emerged. While all the people were still preparing to leave, she emerges stark naked. So, Asha Lee, with great presence of mind, grabbed a blanket and rushed to her. And, anyway, the poor woman wound up in Camarillo State Mental Hospital. And all that I knew after that was that she eventually married her psychiatrist! But later, unfortunately, she jumped off the Golden Gate Bridge in San Francisco.

S: Poor woman.

M: …a sad story. But that morning, it was…

S: Ridiculous. It had only gotten as far as ridiculous.

M: Yes, it was one of those sorts of things that happened to me in the summer at Gstaad, coping with mad women.

S: Mad people. Yes, yes.

M: Yes, there were male ones as well.

S: Oh, yes, I remember.

M: Now, we come to Sunday, the twenty-fifth of July. 'Krishnaji gave his seventh and final talk for this year in Saanen. Dr. Drassinower examined him after the talk. Dr. Liechty came for lunch.' Have we mentioned in this record who she is?

S: I can't remember. We started our dialogues ten years ago! So…

M: I know; I don't remember anything.

S: I don't either [laughing]. So, let's say who Dr. Liechty is.

M: Well, you should know about Dr. Liechty, whoever you are out there. She was a charming, very, very nice, very bright woman. Krishnaji had been, thanks to Enrique Biascoechea, he'd been sick in India, several years ago, before all this.

S: May I just change the way you say all that?

M: Yes. [Chuckles.]

S: Only because you said that thanks to Biascoechea, Krishnaji got sick in India.

M: [laughs] See, I expect you to follow me!

S: So, Krishnaji got sick in India, and thanks to Biascoechea, he was sent to the Bircher-Benner Clinic in Zurich.

M: Yes. And, I think, to add to it, Biaschoechea paid for it. Rajagopal made a fuss about the money, and Biaschoechea said, "No. It is my pleasure to help Krishnaji." So, I'm putting that in, because I read it last night and it reminded me. Anyway, Dr. Liechty was the head of the clinic. She was also the niece of the founder of the clinic.

S: Dr. Bircher-Benner.

M: Yes. So, Dr. Liechty, she'd been the head of it when Krishnaji came, and she also came to the talks from then on. She was very nice. And she was the doctor that I was able to talk to about Krishnaji's "process." Was there anything in medical knowledge that could describe what was going on when Krishnaji went through "the process"? She said no. It wasn't epilepsy, it wasn't…

S: Yes, it was nothing we know about. It wasn't pathological.

M: Right, it wasn't pathological. Krishnaji, of course, had always said that. When I went with him to a doctor, as I did when he came to California, I took him to the doctor I went to. He gave his medical history and I was present, but he never mentioned the headaches and all that. Afterward, I asked him why he didn't mention that, and he said, "Oh, that has nothing to do with my health."

S: Can I just mention also about Dr. Liechty, because it's extraordinary; she had the best medical training in Europe when she was young. She also trained to be a homeopath, and she also spent years training to be an Ayurvedic doctor, and so she was a trained Ayurvedic doctor as well.

M: That's true. I'd forgotten that.

S: …which is remarkable.

M: Yes, it is.

S: I can remember her discussing with an Ayurvedic doctor…I remember this well, because I'd already had hepatitis. She was in India one year when I was there, and she was talking with a very well-known Ayurvedic doctor who'd come to hear Krishnaji. They were talking about hepatitis, and she said that during World War II (she'd already had her training as an Ayurvedic doctor by then), she never lost a single patient to hepatitis because she was using Ayurvedic treatments. And the Indian doctor was saying, "Oh, yes, that's true. There's no need to lose people to hepatitis." And then, they were joking about the different kinds of treatments that they give for hepatitis, and what happens, like bile comes streaming out of people's noses. But, during World War II, thousands of people died from hepatitis. Hepatitis was a real killer. And when I had hepatitis, my English doctor said that there's nothing that can be done about it; there's no cure, no treatment for hepatitis known to man. And here, in Ayurvedic medicine, there has been for decades or centuries, for all I know.

M: That's very interesting.

S: Isn't it?

M: Yes.

S: So she was a real medical expert, which is why she was such a good consultant for Krishnaji, because she had all these different kinds of medical training.

M: Yes, yes.

S: And she was a lovely lady.

M: She was a lovely lady. She came later to Brockwood. I have a photograph of this after a talk; they're walking across the lawn together.

S: Oh, how nice.

M: Yes. Yes, yes.

So, continuing that day, she came to lunch. 'That evening, I drove Frances McCann and Carol Allwell, and Michael Pont to the Brockwood party in the Rougemont chalet of Scott, Ted, Irene, Joe, Carol—about fifty people were there.'

S: I don't remember it at all.

M: Well, it says so here, so it must be so. [Laughs.]

July twenty-sixth. 'Dorothy and Montague moved up to Tannegg.' Usually, they camped in the camping area in Saanen, but when Mrs. Walsh, who was the woman who had the flat down below, gave it up, we would take it over, and Dorothy and Montague would spend just a short time there before going back to Brockwood. 'Krishnaji saw Mr. Russu.'

On the twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji rested. I went to see Madame Duchet in the afternoon and later went to a concert in the Saanen church with Evelyne and her mother.'

S: That probably would have been a Yehudi Menuhin concert?

M: Menuhin, yes.

On the twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji began the public discussions in the tent. Very good. I had tea with Vicky Orfali at the Palace Hotel. There was a big earthquake in China.' Do we need to identify Vicky Orfali?

S: Yes.

M: Oh, dear. Vicky always went to the Saanen talks. She had been a Gurdjieffian person, I think, before, but she was now a Krishnamurti person. She traveled around the world, and she's still doing it. She calls me up every so often when she goes home. Home is Brooklyn, in a place her mother owned before her death. She's still trying to decide whether or where she wants to live in Europe, and she hasn't, to my knowledge, decided yet. She lives, I think, in Spain a lot. Anyway, I had tea with her.

The next day, 'Krishnaji held the second public discussion. I fetched Mar de Manziarly up to Tannegg for lunch. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw the Siddoos, Narayan, and Fritz Wilhelm about adult centers. I talked alone with the Siddoos and Narayan. He's going to go to Vancouver. The school will start in a year. He'll be the principal.'

On July thirtieth, 'Krishnaji gave this year's third public discussion on death. Madame Sherer brought her annual gift to Krishnaji.' She was a French woman who brought him…it says here, 'junky gift.' Things to wear that he wouldn't…

S: …possibly wear.

M: …even consider. 'Carl Marcus came to lunch. I marketed. Walked. Narayan came to see me before supper about his confusion over his salary.' I don't know what that was.

The thirty-first of July. 'Public discussion number four. Dr. Drassinower to see Krishnaji once more before leaving. Narasimhan and Simonetta di Cesaro came for lunch. In the evening, Dorothy, Montague, Doris, Evelyne Blau, and I went to dine with the van der Stratens.'

August first. Krishnaji held the fifth and final Saanen public discussion for this year. I fetched the Fouerés to briefly greet Krishnaji after the discussion. Evelyne and her mother, Mrs. Kraft, and the Simmonses came to lunch. The Siddoos and Narayan saw Krishnaji again about Narayan being principal of the school. He is to think it over and let Krishnaji know tomorrow.' Well, they'd been talking about that all summer. Anyway.

The second of August. 'Jackie Siddoo and Narayan came to see Krishnaji at 10 a.m. Narayan is to go as principal of the school and to help with the adult center. Krishnaji dictated a memorandum of agreement on this.'

The next day, 'Tapas to see Krishnaji at 4 p.m., and Krishnaji had a haircut.'

On August fourth, Tapas and Jackie Siddoo came at 10 a.m. to see Krishnaji. Tapas wants to be where he is for two to three months. Krishnaji explained it was impossible. He had me telephone Jackie that she has done more than enough to bring Tapas around the world, and it shouldn't go on.' Tapas was their guest, and Krishnaji thought that that was enough. 'Edgar Graf, Doris, Dorothy, and Montague were at lunch, and later, Krishnaji and I walked in the woods.'

Thursday, the fifth of August. 'Krishnaji dictated letters. He told the Indian Foundation he will come there in November. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Montague, and I lunched at the Park Hotel. Later, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked to the river.' That was to give Fosca some time off as she would never take a day off if we didn't go out.

S: Yes, of course.

M: On the sixth. 'Desk. Krishnaji and I had lunch alone. Mar called from Paris with a message to Krishnaji from Nadia Kossiakof: She is in the hospital, and very weak, but resolved to live because she still has work to do for Krishnaji. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked in the late afternoon, when it was cooler. It was a beautiful day.'

The next day, 'Mar telephoned saying that Nadia feels she will pull through. Her doctor found a second abscess inside. Radha Burnier telephoned from London. She may come here later. I worked on a list of Krishnaji's addresses for his U.S. visa.' Here I was in Saanen, with nothing to refer to, and the U.S. Immigration Department sent me word that they had changed their rules. For Krishnaji to get a green card, they had initially needed a list of everywhere he had lived for a least three months since the age of sixteen. And I had done that. Now they wanted a list of anywhere he had lived for six weeks!

S: [chuckles] Oh, yes.

M: So, luckily, I had Mary's biography with me, and it's so well arranged, you know, she put the year at the top of the page. So, I was able to fulfill this, so that's what I was doing that day. [Both chuckle.] If I hadn't had the book, I couldn't have done it. 'It is a warm, beautiful day. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked to the river.'

August eighth. 'Frances McCann and Carol Allwell, Dorothy, and Montague all came to lunch. Krishnaji talked to Frances, correcting her impression that he wanted Tapas to come to see him in the West. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked to the river.'

The next day, 'I worked on the visa papers. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked up to the turn on the Turbach Road.'

August tenth. 'Dorothy and Montague left here this morning, steaming stylishly down the hill in their Land Rover, pausing to pick up Doris in Saanen, and set off for Brockwood. The house became immediately quiet, withdrawing into privacy. Krishnaji felt it. It's strange how we make a perimeter around ourselves. Madame Walsh'—she's the woman downstairs—'and the Mattis are below. The proprietor, Mr. Erkelenz, creaks overhead, and plays Mozart piano pieces to himself at suppertimes. But, here, in the middle floor, our territory has its own dimension and pulse. Yesterday, Krishnaji found me in tears, reading of his brother's death. I had been sifting the biography for Krishnaji's addresses and whereabouts. The Herculean task I have is to list every place Krishnaji has stayed since 1911. The biography has made it possible as far as it goes, which is 1932. But, I read parts of it as I went along, and I finished it, wanting to cry and cry. "Why?" asked Krishnaji. I tried to tell him that the pain of all he had to go through, the physical pain, Nitya torn away from him, why? All those foolish people, but most of all, Krishnaji's own undeterred passion for what he sees, his total being. I have never seen an ash of discouragement in him. I think I cry at the wonder of his existing, and it is what I felt in India. There, it seemed as if there were an enormous scale with all the pain, confusion, and suffering of that country, the millions on one side, and on the other, the balancing of it all in the slight and infinite figure of Krishnaji.'

S: Yes.

M: 'So it is today, with the whole of humanity and its ghastliness. Krishnaji balances it all by his existence; one human being in whom beauty and goodness shine. I feel a wild wish to give everything, to die for that.'

S: Yes, Mary.

M: 'So, when he asked me what it was I felt, this is what I tried to say. He asked me if I was keeping this diary still. And to put it down. Did I do so?'

'I said, no, I wasn't writing about myself.'

'But you must, he said. "It will give it bite, what you see, what you feel." I wonder now if I can. I write all this under severe restrictions at times, and do not write too often. I should change.'

S: See. That's a perfect argument also for all that I was saying yesterday about what you feel and how important that is.

M: It is important. 'Krishnaji and I walked alone in the woods in the rain.'

August eleventh, 'I am as far as 1965 in Krishnaji's residences, and now into my own time with Krishnaji, but it is pages long. He traveled endlessly. I ached with a protective impulse, to smooth, to make everything right for him. Vanda rang from Florence, and says she will return Friday or Saturday for a week to check on his yoga. I went to fetch Krishnaji's new walking shoes from Mr. Kohli in Saanen. We walked to the river and saw it flow on a certain rock that is its pulse for us; the rock is running after a rain. Krishnaji watches the water run and his face is as eager and alive as a child. There was thunder as we came through the woods and drops began as we reached the chalet.'

The next day, 'A lovely, quiet day. Krishnaji and I lunched alone, and by midafternoon, the list of Krishnaji's addresses for 1911–1976 was done. I photocopied it and posted it to the U.S. Embassy in London. There is a large weight off my shoulders. We walked through the woods as always. Radha Burnier telephoned and is here. Vanda telephoned saying she can't come till Sunday.'

August thirteenth, 'Krishnaji came into the room, opened at random a copy of the Notebook to page 180, and after a few minutes he said, "Quite good."' [S laughs.] 'Then he asked, "Is it as good as that?" He pointed to a book I had there of Laurie Lee's I Can't Stay Long…'

S: Oh, yes.

M: '…that I'd been reading, and which I had told him I liked. I read him a sentence he wrote describing a rock in Rishi Valley and an example of Krishnaji's pure writing style, quite apart from what he has to say. He made dismissing sounds, as he does when one says something he considers a compliment. I said, "You should write some more."'

'Krishnaji replied, "Maybe I will. But if I start, I won't do anything else."' I remember this conversation. '"Talking is what I do, not that."'

'Radha Burnier has arrived in Gstaad and came up in the car with me to lunch. Krishnaji had his lunch in his room on the tray as usual, but came in afterward and talked to Radha most of the afternoon, mostly about India. Things outwardly are smoother, more efficient there, but behind it is fear. Pupul looks only at the pro-side of the prime minister, and doesn't seem to look at reality. Radha and Achyut are unable to talk to her freely, but Radha feels that under the statement Mrs. Gandhi made to Pupul, that Krishnaji is welcomed to come to talk.' In other words, it would be alright for Krishnaji to speak as he always did, even with martial law. 'I took Radha back to her hotel, Arc-en-Ciel, and Krishnaji took a nap till 6 p.m., coming in then, fuzzy with sleep, realizing it was too late to walk. In the evening, Jackie Kornfeld rang from the United States to say that KGBH in Boston is enthusiastic about the Krishnaji-Bohm-Shainberg videos, and tentatively wants to broadcast and disseminate them. Kornfeld asked what to do about editing, and asked if Sunanda could. I said "no" to that, but suggested they submit a transcript of the tapes with their wish for deletions, and we could compare it with the originals, etcetera, at least to begin with.'

August fourteenth. 'I worked most of the day at the desk. I brought Radha up for lunch. Krishnaji ate to avoid missing his nap and walk time. After eating his lunch in his room, he joined us and the talk was mostly about CWL[2]. Did he really have insight? Radha and Krishnaji thought a little, which, because of his conditioning, etcetera, he embellished and made personal. "He was a materialist," said Krishnaji. Radha said Arundale was an intensely possessive, jealous man. He didn't want his wife, Rukmini, Radha's aunt, to go anywhere without him, etcetera. Krishnaji said, "Amma[3] was the only real one." Radha said that in the Vasanta Vihar settlement last spring, a small cash sum of 10,000 rupees was to come to the JK Trust Madras.' They put up a little trust called the JK Trust Madras, to own Vasanta Vihar till it was…

S: Right…all the things got settled.

M: Yes. So, there was this sum of 10,000 rupees that was to come to the JK Trust Madras. 'When she went to collect it, she was told that Rajagopal had sent it to himself in Ojai, in spite of the court order.' [S laughing.] 'Less than $100!'—exclamation point. 'She also heard that Rukmini was trying to get on the board of trustees with others of her people in order to get Vasanta Vihar for herself. We all three wondered if this was also a Rajagopal ploy. "Did you know Franklin Lacey?" asked Radha. He is a great friend of Rukmini's.' Frank Lacey had something to do with Happy Valley School, and he was a Rosalind person.

S: Ah.

M: 'Then, the conversation went to other things, the meaning of yoga, karma, what dies at death. Krishnaji put it that the stream of thought, self, conditioning, etcetera, continues, and it manifests again, not an individual consciousness. The individual consciousness as we know it is part of that stream, and unless a person changes, it contributes to that stream. When he dies, matter dies. Thought is matter, and so dies, and what he was, remains part of the stream. That stream becomes part of the newborn human, and so it goes. The stream is the karma, not something individual. Only when one steps out of the stream is there a new dimension. Krishnaji had his nap, and after 5 p.m., we walked up through the woods twice as it was muddy beyond. The green pool in the river suddenly muddied as we looked down on it, and the sound of the water rose. There must've been a sudden rain upstream bringing down silt.'

Next day says only 'Radha to lunch. Vanda comes back from Florence.'

The sixteenth, 'Radha to lunch, and then Frances McCann and her sister Helen came to tea.'

There's really nothing until the eighteenth when, 'I took the 8:40 a.m. train to Geneva. Met Mr. Breitschmidt, of the American Fletcher Bank. Gave instructions for Isabel Biascoechea's account, and after talking over my own and Alzina'—Alzina was an account that I was in charge of, but it was for Krishnaji's benefit—'I decided to leave them at the Cantonal Bank for the time being. I walked back to the station, returned to Gstaad by 4:15 p.m., and walked with Krishnaji and Vanda.'

The next day, 'I started packing. Fetched Radha to lunch. Krishnaji had a haircut. And then, we walked in the woods.'

The twentieth. 'I did more packing. Brought Radha to lunch. I exchanged the Fiat for an Opal large enough to take our luggage. Ortolani and his friend came to say goodbye to Krishnaji. Krishnaji and I walked through the woods, and all was in order for our departure.'

August twenty-first. 'It is a most lovely morning. The luggage fitted easily into the larger car, hoisted in by Fosca and me. At 8:30 a.m., we said goodbye to Vanda and Fosca, who are staying on a few days, and we drove via the Col de Pillon down to Aigle where we got on a new auto route which detours Montreux and Lausanne, getting us unexpectedly soon to the Geneva Airport at 10:30 a.m. We flew British Airways to Heathrow. Krishnaji was in cheerful spirits at leaving. He chose the Pillon route instead of Bulle and was very pleased to see his due amici[4].' [S laughs.] The due amici were two large cypress trees that grow just above Aigle. '"Ciao," he says to them always when we pass.' [M chuckles.] 'Then, the new road brought his child smile, mouth open a little, a big smile and absorption in looking at things. These moments melt my heart. His sense of wonder and interest, it is part of the delight of being with him.'

S: Yes.

M: 'Another pleasing and remembered thing, the Patek clock in the airport. He liked to go and look at it because it was accurate to some extraordinary degree.'

S: Yes, it was like an atomic clock.

M: Yes, it was. 'Dorothy, hot and distracted, was at Heathrow when we finally emerged. The wait for luggage was endless. The change in England since we left at the end of June is dismaying. The drought has withered the fields; grass is brown; leaves are tired on the trees. The sun is malevolent. Brockwood was cool in the downstairs rooms but the brown lawn feels like steel wool. I hadn't the heart to go to the grove. We unpacked and didn't walk. There was a painting by Louis de Broucgny'—or something like that—'which was a present from Mary and Joe who spent their summer holiday here.' That's the painting in the hall in the West Wing.

August twenty-second. 'I unpacked and put things in order. Brockwood is desperately dry. The lawn is brown and rough, and the rhododendrons are wilted in the grove. I got the car out, and the battery is okay. The tents for the Brockwood Public Talks are up. It was a hot, dry day.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I went to Petersfield for a train to London. We went to Brigg's, where Krishnaji ordered a sun umbrella, to Hatchards for books. And then met Mary L. at Fortnum's, where she lunched with us. I dropped Krishnaji at the dentist, Mr. Thompson, and went to Nelson for Nux Vomica, prescribed by Alain Naudé for my allergy. Krishnaji has to have a lower tooth out after the talks. We got back to Petersfield, where Dorothy and Doris had come to meet Erna and Theo, but they weren't on the train. Krishnaji and I went on, and Erna and Theo appeared soon after, having flown in from California. Another hot day.'

August twenty-fourth. 'I talked with Erna and Theo in the morning. Fritz Wilhelm appeared; and Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I talked to him in the afternoon about his possible marriage, and the Ojai job, etcetera. Krishnaji, Erna, and I walked.'

The next day, 'another very hot day. I took Erna and Theo to Winchester on errands, but was back for lunch. Erna and I discussed KFA matters. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Dorothy, and I walked.'

August twenty-sixth, 'I took the 11:45 a.m. train to London, and went to the General Trading Company for record holders for Krishnaji.' They sold records. 'At 2:30 p.m., I met Mary Cadogan, Erna, and Theo at Zoom Television. I looked at parts of the English quads.' What does that mean?

S: The Krishnaji-Bohm-Shainberg videos were originally recorded on two-inch English PAL quads. PAL is the English standard for televisions. So, you looked at the standard in which they were filmed, which is much better than American NTSC standard, which is what you saw the recordings in in Saanen.

M: 'I talked to John Hawking about tapes.' Who's John Hawking?

S: Must've been someone at Zoom Television. It was they who did the standard's conversion of PAL to NTSC, and who made copies for us on U-Matics that we could re-copy for resale.

M: 'Erna, Theo, and I came back by train. Another very hot day. There are forest fires all over the country.' That was an awful year.

August twenty-seventh. 'I spent much of the day working at the desk. After lunch, I went to Petersfield on errands, taking Fritz Wilhelm and Carl Marcus. Fritz met Margrete Heising'—that's the woman he married—'a Danish woman who taught at Ojai during the summer school and whom Fritz may marry. The Digbys arrived from their new home in Dorset. Pascaline Mallet arrived and is in the West Wing dining room, which has been converted to a guest room. The weather is cooler.'

The twenty-eighth of August. 'Krishnaji gave his first Brockwood public talk of the year, and the tent was filled and overflowing outside. I sat outside. Mary and Joe came, and Vanda invited them up to the kitchen, where we all had fruit and salad before going back to the tent for the main course.' That's what we used to do. 'I was asked to the Publication Committee meeting in the afternoon. The videotapes of the Krishnaji-Bohm-Shainberg dialogues were shown in the Assembly at 5:45 p.m.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave the second Brockwood talk. We ate fruit and salad upstairs, and the rest in the tent. Radha Burnier is here. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and I walked in rain!!!' That is underlined with three exclamation points! [Both chuckle.] 'I saw number three of the videos in the evening, while Krishnaji watched The Bridge on the River Kwai on television.'

August thirtieth, 'Krishnaji wants to hold a month of meetings in March with representatives of England, India, and the U.S. and probably Canada, about the future of the schools and the work. He wants it to be in Ojai. Desikachar, his wife, and Mr. and Mrs. Martin Underwood came to lunch. Desikachar is holding a seminar at Cambridge. We rested in the afternoon, then a walk with Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and Dorothy.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held a public discussion in the tent. Lunched half in the kitchen and half with everyone in the tent. Took Radha Burnier to the Petersfield train. Krishnaji saw briefly a Polish woman, sociologist, Mrs. Magdalena Jasinska.' We saw a lot of her after this. 'Then, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and we walked. I saw video number four on our return.'

Wednesday, the first of September. 'Krishnaji and I spoke to Jackie Kornfeld in New York about KGBH wanting the videotapes, but also wanting them edited down to three hours by someone from KFA, apparently me. I did deskwork, and walked in afternoon.'

September second. 'Krishnaji held the second discussion in the tent, a brilliant one on thought. Radha Burnier had the first half of lunch with us in the kitchen. Then, we went for the main course in the tent. There was a nap, a walk, and video tape number five was shown.'

The third of September. 'I went to Petersfield on errands and met Mary Cadogan at the train station. There was a meeting after lunch about video matters, with Erna, Theo, and Scott Forbes. The walk was with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and me.'

The fourth of September. 'Krishnaji gave the third Brockwood talk. A tremendous talk. We again had fruit and salad upstairs, and then went back to the tent for hot food. With Erna and Theo, we talked to a George Bohlen about a donation to KFA that involved an inheritance he has of paintings, also about his getting support for the school from people in Massachusetts showing the videos, etcetera.' I don't know what that is. I don't remember all that. 'I walked with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, and Theo; and on my return saw the sixth video tape. I told George and Nelly about the meeting Krishnaji wants in Ojai in March about the future of the schools and work. Krishnaji and I watched on TV The Two Ronnies.' [Laughs.] Do you remember them?

S: [laughs] I remember them well!

M: He liked that. And then there was a Starsky and Hutch program playing.

S: [laughing] A good night!

M: Yes, a good night for television. [Laughs.]

On the fifth of September. 'Krishnaji gave his fourth Brockwood talk, another overwhelming one. Mary L. and Amanda sold books at the book table, and I joined them. Then, they came up for tea with Krishnaji in the kitchen. Krishnaji walked with Dorothy, and I went to the seventh video, and was overwhelmed by that, too. After supper, Krishnaji and I watched a TV film about Cromwell.'

September sixth. 'The guests begin to leave, and the house gets quieter. The talks are over. Krishnaji dictated letters. I typed, and did laundry. I discussed Foundation matters with Erna and Theo in the afternoon. Krishnaji and I again signed the revised KFA charter, and revised the agreement of the case settlement. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and I walked. I looked at videos of last week's talks done by Scott Forbes.'

The seventh, 'I did deskwork, and went to a staff meeting. Krishnaji talked to Erna, Theo, and me; then we walked. There was a letter from my brother. My brother was being sued by an ex-wife' [both M and S laugh] 'for more alimony!' She could use alimony, that woman.

Wednesday, September eighth. 'With Erna and Theo, and Ted Cartee, I took the 8:51 a.m. train to London. Erna and Theo got off at Woking to go to Heathrow and on to Majorca.' He had a sister living in Majorca. 'Ted came with me to the U.S. embassy about Krishnaji's immigration application. There were contradictory statements by the girl at the desk.' I don't know what that was. 'I bought some coffee beans and got back to Brockwood by 2:30 p.m. Walked with Krishnaji. There was another staff meeting.'

S: Would you have gone to Mr. Higgins to get your coffee beans?

M: To buy coffee beans? Probably, but it doesn't say Mr. Higgins. [Both chuckle.]

The ninth of September. 'Krishnaji held the first discussion with the staff for this academic year, on applying his teachings in the teaching of regular academic subjects, history, physics, etcetera. Dorothy came to me with problems with Ted.' I've forgotten what that was, but I knew there were problems. 'We walked, as usual, in the afternoon.'

The tenth of September. 'Dorothy has talked to a staff member about having therapy, and that person is willing to go to Shainberg. I worked at my desk. I wrote to the embassy, as nothing came in the mail.' They were sending me papers. 'To West Meon after lunch. Back for the walk. Rain in the evening.'

September eleventh. 'Krishnaji, in spite of a cold, held a discussion with the staff on teaching. He went to bed after lunch. I went with the Bohms to look at a cottage for sale in Warnford. Heavy rain in the late afternoon.' The Bohms were thinking of living in Warnford.

The next day, 'Krishnaji was in bed all day. I took vitamin C to ward off getting a cold.'

September thirteenth, 'Krishnaji spent Saturday afternoon and all day yesterday in bed with a cold, but mysteriously, he is able to get over that in contrast to his hay fever. Today he said he was quite able to go to London, Huntsman, and the dentist. His face looked pinched on the train, and it was colder today with light rain in London. He fitted at Huntsman, and I did too, a skirt, first try. Then, we walked to Fortnum's and lunched with Mary Links. She had a copy of the Avon paperback edition of the biography. It looked very nice. Krishnaji told her of the two meetings he has had with the staff at Brockwood, and of his plan to teach us how to teach his teachings at the same time as and mingled with academic subjects. He also talked very seriously to her about the month of meetings at Ojai in March, on the future of the schools, the work, etcetera. He and Mary think a few, perhaps I, should be responsible for seeing that the teachings are kept alive, active, unaltered, or uninterpreted after his death. He thinks Sunanda, Fritz, and I should be the three. To my own surprise, during the two meetings with teachers, I came to see many ways Krishnaji's teachings could be woven into history, math, science, etcetera. Something has begun to come alive in my head, where it was a blank before.'

‘Krishnaji wants Mary L.’s ideas on these matters. Should she come to Ojai in March, I would be glad to provide airfare. Krishnaji is not sure yet. While he went to the bathroom, Mary told me that Alain Naudé is down to his last $1,000.’ She remained great friends with Alain, and after he left, he communicated with her. ‘We went next door[5] to inquire about Krishnaji’s sun umbrella, and to Hatchards, where we found a new detective novel. Then, Joe thoughtfully came by to pick us all up, and Krishnaji went to Mr. Thompson. Two lower front teeth are to come out on Wednesday. Pont Vecchio’ [laughs] ‘the name Krishnaji has given to his dental bridge’—[both laughing] I’d forgotten that—‘remained, and Thompson is to have a replacement made and installed. We had a quick taxi to Waterloo. In the train, Krishnaji spoke again about me, Fritz, and Sunanda. I said he must educate me. He said people will accept and trust me. I have no such optimism. We will have Sunanda take notes of anything he tells her and Fritz in India this winter, and send them to me. I am to keep the Lilliefelts informed. I asked Krishnaji about what came up at Saturday’s teacher meeting—Krishnaji’s demand that we transform the students instantly and completely. Is it possible? How is it that he has not done it, speaking all these years?! Krishnaji said, “I’ve wondered about it.”’ [Both laugh.] ‘He said that he thinks Mrs. Besant may once have said that the teachings are so enormous, the light is too strong, it is too much and people go blind. “But when you die, the light will be there, but the personality won’t.”’

S: Hm. Hm.

M: That’s curious.

S: Meaning, in a sense, that they will be no longer blinded but somehow the benefit will still be there…

M: Yes, what he said will be there, but his presence adds to the overwhelming-ness of it, or something. That’s my feel or guess.

S: Mm, hm.

M: September fourteenth, ‘Krishnaji spent the day in bed, and says he should do it one day a week—in India as well. It is good for him. I worked at my desk and went to Petersfield on errands. It rained.’

September fifteenth, ‘We took the 11:45 a.m. train to London, and went directly to Fortnum’s for lunch. We talked of what the immediate assessing mind does on seeing people.’ You know, you look at a person, you assess.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: ‘Example: At a glance, one recognizes Americans in London. Krishnaji watched a man at a table nearby and guessed he was an artist. I asked if these images, which are instantaneous and part of the data gathering of the mind, are wrong in terms of his teachings. He said, “With me, I am vacant most of the time, except when I’m talking.”

He continued, “I see someone, I may know it is Ms. Pratt, but my mind is empty.” I said it seemed as if one has facts and images, but one keeps the score open, so to speak; one keeps looking, not letting the image obliterate what is seen. Krishnaji seemed to assent to this, but I must ask it again, in case he was being a little vacant today. We walked to Huntsman. He fitted a pair of thin trousers and chose a greeny/beige tweed for a warm pair. Then, we struggled for a taxi, he on Cork Street Corner and me on Saville Row corner. We got to Mr. Thompson, where Krishnaji went in to have his two lower middle teeth out. They are loose and worn away. Sitting in the waiting room by the door, I could hear him and Mr. Thompson laughing.’ [Both chuckle] ‘Soon, the nurse came out to say he would be out in a few minutes—my signal to find a taxi. One wouldn’t wait; the second was cheerful and sympathetic, but I sat in it to be sure, and then out came Krishnaji, making a gesture that it was nothing. He had a small amount Novocain, no pain, very quick, and the bridge now has two new teeth in it that look totally real. There was no bleeding. He felt fine. He took some ferrum phos. The cab had to stop in Berkeley Square for petrol, but we caught the 4:50 p.m. I asked Krishnaji if his teeth might have had a healing quality. He said, yes, he should’ve saved them. He said healing cannot be taught or transmitted to another. It is strongest in the person with the least self. I asked, “Can you heal yourself?” He said, “No. But if you put your hand on me, and I touch your hand, it helps.”’

S: Hm.

M: I remember that. When he was dying…

S: Yes, I remember.

M: He asked me to press him here…

S: I remember, yes, me too.

M: And he put his hand on me.

S: Yes, yes, yes.

M: September sixteenth, ‘Krishnaji talked to teachers. Walk in the afternoon with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and dogs.’

September seventeenth, ‘I went to London to take Krishnaji’s passport for renewal by the Indian High Commission, where Mr. Vettakhan saw to it. I went to the U.S. embassy about Krishnaji’s immigration visa, to Nelson for homeopathic remedies for Krishnaji, to the bank, and at 3:30 p.m. to the Connaught, where Betsy Drake joined me for coffee. Then, back to the Indian High Commission to pick up the passport, and so back to Brockwood.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji spoke to teachers. We walked in the afternoon.’

September nineteenth. ‘Balasundaram arrived in the morning and went directly to talk to Krishnaji. In spite of Krishnaji’s coming soon to Madras, and in spite of his wife Visalakshi having cracked her hip in two falls and having to cancel plans to record for UNESCO in Paris, Balasundaram has felt it necessary to be here and talk to Krishnaji. Krishnaji has felt increasingly that Balasundaram has done nothing to carry out all that was discussed and planned between them a year ago. I attended a staff meeting at 3 p.m. Then a walk with Krishnaji, Balasundaram, Dorothy, and me.’

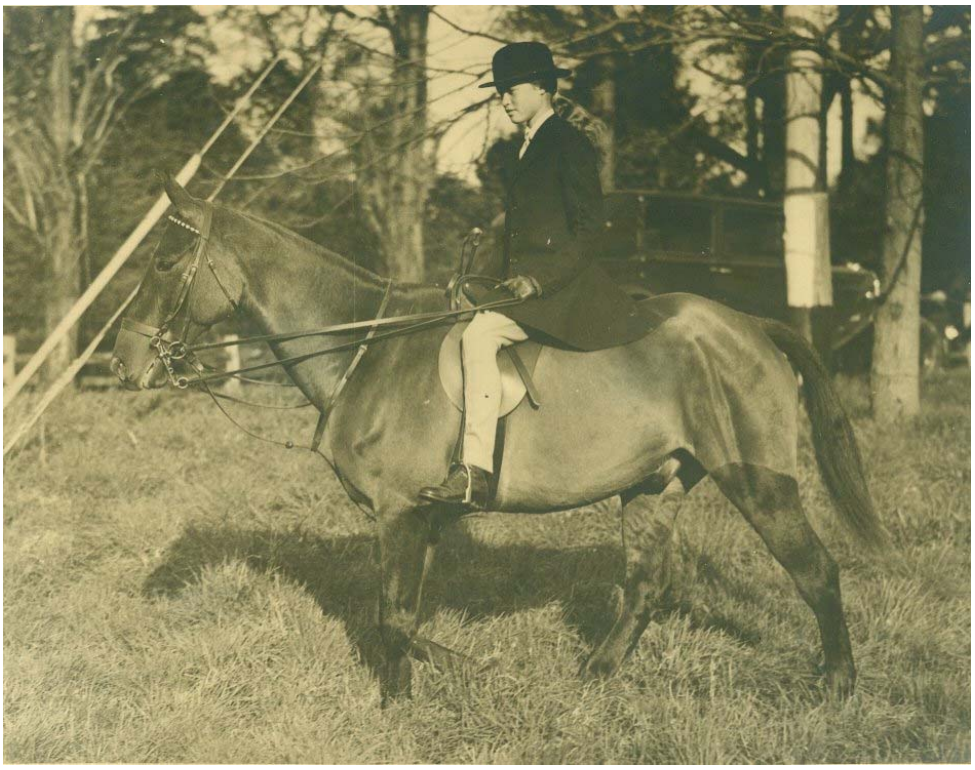
September twentieth. ‘Erna telephoned from London where she and Theo have spent the weekend after being in Majorca and Spain. They fly back to California today. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held an intensive two-hour discussion with the teachers, mostly on fear, putting himself in the role of a student. On the central factor behind various fears, he shut me up.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘He later said he wanted them to respond. It was a very good discussion and hard work. Later on, the walk was with Krishnaji, Balasundaram, Dorothy, me, and the dogs. A warm day, I took off my sweater.’ That seems to have been notable. [S chuckles.] ‘The earth breathes with the damp smells of autumn. This lovely land moves me, and I am lost for moments in its rolling fields. The air, so filled with earth and sky, brings a sense of something, of an essential, something native. I suppose it is out of my childhood.’ I know that countryside has always been immensely reminiscent, evocative.

S: Yes, evocative.

M: Yes, and wonderful to me. It’s childhood memories of similar terrain, only in the U.S.

S: It’s also just so rich with history and culture and something very human.

M: It is. Long before Krishnaji, when Sam and I used to fly there, when the plane would come over England and it was sunny, the clouds would part, and there it was, green and England.



S: Yes, yes.

M: I wanted to touch it.

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘As we were returning from the walk, Jim was there with the horses and persuaded me to get up on the little bay. Suddenly being on a horse again, after all these years, was a delight. I rode over to Krishnaji, with all the instantly alive reflexes and pleasures of those long-ago horse days.’ [S chuckles.] ‘It would be marvelous to ride here, but, and a large but, the stirrup leather and flap of saddle is exactly where my most fragile skin graft is on my leg, where the ulcer was a year ago and where there is hardly any cushion of flesh under the graft.’ That’s why I couldn’t ride.

S: Yes. We should say it was Jim Fowler, just to identify which Jim.

Mary, as a young girl, riding a horse

M: Yes, Jim Fowler took care of the horses at Brockwood.

On the twenty-first, 'I went to Winchester Customs and Excise Office and paid a 319 pounds sterling duty for the import of a '72 gray Mercedes.' [S chuckles.] 'It now has a British instead of a Swiss registry. I was back for lunch. With Dorothy, I went to Alresford and West Meon on errands in the afternoon, and then a walk with Krishnaji and Balasundaram.'

September twenty-second. 'We went to London by train, to U.S. embassy to have notarized affidavits by Krishnaji and me on the particulars of his birth. These are needed in lieu of a birth certificate, required by U.S. immigration visa application. An eager older woman worker appeared to introduce a shy younger one who had recognized Krishnaji. He shook hands and made his slight bow. I wished it had happened in the "immigration section," which is as impersonal as a factory.'

'We walked to Fortnum's, stopping at Morgan Guarantee and passing Sulka, where I saw a handsome cotton dressing gown which Krishnaji liked, but we were hurrying and didn't go in. Mary and Joe lunched with us. It was pleasant. And then Krishnaji went with Joe to Truefitt for a haircut, and I did small errands before joining him at Huntsman. He fitted trousers. And then, it was raining hard, and of course, no taxis. What to do? Then, André de Bloos, father of Brockwood student Jean-Michel de Bloos, appeared having seen Krishnaji through the Huntsman window. He and his friend, a woman named Martine, were parked across the street, and they offered to drive Krishnaji and me to Waterloo. Surprising luck. I was weary and dog-tired' [laughing].

‘In the train, I slept and woke up to watch Krishnaji reading a detective story we bought at Waterloo, his lips moving faintly with the words.’ That slowed him down terribly. I once took a speed reading course and learned you must never mouth the words. Anyway, ‘his fingers seem polished as he holds the book. The grace and beauty that is so limitless in his face can be watched endlessly, wonderingly, more beautiful than a work of art, and more alive than a tree. In the evening, we watched a TV interview with Andrei Amalrik, a Soviet dissident writer. Krishnaji said, “We are talking about the same things,” when Amalrik said, “Change cannot come from without, but from within each person.” Later, we watched till far too late, at 11 o’clock, a remake of Rogue Male with Peter O’Toole. It was a good movie. We both got too tense with the suspense!’ I don’t remember the movie, but I remember the name. That’s the end of that day.

S: Okay. That’s all we have time for.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] He was the director of the Krishnamurti-Bohm-Shainberg videos from America who had come over to film the discussions at Brockwood.

[2] Charles Webster Leadbeater, the man Theosophists believed to be psychic and who discovered Krishnaji as a boy on the beach in Madras, claiming he was the new “World Teacher.”

[3] This is what Krishnaji called Annie Besant.

[4] Italian for “two friends.”

[5] Swaine Adeney Brigg, usually just known as Brigg’s.

Issue 43: September 23, 1976 to December 31, 1976

In this issue we see more than we have before of Krishnaji's concern about how his teachings will continue after he is gone. This continued to be a vexing question for the rest of his life.

Mary gives accounts (one quite long) of discussions Krishnaji held which weren't recorded. It seems these are the only accounts we have of these.

Mary: We're starting on September twenty-third, 1976, and we're at Brockwood. My diary says, 'Krishnaji talked to Balasundaram at some length. Students started to arrive[1]. We walked in the rain; Krishnaji, Balasundaram, Dorothy, and I.'

And for the next day, all it says is, 'Balasundaram left. The rest of the students arrived.'

On the twenty-fifth of September. 'Today is the start of the term for the school, so students are seeing teachers about their studies, etcetera. Krishnaji spent the whole day in bed resting, something that he would like to do once a week. I drove to Ginny and Bill Travers's for lunch with them and their children,' one of whom is my god-daughter. We don't have to put that in. 'I gave them a copy of Krishnamurti's Notebook, and drove back in time to get Krishnaji's dinner tray. It was an intense evening of TV: The Two Ronnies,' [S chuckles] 'who make Krishnaji laugh, and Starsky and Hutch.'

September twenty-sixth, 'Krishnaji gave his first talk of the term to the school, looking marvelous in new beige trousers,' [both chuckle] 'like mine, a brown jersey, and seeming no more than thirty years old. His face was alive, quick, full of laughter and shine. He spoke on listening, what it can be.'

'In the afternoon, just as we were about to watch a full BBC repeat of the first Carter debate in the U.S., Mr. T. Santhanam arrived for tea an hour early. With him was his younger son, a very nice young man of about thirty-one. They left after 5 p.m., and Krishnaji, Dorothy, I, and the dogs walked down to the lodge and across the fields. There were many mushrooms. The air was soft, warm, and wet. The grass is green, green at last[2] —all the delights of England.'

September twenty-seventh. 'I worked at the desk and laundry. Krishnaji slept most of the morning. He, Dorothy, the dogs, and I went for a different walk, to look first of all at the young apple orchard, very good this year. Tasted an apple that tasted like the ones I remember in my childhood in Mill Neck, on Long Island—real apples from the tree, tart and sweet, and tasting of early autumn. We went across the fields, north and then west and around—a new good walk.'

'On our return, I learned that Jackie Kornfeld had telephoned. I got Krishnaji's supper and then rang her at her home in Tuxedo Park, New York. WGBH, the public broadcasting channel in Boston, want definitely to broadcast and distribute three forty-five-minute segments of the Krishnaji-Bohm-Shainberg videos. They want our collaboration and the editing to be done in November in Boston. That means my being there then. Talked to David Bohm about it. He would like to do numbers 4 to 7. He wants us to try to persuade them to take all four. Krishnaji and I watched I, Claudius on TV. Krishnaji looked a little tired and delicate. His bridge is hurting him.' That's his dental thing.

Scott: Mm, hm.

M: 'We will go to the dentist Wednesday. Meanwhile, I put his salad through the blender. I made all his plane reservations today. He will go from Bombay to Rome on January twentieth, and Rome to London January twenty-fourth. From Ojai, I will get his ticket for London to LA for January thirty-first. His India program worries me. It is too demanding. Pupul doesn't realize that he must be protected.'

S: Just to add something here about those WGBH tapes: I remember editing them.

M: You?

S: For some reason, I did at least the machine editing.

M: Well, good.

S: And we have them in the archive. They were first edited on paper.

M: Yes.

S: And I think you and David were involved, weren't you? I'm not sure.

M: Yes, may have.

S: And then, I did them on the machines. It was really tiresome, tedious work. But it was also extraordinary in a way, because to look that closely at them…because you can't just edit anywhere, even when it looks good on paper…

M: No, no.

S: …you have to make it look good on the video…

M: That's right.

S: …to do the editing. So, I spent weeks on this, and really got to know those videos. I still think they're the best things we have, on video.

M: Especially the last one, and the last part of the last one, where Krishnaji just takes off…

S: Yes. It's extraordinary.

M: …is extraordinary, both in what he says, the way he said it, the way he looked…

S: Yes.

M: …the tremendous authority, in the right meaning of authority…

S: Absolutely.

M: …in the certainty of what he was saying.

S: Absolutely.

M: Yes.

S: Even after seeing them as much as I did, I still found them just absolutely wonderful.

M: Yes, yes.

So, the twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji talked alone with the students. I drove to Southampton about insurance for the Mercedes and then to Winchester on errands. I found a foam mat for Krishnaji to use doing yoga. I was back to Brockwood in time for the walk.'

September twenty-ninth, 'Krishnaji and I went to London, to Nelson's for remedies for him to take to India, to Brigg's for his sun umbrella, to Hatchards for two detective novels, and to Fortnum's to lunch with Mary. She is against using the Krishnaji-Bohm dialogues mixed in with talks for the next book.' We've already discussed Mary's reluctance with those dialogues. 'We told Mary about the videos being broadcast on WGBH. Then, Krishnaji began rather intensely talking about India, about nothing having been done there in all these years. Would Sunanda be able to? She is immature still, he said, still may feel personally about him. "Haven't we all, in our time?" said Mary.' [Chuckles.] 'We all doubted India would accept a Westerner being in charge one day. "They are snobs," said Krishnaji. He was very critical of Pupul, whom he saw on television showing, "selling," he said, rugs to Mrs. Thatcher. "A Brahmin?"' [S laughs.] 'He was shocked.' [Both chuckle.] 'His distaste for this got mixed up in the more realistic criticizing of Pupul's association with Mrs. Gandhi. He suggested a group: me, David Bohm, the Lilliefelts, Mary Lutyens, Dorothy, and probably Fritz. But this didn't sound too good in the train later; he said to me, "I want to talk to you."'

S: Mm, hm.

M: September thirtieth, 'Krishnaji spoke to the whole school. I did desk work. Walked with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and the dogs. We watched Kojak on television.'

Krishnaji dressed for London

October first. 'Krishnaji saw Tapas at 10 a.m. Then, he said to me that we must have some serious talk about the work. He said that we care for each other, that is understood, we put that aside. Then he said, "You block yourself by defending and saying that things are impossible. Not free. The Lilliefelts have not gone into things deeply. The Indians are good at repetitive inquiry, but not free. That is what is left at the end of sixty years. So, really, there's actually no one. Someone may turn up in the next five to ten years, but now there is no one. What to do? Mary Links is out of it. She can't do it either. We must take things as they are, and work from there. The Digbys are out. There's you and Sunanda. In India, I will meet Sunanda, Achyut, Pupul, Ahalya, Radha Burnier, and Balasundaram. The best of the lot are in England: you, David Bohm; Dorothy is not pliable enough. In Ojai, there is the Lilliefelts, you, Fritz Wilhelm if he proves right. He will be on trial in India this winter. India sometimes makes people crazy."' [Both chuckle.] 'I asked if there'd ever been anyone. Krishnaji said Jadu and Rama Rao had capacity, but Rajagopal drove them away.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'In India, leave it open. Radha might have something. Theosophy?' (question mark). 'She can't leave it. It is her job. What to do with these few? Build everything as though I'm going to die tomorrow. At Brockwood, David Bohm, Dorothy, and you. At Ojai, it's the Lilliefelts, you, Fritz, and David Bohm again. You and David Bohm are kingpins between U.S. and England. Both are liked and trusted. In India, Pupul may be finished or might come out of it. Sunanda will cooperate with you. He then said I must remind him when he is in India to talk about who will come to Ojai in March for complete confidence in each other. It is doubtful about Balasundaram. The point of all this is to keep the teachings fundamental and vitally in the schools and centers. If the schools don't vitally reflect the teachings, they are better cut loose. He wants me to talk to Dorothy about her defensiveness, lack of pliability. I pointed out that her qualities and David's complement each other. Together, it might work at Brockwood. I said he'—meaning Krishnaji—'was stuck with me, and please to hammer on my head. "I will, he said."' [Both chuckle.] 'He doesn't want me to go to India. He said the climate is too rough. I must keep healthy for all of this.'

October second. 'There were heavy showers. Krishnaji spent the day in bed resting. I spent it at the desk. I went to the David Bohm discussion. In the evening with David Bohm, Scott Forbes, and Joe Zorskie, we edited transcripts of the videos of Krishnaji-Bohm-Shainberg discussions. We did numbers 4 and 5. We have to get them down to forty-five minutes for WGBH broadcasting. I eventually had to stop to go watch Starsky and Hutch with Krishnaji.' [S chuckles.]

S: That's right. Joe was involved in that.

M: Yes, I remember.

S: I'd forgotten that.

M: We went into the drawing room and conferred about it.

S: Right.

M: I remember that.

S: Yes, I remember Joe now. So, we edited them on paper in the drawing room?

M: I guess so. Yes, yes, it had to be on paper.

October third. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school and visitors most movingly on love and suffering. A new glimpse. It rained all day. We walked to the lodge and back in spite of the rain. Tapas left after lunch. David, Scott, Joe, and I finished editing transcripts of videos 4 and 5. Krishnaji saw Joe and Carol at 4 p.m. In spite of the rain, he, Dorothy, and I walked with the dogs to the lodge and back. In the evening, I asked Krishnaji why all his talk about "after my death," and reminded him that he had said recently he would live another ten to fifteen years. “That still stands,” he said, “and luckily my brain is alive as ever and will be till I die.”’

S: Hm.

M: And so it was.

S: It was indeed.

M: My brother telephoned.

October fourth. ‘I worked at the desk all day, except for a school meeting in afternoon. Krishnaji talked to Mr. and Mrs. Goldschmidt who are in a Krishnamurti group in Israel. And later he talked to a French group who want to do a school. I talked to Phil Fry and to Fleur.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji talked alone to the students. I went to Winchester in the car, but must go to Salisbury. A cold, rainy day. Did assorted errands there, and got back by 6 p.m. Krishnaji didn’t walk. It was too wet.’ It has to be pretty wet for him not to go for a walk, I would add!

S: Yes. [Chuckles.] Said with feeling.

M: Yes, yes. And with memory and experience of same.

The English Mercedes. Krishnaji going to the train station to go to London.

October sixth. ‘To get British registration for the gray Mercedes, I left early and drove to Salisbury, only thirty-five miles away, a pleasant drive with more glimpses of countryside. The cathedral spire led me to the city, a nice, neat tower. The office was found, formalities accomplished. WHO 354 R is the number for some continuing odd reason. I am relieved it is settled and made English. Went off on foot to see the cathedral rising out of the green turf; gray stone, solid and soaring. The cloisters would've pleased Krishnaji. I wandered pleasantly in the solitary way I like, and have done so on and off all these years. Exploring, seeing at one's own pace. I came back via Romsey in time for the end of lunch. I had a long walk later with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and the dogs.'

M: The seventh. 'I took the 9:15 a.m. train to London, then to Eaton Place for Krishnaji's Italian visa, then to Morgan Bank, and walked to Marks & Spencer for cardigans for Filomena, Caterina'—that's Filomena's sister. 'Then, I went to meet Krishnaji, who came in on the 10:45 a.m. to Mary Links's house. She had the Fortnum's menu: cheese flan and spinach. Krishnaji went on about her cooking until she confessed that the flan was from Marks & Spencer and the spinach was frozen.' [Both chuckle.] 'His mind was only barely on the topic we were discussing: should a little of the Krishnaji-Bohm dialogues be put in the book that is mainly of the Saanen and Brockwood talks? The Digbys have suggested it as a compromise to printing all the dialogues now, which some, Mary especially, feel give a wrong effect on paper of David Bohm's interpreting the teachings to Krishnaji. Joe came in after and drove Krishnaji to the dentist, dropping me at John Bell and Croyden for miscellaneous shopping for Krishnaji. I met Krishnaji at the dentist, where he had a gleaming new spare bridge by Mr. Thompson the dentist. We caught a taxi to Waterloo and then the 2:50 p.m. train to Petersfield. Krishnaji dozed in the train and kept waking himself up with what he calls shouting.' You remember he used to do that?

S: Mm, hm. I do.

M: Mmm.

S: Maybe you should just describe it a little bit. I think we described it before, but I think you should just describe a little bit for people who don't know.

M: Yes. He would sort of doze off, sometimes in the car driving, and he would come to with a start, a physical start where he would come forward, and he'd make a sound he called shouting, but it wasn't shouting-shouting.

S: No. It was more like 'Ahh.'

M: Yes, yes. Exactly. You've imitated it.

S: Yes.

M: Good. [Both chuckle.] Better than words. Anyway, as I was saying, 'He kept waking himself up with what he calls shouting, more of a sudden start and cry. "I don't know why I do it. I've tried to figure it out, and never could." It happens when he is in light sleep, dozing, and there are no dreams in it. He has done it for years. I worked on video editing in the train. Got back tired. We watched Kojak and now I must go to sleep.'

October eighth. 'I fetched Mary Cadogan at Petersfield. Krishnaji spoke to the school. After lunch, he talked with Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, and me about David Bohm, and the danger that is "assuming the mantle" when Krishnaji is gone. We all felt that David Bohm doesn't intend it, is a good man, devoted to Krishnaji and the teachings, but his weakness is liking praise and being able to be pushed by more dominant personalities. There is a difficulty of having someone talk, go into things, without assuming authority. Krishnaji is bothered by Dorothy's "defending," and not having new ideas. He said again to me that I see difficulties ahead instead of how things can be done.'

S: That you see troubles ahead?

M: Yes. He was annoyed if I said, "But, Krishnaji, if we do that, this will happen."

S: Oh, I see. Right.

M: I would foresee difficulties where he would plunge ahead with something.

S: Right. I've got it.

M: And that bothered him. I shouldn't always look for reasons not to do something. He was right.

'He wants to get good teachers from Brockwood, Ojai, and India together. Later, we watched on TV a series called Victorian Scandals, this one on the Annie Besant and Charles Bradlaugh trial for publishing a tract on birth control.' I remember that. Bradlaugh was an early colleague of Annie Besant before she got into Theosophy.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Krishnaji said, "Amma didn't look like that"'—[S chuckles]—'and the same of Bernard Shaw[3]. "She never talked to me about Bradlaugh. She talked about lots of things, but not him." She said, "Jinarajadasa…"' [Begins to laugh.] I know what's coming [laughs some more]. He's quoting Annie Besant: 'She said, "Jinarajadasa shouldn't be the head of the TS because he liked to look at naked ladies." "Oh, Amma," he said.' [Both laugh.]

October ninth. 'Krishnaji reviewed his statement, written in June for the Bulletins on his being responsible only for schools under his direct supervision, and hence, only they should use Krishnaji's name. It will be printed in the next issue. He then saw Narayan at some length. I went to West Meon, where British plates were put on the Mercedes, completing its import to the UK. Settled at last. I then went to Petersfield to fetch a washed bedspread and Magnolia paint to send to California as a sample, possibly for the cottage.' Magnolia's the color that most of the interior of Brockwood is painted, for people who don't know that. 'Back in time to fix Krishnaji's lunch tray, as he spent his day in bed. He was pleased with Narayan. Feels he can do well. He discussed with him a man named Graham, whom Tapas had here last Sunday; a former British consul in Madras, married to an Indian, who wants to live in India, capable of going to Rishi Valley as a senior teacher if Balasundaram deteriorates further. Could become the principal. Krishnaji asked Narayan, if Canada doesn't work out, would he go to India? And Narayan said, "Of course," which Krishnaji liked. He is pliable. Krishnaji presently is very bothered by the lack of this in Dorothy. He kept repeating, "What will we do?" at me. "She isn't moving forward."'

S: Mm, hm.

M: '"What do we do if something happens to her? Brockwood will fall apart." He is disturbed that there is no one else. She hasn't found anyone as a backup. This doesn't seem Dorothy's doing as it is with Balasundaram, who apparently dismisses capable people. Krishnaji wants me to talk to Dorothy, as she gets so upset when he does. I said that, "I, too, defend."'

'Professor Maurice Wilkins arrived for the weekend and is in the West Wing guest room. I went to David Bohm's meeting in the afternoon. There were only six students; his audience was mostly staff and visitors. It was an intellectual plowing in depth, but rather in circles, I felt. After supper, Dave, Scott, Joe, and I worked on editing numbers 6 and 7 of the videos. Got it done. Dave provided a summary introduction on the long side.'

S: I remember that.

M: You remember that?

S: I think we ought to just say a word here about…

M: Yes, what?

S: …about Krishnaji wanting to make it clear that only schools he started and was responsible for could use his name.

M: That's correct.

S: Because otherwise, if we don't say anything more, it sounds a little bit…

M: No, he felt that it was…I'm talking from memory now, I couldn't tell you when he said it, but he said it often.

S: Right. Well, what I want to add here for the record is that, as you mentioned in the previous discussion or perhaps a couple of discussions before, that there was a group from France that was interested in starting a school. There had previously been a very interested group from Germany that had come and spent a long time trying to do this. So, there were different groups around the world, in South America, for instance, there were several, who wanted to start Krishnamurti schools.

M: And he didn't want any of them.

S: Well, he didn't want them to use his name.

M: Name. That's right.

S: He was very happy for people to start really good, intelligent, sensitive schools.

M: Yes, and doing the things that he talked about in education.

S: Right. But, he just didn't want his name used because he wasn't responsible for them.

M: Correct.

S: So, I'm just adding that, because otherwise it sounds like he was against starting schools.

M: And I think, in a way, he was wary of what he'd seen happen in India…

S: Yes.

M: …where ostensibly, they were Krishnamurti schools.

S: Yes, and a lot of money was given in his name to start places, and then the schools just go on and have nothing to do with his teachings.

M: Yes. But the teachers aren't really interested in the teachings.

S: Yes. Exactly.

M: So, the next day is the tenth. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school, mostly on what love is (i.e., where there is no self), and beauty, which is when there is no thought. Students seem to see the latter more easily. It was a tiring session for Krishnaji, as he had to put much energy to get through to their understanding. There was much talk then at lunch. A Madame Maroger sat…' Oh, that's the mother.

S: Jean-Michel's mother. Yes.

M: 'Madame Maroger sat next to him, a nice and distinguished-looking French woman with her son and granddaughter Arian, the latter is a possible student. Madame Maroger has been long interested in Krishnaji. Her group are very young, consisting of her grandchildren and a few others who would meet, and so she was interested in the ways of teaching very young children. She and her son spoke fluent English. The son gave me a cassette on which is one of the Saanen's talks with the son's translation into French following each sentence of Krishnaji's. The French feel it is very helpful and want to get permission to make them.' I thought that was wonderful; that's when we started the audio translations. As you know, Jean-Michel handled it very well.

S: Yes, yes, he did.

M: He spoke as good English as a non-English person could speak, and he did it beautifully. 'Fritz Wilhelm arrived last night. He and Margrete are married. She remains in Denmark while Fritz goes on the Indian tour, then they will both go to Ojai. Scott and I went over Krishnaji's immigration papers as he will accompany Krishnaji to the U.S. embassy in January. A walk with Krishnaji and Dorothy. Krishnaji had at Dorothy on who would run Brockwood if he and she weren't there. Dorothy thinks a group, and will try it in March when she comes to the meetings in Ojai that Krishnaji wants to hold on the future of the work. She suggested the group should be Joe Zorski, Scott, Steven Smith, Shakuntala, and Ingrid. Krishnaji was very urgent, and belabored her on not taking enough rest. Everyone at Brockwood Park is overworked, has too long hours. Later, he attacked me for the same.' [Both chuckle.] 'He seems to raise this when he himself is tired and when pressure is inescapable, as now, when we are about to leave and there are endless things to be done. He was impatient with me. "You always say the same thing. I must keep away from you," as though my fatigue affects him, which I suppose it does, though I keep it to myself. His objection to both Dorothy and me is that one is not able to give time to what he is teaching. There is too much energy channeled into the necessities of everyday work. This is so, but how is one to make it possible?'

S: Yes.

M: 'I telephoned Vanda, also Nadia Kossiakof in Paris, who is much better.'

The next day is the eleventh. 'We went to London, to the bank, and then to Huntsman, where Krishnaji fitted handsome tweed trousers. Mr. Lintott'—that's the tailor who ran Huntsman—'showed me patterns for copying my brown tweed coat. Four yards are needed. Then off we went to Fortnum's, where Mary lunched with us. Krishnaji talked intently with Mary about who should see to the teachings being alive in the schools and centers: me, Sunanda, possibly Erna. Mary felt that three was a better number than two, and that Krishnaji should leave it as a request and instruction as it can only be done that way, not as a legal thing. We said goodbye to Mary. Krishnaji had his new bridge adjusted by Mr. Thompson, and we had luck and a quick taxi to Waterloo. We relaxed into the familiar, and these days, rather dirty compartment in the train. A day like this, so very much the familiar trip to London with Krishnaji, has the added fondness to it because it is so familiar. He dozed in the train coming back, "shouting" twice, but only a little gasp as there was another passenger in the compartment.' In those days, we went first class.

S: Yes.

M: Then, later on, he decided it was too expensive, and we gave up first class. [S chuckles.] 'I felt sleepy too and quiet in the warm happiness of seeing Krishnaji opposite, the beauty of his sleeping face, grace, and neatness of hands. These quiet moments are infinitely precious, like warm sun in a lee.' You know, when you're in the lee of the wind.

S: Yes.

M: On TV in the evening, on the news we saw via Barnaba Oriani where three Palestinian Black Tuesday terrorists broke into the Syrian embassy, which is downstairs from Vanda's apartment. They were after the ambassador, who wasn't there, and they were captured.'

S: What?

M: It's true.

S: Vanda had a flat above the Syrian embassy?

M: Yes. It was a building with flats on each floor, and one of them was the Syrian embassy, and one above the embassy was Vanda's, and we were about to go there. [S laughs, M chuckles.]

October twelfth,'I work mostly at the desk, and began to pack. Krishnaji spoke to students while the rest of us went to a staff meeting. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Fritz, and I walked with the dogs. Vanda telephoned from Florence about the Syrian embassy event. She is going to Rome tomorrow, and is uncertain if Krishnaji should come there Friday.'

The next day. 'I went to Winchester on errands, then returned to work at the desk. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Fritz, and I walked. In the evening, I telephoned Vanda in Rome. Her place is an armed camp. She had to show her passport to get into her own flat. She is uncertain whether Krishnaji should come there. He talked to her, and it was decided to postpone coming Friday for a week. And then, if it is still not alright, Krishnaji will go directly from London to Delhi. We'll change the reservations tomorrow. I felt a large relief at not having to get off so soon. A week is a boon. I am more tired than I realized. So is Krishnaji.'

This is October fourteenth. 'Krishnaji decided to talk to the school, and then rest until he leaves. I changed our reservations to a week from Friday, the twenty-second. I booked us both to Rome with an alternate booking for Krishnaji if he shouldn't go there at all. He is on a new Japan Air flight that he is due to board in Rome, but he can start it instead in London, where it originates. Does that make sense?

S: Yes. The flight that he was booked on goes London-Rome-Delhi.

M: Yes. So, he could go on the same flight, but starting in London on the twenty-fifth.

‘The question the students asked in the meeting was on meditation. He spoke on thought, the chattering mind, the quiet mind, and mentioned seeing with all the senses, which gave me a chance to ask what is meant by that. Is there not memory involved, i.e., I see the wind in the trees, hear it, possibly smell it, but the tactile sense of rushing wind, cold, etcetera, is partly knowing that feeling, as I am not out in the wind. Krishnaji replied that looking with all the senses implies looking without a center, a self that looks and reacts.’ It was a good meeting.

‘There were gale winds and heavy rains all day. We stayed in, and I rested a little, the pressure of leaving is off. Oh, pleasant space of time. I telephoned Filomena about the delay, but couldn’t reach Vanda. I wrote to Pupul about Krishnaji’s need for rest, and described the way he needs to live while talking; e.g., meals alone, one day a week in bed, etcetera. In the evening, we watched Kojak and then Lord Hailsham in a speech on British government.’

October fifteenth, ‘Krishnaji spent the day resting in bed. I spoke to Vanda, who said that things are quieter in her building. I told her we would arrive a week from today. I worked peacefully at the desk. Dorothy and I walked the dogs.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji again spent the day in bed resting. A lovely clear morning. He urged me to go out, so I took the camera and wandered about taking photos. I wanted to do this during all our time here this year. Went to David Bohm’s discussion in the afternoon. Round and round on what “you are the world” implies. Krishnaji and I watched The Two Ronnies on TV, which Krishnaji finds funny, and he laughs with his high-pitched child laugh.’ You know, he would, when found something was funny, his laugh would go way up.

S: I know, I know, yes.

M: Then, we looked at Starsky and Hutch. Rather poor, but it held.

Editor’s Note:* What follows is Mary’s memory (almost certainly in the evening) of the discussion that took place earlier that day. The paragraphs and punctuation have been left exactly as she wrote them, as changing these can change the meaning, and without hearing a tape of the discussion, that seems wrong. Unfortunately, no audio recording of this discussion exists. It seems worth noting that what follows is the most extensive account of any discussion that has so far appeared in Mary’s diaries.

October seventeenth, ‘Narayan, Fritz Wilhelm, and David Bohm had planned to have a discussion. Krishnaji said he would sit in “as an observer.” Dorothy and I also were present. Once there, of course, Krishnaji participated.’ [S laughs, M chuckles.] ‘They began to examine the way a child learns, motor-learning, action-learning, then touch, etcetera. After a bit, Krishnaji jumped it way forward to insight.’ [S chuckles.] ‘He asked if our consciousness can be aware of itself. He said that if insight is not acted upon, it dies. He spoke of observation in which there is no distortion; distortion is the me. He said there is no action before insight. If there is action, it is the action of learning. Dave said humans handle their lives through action-learning, therefore, insight must be different. Bohm said, "You"'—meaning Krishnaji—'"say insight comes before action, something goes beyond action—what is it? Perception?" Krishnaji said there was fragmentary perception. "Insight implies holistic action, which affects my daily life, the way I live, feel, love." Dave said that then motor-learning is a limited perception and insight is when it is whole. Krishnaji said he had yesterday picked up his biography and read about dissolving the Order of the Star[4]. "And I said, How did he do it? He had tremendous insight—he did it." Krishnaji went on to say that insight doesn't come out of learning. Dave pointed out that Krishnaji emphasizes observation and learning. Isn't it necessary?

Krishnaji said it helps free the mind. Narayan said that Krishnaji had once spoken of the art of listening, the art of looking, and the art of learning—the three arts. Do they precede insight? Krishnaji replied, "They open the door, but it doesn't mean that there will be insight. He didn't do these—he simply said, "This is absurd."… "The point is how we move out of the pattern. Looking, listening, learning is in the pattern."… "Can you have insight without compassion? But he (as a child) didn't know the meaning of the word."…"There is outward-going and inward-going. Most of us are outward-going, linear. That means he was entirely inward-going at that time. He was not an extrovert. There was insight. That is what I want to get at. I wish I could study him."' Meaning, himself.

S: Krishnaji wishes he could now study himself as a boy.

M: That's right. '"Can consciousness become aware of itself? Is there a mirror in which consciousness sees itself—the three arts." David asked, "What does it learn?" Krishnaji replied, "Its content. I think it can. I say, yes it can."…"Can consciousness listen to itself without an outsider listening in?"…"Have you ever seen a body from the outside?"'

'"Can consciousness listen to itself? What happens? Nothing happens. There is empty space, absolutely nothing. No observer, only that."'

'"What is insight? If memory, it will not lead to insight, if it is totally different, what will bring it? Thought won't. There must be a certain foundation. The foundation is non-self. Insight is in the absence of self. When consciousness is aware of itself, and there is nothing, then there is insight. That nothingness is insight. Insight is emptiness and non-self."'

'"Consciousness becomes aware of itself, and there is nothing, no content."…"How am I to communicate this? If education isn't the flowering of human beings, it has no meaning."'

'"Without love, compassion, there is no fine mind. No fine mind without insight, observation."'

‘At the end, he said, “This morning while I played Sutherland singing Bellini there flashed a great delight I missed in my youth. I said, ‘What the hell are you looking at there? It is here.’ That was insight.”’ He chided himself.

S: He chided himself? For missing it in his youth, because the delight is here, now?

M: Yes.

S: Right. And that that is insight. Yes.

For the eighteenth, there is only, ‘I have a slight cold, but worked at the desk. I also went to the school meeting.’

The next day, ‘Packing and desk. Walked with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and Fritz.’

Walking up the front drive at Brockwood.

October twentieth, ‘I packed and sorted files all day until Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I with the dogs took a long wandering walk across the fields. It was wet with autumn and the smell of leaves. Clean, wet air of autumn and its ancient nostalgia; this seems to stir in my head like mist. I love this country sense and season.'

The twenty-first: 'Packing, etcetera. In the evening, Krishnaji and I watched Kojak and the news.'

October twenty-second. 'For once I was packed and ready by breakfast, everything put away, laundry done. Krishnaji was a little behind. "Jee-zus!" he said' [S laughs, M chuckles] 'when he saw the time. Dorothy's Cortina has serious engine troubles, so it was in Doris's mini that she drove Krishnaji and me, with Ted bringing our bags in his Land Rover. All the school was out to say goodbye, as always, when we left at 9:45 a.m. Krishnaji and I told Dorothy she must use school funds to get a new engine as the car's work is almost totally for Brockwood.'

'At Heathrow, the woman at Alitalia check-in asked me if Krishnaji was the writer of the Commentaries on Living; I said yes firmly. She was dazzled, and for whatever reason, our seven bags went through without charge.' [S chuckles.] 'Then, at passport control, a white-haired immigration man recognized Krishnaji, and said, "My wife will be thrilled to hear I've met you," with such enthusiasm, he forgot to stamp Krishnaji's passport.' [M and S laugh.]

'Once in the departure lounge, we heard our flight was delayed to Rome one-and-a-half hours. Alitalia gave vouchers, and I bought Krishnaji a passable tray of cheese sandwich on brown bread, fruit, tomato juice, and ice cream. Vanda, Topazia, and Francis's friend Camillo'—he was a man who did business things for Francis and was also a friend—'plus two others were at the Rome Airport to meet us. Krishnaji, in the crowd, looked like a falcon, aloof, a little tense, and very beautiful. Rome was stifling in the traffic and its fumes. After the Brockwood air, breathing was unclean. Benzina now costs, they say, $2.20 a gallon here, but there is no lessening of traffic. Fosca was at Vanda's at Via Barnaba Oriana 91'—that's where Vanda had her apartment and where the terrorists had attacked the Syrian embassy—'and only two bored policemen were outside. The terrorist raid twelve days ago seems practically forgotten. I telephoned Filomena, set up going over her finances, over which Bud and I are trustees.'

October twenty-third. 'Filomena came in the morning, looking her dear self, well and at least fifteen years younger than her seventy-nine years. I gave her the Dunnes' letters and photos and she laughed and kissed them.' She loved the Dunnes, and they loved her.

S: Mm, how nice.

M: She was a lovely woman.

S: Yes.

M: 'We went over all her finances and explained details of the trusteeship set up with Mitchell Booth's help last year. I talked to her till lunchtime, when she and I joined Krishnaji, Vanda, Topazia, and the Emilio Villas at table. Villas is the man who pleased Krishnaji by saying that there is no evidence that Jesus as a man ever existed.' [S chuckles.] Krishnaji often talked about that.

S: Yes, yes he did.

M: 'Krishnaji talked to him in English, with Vanda translating. Terry Saunders, shaven-headed, came after lunch.' I can't remember who that was. 'Krishnaji talked about Sanskrit and chanting and sat on the floor and did a few chants, his long fingers bending at right angles on the floor, or hanging straight with their constant grace. His fingers never curl, never grasp. Later, Terry asked to speak to me and said how badly he had behaved at Brockwood, making an apology. He told about the four months he spent in Japan in a Zen monastery and his total disillusion with that, and it seems to have shaken some of the arrogance out of him. Everyone left, and I took a bit of a nap until Krishnaji came in, ready to walk. We drove with Vanda to the edge of the Borghese Gardens where we left the car, and walked across the gardens to Piazza di Spagna, where we caught a taxi back. Krishnaji was ready to walk the whole way back. He enthused at being here, but it would have tired him.' That was nice.

S: Mm, hm. Yes.

M: He liked being in Italy.

S: Yes.

M: October twenty-fourth, 'Filomena and her son Mario came, and I returned with them to their house, where I saw the whole family. Mario drove us back to Vanda's for lunch and the four of us had a cheery lunch. Krishnaji teased Vanda, who at last, after many invitations since 1969, has said she will come to Brockwood next year because Paola and Jon (Vanda's daughter and son-in-law) will be in Cambridge, where Jon will teach for a year.' She wouldn't come to Brockwood, but she'd now come because her daughter was going to be in England. [Chuckling.]

S: I remember her visit.

M: I had a rest after lunch. Then, Krishnaji and I went for a walk twice around Villa Glori.' That was a lovely park that was really just across the street from where Vanda lived. 'On the walk I spoke to him about it seeming as if there is insight, revolution, breaking away from concepts, and freedom; then this stiffens into a new pattern, which becomes dogma and so power.' What I was thinking of was: say a teacher, Krishnaji or Buddha, or whoever, comes and something new is seen.

S: Yes.

M: And then, by the followers, what happens afterward, it becomes dogma.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And stiffens and loses its meaning and becomes power.

S: Yes.

M: 'This happens in society, religion, etcetera. Mao advocated perpetual revolution every five years or so, and this became violence, power, and struggle, with his people attacking other people. In religion, it is obvious as it is a peril to what Krishnaji has said. He picked it up immediately. "Freedom is movement," he said. "When I am gone, it must go further, deepen."'

'I said, "Between the Buddha and him there have been 2,400 years. Who is to now go deeper than he?" "Write it down, write it down," he said. "We must talk about this in March when there is the meeting."' That is the intended international trustee meeting.

'We came back to the flat, and there were about fifty people to meet Krishnaji. He spoke on questions asked, like what is the now, memory, thought, etcetera. It was not recorded.'

I don't know if I was saying that the discussion wasn't recorded or what.

S: There is no record of this talk in the archives, so, presumably, you were saying that the discussion wasn't recorded.

M: Well, there you are. 'The now is the past meeting the present and ending there, not carrying over to color the future. After one-and-a-half hours of careful explaining, a young man named Paolo said he didn't understand. There was no change in him. Why did Krishnaji have organizations, foundations, copyright? Krishnaji answered but others said this took the conversation off track. Grazia translated well. Cragnolini was there. He looked thin with some sort of leg trouble. Barabino was also there. I asked him to please hand over the mailing list. He was aggrieved at Cragnolini for abruptly telling him last year that he, Barabino, was no longer the secretary, and that I had said so. I said I delivered the message that Krishnaji had said the Italian committee should decide if Barabino, who was too occupied with Biella'—that was the school that Barabino was plugging…

S: That's right. That was another so-called Krishnamurti school.

M: Yes. '…whether Barabino, who was too occupied with Biella, should be replaced. As usual, whatever it was he was running doesn't function or communicate. I urged him to talk to Vanda. He is still on the committee. Finally, they all left, the lights failed, and we had supper by candlelight.'

The Italian committee was a committee in fantasy only. [S laughs, M chuckles.] And none of them listened. Barabino never did turn over the mailing list.

S: Yes, yes, he felt that it was his private property.

M: Yes. The Italian committee didn't function in any possible way resembling a committee.

S: [laughing] Very Italian.

M: They all did what they wanted to do, and didn't seem to like each other very much. [S laughs heartily.] Somebody eventually got some books published. But it wasn't a committee venture. It was absolute chaos. [M laughs.] And you couldn't make them see that.

October twenty-fifth. 'I'm writing this on TWA over the North Atlantic. I was ready by 8 a.m. Vanda, very warmly, saying a friendly goodbye. I sat with Krishnaji while he ate his breakfast. He said our talk yesterday in Villa Glori was very much in his mind. He had me repeat it, and then write him a memo on it to take with him. He said, "First there is freedom, then insight, revolutionary action. If they stiffen into a pattern, then follows dogma and power. Freedom is movement. When or if insight becomes knowledge, then dogma follows. Freedom from self brings insight. When there is insight, there is radical transformation, which is freedom. When fundamental change does not take place, then there is pattern, dogma, and power. It is the function of the Foundations to see this doesn't happen." I added the word "psychological" before "revolutionary action" in his memo, which it naturally is, but in this crazy world, he shouldn't be carrying to such a country as India notes on "revolutionary action." Words meant in a religious sense are seeable in the current violent eye of the time, differently. He blessed me as always, silently and deeply. I am to be careful about unnecessary travel. Travel in his service is watched over. I feel somehow empty of, or removed from, anything but his service, his teaching, and its purpose. Filomena and Mario drove me to the airport. A large overweight charge in spite of going first class. Krishnaji encouraged me to pay first class for this hop of the trip, and I can't help but be glad I have a single forward seat, the same as he is in too at this moment, flying on Japan Airlines to Delhi. His flight left from the same gate, one-and-a-half hours after mine. There is ocean below, sun, and only a little cloud.'

'I am now writing at 1115'—that's my brother's apartment in New York—'the corralling of the five bags was a wrestling match in a mob of people, dragging them onto the cart, then out to the customs. I got the wrong beige bag, and had to find a man who had the same color bag'—anyway, I got my bag back, we switched bags. 'Finally I got away one-and-a-half hours later to Bud's car, which he had sent with a driver to meet me. I got to 1115 after 7 p.m., had supper with Bud and his wife Lisa, and talked till what was 3 a.m. Rome time. Krishnaji, by then, should have landed in Delhi, and gone to Pupul's. Fritz Wilhelm and Carl Marcus should have been on his flight after boarding it in London. I took a long shower, washed my hair, and slept after telephoning Amanda.'

October twenty-sixth. 'I spoke to all my family. One of my cousins called me. I am to stay with her when I go to the Vineyard, probably Saturday, instead of at Elm Home.'

Elm Home is the family house where my mother lived on Martha's Vineyard. 'I talked to Erna. The school building is slow. The planning commissioner is objecting to enlarging Pine Cottage. Everything is, as usual, a struggle. Lawyer Rosenberg's partner says immigration takes six months to action a request for preferential status. Again, a struggle. Then, talked to Jackie Kornfeld about the edited video tapes. She's delighted, but Joan Sullivan'—that's the woman at WGBH—'is illusive. Jackie doesn't know if she has even seen all the originals. Suggested we copy the edited versions and take a look at them, and take them to Reeve's Tele-taping. She will telephone Sullivan on return to Boston tomorrow. Bud and I did errands, lunched at Côte Basque. I got a present for my mother. Bud, Lisa, and I dined around the corner at a new small place called Summerhouse. I hope Krishnaji is resting. I voted in absentee ballot.'

Now the next several days is all going to be about me and family, so I'll skip most of this unless there's anything about Krishnaji.

For the thirtieth of October, there's a notation in the little book that says: 'Today, Krishnaji should've flown from Delhi to Benares. Mrs. Gandhi canceled the elections, due to take place in 1977.'

S: Right.

M: November eleventh. 'I received a cable from Krishnaji in Benares.'

November seventeenth, and I'm now in Malibu. 'The first letter came from Krishnaji beginning October twenty-seventh and written daily through November sixth. It took eleven days to come from Benares. He is well. He wants Graham Graves to go to India.' Who is that?

S: That was the person who used to be a British consulate person. He was mentioned before, married to an Indian woman, and brought by Tapas.

M: Oh, yes. That's right. 'Krishnaji wants him to go to India at Christmas holiday for KFI members to meet him about Rishi Valley.'

The twenty-ninth of November, 'I got a message from Jackie Kornfeld that the WGBH woman, Joan Sullivan, now has until December tenth to answer about the videos or we will withdraw our offer.'

The next day, 'I had a nice letter,' it says, 'from Ahalya Chari about Krishnaji's stay in Rajghat.'

S: The letter is presumably in your files?

M: I guess so.

The third of December. ‘Erna had a letter from the Immigration and Naturalization Office. They don’t think KFA is a religious institution.’ [Chuckles.]

On the fifth of December, it says: ‘Krishnaji goes from Rishi Valley to Madras.’

December seventh. ‘Letter number three from Krishnaji arrives, written in Rajghat, Delhi, and Rishi Valley.’

The tenth of December. ‘I worked at the desk all day. I wrote a letter to lawyer Rosenberg about Krishnaji’s visa. Jackie Kornfeld telephoned about the WGBH woman, Ms. Sullivan, wanting to use the videos but she is uncertain how many. Shainberg telephoned. He has talked to Sullivan, and will work on her on his return from India, where he goes on the twenty-second for one month.’

The next day, ‘Letter number four arrived from Krishnaji, written in Rishi Valley and Madras.’

The twelfth of December. ‘I telephoned Brockwood about the videotapes. I spoke to Scott and Dorothy, then to Jackie Kornfeld in New York. Albion Patterson resigned as a KFA trustee. I washed and waxed the Green Beauty.’

The next day, ‘I was up early and left for Ojai in the green Mercedes at 8 a.m. Looked at the school building being built. The grove has been pruned. At 11 a.m. there was a trustee meeting. The Lilliefelts, Evelyne, Cynthia Wood all signed a letter to the Immigration Department on being a religious organization. We lunched at Arya Vihara, then more meetings and later met teachers. I got home at 7 p.m.’

December fourteenth, ‘I took the trustee letter to our lawyer, Rosenberg, so he could forward it to the Immigration Department. He said that Krishnaji could be given a temporary visa by the U.S. consulate in London to come back here. I asked Evelyne to get letters from religious experts, rabbis, and priests.’

December twentieth, ‘I got the fifth letter from Krishnaji, written in Madras.’

On the twenty-second, ‘Evelyne and Alan Kishbaugh came at 8:30 a.m., and Alan drove us to Cynthia Wood’s house in Santa Barbara, while Erna and Theo and Ruth came from Ojai. We spent the day going over the new administration building with Ron Gammel’—that was an architect—‘and Sandy Hirshon to get the costs down. Cynthia gave us lunch and we wound up after 4 p.m., and I came home to long telephone calls about the immigration problem. We got rabbis, we got all kinds of people, to back up the fact that we were religious.’

December thirtieth, ‘I met Evelyne to get a letter from a Jesuit priest regarding our being a religious organization. I took it to lawyer Rosenberg, a rude, unpleasant man. I came back appalled at all this. Talked to Erna and Evelyne. Letter number six came from Krishnaji written in Madras.’ And that’s the end of 1976.

S: Okay. Well, we should probably just end it there then.

M: I think so.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] For the start of the school year.

[2] There had been the worst drought in memory that year, and the normally green lawns were brown.

[3] The trial took place in 1877, and full thirty-eight years before Krishnaji first met Annie Besant, and still longer before he met Bernard Shaw. They would have, indeed, looked very different to the way Krishnaji remembered them.

[4] In 1929, Krishnaji dissolved the Order of the Star, an organization that had been created for him by Annie Besant. He returned all the money and property that the order had accumulated.

Issue 44: January 1, 1977 to March 3, 1977

There seems to be an increased sweetness in the relationship between Mary and Krishnaji, or perhaps it's just that Mary is increasingly willing for us to see it. In any event, it is wonderful to be able to be onlookers to this, as we are in this issue.

We also, in this issue, see Krishnaji having a very real impact on the world stage through his influence on Indira Gandhi. I don't know of any history or political books in which the events described in this issue are mentioned.

We also see the long struggle to get Krishnaji permanent American residency come to a successful conclusion.

Meanwhile, the development of the school and the adult center in Ojai continue.

Mary: So we begin on January first, 1977. Krishnaji is in India, and I'm in Malibu. 'It was a quiet day at home. I spoke to my family, except my mother, who by this time was mentally just not well. I read, worked at the desk, played music, and walked in the garden.' There isn't really anything about Krishnaji until January fourth when I saw Lou Blau and Rosenberg about Krishnaji's visa application. There was a possibility to get Krishnaji an appointment with the U.S. embassy in London sometime after January tenth.

On the fifth, 'I telephoned at 2 a.m. California time to a Mr. Silver at the U.S. embassy in London. Krishnaji has an appointment for a visa interview on January twenty-sixth. It is an enormous relief. I telephoned Mary Cadogan about it, and then cabled Krishnaji in Bombay. At 4 p.m. I had a meeting in Westwood with Charles Moore on the plans for Pine Cottage in Ojai.'

Then nothing more about Krishnaji until January ninth when 'I got a telephone call from Narasimhan in New York, who had just arrived from Madras. He says that everyone there had colds, including Krishnaji, at the completion of his talks, causing Krishnaji to delay his travel to Bombay from December thirty-first to January fourth.'

On January eleventh. 'Dorothy telephoned from Brockwood because a form from the U.S. embassy for Krishnaji had arrived there. She's sending it to me. I went down to see Rosenberg and got a copy of the form and went over answers. He says this is the only one left to fill out. I came home wondering if I shouldn't go to England to accompany Krishnaji to the embassy. Before I fell asleep, I had decided to go.'

The next day. 'I booked tickets to London for a week from Friday, then telephoned Dorothy to tell her that I'm coming. I worked on the new form for Krishnaji's visa, photocopied the attached material, and sent three copies to Dorothy. I will take another three with me. Letter number eight from Krishnaji arrived, written in Madras, from December thirty-first to January fourth when he flew to Bombay. He is going to skip stopping in Rome, as he usually does, and go direct to Brockwood on the nineteenth. Amanda, Phil, and Miranda came to supper.'

On January thirteenth, 'with Amanda, and Miranda, I went to the Getty Museum. We had sandwiches on a nearby hill and came home. Waiting for me was a cable from Krishnaji: He is going straight from Bombay to Brockwood on the twentieth.'

The next day 'I drove in the green Mercedes to Ojai, looked at the new pavilion, and fetched my air ticket. Then I went to Pine Cottage and put books and belongings of Krishnaji in the guest apartment, then lunched at Arya Vihara with Erna, Theo, Ruth, Evelyne, Mark, and Michael. There was a meeting of trustees and Mark and Ted Cartee, who is now working here, about whether to get a local architect for the school rooms. I went to the site about an ugly utility hut that was left there, then went to tea with the Hookers.'

January fifteenth. 'I was back in Malibu. After coffee with Amanda on her terrace, I worked on the Pine Cottage house plans. Papers for Krishnaji's visa, sent by Dorothy, arrived. I cabled Krishnaji to bring a vaccination certificate with him, and told him I am coming to Brockwood.'

The next day, I had a long talk with my brother about business things. I was home all day, going over the Ojai house plans.'

On the nineteenth, 'I met Charles Moore at 10 a.m. for a three-hour meeting going over the house plans. It was very accomplishing. Then I did errands, a little maintenance, took care of some plants, and did some things for Krishnaji.'

January twentieth. 'I packed. Telephoned Brockwood and spoke to Krishnaji just after he arrived there from Bombay at 9:30 a.m. English time.'

January twenty-first, we finally get an entry in the big book. 'This is being written in the air en route to London, starting these notes again comes with the end of the time Krishnaji has been in India. Yesterday, he flew from Bombay, not staying in Rome this time. I spoke to him last night; his voice was eager, full of energy, in spite of the long flight and being three hours late. Then, the drive to Brockwood and of course, what must be the accumulated tiredness from the Indian tour. He said, "Darling, you mustn't take the train. You must take a taxi.' [M and S chuckle.] The world sang for me.'

'It was an unhurried day in Malibu, the first part at the television watching the inauguration of Jimmy Carter as he took the oath of office. It was as "Jimmy" he took the oath, pricking my sense of style. Amanda, on the way to the airport this morning, agreed that today a name is whatever one chooses to call oneself or, more likely, whatever anyone else chooses to call you. Otherwise, we were pleased and often touched by the Carters and the quality of American life that they bring. This flight is long and smooth. I have three seats to stretch out in, but sleep doesn't happen. The sound of the engine is alive. It is my own bloodstream seeming joined in high sailing through the sky in the night toward Krishnaji.'

Scott: [chuckles] How nice.

M: January twenty-second. 'No sleep, but arrived fairly promptly at 7 a.m. My one bag was quickly found, and there was Dorothy to meet me in spite of my urging her not to, and of her saying she wouldn't. We talked all the way on the drive to Brockwood. The countryside was grey, wintry, and beautiful. Krishnaji was watching for the car, and met me in the hall, looking thin-faced but bright with energy. A wave of happiness at seeing him. We took breakfast on trays and talked all morning. He told me of his meeting with Mrs. Gandhi, alone for over an hour before the dinner party in Delhi on his arrival. Her nerves and tension and the trouble with her eyes. He's offered to put his hands to help her, her becoming quiet, weeping, eyes were better. She asked to see him again the next day.' Do I have to explain that that would've been at Pupul's house, probably?

S: Yes, and you just did.

M: 'The next day, Mrs. Gandhi came and sat for a long time without speaking. She said she was "riding a tiger," not afraid of being eaten, but doesn't know how to get off. Krishnaji did not reproach her for what she has done. He was gentle with her, held her hand and she wept. On joining others, she refused to sit until he was seated. A friend who has known her for years said she has visibly changed since the meetings with Krishnaji. This week she has freed political prisoners, lifted some censorship, and called for elections.'

'Krishnaji also described enormous crowds at the Bombay talks. Rajneesh sent his father to listen, and if possible, to touch Krishnaji, because "he is a living Buddha."' [Both M and S chuckle.] 'Film people are coming to the talks. He was mobbed afterward. Further news as Balasundaram decided to give up the principal-ship of Rishi Valley. He will take six months off and then travel around, kindling interest in Krishnaji's teachings in India. Krishnaji is going to offer the principal-ship of Rishi Valley to Narayan. Sunanda has too much to do at Vasanta Vihar to come to the March meetings in Ojai. Radha Burnier and Ahalya Chari are coming to the meetings in Ojai for India.'

'After lunch, I took a nap and woke up to catch up with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and the dogs on the walk up and down the driveway. It was clear, grey, winter air; it cleaned the lungs and took away the effect of sitting all night and yesterday for 6,000 miles.' [Chuckles.] 'The winter, austere light, the bare trees, and the smell of leaves touched something deep in my head. To walk on this winter road with Krishnaji seemed the whole of life.'

January twenty-third. 'I slept for ten hours, and would have gone on, but I heard Krishnaji open my door. So, we made breakfast and talked. At 10:30 a.m. Krishnaji had David Bohm join us, to speak of the adult centers. It seems Fritz Wilhelm didn't impress the Indian group when he was in India. He was silent in discussions, or "not quick," with answers off the point of their questions. We discussed the pitfalls for the adult center, the danger of people expecting it will "explain Krishnamurti." It is a delicate and dangerous area of interpretation. Much of what was said I want to apply to David, too. Krishnaji said one can take the position, "I have some understanding of what Krishnamurti has said, and I'm interested. Let us explore, examine together."' That's the way he wanted it handled.

Krishnaji and Dorothy walking with dogs at Brockwood

S: Right, rather than having an interpreter.

M: That's right. 'He later talked alone to Narayan and offered him the principal-ship of Rishi Valley. Narayan is concerned about all the KFI members backing him. He will give Krishnaji his answer in a few days. We walked up and down the driveway. It was cold and grey and beautiful. Krishnaji says once all the schools' incentives are set up for Narayan, he doesn't want to discuss it anymore. The rest of us must carry on.'

January twenty-fourth. 'I borrowed Doris's Mini to go to Petersfield for the train to London, where I went to the U.S. embassy to ask about the procedure for Krishnaji's visa interview on Wednesday. Spoke to a Miss de Silva saying Krishnaji is ready for the Wednesday presentation of visa papers, etcetera. I had Krishnaji's file with me, but she didn't want to look at it. She explained the procedure. Then I went to Selfridge's and on to Nelson's for Krishnaji's homeopathic remedies. I telephoned Mary and had coffee with her and a pleasant talk. Caught the slow train back. Krishnaji had spoken with the school in the morning.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji rested. We walked in the afternoon. The dogs were on leashes as Whisper is "on heat," as the English put it. The grey sky and twigged beauty of the trees moves something deep in the mind's eye; something known, forgotten, remembered in nerve endings and bone feelings; something part of a long life.'

Krishnaji, Mary, and Dorothy walking in Brockwood

January twenty-sixth. 'This long, long thought of day began at 4 a.m., when I got up and Krishnaji did too, a little later. Exercise was out, and a bath was out, as there is no hot water at that hour. But we had a proper breakfast in the kitchen, and with Dorothy in her Cortina, we were off for London by 5:50 a.m. It was still dark. Krishnaji's first appointment was at 9 a.m., with the embassy doctor, a Dr. M. Falin. We came so quickly at that early hour that we reached his office in Cumberland Place by 7:30 a.m., got the one parking place on the street, and sat in the car till 9 a.m.' He had to be checked by a doctor to see that he didn't have tuberculosis or they wouldn't give out a visa.

S: Right.

M: 'It was a scruffy place. Others had the same appointment, but they ran it all quickly. Krishnaji had some blood taken for tests, and a chest X-ray, and he was out in half an hour. We went to Grosvenor Square, where again we found the one parking space. Dorothy stayed in the car. Krishnaji and I went into the embassy and gave the whole file to a clerk, then waited half an hour. When Krishnaji was called, I went in with him to the interview. The imagined opponent of these last months, the possibly hard-eye, indifferent bureaucrat, the counsel on whose whim everything swung turned out to be vice-counsel Leslie Gerson, a nice young woman with long, blond hair, and blue, starry eyes who had gone to school in Encino and said, "Oh, Mr. Krishnamurti, I've been looking forward so to today. I asked to be able to process your papers." She had not a single question. Everything was in order, and then she said, "This is about the biggest file we've ever had." It would all be ready in the afternoon and we were finished by 11:15 a.m. It was done!!' I have two big exclamation points.

S: Now, we should just say, for a moment, this is not a normal visa. This was the visa for the green card wasn't it?

M: Yes, and he got the actual green card when he reached the LA airport.

'We all went to Mary Links, who was waiting to give us a sheltered place to have our picnic lunch and for Krishnaji to rest. I urged that after lunch he go home with Dorothy and I stay to pick up the papers. "No," said Krishnaji, he had a better idea, "We'll go to a cinema." He had seen Raid on Entebbe as we passed the Marble Arch Theater—just what he wanted to see. It was showing at 2:15 p.m. So, I drove Krishnaji, Mary, and Dorothy there, left them, then went to Grosvenor Square, where, again, parking luck held. We had found a place not only right outside of Mary's but with a broken meter, so free; and now I found one near the embassy. I took a walk, but my mind was on the visa, and I couldn't look at paintings, or drop in at Mallard's.' That's where we used to go for beautiful antique furniture, and I always liked to look around; it was fun.

S: Yes.

M: And I bought some things there for the drawing room.

S: Yes, I remember.

M: 'So, unable to do anything but think of the visa, I went and sat in the embassy. Finally, at 4:10 p.m., I got the precious papers, an enormous sealed envelope to be given to the immigration office in Los Angeles airport, containing, among other things, Krishnaji's X-rays. I got back to the car before the meter ran out, and just got to the theater to pick up the moviegoers coming out of the movie. Dorothy drove us back to Brockwood and I fell a little asleep on the way, with relief and exhaustion—my job was done. A long day, but all went well. I telephoned the good news to Erna. Had the blessed feeling of bed and sleep.'

S: Just to mention briefly, where Mary Lutyens lived in those days?

M: Oh, dear, what's the name of the street that runs along Hyde Park? Just off it.

S: I know, just off of it. I was hoping you'd remember. [Chuckles.]

M: Well, I could look it up.

S: Wasn't it Hyde Park Place, or something like that?

M: I could look it up in my map of London. Shall I go get it?

S: No, no. We'll get it some other time.

M: My memory's a little sketchy[1]. Anyway, they lived there until they moved into the lovely little house that she and Joe had bought for her daughter, Amanda. Amanda lived there awhile, but then moved to the country. So, Mary and Joe took over that house and lived there for the rest of their lives.

January twenty-seventh. 'I woke up knowing it was accomplished. For Krishnaji, the high point of yesterday was the cinema.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji dictated some letters. Narayan's letter came, accepting the principal-ship of Rishi Valley. Krishnaji wrote about it to Pupul and Pama Patwardhan. It was a cold day, but beautiful, and we walked in the afternoon. Mary and Joe drove down from London for lunch. We talked most of the afternoon. Krishnaji told in detail of his meetings with Mrs. Gandhi, also, the enormous veneration by crowds toward him this year—more than ever. The feeling of some friends that Mrs. Gandhi's change in India is due to, or at least since she saw him.'

S: The change in her was due to her seeing him.

M: Yes, her seeing him.

S: That was told to me also in subsequent years by people who were high up in her administration.

M: And who surely knew.

S: Soon after seeing Krishnaji, she let some political prisoners out, and she got rid of some of the draconian laws immediately, too.

M: Yes, I think so.

S: I think she also reined in her son, Sanjay, who was really awful.

M: He was awful.

Well, anyway, we go to the twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. I did letters. I spoke to Filomena about her niece's husband dying, but her health is better. It was cold, but we went for a walk up the lane across the street. There was a staff meeting. I talked to Frances McCann in the evening.'

Saturday, January twenty-ninth. 'I telephoned the Frys and Filomena, whose niece's husband died today. A sad conversation. Narayan and Shakuntala talked to Krishnaji after lunch. Narayan is glad about Rishi Valley, but Shakuntala wants to stay at Brockwood. Krishnaji was rather tired. We walked, and I went to the Bohm meeting when we got back—a boring one.'

The thirtieth, 'I spoke to Ginny Travers'—that's Virginia McKenna—'also to Nadia Kossiakof in Paris. Did some more letters, laundry, packing, and tidying. I would like to have everything clean and in order before leaving. It has been fun to be suddenly, unexpectedly at Brockwood and I somehow have no feeling of choice about it, but am eager too to be going with Krishnaji tomorrow to Malibu.'

January thirty-first. 'I slept lightly. Everything is ready, in order, things packed. I turned on the light at 5 a.m. and did exercises. I ran blanket covers through the washer and dryer' [both chuckle]. 'Krishnaji smiled when he said "good morning," seeing I was alert and ready to be off to Malibu. My brother rang at 7:30 a.m. from Paris. He and his wife Lisa flew there on Saturday at the invitation of the French government for the opening tonight of the Beaubourg Exhibition Building[2]. Museum life. Both felt that perennial astonishment at chatting, he in Paris, I in my room at Brockwood, and being able to say "when I am in Malibu this afternoon…"' [Both chuckle.]

'At 10:20 a.m., Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I waved goodbye to the assembled school, cameras clicking, and drove off to Heathrow. A lovely morning, cloudless, frost painted in the shadowed parts of the fields. We were there in one hour and twenty minutes, plenty of time to case W.H. Smith's for paperbacks and fill out the exit cards. We are carrying the enormous and precious visa papers, sealed by the U.S. embassy to deliver on landing in Los Angeles. Also, carrying two large containers of India Oil Aryuvedic food paste' [both chuckle]. 'We have the seats that Krishnaji likes: the two singles all the way forward in first class.' It would be me on one side of the aisle and him on the other side of the aisle and just the bulkhead in front.

S: Yes.

M: The 747s were nicely designed for Krishnaji's purposes. [S chuckles.] From the two singles all the way forward in first class, you can put the feet up against the bulkhead. 'The TWA flight to Los Angeles left at 1:15 p.m. Lunch was the usual travesty of vegetables, but we had apples from Brockwood and there was ice cream. The movie was the new version of The Spiral Staircase. Krishnaji's headphones didn't work, but though I moved to another seat, he wouldn't use mine. He has just fetched writing paper, and is writing me a letter, as he always does, on this long flight, and last leg to Malibu.' He wrote all the time, and he always wrote on the plane back to California and gave it to me when he saw me [S chuckles]. 'I have written one to him. He holds his pen so carefully. To be able to turn and see him is as extraordinary as that vast sky out there, or the Greenland mountains we passed a little while ago; the curving, crust edges of buff earth, scalloping the endless snow.' I was very literary in this one. 'The sun turned some of them pink as it tries to set, but we will not let it, we are faster than the sun or turning earth, and it will outrun us only when we turn out of the race and land. Over the Canadian Rockies, there is little snow at this depth of winter—the drought and the mad weather of this winter.'

'Home at Malibu now. We went into immigration together and handed over the envelope. "The thickest we've had," said the officer, shuffling through it. I saw a copy of Krishnaji's On Education in the file. The man then stamped something, handed Krishnaji a little card with Krishnaji's photo on it and said, "You are now a resident of the United States." Clutching at last that precious green card, which isn't green at all these days, we went out to find our two bags, go through the customs, and out to where Alan Kishbaugh was waiting. He drove us home to Malibu and left. Krishnaji at last in his room sat on the bed and said, "I may faint." He sat quietly a little, then got up, turned facing the bed, and fell forward on it, his face buried in the bed and his knees on the floor. I held onto him for about a minute, and then he came to and was alright. He said later that he thought in all the noise and confusion at the airport, that he probably would faint later.'

S: Mm.

M: 'It is now twenty-four hours since waking up this morning and so no more; but oh, the blessed ease in Krishnaji being here safe and sound and free to come and go from this country as he chooses. And now to sleep.'

The first of February. 'It is so good to wake up at home, knowing Krishnaji is here. Krishnaji spent the day in bed sleeping, reading. He said, "I don't dream anymore. Somewhere in Madras or Rishi Valley, I forget which, I dreamt Rajagopal was chasing me and then I woke up. I said this is silly to keep thinking of that man. That is enough. And so I went into it, and I haven't dreamt since."'

S: Hm.

M: Mm, hm.

February second. 'I spoke to Wooge and my mother at the Vineyard. My mother doesn't seem to understand anything I say, but Wooge says a call or letters mean more than appears. The harbor was said to be full of ice.' That's Martha's Vineyard—there was real weather that year. 'They have enough fuel oil. Krishnaji rested in the morning, and after lunch we drove to town in the grey Mercedes for him to have a haircut. I went to the farmer's market for fruit and vegetables while his hair was cut. And then we went to Lindberg's'—that's the health food store—'and got home in time to walk around the lawn before supper. We watched Carter's first talk to the nation since his inauguration. He made a good impression on Krishnaji.'

The next day is February third. 'I cooked. Evelyne Blau, Erna, and Theo came to lunch. Krishnaji talked about India, some of his meetings with Mrs. Gandhi, various plans in India for schools, etcetera. Evelyne left, and Krishnaji spoke very seriously and challengingly to Erna and Theo and me. Do we flower? If not, why not? Who is to be responsible in the future, and right now, as if he were dead? He said he had realized for the first time in India that there is no one to carry on. He said, the Buddha had only two disciples who understood him and they both died before the Buddha. Why is there no one?' And that always, always harrowed me.

S: Yes, I know. I know.

M: It just seemed utter tragedy.

S: I know. I know. It was. It is.

M: 'He said he knew the easy answers: Nothing grows under a great oak tree, etcetera. "But what will you do?" He said he knew what he would do. "Say I have listened to that man, and I have understood a little bit—and I am going to talk about it." He said we must make Cynthia Wood understand, be serious, talk about it. Then, he said, "I'll be around to help you for another ten years, maybe fifteen."'

The next day, 'Krishnaji asked me if I had felt the change in the room when Evelyne left yesterday and he talked seriously to Erna, Theo, and me. I telephoned Sarjit Siddoo; she has accepted the change of Narayan going to Rishi Valley as principal, instead of to their school in Canada. She seems relieved, as the immigration problem for Narayan was almost insurmountable. They have almost all their teaching staff, and won't have a principal. After lunch, Krishnaji wanted to go to a movie, so we drove to Westwood and saw The Enforcer, a suitable suspense movie, after which we shopped for books. Krishnaji walked around the lawn, and I went over to Amanda's and Phil's briefly.'

February fifth, 'We stayed home, except that I walked over to the Dunnes' for an hour in the afternoon. Betsy was there. Krishnaji at lunch said that the Sanskrit root meaning of mantra is interesting. "Man means reflect on non-becoming. Tra means to destroy, to swallow, to finish with self-centered activity."'

Then there is really nothing for the next several days until the ninth when, 'after an early lunch we went to Westwood to see a movie just opening, Twilight's Last Gleaming, made from a Walter Wagner thriller that Krishnaji liked. The movie was different from what we remembered of the book. It was full of every four-letter word and boorishness. Walking through Westwood has become like walking through a zoo, except that zoos have dignified animals, but the human species make one think mankind is the worst on the planet.' I'm very critical. [Laughs.]

S: And quite right, too.

M: February tenth. 'A mid-summer day. Krishnaji slept nine hours. He said he woke up feeling as if he had been "dancing." In the late morning, Charles Moore, Bart Phelps'—he was the vice-architect and really the person who supervised the building of the house in Ojai—'and John Rubel brought two maquettes[3]'—Krishnaji couldn't understand blueprints or architectural drawings—'of the living and dining room, showing the ceiling structure and the dining area. They went over it with Krishnaji, who suggested heavier beams, and a slightly simpler arrangement in the dining room. Krishnaji seemed tired and abstracted. Many trips to the bathroom are bothering him. He thinks it is a herb tea he is drinking in the morning. I tried to call Lailee'—our mutual doctor—'but she is not in today. The architects lunched with us, and we continued to meet in the afternoon. The architects left, and Krishnaji eventually slept. Amanda reported on the hideous houses of Malibu she saw with Ruth Carter for enormous prices—$450,000 for scruffy beach houses on narrow lots, one million for another. It convinced her and Phil more than ever that they must stay in theirs. As the next meeting with Moore will have cost estimates, the Malibu value will have to balance it.' It didn't in the end, but that's another story.

February eleventh. 'Another lovely day. We left at 9 a.m. in the green Mercedes, stopped for gas at Trancas, and a man recognized Krishnaji and said, "Hi, Jiddu."' [Laughter.] '"I was your son in my last life" with an ugly, vulgar laugh. Behavior gets crazier and more offensive each day, it sometimes seems. Krishnaji drove as far as the place where we always switch. Near the big rock, he said, "You must see into this brain, learn how he thinks. Amma and Leadbeater said this brain had been prepared for a thousand years. It is a special brain. It will probably get better the longer I live, and I will live another ten or fifteen years. You are twenty years younger, you must outlive me. I must find someone, maybe it is you, someone to carry on who has understood something. It is useless to say it now, but I wish I had met you forty years ago."'

S: Hm.

M: 'We went to the Oak Grove School building. Evelyne, Theo, Carey Smoot, Mark, and Ted were all there. The pavilion is almost finished and looks very handsome. Krishnaji was impressed with the quality of the work. Many details are carefully done. Smiles all around. At Evelyne's request, we went over to Eloise's horse barn'—that is Evelyne Blau's daughter, and she had horses, and we had a barn for them across the road from the Oak Grove, and she gave riding lessons to children.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Krishnaji didn't like the look of it at all and said to me, "If Rajagopal objects to it there, he is right." It does look scruffy. We went to the cottage, where all of the little children were there to greet Krishnaji. Everyone was on the shy side. Mar de Manziarly came at 1 p.m. She is staying with her sister, Mima Porter, and we all—Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Evelyne, Ruth, Mar, Mark, Asha, Ted, and Michael—had a nice lunch at Arya Vihara. Later, Krishnaji talked in the cottage to Erna, Theo, and me. He asked if I should really build onto the cottage. Was it worth it? He raised the question of his getting as much rest there as he does in Malibu. The factor is the psychic pressure of people concentrated on him.' That was always something that would come up.

S: Yes, I know.

M: 'Few people know he is in Malibu, so he rests well there. But everyone assumes and thinks of Ojai as where he is. He said he could cut off the feeling, but he didn't like to. We discussed this. He finally said he could avoid it by going away for a day occasionally to Santa Barbara or somewhere. At Brockwood, going to London for a day does it. Erna and Theo said it is vital that I live in Ojai. Krishnaji said again some of what he had said to me in the car about getting inside his brain, etcetera. We are responsible for the teachings, carrying it on. One has understood something, and must speak out of that. I raised what he had said of the Buddha, that the Buddha had only two disciples who really understood him, both of whom died before the Buddha, and yet Buddhism has been alive and a force all these years. Krishnaji's teachings exist. It is living. But he wants more, someone, or some few, who can speak out of their own understanding. I think Erna and Theo are troubled by this, not feeling they can speak, only back up Krishnaji or someone else who has this capacity. Krishnaji asked if we could see into his mind. I said from long listening that, more often than not, when he is questioned I know what he will answer, but not how he will bring the questioner to see it.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Apparently, the Lilliefelts want my help and presence. About Krishnaji's rest and privacy, it was agreed that all the activities, including the adult center, must be, as soon as possible, concentrated at the west end, leaving McAndrew Road private. We came home, Krishnaji driving the second half.' Yes. He was very concerned about all that.

February twelfth. 'We were home all day. Krishnaji stayed in bed, resting. I worked at the desk. It was a warm, beautiful, cloudless day. Water rationing seems more likely.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji greeted me with a "happy birthday," which is just about as far as I want to go with it. Amanda and Phil extended reciprocal tact. Wooge telephoned, Mother was asleep and is beyond any telephoning. Alain Naudé also telephoned. It was another beautiful, rainless, cloudless, perfect summer day. I refrained from longing for rain—it is lost energy. At lunch, Krishnaji said, "I am feeling tismic," and looked mischievous. It seems it is what he and Nitya said about people putting on "mystic airs."' [Both laugh.] Tismic!! 'He slept in the afternoon. I went briefly over to the Dunnes' for a visit, came back, and Krishnaji and I had our walk, ten times around the lawn. My leg seems to prefer that to bicycling at present. Too much exercise makes a feeling of stoppage in the leg. Another telephone call, the least possible expected, Cary Grant steadily wishing me a happy birthday. Chitter-chatter. What he really wanted was to know the possibility of buying this house. I said I would let him know when it was for sale.'

S: Now, by bicycle, you mean stationary bicycle?

M: Yes, stationary, yes, yes. I've always had one, and I've still got one…

S: I know, but this is just for the eventual audience of this.

M: …but I don't use it much.

S: It's very stationary. [Both chuckle.]

M: For February fourteenth all I have is: "Another summer day. Worked on income tax. My brother telephoned and I had a nap in the afternoon.'

The next day, 'I again worked on income tax in the morning. It was a hot, beautiful day. We had an early lunch. Krishnaji said, "You believe what you already know. You see what you have already seen. Therefore, you never see anything." We were discussing people's equating everything with past things. This conversation came as a result of a letter asking for Krishnamurti books for a library that lumped Krishnaji with U. G. Krishnamurti, Vimala Thakar, and Bubba Free John. Krishnaji suggested I say, "Krishnamurti has made it very clear for the last fifty years that he does not wish to be connected with any group, with any sect, with any religious belief, with any guru. He does not wish to be associated with any group or person, for he considers that they are all reactionaries, traditionalists, and acceptors of spiritual authority. They allow themselves to become followers, and so deny totally what he has been saying for years, and that is to be a light to yourself. He doesn't follow anybody, and doesn't accept the authority of any guru. All this contradicts the edict to be a light to oneself, which he has been saying for over fifty years." We then went to Westwood and a movie, The Cassandra Crossing, nonsense but enough suspense to divert and rest.' I have no memory of these movies we went to. [S chuckles.] 'We then shopped for better apples at Brentwood Market and came home to supper. Krishnaji said again, "I feel rather tismic."' [Both chuckle again.]

February sixteenth, 'I did errands, and got passport photos, then fetched watches in Beverly Hills, and Betsy's loan of a Beaulieu movie camera.' I don't know what that was for. 'A hot day, eighty-seven degrees. Home by 3 p.m. Krishnaji spent the day in bed resting.'

The next day. 'Erna and Theo to lunch. Evelyne and Lou Blau came at 3:30 p.m. We discussed the finances of the Foundation. Lou says it is in good shape. We should charge ahead with the building project. Krishnaji and Evelyne are full of confidence, "We will get the money." I asked Lou about any difficulties it could make in my buying the McAndrew property, vis-à-vis Malibu in tax-view if McAndrew property is rezoned to "Educational Institution." Lou said there was no problem.' Well, the point was that if I sold Malibu, I would not pay the big capital gain tax on it if I bought another place that was my residence. You have to live in it.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Now, we're on the eighteenth. 'Philippa and David arrived last night from Connecticut for a ten-day visit. They came to see me early. Then, Krishnaji and I left at 9:30 a.m. in the Green Beauty for Ojai with Krishnaji driving. Along the beach road, he said, "During the last three or four months, something has been happening during sleep. It sounds silly, but it is a sense of ecstasy, as though the brain were trying to assimilate a depth—depth usually means shallowness and depth. It isn't like that—a depth that is the opposite of shallowness. Dreams are usually superficial and have very little meaning. I have hardly any dreams."'

'I asked, "How do you perceive it?"'

'Krishnaji replied, "When I wake up, there is a strange feeling that I haven't had before."'

‘Me: “Is it that the brain is touching something it hadn’t touched before?”’

‘Krishnaji: “Yes. That’s it. It is something the brain hasn’t touched before. It isn’t an experience. In that sleep, there is a greater penetration into something that the brain—no thought can ever touch.”’

‘Me: “What happens to most people is that you see something and then you try to understand what it is, but this is different? How is it different? Is it outside the realm of what the brain can investigate? Is that right?”’

‘Krishnaji: “The brain is trying to understand it, trying to find out what it is.”’

‘Me: “When you say ‘the brain,’ do you mean thought, or the brain without thought?”’

‘Krishnaji: “No, not thought.” A little later, he said, “You remember that night we were sitting quietly and there was something in the room? That has been happening more. It happened in India a little.” I asked him about the pain, and he said it is going on slightly all the time. I asked if the “otherness” of the Notebook and this thing he is speaking of today, is of the same, and he said, “Yes, yes”…“But I don’t remember ‘the other.’ It is gone.”’

‘I said, “Though you don’t make a mental comparison, you know what I mean.”’

‘And he said, “yes.”’

S: Yes. So, he knows what you mean by saying that…

M: Yes, that’s right.

‘We stopped to look at a church in Ojai design by a local architect, Zelma Wilson, and found it fairly nice. We met others for the trustee meeting in the guest apartment. We discussed going ahead with some buildings, i.e., the administration residence, adult center, and classrooms. After lunch, Krishnaji, Theo, and I in the car; Mark, Cynthia, Evelyne, and Asha in another, went to see a building by Mrs. Wilson. On the way back, Krishnaji and I saw an adobe construction on Reeves Road. Mrs. Wilson came to meet us. She was rather a tough-looking woman, probably knows her trade and her way around Ojai building matters.’ I hate to put these things about people.

S: It’s alright, Mary. These things won’t come out until people are dead. But also, it’s fair to give your impressions. You don’t claim to be speaking “truth.”

M: But, I’m leaving it for the world to read if the world ever reads this.

S: Well, we can take it out later if you want.

M: She’s probably dead by now.

S: Exactly.

M: Anyway, I don't have to be so critical all the time.

S: Well, Mary, no, you're just being honest with what you were thinking and feeling.

M: Well, I'm saying what I'm thinking, but I don't have to go around telling people what I think of them all the time. [S simply laughs warmly.] Uh, where are we? 'A decision is still in the air on the classroom building. Teacher Dennis Duncan came to represent the teachers while we discussed school matters. Krishnaji went into the intent of the school. He said if he were a parent, he would send his son to us so that he would be intelligent enough to live in any society, a total human being. It was 6 p.m. when we left and got home to Malibu by 7:30 p.m. A tiring day.'

February nineteenth. 'I telephoned my brother on his birthday. They are at the Vineyard for the weekend. Vineyard selectmen are mad at the Massachusetts legislature and want to secede and become the fifty-first state.' [Both laugh.] 'Krishnaji spent the day in the bed, except for a walk around the lawn in the afternoon. Philippa and David came to see me in the morning. Krishnaji thinks Philippa "has something." He would like to involve them in our work. In the evening, I read a review of a book on fairies, and asked Krishnaji when was it that he used to see them. "In England," he said, when they lived in Ashdown Forest, he saw them all the time. Sometimes he was afraid to walk in the night. He couldn't describe them to me. He's forgotten.' [Chuckles.] 'I asked if Nitya could see them. He couldn't remember. Did he see them in India? Probably. Could he see them today if he tried? Maybe, probably I could see them in the grove at Brockwood. Why then, and why not later? "It was after coming from India. Later, probably I got more sophisticated and didn't see them," he said.' [Both chuckle.] I'm sure they must be in the grove at Brockwood. Don't you think?

S: If they're anywhere around there, they're in the grove.

M: Yes.

S: Yes. And in the Bluebell Forest.

M: Yes, oh, yes, yes. [S chuckles.] I remember your taking me there when I arrived at the bluebell height of season, and how beautiful it was.

S: Yes, yes. You normally just missed them.

M: February twentieth. 'Krishnaji and I walked at sunset, and saw the silver thread of the new moon.'

On February twenty-first, 'I worked on income tax preparation. We had an early lunch and went to the movie The Silver Streak. It started stickily with amorous scenes [both chuckle] and then a cops-and-robbers plot improved things, and Krishnaji enjoyed it.' He didn't like amorous scenes.

S: Yes, I know [laughing; M laughs too].

M: He only liked scenery and action.

S: Yes. When an amorous scene came on, he would say, "Oh, here we go again," or some disparaging remark like that; or "Oh, this is so boring."'

M: Yes, yes. [Laughs.] The ones when people started shooting each other…

S: …were much better!

M: Preferably with beautiful scenery behind it [both laugh], then it was lovely. 'In the car, Krishnaji said, "I was wondering how you came into all this. It must've been planned."' Well, we'll never know. Anyway, 'after the film we went to Lindberg's, then came home. I spoke to Blanche Mathias. Her eyes are doing poorly. We went early to bed, both tired.'

'The next day, I finished the income tax preparation. Philippa and David came to lunch with Krishnaji and me. Krishnaji likes them, feels something in Philippa, a warmth and sensitivity. He thinks Philippa and David are wasting their lives in Indian music.' She plays some Indian instrument.

S: Mm, hm.

M: '"She should be with us." But though we all chatted easily at lunch, Krishnaji didn't move on them, as he sometimes does. Later, he and I walked down the Dunnes' hill and back.' They had a road that went down to the beach, and we didn't have that. 'My leg hurt later. There is something bad for my leg about the extra pressure of climbing. Krishnaji watched Kojak in the evening.'

February twenty-third. 'Rain, amazing rain, fell slightly, only one-eighteenth of an inch. I went to town alone. I delivered my income tax papers to the office of my tax preparer, then had my hair cut. At Bel Air Camera, I bought a Sankyo 8mm movie camera with sound. I was home by 5 p.m., where Krishnaji and Sidney Field were washing the green Mercedes. We gave Sidney tea.' [S chuckles.] I don't remember ever having a movie camera.

S: I can't remember your ever taking movies.

M: No, I don't either. Never. I don't know. Blank. Amnesia.

Editor's Note: What follows is a conversation, the likes of which I have never seen in anything else by Krishnaji or about him. The diary entries for the next two days are not edited the way one would normally edit something for reading, but doing so, I felt, takes too many liberties. Instead, I have transcribed the entries for the next two days exactly as Mary wrote them in her diary; with run-on sentences, the whimsical punctuation, etcetera.

The twenty-fourth of February. 'We left early for Ojai. In the car, our conversation fell to talking of atmosphere—good and bad. I said that for me, in the village of Ojai, there is a strong sense of something disagreeable, of nasty people.' I did feel that, I remember it.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Krishnaji said, "Do you know why?"'

'"Well, there is that," I said.'

'Krishnaji replied, "You can see it."'

'I said, "There is animosity, there is conflict, there is envy."'

'Krishnaji asked, "Why is it there?"'

'I said, "Because people who feel that way go there, contaminate it."'

'Krishnaji said, "That's all." We talked a little further. Krishnaji asked me, how I met it. And I said I did nothing about it. I just sensed it, but the larger relation for me, in a place, is to the land, the beauty, the hills or ocean, the light.'

'Krishnaji said there must be no resistance, no antagonism. There is compassion. There is no self, nothing one is defending, and there is also the extraordinary beauty, the hills and light. "There is no self in this, but there is a goodness that can be invoked or to be allowed to form a circle through which the other does not come. But as long as one resists, or has some antagonism to the bad, the good cannot be."'

'We met with other trustees, and Charles Moore and Murray Silverstein to look at the design for an assembly hall—adult center. It seemed more or less to please. They are to do a model and make several additions—plans for single rooms where thirty can stay.' That never happened. We had no money for any such goings-on.

S: Where was that going to be?

M: It was going to be, I can see exactly: There's the Oak Grove and then there's the rest of the land where the school is. There used to be, on the rest of the land, next to the Oak Grove back entrance, or north entrance…

S: Right. Right. I understand. Right.

M: But, it was a fantasy because we didn't have the money.

S: If that had been built, that would've been the first adult center, instead of the first adult center being at Brockwood.

M: Exactly. That was what was intended.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: Thirty people would stay, that's a big building. And it was to have a library, and it was to have a room where Krishnaji could meet people, or more than that. He could address a group of people. 'All lunched at Arya Vihara. Moore and Silverstein then left, and the trustees met and agreed to ask Zelma Wilson to design a classroom building.'

This was done. That's where the other classroom building is.

S: The elementary school?

M: Yes, and it also holds the library and the physics class and several high school classrooms, and then also the little children.

S: Mm, hm.

M: It's a bad mixture, but anyway. 'Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I walked down Grand Avenue. It was dark when we came back, and a car swerved to avoid a bicycle without lights and came very near Krishnaji and Theo walking about twenty feet behind Erna and me. Krishnaji and I spent the night in the cottage. It was cold.'

February twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji slept badly. He said he had a nightmare. "Evil ones were trying to push me, fight me, and I was trying to make a circle around myself, but it didn't work and I finally woke up."…"I was trying to make a circle around the house. I knew you were in there, and I was trying to make a circle."'

'When I questioned him about why the circle didn't work, he said. "Well, it did because I woke up."' [Chuckles.] 'And he had cramps in his right foot and had to crawl to relieve it. Then he went back to sleep, and the other foot had a cramp, and again he had to crawl to relieve it. Then we started to talk about making the circle, and he said it was something he didn't want to talk about.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'I asked, "Was it magic?"'

'And he said, "Yes, sort of."'

‘I asked, “Did you learn it? Were you taught it?” He replied no, but he knows things like that. I asked why shouldn’t it be told to other people? “I’m not asking you about the magic itself, but why shouldn’t it be told?” And he said, “I have an instinct about it. I’ve never talked about it.” Then he said, “Do you remember when we first came to this house?”’—he was referring to Pine Cottage—‘“I wanted to run from it, it was bad, it was all wrong. And then we came and stayed, and it became alright, and it got better and better. Do you remember that?” I remembered. And out of this, he told me he does this thing whenever he comes to a house, Brockwood, Malibu, here, or I presume Tannegg too, or a hotel room. He does what he calls “drawing a circle around a place” and he said that that is one reason that when he is not with me, it is difficult for him to do it—when I’m traveling or away, and yet even when I go to town in the car alone, he does it to some degree to protect me. And in this, there is what I gather is the crux. One does not protect, as he put it, Maria’—that was his name for me, you know—‘or oneself. One is with non-resistance, non-opposition, non-setting-oneself—there is no self in this because there is no opposition—the intrinsic part is the non-self and non-opposition. He spoke of angels, not angels as sentimental beings—that blah, as he put it—but the invitation to the good, the beauty.’

‘I spoke of my feeling of the nastiness in the village of Ojai, and he said, what caused that? And I said, well, people who have these qualities of envy, jealousy, antagonism, opposition, it affects a place. He said, what do you do with it? And I said, I don’t do anything about it, but to me reality and beauty of the valley, the hills, the sky…but see the reality is the beauty of the valley, the hills, and the sky, and it isn’t mine, and there isn’t any me in it, and he said, “Yes, you know that, now move from that. That is the beginning of it, no opposition, no self, no center, but the invitation, the openness to the beauty and the good.” And he spoke of there being the forces of good, the forces of evil—the forces of evil are enormously widespread, you sense it in the world today, tremendously. You see it in the brutality, the wars, the killing, the torments, the hurting animals, and destroying the loveliness of nature. But there is the enormous force of good. He wants me to talk to the Lilliefelts about it, not from him, but to talk about this non-centered, non-selfed sense of the other. He said he does many things, but magic must not be taught, there are things he can do, that if I were to learn them on my own—I think he implied, I couldn’t do it.’

S: You couldn’t do it, or shouldn’t do it?

M: ‘I think he implied, I couldn’t do. He spoke of arriving at Vasanta Vihar last fall, and the house was filled with the bad, and they made the mistake of not taking him to his old rooms, but to his new rooms which are upstairs, and somehow, he fainted, and Sunanda, who doesn’t understand these things, left him alone, but finally when he came to, he did this thing and it became good.’

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'I said there will be a great pressure of the bad on these places here, and he said it is simple to change that. "It is not strong enough—one makes something different and good."'

'At 11 a.m., he held a discussion with parents and teachers at Arya Vihara. We left at 4 p.m. and drove slowly home. On the way, he said that I must learn to heal. It is to be without self, with compassion. Not for the person, but compassion. I asked if he could heal himself. He said, "No," but then said, "Perhaps I could if you put your hands and then I put mine on yours."'

S: Krishnaji said this before.

M: I know.

February twenty-sixth. 'The Dunnes have a lunch party for Philippa and David. As Lailee'—that's our doctor—'was coming, I asked her to look at Krishnaji on the way. She arrived with Mrs. Piatigorsky, who waited while Lailee came in and looked at Krishnaji's chest, compared X-rays taken in London with his chest X-rays of two years ago. All is well. His blood pressure is 120 over 80. She says he has chronic bronchitis, and antibiotics would clear it, but it would probably recur. Prescribed a cough mixture to thin the mucus. She suggested that Krishnaji see a urologist. In the afternoon, I went over to the Dunnes', and met Lailee with her husband, the Wylers[4], there also the Carters, Joe Cohen, Winky, and a new friend of Miranda's—Gordon Stewart. Betsy[5] came late.'

The next day, 'I spoke to Mother and Wooge, also Blanche Mathias. Her eye has a tumor. Philippa and David came to talk in the morning. Krishnaji slept most of the day.'

February twenty-eighth. 'I worked at letters. Philippa and David came and, to say goodbye before flying off to Connecticut, they made lunch for Krishnaji and me. The Bohms, Dorothy, and Mary C. arrived from London, and stopped here briefly on the way to Ojai.' This is for the March meetings that we were about to have.

S: Right.

M: Now, we come to March the first. 'Krishnaji and I went to Beverly Hills, where Krishnaji was examined by Dr. Marvin Hausman, the urologist recommended by Lailee.' He was the doctor who later operated on him. 'He took Krishnaji's history. A urinalysis was made. He examined the prostate and found enlargement. He recommended an IVP exam.' That uses a dye and X-rays. 'Krishnaji found Dr. Hausman to be a quiet, gentle man, as Lailee had said. Then, we went to Krishnaji's barber. While his hair was cut, I found a car wash, then came back for him. We parked in back of the County Museum of Art and had a picnic in the car. It was windy and cold out. I did some errands in Westwood, while Krishnaji went to a movie, Network, next to Winky's bookstore, and then I went to a two-hour meeting at the USG office with Charles Moore and Bart Phelps.' That was just next door to their office.' I got back by the end of the movie to meet Krishnaji, and home we went. Radha Burnier and Ahalya Chari were to have arrived at 10:30 p.m., and Theo went to meet them, and had engaged rooms for them at the Airport Hotel where they were to spend the night, but they were not on the flight.' Poor Theo.

March second. 'I packed in the morning. We had lunch and then drove to Ojai in the grey Mercedes, arriving by 4:30 p.m. We moved into the cottage. Dorothy is in the flat next door. The Bohms in the flat over the office. Mary Cadogan was with the Lilliefelts. Fritz and Margrete have the rooms in Arya Vihara. Ahalya Chari is to be in the back room, Radha is to be in the little room. And Alan Kishbaugh is off the kitchen.'

March third. 'At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held the first meeting of the assembled trustees at Arya Vihara. Present were: David Bohm, Mary Cadogan, Dorothy Simmons, the Lilliefelts, Evelyne, Alan Kishbaugh, Ruth Tettemer, Jackie and Sarjit Siddoo, Mark Lee, Fritz Wilhelm, and me. Ted Cartee was there to record on the Nagra. Krishnaji began by saying he wished to discuss what would happen when he dies. Books, tapes, etcetera are not enough. Who will be overall guardian to see that the teachings are protected and no division exists between the Foundations, a "brooding body" he called it. There must be a group who have known Krishnaji, been with him, who have the perfume of knowing him, and have understood something of the teachings, who will go about and convey that understanding, talk about it. That group should be formed in Krishnaji's lifetime, a group of those who have known him, are respected by others, who have no other interest than this. Only such a group will hold things together.'

'We lunched on the patio. I went to the village for food and bread from the Ranch House. On my return, Krishnaji was standing outside the cottage with Radha Burnier and Ahalya Chari, just arrived. A friendliness and smiling greeting were the first glimpses of Ahalya Chari. Like her letter to me in December, she was warm in a rare way. Very nice. Warmth and dignity, the presence of an intelligent woman of mid years, one who understands people and whose energy is toward the good. We went for a walk. Erna joined when we stopped at her house. When we came back, all the others had suppered at Arya Vihara. Michael Krohnen brought soup and salad to the cottage, and Krishnaji and I ate on trays as usual.'

S: I think we should end here because we're running out of tape.

M: Okay.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] This conversation took place in 2004, and Mary Links and her husband had moved from this location more than twenty years before.

[2] Also known as Centre Georges Pompidou.

[3] Three-dimensional models.

[4] William Wyler was the director of Ben Hur (for which he won the Best Director Academy award), which Mary's husband, Sam, produced.

[5] Betsy Drake Grant.

Issue 45: March 4, 1977 to April 12, 1977

In this issue, and several previous issues, there have been long sections in which Mary has quoted Krishnaji from discussions that are either unavailable to the public (like trustees' meetings), or for which the recordings have been lost (like Mary's Dictaphone recordings), or which were simply not recorded. All of these long quotes have sections or words missing, truncated sentences, and whimsical punctuation because they were never meant for publication, but were diary entries as a memory aid for Mary. And when Mary read her diaries out to me, she read them, more or less, as they were written. This has left me, as editor, with the dilemma of how to present these for publication—which these issues, indeed, are. I can put in the words I feel are missing; I can complete sentences as I believe she intended them to be; I can correct the punctuation. But it has seemed wrong.

After two decades of living with this material, I have come to feel that, at the end of every day, when Mary wrote her diary entries, she was still so freshly "carrying," "living," "holding" what she had lived that day with Krishnaji, that she was writing out of that carrying/living/holding; and, like an impressionist painter who paints what they are experiencing and not a photo likeness, Mary is giving us what it was like for her to be there—for her to be in Krishnaji's presence. And this rare entry, for us, into something that no longer exists, has to simply be treasured for what it is, how it is.

Mary: We begin on March fourth, 1977, and we're in Ojai for the first international trustees' meetings. 'It was suggested yesterday that all but Krishnaji meet on our own in the days between the meetings with Krishnaji. So, we did it. And it was the beginning of a good discussion. At 10:30 a.m. Krishnaji received David Weideman in the cottage. He was invited to join us at lunch.' I can't remember who he was.

Scott: Wasn't David Weideman one of the television producers or directors who did the Transformation of Man videos at Brockwood—the Bohm-Shainberg dialogues?

M: I have no memory of him.

S: You mentioned their names before.

M: Well, anyway, he had lunch with us in Arya Vihara. 'In the afternoon, cable TV was brought temporarily up to the cottage and connected to the Sony TV we brought from Malibu which we have in the cottage living room. It works very well. There is better reception here. Krishnaji decided we would watch only news,' [S laughs] 'not the endless watching of any old thing. He thinks he will sleep better.' [S chuckles heartily.] That let out Kojak, Starsky and Hutch…

S: The Two Ronnies…

M: Yes. It was not exactly adhered to, as I recall.

S: Right.

M: So, anyway, 'that night we watched the news and Washington Week.' Are you a Washington Week fan?

S: I am, a great fan.

M: Good. We can see it tonight. Oh, no, we can't. We've got guests. [S laughs.] Well, it goes on about 9, so hang around.

Now, on the fifth, 'there was the second meeting of the international trustees with Krishnaji. He raised the suggestion by India for an "apex group," of representatives of the Foundations without powers of authority, but as guardians of the purity of the teachings, to discuss major problems, and hold the Foundations together in spirit and structure. This rose hackles in some. It is clear that Krishnaji wants to guard against separation of the Foundations. Also, he wants someone who will do what he does now: know what is happening in each, point out what is needed, urge improvement, etcetera. But equally clear was the initial pulling back from a "special body," particularly the word "apex" was bothersome. Theo darkly saw all sorts of spiritual authority and implied repugnance. In the afternoon, Ahalya came and sat with me on the front veranda of the cottage, and we talked intensively about the work, schools, the need for teacher training, and business that affects us all. Krishnaji came out, and he, Ahalya, Radha, Dorothy, Alan K., and I walked down McAndrew to Reeves Road.' That's at the bottom of this hill.[1]

S: Yes.

M: 'We looked at the adobe house again, came back, and Krishnaji switched on the TV. There was President Carter with Walter Cronkite, into the second of Carter's two hours of answering telephone calls from the public. Dorothy watched it with us. It was excellent. Krishnaji kept saying, "This man will change a lot in this country." He said he would have liked to telephone in a question' [both chuckle] 'through me. The question would be: "This country and people are lacking in respect, integrity, and morality. What can be done about it?"' [S laughs.] That's his question. 'Krishnaji said no one had asked a moral question.'

S: Yes, probably.

M: March sixth. 'I telephoned Amanda on her birthday. At 11 a.m., the meeting without Krishnaji was held on the deck outside the new school pavilion, which at last is finished.

School will start in it tomorrow. The meeting was fairly contentious. Theo, in particular, but also Erna and Mary C. were against the suggestion of a special body. Theo couldn't let go of the word "apex" and went on about Theosophy.' He, having been a Theosophist, he was…'

S: …dead against it.

M: Exactly.

S: Yes, yes.

M: 'Theo also challenged quite aggressively Radha's continuing position in the Theosophical Society, and the Esoteric Section.' He really went for her, it wasn't nice.

S: I remember listening to the tapes at the time.

M: You remember the tapes? It was rather rude, I thought.

S: It was rude, and it was aggressive, and it was completely against Theo's normal way of being with people; out of character for Theo, I thought.

M: Yes. 'Well, she was finally forced to say something. So, she said she would give an answer, but not then. We went on to debate over the group thing, until time to go for lunch. In the afternoon, Radha, Alan, Dorothy, and I walked with Krishnaji.'

S: It's interesting that this proposal about having a group that oversees all of the work kept coming up.

M: Yes, well, Krishnaji pushed it.

S: Yes, Krishnaji kept bringing it up, but it was always objected to…

M: I know.

S: …by people either who saw themselves as not being in the group, or by people who thought they would be in the group, but they didn't like other people who were possibly going to be in the group. So [laughing]…

M: They felt territorial, I think.

S: Yes, but it was still there ten years later, Krishnaji was still asking about that. He wanted that to happen.

M: I know. He wanted collaboration.…

S: He wanted it, and people wouldn't do it. It's really interesting.

M: It's still being worked upon.[2] [S laughs.]

March seventh. 'The third international trustees' meeting with Krishnaji. He asked what their reaction would be if he appointed one or more "at apex." "Dismay," said Erna. "Grave psychological disturbances," said Theo. "Well, I'm not going to," said Krishnaji.

He then said, "The idea of apex was a group to hold all this together, no apostolic succession."…"Don't suspect India is trying to put something over."'

S: Which is what people did think.

M: Yes. [S laughs.]

S: And this thing about no apostolic succession, Krishnaji kept repeating that, too, every time he made this suggestion. But that still didn't…

M: And yet, behind the scenes, he was talking about…at one point, I was supposed to be a supreme ruler…though he didn't use that word. [Laughs.]

S: Yes, yes.

M: No one would listen or accept, nor do I want to do that!

S: Yes, but that's probably why you would've been good at it, because you didn't want to do it! [Laughter.] Whereas, other people were clambering for it!

M: Anyway, '"How will these Foundations be held together?" he asked. As the discussion progressed, the idea grew that people from each Foundation should go to India with Krishnaji this year. And there also should be an annual meeting of the whole group. This was tentatively agreed to. We will go into the problems and details tomorrow which Krishnaji doesn't want to attend. We went on to discuss adult centers, a name he doesn't like, The center, The Center, The Krishnaji Center. Krishnaji said he knew what he would say to people if he were Fritz or one of us. "I heard K talk. I've understood what he said. I'm not putting my own feelings out. I have put aside my own capacities and am here to convey what I have understood, discuss it, work at it, so that [the other person] can catch something of that. It's not my own notion. It's totally impersonal."' You need to make that big speech to anybody who asks you a question!

S: Yes! [Laughs.]

M: Another quote: '"They"'—the trustees, etcetera—'"are representatives of what they have heard, understood, and live." He slept after lunch and was tired on the walk with Dorothy, Ahalya, and me. And he was tired after supper.'

The eighth. 'Krishnaji slept well. At breakfast, I played for him the cassette sent by Blanche Mathias. It describes what her doctor called "hallucinations" she had had last spring after returning from Ojai. It began with Margot Wilke reading to her about life after death, and Blanche having LSD-like visual hallucinations. She made the tape at her doctor's suggestion, and wants Krishnaji's opinion. He had trouble understanding her speech on cassette, but I repeated it for him. My own first thought was that Margot Wilke either slipped some LSD on her friend or triggered something in Blanche's mind. I didn't give any reaction to Krishnaji before he listened, and his first words were, having listened, that Mrs. Wilke "is not a nice woman." Blanche is made very sensitive by illness, so either Wilke's conditioning or her imagination have been conveyed consciously or unconsciously. Blanche may not have been aware of what she too was feeling. Imaging may be her own unconscious projection, the ugliness part in it, and here, he said. "It is dangerous to say this. It may be wickedness, but it is in the world and various states of consciousness in human beings." He said, "The evil part should never enter into one's consciousness. The fear in it is part of evil that is going on between human beings." He said he should see her and tell her directly what to do. It couldn't be told on the telephone, or written, or conveyed by me, but he suggested we telephone to tell her that he would come to San Francisco. I had repeated into a Dictaphone each thing that he said as he said it. So, with him beside me, I telephoned Blanche and repeated from the Dictaphone what he had said. He told her not to discuss it with anyone. I asked her if she had any further symptoms. And she said no, no more, visually, after that. But now, she is hearing voices, a woman's voice. That is worse, said Krishnaji to me. I asked him what Blanche should do, and he said, "I must tell her"'—meaning he would tell her. 'I asked, "but could he tell me what to do, if such a thing ever happened to me." He said, "You already know."' [S laughs.] 'We spoke…' [M laughing as she tries to read on.]

S: You just don't know you know, that's all!

M: Well, I thought, any little tips if I go mad…

S: [laughing]…I know, would be very helpful!

M: Yes! [Laughs again.] 'We spoke of whether what is perceived is imaging of the person's own mind. He said it probably was, but the ugliness, the evil, exists, and when it touches the mind, it translates into imagery.' That's interesting.

S: Mm, hm. Yes, that is interesting.

M: 'At 11 a.m., all met here without Krishnaji to discuss mostly practical matters. Krishnaji joined us for lunch at Arya Vihara. In the afternoon, Erna came to Pine Cottage and we talked about Theosophy, Radha being in the Esoteric Section, etcetera. Krishnaji joined us. It seems Pupul thinks of Radha as her successor, as president of KFI, which shocked Erna.' [Laughs.] 'How can the president of the KFI be a Theosophist, etcetera? Krishnaji is going to bring it up. We went for a walk. Erna turned her ankle.'

The next day, 'We all met with Krishnaji at Arya Vihara for the fourth meeting. He began by asking what will prevent someone, when we are all gone, from taking over everything? How do we insure that this doesn't happen? What will keep everything moving, flowering? He said, "What am I to do?"…"Everything else is a secondary issue. It is the main thing occupying my mind. If I go on talking as long as I can, travel as long as physically possible, not till the end, I don't want to die on the platform."…"It is my response. The Foundations haven't felt this. So, it is my responsibility. What am I to do? This has been in my mind for a couple of years."'

‘He then went into the analogy of a baby: if one has a baby, one cares for it, etcetera. “This is my baby,” he said. And it became clear that the rest of us feel it is his baby, not ours. No one had an answer to what the Foundations can, or should be able to do with “his” baby. He spoke of the disintegration into ritual, etcetera, after the deaths of the Buddha, other teachers. How can it be kept alive? He said, “Because it has never been done, it is possible. That is the challenge.” He said that the Foundations are the vessel in which the thing goes on flowering. “Can A hand it to B. I will find the answer. It may be that there is no answer. If that is so, it is the right answer.” The power he put forth in this was overwhelming. I felt turned inside out, unable to move for a while after it was over. Others just sat motionless. I felt emptied, with only the sense of the stream of it, like a river, flowing through my skin. How often the river image describes all this, including that most vivid dream of mine years ago in Gstaad’—I’ve told you…

S: Yes, you have.

M: …‘the rushing gray river, the majestic redwood. His purpose, his teaching is the stream. I entered it long ago; now there is only the stream in my veins, mind, and heart. The bits and pieces of self wash away. Whatever does this action of the stream mean, or what is the action of the stream?’

‘I went back to the cottage and sat on my cot. Krishnaji almost locked me in, not seeing me there, and held me when he saw I was shaking. After lunch, he talked to the Siddoo sisters alone. They are starting their school in the fall, have three teachers, and a dozen children. They bought out others in the family trust, so they have less funds at present, but will have these replenished in a couple of years when they plan to sell the present school buildings at Wolf Lake. They assured Krishnaji that they are in this for life. We then drove to Malibu. On the way, I spoke to Krishnaji about whether there is such a thing as genius—in its real, not everyday, sense—in the religious field—innate, born genius, as in other fields, and if it is so, is it not perhaps necessary to do what he is suggesting. He understood my question, and seemed to take it into his exploring. Could this explain the not catching fire when he has brought the flame? I told him of own image this morning as he talked—not of the baby—but the watery one. He is the spring; the pure, clear water is a vast lake now. The Foundation can keep the water pure and clean, but only he is the spring. So, we came home to Malibu, and I was able to go over to see the Dunnes for a little before supper. Miranda was there. I was told of black Muslim terrorists capturing over 100 hostages in Washington. Came back in time for Krishnaji and I to see the Cronkite report on TV at 6 p.m. Krishnaji had to take castor oil at 5 p.m. for IVP exams tomorrow morning.’

S: Oh, right. I was wondering why you were coming back to Malibu when the meetings hadn’t ended.

M: That’s right. He had the appointment the next day.

March tenth. ‘I was up early, and tended to bills. Krishnaji went without breakfast, and we left at 8 a.m. for Beverly Hills and the IVP X-ray. On the way, he said yesterday’s question is working in him. Dr. Orloff, radiologist, X-rayed his kidneys and bladder. Krishnaji felt no ill effects from the intravenous dye or from missing breakfast. So, we did some errands in Beverly Hills—his watch to be checked, my Vuitton bag to be mended. I bought some under-things for Krishnaji, and we came home in time for lunch. Krishnaji rested a little, and then we drove back to Ojai in the green Mercedes.'

Editor's Note: Mary's reading of this is very moving, but her reading is slightly different to what appears as text here because she was having trouble with her eyes due to an allergy, so some of her reading of her diary entries was not accurate. All of the text of these meetings is taken verbatim from Mary's diaries.

On the eleventh of March, it says: 'I telephoned my stepfather on his eighty-eighth birthday. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held the fifth meeting with the trustees. He said his and the Foundation's responsibility is to the light of the teachings. The Foundation is to understand the tremendous depth of it. He said, I feel responsible till this thing is conveyed fully, to see that the Foundations and schools understand it fully, not partially. It is their responsibility to understand it. It is not a one-way street. If you feel total responsibility, you will have the capacity. Then, it happens. Capacity comes as one gets into it. So, my responsibility is to see that each member of the Foundations understands. If some are not so involved, what shall we do together? What is preventing it? Not flowering—is that a tremendous issue to you? It may be there all the time—this crisis. Crisis has no motive. To ask how to bring about a crisis is too silly. Either it is a crisis, or it is not at all. If it is a crisis, it will happen. Crisis is tremendous to understand. I would be at it…' I underline that because he was so emphatic. 'I would be at it, watching, questioning, seeing if my mind is conditioned, ambitious; I'd work at it, investigate it, feel I've got to find out. A crisis. If flowering is not happening, it would be a crisis, challenge. If the Foundation members realize it is not a crisis to them, then it will not take place. My responsibility is to feel the tremendous crisis. I've been wondering the last few days what it was. I see it now: If that is my responsibility, what will I do if you don't?' (realize the crisis). 'Walk out? Or work at it? Give it a time limit? What is my responsibility—to go to a new group and go through all that again? My tremendous responsibility is to see that you flower, and yours is to see that it becomes a crisis in your life. But, if it doesn't, what shall I do? Another group—same problem. So, I can't leave this group. I'm beginning to see something. Knowing if I leave this group, it will be worse, utterly futile, and a waste of colossal energy. I can't divorce. Do I put up with it? I refuse! We are at war with each other. I have to do something to make you change. I'm going to stick, whatever happens.'

'Everyone seemed to feel stunned, silent, and deeply moved after this.

All sat without moving. After lunch, Krishnaji and I drove Ahalya Chari and Radha Burnier to Malibu for the weekend, Krishnaji driving from the poplar trees home. Everyone is having the weekend off. Ahalya has the guest room, and Radha has the living room sofa.' I must have been in Filomena's room. Elfriede was living out by the garage, in that little addition to the garage I made years ago for Naudé. She and her husband lived up there. 'I spoke to Dr. Hausman on the results of Krishnaji's X-rays, and he said that he has “a small obstruction.” He is 85 percent sure it is prostate, but said that there is a 5 percent possibility of a tumor. Wants to do a cystoscopy to determine it. Made an appointment for the twenty-eighth to look at the X-rays and discuss it with us.’

March twelfth, ‘Krishnaji rested all day, except for coming to lunch and walking in the garden. Ahalya and Radha and I talked and rested. We didn’t leave the place.’

The next day, ‘I cooked and did desk work. After lunch, Krishnaji, Ahalya, Radha, and I returned to Ojai.’

March fourteenth, ‘Krishnaji held the sixth meeting with trustees. Krishnaji asked why would people come to the centers. He said that if he had come to the Buddha it would’ve been to find out how he thought, how his mind worked, why he said certain things, to understand his mind, to be in the atmosphere, see the quality of the Buddha. When Krishnaji is gone, will people come saying, “You have spent time, gone into it with him, so being there, I would capture something of that.”’ He jumps between roles in these things’ [laughs].

S: Yes.

M: …‘“I would catch something of that.”…“This is fundamental. Then, you can discuss fear, etcetera.” Krishnaji said the books are alright, but greater depth is not reached that way. Some other quality is necessary. That other quality cannot be reached through this (effort on this level) though one must be without fear, sorrow, etcetera. That is not the end.’

S: The level of books?

M: Yes.

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘He said to us, “You haven’t asked for this. When you want it, you get it.” And “Don’t spend a whole life laying the foundation. Have done it. Then, something much more must take place.” Again, the impact of what he said left most of us silent and overwhelmed. It was cold, and we had lunch inside Arya Vihara. I went to Ventura for an electric blanket. It is so cold in the cottage that it is hard to sleep.’

March fifteenth, it says: ‘Krishnaji and I drove to Cynthia Wood’s in Santa Barbara for a trustee meeting with Hirshon and Gammel’—those were architects. ‘They revised plans for the administration residence building. On return to the cottage, Krishnaji, Mary Cadogan, and I talked over parts of the meetings and the trustee unease with Radha’s TS membership.’

S: We should say just something, because people might not know about the Esoteric Section of the TS, and correct me if I'm wrong. As I understand it, the Esoteric Section of the Theosophical Society is a group within the group.

M: That's right.

S: But it actually is also slightly apart.

M: Yes.

S: In the sense, that the president of the Esoteric Section appoints the next president.

M: That, I don't know.

S: I'm almost sure of this. It's not an elected position.

M: I know that it was founded, originally, I was told by Krishnaji, by Mrs. Besant for him to head.

S: I seem to remember that. Anyway, the head of the Esoteric Section, previous to Radha, was her father. So, it's her father who appointed her, and…

M: She's still head of it.

S: And she's still head of the Esoteric Section, even though she's now president of the TS.

M: Yes. You could be both.

S: So, I just wanted to mention this because, I think, it made it doubly difficult for her to just give it up.

M: Of course.

S: Even though a lot of other members in the Krishnamurti Foundation wanted her to do that.

M: Well, she clearly made the decision not to give it up, but this fuss about it has never progressed, as it were. She has, in fact, from what little I know about it, which is little, she's trying to pull the TS over in Krishnaji's direction.

S: Oh, very much so. And, in fact, when she was running for president of the TS, the fact that she was a trustee of the Krishnamurti Foundation of India was held against her by a lot of old TS people.

M: I'm sure.

S: And a lot of the TS people who had been made quite hostile to Krishnaji by previous people have felt that she has changed it dramatically by bringing Krishnaji more into the TS.

M: Heresy! Huh.

S: But I would probably also add that I…this might be speculation, but just knowing Radha to the small extent that I do, if Krishnaji had ever said to her, please give up the TS, I'm sure she would have. But, I don't think Krishnaji ever did, did he?

M: No. Not that I know of, and I don't think he would have.

S: No. I don't think he would've, and I think if he had, she would've done it.

M: Well, that's speculation.

S: That is speculation. But, it's just the amount of…

M: Her involvement with Krishnaji as a teacher, as a person, was totally sincere.

S: Absolutely.

M: …is totally sincere.

S: That's why I speculate that.

M: I think it's a good exposition for this purpose.

Yes, we were at Cynthia Wood's, and we came back. Mary C. came to talk to me in the cottage, and Krishnaji joined us. We spoke of the worry of many at Radha's position as both KF member and TS.

S: Yes, that's what started our conversation.

M: Right. 'Krishnaji said he would talk alone with Radha about it before it is raised in these meetings. We spoke, too, about the implications of what he is telling us. I asked if his presence, his having been with us will make it more possible for us to carry on; if something more than what we have learned will be at work. Later, alone with him, I tried to say what I seldom mention but is the ground I stand on—that with all my being, I want to go all the way in this. I said that all along, I've seen that wanting, willing, seeking is not the way, that it moves against realization, but that without those there remains a burning center that cares only about what he calls "much more." Spoke of "opening the window"—he said to speak of it in the next meeting.'

March sixteenth, 'Krishnaji's seventh meeting with the trustees. I asked about the "open window" through which the wind may come.'

‘Krishnaji said that “laying the foundation (understanding, fears, etc., etc.) demands the other.”…“If one understands a part, one understands the whole.” Laying the foundation brings about a movement—“the volume of the water brings the movement.” Movement brings energy. In laying the foundation “not taking too long—compress it,” then there is momentum, energy, movement. Then, discussion would take place at a different level, verbally or nonverbally. Later, he said, “Can we act now as if K were no longer here?”…“What would you do?” and “if you have imbibed the teachings, you are the teacher.” Then, “You’ve got a deep well, don’t go to it with a little bucket. For god’s sake, use K, learn. You’ve got a short time. It is the responsibility of the Foundation to suck that dry.”’

‘As it continued, it was clear that one goes to the well with no bucket. Consciousness, empty of knowledge, is no bucket.’

‘In the afternoon, Krishnaji had a long talk with Radha about her position in KFI and TS. She apparently had never considered that there might be a contradiction. Krishnaji told Dorothy and me afterward that he had not advised her how to act, but to look at the whole. He pointed out to Dorothy and me what a difficult decision Radha faces.’

The seventeenth. ‘Bart Phelps’—that’s the architect—‘came at 2:30 p.m., and we spent the afternoon going through the house plans. Erna went with Cohen, our lawyer, to the Planning Commission hearing for a permit for Krishnaji’s talks in the Oak Grove. Present also were Annie Vigeveno, Austin Bee, and Mr. and Mrs. Kelly, who bought the Zork house. Kelly voiced objections: noises, pot holes in the roads, etcetera. But, we got the permission in spite of objections. Krishnaji is shocked at Rajagopal sending Austin Bee and Vigeveno to oppose the permission.’

S: I was just sitting here shocked.

M: Yes.

S: This is where Krishnaji had always spoken.

M: Yes, but we always had to get a permission for a public meeting.

S: Yes, and before that, he, Rajagopal, would’ve gotten it. But, now that it’s the new Foundation that’s doing it, he’s sending flunkies down to oppose it?

M: That’s right.

S: Extraordinary.

M: March eighteenth, ‘Krishnaji’s meeting with the trustees number eight. It began with David Bohm suggesting we start where the K-Bohm-Shainberg videos ended, the subject of something “sacred.” There was considerable exploring of guilt and responsibility. Krishnaji rather denigrated responsibility in favor of a much larger, encompassing compassion. “Compassion can never be wrong.” He said, “Compassion can never be inadequate in any circumstance.” If action comes first it leads to guilt. Let compassion act.’

‘“If you are the world, which I feel most profoundly, compassion arises.”…“Sacred is the sense of wholeness. To live at the point of wholeness is a tremendous thing.”…“The teaching is concerned with all of life, and out of that, comes compassion.”…“K feels you should enter into this sense of compassion, and so he is working at it. You are asking what do we do about this and that, the school, and the administration, etcetera. And K says, ‘Stop all that, and come into this, and you will answer rightly.’…“I won’t feel guilty if you don’t do it. I want you to do it, but it would be a horror if I felt guilty or disappointed. So it is my job to see that you come in.”…“Isn’t it your job to see that others come in? But, first, come here.”…“Do we feel guilty because we can’t do it? Churches have said that you must renounce, and there began the guilt.”’

‘Separation-guilt. “Are you listening consciously or unconsciously? Conscious is reaction. Deep listening is without response. That may be the answer. At that deep level, there is no you and me. At this (the superficial) there is.”’

‘“Something extraordinary is in this. You are listening to K on the surface, and you are making an effort to go down there and listen. That doesn’t work that way. Can you listen without the waves? Listening with background and knowledge is one thing; listening is movement. Can you listen without movement. That may convey what K wants to say more profoundly than listening with waves.”’

‘He said he had listened, for instance, to Hitler that way, and saw instantly what he was. “If you listen at a deeper level without words, as Foundation members, something entirely different takes place, about the schools, the centers, etcetera, then you are the teachers because you have moved from the periphery to the very center of it.”…“If you really listen in silence, you are there because there is no me, you are the world.”’

‘After lunch at Arya Vihara, Krishnaji and I drove home to Malibu, and I had time before supper to go to see Amanda and Phil.’

March nineteenth. ‘Krishnaji and I took the 10 a.m. United Airline flight from Los Angeles to San Francisco, and took a taxi to Blanche Mathias’s apartment. Krishnaji spoke to her in private for an hour, then we both lunched with Blanche. Krishnaji had gone into the matter of the hallucination she’s been having on and off since last spring. He said he told her that she was oversensitive from illness and other things, that made her pick up these things. He didn’t say what else he told her, but indicated I already knew how to deal with such things (no center, no self). At 2:30 p.m., Alain Naudé came by and drove us to his flat, where he took down Krishnaji’s symptoms to try for a homeopathic remedy to help Krishnaji’s problems. Then, he took us to the airport, where we caught the 5 o’clock flight back to Los Angeles, the car, and home to Malibu in time for supper. The trip was not too tiring, but not to be done often.’

The next day, 'We had breakfast early and drove to Ojai in time for the 11 a.m. ninth meeting with the trustees. The first one-and-a-quarter hours were on procedural matters. Then, Krishnaji asked if responsibility for flowering rests on all Foundation members. Do we all help each other to bring about in the centers a sense of Otherness? He said, we had talked about guilt, but it was an enormous subject, and we hadn't dealt with it thoroughly. He said "I do not think we are demanding of ourselves the highest. We are still saying we can't do it. It's yours. We will explain your teachings."…"If it is yours"'—he means the Foundation members—'"it will not be polluted. I thought on the plane yesterday, how do we go through with this?"…"K says 'Come over in this, and drink as much as you can, involve yourself totally.' And I fear you are saying, 'It is too much. We don't know how.'"…"In the centers, when someone asks, will you be able to deal with it—not as individuals?"…"Have we solved what we want to discuss—what will happen when K is gone? Or, is it insoluble? It has become something I have to do something about." He spoke of a mine of gold; are we going to stop at the edge of the cave? What are we going to do about the mine of gold?"…"I'm going to pursue this for the rest of my life with the Foundations. It happened we are together. My job is very clear for the next ten years. Whenever we meet, I'm going to push this thing. What is your dharma? A good word, but spoilt. Dharma means sustain the original—if I may use that word with tremendous hesitation. It is not understood in the West."…"So, what am I to do as a member of the Foundations when K is gone? K says this mine is a sacred treasure. I leave it to you. What will you do with it?"…"My dharma has become very clear in these meetings, apart from the public meetings, to push and pull you into the cave. I feel this tremendously. I accept that. What happens at the end of fifteen years? What will you do?"'

S: Mm. Yes.

M: My diary for March twenty-first says: 'Mrs. Gandhi fails to win a parliament seat in the India election, and so does her son. The Congress party is defeated. Krishnaji is not surprised. He wonders what she will do. In the p.m., Radha B., Mary C., Dorothy S., Erna, and I went to K & R offices to see the archives. Mrs. Vigeveno admitted us, but was totally unresponsive when we asked for material. She said there was no inventory, she wasn't there to help us. So, we saw no manuscripts, no letters to Krishnaji. Mary tried to telephone Rajagopal but was refused the use of a phone.'

S: Hm, hm.

M: 'Radha asked for materials sent from Adyar. No answers.'

The twenty-second of March. 'Krishnaji's trustee meeting number ten. There was a discussion of what relationship is between Krishnaji's teachings, Krishnaji's words, and truth. Is there such a thing as Krishnaji teachings, or only truth? Is he talking out of the silence of truth, or out of an illusion of truth, the "noise of illusion." How to find out? Who is to judge? Is it out of silence of truth, or out of reactions and conditioning? How to approach this question? "As I don't know, I listen"'—this is what we should do, but he's talking—'"put aside the personality, influence. I'm questioning—am I questioning my own questioning (with my judgment, conditioning, etcetera). Can I listen to what he says with an abandonment of the past? Then, there is a different relation to him. I'm listening out of silence. I see all the dangers of thought, etcetera."'

'Mrs. Gandhi resigns as prime minister. Krishnaji feels somewhat responsible. He told her to do whatever was right, and apparently, she did.' [S chuckles.]

Wednesday, the twenty-third of March. 'There was an early meeting of trustees, without Krishnaji, to review decisions taken during the meetings. Krishnaji stayed in bed, but at 11 a.m., came to the Lilliefelts' where Charles Moore and Murray Silverstein had brought the model of the assembly adult center building. Krishnaji and the U.S. trustees looked at it, and discussed it. It was thought very handsome. We all lunched at Arya Vihara, and later we had another meeting about the brochure for fundraising. Nice drawings by Fritz's wife Margrete to be used.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji's eleventh and final trustee meeting continued the discussion of how can we know Krishnaji is speaking the truth. Bohm said, insight sees it is true, and having seen it, one can logically work it out. So, perception is at intervals, or is there one perception that never ends? When Krishnaji dies, the Foundations are to be "guiltlessly" totally responsible to have their own perception, insight of the truth Krishnaji has spoken. One perception is enough. It opens the door, so there is insight all the time: never confusion. Will further action confuse perception, or will perception never be confused? The mind seeks security in insight. In real perception (complete) there is no confusion. The possibility of stepping out of the stream exists for human beings. "Don't say 'everyone.' Perception is never partial. In total perception, there is no further confusion. One cannot have perception if daily life is in disorder. Any conclusion is detrimental to perception. What is perception? It is without attachment, fear. In fear or suffering, one can look at it, the fact that distorts can be looked at. There is perception only when there's no division between the observer and the observed, the act of exploring, in the act of watching there is insight. There was the analogy of washing a window through which one looks. The art of watching cleans the window. Krishnaji said, he has never done this, i.e., it was never necessary. David Bohm asked, how do you know anyone else can? Krishnaji replied, "Because you see it instantly. You see all this. Must you go through all this, or do it instantly? In seeing the observer and observed, seeing the working of it, one sees the totality."…"I think that is the only way."'

'It was asked, is it open to a human being to see it all at a glance, total perception?'

'Krishnaji said, "No human being has refused to go through all this (fear, etc.) and said I won't operate in my conditioned response."…"If he did, something other may take place."…"Something other does take place when you look at the whole thing."…"Yet, that man, K, never said that, he just did it."…"Demand for the essence of excellence washes everything else away. It is possible."…"One must have passion for excellence."… "Total insight is the flame that burns away all confusion."…"Don't you then act as a magnet when you are passionate to bring about transformation? Passion may be what is missing. If it is missing, ask for it!"' [S chuckles.]

‘After the meeting, we all went to the Ranch House, where I gave a luncheon for twenty-four of us. The Hookers arranged it all nicely. We ate inside as a light rain was falling. Later, at the office, there was a meeting on a brochure. Krishnaji talked to Ahalya. Then, he, she, Dorothy, and I took a short walk. It rained, too, in the night. Morarji Desai became prime minister of India.’

March twenty-fifth, ‘there was snow on Sulfur Mountain.’ [Chuckles.] ‘Dorothy and Mary C. left for England, with Carl Marcus driving them to the Los Angeles airport. Krishnaji held his first meeting in the new pavilion and discussed with parents and teachers on education. Ahalya left for San Francisco. David Bohm gave a radio interview about Krishnaji on station KPFK, which we listened to with Erna and Theo at their house. Malibu had 1.3 inches of rain, including snow in Latigo Canyon, which brings the season total to 7 inches.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji held the second parent-teacher discussion in pavilion. After lunch at Arya Vihara, he “put his hands” for Cynthia Wood. At 4 p.m., he saw a young Russian couple, Elena and Jan Dyansky who wrote to him about two years ago from Leningrad and who have immigrated and come here to see him. He has got a job at the Ojai Inn; they have green cards, a car, a new life. Both are young and childlike. Later, Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I walked.’

On the twenty-seventh of March, ‘Krishnaji held a third meeting in the pavilion with parents and teachers. Dale Duffy’—he was a friend of, I think, Cynthia Wood—‘and Cynthia Wood came to lunch at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji “treated” Cynthia, and there was a brief meeting about announcements of the talks, etcetera. Then Krishnaji and I drove home to Malibu.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji rested in the morning. We lunched at home, and then at 3 p.m. saw Dr. Hausman at his office in Beverly Hills. He showed us the X-rays of the kidneys, which are fine, and the bladder where prostate is enlarged with a narrowing exit. We discussed thoroughly what should be done. I asked what the prognosis is if nothing is done. Hausman said there will be an eventual stoppage. Today, the operation is relatively simple and minor, but it will be more complicated if an infection should occur. The kidneys would be affected. Also, it could happen suddenly during travels or in some place without medical facilities and at a time when Krishnaji would not only be older but not be in his present excellent overall health. This decided Krishnaji, and also me, that it must be seen to here and soon. Krishnaji explained his wish not to be unconscious. His mind must not be made artificially unconscious. Hausman said local, i.e., spinal block, is very customary and will be done if Krishnaji wishes it. Krishnaji agreed to the operation. Hausman said prostrate often bleeds quite a bit and would Krishnaji accept a blood transfusion if necessary? Krishnaji said no to someone else’s blood. Hausman then asked if he would take his own blood, and Krishnaji said, yes, of course. Then, Hausman would want him to give a pint or two on two different donations in advance so that it would be available if needed. I said I wanted to be able to be near him in the hospital and stay there. This he will arrange. The date for the surgery was put for May second, and Krishnaji agreed to convalesce in Malibu for the month of May. Krishnaji made all these decisions as Hausman presented them. He saw the necessity. Afterward, he said he was watching the body to see if it accepted. One other thing he explained to Hausman was that his body had never been invaded, i.e., cut into, and Hausman explained that in this there is no incision. The entrance is made through the natural opening; the interior of the bladder is looked at, and a small section of prostrate around the neck of the bladder is removed. The stay in the hospital will be four or five days, and then rest at home. Krishnaji said the bladder muscles are very strong from yoga. This makes urine push back into the kidneys when the exit is blocked. We left and did some errands on the way home, Lindberg's, etcetera.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed. I went to town for a haircut and errands.'

Wednesday, the thirtieth of March. 'I spoke to my brother in New York, and told him our plans. Krishnaji is determined to go to the Shainberg psychotherapist conference at the end of April in New York, before the surgery here in May. Bud said we could use the Ritz Tower flat. Krishnaji and I went to town, where he had his hair cut, and I fetched enchiladas at the farmer's market with which we had a picnic in the car on a shady side street in Beverly Hills. Then, we went to a 2 o'clock movie, The Domino Principle.' Do you remember that movie?

S: No. I don't remember that one.

M: Neither do I. 'We came home in time for a walk in the garden. I telephoned Blanche Mathias. Her usual hallucinations have gone since Krishnaji's visit.'

S: Hm.

M: The thirty-first, 'Diane and David Shainberg, and their children Steven and Nancy, came down from Ojai, where they are staying, to lunch with Krishnaji and me. Diane was pleasant, more relaxed than at past meetings.'

April first, 'I spoke to my stepfather at the Vineyard. Alain Naudé rang on his own behalf and Theo's, saying that the May second date for Krishnaji's surgery is bad astrologically. "How superstitious are we?!" asked Krishnaji.' [S laughs.] 'But, on the ignore-nothing-for-his-good theory, I asked Hausman to change it to May ninth, which is okay according to Alain Naudé.' I didn't tell Hausman why I wanted to change the date. [S laughs.] 'Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai in time for lunch. Afterward, we took Ahalya, who has returned from San Francisco, and we went to look at the Oak Grove, ready for tomorrow's public talk. Everything was well arranged, fencing neatly around to keep people from wandering. This year we've had to get a permit to hold them, and the county will inspect tomorrow. I seem to have a cold, started coughing on the way up. Not bad.'

April second, 'there were clouds, but no rain. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji gave his first public talk in the Oak Grove, and spoke of the need for security, that the only security is intelligence. The Grove was the best organized ever. Ted put slat fencing all the way around, so people do not wander in from behind Krishnaji while he is speaking. We are recording in color on video, done by Santa Barbara TV station for the Foundation. Mr. Sperling of the Ventura County Planning Commission, which gave the permit to hold the talk, was there to inspect. We estimate 3,000 people came. Afterward, Krishnaji went over to where Hooker had organized lunch, but after making his appearance, he came to the cottage where we had lunch quietly.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave the second Ojai talk, and we lunched there. In the afternoon, I typed letters for Krishnaji to Pupul, Sunanda, etcetera, for Ahalya to take to India. She leaves early tomorrow morning for India. In the letters, news was given of Krishnaji's operation. Ahalya, the Lilliefelts, and Alan K. came on the walk. We said goodbye to Ahalya as she leaves early tomorrow for Delhi, such a nice person.' She was and is.

S: Mm, hm. Yes.

M: April fourth, 'the Bohms came to say goodbye. They will go to New York. In the afternoon, Isabel Biascoechea, Alfonso Colón, Mr. Riesco, and Mr. Sendra came to see Krishnaji, and had things out more or less.' That's the Puerto Rican grouping. 'Sendra has his own elaborate plan by which the Fundación would do all the work of his publishing ventures and pay him and his wife for life.' [S chuckles.] 'It was rejected. He left. Whether he remains a trustee too is up to the other members of the Fundación, but with a strong implication that he resign or be asked to leave by the other members.'

Oh, wait a minute. There's more from the fourth. It's in faint pencil, so bear with me while I read it. It's titled 'Notes, Incomplete, on Conversation between Krishnaji and David Bohm in the Cottage, Ojai, April 4th, 1977. The source is a Dictaphone recording begun after the conversation was in progress. It's a poor recording.'

S: Do we have that recording some place?

M: I don't know.

S: Alright. So, you read the text, but this small Dictaphone recording, as far as the archives list I have is concerned does not exist. So, read on, it's all we seem to have.

M: Alright, I'm going to say "Krishnaji" and read it, and then "David" and then read it. It'll be dialogue like that.

S: Right.

M: 'Krishnaji: "There are other forces. You may use the word evil. There are people in the world who are evil."'

'David: "Would you say force penetrated beyond the ordinary communication?"'

‘Krishnaji: “They penetrate only when that”’—“that” is special underlined—‘“when that interest is not in charge.”’

S: In charge. Right. When the interest of that “Other” is not in charge.

M: The “Otherness,” etcetera.

S: Right.

M: ‘Krishnaji: “They penetrate only when that interest is not in charge.”’

‘Bohm: “What is not clear to me is, suppose there is an evil person, making evil through his words and actions. But suppose I don’t see him. He is somewhere, far away.”’

‘Krishnaji: “But there is a very well-known phenomenon. I can think about you happily, with affection, care, or I can hate you.”’

‘Bohm: “How does that hate affect you when you are far away?”’

‘Krishnaji: “Yes, that’s what I mean.”’

‘David: “Then, there is transmission of thought?”’

‘Krishnaji: “Oh, obviously, obviously.”’

‘David: “Yes. Well, it is important to get it clear, because it contradicts what people usually accept, but you are quite clear on that? Quite sure of it?”’

‘Krishnaji: “I’m quite sure. Personally, when I go to a place which I’m not familiar with, where I haven’t lived, say when I first came here after ten years, I came through that door. I felt appalling, I said to her. I ran out.”’

S: Mm, hm. This is the door of the cottage, which you just pointed to, and which won’t come through the audio recording.

M: Oh, of course. That’s right.

S: Right. [Chuckles.]

M: ‘David: “But, how is it now?”’

‘Krishnaji: “Nothing. It’s all gone.”’

‘David: “But what happened?”’

‘Krishnaji: “Because the other thing is stronger, it cannot be touched. That’s why whenever a doctor said to me, ‘Do you want it?’”’—meaning a general anesthesia—‘“by injection, a total anesthesia…”’ and then I say in my diary ‘the recording is then unintelligible.’

‘David: “It occurred to me, you say these people are caught in confused thought; nevertheless, there is a transformation possible whereby they get out of it. Would you say, suppose you took an anesthetic and were caught with an evil thought, could an evil thought take hold of you?”’

‘Krishnaji: ‘Oh, but I don’t want to go through all that. Of course.”’

Then, apparently I: ‘Mary speaks: “Is it relevant to ask what is the difference between the unconsciousness of anesthesiology and sleep?”’

‘Krishnaji: “Oh, that’s entirely different. There, it is natural. This is unnatural.”

‘Mary: “Because it is imposed?”’

‘Krishnaji: “You are forced, you’re driven out.”’

‘David: “Now, with sleep, would you say there is still a kind of attention?”’

‘Krishnaji: “Oh, yes. That intelligence is watching.”’

S: Hm.

M: That’s the end of that.

April fifth. ‘Krishnaji held the first public discussion of the year in the Oak Grove. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Dr. and Mrs. Drassinower came to see Krishnaji at 4 p.m., a long, tedious discussion, but Krishnaji politely and firmly conveyed that no more doctoring was required from *celui la[3].’ [Both M and S chuckle.]

On April sixth, ‘Krishnaji spent this warm day in bed. He dictated a letter to Rajagopal, saying he would go to the archives on the fifteenth, that he was concerned by reports of trustees who visited the archives, that none of his manuscripts, etcetera, were there, and said he would be coming to see them, plus Mrs. Besant’s, Leadbeater’s, and Huxley’s letters.’

April seventh, ‘Krishnaji held the second public discussion in the Grove. Pascaline Mallet and Giselle Questiau…’ Do you remember her? Wasn’t she that woman who was married to a general? Or was that someone else?

S: I don’t remember. The name sounds familiar, but I can’t put a face to it.

M: Neither can I. Well, anyway, 'they came to lunch at Arya Vihara. Also, Abdullah El Hussein, and a Ms. Habibe came for lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji saw Elena and Jan Dyansky'…the young Russian couple. 'We walked later.'

For the eighth, there is only, 'Elfriede brought mail and laundry. I did letters, and we walked.'

April ninth, 'Krishnaji gave the third public talk in the Grove. We lunched in the cottage.'

April tenth, which was Easter Sunday, 'I telephoned my mother. Krishnaji gave the fourth public talk in the Grove. We had the lunch nearby that the Hookers had set up. Before the talk, I made announcements and an appeal for funds. Krishnaji met the Canadian teachers from the Siddoo school at 4 p.m. in Arya Vihara. In the evening, he told me with great seriousness that I must be watchful of him after the operation, that the line between life and death is very thin with him, and that I must remind him to be watchful.'

April eleventh, 'I wrote to Dorothy Simmons and Mary Cadogan about Krishnaji's plans to have the operation and stay here during the month of May. Krishnaji saw Sendra alone in the afternoon who tried to undo the agreements made last time with the other Fundación members. Krishnaji said no. We walked later. In the evening, Krishnaji spoke to me about not letting him slip away in the hospital. I must talk to him, remind him, be watchful after the operation. He said that the body for the last three days has been resisting the operation, and that the danger is that he, Krishnaji, might suddenly say, "That is enough," and slip out. The line between life and death is always there; it has happened to him in the past; it happened here in Ojai when he was walking in the mountains; it has happened in India when he "goes off" and "wanders away," as he put it, and that could happen. He said he must not take any sedation, but in particular I must be watchful. I asked what I could do, and he said to talk, to talk to him. It wouldn't happen with strangers about, but after he comes back to his room after the operation, I must talk to him. I must remind him, too, in the morning before he goes down to surgery. I must also remind him before he gives blood. I must be watchful. Last night, when we were joking about a "home loan," which was being advertised on television, I jokingly said, "Do you wish to apply for a home loan?" and he said, yes. And I said, "For what purpose?" And, he said, "For an operation," which threw me, because since he made the decision to have the operation, he hasn't referred to it except very factually, and suddenly in the middle of a joking conversation, I realized it is in his mind to some degree. Sometime later, I asked if he didn't want to have the operation. Should we cancel it? And he said, no, no. It is decided, and this morning, I asked him again if we should not have it. "No. If one neglects it and there is a stoppage, it would be much worse." But, I must remind him.

April twelfth. 'Krishnaji held the third public discussion in the Oak Grove on education. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Abdullah El Hussain and Ms. Habibe were there. They asked Krishnaji about thought being matter, etcetera. Thought as matter dies with the body, which is matter, but Krishnaji implies thought in some form enters a stream of consciousness and continues. I tried to ask him to clarify more specifically how this happens. I think I see his meaning, but more might be said at some moment when he is feeling like talking of this.' You had to ask questions when he wanted to talk, and not plague him with them.

S: Yes.

M: 'Abdullah asked about reincarnation, and Krishnaji said the body and mind die, but thought is like an energy put out by the mind, and it is matter and continues as evil exists, as good exists, the good put out by man, etcetera. In the afternoon, he called in Colón, Isabel, Riesco, and Sendra, and chastened Sendra for his mixing Theosophy with his teachings. He told the Fundación members they must deal with this and Sendra.'

S: Okay. We're going to have to end it there, because we're running out of tape.

M: Okay.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] This interview, and all subsequent ones, were conducted at Pine Cottage in Ojai.

[2] This discussion took place in 2004.

[3] French for "that person there."

Issue 46: April 13, 1977 to May 31, 1977

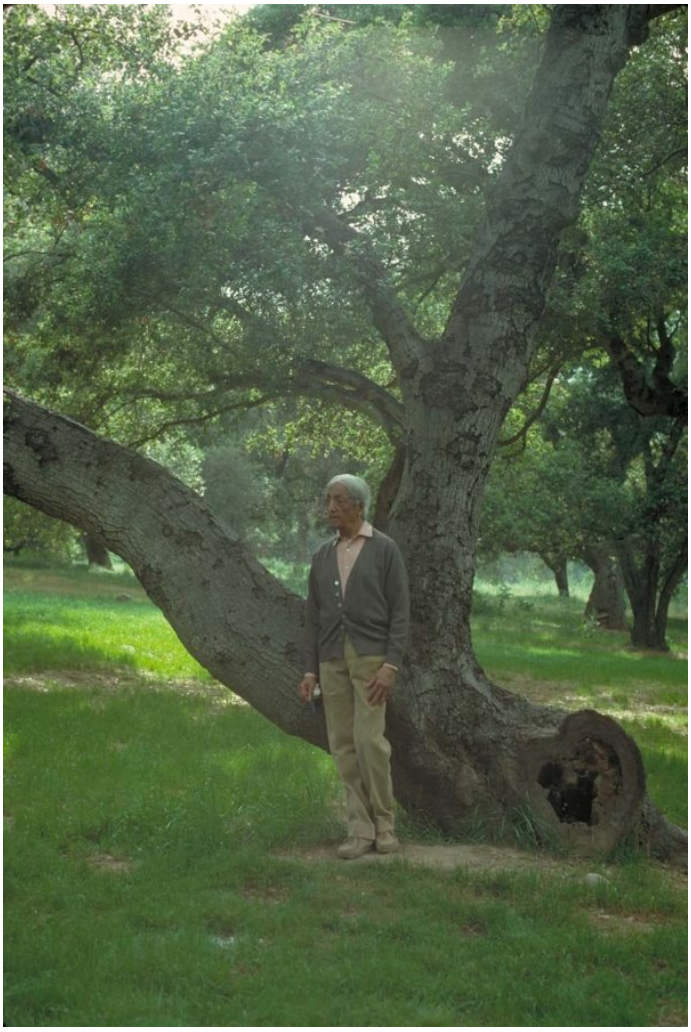
In this issue, we see Krishnaji go through his first-ever invasive medical procedure, and, for the editor of this account, it is grueling, although Krishnaji deals with it all in a very matter-of-fact way. Again, we see Mary doing everything she possibly can to take care of him and ensure everything goes well. At the end of this procedure, and as a result of it, Krishnaji has a "dialogue with death" which he dictates to Mary. While a version of this was published by Mary Lutyens in Krishnamurti: The Years of Fulfillment; the full version is in this issue, and as it is also in the full context of all that was going on with Krishnaji, as he described it and as Mary witnessed it, that "dialogue with death" is much more powerful, and more poignant. This full context, the daily minutiae of Krishnaji's and Mary's lives, has increased value when it frames the extraordinary.

Mary: Well, I believe we begin our discussion today on April thirteenth, 1977. 'Krishnaji said I must be watchful after he gives blood too, and that I should tell the Lilliefelts about this. Charles Moore and Bart Phelps came at 9:30 a.m. with a mockup of the way to link the present cottage with the new wing. Krishnaji was pleased with it, liked the sample of gray roofing, etcetera. While I went on with the architects, Krishnaji talked to Mark Lee about problems with teachers. Krishnaji stayed in bed, but had the Lilliefelts, Mark, Alan, Evelyne, and me in at 11 a.m. to talk about teachers' salaries and other dissatisfactions; said they must understand that what is being done is the main thing. Then, suddenly, he asked me if I could tell them'—that's the assembled people—'what he had told me, and went on to say that he has always lived with a very thin line between living and dying; that he mustn't "slip away" in the hospital; that he has told me what to do. They were in tears. When others had left, he called the Lilliefelts back, and talked to them a little more about it.'

Scott: It would be good to just clarify something. Can you go back to the beginning of that one?

M: Mm, hm.

S: Where you mention talking to the teachers about salaries.



M: Mm.

S: It's not clear if Krishnaji is saying they must understand, meaning the teachers must understand, or that the trustees must understand.

M: Well, he's talking, let's see how it reads. [M reads.] Hm. I think that the teachers were objecting to the salaries.

S: Yes, well, that's understandable. So, go on.

M: 'Said they must understand that what is being done is the main thing.'

Krishnaji in the Oak Grove

S: Alright, they meaning the teachers must understand, or the trustees must understand that what's being done is the main thing?

M: I don't know which he meant. I would guess the teachers.

S: Okay, alright.

M: April fourteenth. 'Krishnaji held the fourth public discussions in the Grove on thought, intelligence, etcetera. He was marvelously clear. The audience contributed nothing. Cynthia Wood was at lunch at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji gave her a treatment. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave a taped interview to Donald Ingram Smith for Australian Radio. Zelma Wilson presented plans for school buildings.'

The next day, 'At 3 p.m., Evelyne organized a tea for the helpers at the public talks and discussions. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Ruth, Alan, and I went to see the things in the archives about which Krishnaji had written to Rajagopal: manuscripts, letters, etcetera. Austin Bee admitted us. Rajagopal quickly appeared. He said that he didn't know where Krishnamurti's manuscripts are and all the other material is his personal property. Krishnaji left. The rest of us stayed and talked to Rajagopal. Before Krishnaji walked out, I asked him if I could look again at the two first photographs I had found in an album apparently put together by Nitya, as the writing underneath is his. These were photographs of "Krishna aged about 5," it says.' [S chuckles.] 'And then, "Krishna's mother," a separate photo. Krishnaji looked at them, and then left. This drew Rajagopal's interest, who peered at them, and said that he hadn't seen them in a long time. I said it was a pity, that they were beginning to fade, and would eventually disappear, that they really should be re-photographed as quickly as possible. Rajagopal said yes, maybe they should, but wouldn't it be very expensive. I said I, or we, would be glad to pay for them. What about our sending a photographer? Alan Hooker's brother-in-law is a professional and can do the job. Rajagopal said alright. There was a lot of questions backwards and forwards. With nothing to lose, I asked Rajagopal what he planned to do with all the material he claimed was his after his death? I didn't expect him to tell me, but wanted to hear what he would say. "You'll find out after I'm gone." Alan Kishbaugh and I were walking out with Rajagopal behind us, when I opened the door of the closet in the hall, so that Alan could see the Bourdelle[1] head of Krishnaji done in 1927 to 1928. As we admired it, Rajagopal said, "I suppose that ought to be in your school." I said, "It should indeed." And he said we could take it, surprisingly. We went back to the cottage, and in the evening, Krishnaji dictated a very pointed and strong letter to Rajagopal.'

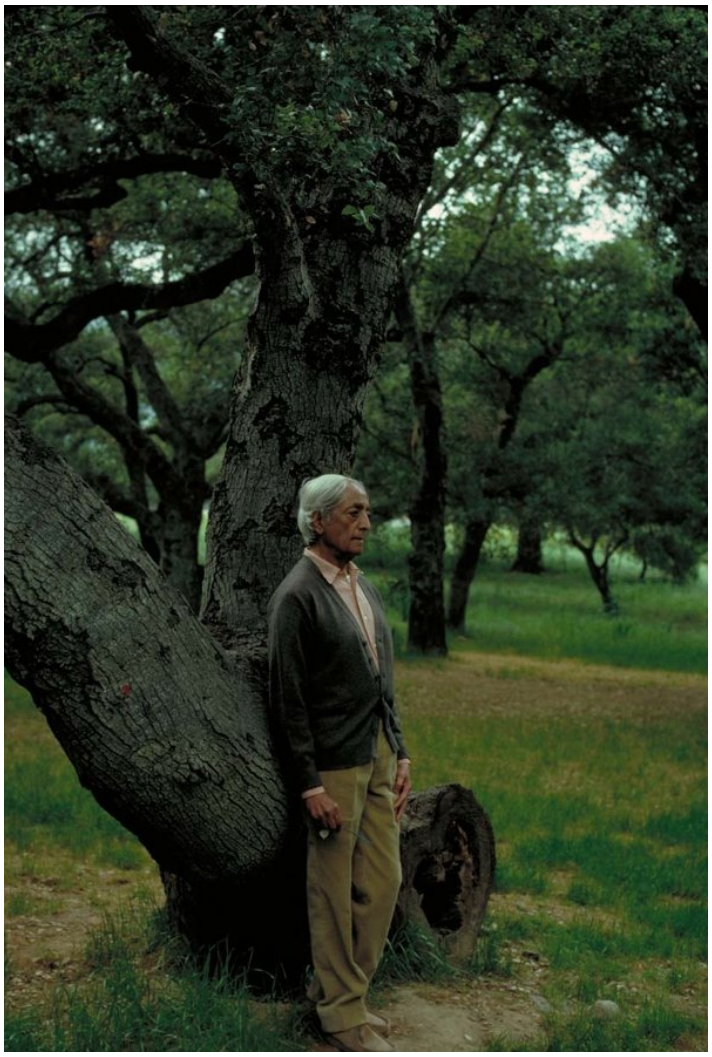
Now, it doesn't say in this, but I remember thinking that Rajagopal is going to change his mind about that if we don't act quickly.

S: About what?

M: The statue.

S: The Bourdelle. Right. So, you took it right away?



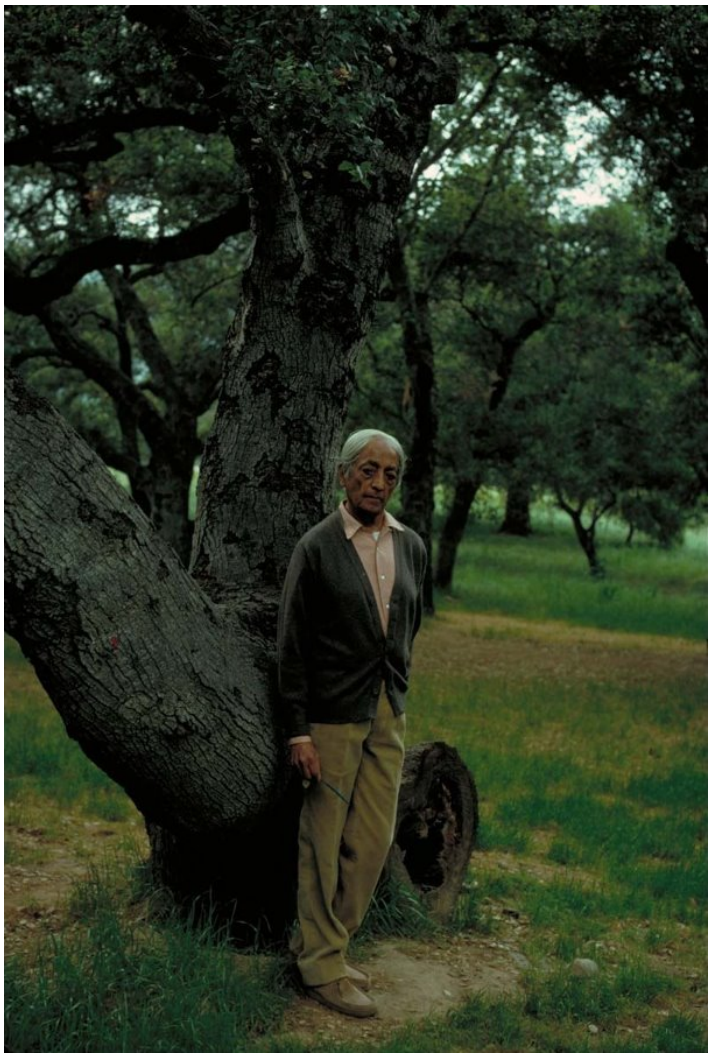
M: I got Alan Kishbaugh to go back and get it is my recollection. I don't seem to have noted it here. That's how we got it.

S: Right.

M: And it's over in the library now.

S: Yes.

M: April sixteenth. 'Krishnaji gave the fifth talk in the Oak Grove, a profoundly moving one on the meaning of death. There was a huge crowd. Ravi Shankar was there and greeted Krishnaji. Cynthia Wood came to the cottage for Krishnaji's "treatment" and stayed to lunch with him and me. Alan Kishbaugh and Mark'—oh, here, it does say—'Alan Kishbaugh and Mark went to get the Bourdelle statue before Rajagopal changed his mind.'



Krishnaji in the Oak Grove

And the seventeenth. 'Krishnaji gave the sixth talk in Oak Grove, completing the season's series. Again, there was a huge crowd, including Rajagopal who stared intently and malevolently at Krishnaji, especially as the crowds swarmed around him after the talk. We ate lunch at the Hooker-arranged place, came back and Krishnaji slept while the Lilliefelts and I counted the donations. Krishnaji saw Mr. Mirus at 4 p.m., and then Jan and Elena Dyansky at 4:30 p.m. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Evelyne, Alan K., and I walked later.'

April eighteenth, 'I typed Krishnaji's letter to Rajagopal and one to Pupul. She has resigned from government service. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a meeting at Arya Vihara with the school staff.'

The nineteenth, 'Elfriede came to Ojai and loaded her car and the Mercedes. After lunch, Krishnaji talked to Erna, Theo, and Fritz about Fritz backing up Mark in school matters with teachers and parents, etcetera. Then, we left Ojai and came home to Malibu.

Everything looking lovely, the garden is in flower, a gentle moisture from the ocean, and the peaceful house.'

Krishnaji in the Oak Grove

S: Mary, just this business of backing up Mark. I know that there was eventual trouble not too long after this, between Mark and the parents and teachers. Was this the beginning of this?

M: I would think it was, but I don't remember exactly; it will come out in these diaries. Krishnaji was always trying to get people to work together.

S: Yes, yes.

M: April twentieth. 'I spoke to my brother early. They will lunch with us Sunday,' it says here. They must've been going to come out.

S: No, you were on your way to New York.

M: Oh, of course. [M and S chuckle.]

'I went to town for a haircut, etcetera. But was back in time for lunch with Krishnaji and Alan K. Then, Alan drove Krishnaji and me to Cedars-Sinai Hospital, where in their blood bank Krishnaji gave a pint for his own use, should he need it during the operation. A Spanish-speaking doctor was relieved when I read the list of questions to Krishnaji—have you ever had heart trouble, etcetera. They typed his blood; his group is O positive.'

That was meaningful to me because I used to work in the blood bank during the war, and O positive is the most prevalent type.

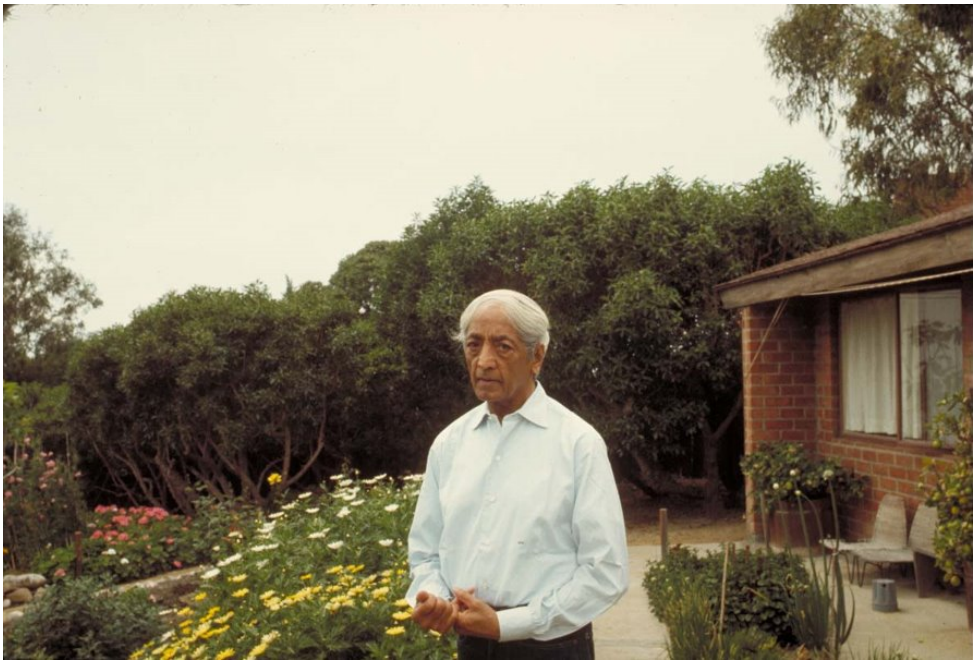
S: Right.

M: Anybody can accept type O blood, as I remember. 'An expert nurse inserted the needle in his right arm, and in nine minutes he had given the precious substance into a plastic bag. I sat with him, and we chatted. No strain, or reaction. Kishbaugh, who feels faint' [both laugh] 'at the sight of blood had stayed outside.'

S: Yes, I'm sympathetic. I would have, too. [M chuckles again.]

M: 'Krishnaji stayed for the required ten minutes afterward, drank some pineapple juice I had brought, and then we walked out without trouble for the rather long walk to the car. Alan drove us home. Krishnaji went to bed. He's taking feosol tablets.' Those are iron tablets to rebuild the blood. 'We watched Carter address the Congress on energy. I spoke to Erna. She went with a photographer to the K & R office; and with Rajagopal standing by, the old photographs of Krishnaji as a little boy and his mother were copied for preservation. Krishnaji says he feels no effect of the blood donation.'

The twenty-first, 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed resting. I did desk work and went over to see Amanda and Phil in the afternoon. A pleasant, mild day at home.'



April twenty-second. 'I packed. After lunch, we went to Beverly Hills for his appointment with Dr. Hausman.' That's the urologist who's going to do the operation. 'We went into details of the operation, then Krishnaji had a haircut, and we came home.'

April twenty-third. 'Alan Kishbaugh came at 7:30 a.m. and drove us to the airport for a 9:15 a.m. TWA flight to New York. It was over an hour late, but Bud and Lindsey were there, unexpectedly, to meet us. I was touched.' Lindsey is my brother's son. I don't think he's appeared yet in this opus.

S: [chuckles] Only when he was born.

M: [laughs] 'He drove us to the Ritz Tower. Bud had put food in it, so Krishnaji and I had our supper, and were able to go to bed early.'

April twenty-fourth. ‘We slept late. I spoke to my cousin Lorna at Martha’s Vineyard and then to my stepfather. Krishnaji and I met Bud and Lisa and Lindsey for lunch at the Indian restaurant, Raja, near Radio City. Krishnaji then rested and I went up to their apartment to go over business things with my brother[2]. I was back in time to make Krishnaji’s and my supper.’

Krishnaji in Malibu

The next day, ‘Krishnaji and I went to an 11 a.m. conference at the Post-Graduate Center for Mental Health on 28th Street. It was the same Shainberg group of psychotherapists, plus David Bohm, and some physicists. Rather wordy going. We went back to the Raja restaurant where Philippa and David lunched with us after having driven down from Connecticut. We then walked over to a Patek place where a new crystal was put in Krishnaji’s watch. Then, we all came back to the Ritz Tower where Krishnaji took a nap, and Philippa and David and I talked all afternoon until about 6 p.m. Today’s Indian food disagreed with Krishnaji.’

April twenty-sixth. ‘Another session with the Shainberg psychotherapists, a dull group. Jackie Kornfeld attended and gave us a lift back to the Ritz Tower. Krishnaji and I had lunch in our rooms, and while he took a nap, I did some shopping.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji and I went to the third psychotherapist conference. After, we went to the Shainberg’s house on 92nd Street for lunch with the Shainbergs and the Bohms. David Shainberg took us around the corner to his office briefly and then Krishnaji and I went for a walk. We went past the Cooper-Hewitt Museum, where I nipped in to see the Brighton exhibit, while Krishnaji walked in the museum garden. He found the blossoming trees more beautiful than any museum.’ [Laughs.] He wasn’t interested in exhibits at all. My sister-in-law, Bud’s wife, Lisa, was the head of the Cooper-Hewitt Museum, and that’s why I went.

S: Did she start it?

M: She was working in Washington for the Smithsonian, and the Smithsonian took over the Cooper-Hewitt, which used to be in downtown New York, a very old organization, and when the Smithsonian took it over, they moved it up to where it is in this account, and still is, which is the old Andrew Carnegie Mansion.

'We came back to the Ritz Tower. Bud's two daughters, Daisy and Toodie, came to see me. Daisy is graduating from Chapin in June and has already been accepted by Johns Hopkins. My brother came by briefly with business papers.'

April twenty-eighth. 'Narasimhan came at 9 a.m. to see Krishnaji. He has just returned from India. He saw Mrs. Gandhi who thinks her son Sanjay is innocent and being framed. Civil rights and a free press are now restored in India. We told Narasimhan briefly about Krishnaji's surgery. At 10:30 a.m., my brother came to say goodbye and lend his car with a chauffeur to go to the airport. We took the noon TWA flight to Los Angeles, where Alan K. met us, and we came home to Malibu on a lovely afternoon. The soft sea wind was clean and healing. After tea, Alan K. left, and Krishnaji and I walked ten laps around the garden. I began to feel good again. This is a blessed place, and coming home to it is an ease and happiness for me. There was a nice letter from Ahalya, and one from Pupul saying the present government refused her resignation and begged her to stay. She will continue for the present.'

April twenty-ninth. 'It was lovely to wake up in Malibu, exercise, make breakfast slowly, and talk to Amanda. Krishnaji "had an idea," which turned out to be another letter he dictated to Rajagopal. He said, "I woke up with a strong feeling I should write to Rajagopal because I have not told him directly that he is totally dishonest and corrupt, and the impact might do something to him. That is the reason I am writing."'

S: You, of course, have a copy of that letter in your files?

M: I think so. I hope so. Yes, I must have. 'After lunch, we drove into town, Krishnaji questioning me about my learning of Sam's death, how I had heard, etcetera. He has heard all this before, but doesn't remember it. What interested him is the question of whether everything in his own life is foreseen and planned, or is it all chance. "I don't think it is chance." He said also, "property always brings corruption. Look at Rajagopal."…"But we need property. I want to talk quietly to the Lilliefelts on how to prevent this in the future. I've been thinking about it." He told me all this in the car and kept talking about it in Cedars-Sinai when he gave his second pint of blood to be kept in case he would need it at surgery. His red cell count was thirty-six, down from forty after the first donation. He gave the pint in five minutes and had no symptoms from the donation.' I was used to people in the blood bank having reactions from giving. So, I was very aware of this and was watching him.

S: Right.

M: ‘After no more than half an hour, we drove home. He wanted to walk in the garden a bit but was persuaded to go to bed. I read the Rajagopal letter to Erna, who said she agreed with every word of it and thought it should be sent.’

April thirtieth. ‘A lovely, quiet day at home. Krishnaji stayed in bed. We were both relaxed, the quiet pleasures of privacy. He feels no effect from the blood donation.’

The first of May. ‘An exquisite day. Krishnaji stayed in bed again. I made our lunch, and then we read. In the evening we watched the last of Upstairs, Downstairs on TV.’ [Laughs.]

The next day it just says: ‘Home, a quiet day.’

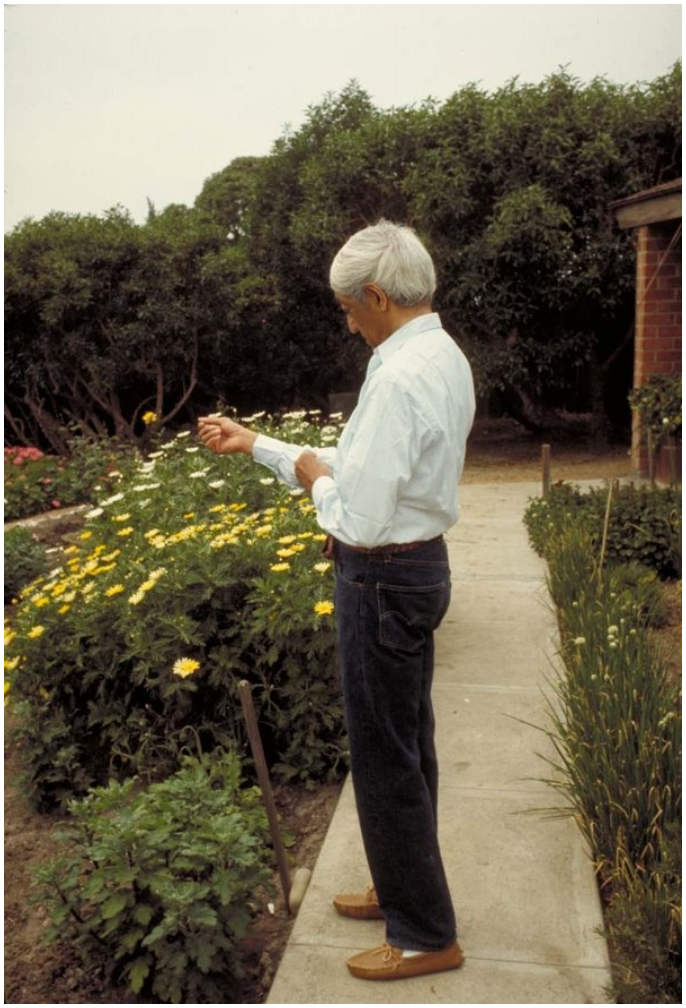
And for May third, there is little more. ‘To town alone on errands. Posted Krishnaji’s letter to Rajagopal to Erna, who will post it in Ojai.’

For May fourth, in very pale writing it says, ‘Cooked in the morning. Alan K. came to lunch. Krishnaji, he, and I went to a movie, Black Sunday, in Westwood. In the evening, we watched the first of Nixon’s TV interviews by David Frost.’ Do you remember those?

S: Yes, I do.

M: The next day is just, ‘Desk work, and to town briefly. Krishnaji rested.’

May sixth, ‘Desk work, home. In the evening, I telephoned Filomena in Rome to wish her a happy birthday. It was her eightieth.’



The next day. ‘Amazingly, it rained. Almost half an inch; light and gentle, but very precious. Krishnaji rested, and I did desk work.’

May eighth. ‘0.65 inches of rain had fallen by early morning, and instead of tapering off, it rained quite heavily on and off all day. Krishnaji did all his exercises thoroughly. Erna and Theo came for an early lunch, and spoke of the immaturity of the present teachers in the school, of Erna’s having written to Cohen’—Cohen is our lawyer—‘about Rajagopal’s flouting the agreement on the archives. She has also written to Rajagopal that she and Krishnaji will go on the seventeenth of May to start an inventory of the archives. Talk got onto a book of Krishnaji’s and Leadbeater’s letters.’

S: Was this a book about Krishnaji and Leadbeater’s letters to each other when he was a boy?

M: I’m not sure. I don’t quite remember if there was a book, or whether somebody had suggested a book, or something.

S: Okay. That’s alright. We’ll go on.

Krishnaji in Malibu

M: 'Erna asked how she could judge such things? The credibility of people? I pointed out that there is really only one witness who can now talk about it, Krishnaji himself. He said he didn't really accept his own youthful testimony of seeing Masters, etcetera, as reliable. He doesn't remember it. But apart from that, at that age, he was very young, younger than his numerical age, impressionable, etcetera. We had to interrupt this conversation and be off—the Lilliefelts to a motel near the farmer's market'—that's in town, in Los Angeles, near the hospital—'where they would stay to be able to be at the hospital tomorrow morning. Krishnaji and I drove through occasional downpours of rain to Cedars-Sinai.'

'We checked in on the eighth floor. Lailee, our doctor, had ordered a private-duty nurse, who was on hand; a nice quiet young woman, sensitive, understanding, African-American. Krishnaji had a "suite" which is a large corner room with a table and a couch. As the couch is too small to sleep on, they provided a room for me next to his. Lailee appeared and talked alone to Krishnaji, taking more medical history. Then, the hospital pre-surgery routine unrolled: blood chemistry, chest X-ray, EKG, clotting rate, urinalysis, etcetera. It made it smoother to have Ms. Mitchell, the private nurse. I talked to the dietician. When Krishnaji arrived, he did whatever he does to make the atmosphere protective in the room, and later he went alone into my room to do the same. "Go in, and see," he said. I did, and felt immediately strongly a sense of—how to describe it, a sense of presence, an intensity, very quiet but there, perceptible in one's nerve endings, a perimeter in which there is something alive, vital, strong, and quiet. It is something un-assessable, unprovable. I am aware of possible imagining, but it was clear and felt part of what I have felt increasingly these last days, a strength and calm in which emotion and self isn't. Krishnaji had said this morning, "the body resists this," meaning the operation. And I asked how it showed this, and he laughed and said, "I don't want to go."' [Both M and S laugh.] 'But at hospital in the evening, he said, "It is alright. Can you feel the atmosphere?" I could. Something is strongly around him. I spoke with him, as he had told me weeks ago to be attentive. He said it was not necessary. He had talked to the body. I am only to remind him tomorrow morning to "Be careful while I am in their hands." Early, the anesthesiologist, who was a woman, a Dr. Stoka, came and described carefully the spinal, examined his back, and discussed normal medication which would be a shot of tranquilizer and belladonna, the latter for a certain, good affect on the blood pressure, etcetera. But, because tranquilizers have never been taken by Krishnaji, he will not have these as part of his wish not to have his consciousness lessened. I talked to Dr. Stoka alone, explaining without going into it too much the good of keeping contact, conversationally with him, during the operation.' I wanted her to keep him grounded in what was happening outwardly.

S: Yes, I understand.

M: 'All that seemed well-handled, efficient, and thorough. Cedars-Sinai is an enormous building but because it opened only last June, it has less of a loading of a hospital atmosphere.' Krishnaji had asked, when I had this little trivial thing in my leg, did I understand that he couldn't come into the hospital to see me because in hospitals he got a sense of all the suffering that goes on in them.

S: They're terrible, they're really terrible.

M: I said to him, I didn't want him anywhere near the hospital. But this one was just newly built, you see, and Lailee getting that end room that was on the end of a wing that was new and there wasn't things around it was good; it was at the end of the hall. She was helpful. When Krishnaji had X-rays, we walked there for the exercise, Krishnaji in his nice gray Viyella Charvet robe'—which is in the closet here—'with a nurse leading the way. And while the technician checked the first X-ray, we walked briefly up and down a very long empty hall for exercise, as we have in airports.' We used to do that, waiting in airports.

S: Yes. I remember.

M: 'There was a Rodin reproduction in the hall of the hospital, which Krishnaji liked and stopped to examine, and he recognized a Van Gogh sunflower as we passed by. By 9:30 p.m., he was ready to sleep, had seen the up and down buttons of the hospital bed, and seemed to think everything was well-handled. “It wouldn’t be like this in India,” he said. So, he is ready and feels “All is taken care of.”’

The ninth. ‘As I write this, Krishnaji has just gone into surgery. The operation will be at 7:30 a.m. Neither of us slept too well, but each got up at 5 a.m. Krishnaji did his breathing exercises and some asanas. I spoke to him, “Be attentive. Remember. Be careful.” He said he knew the body was ready and all was alright. He had shaved but not had time for a shower. A boy attendant came with the gurney, and Krishnaji climbed onto it on his own, smiled at me, and I said, “Stia attenta, non dimenticare”’—be attentive, don’t forget. ‘He replied, “Non abbia paura”’—don’t be afraid. ‘I said, “Sto con lei”’—I am with you—‘as he was wheeled off down the hall. I followed to the door of the surgery, saw him raise his head to look at what was ahead as the door closed.’

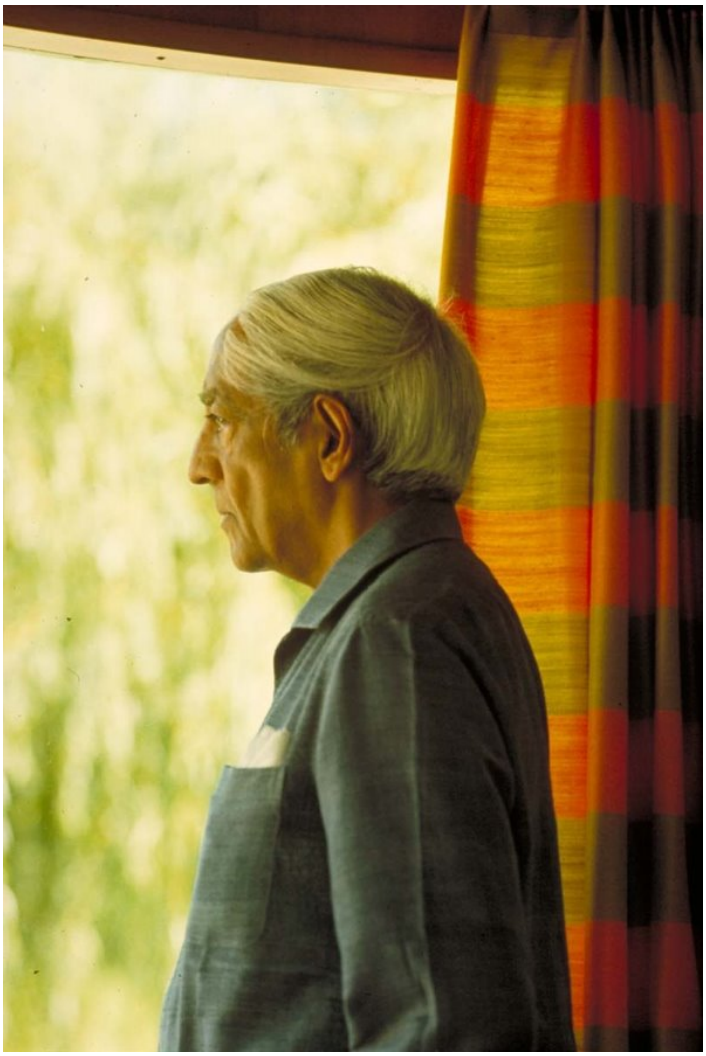
‘I am writing this later. He is alright and back in his room, large, bright eyes reading his detective story, The Chancellor Manuscript. Erna and Theo came while he was in surgery, then Evelyne later. A private duty male nurse for Krishnaji was able to find out that he would be out of the recovery room by 9:30 a.m., but before that, Dr. Hausman appeared and told Erna, Theo, and me that the operation was a complete success. Krishnaji came through it perfectly, but said that Krishnaji should have had the operation long ago. It will take some time for the bladder to relax and readjust, and Hausman will give him medication for it later. He did not lose much blood and didn’t need the autologous donation. Erna, Theo, and Evelyne came in just to greet him for a matter of seconds and then left. Various testing went on, and Krishnaji kept saying, “They wouldn’t do all this in India, or in England!”’ [Both M and S chuckled.] ‘The thoroughness impressed him. He did the breathing through the bottle to help his lungs exercise. He drank fruit juice all day, was thirsty, said he had some pain and was given Tylenol and codeine. Krishnaji is inclined to go too long without something for pain. Dr. Hausman came in just after noon, and repeated that if he himself were having this operation, he could not want it to go better.’ [Laughs.] ‘Krishnaji is interested to see the surgical instruments.’

‘Alone, he asked me if it were my imagination last night about the room. He said the body had not wanted to go through it; when he went into surgery, it wanted to get up and run. But, he talked to it. The spinal went easily and quickly. The operation actually took fifty-five minutes. The time in recovery was not long. He told me that after quieting the body, he was without thought until he was back in his room. The male nurse, Roger Anderson, was fair, but didn’t seem to affect Krishnaji one way or the other. At Krishnaji’s urging, I went out briefly for a little air and also bought him Newsweek and Time. I took a short nap. Ms. Mitchell came on duty at 3 p.m. We sat for awhile. She went to order Krishnaji’s meals for tomorrow. He wanted spinach and cheesecake. After she left, he took my hand, then had me sit near, but not too near the bed. “This is the danger point. I feel like going off, not fainting, you understand.” I talked quietly to him as he had instructed me, but now he stopped me, “No, no. You mustn’t say anything. You mustn’t interfere. You mustn’t think about anything.” He had me move the chair to the foot of the bed opposite him. His face became inward-turned, slightly hallucinated look. This was interrupted by Lailee coming in to see him. Hausman had left orders for

Demarol if needed, and Lailee told the nurse, Ms. Mitchell, to give him a tiny dose, what one would give a child. It was given, and he began to feel a dizziness from it. "Is this normal?" he asked several times. It cut the pain, but soon made him sick to his stomach, and he vomited several times. Hallucinatory look increased. He kept telling the nurse to go and have her supper, which she had had earlier. It was by now a little before 9 p.m. When she was out of the room, he told me, "I felt the body floating and there was a dialogue between death and the body and 'the Other,' and death was winning." He became aware that the nurse had returned to the darkened room, and this seemed to bring him out of the state he had been in. We were able to talk about this in spite of her comings and goings. And he said there was nothing I could do, not to interfere. I pointed out that the nurse's presence had brought him round. But he said, "It will come again tonight until it is settled." Soon, he lapsed again into the "off" state and said that since five this morning, so many people have touched the body, and he began to count them, and said, "About ten have touched me." There was a sense of irritation in all that had been done to him and soon he began to look about as though seeing things, making random gestures, raising his right arm. Then, "Where am I?" Pause. "I have been wounded," looking about. Then, "Where's my brother Nitya?" The voice was light, higher, almost that of a boy. Then "I want to join you, Nitya." And then, "I'm going away." I had said nothing until this, but at that, I said, "No, Krishna. You are going to be well and strong." After a few seconds, he made a deep-sounding cough, his normal cough, and his voice dropped to its normal level, and he said, "That's better." And then, "I'm not going. I'll join you later, Nitya, much later, another ten years." Later, he said, "One mustn't be burdened with the past." And later, he said, "You and I mustn't be in an automobile accident, so drive carefully." And later, "I'm not a philosopher."'

'Finally, after about an hour, he seemed to come out of it and spoke directly to me. "I'm all right now." The nurse had called Dr. Hausman, who said no more Demarol and had her lessen the size of the balloon in the bladder that keeps the catheter in. This lessened the pressure and the pain. After telling me he was alright, he fell asleep, and I felt the assurance that he was through it. I slept on and off in the adjacent room, coming in to check. At 11 p.m., the 11-to-7 nurse came, a young man, nice but not looking too experienced, but he did nothing wrong.'

That was that day. It was strange because it was night and of course, the city lights were outside. It was raining; and the light outside and the rain on the window, it was strange.



S: It's terribly moving, that whole thing is terribly moving.

M: Is it? I wrote it up for Mary. She put it in the book, more or less. I forget how. I haven't read that in years.

S: I haven't either. It wasn't nearly as moving in Mary's book, though.

M: Yes. [Pause.] When he said to Nitya that he was coming, that was…

S: Yes, yes.

Krishnaji in Malibu

M: …I had to butt in.

S: Quite right.

M: May tenth. 'Krishnaji was reading when I came in at 6 a.m. He is much better. No pain. Lailee came in early and so did Hausman. Krishnaji didn't want solid breakfast, but I made a little muesli and some of his usual food, and he ate it saying "L'appétit vient en mangeant."' [Both M and S chuckle.]

S: You better translate that for people.

M: Appetite comes when you eat.

S: Mm.

M: ‘Hausman ordered the glucose IV discontinued and also the saline drip. Krishnaji was able to get up and walk in the room while his bed was made. Hausman had ordered probanthine to relax the muscles but after one tablet, Krishnaji threw it up again, and so all medication was stopped. After Hausman’s visit, Krishnaji dictated to me a dialogue with death as follows:’—and then I have written the whole dictation, which is, at least partly, already in Mary Lutyens’s book. Do you want me to read it here?

S: Yes, why not?

M: Alright, this is his dictation: ‘“It was a minor operation and not worth talking about, though there was considerable pain. While the pain continued, I saw or discovered that the body was almost floating in the air. It may have been an illusion, some kind of hallucination, but a few minutes later, there was the personification—not a person—but the personification of death. Watching this peculiar phenomenon between the body and death, there seemed to be a sort of dialogue between them. Death seemed to be talking to the body with great insistence, and the body reluctantly, not admitting what death wanted. Though there were people in the room, this phenomenon went on, death inviting, the body refusing. It was not a fear of death why the body was denying the demands of death, but it realized it was not responsible for itself, there was another entity that was dominating, much stronger, more vital than death itself. Death was more and more demanding and insisting and so ‘the Other’ interfered. Then there was a conversation or a dialogue between not only the body, but ‘the Other’ and death. So, there were three entities in conversation. He had warned before he went to the hospital that there might be a disassociation with the body and so death might interfere. Though the person was sitting there, and a nurse, it was not a self-deception or kind of hallucination. Lying in the bed he saw the clouds full of rain and the town below stretching for miles. There was spattering of rain on the window pane and he saw clearly the saline solution dripping drop by drop into the organism. One felt very distinctly and clearly that if ‘the Other’ had not interfered, death would have won. This dialogue was expressed in words with thought operating very clearly. There was thunder and lightning and the conversation went on. Since there was no fear at all, neither on the part of the body or ‘the Other’—absolutely no fear—one could converse freely and profoundly. It is always difficult to put a conversation of that kind into words. Strangely, as there was no fear, death was not enchaining the mind to things of the past. What came out of the conversation was very clear. The body in considerable pain and was not apprehensive or anxious and ‘the Other’ was discernibly beyond both. It was as though ‘the Other’ were acting as an umpire, a dangerous game of which the body was not at all aware. Even if it was, there would be no withdrawal from the scene.”’

‘“Death seemed to be always present, like one’s shadow. Being concerned with the whole movement of life, death cannot be invited. That would be suicide, which is utterly foolish. But, death and life, or rather the living, in this peculiar phenomenon that was going on, the three, would never be separate. During this conversation there was no sense of time. Probably the whole dialogue lasted about an hour and the time by the watch did not exist. There were no words used but an immediate insight into what each was saying. Of course, if one is attached to anything—ideas, beliefs, property or person, death would not come to have a conversation with you. Death in the sense of ending is absolute freedom."'

'"The quality of conversation was urbane. There was nothing whatsoever of sentiment, emotional extravagance to distort the absolute fact of time coming to an end and the vastness without any border when death is taking part in your daily life. There was the feeling that the body would go on for many years but death and 'the Other' would always be together till the organism could no longer be active. There was a great sense of humor among the three of them and one could almost hear the laughter. And the beauty of it was with the clouds and the rain."'

'Here Krishnaji was interrupted by hospital routine. He said he would review it or add to it later. During the day he got up and walked several times, and ate well. I went out and got some fresh cherries, the first of the season, which he said were very, very good. It was odd to be walking around Beverly Hills—unreal besides being with him in this huge hospital. He had some leg cramp in the afternoon. Evelyne came by for a minute. In the evening, he fell asleep naturally around 9 p.m. and slept well. I transferred to a room that connected with his so that no nurse on the 11-to-7 shift was necessary. I came in almost every hour to check, and he was sleeping like a child.'

S: Whew.

M: May eleventh. 'Krishnaji looked well in the morning and thought a cheese enchilada from the farmers' market might be nice.' [Both chuckle.] 'So, needing exercise and thinking it was closer than it is, I walked there and back with three lunches, one for the nurse, Roger Anderson, and some grapes and cherries. A long walk, but just in time for lunch. I brought it all back. The afternoon was harder on Krishnaji. He had spasms with pain. Dr. Hausman came in the evening and said that Krishnaji was doing well, and had no sooner left than Krishnaji had a bad spasm which Mrs. Mitchell helped relieve, but it was a rough night for him. The floor nurses were not as good, and I can't remember if I did more than doze.'

May twelfth. 'Krishnaji's eighty-second birthday. It began with misery at around 12:30 a.m. with pain, and I couldn't mention birthdays or indeed anything. Roger Anderson, the morning nurse came, which was a relief. Dr. Hausman appeared and said that Krishnaji could go home tomorrow. Then, Lailee came at noon and felt it was wiser to wait till Saturday, to give Krishnaji more time to get used to things while still here, and more time to rest before moving. Hausman agreed. We had both nurses all day—Roger Anderson from 7 a.m. to 3 p.m., and Jane Mitchell from 3 p.m. to 11 p.m.'

May thirteenth. 'Lailee in just after 9 a.m. to see Krishnaji. I did the morning nursing.' That means washing his teeth. 'In the afternoon, Dr. Hausman came and said Krishnaji is fine and can leave tomorrow, prescribed Pyridium to ease the pain of voiding. Then, he told us that the results of the lab test showed on one "chip" a dot of malignancy. He said it was in the center of normal tissue, so it had not spread. It was just beginning and is now out. He said that eighty percent of autopsies of men over eighty show cancer of the prostate, it's very common, and usually they die of something else. It's not a swift malignancy. In Krishnaji's case, it's as if he hadn't had it. It is gone. No need for special watching. He will examine Krishnaji when he returns to California next year and said, as he now knows what his bladder is like, he can easily tell how it is. Krishnaji took this in a very matter-of-fact way. Further evidence of a good thing that the operation was done. I, too, felt a lack of alarm at this, which I mention only because it was so marked. Krishnaji had the afternoon nurse, Mrs. Mitchell, who was not really needed, but just to keep a continuity of care until he leaves tomorrow. Evelyne came by with a Sherlock Holmes.' [Laughs.] 'The chest doctor came by, says Krishnaji's bronchitis is minimal and to leave it alone.'

May fourteenth. 'Lailee came by early. Her evaluation of the lab report tallies with Hausman's. We were ready to leave early, but Hausman was delayed in coming to sign Krishnaji out. Dr. Stoka, the anesthesiologist, came in to say goodbye, and so did Dr. Shkolnick, the chest man Lailee had called in. He said Krishnaji is doing fine with bronchitis matters. He could take antibiotics, but he is not sure it would help permanently, and there are possible ill effects from antibiotics. So, it is better to leave well enough alone. He then asked Krishnaji about meditation, and Krishnaji gave him a wealth of a reply. Dr. Hausman finally appeared at 12:30 p.m. and signed Krishnaji out. He went in his dressing gown by wheelchair to the car, and so we came blessedly home to Malibu. He is now in his own bed and room, and the sight makes me want to kiss the earth with gratitude. On the drive, he observed everything as though for the first time, missing nothing. We had a late-ish lunch. All is now quiet. Instead of air conditioning, there is a gentle freshness from the sea, the garden smells of flowers and moist leaves; quail call in the canyon.'

May fifteenth. 'We both slept a lot. There were telephone calls from Alain Naudé and Blanche Mathias and I told both of them about everything including what Krishnaji calls "the dot."' That was the…

S: Yes, small malignancy.

M: Yes. 'And I also told the Lilliefelts and Amanda. Elfriede is off, so I cooked. Krishnaji walked a little in the garden. It is quiet and beautiful, and we played Mozart. The sea makes a sleepy summer sound. Hospitals are anti-life, walls, plastic, food, and air. The grass, sun, and air are healthy, and Krishnaji feels quite "washed out," but it is, I think, the lassitude of relaxation after all that happened. Here, I too am losing the strain in sleep, as though deprived for a month.'

May sixteenth. 'I cooked for us. I confirmed the change of our flights to London from May thirty-first to June seventh. I cabled Narayan to postpone the Buddhist conference one week. Amanda came over in the afternoon. Krishnaji slept in. Later, we walked in the garden.'

For May seventeenth there are just two lines. 'Krishnaji remained in bed resting. I went to town on errands.'

And there is not much more for the next day. ‘Home all day. I worked at the desk. We walked in the garden.’

In fact, it seems to have been like this until May twentieth when, ‘we walked in the morning seven times around the garden and the same again in the afternoon. I did letters all day. Krishnaji looked at the photos we copied from the archives of himself “about 5” as Nitya’s writing says underneath. Then, he asked me what the face said. “I wish I could talk to you without words,” he said. “Words distort. There is something I want to convey. I’ve told you about this other face that is sometimes there—there is that and that boy’s face and this…” pointing to his own face. Then, he changed the subject.’

May twenty-first. ‘We were home all day. Krishnaji was in bed, except for a walk in the garden in the morning and afternoon. I did letters. Amanda came over. Fruit was sent from Ojai and a pair of Indian clubs for Krishnaji.’

S: Mm, hm, for exercise.

M: I guess so.

May twenty-second. ‘Alain Naudé, who had been in La Jolla, came here in the afternoon and spent the night.’

The next day. ‘Krishnaji was up for lunch with Alain and me. Afterward, we dropped Alain in Santa Monica to taxi to the airport for his flight to San Francisco. Krishnaji then went to see Dr. Hausman in his office. All is as it should be, but the feeling of weakness, though normal, suggested postponing our departure for Brockwood from June seventh to June fourteenth. On the way home, Krishnaji said, “Why not postpone it till the twenty-first?” I called Narayan to cancel the meeting with Buddhists.’

May twenty-fourth. ‘I had a meeting at 10:30 a.m. at the USG office with Charles Moore and Bart Phelps’—the architects—‘which lasted till 2 p.m. Then I had a fitting, did miscellaneous errands, and was home by 5:30 p.m. Krishnaji had rested all day. Our reservations for London are confirmed for June twenty-first.’

The next day, ‘I telephoned Dorothy at Brockwood about the change of our plans and our arrival on the twenty-first, then I booked flights to Paris and Geneva, and cabled the Plaza Athénée for the rooms from June thirtieth to July first. I was writing letters about all this all day. Krishnaji recommenced his yoga asanas, and did eleven laps around the garden. In the evening we watched the fourth Nixon/Frost interview on TV.’

Nothing really the next day, then for the twenty-seventh it says, ‘Home all day with me doing desk work. Mr. Schwartz brought two samples of carpet and curtain fabrics for Krishnaji to see’—that’s the man who bought those things for us. ‘In the evening we watched a TV interview of Mrs. Lindbergh by Eric Sevareid.’ Huh, that’s interesting.

May twenty-eighth, 'I cooked all morning. Dr. and Mrs. Hausman came for a 2:20 p.m. lunch and stayed till 5:30.' I don't remember that.

Then there's nothing much until May thirty-first. In the morning, Krishnaji finished dictating the "dialogue with death" which he began the morning after the operation. He did not reread what he has said three weeks ago. He remembered where he had stopped and he said "I would only rewrite it."' That he did all the time.

S: I know.

M: Anything that he'd done, he didn't want to reread because he said he'd only redo it.

S: I know [laughing].

M: I could only ask, "Did you mean this word was that word?"—that's all I could ask. I couldn't read him the text. One learns how to cope with this. Talk about somebody living in the moment…

S: I know [laughing].

M: …the moment five minutes ago is long-gone. So, anyway, he dictated, '"Of course, it wasn't death, K, and the body, three separate activities on their own, but it was a humorous whole, moving together without distinction from each other."

When in the evening, he did have me reread the whole piece, I pointed that he'd been speaking of death, "the Other," and the body, and now he referred to death, K, and the body—so he changed that sentence, putting "the Other" in place of "K." "You know what I mean by 'the Other,'" he said. I nodded. And he said, "The mind that is inhabited by K."' How do you take that?

S: Can you read that again? Because it sounds as though "the Other" is a mind that is inhabited by K?

M: Yes, '"…inhabited by K."' That means Krishnaji is in that mind?

S: Well, to me…you know, there was this very funny private discussion I had with Krishnaji, which is on one of my private tapes, where Krishnaji talks about "the little K" and "the big K." And "the big K" is clearly "the Other." And if you take that to mean the big K, then the Other is the mind which is inhabited by "the little K." That's how I would take it.

M: I don't know how I take it. [S chuckles.] It's one of those things you don't think you know easily.

Hmm. '"…the mind that is inhabited by K."' Anyway. 'Then he continued the dictation. "Words cannot describe this strange movement that is essentially timeless. Putting this down in black and white on paper is the expression of thought, is the expression through words and so the movement of thought and time. But the movement of death is not of time, so the description is not the described. However cunning thought may try to capture it, death is beyond measure. It was a conversation without word, without thought, and so not of time." Here, he paused, looking for words, and then said "Don't look at me."'

S: Was that because somehow looking at him interfered with some…process or…

M: I don't know. I sort of lived all those years and times and events on an instinct not to intrude.

S: I know.

M: I didn't have a deliberate plan to do this. It was instinctive. I felt it was so unusual to be there, to participate in his life…it wasn't mine. Do you know what I mean?

S: I know exactly what you mean. I now look back and I wish I'd said, "Why? Or, what do you mean?" But one didn't at the time. You just didn't…

M: It was just that way. I could've said, "Well, are there Masters or not Masters? Oh, you know, what is this about?"

S: Yes, or "Why don't you want me to look at you?" But you didn't because one had a…

M: I never did.

S: I completely understand that because I felt the same. But was your feeling that your looking at him interfered, or intruded somehow?

M: Well, it says he said that. I didn't look at him. I mean I wasn't looking at him, but it was a moment when…if I had looked at him, it would've disturbed him. I was writing things.

S: Yes, that's right. Yes, yes.

M: 'Then, he continued. "The sound of this conversation was expanding endlessly, and the sound was the same at the beginning and was without end. It was a song without a beginning or an end. Death and life are very close together, like love and death. As love is not remembrance, death has no past. Fear never entered this conversation, for fear is darkness and death is light."' That's strange.

'When I reread this part to him in the evening, I couldn't continue for a bit after reading it, on the edge of tears, too moved. Then I went on and finished, and he asked me if I had felt something then. I said I had felt something there, something listening. He said, "I had tears in my eye." Neither of us had looked at each other. It was, of course, "Death is light" which lifted something in me that was like a rising light.'

‘He finished the dictation. “This dialogue was not illusory or fanciful. It was like a whisper in the wind, but the whisper was very clear and if you listened you could hear it; you would then be part of it. Then we would share it together. But you won’t listen to it as you are too identified with your own body, your own thoughts, your own direction. One must abandon all this to enter the light and love of death.”’ [Pause.]

S: That’s extraordinary.

M: ‘Charles Moore lunched with us, a likeable man. Among other things, we talked about the atmosphere in houses, and surprisingly, Krishnaji spoke of what he does to make a certain atmosphere when he stays in a new or strange room. He told Charles things done in India that are mysterious—the story of the raving woman, the priest bringing a branch of a certain tree, carrying it around the woman, she quieted a little, then the branch was nailed to a tree and the woman was cured—i.e., the bad was captured out of her into the branch and nailed to a tree; then the holding up the cross in Christian practice—“Only, it doesn’t always work because the priest is not really religious.” And, “You’ve heard of all these?—Well, what I do is none of these.” Then, he smiled and said nothing more. Moore seemed pleased.’ [Both M and S chuckle.] That’s a very, very Krishnaji anecdote. [S laughs again.]

S: Yes, yes.

M: ‘In the evening, we tried to watch a TV of a gala for the Queen of England at Covent Garden. During the ballet, Krishnaji, not a fan at all, kept saying, “Get on with it!” [M laughs.] And when Nureyev and Fontaine did a special ballet by Ashton for the occasion, Hamlet and Ophelia, it looked rather dreary and Krishnaji gave up. I continued in the living room, and it was pretty dull.’ [Both chuckle.]

[The tape ends.]

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Antoine Bourdelle (30 October 1861–1 October 1929) was an important French sculptor and painter who worked with Rodin. The Musée Bourdelle is located on rue Antoine Bourdelle, where several renditions of Krishnaji are available.

[2] The frequent mentioning of Mary talking with her brother about business should probably be explained—Bud was a sophisticated stockbroker and investor; he oversaw Mary’s investments.

Issue 47: June 1, 1977 to July 23, 1977

This issue covers the period just after Krishnaji's operation and the extraordinary "dialogue with death," and it is a time when Krishnaji and Mary quietly re-enter their normal travel schedule and routine—flying, albeit late, to England to be at Brockwood, then Paris, then Switzerland. The most notable event for their biographies during this period is the beginning of construction that converted Pine Cottage into a proper house for Krishnaji and Mary. This would be most fully their house, with other places, though loved, being places they visited. This house was where they both chose to die.

Mary: Now, I believe we start on June first, 1977.

Scott: Yes, that's correct.

M: Hmm. We seem to have nothing in the big book until the fifteenth, but in the little book it says, 'I went to town on errands'—so we're obviously in Malibu—'and looked for tile for the new house and had a fitting.'

S: Where did you have your fittings there?

M: A place that doesn't exist anymore, called Gisele in Beverly Hills.

S: Ah.

M: But there's a woman here in Ojai who's wonderful, who does things.

S: Right, I met her.

M: Oh, yes, you did.

On June second, 'Krishnaji and I left at 9 a.m. for Ojai in the green Mercedes. I fetched our air tickets from the travel agent in the village. At 11 a.m., we had a trustee meeting in the guest flat, then lunched at Arya Vihara. Mark and Fritz gave reports on the school and the center. The Lilliefelts showed us the solar heater they just put on their roof, and we drove home.'

June third, there's very little: 'To town to the Swiss consulate for Krishnaji's visa, which is more complicated from here than from England. Errands and home by 5:30 p.m.'

The next day there's even less: 'Home all day. Desk. Walk in garden.'

And still less the next day: 'Home.' [Both chuckle.]

And the sixth: 'Home, desk, walk. Krishnaji tired.'

S: You're obviously mastering the art of brevity.

M: Yes. [S chuckles.]

For the seventh, it says, 'My mother turned 86, and I telephoned her, but she wouldn't come to the phone, so I talked to Wooge. Then I telephoned my brother'—things about their flying to Paris. 'Then went to the bank to open a savings account. After lunch, Krishnaji and I drove to Beverly Hills. Dr. Hausman found a slight bladder infection. It is what makes Krishnaji feel tired. He gave Krishnaji sulfa tablets.'

The next day, 'I heard from Bart Phelps about a bid on the cottage.' That was the architect about how to rebuild it. 'We drove in the two Mercedes to Dieter's Mercedes place and left the diesel to have its 6,000 mile service and we then went on to Ojai in the green one. Lunched at Arya Vihara with the Lilliefelts, Evelyne, Alan K., Mark, Fritz, Ted, etcetera. Krishnaji rested instead of going to the K & R archives as planned. Then we drove back to Dieter, left the green car for its 9,000 mile service and came home in the diesel.'

The ninth of June. 'Alan K. came for early lunch. Krishnaji taught him some pranayama.'

S: So Krishnaji taught Alan some pranayama?

M: That's right.

'We were persuaded to go to Westwood by one of the Dunne girls and a friend of hers to see the Star Wars movie at 2:30 p.m. Both Krishnaji and I went.' These people who persuaded us were so thrilled about Star Wars, and they stood in line for god knows how long [S chuckles] to get us tickets. And so we got there just in time to go in, and we sat there like owls [S laughs] looking at the screen, glancing at each other. Everybody was carrying on about Star Wars. We found it boring. [S laughs.] 'Not Krishnaji's or my style.' [Chuckles.]

June tenth. 'Elfriede drove me to Dieter's. I brought the green Mercedes back. Then, went to town for Krishnaji's French visa, to look at tile, fetch clothes at the place where they were being fixed, etcetera, and came home to walk with Krishnaji in the garden. There was a huge, thunderous surf.'

June eleven. 'Home all day. I cooked. Mr. Schwartz bought some carpet samples'—that's the man who did that for me. 'I did desk work. Krishnaji and I walked in the garden and watched the huge surf.'

The twelfth. 'Another lovely day at home. I went to the Dunnes' in the afternoon. Betsy was there. Krishnaji rested and walked.'

June thirteenth, 'Krishnaji and I to town at 9 a.m. We first fetched his passport with the French visa from the French consulate, then met Henry Bamberger at the IRS office'—

that's the man who does my taxes—'where we got Krishnaji's sailing permit[1]. We were finished there at 11:30 a.m., so we went to North Hollywood to look at marble for the bathrooms in Ojai. Krishnaji liked a dark gray granite. We came home at 1:30 p.m. for lunch, then took a short nap afterward.'

June fourteenth. 'I talked to Sam's[2] lawyer about someone checking my building contract for the house in Malibu. Then, Lou Blau telephoned and suggested another real estate appraiser on the Malibu house. I spoke also to Ruth Carter'—she was a friend who did real estate—'who says there is a present lull in Malibu sales. Dictated letters. Bart Phelps says another contractor will bid on the Ojai job. Krishnaji and I had an early lunch and went to a 2:15 p.m. appointment with Dr. Hausman. Krishnaji is to continue the sulfur two more days, otherwise, all is well. I am to call Friday for results of today's analyses. Went to the barber where Krishnaji had a haircut, and we came home.'

June fifteenth. 'Krishnaji and I went to Ojai in the green Mercedes, Krishnaji driving the first half of it. At 11 a.m., there was a meeting with architects Gammel and Hirshon, Erna, Theo, Mark, and Ted to review where we are with the plans for the administration school director's building, and to receive contractor's bid at 4 p.m. Meanwhile, Erna and I went to Ventura for the preliminary hearing on factors in the C.U.P.'—that is the conditional use permit—'change on the McAndrew Road property'—that's Pine Cottage and Arya Vihara. 'No environmental report was necessary. The decisive meeting on this will be on July seventh. We saw Mr. Sperling of the commission; he said he had prepared our case and his boss, a Mr. Lapidous, would present it. We came back to McAndrew Road. Willa Erwin, a splendid secretary'—she was a lovely woman, she was Erna's secretary in the Foundation—'had typed two dozen letters I had dictated. At 4 p.m., a contractor gave his bid to Gammel and Hirshon, who turned white' [laughs]. 'It was for $520,000—twice the professional estimator's figure and our budget. This is the same contractor whose bid Bart Phelps is awaiting on the cottage plans. It was so gloomy that everyone began to laugh' [chuckles]. 'About 5 p.m., Krishnaji and I felt it time to leave, so we got in the car but I couldn't turn the key in the ignition. Krishnaji tried, Theo, Erna, Ted, Mark, Michael Krohnen, Gammel and Hirshon' [S laughs], 'and the Auto Club man, who had been called out, tried! All failed.' [Laughs.] 'So, Erna and Theo drove us home to Malibu and had supper with me in the kitchen. By this time, it was 9 p.m. I searched for something in my handbag after they left, and there was the key to the green Mercedes; it was the key to the gray I had been trying to use. Ultimate idiocy. Krishnaji was very nice about it—saw that I was tired and not functioning.' [Both chuckle.]

S: While we're on the subject of the different Mercedes…

M: Yes?

S: What about the license plates?

M: Ah, yes.

S: I don't think that has been talked about on these tapes.

M: Oh. Well, Krishnaji decided…you know that in California you can buy special license plates if you pay $20 more or something.

S: Right, right.

M: So in thinking about what we might put on special license plates, Krishnaji came up with the idea of using KMN, and that stood for Krishnamurti, Maria, Nitya—because when he and his brother lived in Europe years ago, they shared their clothing, and their things were monogrammed for both of them—KJN, as their mutual surname was Jiddu and then K for Krishnamurti and N for Nitya. I even have a pair of socks that has KJN…

S: I have some things like that, too.

M: Yes, I think I gave you some.

S: I have some handkerchiefs and some socks and some other things…oh, shoe bags.

M: Shoe bags?

S: Yes.

M: In those days, you know…

S: Everything was monogrammed.

M: Everything was monogrammed, if you went to the right places to get things, like your shoe bags. And, so, he suggested that for the car.

S: That's nice.

M: I kept it sort of secret because it seemed an in-joke kind of thing. I didn't tell people. They'd say, "What are those initials?" And I'd say, "Oh, it's just something we chose." [Laughs.]

S: Yes.

M: And, then, when we got the next car, it had to be KMN-1, and KMN-2.

S: Yes.

M: And that's the secret.

S: I know. I know all this.

M: You know all that. I know you know all that. [Laughs.]

S: It's just that it's not recorded any place, and now it is.

M: Anyway, for history, this important matter is now public.

S: Exactly, exactly. [Both laugh.]

M: June sixteenth. 'Krishnaji proposed we both go in the green Mercedes to Ojai on awakening—no breakfast, just dress and go. So, we did, leaving at 6:30 a.m. The mist along the ocean was beautiful. He said, "Be without thought," i.e., just look—no reactive thought, no associations stirred by what one sees. We picked up the car key at the Shell station and went on to the cottage. Theo was waiting there to invite us to breakfast, but we came right back home. Krishnaji driving the green, starting it perfectly with his own key. He followed the gray and drove through whatever there was of traffic.' You see, normally he didn't like to drive in traffic…

S: Mm, hm. Yes.

M: …but, in an emergency, he did. 'We had breakfast at home by 9:30 a.m. In the afternoon, Mr. Sandler, a real estate man suggested by Lou Blau, came to look at the house. He suggested $550,000 to $650,000—not ask over $750,000, which is no more than last year's estimates. John Frankenheimer'—he was a movie director, a very nice man, and a friend of the Dunnes'—whom Amanda told of this house, telephoned and would like to see it. He will come Saturday. He and his wife want to move from the Malibu Colony.'

S: Which is along the beach.

M: Yes. 'I talked to Lou Blau, and Sidney Field came by to see Krishnaji.'

June seventeenth, 'I went to town to get a haircut. In the afternoon, I went over the new house matters with Bart Phelps. The cost estimate without stonework is about $400,000, all more than envisaged but it must be done'

S: What is this?

M: This cottage[3].

June eighteenth, 'Miranda came in the morning. Then, John Frankenheimers came to see the house. I told them the price was $900,000. I asked Betsy to let Cary know I am offering it as I had promised to let him know when the time came'—that's Betsy Drake, ex-wife of Cary Grant. 'He turns out to be in London. Dieter came by to put the cars up on blocks for the summer. I talked to Erna, who reported that James Vigeveno died. Blanche Mathias telephoned. She had an operation on her eyelid on Thursday. Krishnaji spoke to her. I worked at the desk and packed. Krishnaji watched a movie on TV called Elmer Gantry, remembered Erna and my counting the donations after the Ojai talks, and said, "My god, are we like that?"' What? Oh, I know what it was. Do you know the story of Elmer Gantry?

S: No.

M: It's a book by Sinclair Lewis, I think, in which Elmer Gantry is a character who poses as a religious man but really is just out to make money.

S: Ah, ha.

M: June nineteenth. 'Home all day. Started packing. Did our cooking. Al Blackburn telephoned early. Don't know how he got my number. He said he had to speak to Krishnaji who at first demurred, but then spoke to him. He wanted to tell Krishnaji that James Vigeveno died of cancer two days ago. Krishnaji asked me if he should telephone Annie, and I said I thought we should. I rang and spoke to her briefly. We both used first names.' We'd been on opposite sides of the legal case, you know. She sided with Rajagopal.

S: Right.

M: 'I said I hoped she would accept my sympathy. She thanked me, and then Krishnaji spoke to her, saying he remembered what a kind man her husband used to be—brief but appropriate conversation. Krishnaji told her he was leaving Tuesday. I telephoned my stepfather and was able to speak to my mother who, for a minute, was rational. She seemed to know me, and said, "When am I going to see you?" Then, it blurred. I could hear only ranting as Wooge struggled to talk to me. I rang my cousin, too; she is much better.'

Twentieth 'John Frankenheimer called. They do not want to buy the house. They think the price is fair, but the place is more than they want to take on, he said. I felt nothing, but I'm not swinging in expectations in all this. Ruth Carter'—that's a friend in real estate I mentioned—'called and said she felt I was unimpressed by her suggestion of $650,000 price last week. I told her I was thinking of $900,000. She asked if she could show it during the summer if someone came to look at her Carbon Beach house. She has listed it for $1,200,000. She wanted an exclusive contract. I said while I'm away (i.e., till November) she can show it with an asking price of $1,200,000. If some extraordinary client drops out of space during that time, no other real estate agent will have that right; but on my return, I will reassess the whole situation. She agreed. I then had a long talk with Lou Blau and a real estate specialist in his office over the formula for my acquiring the McAndrew Road property from KFA. It's very complicated. They understand all the factors and will work it out. Blau says I must have title to it before I start building. I must then settle Malibu within eighteen months.' That's the law, you couldn't deduct…

S: Yes, the capital gains tax.

M: Yes. Naturally the price of the house had gone up because we'd had it so long, so there would be capital gains. 'The pitfall would be if I have to cash in stock to pay for the new house and don't sell Malibu within the time frame, then I'd have to pay capital gains on it.' Well, that's what happened, unfortunately. It's a long, boring story. We may come to it in here.

S: Yes.

M: 'It's the risk I have to take. This is all getting into high finance, but there it is. Bart Phelps came by with a copy of the specifications for me to take with me. We discussed it a bit. I rang Bamberger; he was in New York, due back tonight, but returned my call. I have put $83,000 in a savings account and have given him power of attorney to transfer from it to the checking account with which he pays my household bills while I'm away. I told him of the Blau plans, etcetera. I'm going to have to let all this work itself out in its own complicated way. Betsy telephoned and said that the news on television was that U.S. airlines cannot land in Britain after tomorrow. TWA knew of no such thing. All this telephoning put me behind in packing. I tried to get Krishnaji to go to bed and leave me to finish at my own speed, but it disturbs him for some reason, and he kept coming in. I stopped after 10 p.m. and when around 11 p.m., I heard his quiet "Maria, Maria" in the hall, I was in bed in the dark, and he was pleased'—he thought I was asleep—'and went off satisfied and relieved to his own room and sleep.'

June twenty-first. 'I checked with TWA at 7:30 a.m., but they didn't know if the flight would go to London or Paris. I telephoned Dorothy to check at her end before going to the airport. She knew nothing of the possibility of American planes not landing. At 9:30 a.m., TWA said it was alright for plans to land in London. If London is closed, it won't be till Thursday that it reopens. I spoke to Erna. Wooge rang asking me to have Bud bring Gerovital from Paris'—that was for mother. Alan K. and Amanda each came at 9:30 a.m. We were all packed and ready to go by 10:15 a.m. and I had done the daily four miles on my stationary bicycle. Alan K. brought an Ecuadorian straw hat'—it's in the closet there.

S: Yes. That's a Panama hat.

M: Yes, only it's from Ecuador, the best Panama hats are—'for Krishnaji to wear in the sun.' [Laughs.]

S: Yes.

M: We said goodbye to Elfriede. I drove with Amanda to the airport, while Krishnaji went with Alan, and we took TWA, leaving at 12:30 p.m. I am writing this over the Atlantic. Krishnaji slept a little before and after lunch. He is now exercising by walking up and down the aisle. We have our preferred seats, all the way forward in first class. The sun has set, but it is the longest day, and it will soon rise again. I cannot sleep. Krishnaji looks well. Amanda kept remarking on it, and it fills my heart to see him in his proper health.'

On the back lawn of Brockwood looking south

June twenty-second. 'No sleep on the airplane, and breakfast was inedible for Krishnaji, but we both felt better than we might have on landing at Heathrow at 7:15 a.m. I corralled our four bags and two camera cases and by 8 a.m., we were out to meet Dorothy, Doris, and Ingrid. We arrived at 9:30 a.m. at Brockwood. It was green and beautiful. Everyone keeps saying, "This is the first day of summer." Krishnaji went to bed for the rest of the day, with lunch on a tray. I wanted nothing so much as sleep. I took a short nap before lunch, a long one in the afternoon, and after supper, went for a walk around the place. The grove, in which uncounted rabbits were killed after the fence was wired, has had to be filled in and replanted from their devastation. New azaleas, some new trees, and the grass has come back. The handkerchief tree is still in bloom. The hay was smelling deliciously in the meadow. Four of the garage units have been turned into classrooms and will be divisible into sleeping quarters during the public gathering. They are very nice, white-painted, mullioned windows and doors—Robert Wiffen's design. The place grows ever better and more beautiful. I spoke with Mary Links by telephone.'

June twenty-third, ‘Krishnaji slept on and off, but got up for lunch. Together we looked at the garages made into classrooms, and he is pleased. He, Dorothy, and I walked in the grove with the dogs and weeded.’ You know, we used to do a lot of weeding.

The next day, ‘I woke up early, did the ironing and my exercises. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went weeding in the grove.’ Then it says: ‘New Mercedes van arrived for Brockwood.’ That was your doing.

S: Yes. [M laughs.] We needed a mobile video production unit for the public talks in Saanen and Brockwood.

M: June twenty-fifth, ‘Narayan here for the weekend. Talked in the morning. I went on errands to West Meon and Alresford, borrowing Doris’s car. At 3:30 p.m., Scott and I telephoned Erna about getting a third Sony video camera for Saanen. Mary and Joe Links came to spend the night in the West Wing. Krishnaji, they, and I had tea in the kitchen, then went for a short walk in the grove. After supper, Mary and Joe and I talked.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji rested. I spoke to Fleur, Jenny, Phyl Fry’—that’s Christopher’s wife. ‘Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. The long grass gave Krishnaji hay fever. Mary and Joe left. In the evening, we watched Christopher Fry’s Sister Dora on television.’ That was something he wrote for television.

In West Wing with tapestries

The twenty-seventh, ‘I went to Alresford about the repair of one of the framed tapestries.’ You know, the ones that hang in the drawing room. ‘Krishnaji stayed in bed. No walk because of the hay fever, but he walked in the house.’ [Laughs.] ‘I attended the school meeting.’

June twenty-eighth. ‘Borrowing Doris’s mini, Krishnaji and I went to Petersfield and by train to London. The city is in banners for the queen’s jubilee’—I don’t know what jubilee that was. ‘Krishnaji left trousers to be altered at Huntsman, and we walked to Fortnum’s, stopping to buy a jersey for Vanda. Krishnaji is shocked at current prices, “65 pounds for this one?” he said.’ [S laughs.] ‘We had a pleasant, leisurely lunch with Mary L. While I went to the lavatory, Krishnaji started one of his questionings with Mary—how is it, chance or otherwise, that someone turns up to look after him? Example: me. And he repeated again that the only thing he regretted in his life was the association with DR and RR’—that means Rajagopal and Rosalind.

On train to London

S: Yes.

M: ‘He said what an extraordinary life he has had. This remark came up after my return when we were talking of the difficulties facing the young, Mary’s grandchildren, for instance, on how to find jobs, etcetera. He said he had been so fortunate, looked after always, cared for. Did something arrange it all? Did “they” therefore see to it that someone (me) would come along, interested, able to care for him? I asked him if, without asking him to tell us anything he didn’t want to discuss, if he knew more about this. He said he did, but “It is not my job to go into that.” Yet, he does raise this question frequently. It seems as if there is mystery in some part of it for him too, as there is about “that boy”—his younger self. We walked up Bond Street, failed to find a replacement for my wallet at Asprey’s, but got a small boy thing for Lindsey’s’—that’s my nephew—‘birthday at Rowe’s’—that’s the store that sells children’s things. ‘We also collected some detective books at Hatchards.’

S: Where was that?

M: On Bond Street, Rowe's. You've passed it.

S: Oh, yes, yes, yes. Farther down, yes.

M: 'We got a taxi to Waterloo and so to Brockwood a little after 5 p.m. I fell asleep in the train, and Krishnaji was tired too, but not especially so after his one effort since our arrival.'

June twenty-ninth, 'I packed and Krishnaji rested and read all day. He was tired from yesterday. He started packing at 5 p.m., but did it energetically and in short order. All my letter writing is up-to-date, a rare summit. We watched a Wimbledon match, Virginia Wade defeating Chris Evert. Krishnaji was for Evert, "Come on, Chris, I have fifty pounds on you," he said. "What's the matter, Chris?"' [Both M and S laughing.]

S: One has to say, for the record, that he would not have had fifty pounds on her. [Laughs.]

M: No. He wasn't exactly a betting man, and he never carried any money anyway.

S: I know [laughing heartily].

M: The next day, 'my brother telephoned from Rome. He said that Filomena in Rome came to see them and she saw Daisy for the first time.' That's notable because Daisy was christened Daisy Dorothy and the name Dorothy comes from our Aunt Dorothy, a character who Filomena had worked for, so Filomena always called Daisy "Dorothy." [S laughs.] It gave her pleasure. It was very sweet. 'I spoke briefly to Bud of the possible expenses I may have in building in Ojai and to think over what I can best afford to liquidate, etc. We left Brockwood at 11 a.m. with Dorothy, and had a picnic lunch in the car near Heathrow. Our 2 p.m. flight was delayed until 4:30 p.m., so we sat in the first class passenger lounge and read. On the flight, an obnoxious man, an I-am-the-center-of-the-universe type, sitting across the aisle from Krishnaji, refused to stop smoking though we were in nonsmoking seats. I bore down on the steward to enforce it. He seemed to be servile to the man, and apologetic to me; suggesting we move seats. I spoke freely, which upset Krishnaji. The steward said to Krishnaji, "It doesn't matter; it doesn't matter. If someone is boorish, what can you do?" We landed at Charles de Gaulle, that horrid airport, got our luggage, changed traveler's checks, and then went by taxi to the Plaza Athénée. We walked around the block, had supper in our rooms, and soon went to bed.'

July first. 'We both rested all morning, then had a leisurely lunch in the garden: melon gazpacho, omelet fines herbs, haricots verts, fraises du bois. Nadia Kossiakof came for coffee. She and her husband Nicolas enthused over their visit to the U.S.—there's such freedom there, they feel. "Tout est politique en France," she said. She spoke of Madame Duchet and her quiet death.'

'Krishnaji and I went to Charvet; each ordered three shirts, Krishnaji's all blue, mine two white and a pale pink.' (This is one of them, what I've got on now, one of the whites.)

‘We went for errands on Rue Mont Thabor, like oil for Krishnaji’s razor. He saw a small quartz clock by Braun and thinks he will get one in Switzerland. It’s supposed to be correct to one minute per year, which is what pleases him. We bought some books at Smith’s, then walked back to the hotel and rested all the rest of the time. Eventually we had supper in the rooms. There is here a comfort, and quiet sense of a familiar haven, but one barely feels in Paris.’

S: Would you have walked from the Plaza Athénée down to Charvet, or would you have taken a taxi?

M: I don’t remember what we did specifically that time.

S: But typically? Because it’s…

M: Yes, it’s quite a walk, Avenue Montaigne to Place Vendôme.

S: Yes, but it’s walkable, and because you walked for exercise, it’s not too far for that.

M: We used to walk distances in Paris, but I think probably that time we didn’t. I’m guessing we didn’t. It doesn’t say.

S: When you did walk it, would you have gone down the Champs-Élysées, or would you’ve gone on the rue St. Honoré?

M: We probably would have walked down the Champs-Élysées to Concord, then the rue de Rivoli.

S: Right.

M: The next day, ‘we left the Plaza Athénée a little after 9 a.m. Our expenses for two nights and a day came to over $600, really out of hand.’ I mean, today that would be…

S: Cheap!

M: One night or something.

S: Exactly.

M: No, it wouldn’t be even that. You couldn’t stay there today for $600. [Both chuckle.] Anyway, ‘Krishnaji thinks we mustn’t stay at the Plaza again. We must find a nice medium hotel, he said. But, perhaps I should figure out ways to accept Bud’s offer of the Le Tour apartment.’ You see, my father, who had died, lived in Paris in the building of Le Tour d’Argent, and my brother now had the apartment. But, for some reason, Krishnaji was sort of reluctant to go there. ‘The get-out-of-Paris rush was on, mostly south, so we reached Charles de Gaulle Airport in thirty-five minutes—a most unattractive place, "awful" says Krishnaji.' I'm not sure why we took a dislike to it, but it seemed pretentious.

S: And it's not attractive.

M: That's right. 'We took an Air France 11 a.m. flight and landed in Geneva an hour later. It was a clear, warm day. Cointrin Airport in Geneva is much nicer than De Gaulle. There were no porters, but finally, some sort of baggage official helped us load two carts with our luggage and helped push them to the Hertz counter. Fortunately, he accepted a tip. We set off in an Opel Rekord, large enough for the five bags and two camera cases, but with horridly stiff gears, and found the Intercontinental Hotel where Narasimhan met us and guided us to his apartment building. He provided lunch, vanishing into the kitchen, and refusing all help from Krishnaji or me. A South Indian friend had provided the curries. The conversation never quite got off the ground, but he was pleased to entertain Krishnaji, and soon we left and went down the hill to the underground parking garage opposite Patek Philippe. We left the watches to be demagnetized and walked to Jacquet. Alas, it was closed till Monday, so we failed to order neckties.' Every year Krishnaji would order ties for himself and Joe Links. 'But Krishnaji had an idea where we could find the Braun quartz clock he saw in Paris—at Grand Passage.'

S: I remember that clock. Yes. It was black plastic; a little travel alarm clock.

M: I don't remember it. I remember that such a thing happened, but I don't visualize it. He wanted to give it to Balasundaram or somebody, or maybe just take it to India. 'He said we would find it at Grand Passage, and so we did. He is very pleased because it varies by only sixty seconds a year.' [Chuckles.] 'I bought some other small things, and at 3:30 p.m., we set off for Gstaad, along the lake, up through le centre ville of Lausanne at Krishnaji's suggestion, so we could come down into Oron by the long road.' If you remember, there's a long straight road—you go up the hill, then you go zooming down.

S: Yes. [Laughs.]

M: He liked that, and I did too. 'Like a toboggan run,' it says here. 'It was hot. My leg ached from walking on pavements in city shoes. But the stiff clutch pushed in, and hurt the foot more. We greeted the friendly linden tree, both remembered simultaneously, laughing at the place in the road where we had seen the Swiss'—oh, this was our remembering a trip once from Gstaad leaving early in the dark to go to Geneva and the airport, and as we came to this spot, there was a whole platoon of Swiss Army people, and they had lights on their bicycles, so it looked like a great, big caterpillar in the dark.

S: Right, of course, all riding their bicycles. Yes, the funny Swiss army.

M: '…simultaneously laughing at the place in the road where we had seen the Swiss army with lights on their bicycles looking like a caterpillar in the pre-dawn of the dark last time we motored from Gstaad to Paris. At Bulle, we stopped to buy Gateau Bullois and a glass of apple juice for Krishnaji.' Do you remember those cakes?

S: I do indeed. They were delicious.

At his desk in Tannegg

M: Yes. 'We arrived at Tannegg at 6:20 p.m. Vanda and Fosca were there. Krishnaji's room has lost its view of the valley to two cupboards and a dressing table and a horrible red carpet. It looks hot and Wagnerian in the hall. I was too tired to unpack. Krishnaji went to bed. I took a shower and had supper with Vanda. We talked at some length. I told her more fully of Krishnaji's night after surgery. I was staggered by her telling me that some years ago "before you were there," he had been examined in Geneva, and the doctor told her that Krishnaji had a tumor in his bladder that might be cancer. She never told Krishnaji, and nothing further was done.' [Long pause] So…

S: [chuckles] She was extraordinary.

M: I was absolutely aghast. She believed what she wanted to believe, and it didn't matter what implications or facts there were or anything.

Sunday, the third of July. 'Krishnaji, as a result of yesterday's drive, has hay fever. It was too hot to close the car windows; at least, he refused to, and so the pollen reached him. He stayed in bed and took tablets given by a homeopath, E. Roth, who came to us through Carol Smith at Brockwood with combination of allium cepa and sapodilla, two every two hours for six times, potency six. I unpacked and put everything in order, then went to Saanen for yogurt for Krishnaji. He stayed in bed. I had a nap after lunch.'

S: Why would you go to Saanen for yogurt?

M: I don't know. There was the Saanen shop, I don't know. [Both chuckle.] You know, what do you call it?

S: The Molkerei.

M: Yes. [Laughs.] 'I read and took a long nap in afternoon and then went for a walk to the end of the road. It helped the leg, which still aches.'

At his desk in Tannegg

July fourth, 'I exchanged the Opel Rekord for a small Renault, much easier to drive. Did all sorts of errands in morning and afternoon—marketing things, etcetera, mangoes fetched from the Siddoos. I met Vanda walking with Martha Crego and brought Vanda up the hill. Krishnaji remained in his room, his hay fever is contained but it wakes him at night. He rested and took the same pills as yesterday, but the dosage was one three times a day.'

The next day all it says is, 'Krishnaji in his room all day. I did errands in afternoon.'

July sixth, 'I worked at my desk on letters. Krishnaji remained in bed with his hay fever. After lunch, my brother telephoned from Bonn where he has consulted with Dr. Scheef'—who is in the same line of medicine as Dr. Wolf, who we had consulted in New York. 'Bud said that he had set it up for Krishnaji and me to go to him in September. Scheef will try to get all our records from Dr. Wolf's widow. Bud and Lisa go to Geneva tomorrow but only for a few hours on business, so I won't go down to see them. Then they go to Paris until they return to New York on Tuesday. Edgar Graf came to see Krishnaji, who is trying to help his back'—meaning Edgar Graf's back. 'Vanda claims that the TURP operation that Krishnaji had was only invented a few years ago; therefore,

Krishnaji would've had to have had a full operation years ago; therefore, it was alright to ignore the diagnosis of the doctors in Geneva. This seems to obliterate for her the possibility that if Krishnaji had had cancer, as the doctor told her, he might not be here now. My brain shivers at this sort of thinking; it becomes un-discussable as she believes what she wants to believe.'

S: [chuckles] We should just say for the record who Edgar Graf is.

M: Oh. Edgar Graf was a Swiss, and he was the one who got things done for the Saanen talks, getting the tent up, etcetera. He did what had been done by de Vidas before, and he took over all those arrangements.

July seventh. 'Today is the day for the Ventura hearing on our zoning application in Ojai. I received from Erna copies of various requirements from the building department about the cottage—not too bad—and replied to her. I walked up the hill and around twice daily for the leg. Errands in afternoon. Krishnaji saw Mr. Russu very briefly.'

July eighth. 'There was no cable from Erna, so I will wait for a letter about the zoning change application. Frances McCann, Simonetta di Cesaro, and a young Italian painter came to lunch. Simonetta brought Krishnaji a gray silk shirt. "Too fancy," he thought. I asked him if we could give her a sample shirt and have it copied in cotton. She is no longer working for the lepers in Rishikesh but for the Tibetans. The Siddoos came at 4 p.m. to have Krishnaji sign a lease from them at $1 for three years for the school and adult center buildings for the KF Canada. They own the two buildings. Scott Forbes arrived in the new Mercedes van rigged as a video center, and brought Krishnaji's books and sun umbrella. As it was raining lightly, Krishnaji walked down the hill while I went to the post to fetch the Krishnaji/Anderson video cassettes air-freighted from Ojai to be shown here on the tenth. I then met Krishnaji by the bridge and we drove to look at the tent now erected for the public talks. He likes the yellow Renault. Vanda is eating almost nothing, and looks ill. She refuses all urging to eat more.'

S: We just need to add something here: The reason the Siddoos wanted Krishnaji to sign for the Krishnamurti Foundation of Canada to rent property that they had purchased was because Krishnaji was the president of the Krishnamurti Foundation of Canada, from which he soon afterwards, according to my memory, resigned.

M: Yes, he resigned, and told them to dissolve the Foundation. But they never did.

S: Right. But anyway, at that point, Krishnaji was president, which is why he was signing.

M: Yes, that's true.

S: Yes. I'm just trying to make sense of this, otherwise it seems silly that they're asking Krishnaji to sign an agreement…

M: …for three years for one dollar.

S: Yes…to rent property that they own.

M: Yes. Good, good.

The next day, 'I went to the village on errands, then went by the camping site. Dorothy, Montague, and Doris have arrived in the Land Rover with no mishaps. Kathy Harris, who bicycled with six others from Brockwood, came by. Vanda ate a little more at lunch, but nothing at supper. Krishnaji has scolded her. I have urged gently. It is worrisome.'

S: That she doesn't eat very much?

M: Yes, she would sit at the table and just pick at her salad and not eat anything. 'Krishnaji and I walked in the rain to the river. A policeman stopped us, asking if we had picked wildflowers or mushrooms. They must be trying to protect them. We felt very approving. Before retiring to bed, Krishnaji had me pick out his clothes for tomorrow's talk. He said goodnight with a thinking-of-something air, and then said, "Tomorrow I have to talk," and stretched his eyebrows. He is wearing the orange silk kimono dressing gown that stays here all year for the summer, sannyasi-color and very becoming.'

July tenth. 'The day began with clouds, but the sun appeared before it was time to go to the tent for the talk. Krishnaji breakfasted at 7:45 a.m. Vanda went to the talk with Mrs. Walsh. Krishnaji and I got to the tent just before 10:30 a.m. Henri Methorst was making endless announcements. Despite the rain and it being the first talk, the tent was nearly full. Scott had four monitors and all the video set up in the new Brockwood Mercedes van. Mary Cadogan had brought, from London, the third Sony video camera that was needed and which I've donated with Erna ordering it ten days ago in Los Angeles, and Donald Hoppen bringing it to London.'

Editor's Note: The year before, the Saanen and Brockwood talks had been video-recorded with one video camera, but this year was the beginning of the much more complex, three-camera video recording procedure. For years, the only cameras we had were black and white surveillance cameras, so the production value of these recordings is not high, but it seemed important to have the best recording we could have, even if it was not professional. From now on, all of Krishnaji's public talks would be recorded in Saanen and Brockwood, and not long after in Ojai and India. Soon after this full recording began, Krishnaji said to me, and he repeated it several times, that he "was the first one to be recorded." Of course, with hindsight, I now wish I had asked him, just for the record, "the first one what?" but at the time, it seemed obvious and the kind of question one didn't need to bother him with. These memoirs will continue to offer the text of any talks or discussions that Mary indicates are especially good, and when there are links to the videos of these talks, we will offer those as well. At the moment, the videos of these talks are for sale by the Foundations, but not offered for free.

‘Krishnaji looked well, fully of energy, and gave a strong opening talk, laying the basis of there being no security in thought and finally coming to the fact that the real seeing of this is the action of change and intelligence, and in this, is real security. He walked up the road right after the talk. Scott warned me that the mad girl, Christina Shroeder, who lay in the driveway here last summer and appeared naked in the Oak Grove after an April talk, is here, is lurking by the river, and waiting to “cut him off at the pass,” as Scott put it.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘I asked Scott to walk with Krishnaji a ways so that nothing happened. Vanda brought Mar back for lunch. Krishnaji said on the way back, “I had no idea what I was going to talk about when I began.” Krishnaji ate in his room, though he sat before lunch with us. In the afternoon, Dorothy brought Mrs. Billimoria and Mrs. Puri up to Tannegg with things they have brought from India for Krishnaji, mangoes too. He talked amiably with them for a while. I took Mar to Caprices, then walked partway with Krishnaji and Vanda to Alpina, and then I drove up the hill.’

S: Just to mention, Alpina’s a hotel.

M: Yes. It’s on the same mountain as Tannegg, but down the mountain a bit. ‘Krishnaji’s face looked thin in the evening, but he does not appear to be over-tired, just normally tired.’

July eleventh, ‘I spoke to my brother in Paris. He says he thinks he has arranged the apartment in le Tour so that it is convenient for all, including me and Krishnaji to use. We must all try to avoid the enormous cost of hotels. They leave for New York tomorrow. At 3 p.m., I met Mary Cadogan and Dorothy about Friday, and all the committees[4] coming up to Tannegg for their annual meeting. Krishnaji received an Indian friend of Edgar Graf, Madan al Himat-Singlike. Then, we went to Saanen about shoes.’

July twelfth, ‘Krishnaji gave an intense, very strong talk on authority, its falseness. It was hot in the tent but the lights of the video made it hotter. When I picked him up at the road, he wanted to go to the Saanen shoe store. It was cool there. Mr. Kohli found him light shoes he liked. We came back to the chalet, and there were Suad al Radhi for lunch and a Madame Janine Pinson, a friend of Vanda’s who wants her son and daughter to go to Brockwood. Suad brought pastries of honey and pistachio, apricots, and sweets which, alas, were later found to have little bugs, and a silver ring from Afghanistan for me. I think one of the Dunne girls will like it.’ [S chuckles.] ‘I fetched Narayan up the hill at 4 p.m. Krishnaji talked to him and the three of us walked to the river and back. Narayan stayed for supper with Vanda and me, and then we drove him way up to his chalet above Saanen where Donald Dennis and friends have rented rooms, and Narayan is with them for a couple of nights. It’s a nice old chalet, warm, gray wood, low ceilings, and bright flowers in boxes outside.’

There’s really nothing for the next day.

July fourteenth. ‘Krishnaji gave Saanen talk number three on skill, clarity, and compassion. It was all new. Later, he said it is like a triangle: the base is compassion.

Suzanne, Hugues, and Marjolaine van der Straten, Simonetta di Cesaro came to lunch. A letter came from Erna; the Ventura planning commission approved a zone change for the McAndrew Road property for an adult educational center and religious retreat, including permission to add on to the cottage. At last, the door opens to building. Erna further wrote that Topa Topa Ranch was against it, saying it could become a hotel, but a Mr. Zogg defended KFA and approval was unanimous. Also, a contractor named Max Falk, half-brother to an Alan Tansill, an old admirer of Krishnaji, and both of whom plan to leave everything to the Krishnamurti Foundation of America in their wills, offered to build the "house for Krishnaji without a fee," but when Bart showed him the plans, he said it was too extensive to donate his time. Bart is pursuing it with the fee as he is highly recommended by other architects. Whatever happens with this, the path leads further to this move and I follow it without question. Narayan came to talk to Krishnaji about Rishi Valley, went on the walk, and both he and Edgar Graf stayed to supper with Vanda and me.'

July fifteenth. 'At 11 a.m., there was the annual meeting at Tannegg of all the Krishnaji committees. There were about forty-five people. Mary C. opened the meeting. Dorothy gave a good report of Brockwood. The Siddoos spoke of the school opening in September in Canada. I reported on the Oak Grove School in Ojai, and Narayan spoke well about Rishi Valley. Krishnaji handled his health question very well. "About my health: I'm fine."…"I had a very minor operation, nothing worth mentioning. The doctor says I'm fine, and I expect to live another ten or fifteen years." Scott spoke about video matters. Krishnaji reported on the March international trustee meetings, but didn't mention why only four Foundations were there; so I added that it was about schools, so only Foundations with schools were there, hoping to make it clear to the Spanish group present who feel they are a Foundation like the others. Mary Cadogan and Jane Hammond, also Mar de Manziarly, were at lunch with Vanda and me. Krishnaji came in for coffee, and Jane tried pressure points in his feet. She has cured her husband Ian's hay fever that way, but none of the spots in Krishnaji's feet hurt. At 4 p.m., Graf brought two women from Lugana Radio. Krishnaji gave a taped interview. Later, we walked.'

July sixteenth. 'Vanda left for Florence. Mrs. Walsh drove Vanda to Zweisimmen where she caught a direct train. Krishnaji spent the day resting in bed.'

S: There's a direct train from Zweisimmen to Florence?

M: Yes. Normally.

July seventeenth. 'Krishnaji gave the fourth Saanen talk, full of fire. At 12:30 p.m., Mr. Mirabet came to give Krishnaji the annual donation of $4,000. Krishnaji decided to give $3,000 to Brockwood and $1,000 to a Rishi Valley fund Narayan wants to collect and keep in the West for books, purchases, also for teacher's travel. I am to open an account in Ojai with it, and Krishnaji wants to donate $500 of his Miss Dodge money to it.' Well, his Dodge money was only $500. [S laughs.] 'Narayan came at 4 p.m., and we told him all this. Krishnaji is so full of hopes for Narayan making Rishi Valley what it was meant to be. He exhorts him, encourages him, and calls him "old man." We all three walked to the river. “This operation has done me good. I have more energy,” said Krishnaji. Narayan stayed to supper and Donald Dennis came to fetch him.’

The next day, ‘I marketed, then brought Mar de Manziarly for Krishnaji to place hands. Went and brought up Pascaline Mallet, Gisela Elmenhorst, and a young German woman, Dr. Suzanne Shaup, who works for Sherg, the German publishing house and who has just done the translation of Talks to American Students which has been retitled’—excuse my lack of German—“Gespräche öber das Sein,” which literally means Speaking of Being. It is hardcover and Sherg Verlag, which seems to own O.W. Barth Verlag, is a major publisher with good distribution. It is said to be well translated, and Suzanne Shaup turned out to be an intelligent young woman. We all had lunch, and then Krishnaji, who was spending the day in bed, quite tired from yesterday, joined us in his orange silk kimono for a while after lunch. I drove them all back to where they live.’

July nineteenth. ‘Krishnaji gave Saanen talk number five. He spoke with great intensity on discontent, the necessity for it, leading to compassion which is intelligence, and on suffering and what it has to do with love—nothing. He ended with his story of the teacher addressing the pupils, and a bird comes to the window and sings. The teacher listens and when the bird is finished and flies away, he tells the pupils, “You have heard the lesson for today.” It was one of Krishnaji’s talks that leave me in tears. When he got in the car, he wanted to go right to Kohli in Saanen for a second pair of the lightweight shoes. We lunched together in the dining room, and then he slept until 4 p.m. In the afternoon, there was a tea for the Patel family, eight strong, also Narayan and Graf. There was talk of Indian politics between Krishnaji and father Patel. Disappointing to the two sons, two daughters and a son-in-law and daughter-in-law; the son-in-law and daughter-in-law who wanted Krishnaji to talk on other matters. The mother sat monolithically, the father voluble. One son, Siddarth Patel, seems to be the most interested in Krishnaji’s teachings. After they left, Krishnaji, Narayan and I walked to the river, and Narayan stayed to supper. Krishnaji wants me to take him shopping tomorrow for shoes, jeans, and Lamy pens. Later, Krishnaji said, “That operation must’ve done something to me. I feel such energy.”

July twentieth. ‘Mar came to Krishnaji to put “hands.” I took Narayan shopping. Krishnaji wants him to have proper shoes, so we went to Kohli and got two fine pairs; then for trousers, but failed to find them; then to Cadonau for a Lamy pen and pencil. This took all morning, but was considered a great success. Narayan went off with a young American woman, Beverly Nichols, who wants to teach at Rishi Valley. Dorothy and Montague moved up from the Land Rover in the camping site to the rooms downstairs. Edgar Graf brought a Swiss editor, Dr. Werbel, who has a Swiss TV and radio magazine, to interview Krishnaji for an article on him and the new German book, the translation of talks to American students. He brought a translator who also recorded it all on cassette, but seventy percent of what was said was in German between the two and Graf; Krishnaji looked out the window.’ [Laughs.]

‘Krishnaji and I walked to the river, Dorothy joining us. Krishnaji is pleased with the raincoat I bought him this morning from Kohli. On our return, the aggressive Mr. Paco

Forilla, from Grenada, who keeps pointing to a letter from Frasier, telling him to ask for "Princess Alliata" who will arrange for him to see Krishnaji. My saying Topazia'—Alliata was her last name—'is not here, etcetera, etcetera, only increased his insistence. So, finally Krishnaji saw him for a few minutes. It seems he had come all this way to ask on behalf of a woman Krishnaji knew years ago the question, "Why did I marry my husband who is now dead?" [Laughs.]

S: Really! [Laughs.]

M: [laughing] 'Krishnaji said, "How would I know?" And the man left satisfied. "People are crazy," says Krishnaji, and say I.' [Both chuckle.]

July twenty-first. 'Krishnaji gave Saanen talk number six, an extraordinary one on death and love. I fetched Mrs. Billimoria, Mrs. Puri, and Narayan up to lunch. The Simmonses were there too. Krishnaji came in before and after. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji talked to the Siddoo sisters, Dorothy, Narayan, and me on having a teachers' training center in Bangalore. Dorothy took exception to "training," saying it couldn't be taught as a method, etcetera; that they must learn by doing. She got tense about it, "defensive," Krishnaji calls it. He rephrased it as a "teachers' educational center." Narayan spoke well and enthusiastically about it. Krishnaji wants me to speak to Dorothy about this "defensiveness," as she gets upset if he does it. This seems to happen every summer. Dorothy gets intense and somewhat defiant about something. It annoys Krishnaji, and he wants me to talk to her about it.'

July twenty-second. 'I woke up around 4 a.m., and having had no walk yesterday, I went out at 5:45 a.m., went up the hill, across the field, and down the other road. The fields smelled of hay and moisture, clean and full of summer. Then I did my exercises, but extra, and it felt very well. I ran errands in the morning. Jean-Michel Maroger and his mother came for lunch, and Krishnaji joined us in the dining room. Jean-Michel is now doing translations of the talks on audio cassette; using Krishnaji's voice, then his French translation, then Krishnaji, etcetera. He does it excellently. Very nice family. He invited Krishnaji to where he and his wife and children live near Blois and Chenonceau. Krishnaji later said it would be nice to go there. At 3:45 p.m., Graf brought a Mme. Geiser of Swiss journal Fémina to interview Krishnaji. Krishnaji was sleepy at first, rather vague, and then gave her an absorbing lesson in the basics of his teachings, leading her step by step into what he thought of conditioning, religion, belief, the future being a projection of the past, the observer and observed. He said, "To see the whole is to see more than the parts." And when she said, "You have taught for fifty years. Are you tired of it?" he said, "I am not tired because I don't expect anything." I joined Krishnaji on the walk after bringing Fosca and the marketing up the hill.'

July twenty-third. 'I went down to the village early for fresh fruit. And at 11 a.m., Mr. Colell, and Mrs. Rusak, a Spanish lady, and a Señor Marcos Martinez Montegudo came to bring the latter's donation of a thousand Swiss francs for Krishnaji's use in the work. We had a cheerful conversation, translated back and forth. They are nice people. Krishnaji stayed in bed and said half the donation should go to Brockwood and half to Saanen gatherings. He had lunch in bed. I lunched alone in the dining room. At 4 p.m., Graf brought another German journalist, Silvia Schaefer, to interview Krishnaji for a German paper. I went down to town on errands, and had my hair trimmed a little. Krishnaji was tired today.'

S: Okay. I think that's all we have time for. We're about to run out of this tape.

M: Okay. Let me just mark the twenty-fourth for domani.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Before leaving the United States for six months or more, all resident aliens (people with green cards) must obtain a Sailing or Departure Permit, which is given by the Internal Revenue Service.

[2] Sam was Mary's husband who died in 1958.

[3] Pine Cottage, which originally really was just a cottage, was transformed into a beautiful house that Mary and Krishnaji moved into, but it continued to be called "a cottage" or "the cottage" by Mary, Krishnaji, and, of course, many others.

[4] These were the Krishnamurti Committees from the various countries.

Issue 48: July 24, 1977 to October 18, 1977

In this issue Mary's mother dies, and Mary is unable to get back to the US for her funeral due to airline problems. It seems typically stoic of Mary not to tell anyone, except Krishnaji, and just to get on with her responsibilities; but Mary has some brief but very touching memories of her childhood which are triggered by her mother's death.

There has been very frequent mention of Krishnaji's "putting his hands" on various people to heal them in these memoirs. It is worth noting that this was very quietly acknowledged, but not openly talked about when he was alive. We have also not seen so far, in these memoirs, dramatic effects of this healing. We do in this issue.

Mary: We begin on July twenty-fourth, 1977, so we're still in Switzerland for the Saanen talks. 'It was a shining, cloudless morning. I went at 6 a.m. for a walk to the river and back. All the earth was alive, and there was the smell of grass and pine in the forest. The little stream and the bigger one down in the valley were louder, as if it were their time. All nature was awake; it was a delight. I came back to do my exercises. Krishnaji feels better today; he has slept well. He went to his seventh talk, the final one of this series in Saanen. It was on meditation, really, but he began on decisions, went on to what it is to be without ambition, goals, will, and spoke of space, and the space of the conditioned mind which is limited, but where there is no self, no center, space is limitless. As he spoke, I saw him living in that infinite space, the rest of us tied in our pens; but in such a talk, I felt he lifted one high above the mountains into the sky. At the end, he put his hands together, and said to the audience, "May I go now?" and left. I picked him up on the road, surrounded by people. We went for a short drive up the road to Gsteig, and then came back as Dr. Liechty and her head nurse, Sister Lori, were to come to see Krishnaji for half an hour.'

Scott: Was she a religious sister?

M: No. Some places use "sister" as a title for a nurse. When Krishnaji went to the Bircher-Benner clinic, Sister Lori looked after him. She was a nice woman. When I went there later, I had the same room, by pure coincidence, and Sister Lori.

'They left as Narasimhan and Simonetta came to lunch. Krishnaji slept till 4 p.m., when he gave the only interview so far to a Swedish man named Arridsen, who had an operation for a brain tumor, which is now recurring. Narayan came by and came on the walk. Graf stayed to supper with Dorothy, Montague, and me.'

S: Why do you say it's the only interview so far, because Krishnaji had had interviews almost every day?

M: I suppose to that man.

S: Oh, to that man.

M: July twenty-fifth. 'I walked from 6 a.m. to 7 a.m. up the hill. It was wild and beautiful. Two deer bounded out of the woods, over a meadow, and were gone. I felt marvelously after all that, plus yoga. Krishnaji rested. Anneke, Doris, Dorothy, and Montague were at lunch. Krishnaji came in afterward and reminisced with Anneke and Doris about the early days. He asked them why they didn't try to stop Rajagopal, see what he was doing. This upset Doris, who became almost impossible, interrupting Krishnaji, finishing sentences for him. She seemed out of hand. It tired Krishnaji. At 4 p.m., he had a haircut, a very good one from the Italian barber, Nicholas.'

S: Can we just say that Anneke is Anneke Korndorffer…

M: Yes.

S: …who was really the principle mover in the Dutch committee.

M: And she goes back to the Ommen[1] days.

S: Yes.

M: And she ran the Stichting[2], as they call it in Holland, at least at this point. And was a good friend, and she was all the times when I was there, and Krishnaji went to Holland, it was Anneke who found and rented the places and lived there with us, and did everything.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: She was a very, very nice woman. She used to come to Brockwood, too.

S: Oh, yes.

M: July twenty-sixth, 'Rain all day. Fetched Mar to see Krishnaji and have hands put. Anneke came for the same, and I lunched alone. At 2 p.m., I met Dorothy, Montague, Ortolani…' Do you remember Ortolani?

S: Oh, yes. Very well.

M: Do we have to identify him?

S: Yes.

M: Well, he was an Italian, very nice man, had known Krishnaji forever, used to come every year to Saanen. What else do you remember about Ortolani?

S: Well, he was involved in the Italian committee.

M: Well, such as it was. [S laughs heartily.]

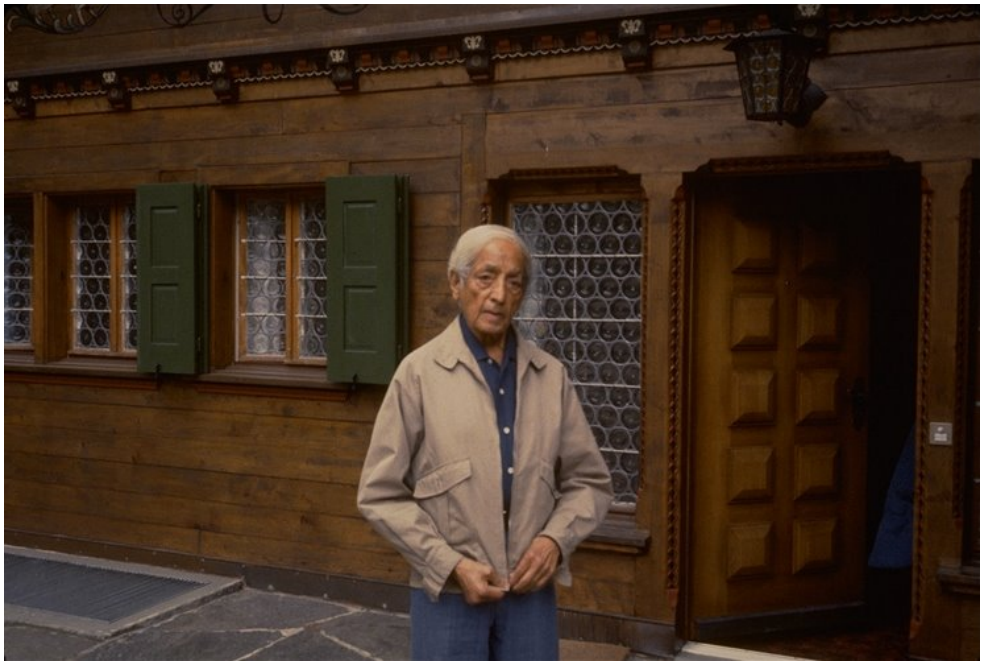
S: Yes, quite right.

M: [chuckles] It was never clear what that meant…'and Dr. Baldi of Argentina and a Mr. Turchi.'

S: Hugo Baldi?



M: Yes. It says here "Dr." but that was Hugo Baldi, and Mr. Turchi, from Italy, 'to discuss schools. Baldi wants to start one in Argentina. I walked with Krishnaji in the rain, and had supper alone.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held the first Saanen public discussion. The Reg Bennetts and Simmonses came to lunch. Krishnaji talked at length with them afterward. At 5 p.m., I went to Rougemont to a Brockwood party.' Doubtless, you were there.

S: That year, it probably would've been at the place Kathy and I had that year.

M: Probably.

The twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji held the second Saanen discussion. Krishnaji made me buy heavy shoes.' I don't know why, but anyway, he did. 'Narayan and Beverly Nichols came on the walk. The Simmonses and I dined with the Siddoo sisters.'

Krishnaji walking in Tannegg

July twenty-ninth. 'Saanen discussion number three. I got a long letter from Erna. At 12:30 p.m., I fetched Mar to Tannegg for hands, and to stay for lunch with the Simmonses and me. At 3 p.m., Scott Forbes came to see me about videos, and an endowment for all the schools.' Remember that?

S: Not at all. [Both laugh.]

M: It was somebody else! 'Graf brought an Italian, Luigi something, to see Krishnaji. Bart Phelps telephoned from Los Angeles to say that Max Faulk the contractor, who offered to do the residence at cost but couldn't afford it when he saw the size of the job, has made the lowest bid of $359,000, which is about $80 per square foot. I said to discuss it with Blau, but I am for going ahead with it as quickly as possible, even before signing the contract to buy the property.'

July thirtieth. 'Krishnaji held the fourth public discussion, but disorderly people made it difficult for Krishnaji. I fetched Suad al Radhi, her sister Amel al Kadhi and her friend Naira Munir Abbass to lunch.'

S: Where are they from?

M: Iran. 'Krishnaji talked to them afterward until the Siddoo sisters came at 4 p.m. Also, Mrs. Billimoria and Mrs. Puri came to say goodbye. I drove them all back to their respective places. Narayan and Graf came on the walk. Graf saw a flat in a nearby chalet as a substitute for Tannegg.' We were afraid we'd lose Tannegg, that the owner was going to sell it or something.

July thirty-first. 'Saanen discussion number five in pouring rain. Again there were unruly people. Krishnaji overcame it all. Anneke came back to the chalet for hands. Dorothy and Montague and I to lunch, and Krishnaji rested. I had a nap in afternoon. At 4 p.m. Dr. Frederick Leboyer…' Do you remember all the fuss about him?

S: No.

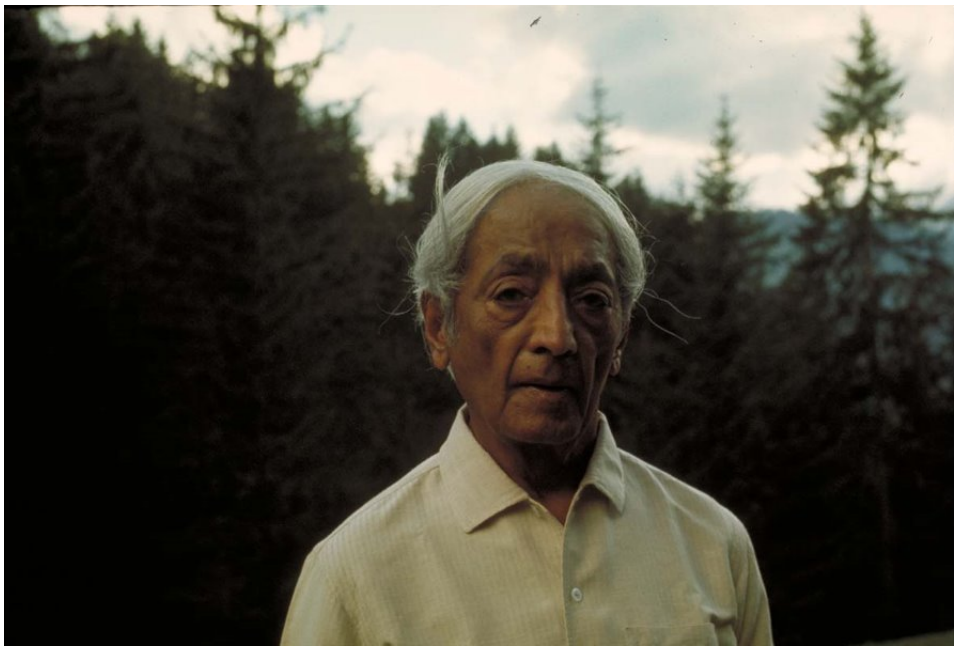
M: He's that child specialist who had all kinds of notions about…

S: Childbirth?

M: Yes.

S: Oh, right!

M: '…author of Birth without Violence, was sent by Vanda to see Krishnaji. Krishnaji and I walked to the river, which was thundering with rainwater and silt, boulders hitting one another. I had supper alone.'



The first of August. 'Krishnaji rested in the morning, then gave Doris Pratt a two-hour interview in the afternoon. Then, we walked to the river.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I on a beautiful day took the 8:44 a.m. train to Geneva. In Gstaad, we got into the forward carriage, the first one, and just beyond that is the engineer, who's steering it all in a closed-off section and where only one passenger was allowed'—that was the rule—'so Krishnaji rode all the way down the mountains to Montreux in that forward section, and emerged smiling.' Oh, that gave him great pleasure. [S laughs.]

S: Yes. He would have loved that, yes. [M chuckles.]

M: 'He said, "I felt like a boy."' [M chuckles.] 'We went to Jacquet and chose patterns for four neckties for Joe Links and four for Krishnaji himself, also a pair of moccasins. Then we went to Grand Passage about the quartz clock, and then crossed to the Hotel des Bergues and lunched pleasantly at Amphitryon'—that's the restaurant in the hotel.

Krishnaji walking in Gstaad

S: Yes.

M: We always lunched there; that was pleasant, very nice.

S: Yes, it was a nice place.

M: 'It was cool and quiet, the snowy linens, flowers on the table, attentive waiters who served nice food with care—a little pool of vanishing amenities. It gave me a sigh of satisfaction to pilot Krishnaji to such—a proper meal, quietly served in a proper place for him.'

S: Incidentally, I remember what happened to the Braun quartz clock that came from Grand Passage or wherever it eventually came from.

M: What did happen? I forget.

S: He kept that as his clock in India.

M: Oh, did he?

S: And he traveled around with that.

M: I thought it was bought for Patwardhan.

S: Well, I think that he must've bought two then, because he had one that he traveled around with there in India.

M: And it stayed in India?

S: It stayed in India.

M: That's why I never saw it.

S: Well, you would have but only on the few occasions when you went. If you think about it, it's small, black; I can still see it next to his bed in different places in India.

M: I don't remember that one. I remember the one that was next to his bed in Brockwood.

S: Ah, that was a big one.

M: A big one.

S: That's the Patek Philippe.

M: He gave that…

S: He gave that to Dr. Deutsch.

M: Dr. Deutsch, that's right.

August third. 'I went with Edgar Graf to look at possible quarters for next summer if Tannegg is not possible. I saw nothing satisfactory. Krishnaji and I lunched alone. He saw Mr. Russu very briefly at 4:30 p.m.'

There's really nothing for the next day except 'Krishnaji saw Mr. Joseph Elkabir at 4 p.m.'

August fifth. 'There was a letter from Bart Phelps, saying that Max Faulk the construction contractor is to start work on the Ojai cottage next Wednesday, the tenth, without waiting for a signed contract, which is in the hands of Lou Blau; so we are launched. It is interesting how all this seems to flow of itself. Decisions make themselves and one goes with it. Frances McCann, Padma Madholkar, and the Simmonses were at lunch. Frances described the Guido Franco film with bits of Krishnaji, illicitly shot, used in it. It is, apparently, as bad as I felt it would be.' I was always having trouble with Guido Franco.

August sixth. 'I had an early morning walk before exercises. The Simmonses brought the Land Rover up. They and I dined with Suzanne, Hugues van der Straten, Marjolaine, and Ariane.'

The next day, 'Dorothy and Montague left in the Land Rover to drive with Doris to Brockwood. Nadia and Nicolas Kossiakof came to lunch. I slept all afternoon, and felt really rested for the first time in ages.'

August eighth. 'I went for an early morning walk. To give Fosca some respite, Krishnaji and I lunched pleasantly at the Park Hotel, and later in the afternoon, went for a walk.'

Krishnaji walking with Mary in Gstaad

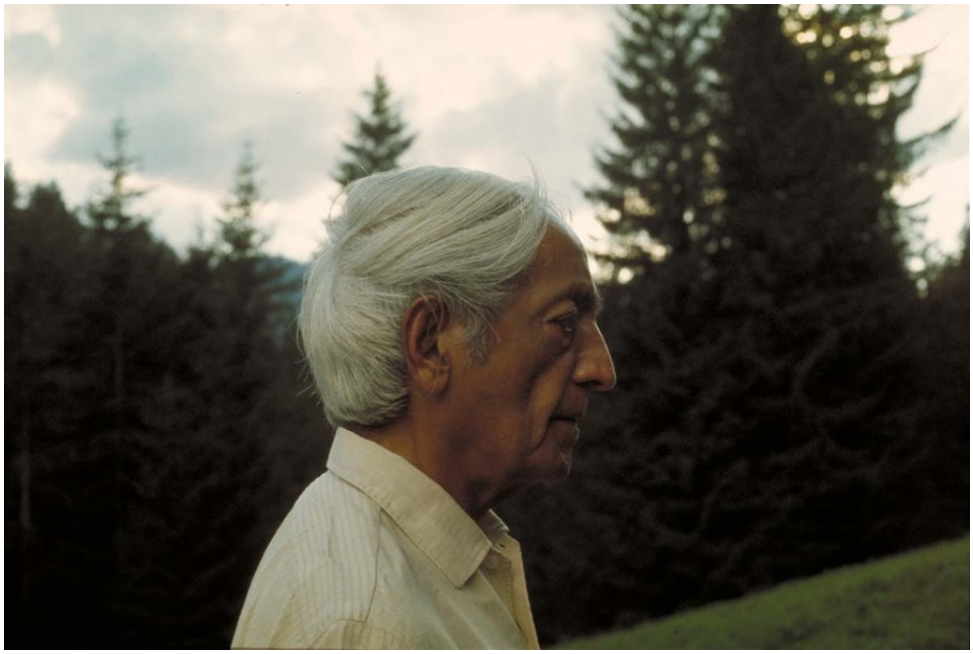
The next day, 'Mr. Elkabir came to lunch. Krishnaji and I walked in the afternoon. A cassette came from Betsy saying Cary is interested in buying the Malibu house.' Nothing came of that.

Editor's Note: There were two small loose pieces of paper in Mary's diary that covers the dates in this issue: one of them is dated August ninth, 1977, and the other piece is undated. The dated piece reads: 'Woke [presumably, Krishnaji] up this morning with "The means is the skill"—"there is no end, the means is the end, so the means is the skill."'…"'In consciousness there has always been the good and the bad, the bad always predominating as it does in the world."'

On the undated piece of paper—'Krishnaji: "I don't know if you've noticed—it is strange, That is never tired. My body was tired but not That. Now I know what it is to be inexhaustible. I've found something—That is really inexhaustible.'"…'"Silence—uncontaminated by the mind, the original silence."'

The tenth. 'Today construction is supposed to have begun on the cottage in Ojai. Krishnaji and I lunched alone. We saw Nadia at 4 p.m. I photographed the painted sunburst shutters on old buildings in Rougemont, and finally met Vanda on a train from Montreux.' I liked the painted shutters I saw in that part of Switzerland, and eventually copied shutters on the outside of a building in Montreux, a lovely old chalet, with what is called a sunburst pattern. When I built the addition onto Pine Cottage, I used the idea but for sliding shutters inside, in the place of curtains.

S: Out of interest here, just while we're interrupted: Why did you use to eat at the Park Hotel rather than the Palace Hotel?



M: I think we just liked it better. It was always simpler in atmosphere.

The next day, 'I had an early morning walk, and had a quiet day. Krishnaji gave Frances McCann an interview in the afternoon. I deposited $1,148 dollars into the Vanda Scaravelli account from the Krishnamurti travel fund for this year's share of the Tannegg rent.' We used to split the cost of renting Chalet Tannegg. 'I had supper with Suzanne and Marjolaine, and went with them to the Saanen Menuhin concert; that was the Menuhin school students that were playing.'

August twelfth. 'I had an early walk and then worked at the desk. In the afternoon, I talked to Nadia about the French translations and other publication matters, then walked with Krishnaji to the river. Vanda helped my leg by manipulation and stretching.'

Then there's really nothing until the eighteenth but our happily and quietly being in Gstaad, doing little, seeing a few people, going for walks, etcetera. But on the eighteenth, 'I packed all day, exchanged the Renault for a larger Taunus from Hertz, and packed the car.'

August nineteenth, 'Vanda and Fosca are staying on at Tannegg for a few days and it is settled that we take Tannegg next summer. At 9:30 a.m., in the Taunus I took yesterday in exchange for the Renault, we left and drove through rain down via le Col de Pillon and Aigle to the autoroute. After Lausanne, at Krishnaji's urging, I switched to the Route du Lac. Our 1:30 p.m. Swiss Air flight sat on the ground for over an hour due to a slow-down strike at air traffic control at Heathrow. Dorothy, Doris, and Ingrid were there to meet us, and we were at Brockwood by 6 p.m. The house was quiet, almost empty and very welcoming. I had had enough, suddenly, of Gstaad, and it was good to be at Brockwood again. Waiting for me were legal papers from Blau, including the contract with Max Faulk which I am to sign right away, and there was an agreement with KFA about my buying the McAndrew Road property.'

Krishnaji walking in Gstaad

'I talked to Mary L. She, her husband Joe, and her daughter, Amanda Pallant, and grandchildren spent a happy summer at Brockwood. There was a cable from Evelyne Blau that she cannot come to the Brockwood talks.'

'The tent for the Brockwood public talks is already up in the meadow.'

August twentieth. 'Unpacking, etcetera. Krishnaji spent the day in bed resting and reading a good detective novel, The Enemy, by Desmond Bagley. There was a letter from Amanda. Winky was operated on for cancer'—oh dear. 'There was a letter from Bart Phelps; the needed demolition on the cottage is already done, and the foundation is staked.' [Chuckles.]

S: That's the demolition of the thing Rajagopal had built next to the Pine Cottage, not the cottage itself.

M: That's right. It was a hideous addition that Rajagopal had put on without telling Krishnaji.

August twenty-first: 'Unpacking, rearranging, tidying, laundry, etcetera. Krishnaji got up for lunch. I sorted his things. He, Dorothy, and I walked and inspected the vegetable garden, which was kept immaculately by Alasdair Coyne and Jean-Michel. Krishnaji was very pleased. He also was pleased with the new garage rooms that are fixed up as temporary bedrooms for guests during the public gatherings. They're very nice.'

The next day, 'I went through Krishnaji's clothes and shelves, cleaning and sorting. Then to Alresford, to post off the signed building contract to Max Faulk. After much confusion, the Mercedes battery was located at the West Meon garage, now under new and raffish ownership. I had to fetch the old mechanic who used to work there, Alan, now at Wall's garage, to find the battery. In the afternoon, I walked with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and the dogs across the fields. It is so beautiful, so good to be here.'

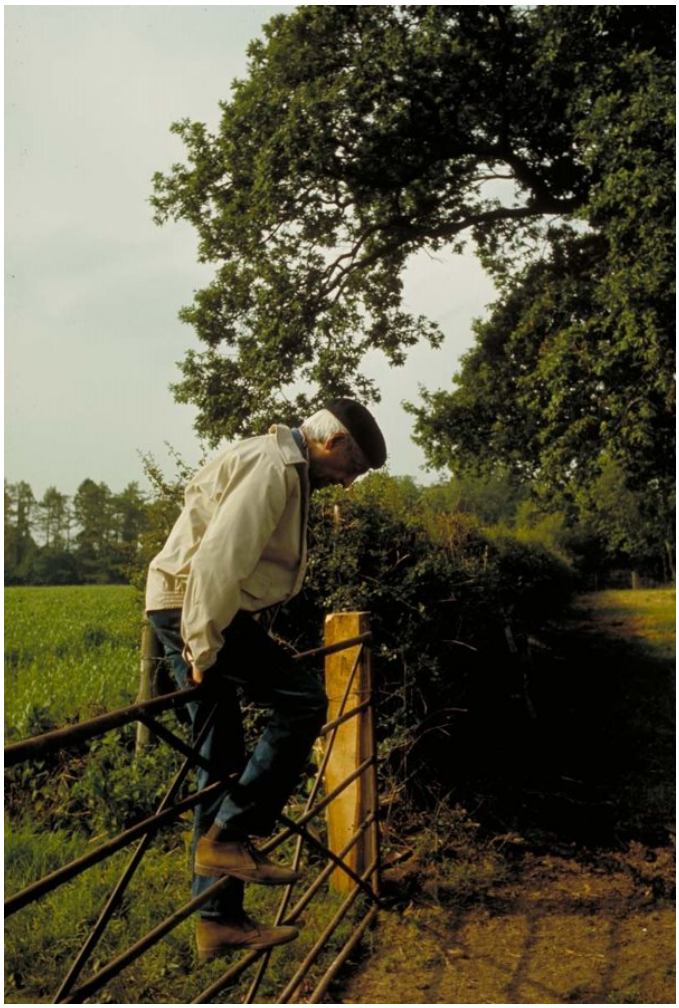
August twenty-third, 'I did miscellaneous sorting of things for Krishnaji. I was busy all day. Fixed the rooms in the West Wing for guests. There was a shorter walk with Krishnaji and Dorothy.'

August twenty-fourth. 'Rain. A carpenter rehung the tapestries in the drawing room. The Mercedes was put in running order, and I drove it to Petersfield for plants for the West Wing, etcetera.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I took the 9:20 a.m. train to London. It rained. We went to Huntsman, Hatchards, Asprey's, and at 12:15 p.m. Mary and Joe lunched with us at Fortnum's, and Krishnaji gave Joe the Jacquet ties. Everyone was very pleased.' [Both chuckle.] 'After lunch, Joe drove Krishnaji to the dentist, Mr. Thompson. I went to the bank, where Joe met me and drove me back to Portland Place, where the dentist was. I fetched Krishnaji, and then Joe drove us both to Waterloo.'

The twenty-sixth. 'Mavis and Reg Bennett arrived to stay in the West Wing guestroom for the public talks. In the afternoon, I met Asit Chandmal and his wife, Meenakshi, at Petersfield train station, and gave them the dining room in the West Wing, which has been made up as a temporary guest bedroom.'



August twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji gave the first Brockwood talk in the marquis. There was rain and confusion. After the talk, Krishnaji and I had fruit and salad upstairs in our kitchen and then returned to the tent for hot food. I sat with a photo exhibit of the Oak Grove School to answer inquiries. We walked in the late afternoon. After supper, Dorothy and I rearranged the chairs in the marquis, and roped off a section for the bus people.' Otherwise, the bus people didn't have any place to sit when they got there after the other people.

S: Right. Right. We should just mention that there's really very little public transportation to Brockwood.

Trains came into Petersfield and Winchester, so we hired buses during the gatherings to pick people up at specified times at those stations to bring them to Brockwood for the talks. The problem was that by the time they got there, all the good seats were taken by all the avid campers who used to start lining up at 6 in the morning to get seats.

M: Yes. [Laughing.] Well, we fixed that.

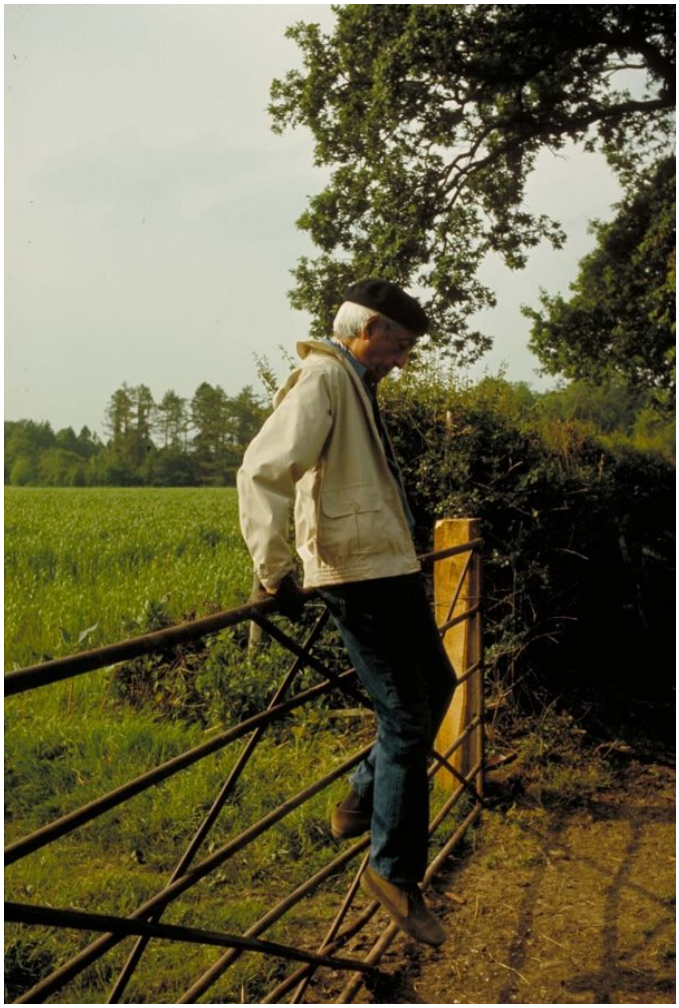
S: Right.

Krishnaji going over a fence in Brockwood



M: The next day, 'Krishnaji gave the second Brockwood talk. Dorothy and I managed the traffic in the tent, and it went smoothly. Mary, Joe, Amanda, and Nicky (Nicky is Mary's granddaughter, one of them) came. Early on, coming downstairs, I fell and bruised my left knee. After the talk, Krishnaji had fruit and salad in our kitchen, then hot food in the tent. Later, the Linkses, the Chandmals, Krishnaji, and I had tea in the kitchen; and later still, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went for a walk.'

August twenty-ninth, 'I worked at the desk. In the afternoon, Krishnaji held a taped discussion with David Bohm, Asit Chandmal, and P. Krishna, professor of physics at Benares Hindu University.'

S: Ah, the one who later became the head of the Rajghat school?

M: That's right. That's what happened.

S: Okay.

Krishnaji going over a fence in Brockwood

M: So, now we go to the thirtieth. 'Krishnaji had wondered how to hold a public discussion in the tent with so many people. Should he appoint a few, and let the others listen? Or appoint a few and let those who wish to join, join? He spoke of this in the tent, and then suddenly he said, he thought he would have a dialogue with himself, and so he did, most marvelously.' Do you remember that?

S: I remember it well.

M: 'People were very moved by it. At last, he had someone worthy to discuss with, said so many' [humor in her voice]. 'The Chandmals left in the morning before the discussion.' Oh. That's interesting. 'I drove them to Petersfield. My leg is hurting.'

August thirty-first. 'In the afternoon, Krishnaji talked to Reg and Mavis Bennett on the future of the work in Australia. Also, he saw and talked a little to Hari van Till, a paralyzed Dutch woman with multiple sclerosis, who has been attending the talks. I'm coming down with a cold. Took two grams of vitamin C, which may help but doesn't seem to prevent.'

Now, September first. ‘This day began with Krishnaji holding his second public discussion in the tent, this time taking questions from the audience, and weaving them together in his answer. In the afternoon, he saw the Shepard sisters, Lola and Pat, about the work in South Africa.’ Do you remember them?

S: Yes, I do.

M: ‘Then, he talked to a Richard Hemwood and wife. At midnight time here, Bud telephoned from the Vineyard to tell me that Mother has pneumonia and may not live. She has been sleeping most of the time lately, and does not recognize anyone. Wooge decided not to put her in the hospital today, but pneumonia is diagnosed by a Dr. somebody. Bud said to wait and see what the doctor says tomorrow morning when he comes at 10 a.m. before deciding if I should fly back. He said Mother would not recognize me. I lay in the dark and felt as if Mother had gone a long time ago.’

September second. ‘At 6:30 a.m. my time, Bud telephoned and said he had looked in on Mother about 11 p.m. last night, before he went home. She was sleeping peacefully; her fever had dropped. Wooge had gone to bed. Only minutes after Bud was across the street, where he was staying, Lynn’—that’s the nurse looking after Mother—‘went in to see Mother and found she had died. It must’ve been about 11:15 p.m. there. Francis[3] was at Elmholm[4], and he and Bud woke Wooge to tell him. He had gone to bed thinking Mother was better. Bud thinks the funeral should be tomorrow, as Monday is Labor Day and to postpone it till Tuesday would prolong things for Wooge. I cannot get there by tomorrow; there is an air strike and seventy percent of flights are canceled here, with delays up to twenty-four hours on some that are going, but I said I would try. I telephoned the airlines going to Boston; none can get me there. I telephoned Bud and spoke to Lisa. Wooge is bearing up, putting himself to planning the funeral, which is now planned for Monday anyway. I then telephoned Wooge, who said he is not expecting me for the funeral, but when I return to the U.S.A., would I come and see him then? I tried again to telephone Bud, but couldn’t get through. That was in the evening his time.’

‘I told Krishnaji what had happened but no one else. I went to a lengthy publication committee meeting, which lasted into the afternoon. Bud’s voice this morning told me what I already knew somehow, that Mother was gone. She had vanished as we knew her long ago, leaving a tragedy, a parody of herself. Now, all this vanishes. What comes is the sense of long ago, things in childhood which now seem gifts from her. Oddly, they are moments when I was alone, but they must’ve been things I cherished—summer days, sunlight in a room, or filling the senses on a beach, a certain order, things clean, pretty—a grace. She taught me taste of the eye, and I remember these things, as I remember the sounds of the Vineyard, deep in some child’s memory, where there are many treasures—the smell of books and pleasures of beginning one, the feel of linen sheets, letting me be a shy child. I realized all these memories are about me, not Mother. A child sees its mother through its own experience—objectivity comes later—but between her and me, the best time must’ve been very early, and it is the good that is left in the face of death. The rest does not really matter.’

September three, ‘Krishnaji gave the third Brockwood talk. He saw the Polish lady Magdalena Jasinka at 4 p.m.’ Do you remember her?

S: Yes, I certainly do. She was a nice woman.

M: ‘I telephoned Bud and spoke to both him and Lisa. The memorial service for Mother will be in Grace Church in Vineyard Haven at 10 a.m. on Monday. All Wooge’s children are with him, and Ann’—that’s his eldest daughter—‘will stay on with him for a few weeks, and then Francis and Cynthia will come’—that’s his son and daughter-in-law. Brockwood had trouble with a pathetic mentally disabled young man. Scott found him in the West Wing and put him on a train to London.’ Do you remember that?

S: There were several, so I’m not sure which one this was.

M: Yes, there were several mad people who we both had to deal with at various times.

September fourth. ‘Krishnaji’s fourth Brockwood talk. I made an appeal for funds. The tent was overflowing with people, even though we have added a smaller one extending the center of the big one in which Krishnaji speaks.’

September fifth. ‘Today there was the memorial service for Mother in Grace Church at Vineyard Haven, with the burial in the family plot. Guests leave Brockwood.’

September sixth. ‘Most of the guests are gone. I wrote to Louis Blau and Mitchell Booth about the agreement with KFA to purchase the McAndrew Road property. I then went to Alresford on errands. Krishnaji saw Mr. Jenkins’ little girl who has leukemia.’ There are many other notations about this little girl with leukemia, who Krishnaji tried to help, and I was told lately, by Kathy[5], that she’s a grown woman now and came back to Brockwood, just lately, in the last few weeks, and she remembers Krishnaji and her coming there.

S: She was cured?

M: Krishnaji cured her.

S: He cured her of leukemia?

M: Yes.

S: How nice. I remember her.

M: Yes. If she was, say, five or six then, how old would she be now?

S: Well, that was almost thirty years ago, so she’d be about thirty-five. But I picture her as being about ten.

M: Well, she was a little girl. Now, she may have been older than five. Let's say she was ten; she's in her thirties, anyway.

September seventh, 'Krishnaji and I took the 10:20 a.m. train to London. We went first to Huntsman, where he ordered a worsted tweed brown suit and a pair of brown trousers. I chose a similar tweed, worsted, gray, and a beige twill for making into trousers by Hillier's.' Huntsman couldn't fit me.

S: Yes, I remember.

M: And so I went down the road to Hillier's. 'We went there and left the model and the material. At Krishnaji's urging, I bought a small silver pencil at the pen shop in the Burlington Arcade for my purse. Then, we lunched with Mary L. at Fortnum's. Krishnaji told her about my mother. Krishnaji went to the dentist while I went to Heal's for an eiderdown duvet and some big Japanese paper lanterns for the West Wing halls. I walked to the dentist at Portland Place and met Krishnaji, and we came back to Brockwood. In London, while walking, Krishnaji felt "faint" for a few seconds, then it passed.'

Editor's Note: Subbulakshmi did not so much "perform" for Krishnaji as exercise an act of devotion. I saw her sing for Krishnaji several times, and her songs were traditional devotional songs to Krishna, and she sang them with a palpable and most moving devotion.

Many people consider Subbulakshmi to be one of the greatest singers in South Indian history, on a par with Pavarotti or Domingo in the West.

There's really nothing for the next day, but for the ninth, 'I first did desk work, then prepared the spare room and dining room West Wing as bedrooms for the afternoon arrival of M.S. Subbulakshmi' [both chuckle for a bit] 'and her husband' [more laughter]—I'm laughing in anticipation—'T. Sadasivam, daughter Radha Viswanathan, her daughter Lakshmi, a six-year-old, and a "considered son," K.R. Athmanathan. Who also came was the violinist, Alagiriswamy, and guru Vayir Doren, the mrdangam player. Shankar, our student, is a son of a niece (I think), but they call him grandson. He met them at the airport and spent the night with them in London at their first hosts there, a gloomy-looking banker named, unforgettably, Mr. Rajagopal.' [Both laugh.] 'He came too. Brockwood rather extended itself for the visit. Shakuntala, with helpers, cooked a South Indian supper. They arrived about 4:30 p.m. Subbulakshmi, at first glimpse, was a tiny, shy, smiling little old lady.' I'd heard her sing in London. 'But, there she was, on the doorstep' [S chuckles], 'modest-looking, gray-haired, with two diamond rings in her nose, [both chuckle], right and left nostrils. I had freshly ground brewed coffee made as they drove in, which was well received. Krishnaji darted out to welcome them. And both Subbulakshmi and Radha prostrated themselves at his feet, forehead to floor'—that's the way to do it.

S: Yes, yes.

M: 'The husband'—Shankar had warned us correctly—'had the Shiva ashes on his forehead and came in full dhoti, kurta and shawl, beads, and manner. She was to sing at 5 p.m. to 5:30 p.m., but it was 6 p.m. before they came into the assembly room, keeping Krishnaji waiting quite a bit. Incense and garlands were on hand—roses had been snipped from the garden and stitched together all afternoon. Then, she began to sing, and it was of extraordinary beauty, deeply moving. The sound seemed to float through consciousness, stirring a sense of forgotten memory beyond what I have known. She seemed to sing her heart out for Krishnaji, and he followed it, telling me later that it was more than she had ever sung at Vasanta Vihar. Krishnaji came to the supper in the dining room. Shakuntala had cooked a fine Indian supper. Shankar, the Brockwood student, helped a great deal.' Do you remember him?

S: Yes, of course. Shankar was her nephew.

M: Was he? Without Shankar, I don't know what I'd have done.

'Then followed a comedy of getting them to bed.' [Chuckles.] 'Shankar flew about, relaying their needs—a bucket, a pitcher, another pitcher, then they want early coffee. I said I would get it, but Shankar said, no, he would.' [S chuckles.] 'Subbulakshmi and the husband were in the guestroom.'

S: Right.

M: 'But that has a shower. Well, the shower wouldn't do. He had to have a bucket to fill and pour over himself.'

S: Yes, yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: I couldn't make that one out. Why, I wondered, did he want a bucket? '"Do you really want a bucket?" I asked. "Yes, I want a bucket."' [Laughs.] Anyway. [Laughs again.] So, that's what happened.

September tenth: 'Last night, Shankar had said that they wanted breakfast and coffee at 6 a.m., so I got up, set up trays, and prepared it for Shankar to serve. He had asked if I minded if he slept on the floor of the room with Radha and her child. I said, of course not, to sleep where he liked. "I don't want to," he said. "Then, sleep where you feel you must, I replied. As I went off toward my room last night, with humor he asked, "Would you like a pitcher of water in the morning?' [Both laugh.] They left early, at 8:30 a.m., after presumably having both had breakfast served by Shankar. Krishnaji gave Subbulakshmi his best gray cashmere cardigan, and she and the daughter again prostrated themselves to Krishnaji, and even the husband, in fresh starched dhoti and freshly maquillé ashes, touched his hand to the floor at Krishnaji's feet.'

'So they left in a high commission car with chauffeur, with Shankar going to ease the remainder of their London stay. She sings there tomorrow, but may go on tour in the U.S., arranged by Narasimhan. How will he look after them?' [Laughter.] 'Brockwood went back to normal.' [S laughs.] 'Krishnaji and I had a quiet breakfast, but afterward, Krishnaji felt a little dizzy for a few seconds. He had difficulty sleeping last night, he said. He stayed in bed all day. In the evening, he had a pain in right thigh, but a hot pad relieved it.' [Laughs.] That was one for the Brockwood annals. [S laughs.]

The eleventh of September. 'The pain in Krishnaji's thigh is gone. I did mostly desk work. In the afternoon, he saw briefly Mrs. Chando Moaraji and son, then talked to Shakuntala. He, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields. It is so beautiful, a sense of blessing.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji stayed in bed until it was time for the walk across the fields. The cement was poured for the new wing of the cottage in Ojai.'

September thirteenth. '"Let's go out for lunch," said Krishnaji. So, he, Dorothy, and I drove south to look at the English Channel and then inland a little to Wickham, where in an old Georgian house, there is the Old House Restaurant. We had a nice meal there, vegetables from their garden, mushroom omelet, and cinnamon ice cream. We came back, took naps, then went for a walk.' I think that was the first time…

S: …that you went to the Old House at Wickham?

M: Yes. And it became a favorite, as you well know.

September fourteenth. 'I went to London, had a haircut, did errands, went to Harrods, and then walked to the Victoria and Albert Museum to see a Fabergé exhibition; but there was a queue of at least 100 people, and I was too tired to wait, so I caught a cab to Waterloo and came home. Krishnaji surprised me by approving the haircut.'

S: Hm. [M chuckles.] Where did you have your hair cut in those days?

M: Well, it says here, but I skipped it because I couldn't quite make it out: somewhere on Bruton street…John or John-Paul somebody and something. It was on Bruton Street.

I didn't go forever to them, but I did then.

The next day, all that my diary says is that Krishnaji talked to the staff, and the day after that has even less.

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji talked to staff for over two hours on what it is to live with intelligence, though what attitudes to take about the students having sex was the precipitating question.' You may remember that, but I don't.

S: I don't, either.

M: 'Krishnaji also saw the little Jenkins girl again and put his hands. The child, who has leukemia, is said to be better.'

September eighteenth. ‘I drove to the Travers’s for lunch. Ginny, Bill, William, Louise, and David’—those last three are the children—‘were there. Very pleasant. I came back in time to get Krishnaji’s supper tray. Driving through the lovely country, I passed dahlias, tall in gardens and the phrase “a sanity of dahlias” kept going through my head, as if in this increasingly disturbed, demented world, sanity has gone to live in simple beauty.’

On the nineteenth, ‘Krishnaji talked to the staff on the highest intelligence coming with the absence of self. He gave Saral Bohm an interview after lunch. I went at 3:30 p.m. to a staff meeting, and then Krishnaji and I walked.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji talked again to the staff, this time on how to teach that intelligence is the absence of self. I took the Mercedes for a vehicle test for the annual license. We had our usual walk.’

September twenty-first. ‘It was a cold day. A letter from Amanda says that Cary Grant asked to see the house in Malibu, and Phil’—that’s Amanda’s husband, Phil Dunne—‘showed him through. Also, the Bob Earls want to see it.’ Those are people who live down on the beach. Krishnaji and I got the 10:20 a.m. train to London. He fitted at Huntsman. I got some sweaters at Peale’s. Mary L. lunched with us at Fortnum’s. Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt, and we came home. New students have arrived for the start of the new school year.’[6]

The twenty-second, ‘Krishnaji talked to the staff on how to tell students that pleasure is an isolating thing.’ [M and S both chuckle.] A sort of vaccination talk. ‘There was a tea for the new students. Krishnaji saw the Jenkins child again, and we walked.’

September twenty-third. ‘All the students have now arrived. Krishnaji talked to the staff from 4 p.m. to 5 p.m. Whisper was spayed, and dead puppies were found in her.’ Oh dear; that’s awful. That’s horrible.

S: Yes, it is.

M: The twenty-fourth. ‘There was a school meeting at 9 a.m., and then Krishnaji talked to the school at noon on the isolation of pleasure. Whisper was fetched from the vet by Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me in afternoon. We had the usual walk.’

September twenty-fifth, ‘Krishnaji had a meeting alone with the students. After lunch, David Bohm talked to Krishnaji on behalf of David Shainberg, who was having difficulties with his wife; she’s interested in Kabbalah.’

The next day was mostly packing.

September twenty-seventh, ‘We were up at 5 a.m., breakfasted in the kitchen, and left with Dorothy at 7:45 a.m. for Heathrow. Krishnaji and I took a Lufthansa flight to Cologne/Bonn, but were late leaving because of the continuing air traffic control strike.

Once we landed, there were hard-faced men watching disembarking passengers.' I remember—they were two tough-looking men; they were looking for someone.

S: In Cologne/Bonn?

M: Yes. 'I thought instantly of the man now in the hands of terrorists, kidnappers, the nightmare it must be for him, the government, police, the whole country—how close ordinary life is to violence and horror. We came by taxi to Bonn and the Hotel Bristol, recommended by Bud. I telephoned Dr. Scheef to confirm our appointment for tomorrow morning. We lunched in a largely empty dining room, where the head waiter turned out to be from Delhi—Namaste, etcetera.' [S chuckles.] 'We took naps. Then, we went for a walk, first to locate the clinic, which was nearby, and then to look for quartz clocks. We found a small one for Krishnaji to give to Pama Patwardhan, but for himself, he wanted the Braun. We walked on, saw a razor shop and they had the Braun clock. Krishnaji's face lit up with pleasure. We came back feeling successful.'

S: Ah!

M: Ah-ha! You were right. 'We had our suppers in our rooms. Then, very suddenly, in the middle of the soup, Krishnaji's face changed. He looked about with that listening expression, "Do you feel it?" I hadn't till then. But the room suddenly seemed vibrant and charged. He closed his eyes, and I wondered if he would faint, but he didn't. He came out of it. Said his head was beginning to hurt, but finished his supper. He didn't want to talk about it, as always.'

September twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji slept well. "I had to. I was tired," he said. We each quite liked the duvets; eiderdowns in a duvet-case instead of sheets with blankets. The first time we've slept under those. It was a scurry, but we reached the Strahlern Klinik Janker'—that's the name of it—'by 9 a.m., and waited a bit. "We needn't have hurried," he said. We observed the people, and I heard German spoken musically instead of the singsong rendering of Swiss-German. Then, suddenly, Dr. Scheef was there, come to greet us and show the winding way to his office. I had written a memorandum for each of us, the list of past and present ailments. He went over Krishnaji's first, and then Krishnaji was taken off to have tests. Dr. Scheef had telephoned Dr. Randsberg, a friend of Dr. Wolf in Munich, to see if he'd been able to get from Mrs. Wolf'—Dr. Wolf had died in the meantime—'our records, but the story from Wolf's lawyer in Miami is that a hurricane destroyed them. I spoke to Randsberg about the anti-migraine tablets, "anti-uric acid" as Wolf described them to me, and it seems they are made in New York, and he will get them for me, from a Dr. Chapman. Dr. Scheef then went over my history, looked at my leg, and took me to Dr. Hoffa who, I think, is the head of the clinic. Scheef said sympathectomy is not very satisfactory.' I've had one. They do nothing. Anyway. 'I then had a pressure test to measure the blood flow in both legs. I gathered from their conversation in German that Scheef and Hoffa admired the technique of the skin graft by Dr. Timothy Miller, and they knew of Dr. Wylie Barker—those were the two UCLA hospital doctors when I had the skin graft. "We have a book of his," Scheef said. Scheef told me that Krishnaji has clear sinuses, but a bit of emphysema, which is normal for his age. And tomorrow, after the results of all the tests are in, we will meet at noon to learn of the results.'

'Krishnaji and I walked back to the hotel at 11 a.m., rested, and lunched. During lunch, he said, "It isn't superstition, but I think I know what it was last night. Nobody knows this person here, except a few nuts, and it's like the jewels[7] (in the foundation of house), it is to bring about an atmosphere." I asked if he meant that this something and his presence would have the effect, and he nodded.'

S: Of bringing about an atmosphere?

M: Yes.

September twenty-ninth. 'We decided Krishnaji should allow one-and-a-half hours to dress, as again he was hurried and was late, though up early, and our appointment with Scheef was only at noon. Krishnaji's X-rays showed clear head, sinuses, and only slight emphysema in the lung, "fantastically little for a man his age," said Scheef. He gave him experimental pills, not on the market, to reduce mucus.[8] He could only spare one box. He upped Krishnaji's dosage of enzymes to two tablets weekly, but for one week a month, two tablets a day. Gave him a strong emulsion of vitamin E to take until it's used up, and then resume 675 units daily. For me, he doubled the dose of vitamin E to one gram a day and said, continue two tablets of enzymes every two weeks, but for one week each month, also take three enzymes daily. He would like to see us again next summer to compare our conditions after this medication. I paid the bill, which was $152 for Krishnaji, and $40 for me, way-oh-way below U.S. bills. We lunched, and Krishnaji said he realizes here how much he can rest in a place where no one knows him. He spoke of going to France, somewhere in the country, for a week or two. He can't rest at Brockwood—too many people. We rested then, and walked to look at the Rhine and came back to supper in our rooms.'

September thirtieth. 'We left the Hotel Bristol in Bonn in a taxi, and reached the Cologne/Bonn airport by 10:30 a.m. The Lufthansa flight was held up by the Heathrow air traffic slow-down, and we got off over four hours late. We had a lunch of cheese at the airport before leaving, and arrived at Heathrow, where Dorothy and Doris were patiently waiting to meet us. Heathrow was stacked with waiting people. We got back to Brockwood by 7 p.m. Carol and Joe have had a baby boy.' He was born in Winchester?

S: Yes, in Winchester.

M: Now there's nothing of note until October second, when Krishnaji talked to the school and guests. And then again nothing much until October fourth. 'A cassette from Bud arrived bringing news up-to-date. Krishnaji spoke alone to students, and we walked in the afternoon. In the evening, Bud and Francis and Mitchell Booth'—that's the family lawyer—'telephoned from New York about papers Mitch needs for Mother's will and which I am to sign, but which have not yet arrived here. He will send duplicates, etcetera. Bud and Lisa are going this week to Paris, then to Tehran at the invitation of the Empress of Iran. They will be back in New York before I arrive, and Bud will come with me to the Vineyard on the thirty-first so I can see both Wooge and him at the same time.'

October fifth, 'Krishnaji was feeling "far away," had a faraway look, and a meditative feeling, but a dentist appointment compelled our going to London. We took the 10:20 a.m. train. He came with me to Hillier's where I fitted trousers, then he had the same at Huntsman. We lunched with Mary at Fortnum's. Joe came by and drove us to Portland Place and the dentist, Mr. Thompson. Krishnaji had his dental work. More is planned in the spring on his return. We eventually caught a taxi to Waterloo, browsed through paperbacks and magazines, and came back to Brockwood by 6 p.m. Krishnaji is still feeling far away. We had told Mary about the Bonn trip, and both of us feel good effects from the medication. Krishnaji's bronchial problems are much less. My leg feels more alive, and I feel more energy.'

The next day, Krishnaji talked to the school. And again not much until October eighth, 'Maurice Wilkins stays in the West Wing overnight. Krishnaji remained in bed resting. I went to a 4:30 p.m. staff meeting. Bud telephoned from Paris. He and Lisa go to Iran on Tuesday.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji talked to the school, and he saw Alan Rowlands for an interview after lunch. We walked in the afternoon. Helen Brew'—do you remember her?

S: I do indeed. [Laughs.]

M: 'She talked to me all through supper about Krishnaji and R. D. Laing meeting and filming a dialogue between them.'

October tenth. 'Krishnaji stayed in bed. I got a letter from Amanda; Miranda has a TV news job in Eugene, Oregon. I worked at the desk most of the day. At 4:30 p.m., I attended a school meeting. Photos from Erna arrived of the walls going up for the Ojai house.'

October eleventh. 'Krishnaji talked to the students in the morning. I took a 9:20 a.m. train to London. I had legal papers sent by Mitchell Booth about Mother's will notarized at the U.S. consulate. I shopped for Krishnaji's presents to people in India. Then I met Paul Anstee at his shop in Prince's Arcade and lunched with him at the Cavendish Hotel. I asked him for suggestions for the Ojai living room. Then I bought cheese and miscellaneous things for Krishnaji, and came back.'

The next day, 'I met Mary L. at the Petersfield Station at noon. She lunched with us and spent the afternoon at Brockwood.'

October thirteenth. 'Krishnaji talked to the school. Ginny Travers came in time for lunch after car trouble. I took a nap after she left. Then Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked, but not too far as Krishnaji gets tired after a talk.'

The next day, ‘Krishnaji and I to London. He had Huntsman fitting, and then we lunched at Fortnum’s and bought a quartz watch for Dr. Parchure and a sweater for Pupul, also books and cheese. At supper, Krishnaji had a stomach ache, which passed after Perrier and Nux Vomica. The Marogers are here to stay the weekend in the West Wing spare room.’

October fifteenth, ‘Krishnaji spoke to the staff and both Marogers, who also came on the walk.’

October sixteenth, ‘I met Mrs. Billimoria at Petersfield. She came for Krishnaji’s talk to the school and for lunch. The Hammonds were also at lunch. Krishnaji spoke with the Marogers after lunch and then with Mrs. Pinky Martini’—whoever that is. ‘Krishnaji and I took a short walk in the grove.’

There’s really nothing the next day.

October eighteenth. ‘Krishnaji spoke alone with the students in the morning. News came early that a German commando team captured the Lufthansa plane hijacked last Thursday, which was in Somalia. All the passengers were saved. Three hijackers were killed, and a woman wounded. In the evening news there was a report that the Baader-Meinhof gang and two others in jail committed suicide. The fate of the kidnapped Hanns Martin Schleyer is still unknown. In talking these last days about this horror, Krishnaji has said the Germans should do what the Israelis did at Entebbe. And they have.’

S: I think we’re running out of tape here.

M: Yes? Then we stop.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] The 1920s.

[2] Stichting Krishnamurti Nederland is the name of the Krishnamurti committee in Holland.

[3] Francis McAdoo was the son of Wooge, so the step-brother of Mary and Bud.

[4] Elmholm was the name of Mary’s mother’s house on Martha’s Vineyard.

[5] Kathy Forbes, a Brockwood staff member who was close to Mary from 1977 until the end of Mary’s life. This interview with Mary took place on July 22, 2004; so Kathy would have told her this around the end of June of that year.

[6] By this time, Brockwood had established the practice of having the new students come to the school a couple of days before the returning students, ensuring all the new students became well known to the staff and to each other before the rush of returning students.

[7] This will be discussed more toward the end of Krishnaji's life as, at that time, he had me assemble the nine gems needed, and which he "charged" so they could be put into the foundation of the new Krishnamurti Centre we were about to start building. He did the same thing for the rebuilding of Pine Cottage.

[8] I believe these are what Krishnaji called "the magic pink pills" and which gave him greater relief from hay-fever than anything else. He continued to get this from Dr. Scheef for the rest of his life.

Issue 49: October 19, 1977 to February 19, 1978

As Mary had become increasingly candid over the years of her reading and discussing her diaries with me, we see more clearly now what the nature of Mary's existence was when Krishnaji was gone for those several months to India.

The new house in Ojai is being built, and when Krishnaji gets back from India, he gets his first glimpse of it. Simultaneously, the land around the Malibu house is unstable. It seems almost as if nature is conspiring to help Mary break her emotional ties to the place she had lived in longer than any other in her life.

Mary: So we begin on October nineteenth, 1977. 'I went to London alone, to the Italian consulate for Krishnaji's visa. It was refused as his present passport expires on November sixteenth. I telephoned this to Krishnaji from my hairdresser. Then, I went to Paul Anstee's to go over plans for the Ojai living room. He had prepared suggestions of furniture arrangements for the living room in Ojai.' I thought he could get me some materials for Ojai, and he also told of that green lamp he saw in a sale. He thought it would go well in the living room, which it has. Krishnaji rang me via Dorothy at Anstee's to say he probably wouldn't go to Rome this year. Anstee then drove me to Jermyn Street and I went to fetch the watch that Krishnaji is getting for Dr. Parchure.' Do you remember the one he wanted to give him?

Scott: Yes. The Seiko. [Chuckles.]

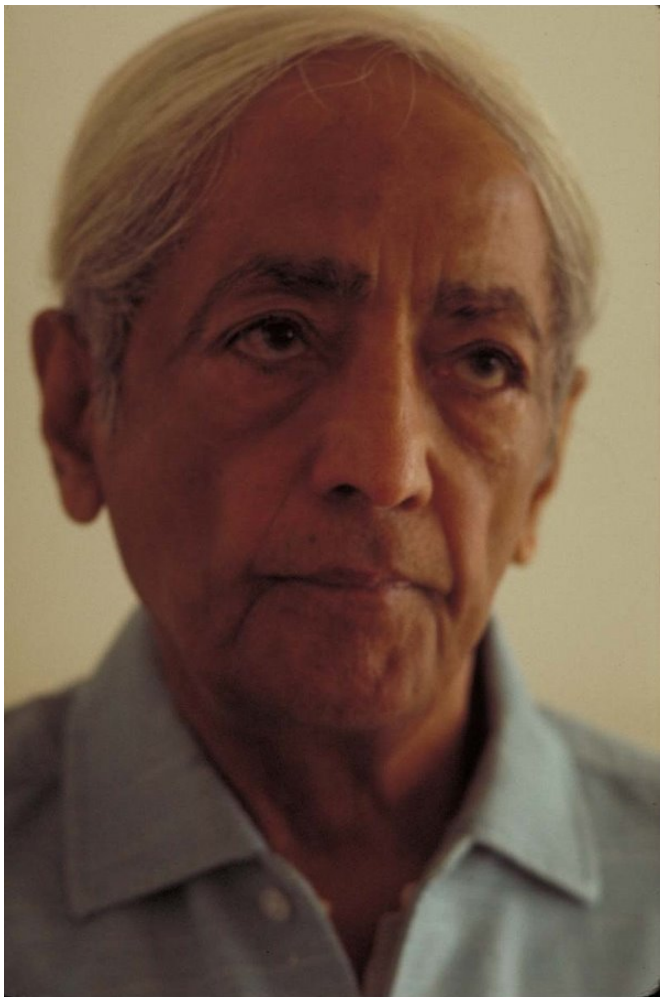
M: Right. 'I caught the 4:50 p.m. train from Waterloo. Krishnaji and I had supper on trays. News came on the BBC of the body of Hanns-Martin Schleyer found in the boot of a car in Mulhouse, France; shot in the head.' That was…

S: The German kidnapped by the Baader-Meinhof group.

M: Yes. Goodness.



October twenty. 'I telephoned the Indian High Commission about a new passport. It takes a week. Krishnaji decided not to go to Italy, as he doesn't want me to go alone. Too much disorder—German offices being attacked by leftists all over Italy, etcetera. I re-booked our flights to originate from London.'

S: Ah…so, you were going to go to India that year?

M: I don't think so. 'I on TWA from London to NY on the thirtieth, and Krishnaji London to Bombay on November first. His Air India flight will stop in Rome for one hour, and Vanda can see him then. At 11 a.m. there was a trustee meeting, about budgets for the office and for Brockwood. Dorothy gave the financial accounts for the last year. We cleared about 9,000 pounds sterling on the gathering. Krishnaji came in at noon, and after lunch, also sat in till 5 p.m. He asked what Brockwood is to do about children of staff.' You remember all that debate? [Laughs.]

S: Oh, yes! Very much so.

Krishnaji – A portrait (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: '"What do we do with staff having babies?" Krishnaji asked. Do we incorporate them in the school? This took hours. In the end, he said he will raise it at a staff meeting, asking what it can mean for Brockwood, their responsibility in this, etcetera. Also, he spoke about an adult discussions meeting for two weeks.'

'It was gray and darkish when we finally went for a walk. Frances McCann was invited to come and take photos.'

'In the evening I telephoned Vanda about our not coming to Rome. She will see Krishnaji at the one-hour stopover of the Air India flight. I also told her about the Bonn doctor's report. I then telephoned Filomena. Her voice touched me so deeply I wish I could rescue her from the pain, privation of her present days.' She was back with her family, and she had arthritis unpleasantly…

S: Oh.

M: 'The privation of her present days, humanly and otherwise. I think about lifting her magically to Malibu and surrounding her with the company of the Dunnes and me, making her smile, and banishing her physical pains. This is all fantasy. All I have done is remove my visit to which she looked forward. I think of her with a great sense of love.'

She was a wonderful woman, wonderful.

S: Yes. You've often spoken of her with such affection.

M: A dear one, she gave her life to my aunt Dorothy, but also my family was more her family than her family was.

S: Yes.

M: And she'd left her children and family and everything to be with Dorothy all those years. Dorothy was as dependent on her as a child would've been. [S chuckles.] And when eventually Dorothy died, everybody wanted to employ Filomena, all of Dorothy's friends. She was the greatest—well, it sounds silly in this day and age—but she was the greatest lady's maid. She knew everything needed—she packed, and in those days, women like that traveled with steamer trunks of clothes that had to be kept and pressed, and there were endless, endless details, and Filomena was an expert. Perfection, and everyone wanted her, all Dorothy's friends. She chose to come to Sam and me because apart from my being close to her, we lived in the countryside, and all those years of traveling with Dorothy, her heart was really in gardens and raising vegetables and flowers and all that. [S chuckles.] And so, she came to Malibu, and she worked in the garden as much as the house. I mean, I had someone do the heavy work…

S: Of course.

M: But it was her pleasure to do that.

S: How nice, how very nice. You told me once also that she did whitening of linen with ashes, wood ash.

M: She ran Villa Madama with an iron thumb, where Dorothy had this extraordinary house. The linen, the washing, the laundry…

S: Yes.

M: …and she had other people who did it, but she oversaw them do it. Yes, you took …how did it go? …the ashes…

S: The wood ash.

M: …the wood ash from the fireplaces, and you boiled it or something, and strained it and used that as bleach for the linen. That was the old-fashioned Italian way to do it.

S: Extraordinary.

M: That's the way it was done. Anyway, she was a dear and wonderful woman.

S: Yes, yes.

M: October twenty-first. 'Krishnaji and I took the 10:20 a.m. train to London. On the train, he said, "The day you were in town, Wednesday, there were hardly any people"'—at lunch—'"about twenty. And I was sitting there looking out of the window. A couple…"'

S: This would've been at Brockwood?

M: It's at Brockwood. '"…a couple of the students were watching me, but I was looking out the window. I suddenly had the feeling that the body was very holy. It has continued since. I never felt that before."' [S chuckles.] 'We were forty-five minutes in the taxi queue at Waterloo because of the demonstration of taxis in White Hall for higher fees. An ancient gentleman in the queue chatted with Krishnaji and me, and we shared a cab when we finally got one. Krishnaji sprang for the jump seat, saying "Je vous en prie. I am younger than you."' [Both laugh.]

'We got off at Huntsman. Krishnaji fitted again and I went around the corner to Hillier's for the new trousers delivered this morning, which are a little bit big in the waist. We then walked in the rain to Fortnum's, where Mary L. lunched with us. She delivered to her publisher this morning her book about her grandfather, Lord Lytton, when he was viceroy of India. Next, she will edit the Krishnaji/Bohm/Shainberg video discussions into a book. She said that when she does volume two of Krishnaji's biography, she will go to India again. While Krishnaji went to the bathroom, we talked about his not going to Italy—really best for Krishnaji. It is tiring, etcetera, and something made me tell her of the incomprehensible thing that Vanda told me this summer—her taking Krishnaji in the early 1960s to a doctor in Geneva who told Vanda that Krishnaji might have cancer of prostrate and that she never told Krishnaji. Mary said she felt what I felt, as though the blood had drained out of her body at such a story. Krishnaji went to Truefitt for a haircut, and I sent a case of wine to Paul Anstee, who will not let me make his advice a business matter. Krishnaji and I went looking for face oil to take to India, which we found at Fenwick. We searched and found a taxi, and so to Waterloo and the 4:20 p.m. train to Petersfield. Bud telephoned from Paris in the evening; he and Lisa are back from Tehran and fly to New York tomorrow.'

October twenty-second. 'Dr. R. D. Laing, and his wife, and three nice children came to lunch. He sat next to Krishnaji, and afterward, Krishnaji, Laing, and Bohm talked for an hour and a half in the drawing room. I served coffee and then left in spite of Krishnaji saying I should stay, as I was trying to prevent Mrs. Laing and possible child coming in.'

S: Right. So, you were out there running interference?

M: Yes.

S: Was that the first time R. D. Laing and Krishnaji met?

M: I think so, but I'm not sure.

S: I know he came again, because I remember I sat with him at lunch.

M: Well, we'll see what is revealed. 'After, Krishnaji said Laing "had never thought about these things," but that he was intelligent and listened. Helen Brew is hoping this meeting might result next year in a filmed dialogue that she would produce. We will see. Nothing was said about this with Laing and Krishnaji today, and I have made no commitment to Helen Brew. It will or won't develop later. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked in the late afternoon. The smell of leaves in autumn moves me so much; it seems to stir some vanished remembrance.'

The twenty-third. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school and guests. Then, Alan Hammick, brother of Huntsman's Mr. Hammick, arranged by Lintott, came to lunch.'

S: Ah!

M: Yes. He was, I forget—he did either the trousers or the jackets or something.

S: Yes. Mr. Lintott, I remember him.

M: Mr. Lintott was a nice man.

S: Yes.

M: 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.'

October twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji received a letter this morning from Indira Gandhi written on the twenty-first of June and sent "sea mail."' [Both laugh.] You'd think the prime minister…

S: …could afford an air mail stamp.

M: …exactly. Well, thrifty, she must've been, or her secretary, or whoever. 'This must be the one she told Pupul that Krishnaji had not replied to. It was an indignant, and put-upon letter, listing terrible accusations against her son Sanjay. He is taking it to show Pupul but today he dictated a short letter saying he had received it and was coming to India and perhaps they may meet.'

'I put the Mercedes in winter storage in the garage.'

The next day it just says that 'Krishnaji talked to the students, and I worked at the desk.' And the day after there's even less.

October twenty-seventh, 'I went to Winchester for a cardigan that Krishnaji wants to wear on the plane. As the Mercedes is in storage for the winter, I went in Doris's mini. At lunch, Krishnaji talked briefly with a young Yorkshire man who had come all the way on his bike to see Krishnaji. He arrived yesterday, and was crushed when he was told that Krishnaji was not seeing people. Krishnaji was also in bed all day yesterday. But today, the young man, Paul Mitchell, sat at Krishnaji's table and afterward, Krishnaji talked to him in Dorothy's office. Dorothy is ill with a violent reaction to a cholera shot[1]. Krishnaji and I took Whisper across the fields and through the lane. At lunch, Krishnaji said, "My brother and I, when we were here, never saw our shadows. We said 'Let's go where we can see our shadows.'"'

S: It's true, in England, for most of the year, there is only very diffuse light, and with that light, you don't really get shadows.

M: I never thought of that. [Chuckles.] I completely understand that. [Chuckles.]

Now, the next is the twenty-eighth. 'I did packing and desk work. Dorothy is still ill from the cholera shot. Krishnaji and I walked with Whisper. I went back to Winchester for Krishnaji's jersey and some cheese for him to take to India.'

October twenty-ninth. 'I first did desk work and packing, then helped Krishnaji assemble his things for India. He leaves Tuesday next, the first of November, on Air India. The flight stops in Rome, so Vanda will try to see him at the airport. I gave him a letter and cassettes of Brockwood talks and also letters for Filomena, including checks. I hope it will work.'

'At lunch, Krishnaji and David Bohm fell to further talk about the brain registering, and a gleam came into Krishnaji's eyes and he said "I shall have a discussion on it tomorrow." It will be at 11:30 a.m., just when I will be at Heathrow. I said, "Rest." He looked mischievous and said he would do it.' [S chuckles.] 'As I will miss the discussion, George Carnes said he will send me a cassette of it. Later, Krishnaji said, "I want to fix it in my mind, or I will forget it." In meditation, he has seen something about it. In the evening, he said to me, "Register lightly, that's the thing." Dorothy is still in bed, but better. I went and had a talk with her. She leaves for India with Shakuntala and Frances McCann on the twentieth of November. Krishnaji and I took Whisper across the fields and through the lanes. The beauty of the earth and him. I was up late getting every last thing done.'

October thirtieth. 'I was up at 6 a.m., and made a little fire in my fireplace with the last of the basket of wood we have gathered on walks. Krishnaji gave me the back massage he has given since we went to the Bonn clinic, morning and night, to stimulate circulation in the lower back, where the blood supply goes to the leg. It has helped very much. I was packed, and dressed by 7:30 a.m. I made our breakfast and his for Monday and Tuesday of muesli. Then, I said goodbye to most of the staff. I was in tears, with Krishnaji. He said, “Sia benedetta”—be blessed. “An angel goes with you” and more. He came down to see me off, and so did most of the staff. I went in a taxi, seeing Krishnaji in his white dressing gown, his arm in what seemed a blessing. From Heathrow, I took TWA noon flight to New York. I write this on the plane. Krishnaji is talking now in the assembly hall at Brockwood.’

‘(Later.) Bud met me at the airport, and talked all the way to town. We dined in the apartment. Bud gave me Mother’s cabochon ruby ring’—she’d left it to me in her will.

S: I’ve never seen that ring, have I?

M: I gave it to Toodie.[2] ‘In the evening, I talked with him and Lisa, mostly about Toodie and Penebaker troubles.’ Penebaker was Toodie’s husband. ‘They told me about their trip to Iran, and Bud told me about Mother’s last days. I telephoned Amanda, Erna, and Elfriede. Bud and I go tomorrow to the Vineyard. Krishnaji must be asleep in his room at Brockwood. I follow him in my mind and heart.’

October thirty-first. I’m in New York now. ‘I did errands in the morning, including taking Sam’s watch to the Patek agent to be cleaned, etcetera. Bud, Lisa, and I lunched at the apartment. Then, Bud and I took an Eastern shuttle to Boston and then Northeast on a little eight-passenger plane across to the Vineyard. My cousin Lorna met us. We went to Elmholm to see Wooge. Bud and I dined with him, but I am staying with Bud in his cottage.’ My brother had a cottage across the street.

The first of November. ‘Bud and I met Mr. Cronig at Elmholm about the inventory appraisal of Mother’s furniture…’ Well, you don’t want all this. ‘Wooge and I went to the graves and chose a stone to be for both Mother and his grave, a simple granite footstone. In the afternoon, I went to the village with Bud, and then my cousin Lorna came to the cottage, and we gave her Mother’s gold matching toilet articles, and her pearl necklace, gold watch, and furs. She was pleased. Bud, Wooge, and I went to Menemsha’—do you know, that little fishing village up the island?

S: Yes, yes.

M: ‘Lorna came over for supper to Elmholm. I made an appointment with Mitchell Booth next Sunday to discuss my agreement with KFA about my buying the Ojai land. I spoke to John Rubel’—oh, that’s again an architect—‘about the KFA office roofing. Krishnaji was to have left London at 10:15 a.m. on Air India, stopping in Rome, where Vanda may have seen him, and then gone to Bombay, arriving at 4 a.m. their time, November second, ten-and-a-half hours earlier than here.’

Staff and students saying good-bye to Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimablist)

S: Just briefly, who owns Elmholm now?

M: Mother left it to Wooge's younger daughter because Bud had a house up-island and I was never going to live at the Vineyard again. I had my house in California.

S: Sure, sure.

M: And so she left it to Sally McAdoo Coy, and Sally's there right now, as a matter of fact.

S: Mm, hm.

M: November second, my diary says, 'Krishnaji should have arrived in Bombay at four this morning. I talked to Bud most of the morning. I took him to the airport at 1 p.m. He returned to New York. I lunched with Wooge, and spent a couple of hours with Lorna. Read to Wooge. Had supper with him. And, again, writing to Krishnaji.'

The third of November. 'Wooge and I took flowers to Mother's grave. Lorna came to supper. I spoke to Philippa in Connecticut.'

The next day, 'I drove Wooge to Chappaquiddick, then did bills for him. In the afternoon, I posted a letter to Krishnaji in Bombay. Lorna came for supper.' Do we want all these things that I did?

S: I think so, yes. We can always cut it out later. I think it's nice because it shows something of the life you were living that included Krishnaji; and somehow, even when he wasn't there, the way you were thinking of him sometimes, and different things that you would do for him.

M: Okay.

November fifth. 'Read to Wooge. Lunched with him, and when he took his nap, I went over to Lorna's and she took me to the airport for a 4:15 p.m. Northeast to Boston. Caught a 5 p.m. shuttle to LaGuardia and so to New York and Bud and Lisa's. The three of us dined and talked.'

November sixth. 'I had a quiet morning. Bud went to a football game with his children. Lisa and I lunched together. At 4 p.m., Bud was back, and Mitchell Booth came to discuss the best way to handle my agreement with KFA about the McAndrew Road property. It's terribly complicated.'

The next day I went by train to visit Philippa and David in New Haven; and the day after that 'it rained five-and-a-half inches, and there were floods.' [Chuckles.] 'Lisa and Bud had to go to Boston by train for Lisa's speech at the Boston Museum. I went with Khen'—oh, that's the…

S: Vietnamese cook.

M: Yes, and who eventually became a third parent to Lindsey. 'I went with Khen to Parent's Day at the Buckley School, Lindsey's class.' Khen and I stood in for family because his parents weren't there. 'I then walked in the rain to an exhibit of Joseph Cornell's boxes.' Joseph Cornell was this strange artist who did these lovely…he would take a box and then, like a doll's house, he'd make a scene in it, but it was very surrealist. He once used a photograph of me from Vogue as part of one of his pieces, and somehow we met and were sort of friendly. 'He had an exhibit of his things at the Whitney Museum. Then, I went to Cooper-Hewitt for a pre-glimpse of the exhibit from the collection opening next week. Toodie'—that's my niece—'had supper with me. She may come to Los Angeles at the end of the month. She stayed for the night.'

November ninth. 'The rainstorm is over, so Bud and Lisa were able to get back from Boston on the shuttle. I left for JFK at 9 a.m., and took a TWA at 11 a.m. for Los Angeles. Amanda met me at the airport. Malibu never looked more beautiful. I had supper with Amanda and Phil.'

The next day, 'I left early in the green Mercedes for Ojai. The cottage is astonishingly advanced. I met Max Falk, the builder, and Bart Phelps, the architect. I spent the day conferring with them, and talking to Erna and Theo, who leave next Tuesday for India. I had supper at Arya Vihara, then spent the night in guestrooms above the office.' What is now the lower flat was an office in those days.

S: Right, right.

M: November eleventh. 'Ojai is beautiful in its early silent morning. I spent most of the day with Erna, being checked out on things to be done in her absence. I answered messages, including a message from Mrs. Vigeveno requesting I call her. She had nothing to say.' [Chuckles.] 'Then I went with Erna and Theo to parent-teacher meeting, in the Pavilion, moderated by Fritz. Then I drove back to Malibu.'

November twelfth. 'In the morning, I found a letter from Krishnaji in a pile written at Brockwood on November first. His Air India flight was postponed for nine hours, so he returned to Brockwood from the airport, went back to bed, had an oil bath, lunch, and a nap. He wrote to me just before leaving again for Heathrow. I went to the Dunnes' in the afternoon.'

The next day, 'I was home all day. Some people came about possibly buying the house. I talked to Lou Blau about the KFA agreement.'

On November fourteenth. 'There was a cable from Krishnaji sent on the eleventh, saying he was leaving that day for Rishi Valley. His program is changed. He's to speak in Bombay later. I was in all day working at the desk.'

S: Krishnaji telegrammed you on the eleventh, and you didn't get it till the fourteenth? That's quite a bit of time, isn't it?

M: Yes. It is. [Chuckles.] I didn't notice it when reading it.

S: Anyway, yes. Just something of note.

M: Telegrams don't exist anymore. You don't think about telegrams.

S: No. But it should've been there in a day or two.

M: Well, yes, it should have; but from India, who knows.

S: Well, that's just it. That's part of what you were living with.

M: November fifteenth. 'I went to the airport to meet Erna and give her a letter for Krishnaji, and see her and Theo off to India. I then met Bart Phelps at the Pacific Design Center and looked for door knobs for the house.'

The next day, 'I went to the hairdresser for a haircut. At 11:30 a.m., to Henry Bamberger'—my accountant—'then did errands. I was home by 3 p.m. There was a letter from Filomena; she had received mine, carried by Krishnaji and given to Vanda who gave it to her. Vanda evidently was able to see Krishnaji in transit.'

The next morning, 'I went to Ojai, and did office things and building things. I spent the night in the guestroom over the office.'

On November eighteenth. 'I met Bart Phelps, and Mr. Weingarten'—he's the man who put the hi-fi system in—'then a TV man, a telephone man, an electrician, etcetera. At 4 p.m., I went to the Pavilion for another parent-teacher meeting, moderated by Fritz, and again spent the night in Ojai.'

The next day, 'I did office work in Ojai. At 2 p.m., I went to a discussion outside the Pavilion, with Fritz conducting it. I got a letter from Sunanda saying the heat in Madras made Krishnaji go on to Rishi Valley. There was also a letter from Ahalya saying that Tapas died, October twenty-ninth.' Then, it says down below: 'President Sadat of Egypt came to Israel.'

There was really nothing the next day.

On November twenty-first, 'I received the first letter of the year from Krishnaji written in India from November third to the ninth, and sent from Bombay. The heat there bothered him. He saw Mrs. Gandhi. I worked at the desk all day. Mr. Schwartz came with carpet samples. I talked to Miranda in Eugene, Oregon.' Miranda had a job as a newsperson on television.

Then nothing about Krishnaji or the KFA until November twenty-fifth. 'It was very hot and at 8 a.m. I left for Ojai. There I met a man about burglar alarms, and Mr. Schwartz about curtains and rugs. Then I worked on mailings. At 4 p.m. I went to Fritz's parent-teacher discussion. I had supper at Arya Vihara, and spent the night in a guest flat.'

The next day, 'I did mailing envelopes all morning with Ruth Tettemer. At 2 p.m., I again went to Fritz's discussion next to the Pavilion. When I returned to Malibu, Krishnaji's letter number 2 from India sent from Rishi Valley, was there.'

S: Would you like to say something about the numbering of letters?

M: Alright. Well, because of uncertainties of mail, especially in India, we had agreed to both date, actual date, and number the letters; so most of his letters, and I presume mine too, followed that pattern.

S: So that would've have meant that the second letter he sent you that year was number two?

M: Yes.

S: Right. I just wanted this on the record.

M: Good. November twenty-eighth. 'I was home all day. Mr. Schwartz brought more carpet samples, and I ordered for Ojai. Also, I ordered Indian cotton for sofas.'

The next day, 'The wind stopped. I had lunch with the Dunnes. George Duff and family—that's Amanda's brother—were there to see Tally and Willy at their beach house.' Tally and Willy, that's William Wyler, the director and his wife, who were long-time friends of ours, and they had a beach house.'

November thirtieth. 'I went to Ojai, arriving by 9:30 a.m. I met Charles Moore and Bart Phelps. We went over everything, and also went over all cabinets with the cabinet maker. Charles stayed for lunch, and Bart was there all day. The painter did samples of the English "magnolia" color.' I brought back a tin of that from England as I wanted the outside of the house to have that. 'I had supper at Arya Vihara, and again spent the night in the guest flat.'

December first. 'I did things in the KFA office, then drove to Santa Barbara to look at marble. They had nothing. And then to the cabinet maker to finish checking all the dimensions, etcetera. Then I drove home to Malibu.'

December second. 'I went to town'—that always means Los Angeles or Santa Monica—'on errands. I looked at appliances for Ojai and bought cotton yardage for the Ojai bathroom curtains. Then tea with Evelyne and I gave her the notes on her compilation of Krishnaji's writings on meditation for a small book. I came home with a migraine. Tired.'

Then, again, there's nothing about Krishnaji or the KFA until December ninth. 'I went to Ojai. I talked to Carl Marcus about his donation to KFA. Then I did office and house things. Went to Fritz's parent-teacher discussion. Spent the night in the guestroom.'

The tenth of December. 'I cleaned the flat. Toodie came for lunch and brought a friend. Then we went to a concert of baroque music in the Pavilion. I signed the Sandler contract'—that's the real estate representative—'brought by Evelyne from Lou about the sale and handling of the Malibu house. I came home to supper. Waiting for me was letter number three from Krishnaji in Rishi Valley.'

Then again nothing until December thirteenth. 'Today, Krishnaji goes from Rishi Valley to Madras. I did desk work. Philippa and David arrived for the holidays. I went over at 4 p.m. and had an early supper with them all.'

The fourteenth. 'I went to Ojai. Went over things with Bart Phelps and Max Falk. The marks on the beams are not obscured by "pickling," so I decided to have them painted white. We discussed drawers in the buffet, fire screens, and lighting. Charles Moore was supposed to come, but couldn't. I spent the night again in the flat.'

December fifteenth. 'There was a meeting at noon with architect Ron Gammel and Mr. Meyers of his office. Max Falk, Ruth Tettemer, Mark Lee, and Ted Cartee were there about the Falk bid on the Oak Grove School office building. That continued in the afternoon. I came back to Malibu in time for supper. A cable had come from Krishnaji in Madras; he has had no letter in three weeks, am I alright? I cabled him back.'

Editor's Note: These seem almost "throwaway" lines, but there was real concern here. The postal service in India was absolutely unreliable. In both Krishnaji's letters to Mary, and hers to him, there is often worry because they would go for weeks without hearing from each other; and they both knew that each was writing to the other every day and posting off the accumulated writing at least once a week. What each was most concerned with was that they hadn't heard from the other person because the other person was unwell or injured. Letters, also, just went missing, which they could tell from their numbering system, but again, they wouldn't know that until the next numbered letter arrived.

Then again nothing until December seventeenth. 'I went to the airport to fetch curtain material for Krishnaji's room in the new house, sent from London.' That would've been Paul Anstee's helping me.

December nineteenth. 'Wind in Malibu. To Ojai where there was no wind.' Wind was always a factor because of the fire danger.

S: Right.

M: 'I went over things with Bart Phelps. Charles Moore came in the afternoon. I stayed on to discuss with Mark, Ted, and Max the reduced bid on the school office and resident's building. Max's figure is now $300,000. But there is only $270,000 in our budget—inflation. I left at 6:30 p.m., and came home to Malibu.'

Then not much until the twenty-first. 'Bart Phelps and two architect friends came by with a sample of lighting fixtures for the hall. Bart is going to teach for a semester in Texas. John Rubel'—that's another architect in the office—'replaces him on the job. I worked at the desk all day.'

The next day, 'I spoke to Scott Forbes in Massachusetts about video equipment for India.' Do you remember that?

S: I most certainly do. I collected all money for that equipment. Bought it. Then I took it to India and trained people how to use it, but I had to keep going back to India about every other year to retrain and service the equipment.

M: [chuckles] 'I drove Amanda, Phil, Philippa, and David to Ojai to see the house. We had a picnic lunch on the guest house terrace. On the way back we stopped off Hueneme Road to see birds: egrets, and many hawks. When I got home, there was letter number four from Krishnaji, written November thirtieth to December tenth in Rishi Valley.'

December twenty-third. 'There was a cable from Krishnaji in Madras about a cable received from Rajagopal asking, "Does it mean anything?" I replied by cable. I started cooking for Christmas Eve.' Oh, yes, Christmas Eve. I always made…

S: The bean stew.

M: Yes, the bean stew for vegetarians, and what the Dunne children, when small, used to call the Christmas mouse! It was a mousse. [S laughs.] Out of, um, what's the cookbook?

S: Julia Child's?

M: Julia Child's cookbook. There's a wonderful recipe in that for chocolate mousse. There's a little bit of coffee in it and other things. 'I spoke to Blanche Mathias, and spoke to Mary and Joe Links.'

December twenty-fourth. 'I cooked to Handel's Messiah!' [Both chuckle] I used to like, when I did a big cooking, to play music to fill the house. 'Amanda, Phil, Philippa, David, and Betsy came to Christmas Eve dinner. We ate at 6 p.m., and opened presents afterward. Another happy Christmas evening in this blessed house.' We've always celebrated either on Christmas Eve or Day, and not both. So, it was Eve for that year.

December twenty-seventh. 'I sold all the Greyhound Bus shares, then went to town, had a haircut, and took a present to Winky. When I got home there was a letter from Krishnaji dictated on the seventeenth. He had flu in Madras. His temperature went up to 102, but it was now normal. He wrote to Dr. Scheef that the bronchitis pill had helped a lot. There was also a letter from Erna saying that she and Theo had the flu as well; the three-day type. The students at Rishi Valley had it, teachers too, and Dorothy.' Everybody got the flu.

S: Now, before going on, I think we ought to just stop. I don't know if it's on earlier tapes or not, but could you mention about Krishnaji waving at the Greyhound buses?

M: [both laugh] I'd forgotten that. [Laughs more.] This reminds me because somewhere in all this…Greyhound was a large investment of mine and Greyhound got taken over by Armor & Company.

S: No, that's another story.

M: Have I told that story?

S: I don't think…I don't know if you've told that or not.

M: Well, I was horrified because…

S: Armor meat.

M: Armor is not good for a vegetarian to own; it's immoral. And I was puzzled because this was a large investment, and somehow Krishnaji got wind of this, and he said, "Don't mix up these things."

S: Yes. I was going to ask you about that story second because that's important, too. I think, as I remember your telling me the story, he said something like: Keep these things separate.

M: Something like that.

S: Yes.

M: In other words, he didn't think it was an issue. [Chuckles.]

S: Right. But there is also the story that every time you passed a Greyhound bus when you were driving…

M: Yes.

S: … Krishnaji would wave to the bus. [Laughs.]

M: Yes, because by that time he knew about my investment, which I'd never discussed with him. I'd forgotten that! [Both laugh heartily.]

S: Yes, okay.

M: December twenty-ninth. 'A pipe broke in the upper terrace under the eucalyptus trees. I got Mr. Carlson'—he was the builder—'and a plumber to stop it.' This is the beginning of why I didn't get any profit from the house because suddenly, the earth on my side of the canyon started slipping, and it delayed endlessly selling the place. 'Philippa and David came over for coffee as they return to Connecticut tomorrow. I then worked at the desk.'

The next day. 'I went early to Ojai, met an auditor, Cliff Hey, and went into the KFA safe deposit box for inventory. Then back to the cottage to go over various things with Max. I lunched at Arya Vihara and left for Malibu at 3 p.m. Carson'—the builder in Malibu—'had put a new pipe under the driveway to connect the sprinkling system along the drive by the gate.'

December thirty-first. 'I was home all day, mostly doing desk work. Had supper alone. Read. Then late I listened to a Krishnaji tape, and so I ended the year and began 1978—listening to him.'

Then there's really nothing for our purposes until January fourth. 'Charles Moore came in the morning for coffee and to look at ocean stones in the Japanese garden for use in Ojai.' You can look out the window and see them out there.

S: Right. Yes. They're the deeply grooved stones.

M: Yes. They were in up at Trancas Beach. A friend of Sam and me, Sidney Franklin, the director, had a piece of land there, and at some point, a big storm washed the sand away and uncovered these big gray stones that were raked by the sand going back and forth and back and forth, who knows how long. And he found them so beautiful that he got some workman to fish them out of the ocean, and at one point, I saw them and admired them and he gave me some. And I had them in Malibu in a little Japanese sort-of garden out front, and then I brought them with me here to Ojai. They're like statues to me.

S: Yes. They're very unusual. Yes.

M: 'Rajagopal telephoned. I don't know how he got my number. He wanted me to know he had "no ulterior motive in calling, just wished happy new year as he had always loved me" since years ago.' He was the most dishonest human being. He would pretend to love Krishnaji, love me, love everybody, but everybody was mean to him, and he was innocent of everything; and the next time, he was an absolute swine about the way he behaved to all of us.

S: It was a very dysfunctional personality.

M: Well, yes, if you want to put it that way. [Both laugh.]

January sixth. 'I drove to Goleta about Formica for the kitchen in Ojai. Then, continued to Ojai where I first signed onto the waiting list for a P.O. box at the post office. I went to the cottage, and the office. Lunched at Arya Vihara. Fred Kulsa came at 2 p.m. and I gave him some new photos of Krishnaji for book jackets. Kathy Harris and Alasdair from Brockwood came by. The tile man came for the bathrooms. I drove home.'

The next day. 'Fred and Lorry'—Lorry was the gardener and Fred was the husband of Elfriede, the housekeeper—took three of the ocean stones from the Japanese garden in Malibu and got them onto Lorry's truck, which Fred and Elfriede drove to Ojai. Amanda and I went to the county museum. We had a picnic lunch in the car, then to see a recently acquired de La Tour painting and others. And an exhibit of Indian sculpture. We then went to a movie, A Special Day, with Sophia Loren and Mastroianni.' I don't remember it, but I'm sure we enjoyed it.

Then there's nothing of note until January ninth. 'I took the curtain fabric to Mr. Schwartz, and went to Design Research, Magnin, and home. There was a letter waiting for me from Erna. Krishnaji had telegraphed a reply to Rajagopal after receiving my cable. Erna's letter written on the twenty-sixth said that the first and second Madras talks went marvelously well; they were strong, and new. Krishnaji looked well, rested, but has been in bed all the time in Madras.'

Then nothing relevant again until January twelfth. 'I got a cable from Krishnaji saying he will fly from London to Los Angeles on February fifth. I booked his ticket. Later, letter number five came, written before, and then after he had the flu and through December twenty-seventh. He said Rajagopal had telephoned him on the twenty-seventh.'

The next day, 'I drove to Ojai where I did office things and house things. I spent the night there.'

January fourteenth, 'at 2 p.m., I went to Fritz's discussion at the Pavilion, then drove home through the rain.'

The next thing about the Foundation or Krishnaji is January eighteenth, when I note that Krishnaji would have gone from Madras to Bombay.

On the twenty-first, 'I drove to the airport at 8 a.m. to fetch yardage from London sent by Saxby'—that's the decorator who worked with Paul Anstee. 'It's the wrong color blue. Then I drove to Ojai to do some work on the house. Evelyne came to see the house and talked with Mark and me about a benefit concert for the school. We went to Fritz's discussion next to the Pavilion. I drove home and went early to sleep. Krishnaji must've given his first talk in Bombay today.'

On January twenty-fourth, 'Letter number six from Krishnaji arrived. It was written in Madras, and took eighteen days to come.'

January twenty-fifth. 'I drove to Oxnard where I left the green Mercedes to have the oil changed, greased, wheels aligned, and miscellaneous adjusted. I took a rental car to Ojai and with John Rubel went over the house matters. Lunched at Arya Vihara, then went with Ted and Mark to Eloise's Barn'—Eloise is the daughter of Evelyne Blau who had horses on the place—'and discussed moving it further back in the field with a cement foundation. Came back to Oxnard, left the rental car, fetched the green Mercedes, and came home.'

On January thirtieth. 'I drove to Ojai where I met Charles Moore and John Rubel, but was home for supper.'

January thirty-first, 'Krishnaji left Bombay early this morning and flew to London. At 11 a.m. here, I telephoned Brockwood and spoke to him. His voice was strong, eager, and full of energy. It was so extraordinary to be talking to him, I forgot to ask him more than "Are you alright? Are you well?" He was and he is. I reminded him that he is now a U.S. resident with his "green card," so he must fill out a customs declaration. He asked me to find the porter who last year said he could go into the customs area and help him with the luggage.' How was I supposed to do that?

S: [laughs] I don't know!

M: [laughs] Till Sunday. 'Exuberance! In mid-morning, some real estate people, including Carla Zimbalist, came to make an offer on the Malibu house.'

S: No relation to Sam?

M: Yes. Niece. This is the first offer I've had. In late afternoon, I talked to Louis Blau about a counteroffer.'

February first. 'I went to town on errands: plants, books for Krishnaji. Then using the Dunnes' VW, I got eight outdoor chairs for Ojai. When I returned home, Krishnaji's letter number seven was there, written in Madras and sent of the fifteenth of January. Later, I went to meet Erna and Theo at the airport from Delhi, via the Pacific.'

On February third, 'I drove to Ojai for house matters, lunched at Arya Vihara, talked to Erna in the afternoon, then drove home.'

February fifth. 'There is a light rain. I drove to the airport well ahead of time.'

I used to think, I must drive carefully, because suppose I have an accident, and I'm not there to meet him. What will he do?

S: Yes. What would he do? [Laughs.]

M: I used to ask him that, "What would you do?" He would say something like, "Oh, I'd be alright. I'd call the Lilliefelts." He didn't have the Lilliefelts' number with him.

S: …[laughs]…or any change for the phone.

M: …exactly, or any change for the phone. I'd put $20 in his…I told you that.

S: Yes…in his passport.

M: Yes, But he never used it. He finally gave it to a barber in Rishi Valley, I think. [S laughs.]

'Krishnaji's TWA flight was on time at 4:15 p.m. I saw him through the glass as he went into customs, smiling and bright. I had found a porter and tipped him $10 to find and help Krishnaji.' [Both chuckle.] 'It is Krishnaji's first arrival on his own with the green card, and all went well. He came out smiling and hugged me in the lift going down to where we had a long wait for his bag. The highly tipped porter never reappeared.' [Both laugh]

In those days, a $10 tip was a very good tip.

S: Yes. He probably just went home. [Both laugh.]

M: 'We drove home through the rain, Krishnaji talking a streak all the way. We had supper on trays in his room. He was full of energy and wanted to tell me everything that had happened since he left for India in November. In spite of getting up early and hours ago in Brockwood, and the long flight, he was not sleepy. We talked for hours, until quite late, about everything, including ourselves. I have the immeasurable happiness of having him here.' Even though he was tired, whenever he came back, even though he'd been up for twenty hours or more he wanted to talk.

February sixth. 'I woke up filled with happiness. It had rained all through the night, 1.60 inches. Krishnaji stayed in bed all day, alternately sleeping and talking. There is a stream of energy in him. He says it began in Rishi Valley as if something had opened in his head. One feels it strongly being with him.'

February seventh. 'We were home all day. Krishnaji resting and talking.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji rested in bed all day. A nun and mother superior of the Franciscan Order next door…' Oh, yes. Some nunnery had bought the adjoining house [chuckles]. '…came to call and discuss their broken pipe, which is pouring water onto my land, and that's making my slide worse. I gave them Carson's name and number for repair.'

February ninth. 'The nun's land is draining onto this side. Elfriede went over and cleared their drains. Then, Carson came with a plumber and put a temporary pipe to divert their rain down their side, luckily, just before the rain began again. Krishnaji slept most of the day. He lunched in bed. I went to the market. It was a wild night of wind and rain. I went out at 1 a.m. with a flashlight to look at the slide and see if it had moved. It looked the same, but the wind was tremendous. Krishnaji followed me out.'

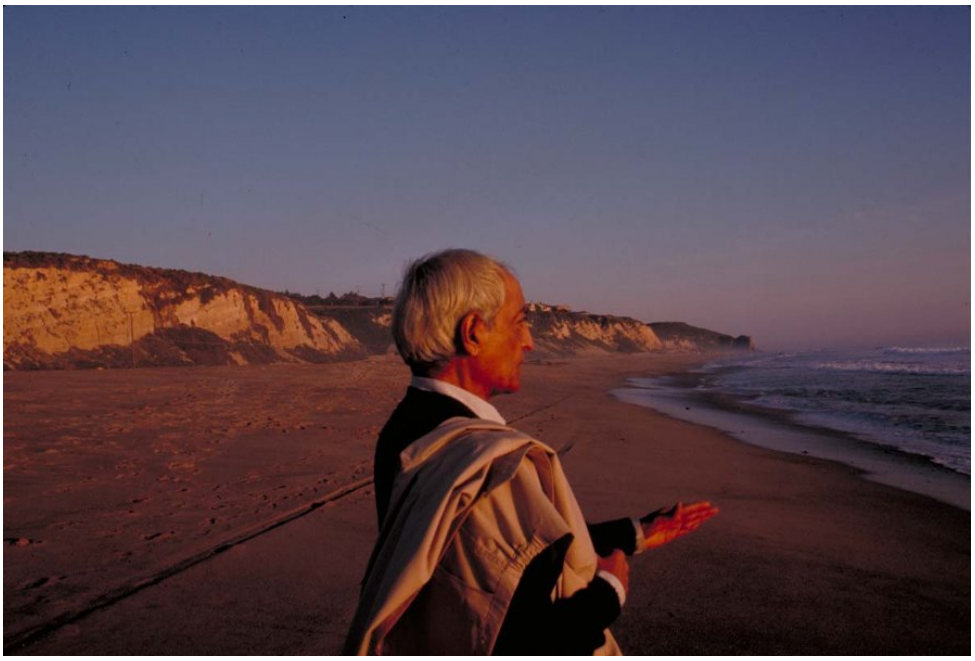
S: Oh.

M: I don't know how he knew I was out; I wouldn't have let him know. 'The sense of the storm seemed to wash over one.'

S: When you mention the slide, you mean actually that the earth is subsiding, sliding down.

M: Yes. It's clay, but when it's wet, it gets like Vaseline, sort of, and it slides.

S: Right. These are the famous mudslides that are all in that area.



M: Yes. You would read about mudslides in California; it's because of that. And unfortunately, my side of the canyon had just that clay. The Dunnes had a lot more rock underneath, and they had no slides. But I had nothing but slides. And it's the reason that I couldn't sell the house for so long. It cost me a lot to try and put pipes to drain it and so forth, and also, people didn't want to buy something where the hill was going to slide.

S: Yes.

M: February tenth, 'The rain has stopped, a total of 16.71 inches; and the wind had shifted to the west. I talked to Erna. Ojai is awash in the storm; bridges are overflowing and uncertain, so Erna and Theo cannot come down to lunch today as planned. There is enormous damage all over southern California. Flash floods swept cars, houses away; washed bodies out of graveyards. A ninety-two-mile-per-hour wind hit Newport.'

The eleventh. 'Bud telephoned from New York. He and Lisa are going to San Francisco on Thursday, then coming here Saturday to Monday. They're buying my half share of Seven Gates left by Mother to both of us, which will help with money needed for the Ojai house.' Mother had bought the land up at Seven Gates[3] but she never did anything with it, and she left it to both of us. Bud and Lisa wanted to build a house on it, and so they bought out my half share. 'Krishnaji and I stayed in all day, resting and reading. The television not working makes for peace and music.'

Walking on the beach in Malibu (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The twelfth. 'I cooked all morning. The Lilliefelts and Mark Lee drove down for lunch. Krishnaji asked us if the schools "are worth it." Mark gave a firm yes, and so did Theo. Erna didn't demur. Krishnaji said they had asked him in India to whom he talked. He said nobody and because he is speaking to nobody, not seeking a result, there is greater energy. It is also evident that if one is nobody, one hears. He asked about Fritz's meetings, but both the Lilliefelts and Mark didn't want to talk about it until Krishnaji has talked to Fritz himself. Erna brought a statement written by Donald Ingram Smith at Rajghat on January twenty-eighth, 1978, recounting a meeting last April with Mrs. Vigeveno and the Blackburns about the archives. It was said that the real archives are in an air-conditioned vault under Rajagopal's house, and that they would remain there until other adequate air-conditioned housing is available. There was no mention of his agreement with KFA and his flouting of it.' You see, he was supposed to share the archives with the KFA.

'There was sun, rain, and hail in town. The deal is off on the sale of the Malibu house.'

Walking on the beach in Malibu (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The next day, 'Birthdays come lightly at this point.[4]' [S chuckles.] 'It rained heavily in the night. Krishnaji and I lunched at home and then went to town, Krishnaji had a checkup with Lailee Bakhtiar. All is well. The results of blood and urine tests will come in a few days. We then went into Westwood for a new electric razor, a Braun. Krishnaji had read an ad in the New Yorker.' [Chuckles.] That was what prompted this. Every year, he had to have a new electric razor.

S: [laughing] I remember.

M: 'There was some rain and hail on the way home. The deal to purchase Malibu is off; the lawyer buyer wants to sell two other houses first. Bud telephoned about my birthday and so did Alain Naudé, just back from London, where he visited Mary and Joe, and Florence, where he stayed with Vanda.'

February fourteenth. 'The weather is clear and beautiful. Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai in his green Mercedes, himself at the wheel, smiling. The skies smiled too; it was a perfect day for his first trip to Ojai, and his first glimpse of the new house. He looked at it, shyly, and met Max Falk. Erna and Theo were there. Radha Burnier also came; she is lecturing at Krotona.[5] Krishnaji looked at everything. "It is stupendous," he said. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Everyone was there to greet Krishnaji. After lunch, he talked alone with Fritz Wilhelm. Then, he came back to the cottage and asked for the removal of the trellis outside his bedroom window.' Don't remember that. 'He is right.' [Chuckles.] 'He talked about the cottage all the way home. He is pleased.'

February fifteenth, 'Krishnaji and I went to town. He had a haircut. We lunched on Mexican food at the farmer's market. Then, at Krishnaji's urging, we went to Beverly Hills Silk & Woolen, where he chose material for clothes for me to wear in India next winter; kurtas, bundies, and pants. We took the material to the dressmaker, and he explained how they should be made.'

S: [laughs] Krishnaji explained to the dressmaker how these Indian clothes should be made for you.

M: Yes. Well, she didn't know and he did, you see.

S: Of course, of course.

M: And he wanted things to be correct.

The sixteenth of February. 'Krishnaji rested in the morning. He spoke of the necessity for young people to carry on. This has become urgent to him. He wonders if Fritz can do the adult center and is doubtful. He spoke of the Buddha having two disciples who really understood his teachings, and both of them died before the Buddha. "That is sad," said Krishnaji.' It made me cry when I first heard that.

S: Yes.

M: 'In the afternoon, he saw a man named John Ferry, who had written a good letter last spring. He turned out to be not so young. He had taught at Happy Valley and left it; before that he was in the insurance business; now lives in Cambria, does real estate, and is now writing a book, which he intends to publish himself. He had no questions to ask Krishnaji. Just wanted to talk. He was polite, "Mr. Krishnamurti, Mrs. Zimbalist." Krishnaji asked him to come to a discussion meeting if any are held.'

February seventeenth. 'We were home all day except I went for marketing. Radha Burnier came down from Ojai for lunch. We talked of what people come to her and why, and from that, to what people expect from Krishnaji, etcetera.'

The eighteenth. 'I met Bud and Lisa at the airport. There was an earth slide on Pacific Coast Highway near the Getty Museum, so I brought them back via the valley and Malibu Canyon. Lisa has a cough and is very tired. So, after greeting Krishnaji, she went to bed. Krishnaji had supper in bed as usual. So, Bud and I ate in the dining room and talked till quite late.'

February nineteenth. 'Bud's fifty-eighth birthday. I cooked in the morning, and then we had a birthday lunch. Krishnaji, Bud and Lisa, Amanda and Phil, and Toodie, who brought a young actor, Lance…somebody. Krishnaji talked to him quite a bit. He made a surprising good impression on all of us. Lunch went well celebrated with some Cheval Blanc 1953' [S laughs] 'which Father gave me years ago. The weather was golden warmth. Krishnaji and I rested after lunch. Amanda and Phil went home. The others sat on the lawn all afternoon talking. At Bud and Lisa's invitation, Artie Shaw and Joan someone came for drinks at 6:30. Then, they, Bud, Lisa, Toodie, and Lance went out to dine at Orsini Restaurant in Malibu. Krishnaji and I had our usual supper on trays.' Artie Shaw was a friend of my brother's, you know, the musician.

S: Mm, hm. Yes. I think we're going to have to end it there. We're running out of tape.

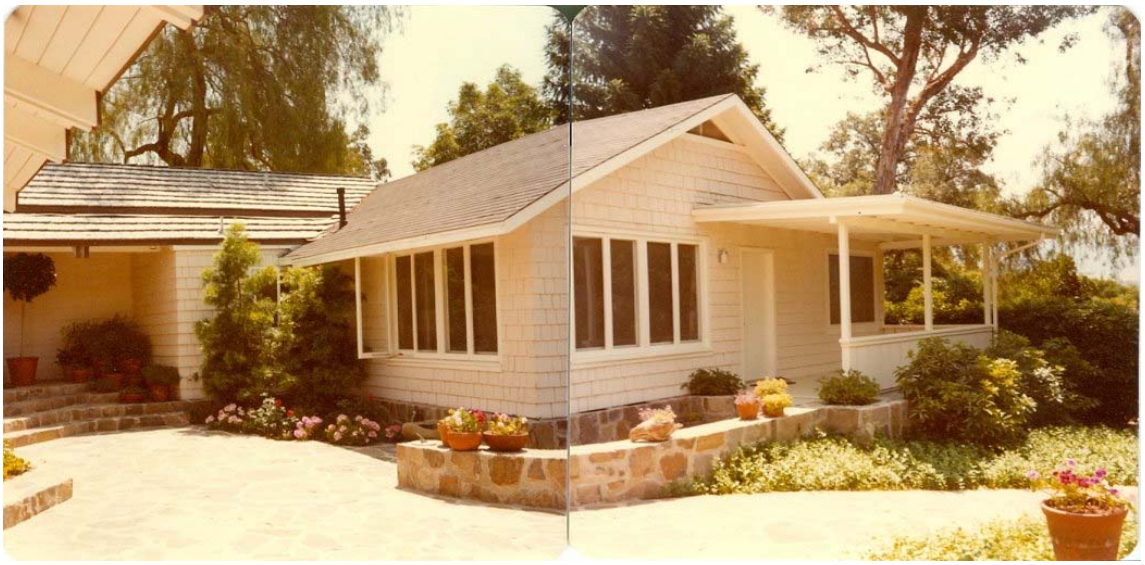
M: We are? Very well.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Dorothy was going to take her first trip to India that winter.

[2] Bud's eldest daughter.

[3] Seven Gates Farm on Martha's Vineyard.



[4] It was Mary's birthday.

[5] Krotona is a Theosophical community in Ojai.

Issue 50: February 20, 1978 to April 17, 1978

The bad weather and landslides of the last issue continue in what, I am told, is a thirty-year cycle of severe rain in that part of the world. Mary and Krishnaji are cut off in Malibu by mudslides for several days. Through it all, Mary and Krishnaji watch the hatching and growth of a hummingbird in a ficus tree outside their dining room window, and the hummingbird finally flies from its nest just as Mary and Krishnaji vacate Malibu for their new house in Ojai. It seems poetic.

This issue contains early, un-retouched, and un-preserved photos that Mary took of the new Pine Cottage shortly after she and Krishnaji moved in.

The original Pine Cottage (showing Krishnaji's sitting room) and part of the new addition with steps up to the front door

Mary: We start on February twenty, 1978. 'I drove my brother and Lisa to Ojai, where neither has ever been; showing them the school property, then the new house. We lunched at Arya Vihara with the Lilliefelts. My brother was enthusiastic and interested in the house. We drove back in the afternoon, and after supper, I took them to the airport for the night flight back to New York. It was good to have them in Malibu one last time and to have my brother see Ojai. He offered the Paris apartment, which now has a Vietnamese maid, and Krishnaji and I can use it whenever we are in Paris.'

February twenty-first. 'Another warm, beautiful day. We stayed home, and relaxed after a busy week. Krishnaji said, "The last two or three days in my sleep, in the brain, there is a quality of dreadful seriousness." In the morning, Krishnaji dictated letters, including one signed by me to Rajagopal saying that Krishnaji had asked me to write to ask what is his intention with regard to the exchange of telegrams with Krishnaji in Madras about a meeting between them. I suggested that we have it in Malibu or at Arya Vihara.' I'd forgotten that. 'Krishnaji and I walked around the garden. Sarjit Siddoo telephoned about Krishnaji visiting their school on Vancouver Island. Krishnaji said we would go on April nineteenth, and return on April twenty-fourth, staying only at the school.'

The front door of the new Pine Cottage with window into the dining room (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The twenty-second. 'It was a warm, beautiful, quiet day at home with Krishnaji resting. I made lunch and slept afterward. We walked in the garden.'

The next day 'was another quiet day at home. We did letters in the morning. Krishnaji talked to me about what to do for the adult center, and the need for the right people. While we walked around the lawn, he spoke about giving me the necessary understanding. Can he give it to me? There is nothing I can "do" to enhance that. It seems foremost in his mind to transmit something, an understanding of his teachings.'

February twenty-fourth. 'Erna, Theo, Evelyne, Ruth, and Mark Lee came at 11 a.m. for a meeting. We broke for lunch but continued the meeting afterward. We discussed financial matters and the adult center, and Fritz's meetings—are they right.'

The twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai. Krishnaji spoke to Fritz and others while I saw to house things. Radha Burnier brought Mr. and Mrs. Perkins, Theosophists, to Arya Vihara to lunch. She feels they could influence giving some of the Theosophical Society land in Adyar for a Krishnamurti school. Mr. Schwartz measured for the window seats, etcetera. The floor tiling is all done in the cottage living room. Krishnaji is very pleased with it. It has a "feeling of lightness," he said. He likes it better than the Malibu floor tile. Krishnaji says there is already an atmosphere in the house. This especially pleases Theo, who put the jewels in the foundation when the cement was poured. These, according to Krishnaji, are supposed to bring a certain sacred quality to a building. At 3 p.m., Krishnaji talked to Fritz, Mark, Erna, Theo, and me about the adult center. Then, he and I drove home to Malibu.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji rested in bed all day, and I did letters. We watched a golf tournament on television. I took a nap, a rare event.'

February twenty-seventh, 'We drove to Ojai. Bart Phelps was there briefly from Houston where he is teaching one semester at Rice University. He was at the cottage with John Rubel. They were very helpful in sorting things out with the Juarez brothers who are doing the stone wall and other house things. Phelps's students came on a bus to see the house in progress. I went to the Ojai Bank of America and opened accounts, and also got a P.O. box. Meanwhile, Krishnaji talked to Fritz and then had Theo fetch Radha Burnier to discuss her accepting Rajagopal's invitation to visit him on Wednesday. We then drove home to Malibu in time for supper.'

The twenty-sixth, 'I invited Alain Naudé to join next week's discussion group in Ojai. He said yes at first, but then he said he would prefer to come later in April for the last week of the public talks. We can put him up at Arya Vihara as David Shainberg vacates a room then. Krishnaji spent the day in bed. I was at the desk and on the telephone sorting out stone mason problems with Bart Phelps and John Rubel. There were heavy rains in the afternoon, almost two inches.'

March first. 'In spite of rain, Krishnaji and I drove to Santa Monica, where Krishnaji had an eye examined with Dr. Hulquist. He has cataracts, but they do not interfere with his vision. No glaucoma, but there is an asymmetry of disk in the left eye which should be checked again in six months as it could lead to glaucoma. He gave us the name of a Mr. Perkins at the Institute of Ophthalmology in London, as we will be there in six months. He also gave Krishnaji drops to help with the tearing. The rain had let up, so we went to the farmer's market for a cheese enchilada lunch. Then, to Giselle where Krishnaji supervised my fitting for India clothes. Pajamas very full, kurta almost to the knees, bundi rather short. He approved the look and dimensions, and we came home, driving carefully on the muddy highway. In the evening, Radha Burnier telephoned to report her meeting with Rajagopal. She said at first there was chitchat about her family. Then, he had questions on how she got from Krotona to his house. He pretended not to know of the gate at the back of his property. Then, Radha asked, "What are you doing?"

Rajagopal: "I'm very busy."'

'Radha: "Are you writing?"'

'Rajagopal: "I'm busy with the teachings."'

'Radha: "What do you mean?"'

'Rajagopal: "Busy distributing the books."'

‘Radha: “Are you going to see Krishnaji?”’

‘Rajagopal: “Is he here?”’ [M and S laugh.]

‘Radha: “Haven’t you received Mrs. Zimbalist’s invitation to Malibu?”’

‘Rajagopal: “Oh yes.”’

‘Radha: “I was in Madras when you telephoned Krishnaji. Are you going to see him?”

‘Rajagopal: “That is a personal business between him and me. I don’t want to talk about it.”’

‘Radha: “I want to talk about the archives. I was here last year when you wouldn’t show them. I have proof that letters were sent from Adyar and they were sent to Krishnaji, not to you.”’

‘Rajagopal: “I don’t want to talk about this with you. You don’t know about it. It’s personal between Krishnaji and me.”’

‘Krishnaji listened to all this on an extension telephone. Radha then said to both of us that she thought he might flare up, but he didn’t. He was just like a stone wall that she couldn’t penetrate. He had little subterfuges in the conversation, like pretending that he didn’t know about the gate. She also said to Rajagopal that she had seen his recent letter to Krishnaji. What was he quoting in it? Rajagopal wouldn’t say. Krishnaji asked her if she felt his mind was losing ground, becoming demented. Radha said, “He was clear, and sharp enough, but demented in some way. He is off the tracks.” She said that he was nervous when the telephone rang twice. She was there an hour, from 5 p.m. to 6 p.m. She said he is without conscience, there is something evil about him. She is glad she went, though, because she can now tell the others in India that she had had a certain hope she could talk to him, that she could reach him, and she knows now that it is impossible. They have always had the feeling that we don’t know how to deal with him, and that has led to all the difficulties. She can now tell them otherwise, and they will believe her. She leaves Ojai tomorrow.’ It was very good that she went. And she’s an outspoken person.

Scott: Yes. Do you think you could just talk a little bit now about that whole funny relationship, because it hasn’t yet really come out in your diaries, how the Indian Foundation…

M: They had a perhaps understandable notion that Indians understand Indians better than Westerners do.

S: Yes.

M: That was often the sort of a floor under the conversation, or under their points of view. And so, it was very valuable that she went.

S: Yes, but the larger issue was that somehow they felt Krishnaji was a religious man, and he shouldn't get involved in anything like the lawsuit.

M: They did. Well, that was Pupul's point of view, particularly.

S: Right. And so they were siding with Rajagopal.

M: Yes, because he was Indian, and he'd always been there and so forth. As far as they knew, he handled the business things well, not realizing that he'd stolen the business things.

S: Right.

M: It was understandable, but I think it was…well, I don't know other people's points of view directly, but I know that Pupul felt this, and her book mirrors this. As far as the book was concerned or she was concerned, Krishnaji was an Indian, and his teachings came out of India. There's a big Indian stamp on both, and she ignores a great deal: that most of his life was spent in the West, for instance. If you read the book, you wouldn't realize that so much. She was always bringing in Indian tradition.

S: Trying to make him more Indian.

M: Yes, she thought he was Indian and she'd have liked him to stay there all the time. Never mind the West.

S: Yes, yes. Oh, absolutely. Yes. But there was also all the mess about Vasanta Vihar.

M: Yes. While they were thinking that maybe the problem with Rajagopal was really westerners not understanding Indians, Rajagopal claimed that Vasanta Vihar was part of KWINC.

S: Right.

M: And with that, the Indians felt he trod on their toes, because they wanted control and should have control of Vasanta Vihar. And in the course of disclosure in KFA versus Rajagopal lawsuit, we came to find out that for some obscure, ancient reason having to do with Rajagopal's manipulations, Vasanta Vihar actually belonged to the Dutch Stichting. So, Anneke had to sign off for the Dutch to get it transferred to KF India, because she was the Dutch Stichting spokesperson.

S: That's right.

M: So, when it came to Vasanta Vihar, the Indians got slightly less impressed with Rajagopal. In other words, they had to sue him, and the court in Madras agreed with that.

S: But they weren't supportive of you and Erna in your case against Rajagopal, and they should've been.

M: Not in the beginning, you see, but when they later found that it came on their territory, things changed a little bit. [Both chuckle.]

S: Anyway, that's just a small aside, since we were talking about Radha…

M: Yes. Radha was extremely helpful, and of course, being Indian and being a Theosophist.

S: Yes, and having an important position.

M: Yes, as the head of the Esoteric Section, she was immensely helpful. The fact that the year before when there had been Indians and Cadogan, and Rajagopal had refused to let us into the archives…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …and she could challenge him on that. He just stonewalled. [Chuckles.]

The next day is just errands for me and Krishnaji staying at home.

March third. 'It rained all day. I worked at the desk. Krishnaji and I were finally able to walk around the garden at 5 p.m. during a lull. The grass is a sponge. Mitchell Booth telephoned. He and an accountant have worked out an ingenious way of working out a way for me to purchase the Ojai property that is a benefit to both the Foundation and me. By evening, the high tide, sliding mud, and pouring rain had damaged houses along Malibu Road in the Colony. The sea destroyed the beach and parts of some houses.'

March fourth. 'It rained all night, and Malibu is cut off by landslides. Two more inches fell during the day. The Pacific Coast Highway is closed in both directions. All canyon roads are closed, except Kanan Road, through which Fred was able to get home. In my slide area, two V-shaped cuts are aimed at the house and the path on the sea-side of Filomena's garden is gone. I found a leak in the sprinkler pipe that was put in only last week by Carlson. I turned off the valve.'

The next day, 'there was another half an inch rain in the night. When the sun finally came out, I found that a lead in the sprinkler pipe, and some of the chain link fence, had gone down in the slide. We were home all day. Malibu is still cut off by slides, so when Hugues van der Straten arrived from Brussels in the evening, there was no way for him to come here as planned. He went to a hotel.'

March sixth. 'It was Amanda's birthday. Krishnaji and I went over to see her and Phil in the afternoon. Otherwise, Krishnaji and I were at home all day. Hugues flew from Los Angeles airport to Oxnard, where Theo met him, and took him to Ojai. They showed him everything. He then flew on to San Francisco. The roads to Malibu remain closed.'

The seventh. 'The Pacific Coast Highway is still closed. It was a quiet, sunny day here. I did letters and other desk work. Amanda and Phil came over to see the hummingbird nest in the ficus outside the dining room. Krishnaji rested. I went to the bank in Malibu to close out a safe deposit box.'

March eighth. 'Elfriede and I packed the gray Mercedes. Krishnaji and I had an early, simple lunch in the kitchen, and then we drove to Ojai via Kanan, a newly widened road through to the valley where we picked up the Ventura Freeway. Krishnaji was pleased by the beauty of the wild country. We got to the Lilliefelts' without difficulty, where we are staying till Monday. All four walked up to Pine Cottage as Saral and David Bohm were there, staying in the guest apartment. The painting of the exterior is finished; it looks nice. We came back to the Lilliefelts', and I cooked soup while Erna made salad.'

The ninth. 'I went early to the bank to open a safe deposit box. At 11 a.m., there was a discussion group at the Lilliefelts' with about thirty-five participants. The subject was, does knowledge deform the psychological structure of man? The trustees, the Bohms, and the usual inhabitants lunched at Arya Vihara. In the afternoon, there was a meeting at the Lilliefelts' of Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, David Bohm, Evelyne, and Mark to talk about what is being done in the adult center, and Fritz's discussions.' It seems Fritz was not part of it.

The next day, 'there was the second group discussion at 11 a.m. Again, some of us lunched at Arya Vihara, and then Krishnaji and I went to the cottage. John Ruble was there, and we went over things. Margrete Heising Wilhelm, Fritz's wife, had done paper cut-out samples of the design for the inside shutters, as on the shutters in Rougemont. She has done it very well.' She did those sunburst things. 'Krishnaji chose the colors for them, a sannyasi orange. Krishnaji talked to Fritz and Margrete about the adult center discussions. They feel nothing is wrong, and they rather rejected the implications of Krishnaji's questions. Later, I went with Alan Kishbaugh to Fritz's discussion with parents and others at the Pavilion; the Bohms, the Lilliefelts, and Evelyne were there. All the trustees felt it was not going rightly; it is group therapy, personal problems are being aired, not Krishnaji's teachings. Talked lengthily about it at supper with Krishnaji.'

March eleventh. 'Wooge's eighty-ninth birthday. I telephoned him at Molly McAdoo's in New York where he was staying en route from Sally's to the Vineyard. At 11 a.m., there was the third group discussion at the Lilliefelts'. Krishnaji posed the question: Why do we demand? We left it for continuation tomorrow. Lunch at Arya Vihara. I met Alan Hooker and Alasdair Coyne about plantings around the cottage, which Alasdair will do. At 4 p.m., there was a meeting at the Lilliefelts' of Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Evelyne, Mark, David Bohm, Fritz and Margrete on the adult center meetings. Everyone aired their views. An improved relationship seemed to come out of it. We all walked down to Reeves Road and back.'

March twelfth. ‘There was the fourth group discussion. Mar de Manziarly, who is visiting her sister Mima Porter, came to the discussion and to lunch at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji went into incompleteness and what is completeness? Incompleteness is the root of demanding. After lunch, I checked bills for extras with Max Falk. Then, I joined Evelyne, Erna, Theo, Ted, and Carl Marcus for a meeting with Michael Mendizza, who gave information on ways of showing Krishnaji material in universities. At 4 p.m., there was another meeting between Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Evelyne, Mark, me, David, Fritz, and Margrete on the adult center, and it was more or less decided to continue the adult center discussions, but with more participation by trustees—less of one-man control by Fritz. Fritz is self-confident, and certain that he can do it, but he is still making Krishnaji and some of us uneasy. We all went for a walk. Erna and Theo and I watched Anna Karenina on television. Krishnaji went to bed.’ We were staying with them, you see.

S: Ah, yes, because the house here[1] wasn’t finished.

M: Yes, that’s right.

March thirteenth. ‘Krishnaji held the fifth group discussion. I have an odd feeling.’ [Long pause.] ‘I seem to be swimming in consciousness of his voice, almost fainting at times, moved to tears when he spoke of insight—different from understanding, which is arrived at slowly, by degrees. Insight is nothing to do with thought. It is instantaneous, the perception of intelligence. When he spoke of this, it was as if he had taken off into the sky, a hawk soaring, free of where earth people trudge along, and it pierced something in my mind. Insight is never partial, it is whole. Mar was at this discussion but left after. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji spoke a little with Erna and Theo and to David Bohm about the continuing distrust of Fritz, and he very much includes Margrete, blaming her for a change in Fritz. I went over house things with Max Falk. Then, Krishnaji and I drove home to Malibu. The Coast road was opened this morning, and we came along it in the usual way, Krishnaji driving partly. The native daisies that grow along the sea were in bright yellow profusion. The rains had spread their growth, and it was wonderful to see. We arrived home at 5 p.m. to find Elfriede had done an enormous amount of packing—boxes and boxes. A crack has come in the lawn near the slide; it is worrisome. The drain broke there too. At supper, Krishnaji said, “the house feels abandoned,” and I couldn’t bear to talk about it.’ So, it was.

The next day ‘was a lovely, clear day—the ocean gentle, the sun smiling. Krishnaji rested in bed. I went to town on errands. The Pacific Coast Highway is messy but open. I got in without delays. I went to fit the Indian clothes, and the grayish sari made into a long dress, which looked well. I got home before the traffic. Krishnaji and I walked in the garden.’

March fifteenth. ‘It was a beautiful, warm day; and I spent most of it packing. Krishnaji stayed in his bathrobe, but we lunched in the dining room, watching the remaining baby hummingbird in its tiny nest in the ficus tree. I walked over to the Dunnes’ at 5:30 p.m., while Krishnaji went walking on the lawn. He waved across the canyon to me and then resumed his rounds—a bright, clear figure in his white terrycloth bathrobe. Phil showed me his flowers. We watched Walter Cronkite so I could bring news back to Krishnaji. We are still without television over here. Then I came back to supper. Is this our last night in this blessed house? Krishnaji felt this, and said he thought of it as he watched me walking over to the Dunnes'. He thought of how many memories this house has for me—twenty-five years here. He hoped I will be as happy in the new house as in this one, and nothing will ever be wrong between us.'

The sixteenth. 'It was a hot day—ninety degrees in town. I got up at 5 a.m. and packed all day. The carpet people cleaned the living room rug and the one in Krishnaji's room. Krishnaji and I had a quiet lunch, and the baby hummingbird sat on the edge of his nest. He will fly in a few hours. At 4:20 p.m., we left in the gray Mercedes for Ojai, and arrived at the Lilliefelts' just in time for Krishnaji to see Walter Cronkite. Aldo Moro, a former Italian Prime Minister, was abducted by terrorists in Rome; Israel has a band of six miles of Lebanon on their border, now occupied by their troops after PLO terrorists attacked last Saturday. Erna and Theo have had good conversations with Fritz. We will stay with the Lilliefelts until we move into the cottage.'

The seventeenth. 'I went to Pine Cottage. Workmen are still in every room—electrician, plumber, carpenter, stone masons, and a land service all working; every room is a mess. I found a corner in the kitchen where I could work at cutting shelf lining and cleaning drawers. Krishnaji came over at lunchtime; we ate at Arya Vihara. I worked all afternoon. Ted got a Hoover vacuum cleaner for the cottage. Laura Martin, Ted's friend, helped to clean closets, etcetera. Mr. Schwartz hung Krishnaji's room's curtain. I found there was the beginning of some order. Krishnaji said with much feeling, "It is a marvelous house."' [Chuckles.] 'He felt a special atmosphere from the first day he walked in. Erna and I made supper at the Lilliefelts'. Again, Krishnaji said to me, "It is a marvelous house." I fell asleep at the supper table.' [Chuckles.] 'Later, I fell asleep watching television.' [Laughs.]

March eighteenth. 'I made Krishnaji's breakfast and then went to the cottage. At 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji had a meeting outside the Pavilion for the school parents and staff, during which Michael Mendizza took pictures of him. I stayed in the cottage all day cleaning and putting in shelf lining, helped by Laura Martin. The bedrooms are now clean and ready. At 5 p.m., Elfriede, Fred, and Lori arrived. Elfriede and Fred in a huge moving van and Lori with his truck. They did an enormous job of moving an astonishing amount of furniture and things out of Malibu. It's almost all done. One more trip tomorrow. Everyone here came to help unload, even Saral and David.' I remember this well. David Bohm tried to help and I was terrified [S laughs] that he would drop something.

S: I know. I frequently saw him at Brockwood helping to dry dishes, and it was frightening to watch him try to do anything like that.

M: His hands just are like gloves, mittens really.

S: Exactly, yes, and not really made for doing anything physical.

M: David picked up a lamp to move it into the house, and I thought, oh my god.

S: Yes. [Laughs.]

M: But it was alright; he made it. [Laughs.] 'Everyone here helped unload most wonderfully. Krishnaji came toward the end. Everything was just piled in the house. Tomorrow, I will start unpacking and arranging. I fell asleep at the dinner table again and went to bed. Coming back to the Lilliefelts' to sleep, Krishnaji again said, "It is a marvelous house." At supper, Krishnaji questioned the qualities of the teachers in the school. Where do we find people? What is happening to Americans?'

March nineteenth. 'I worked in the cottage all day, putting Krishnaji's clothes in closets, etcetera. Krishnaji held another meeting with parents and staff in the Pavilion. Lou Blau came with Evelyne to lunch at what we are trying to call "the Old House" instead of Arya Vihara as the latter name seems to upset some people.' That never took. [S laughs.]

S: Why did it upset anybody?

M: Because it means "abode of the Aryans," you see. Vihara means house or home, where you live, and…

S: Arya was Aryans. Yes.

M: [chuckles] Yes, but it was named that before the Nazi era, and the Aryans it refers to are the early Aryans who brought what became Sanskrit and Hinduism into India. 'Krishnaji says it meant an abode of noble people, but that is off-putting, too. So, it is the Old House. Pine Cottage remains as is. An office building was decided to be "the guest house." Lou talked with Evelyne, Erna, and me on various things, including trustee insurance, and saw the cottage. Elfriede, Fred, and Lori with a van and truck brought the next things from Malibu, including the tubs of camellias and other shrubs. They seem living parts of Malibu, and I was glad to have them follow us here. They are friends. The ficus with its hummingbird nest came, but its little occupant had flown. I spoke to my brother in New York about selling more stock for the final house payments, etcetera. Krishnaji slept all afternoon and walked up with Theo just as I was locking the house. Everything sits in clumps, but the beginnings of order are there. My bed fits the room just as I'd hoped.' [Laughs.] That was my electric bed.

S: Yes, yes.

M: The twentieth. I worked all day in the cottage. Krishnaji's room is in order. I made up our beds. My brother telephoned about stock sale. In afternoon, Krishnaji held a meeting with teachers in the Old House. We had supper at the Lilliefelts' and then came over to the cottage, and stepped through the door of the old part of the cottage'—that was into what was Krishnaji's sitting room—'to live for good.[2] We have moved in. Krishnaji asked me to leave him alone for a few minutes in my room, to do whatever it is to bring a certain wordless something to that room: protection, blessing. He asked, "Do you feel the atmosphere?" I did, and I felt it even more in his room. So, we sleep in this house, blessed by Krishnaji, his life here and his presence.'

Krishnaji's bedroom (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The entry into Krishnaji's sitting room through which he and Mary entered "to live for good" (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The next day, 'Erna helped me all day unpacking kitchen things. All sorts of things don't work properly. The heat, both radiant and air, faucets in my bathroom, etcetera. Max worked on all of them; an electrician, a plumber, etcetera, worked too. Margrete continued painting the design on the shutters. Krishnaji held a discussion with teachers at the Old House. Renée Weber is here to interview Krishnaji for a new magazine called Revision. We all lunched at the Old House' [laughs]; this "Old House" business won't last.' [S chuckles.] 'For supper, Krishnaji and I had our first meal in our kitchen brought over by Michael. Helen Brew in Los Angeles wants to discuss an education film with Krishnaji when we get to Brockwood. Rajagopal telephoned the office, leaving a message for Krishnaji to call him.'

March twenty-second, 'I worked all day unpacking in the cottage. Krishnaji gave an interview to Renée Weber for magazine Revision.'

Various shots of the new living room (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The next day, 'I worked on putting things in order. The house still swarms with furnace and heating men, stone masons, etcetera. Krishnaji returned Rajagopal's telephone call with Erna and I in the room. Rajagopal said he wanted to see him. Krishnaji asked what he wanted to talk about. Rajagopal said, "For your own good and mine" he wanted a two-hour talk alone. Krishnaji said that unless it was about Rajagopal's returning everything to Krishnaji, as he had said in his cable from Madras, there was nothing for them to discuss. Rajagopal hung up. He had stressed "for your good," which sounded like a threat. Krishnaji asked him if he were taping the conversation.' In the past when Krishnaji or I had called, Rajagopal always said "One minute, one minute, one minute" and you knew he was going to turn on…or at least you suspected, he was turning on a recording device. This went on, even before the break. 'At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held the first discussion in this house, the trustees, teachers, the Bohms, the Hookers, Frances McCann—just arrived from Brockwood—and Sidney Field.'

March twenty-fourth. 'Elfriede came, and worked thoroughly at cleaning and helping unpack. Max continues work on the doors, etcetera. The carpenter, John, is still working, and Robert is still painting. There was an Indian actor and lady to lunch at Arya Vihara. By evening, almost everything was clean and in order.'

March twenty-fifth. 'It was a warm, beautiful day. I finished putting things away in my bathroom, hung pictures, etcetera. Margrete is doing blue and white shutters for the kitchen and dining room. In the afternoon, Krishnaji held another teacher discussion at which, for the most part, only David Moody talked. Others sat in silence, which Krishnaji feels is pointless. There is a strong atmosphere in the living room, and it holds that number of discussers easily. The acoustics are good when there is a crowd. We went for a walk to the dip, and after'—do you know where the dip is?

S: Yes. On Grand Avenue.

M: Yes. March twenty-sixth. 'My upper lip is swollen. Alain telephoned to wish happy Easter, so I told him about my lip and he prescribed homeopathic apis, which helped a bit. I talked to Wooge, my stepfather, at the Vineyard. Mar de Manziarly lunched with us at Arya Vihara and stayed for the 4 o'clock discussion Krishnaji had with teachers. Margrete completed the blue and white shutters for the dining/kitchen area. It looks very nice, slightly Matisse.' [S chuckles.] 'I spoke to Blanche Mathias about lunching with her in San Francisco on April twenty-fourth.'

There isn't much the next day, but on March twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji and I drove to Los Angeles via the Ventura freeway. Krishnaji had a haircut at noon, after which we lunched at the farmer's market, and bought Benes cakes'—oh, there was a wonderful bakery, a Hungarian bakery called Benes. 'We went to Design Research'—that was a very good store of modern furniture—'for a wall clock, but they didn't have one I liked. And then to Giselle for my fittings on Indian clothes. We came back to Malibu. The house looks beautiful in spite of its emptiness. Its serenity is untouched. Lori was cutting the grass. Elfriede had everything clean; the remaining tubs of plants are nicely distributed, but part of the lawn has sunk a bit, and a large crack is in the cement terrace. We went over to the Dunnes', and Phil reminded me that that part of the lawn is on fill from when we first moved earth in the house building in 1953. We stayed with Amanda and Phil briefly. We came back to Ojai, Krishnaji driving his usual portion of the way and went to the "Old House" to greet David Shainberg, arrived from New York and staying there till April tenth. We came back to the cottage for supper. Krishnaji is concerned that there is less vitality in the U.S. Foundation. He is afraid it may peter out.'

March twenty-ninth. ‘There was a light rain. Krishnaji talked to Erna and me about the adult center activities. Also, it was decided that, because of the predicted weather, this weekend’s Ojai public talks will have to be held in Nordhoff School and Gymnasium. Krishnaji, Max, and I walked in the afternoon.’

There isn’t much the next day, but on March thirty-first, ‘there was rain again. Elfriede came and cleaned. Carlson says another old pipe broke near the point, so he turned off the valve.’

S: This is the Malibu property.

M: Yes, Malibu. ‘After lunch, Krishnaji, Erna, Evelyne, and I talked with Saral and David about David’s retirement plans and the time he might spend here. Krishnaji and I took a short walk.’

Two shots of the new kitchen/dining room (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The first of April. ‘The sun was out, but the Oak Grove was still too wet to be used. So, Krishnaji gave his first Ojai talk in Nordhoff High School Gymnasium. Not a bad place, but “not as nice as under the trees,” said Krishnaji, a little wistfully. “I don’t know what to talk about,” he said on the way over. Then, as usual, it came to him and he spoke of the pressure of language. “It uses us, not we using it,” and the pressure of ideals. We came back and had our first meal in the cottage dining room. Krishnaji, Shainberg, and I walked on Thacher Road. After our supper in the cottage, I went over to the Old House. Carol and Joe Zorski are there from Brockwood. Michael Mendizza showed slides he had taken of Krishnaji at a teacher discussion and used over Krishnaji’s voice—a sample for possible use in libraries, universities, etcetera.’

April second. ‘A clear day, but Krishnaji’s second Ojai talk also needs to be in the Nordhoff Gym. A stupendous one. An intense key talk. Krishnaji making razor-subtle points of thought being always old, knowledge being the past, thought being able to see its limitations without making it a thought product. It seemed that stop of thought lets insight and intelligence in. So, seeing is where insight and intelligence take over.' I think that's…

S: …fundamental.

M: Yes, that's the word. [Chuckles.] 'Thought doesn't carry its seeing, its limitations on; if it did, that would still be thought. This is the razor edge of transition out of thought, when insight takes over.' I don't know why people don't see that. [S chuckles.] 'We lunched alone in the cottage. Erna, Lou Blau, and I had a telephone discussion about my purchase of this place.'

April third. 'I talked to Mitchell Booth about the purchase agreement and later signed it. We lunched at the Old House. John Alcorn, a man with cancer who has left everything to KFA, sat next to Krishnaji and came over to the cottage afterward. Alan Hooker came with a ceanothus plant; Alasdair Coyne and Denise from Brockwood prepared the soil along the path for planting.'

The next day. 'It was cloudy on awakening. Rain soon began. Telephoned Frances McCann to thank her for a very generous present for the house, cash instead of the rug she had bought, which didn't look right, and Krishnaji wants to use the money to make an outdoor table using the Malibu tiles.' It's out there. I had brought some extra tiles up from Malibu. 'Frances suggested the Art Center on Montgomery Street for today's public discussion. We were to have used Libbey Park, as Nordhoff Gym is unavailable, but the rain refused. So, with immense effort on the part of all helpers, it was moved to the Art Center. Though a small, gloomy building, it produced a good, closer atmosphere. Krishnaji gave an intense exposition of "the observer is the observed." In the car, coming back, he said, "My, I put a lot of energy into that." I had made lunch, and we asked Max to join us. Krishnaji slept afterward, and I struggled with a mountain of paper at the desk. We walked on Thacher Road, ran into Bill Angelos and, of course, Ms. McGarrity.' Ms. McGarrity, I don't think has appeared in this, hasn't she?

S: I can't remember.

M: She's a character from ancient times; an old lady who knew that Krishnaji used to, when he lived here before my time, walk up over the bridge, you know, on McAndrew Road. So she would be there waiting.

S: Ah, ha.

M: …so, 'ran into McGarrity, who has resumed her old waitings at the bridge for him to pass. On the walk, he asked me if the people this morning understood; what impression they got out of it. I said the serious ones seemed to listen intensely. Some seemed to see it, but from what one or two others said, it seemed to slip away. "Observer is the observed" is the way to put it, Krishnaji's own, but perhaps harder for most to grasp. Krishnaji asked, "how else?" I said, psychological terminology is inferior, and not his, but people mostly seem to understand projection; the mind projects its accumulated thoughts and knowledge onto what it observes; it colors it with that, and thereby, doesn't see. He said he would use the word projection.' He never did. [M and S chuckle.] 'We came back in time to watch Walter Cronkite and the news. In the evening, suddenly, while watching a Hitchcock movie on television, Krishnaji said, "I must've been born this way, able to see directly. I have never been through all that." (Thought, images, division)' in parentheses.

S: Those are your parentheses?

M: Those are my parentheses.

S: Alright.

Editor's Note: Unusually, in Mary's small daily diary, she has a slightly different version of the following: 'Krishnaji asked, "How does he know all this?"' And Mary says after reading this, "He's talking about himself" [chuckles].

M: '"What makes me see all this?" I suggested that he never thinks about all these matters except when he's talking seriously. He nodded.'

April fifth. 'I woke up early, happily. A clear, beautiful morning, a lovely way to wake up. Krishnaji and I drove to Carpinteria taking Alan Hooker, with Alasdair Coyne following in Alan Hooker's truck. At Carpinteria Nursery we chose plants for around the cottage, pittosporum, podocarpus, vinka, etcetera. Krishnaji and I came back in time for lunch. In the afternoon, Alasdair, with an all-Brockwood team of helpers—Denise, Adrian, and Matthew—planted everything. Frode came in, too. Krishnaji said of the visit to the nursery, "I get absolutely vague." He had to retreat to the shade of the car after a bit; the sun was too bright. But, he was pleased by the beauty of the hills and the full waters of Lake Casitas. The rains have furred the hills with green as we have never seen them. The ceanothus was in bloom everywhere, and pink and wild flowers grew on steep banks, etcetera.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji's second public discussion was held at Libbey Park. It was cold, but the rain held off till later. It was not a good discussion. Pressure was the main subject, but contentious people kept it from going well. In the afternoon, at 4 p.m., Nathan and Dorothy Shainberg (David Shainberg's parents) and David Shainberg came for tea with Krishnaji.'

Krishnaji's sitting room with the couch on which Mary sat for most of the interviews (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

April seventh. 'Elfriede brought some of the cushions recovered in chintz for the big sofa[3]. She also stowed things in cupboards in my study so that some semblance of order began in there, and I can begin to function at the desk, which is a horror of papers. Countless people were at lunch at the Old House. The Hookers helped Michael do a Mexican meal; I don't know how they managed so many. I fetched Krishnaji's gold watch from the safe deposit box. His other one has gone to Patek in Geneva for cleaning, etcetera. After lunch, we went to the Green Thumb Nursery in Ventura for another floribunda rose, Charisma'—that's the name of the rose—'and other flowers for planter's pots outside Krishnaji's bathroom. Krishnaji came back from a short walk as I returned and helped unload the car. He said, "In spite of all the people working, do you feel the atmosphere of this house? It is extraordinary." He is pleased for me, and this is that feeling of sunlight.'

April eighth. 'There was snow on Topa Topa, some sun, but mostly cloud. Charles Moore and John Rubel and his wife came to see the house at 9:30 a.m. Charles has not seen it since the tile floor went in. Alasdair came and planted the plants I bought yesterday. So, the little bed of flowers outside Krishnaji's bathroom looks bright and pretty. The third talk was held in the Nordhoff football field, with Krishnaji on a small stand in front of the bleachers, a shelter over his head from the sun, but not from a rather sharp wind. The electricity failed just as we arrived. Ted and others rushed to cope. After a wait, it came on. I made the announcements. Krishnaji spoke further on pressure and toward the end asked how the whole of consciousness can be seen—only when the mind is quiet, without thought, can this be seen. We lunched alone. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon, while the rest of us held a trustees meeting. Lou Blau came and went over all the legal explanations, etcetera, of my buying this place. He left and we continued for over three hours. Cynthia Wood's resignation as a trustee was accepted, and she was made an honorary trustee, with whom reports, etcetera, will be shared, but she will have no responsibility. Her generosity in donations has been immense, according to Evelyne. She has given larger sums to KFA than anything else, but one wonders about her understanding of Krishnaji. Recently she said to Evelyne, "Krishnaji is such an egotist that he does all the talking in public discussions." At the end of the day, I was weary of people.'

S: Hm. That's understandable.

M: April ninth. 'At last, a beautiful day. Krishnaji gave the fourth public talk in Ojai at Libbey Park Bowl. Alan Kishbaugh had lunch with us in the cottage. Then, at 4 p.m., we had to tea Dr. and Madame Questiau, Madame Jacqueline Marco, Frances McCann, Ruth McCandless, Maris Lindley, the Hookers, Sarjit Siddoo, Verna Kreuger, Evelyne, the Lilliefelts, Alan Kishbaugh, and Max. There was enthusiasm over the house. Krishnaji went for a walk with Max. *Finalmente[4], we had supper quietly. Krishnaji said, "What a strange life, talking all the time."' [Both chuckle very quietly.]

The next day, 'in the afternoon, I took the gray Mercedes to Dieter for the 9,000-mile service and came back to Ojai in a rental car.

On the eleventh, 'Krishnaji held the third public discussion in Libbey Park Bowl. Max lunched with us. Sarjit Siddoo talked with Krishnaji in the afternoon about Wolf Lake School and the plans for next week.'

April twelfth. 'In the rental car, I went to Oxnard, returned it and picked up the gray Mercedes, which had its 9,000-mile service and drove inland to Beverly Hills. My hair was thoroughly and well cut. I did miscellaneous errands and drove back to Ojai by 5 p.m., passing Malibu, unable to stop. I knew the Dunnes weren't home. Krishnaji was walking down the drive as I came in, pleased at the sound of the Mercedes motor; he could tell it had been tuned.' [Both chuckle.] 'I went over to the Old House to a tea party for "interested people" arranged by Evelyne. Today she went to see Rajagopal and will tell us about it tomorrow.'

The thirteenth of April. 'Krishnaji's fourth public discussion held in Libbey Park Bowl. These are arduous for him; it's as if he had to lift the whole weight of the audience's mind. We lunched alone; and then Evelyne, Alan Kishbaugh, and the Lilliefelts came; and Evelyne reported on her meeting with Rajagopal. It was at his invitation after she initially suggested they meet. It was held in the K & R office living room. She had never met him before. Her initial impression was: old, shuffling, unable to find the light switch, dressed in a sort of velour windbreaker and slippers, sat in silence, putting it on her to explain why she came. So, she described building plans, etcetera, and wondered if K & R could contribute.' [M and S laugh.] 'He listened, questioned her on details of the positions of the buildings, etcetera, then took over the conversation, and described his martyrdom.' [Both chuckle lightly.] 'He said he is faithful to the "real" Krishnamurti. He had been vilified. He said, "You will get it all when I am dead, but only over my dead body," and said he must settle "personal matters" with Krishnaji. She was there one-and-three-quarters hours. It ended with his agreement to think over whether he could contribute anything, within the rules of K & R. Erna says that he can't because we hedged him in so thoroughly in the settlement. He can only use funds as it specifies, i.e., for donations of books to libraries, etcetera. In the afternoon, Ralph Gardner took photographs of Krishnaji.' [M laughs.] His martyrdom! [Both chuckle lightly.]

The walk into and out of Pine Cottage past the Pepper Tree (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The next day. ‘Bud telephoned, and we discussed business things. He and Lisa will be in Europe in June. Elfriede came and unpacked the remaining books, and I will have to sort them, but at least they are on shelves. The Fundación members came to see Krishnaji—Alfonso Colón, Armando Riesco, Juan Colell came, bringing Sylvia Cardenas, publisher of Orion, Hugo Baldi of Argentina, and Racquel Drassinower. There was the usual Fundación problems. Later, Krishnaji and I walked to the dip and back. It was cold and gray. The paper says it snowed from Scotland to the Channel and London had nineteen-degree weather.’

April fifteenth. ‘There was rain all day. Krishnaji gave the fifth public talk in Nordhoff High School Gymnasium, a great and deeply moving one. He was tired afterward from the energy he put into it. We lunched alone, and he slept till 5 p.m. At 4:30 p.m., there was a tea for all who had worked setting up the talks at the Old House, and Krishnaji came briefly. While there, I was telephoned by Jackie Kornfeld at Tuxedo Park at the suggestion of Maris Lindley. Jackie is in great pain at the death of Joe, her husband. I talked to her at length. When I came back to the cottage, I told Krishnaji about it, and he spoke to her. It is rare for him to talk on the telephone, and especially about such serious things. He talked at some length.’

April sixteenth. ‘It was clear in the morning. Krishnaji’s sixth Ojai talk was again in Nordhoff Gymnasium, an extraordinary one. The audience sat silent and transfixed at the end, many in tears, as was I. There was a sense of something overwhelming, sacred; of his having spoken from the depth of truth. When we reached McAndrew Road, hail fell and then a downpour of rain. We had to change our clothes after just going from the garage to the house. Toodie had been at the talk and came for lunch, bringing her daughter Zoë. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon while Toodie talked to me about her problems, and what to do. Rain poured all afternoon. Ralph Gardner came again and photographed Krishnaji. Toodie and Zoë left. Then Evelyne, Erna, and Michael Mendizza came and talked to me about the plan for which Evelyne says she can raise funds from sources outside the Foundation mailing list, to have Mendizza do an hour-long 16mm film on Krishnaji. He will go to Canada this week, and later Saanen, Brockwood, and India. He looks on it as a sort of biography of Krishnaji, using stills and views of past places in Krishnaji’s life, intercut with the footage of present talks, etcetera. He seems intelligent and capable but might attempt too much: reference to the pepper tree and how to bring that in, an area I would be cautious in touching. The rain finally stopped, and Krishnaji and I took a short walk.’

The next day says, ‘desk work, to the bank about opening a Krishnaji account for Ms. Dodge’s trust money. I also sent Narayan airfare to England and back. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji saw Carol Kinsey about a study she is doing at JFK College on consciousness, drugs, etcetera. We walked with Erna. Krishnaji finished the Avalanche Express thriller.’ [S chuckles.]

S: Alright, we’ve run out of tape for today.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] This interview took place at Pine Cottage.

[2] It seems poignant to me that they entered "to live for good" through the original front door of Pine Cottage rather than the new front door of the expanded Pine Cottage. It is also through this door that Krishnaji left for the last time, after his death.

[3] Mary then says, "That's these," indicating the sofa in Krishnaji's sitting room where we conducted the interviews.

[4] "Finally" in Italian.

Issue 51: April 18, 1978 to May 25, 1978

The strange series of experiences Krishnaji underwent that came to be called "the process" and which began in 1922 occurred again in 1961 and 1962 when Krishnaji was staying with Vanda. She had made notes of those events, but had kept them to herself. In this issue, Vanda reads out her notes to Mary and Mary Lutyens, the person Vanda knew Krishnaji had asked to be his biographer. The next day, Vanda dictated large segments of her notes to Mary to send on to Mary Lutyens for the second volume of her biography of Krishnaji, Krishnamurti: The Years of Fulfilment. However, Mary's account of Vanda's notes in Mary's diary feels more intimate. If, as Mary and I suspected, Vanda's notes were subsequently lost, then Mary's notes on Vanda's account are the best record we have of these important events.

Mary: Alright, we're beginning this on April eighteenth, 1978.

Scott: That's correct.

M: Yes, well, Krishnaji and I were in Ojai, and my diary says, 'Krishnaji and I packed some luggage, and left in the morning in the gray Mercedes with Theo to Malibu. We had a light lunch in the dining room there, and Elfriede had'—[chuckles]. You don't want details about…

S: Yes, we do.

M: No.

S: Yes, yes.

M: 'Elfriede fixed the teak game table with a tablecloth.' You see, all the furniture had gone up to Ojai.

S: Oh, that's right.

M: Yes.

S: You see, now, these are important details.

M: No, they're not! [S chuckles, then M chuckles.] I'll never agree with you on this. Well, anyway, she fixed it. 'And we had a couple of folding chairs and the kitchen stool, so we had our lunch. We continued on to the IRS office in West Los Angeles for Krishnaji's tax clearance, required before he can leave the country. We went on to Westwood Village for a reading renewal for Krishnaji, at Winky's.' Winky was my friend who worked in the bookstore. She's been identified earlier.

S: Yes.

M: And I got an Indian art book for Margrete Wilhelm.' That was Fritz Wilhelm's wife, and she had been very nice and done the painted shutters in the house.

S: I remember she did those.

M: Anyway, I apparently got her an Indian art book, and 'also the all-important detectives for Krishnaji.' [S chuckles.] 'We drove back to Malibu, where Krishnaji and I remained and Theo drove the gray car back to Ojai. I went over to see Amanda and Phil Dunne. The Dunnes' garden, mine, and our canyon never looked so beautiful. The rains had made everything bloom, the wildflowers, every leaf was a deep green. It was especially beautiful. The house was very beautiful by itself with almost no furniture. It is serene and blessed. It feels like my very skin.'

S: Oh, how nice.

M: Krishnaji had been worried that it was painful for me to leave the house. It wasn't, but I think we recorded it earlier, he had said that the house feels abandoned, which broke me up.

S: I know.

M: But, it was alright, you see. 'There is still a bed in each of the two bedrooms, a few dishes, towels, etcetera, so Krishnaji and I could have supper as always, and spend the night there. Krishnaji said that this morning, in Ojai, meditation came when he woke up early at 3:00 a.m.'

April nineteenth. 'Woke up to the soft ocean sounds, and the quail came bustling across the lawn. The lawn has sagged curiously in places. So much rain seems to have caused it to settle. Krishnaji said, "I'm glad they chose you to look after me."' [S chuckles.] And then he went on, '"It might've been someone else."' [Both chuckle.]

S: No!

M: Of course, there would've been a queue for that.

S: Exactly.

M: 'He said, "This room must've had many happy and unhappy times for you." I saw the Roman nails in the beams and remembered how Sam had found them in Ostia Antica and told me to take them back and put them in the Malibu house so it will last a thousand years.' That's true. They were all Roman nails.

S: Oh, wonderful. Did you leave them there in the house?

M: Of course, but I don't know whether that house still exists.

S: Yes.

M: I don't know. I don't go down there anymore because the Dunnes don't live next door. 'I told this to Krishnaji, and he said, "Why don't you take one out, and put it in the house in Ojai?"'

S: That's exactly what I was thinking. [Both laugh.]

M: Well, they, they were big, you know…

S: Yes.

M: …big, fat…I don't know how I would have gotten them out. I would have had to hire a carpenter to pull them out.

S: Yes, they probably would have had to be sawn out. [M chuckles.] I know what those old Roman nails are like.

M: 'We had breakfast. I took the green car down for gas, etcetera, and came back to go with Krishnaji and Alan Kishbaugh, who drove us to the airport. Krishnaji and I flew at noon to Seattle. We arrived at 2 p.m., and had a two-hour wait before taking Pacific Air West to Victoria. The vegetarian lunch was so poor that we had a salad in the airport, some ice cream, and a Danish. Krishnaji had never heard of that'—a Danish [S chuckles] —'but it was what came when he wanted a sweet biscuit. He spoke again about a Roman nail from Malibu for Ojai, and said, "When we came there yesterday, I felt Mr. Zimbalist."'

S: Mmmm. How nice.

M: Yes. 'We reached Victoria at 5 p.m., and both Siddoo sisters met us. We drove to their school by the sea. Krishnaji met only a few of the teachers and students and went right to bed. I brought his supper on a tray, and now I must sleep.'

The next day. 'Jackie and Sarjit gave me a tour of the place. It has well-kept gardens, lovely places above the shore, and the lapping sound of water is dear to my island blood. They have two cows, and a newborn heifer; and the school has more milk and its own butter than it can use. The milk tastes like milk.'

'At 11 a.m., Krishnaji spoke to students and staff on what a school is all about: learning, freedom, and what they mean. The ten students are nice-seeming children, seem at home, and pleasantly say good morning to you. There is a please-ing and thank-you-ing, and they listened to Krishnaji. The meeting was videotaped by the school and by local TV, and Michael Mendizza is here to begin his filming of Krishnaji, which is to continue at Saanen, Brockwood, India, and Ojai next spring. Krishnaji had lunch with the children at one table, and took a nap till 3 p.m. After that we went in one car with Jackie and Sarjit, a second car following with Michael Mendizza, Terry (the handyman at the school), and Mary Whitehouse (who tends to various things at Wolf Lake itself, which is a possible place for the school).' They owned two places; actually, they owned vast forests. But, they are distressing forests because every tree is the same size. In other words…

S: Yes. It's all reforested and replanted.

M: Yes.

S: I know. That never feels natural.

M: It doesn't look like a forest.

S: No. I know.

M: It looks like…I don't know what.

S: Yes, a tree farm.

M: A tree farm, although it was beautiful, and the trees were quite big.

S: Yes.

M: I think that their father was in the lumber business. So, they owned that, and then they also owned the place where the school is, which was separate, on the ocean, which is beautiful. Anyway, 'Wolf Lake is several miles into a thick forest, logged thirty years ago, and now thickly wooded with Douglas firs and alder. We had to walk in to see the lake, which is about a mile long, and we walked to the end, a two-mile walk each way for Krishnaji, which he stood very well; and he chided me for suggesting to the Siddoos that it was a bit much for him. I feel, rather, enclosed in the woods without space: the trees crowding in. It would not be my choice, but Krishnaji tends to like large pieces of land. This one is 5,000 acres. He speaks of not only a school, but a college, an enormous outlay when it would probably cost half a million just to bring in the electricity before the cost of the road, clearing, building, etcetera. "One mustn't think of the money, but whether it is right."' [Chuckles.]

S: That's so like him. [Laughs.]

M: Yes, and it always left the rest of us thinking, what will we do? [S chuckles.] 'The two sisters Siddoo listened willingly. Jackie seemed prepared to go to any length. Sarjit looks more to the practical side. It would be a tremendous undertaking. I wonder if they're up to it and have the energy to do it. They are not young, but Krishnaji's visions are undaunted.'

April twenty-first. 'It's a gray day. Krishnaji spoke to the staff in the morning. After lunch, Saral and David arrived. He has been lecturing in Vancouver. The plan was to go to the Butchart Gardens, but it rained. So, Krishnaji talked all afternoon with Jackie and Sarjit about the school, the rules for it, etcetera. A Mr. and Mrs. Eric Smith—he is on the board of the Krishnaji educational center of Canada and is the Siddoos' financial adviser,' um, 'he came with the Bohms.' I must stop saying "um."

Editor's Note: Obviously, Mary's "ums" have been edited out, as well as most of the little asides Mary and I had. However, Mary and I had such fun in these discussions, and there was so much joking between us, that it seems only right that readers have some sense of the affectionate humor that pervaded these discussions, so a couple are included in this issue.

S: [laughs] It doesn't matter.

M: It does. It sounds horrible.

S: And they all get transcribed, so they're down there for posterity. [Laughs.]

M: That's the trouble; that's what bothers me.

April twenty-second. 'Krishnaji spoke to the children alone. I did letters. In the afternoon, there was a little sun, so, with the Siddoos, we walked around the grounds while Michael Mendizza filmed Krishnaji in 16mm with a Beaulieu movie camera for his film project. Down along the gray pebble beach, there were beautiful driftwood logs and again that gentle lapping sound at the edge of the sea. Krishnaji said to me, "One should only come here in summer." He feels the cold here, which must be because he is tired. In the evening, a tooth hurt him. He put oil of cloves on it and tried pressure on it with the first joint of his index finger, suggested to relieve tooth aches by Terry, the handyman here, a believer in such.' [Both chuckle.]

The next day, it just says, 'Krishnaji spoke to the whole school plus guests.'

That brings us to the twenty-fourth, and in the little diary it says, 'We left Wolf Lake School at 9 a.m. Jackie and Sarjit drove us to Victoria Airport, where Krishnaji and I took the 10:15 a.m. Pacific Air West flight to Seattle, changed to Western Airline, and flew to Los Angeles, where Alan K. met us and drove us to Malibu. We put our bags in the green Mercedes and Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai, arriving about 5 p.m.'

And in the big book it says the same thing.

S: Well, it won't be word-for-word; there must be some word you changed. [Both chuckle.]

M: You would like the punctuation too? [Laughter.]

S: No, I'll just throw that in willy-nilly. [Chuckles.]

M: 'We left Wolf Lake School, and at 9 a.m., Sarjit and Jackie took us to the airport. We flew Pacific West flight to Seattle' (comma) [S laughs], 'changed to Western Airline' (comma) [S laughs], 'and flew to Los Angeles' (full stop). [Both laugh.] 'Krishnaji liked the new plane.'

S: You see! That's a new detail.

M: …'and they served an acceptable vegetable lunch.'

S: You see, there's another new detail.

M: Oh, posterity will thank you for all this. [S laughs.] 'Alan K. met us and drove us to Malibu. Krishnaji and I changed to the green Mercedes and drove to Ojai, arriving about 5 p.m. Krishnaji feels the Siddoos don't really know what it is all about.'

S: You see, that's a very important detail [both laugh] because Krishnaji turns out to have been very right.

M: He was right in all such things. 'He doesn't intend going back there. He did a thorough job there, but neither of the sisters, as he calls them, really understand what is needed, nor has a clue.'

April twenty-fifth. 'John Rubel came with Salvador Juarez'—he was the stone mason. 'We wrestled over placement of the Malibu ocean rocks.' Oh, I brought up those rocks.

S: I know which ones.

M: To me, they're beautiful sculpture, sculpted by sand and waves.

S: Yes.

M: 'So we placed them in a pool in the patio. The shower doors were put in the bathrooms. I worked all day in the house and at the desk without lunch.'

April twenty-sixth, 'The Jøtul Norwegian stove'—the one in the dining room, like the one at Brockwood—'was installed and looks very nice. Krishnaji says it gives a country look.' Which it does, I think. 'I worked all day at the desk, trying to figure out the final costs on this house. In the evening, we watched TV, and something came up that made me ask Krishnaji if mankind's impulse toward religion is a plea to make things better, or something deeply inherent. He replied, "I think it is inherent."'

S: The impulse is inherent?

M: Yes.

The twenty-seventh says, 'There was an all-day-long trustee meeting. Before it, I telephoned my brother to sell some stock to be able to pay the remaining bills on the house. Krishnaji came to the meeting and made a statement on the future use of Pine Cottage when he and I are dead. It's not to be lived in, but used as a study place, library, for quiet study of the teachings. Last night, Rosalind R. telephoned Mark that she is selling the old Weideman property adjoining her house, and offered the KFA first refusal: two acres with two houses in bad repair. Cost $110,000.'

S: What's the Weideman House?

M: I think it's what we now call the Maris Lindley House, but it once belonged to someone in the distant past called Willie Weideman. I never knew him; he was before my time.

S: Ah. But how did Lindley get it if KFA bought it?

M: I don't know. I don't remember. Did we buy it? Well, it says we're buying it; I don't know if we did. We'll see. 'We debated it at the meeting, and decided KFA should buy it. Her agent tried to raise the price, but in the end, she said, "You should have it." So we are buying it. We must raise the money, as we have only enough for the two buildings Max is building at the school. The old Logan house is also for sale. We should buy that too for $165,000, but haven't any money. Much discussion too about publications, with much criticism of the choices of material for books…all this went on till after 5 p.m. It was wearisome. Alasdair came about planting plants.' There were two houses, and I've never been clear. The Old Logan House is somewhere up there, but I've never been up there.

S: Up there where the office is now?

M: No. Up Horn Canyon.

S: Oh, up Horn Canyon?

M: Yes.

S: But, that's not the Logan that was Krishnaji's friend, is it?

M: Yes, yes, that's the Logan. But I don't know…one was the Weideman house and one was the Logan house. I don't know how Lindley got it. She must've bought it. She wanted to be close to Arya Vihara…

S: Yes.

M: …and she bought it.

April twenty-eighth. 'Up early to work at the desk. I paid the insurance bills. At 10 a.m., Erna came with Mr. Brown, an insurance man, and we went over policies of all the properties here on McAndrew Road, KFA's share and mine. Elfriede came to clean and Mr. Schwartz brought new lampshades. Michael Mendizza filmed on 16mm a discussion in the living room between Krishnaji, Fritz, Mark, Evelyne, Alan, David Moody, and Laura Martin and Carol someone. In the afternoon, he filmed Krishnaji walking in the Oak Grove and also speaking briefly to the camera. I went to the bank with Erna and Ruth to sign before a notary the agreement between KFA and me and the transfer of the title of the McAndrew Road property to me.' This was a complicated maneuver that Louis Blau thought of, which was supposed to save me capital gain on selling my Malibu house.

S: Right.

M: …which never worked in the end because you need to sell the one before buying the other within eighteen months, and it took me longer than that to sell Malibu.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Anyway, Louis Blau thought up all this and in order to bring this about, I had to own all this property on McAndrew Road. I had to buy it, which I did. Well, eventually, I gave it all back. But that was what we went to the bank about. Yes, it says: 'All this is carefully worked out by Lou Blau. I pay $10,000 now and owe an additional $165,000, and I pay seven-and-three-fourths percent till I pay that off. I lease Arya Vihara and the orange groves to KFA and then give back the whole thing, retaining a life tenancy. I gave Elfriede instructions about Malibu as I won't be able to go there Tuesday as planned. Too much to do here. Another nonstop busy day,' it says.

April twenty-ninth. 'I slept well, and was busy all day in the house and at the desk. Max's brother Alan Tansill came to lunch at the Old House. I gave Erna a check to buy this place. Krishnaji, Mark, and I walked in the afternoon. Alasdair Coyne planted vines under the trellis and we moved the Malibu tubs of camellias up to the north patio, where they look lovely. Krishnaji is very pleased and kept going to look at them.' [Chuckles.]

The next day, 'I was busy all day in house. Rosalind Rajagopal reneged on the sale of the Weideman house by trying to raise the price to $115,000 and higher interest and retaining mineral right. She told Mark, "I have so many trustees," a lie because it doesn't belong to Happy Valley; it is her personal property. We won't pay what she now asks and with those conditions. Krishnaji dictated a statement to go in the minutes of last Thursday's trustee meeting about the use of Pine Cottage when he and I are dead. No one is to live here. It is to be a library, "a place of study and meditation, as carefully explained in my teachings." I spoke on the telephone to the Dunnes.'

May first. 'I worked at the desk. Krishnaji washed the green car with Ted's help.'

May second. 'Amanda and Phil came to see the house for the first time and for lunch with us in the cottage. It was a joy to have them here. They clearly like the house, and Krishnaji was pleased by this reaction. He noted Amanda explaining it, and the extraordinary atmosphere in the living room. It was a beautiful day. It was a clear day, and the air was laced with orange blossoms. It was perfect for their first visit, and first meal with us here. Later, Krishnaji washed the gray Mercedes. I had to keep working at the desk. I was up till 4 a.m. this morning on this. I finally figured out the cost of this house.'

The next day, 'I telephoned my stepfather, then started packing. Alasdair came in the afternoon and planted the herb garden by the back patio, also rock roses on the east bank. Dieter came and put the two cars up on jacks; drained the tanks and removed the batteries.' Dieter is the Mercedes garage person. 'Then, Krishnaji and I fastened old sheets over them.'

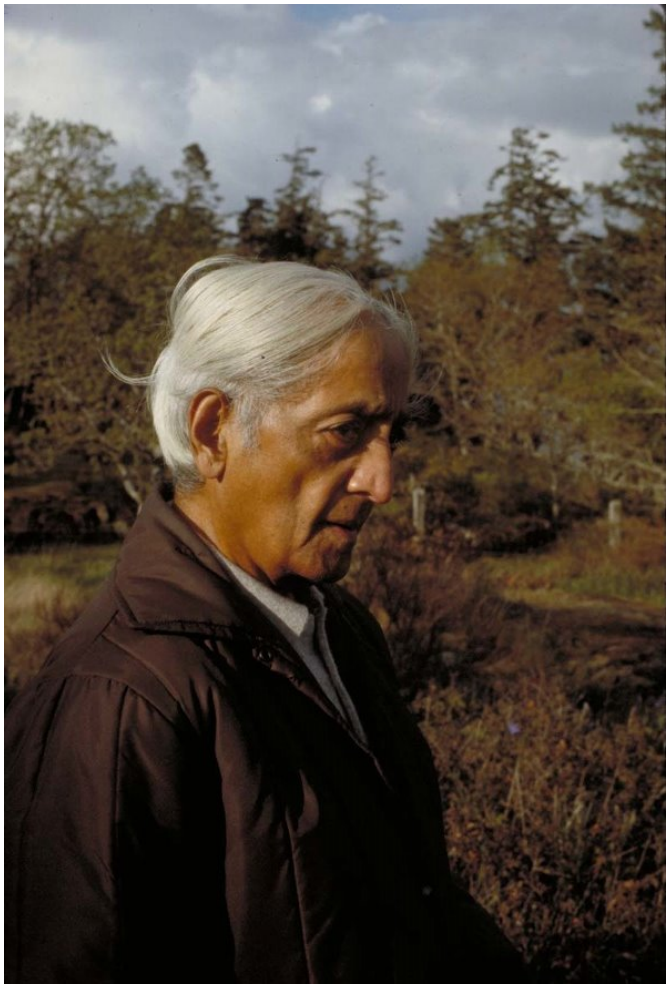
S: So, they stayed in the garage here?

M: Yes, and they were always prepared for our long time away.

May fourth. 'We were up at 5 a.m. Mark rang to say that Rajagopal had telephoned him last night, saying he had to speak to Krishnaji. Mark said Krishnaji is leaving this morning. Rajagopal said he would telephone through the office at 9 a.m. Krishnaji had me ring him. I said Krishnaji was calling. He thanked me rather unctuously. Krishnaji came on, and the conversation was short. All that was said was that Rajagopal sent his love and that he had not had the privilege of seeing him this year. Krishnaji said he accepted that. Mark had the school van to drive Krishnaji, Max, and me to the Los Angeles Airport. Everyone, the Lilliefelts, Fritz, Margrete (his wife), Michael Krohnen, Ted Cartee, Carl Marcus, and some others saw us off. Krishnaji wanted to go along the sea, and as we neared Malibu, Mark asked if I wanted to stop at the house. Krishnaji said, "Let's!" and we slowed. Elfriede was working with Lori along the driveway, thinking to see us pass. We drove in, and went into the house, Max seeing it for the first time, and I saw the partial cleanup of the broken pipe, etcetera, on the slide, done mostly by Lori and Elfriede and some by Carlson'—Carlson was a local contractor who tried to help fix these things—'who promised last night on the telephone that he would finish the work this afternoon. The house looked serene, beautiful, it is as part of me as my skin; its looks, its feels, its sounds, are extensions of my nerves, not because of memories, as Max suggested, but because it is, to me, something alive, as each tree and plant are in my care, a sort of trust, as an animal might feel. I cared for it from the beginning, and when it was hurt by the fire, I healed it. Now, I must turn away from it, and the pain is the absurd one, I suppose, of not losing it, but of turning away from it, not caring and tending it anymore. Krishnaji, Max, and I took the 12:30 TWA flight nonstop to London.'

S: Is that the year Max came to Brockwood?

M: Did he come?



S: He came to Brockwood.

M: Well, then that's it. I don't remember. He was the builder.

S: Yes, I remember.

M: May fifth. 'No sleep at all on the airplane, not even a doze. Krishnaji slept a little across the aisle, and when he woke up, he watched the sun rise and chanted to himself'…

S: This is on the airplane.

Walking in Brockwood Park (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: Yes…'in Sanskrit, quietly. We landed at 7 a.m. Dorothy and Doris in the Cortina and Scott with a van met us.' [M says S's name softly and both chuckle.] 'Scott Forbes brought back Max and the luggage. We drove through a light rain to Brockwood. Spring is young. Leaves are just beginning on the beeches and oaks, and the daffodils are still out. Everyone came out on the driveway to greet Krishnaji. We walked around a little, and then Krishnaji went to bed and slept most of the day. I showed Max around. He is in the West Wing guestroom. Dorothy brought trays to Krishnaji and me for lunch. I unpacked and bathed, ate lunch, and slept in the afternoon. I spoke to Mary Links on the telephone, who said that Vanda is visiting Paola and Jon in Cambridge.' Paola was Vanda's daughter, and she was married to Jon Cohen, who's a professor in Canada, and he was on a sabbatical in Cambridge.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And that brought Vanda over to England. I never could get her to come to Brockwood, but she did come when Paola and Jon were here. 'I telephoned Vanda. She will come to stay here next Friday.' I don't think she did, but we'll see.

S: I think she did.

M: Did she?

S: I think so. I remember seeing her at Brockwood. I'm sure I did.

M: I even had a guestroom created when we first moved into Brockwood that was to be Vanda's room.

S: If I may interrupt for a minute before we go on: What happened to Il Leccio, Vanda's house outside of Florence?

M: Oh, she lived there till she died.

S: I know. But what happened after she died?

M: I don't know. I've no contact. There's nobody to have contact with. Well, there is Paola; but Vanda's son, you know, was killed.

S: I know, before Vanda died. I know, a tractor accident.

M: Tractor, he was riding a tractor all by himself in a field or something.

S: Yes, and he fell off, and it fell over on him, or something.

M: It tipped over; he was crushed.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Awful.

S: I know.

M: I went down to Florence to see Vanda after Krishnaji died.

S: Yes.

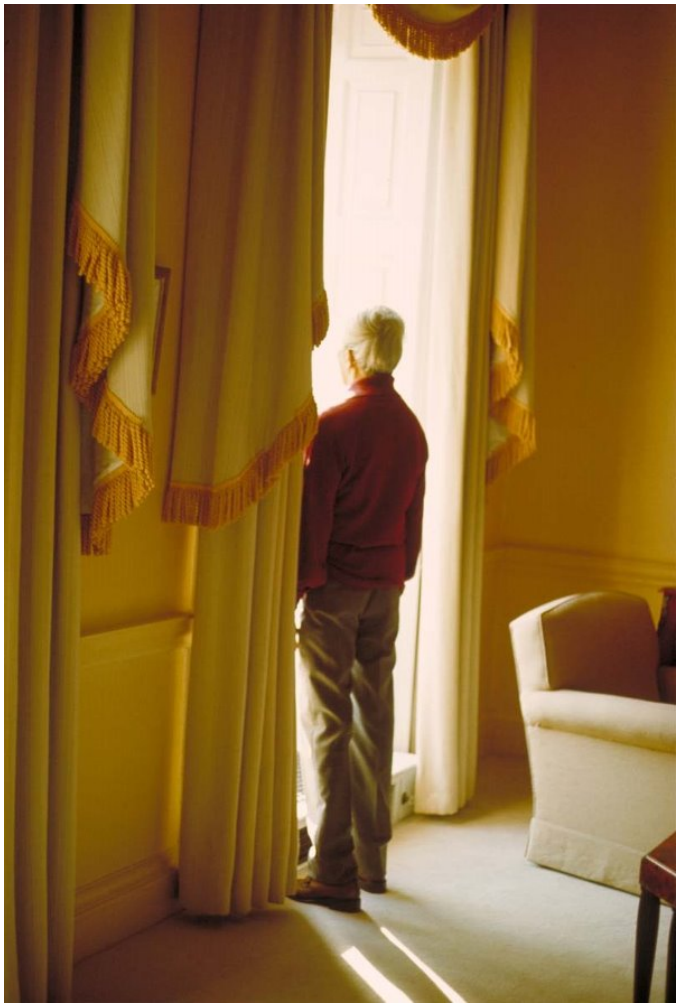
M: But stayed in Florence.

S: Not at Il Leccio?

M: I didn't stay in the house. She didn't have a guestroom or something; I stayed in Florence. Il Leccio is just outside.

S: Right, yes.

M: I didn't see her again after that, although we were in touch.



Walking in Brockwood Park (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

'I unpacked, bathed, and slept most of the afternoon, getting up to fetch Krishnaji's supper tray and to eat my own downstairs. So, once again, I am in this lovely room and very glad to be here. How extremely fortunate I've been in places I've lived in. How blessedly generous life has been in this.'

The sixth of May. 'Krishnaji and I rested. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked up and down the driveway. There was a discussion among a few in the afternoon, not with Krishnaji. I telephoned Filomena in Rome; it is her eighty-first birthday tomorrow. She sounded well and her usual dear self. Krishnaji was up for lunch, but rested otherwise. He says he feels "washed out." So do I. We took a gentle walk with Dorothy and the dogs up and down the driveway.'

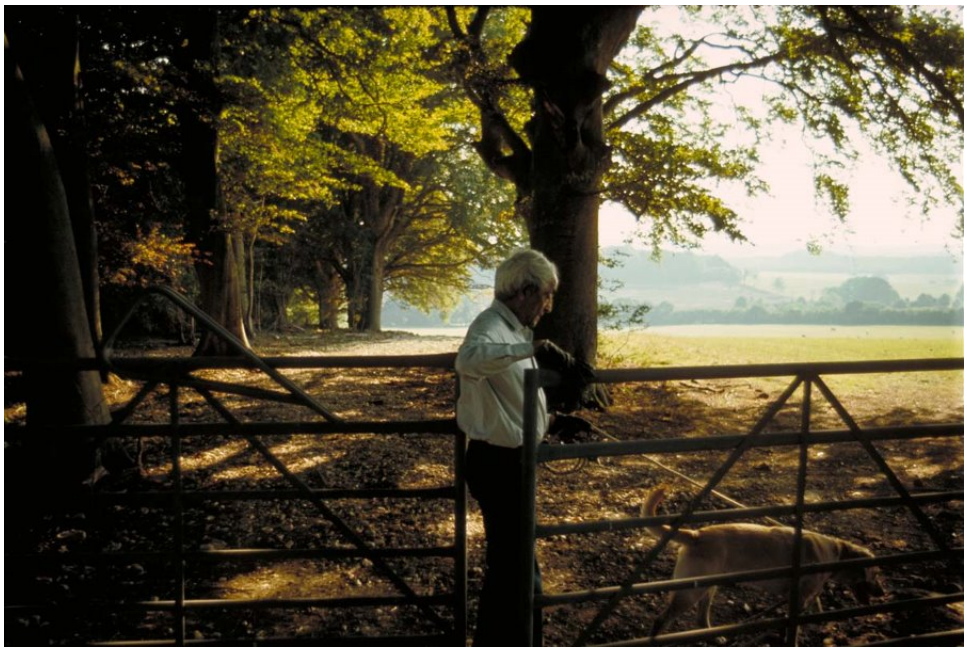
May seventh. 'Krishnaji didn't speak to the school. He rested in the morning. Mary and Joe came to lunch, and they, Krishnaji, and I sat in the kitchen talking afterward. Then, we strolled in the garden. They will summer here again this year.' They did that several summers when the school was on summer vacation, and we were in Gstaad.

S: Yes.

Looking out of the West Wing drawing room (Copyright Mary Zimablist)

M: Which was very nice, but it'd be nice if they came when we were all there. It'd be nicer. 'For supper, Krishnaji and I dined as guests of Dorothy in the theater workshop, where Carl Tolbert'—I'd forgotten him—'had'…

S: Yes.



M: …'a cooking class, studying restaurant management.' We had a restaurant…what?

S: Oh, yes, I remember that. It only happened one term.

M: Well, anyway, 'the theater workshop was done up as a restaurant, tables for four, candlelight, excellent menu, service good, live music, i.e., harpsichord and a recorder playing, two students; the food was very good. We dressed for the occasion, i.e., skirts for women and jackets for men.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji said afterward, "I watched their faces. It is a hard world for the young. Exams, A-levels, O-levels, then what to do in life. Thank god I'm not young."' [Chuckles.] Yes.

The next day, ‘Krishnaji didn’t sleep well. He rested during the day, but was tired. Eating mousse last night with cream in it is not good for him. I went to Petersfield in Doris’s mini on errands.’

May ninth. ‘The Mercedes is activated. In the morning, Krishnaji spoke to the school. In the afternoon, I took the Mercedes to be serviced in Chichester. Scott brought me back.’

Walking in Brockwood Park (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The tenth. ‘Krishnaji is tired. He saw Peter Jenkins’ child.’ She was the one with leukemia. ‘I went to the school meeting, and then with Donald Dennis to fetch the Mercedes in Chichester.’

May eleventh. ‘Krishnaji, Max, and I, in the newly serviced Mercedes, went to Petersfield and caught the 10:23 a.m. train to London. Max got off at Woking to go by bus to Heathrow and fly back to California, where he is to start work on the two school buildings. Max made friends with everyone at Brockwood. Last evening at supper, Brian Jenkins made an announcement about the swimming pool heater, which Max helped the students build out of two old radiators.’ Remember that?

S: I do [laughs]. It was a solar-powered swimming pool heater.

M: ‘And Brian Jenkins added that, due to a kind and smiling friend, a cover had been donated for the pool. All the students turned smiling and clapping to Max, who colored and made a shy bow.’ [S laughs.] ‘He takes everyone’s warm feelings with him. Krishnaji and I continued on to London. Looked in at Huntsman briefly, and then Krishnaji had his hair cut by Mr. Brown at Truefitt.’ Mr. Brown emerges to fame.

S: I remember him. Krishnaji always had his haircut by Mr. Brown.

M: It was a sort of a male preserve in there.

S: Yes, very much so.

M: I would sometimes go in and there'd be a chair for a visiting creature such as I. I could sit in, but I knew I was intruding. [Both laugh.]

S: I went in with Krishnaji.

M: Yes, but you would've been accepted eagerly.

S: Yes, yes, I was.

M: But, women? No. [S laughs, and M.] 'I bought two pair of flat Ferragamo shoes on the corner.' That's around the corner from Truefitt. 'We then walked to Fortnum's and lunched with Mary Links. There was a pleasantness in the picking up of the familiarity of all this, the train compartment, Waterloo, and London cabs, Huntsman with its bolts of woolens, the walk down Burlington Arcade, and of course, Fortnum's and its smell of very expensive groceries.' [Laughs.] 'And so to our window table for three, the invariable lunch of fruit salad, cheese flan, grilled mushrooms, fresh spinach for Krishnaji, and then his gâterie ice cream. We talked about the uncertainties of people; who will be responsible when he is not there to hold all the work together as he now does. And Mary raised again the need for him to clarify his will, so that his letters will not be under the jurisdiction of the publications committee. This should be gone into when we can during these coming weeks. Krishnaji took a cab alone to Portland Place.'

S: If I may stop here a minute, just to clarify, that when you had lunch at Fortnum's, it wasn't in the downstairs…

M: Oh, no. It was upstairs.

S: It was in the upstairs more formal dining room, which, it's on the fifth floor?

M: Fourth floor, I think. I think, I'm not positive.

S: And there was always that Scottish lady who was the maître d'.

M: Yes. And she always escorted us to that same table.

S: Right, the same table, which is in the corner just as you enter on the right-hand side.

M: Well, it's over by the window.

S: Yes, by the window, but it's on the farthest…

M: There's a banquette that goes along under the window, where there's room for two, and then there's the end of the table, which backs up to a short bit of wall.

S: Yes, yes. I'm just trying to locate this for posterity, you see. [Chuckles.]

M: People will go stare at it!

S: [with laughter in voice] Yes, they probably will. If I didn't already know it, I'd probably do the same.

M: Well, see that you don't forget [with mock stern voice].

S: [laughs] So, Krishnaji took a cab alone to Portland Place, you said.

M: Well, yes. 'Krishnaji took a cab alone to Portland Place.' That's the dentist place.

S: Yes.

Walking in Brockwood Park (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: …'whilst I bought him some goat cheese, coffee for me, and a new detective at Hatchards,' a good bookstore on Piccadilly, right near Fortnum. 'Then I followed him to Mr. Thompson's. He had X-rays, etcetera, and they both came out to tell me'—that's Thompson and Krishnaji—'that next Thursday, afterThompson has pondered, we will discuss what should be done. Considerable repair is needed and Krishnaji is worrying about the expense. Thompson said he was sick at what it will be, which will be around 1,000 pounds sterling. I obviously said Krishnaji was not to think about the cost, only what was best. Thompson said Krishnaji was clearly going to live to be a hundred. And the new tooth would last that long. So we left, caught a cab on the corner, and got back to Brockwood a few minutes before Vanda arrived by car with Paola and Jon from Cambridge, where Jon is teaching economics for a year. This is Vanda's first visit. She's in the West Wing guestroom, and Paola and Jon are in the West Wing dining room.' That means, it was considered a dining, at least it was intended to be, a dining room, if Krishnaji wanted a dining room in the West Wing, but it was later known as the Bird Room because of the wall paper. It now should be known as the Butterfly Room because the wall paper with birds was ruined by a leak in the roof, and I couldn't get any more of that bird paper, it didn't exist, so…

S: It was butterflies.

M: It was butterflies, which is really in my view, as the one responsible, an improvement because it's a north-facing room, and it…

S: Yes, it's much cheerier.

M: …it's bright yellow.

S: Yes, yes.

M: The birds were nice but they didn't make it lighter.

S: Yes.

M: So, if anybody cares, that's what happened.

S: Although I have to correct you.

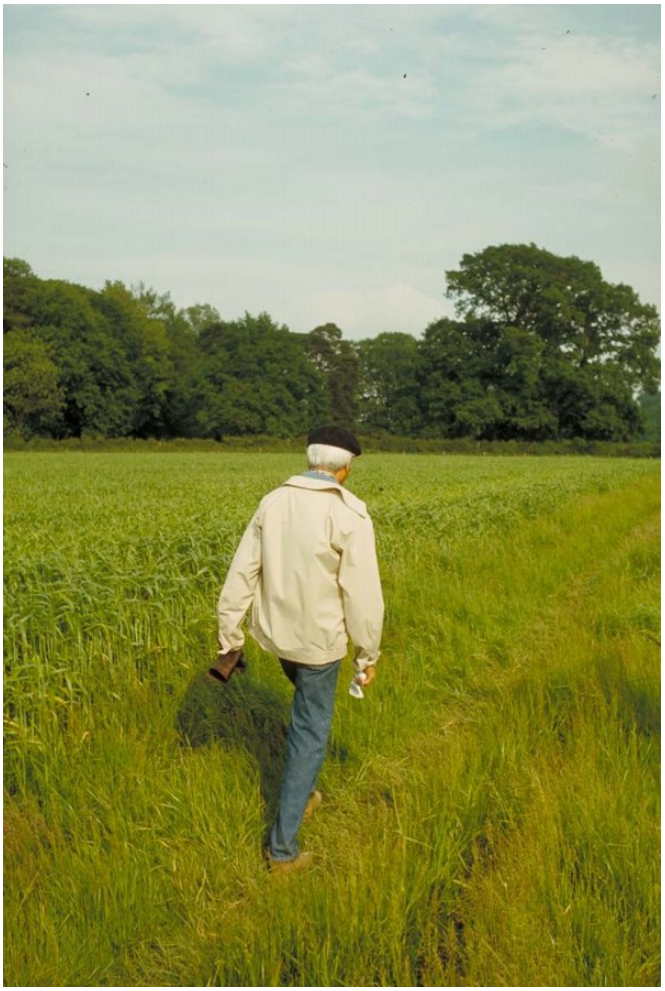
M: Yes?

S: It wasn't the roof that leaked through to the paper.

M: No. It was the…

S: …the pipe.

M: It was the pipe? Oh.



S: It was an old pipe that was left over from the…

M: …the eighteenth century.

S: …the eighteenth century, and it was a lead pipe…

M: Oh, awful.

S: …which had eroded through and water ran down the length of the wall, and that's what did it.

Walking in Brockwood Park (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: I stand corrected. But leaks were not unusual events in Brockwood, and it's still going on, as far as I know. 'It was their first visit, and Krishnaji took Vanda on an immediate tour before we went to bed. Frances McCann and various Brockwood people (like Shakuntala and Natasha) who had visited Vanda in Florence, greeted her. We talked a little about the Aldo Moro horror[1]. Vanda has not rented her flat again in Rome. It is no place for Krishnaji these days, she said.' Hmm, that was interesting.

May twelfth. 'It was Krishnaji's eighty-third birthday. As usual, he brushed aside any mention of it. I made breakfast for Paola and Jon before they left for Devon, to where one of their boys is in school. Vanda remained. There was a discussion between Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me about his talking to some of the members of Brockwood who seem dependable, responsible, and who will be committed to it. Krishnaji wanted to talk to them right away, so at 4 p.m., in the West Wing dining room for privacy, Krishnaji met Dorothy, Scott, Harsh, Stephen Smith, Shakuntala, Ingrid and me. The problem' [laughs] 'was met of not incorporating partners, whom Scott, Stephen and Ingrid have. The point is responsibility for Brockwood now and after he is gone. Joe and Carol are leaving. Dorothy talked to them just before this meeting, and they do want to try it in the U.S. At 5 p.m., there was a staff meeting. Narayan has arrived. I spoke to Betsy Drake in London where she has a flat for three months and seems pleased.

May thirteenth. 'Krishnaji remained in bed. Pascaline Mallet is here for the weekend, and I explained to her why Krishnaji decided not to go Brittany in June as originally planned. She had made inquiries about places there. The Marogers are here with their youngest daughter, Diane, a dear little girl, very bright, eager, friendly, and who has a congenital bone illness. Her parents hope that Krishnaji will cure her. Krishnaji talked to Narayan. In the evening, Vanda and I talked. She has brought with her her record of the times in 1961 in Gstaad, and 1962, when Krishnaji fainted, and another entity seemed to speak to her through him. Mary L. comes here tomorrow, and Vanda is wondering whether to tell her about it. They have met only once at a Tannegg lunch a few years ago. They should know each other, and perhaps tomorrow will bring this about. I said to Vanda that I had hoped she would wish to tell Mary. She came across her notebook when moving out of her Rome flat at Via Barnaba Oriani.' That's the name of the street.

S: So, Vanda came across the 1961/1962 record that she had made?

M: Yes. But what she did with it, god knows.

S: So, we don't have that?

M: Not that I know of. When I visited her, she had all of Krishnaji's letters to her in a plastic shopping bag in her hall closet downstairs. I tactfully suggested other ways of preserving them and all kinds of things, but she, I don't know, just didn't react. And after she died…she had a friend, Mary somebody, in London, also a yoga person, and I was able to get in touch with Paola through this Mary, her friend, and I sent word. I didn't want to be pushy about it, that if Vanda had left any provision for archive material, that we had archives and would very much like to have any material. But nothing ever happened. I didn't feel I could push it any more.

S: No, of course not.

M: So, as I was reading, 'I told her I hoped she would wish to tell Mary Links. She came across her notebook when moving out of her Rome flat on Via Barnaba Oriani. She feels as though it is private, and she has kept it to herself, but that she has not the right to do this indefinitely. "It is not mine." But, as she doesn't know Mary, she said, "With you, I feel like a sister. I can tell you."'

May fourteenth. 'Mary L. and Amanda Pallant came in the morning. Krishnaji talked to everyone. After lunch, Vanda, Mary, and I talked, and after a bit of general conversation, what I had hoped for came about. Vanda began to tell Mary about the events that began in July '61 at Tannegg, the period at the start of Krishnamurti's Notebook, when Krishnaji was staying with her. Krishnaji, in his room, suddenly fainted, and then as Vanda described it, his eyes became enormous and another being spoke to her through Krishnaji's body. An extraordinary change came over the face. It happened on July 18, 1961. The voice said, "Don't leave me until he comes back." And then, "He must love you if he lets you touch me, as he is very particular in this." And "Don't let anyone come near me until he comes back." On the following day, it happened again. Krishnaji fainted. After trembling, the eyes became larger and deeper, and the voice said, "I feel very strange. Where am I? Don't leave me. Will you kindly stay with me until he returns? Are you comfortable? Take a chair. Do you know him well? Will you look after him?" It was this last question that Vanda said "Is why I am here." She feels she gave her word on this; she said that for a whole month Krishnaji's face continued to change. There was not a return of the other being but a "different look" would come over his face. He fainted once in the woods on a walk across the Turbach stream.' The Turbach is a river that runs behind Tannegg. 'She describes these looks, and the feeling around Krishnaji at that time, in language that seems to copy Krishnaji's own in Krishnamurti's Notebook, which she was reading as he wrote it. Coming from her, not him, it sounds a little overdrawn, but she read most of it to Mary and me, from her own handwritten account. Part of it described a time, a year later, the twenty-first of May, 1962, in Rome when Krishnaji was ill with fever, and became delirious. "It has been told to you to look after him. He should not have gone out. You should've told him." And, "Do you know him? You cannot know him. How can you know the running water?"…"We repeat and never question. Tell him, take a pencil, tell him 'Death is always there very close to you, to protect you.'…'When you take shelter, you will die.' Mary and I guessed there were four entities in all this. The one who goes away (presumably Krishnaji); the one who tells what should be done; the one with the great eyes; and probably the childlike one who also spoke to me in Gstaad when Krishnaji was delirious. Mary and Amanda had to return to London, but it was a good meeting, and a bond was formed. Paola and Jon returned from Dorset and visiting their son at Dartington, just before Mary and Amanda left, and so Amanda met them too, for the first time. Paola and Jon spent the night.'

S: Alright. Let me just ask you, because what's clear is that Vanda had brought her…

M: Notebook.

S: …her notebook. And she didn't just tell Mary and you about it; she actually read it out.

M: Yes.

S: And so all these quotes are your writing down what she had said.

M: That's right. That was what she told Mary and me.

S: This is probably the only record we have left of it.

M: I know, I know. I have no idea what Paola's done with these things, or if indeed Vanda even had them when she died.

S: Yes. Yes, because she would throw things away.

M: She would throw things away.

S: So, you and Mary are proffering that there are four beings. There is the one who went away (presumably Krishnaji); the second is the one…

M: …who was left.

S: …the one who was left. The third is the one with the big eyes.

M: The one with the big eyes…

S: Can you read them again? Because I want to make sure I get this.

M: Oh, yes, yes. Mary and I probably talked about it afterwards.

S: Exactly.

M: 'The one who goes away (presumably Krishnaji); the one who tells what should be done'—the one who was talking to her who said, "You should look after him. You didn't look after him."

S: But, that's not the same as the little child.

M: No. The little child is very distinctive, because I had an experience with the little child, and it's the little, little voice that talks like a child.

S: Okay. So, there's the little child; there's the one who tells what should've been done.

M: Yes.

S: …who's in a way instructing the person looking after the body.

M: …yes, chiding the person, really. "Why did you not…you should've told him," that person said.

S: And then the fourth one is the one with the big eyes?

M: I don't know why we got the fourth one with the big eyes. The one with the "great eyes" it says. I didn't see great eyes when I had the same experience. Well, I don't know what she interprets, because when—I'm now judging from my own experience with him, which is that he was looking around the room and didn't recognize or even know who I was. I've written about that elsewhere. And he spoke to me as though…and he said, "Did you ask him any questions?" he said to me. He was looking around the room, as though he didn't know where he was; he certainly didn't know who I was. And he spoke to me as though I were a stranger, “Did you ask him any questions?” and I said, “No.” And he said, “He doesn’t like to be asked questions.”

S: Isn’t that more the instructor?

M: Yes. But his eyes could’ve been described more as…they were unseeing. They were eyes of…

S: But Vanda said that his eyes never went back. So, in a way, there was the Krishnaji who existed after this event, who is different to the one who existed before this event, and different to the other three. [Long pause.]

M: Yes.

S: He was never quite the same again.

M: Well, without repeating it all, the one who is left says, ‘“Don’t leave me until he comes back.” And then, “He must love you if he lets you touch me as he is very particular in this.”…“Don’t let anyone come near me until he comes back.”’ And then on the following day, it happened again. Krishnaji fainted after trembling. ‘The eyes became larger and deeper and the voice said, “I feel very strange. Where am I? Don’t leave me. Will you kindly stay with me until he returns.”’ That’s still the one who’s left, but, you see, that has the big eyes. I’ve only questioned, or tried to figure out if there’s a fourth one with big eyes.

S: That’s why I’m asking.

M: I think it’s the same one who’s looking around bewildered.

S: Yes.

M: ‘“Will you stay with me until he returns? Are you comfortable? Take a chair. Do you know him well?”’ You see, this is like, to me, he didn’t know who I was, and he didn’t know who she was. ‘“Will you look after him?”’ It was this last question that Vanda said ‘“Is why I am here.”’ She took it as her job, just as I took it as my job when he said these things. ‘She feels she gave her word on this. She said that for a whole month Krishnaji’s face continued to change. There was not a return of the other being, but a “different look” would come over his face. He fainted once in the wood on the walk across the Turbach Stream. She describes these looks and the feelings around Krishnaji that time in language that seems to copy Krishnaji’s own in the Notebook, which she was reading as he was writing it then.’

S: So, what I’m asking is, is the fourth person the person who was left after these events, in the more the day-to-day things?

M: Well, there's always a person who goes away, and there's always the person who's there, who is, as he said to me, something like…this is not verbatim, but the gist of it is (but I have it written down somewhere), "Even after all this time, all these years, I don't feel at ease with him." That's said by the person who is left, when Krishnaji has gone away.

S: Yes.

M: The one who doesn't know who you are, or where he is, really, and he looks around with vacant eyes, which could be described as big eyes.

S: But you and Mary are postulating a fourth person, which could be, after all this is over, somehow, Krishnaji is different than he was before.

M: I don't know if it's a fourth person.

S: Of course.

M: Yes. She said, '"there was not a return of the other being, but a 'different look' would come over his face."'

S: Right, right. I'm just trying to probe. We don't have to push this further.

M: I know. I'm trying to sense what it seemed…or trying to provoke what I was seeing, because…well, there were times when he was off, if you know what I mean.

S: Yes.

M: And one didn't intrude on that. Only once did I—I've told you about this before. I only made one mistake in not sensing it. It was in Malibu and we were having supper on trays and looking at the evening news. And I was sitting on that long sofa that's in the other room; and I was sitting on that long sofa, and he was at the other end; it's twelve feet long, so it was quite a ways away, and the television was over there, and we were both watching it. And we'd been talking. And he was eating; I was eating. And I suddenly made some remark, and he reacted with a convulsive shock as though…a physical shock. And I didn't realize that he'd suddenly gone off. I mean, it wasn't unlikely. He would go off, he'd go off in many unusual moments, but I hadn't picked it up. And it gave him this physical shock. And the next day he told me that he'd been shaking all night from it. So you had to…

S: …be sensitive.

M: …be very sensitive. And that's the only time I didn't pick up the signal.

S: Yes.

M: I don't know, these things are hard to sort out.

S: Anyway. Continue on. Did you finish off that day?

M: Not quite. 'Krishnaji again put his hands on the Maroger child, Diane, a dear little girl, age eleven.'

May fifteenth. 'Paola and Jon spent the night here, and before they left after lunch, Jon had a long talk with Krishnaji. "I lit a bomb under him," said Krishnaji with satisfaction. The bomb presumably is to lead Jon to see that he's wasting his life teaching economics.' [M and S chuckle.] 'I met Mary C. at Petersfield, and we talked shop for most of the day. Vanda is staying on here till Thursday. Half the school went on a two-day camping trip. In the afternoon, Krishnaji put his hands on the Maroger child. "She's an extraordinary child. She sat absolutely still with her eyes closed," said Krishnaji afterward. He both did and didn't want to talk about it. "One mustn't talk about it," he said.' He didn't like talking about healing at all.

S: Yes.

M: May sixteenth. 'The house is quiet and relaxed, with only a few of us are here. Krishnaji treated the Maroger child. Vanda gave a yoga lesson to Dr. Parchure and others in the evening. She dictated parts of her notes on the '61, '62 events, and I typed them.'

S: I don't think I have ever seen this account of Vanda's that you typed up. Do you have any recollection of it at all?

M: No.

S: Perhaps what we'll do this afternoon, with your permission, is just look through Vanda's file quickly.

M: Yes. Where would Vanda's file be?

S: In your file cabinet.

M: Oh, that one. I'm not sure I have anything in it.

S: Well, we'll take a look. Alright. Let's continue.

M: May seventeenth: 'Another quiet day. In the afternoon, for half an hour, Krishnaji put his hands on the head, arms, legs, and various bones of Diane Maroger, something he's never done at such length.'

May eighteenth. 'Krishnaji, Vanda, and I went to London by train. They went to Huntsman while I took Vanda's suitcase to Fortnum's. Then, I went to fetch photos.

Mary L. and Amanda joined Krishnaji, Vanda, and me at Fortnum's for lunch at 12:30 p.m.'

S: Where would you have taken the photos? There's a photo place on Bond Street, is that the one you went to?

M: I've no idea.

S: Okay.

Walking in Brockwood Park (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: 'After lunch, Vanda dropped Krishnaji and me at the dentist, and she went on to the train to Cambridge to join Paola. Mr. Thompson has studied Krishnaji's X-rays and decided five teeth must come out. Two will be crowned, and two bridges will be necessary. He pulled two upper left today; there was scarcely any bleeding, but he said it was a good thing as there was pus underneath. Krishnaji said he was alright. Vanda had tried to persuade him not to have Novocain. When I remonstrated in the taxi, Krishnaji pressed my arm, and I realized he was telling me he would pay no attention to her advice.' [S chuckles.] 'He had the Novocain and said afterward he couldn't have stood it without it. We got a taxi quickly, and the train was waiting, so we were back in Brockwood by 5:20 p.m.'

May nineteenth, 'Krishnaji has tooth pain, but the swelling is gone. He got up for lunch, treated Diane, "an extraordinary child," he says each time. And again, it was a long treatment. He walked with Narayan, and I went to a staff meeting. A letter came from a man who wrote in December to Krishnaji about Padre Pio.'

S: Ah, yes.

M: That was interesting. I recently came across my account of all that.

S: Yes, Padre Pio was interesting.

M: Yes. 'In January, I answered this man that Krishnaji was in India, etcetera, but that he knew of Padre Pio. The man added a p.s. in today's letter that Padre Pio also knew of Krishnaji. Today's letter appeals to me to explain the relation of mystical states of Krishnaji and Padre Pio. I read the letter to Krishnaji. And asked him how he considers the record of mystical experiences as described in so many religious writings. He is skeptical of most, he said. "I question that it is a total vision. It is a partial vision, like a little harbor. The waters are of the sea, but it is without the width."' That's nice.

S: Just tell a little. What did Krishnaji think of Padre Pio?

M: Well, he didn't say what he thought just of Padre Pio, but he talked in answer to my questions.

S: And Padre Pio was aware of Krishnaji?

M: Yes. Vanda knew about Padre Pio, and apparently, once when Krishnaji was ill in India, before my time, and she was worried that something awful would happen to him, she somehow asked Padre Pio. I don't know what the contact was, and he said, "Do not worry, he will be alright." So, anyway, Padre Pio had the stigmata.

S: Yes. I remember.

M: There are many things I could've, I should've asked Krishnaji, but…

S: Oh, I know…it's…I'm… [Laughs.]

M: I didn't want to push. I mean, if he wanted to tell me, I wanted to hear.

S: Yes.

M: But I didn't want to corner him with questions. It didn't seem cricket.

May twentieth. 'Krishnaji decided to spend the day in bed. He had Dr. Parchure work on my back to help the leg circulation. Krishnaji gave another long treatment to Diane, who wept afterward because she felt so happy with Krishnaji. We have moved the Marogers into the West Wing guestroom. The house is filled with weekend guests.'

The twenty-first. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. We walked in the afternoon. He treated Diane Maroger. Dr. Parchure treated my lower back and foot.'

May twenty-second. 'Guests, desk, etcetera. School meeting. Krishnaji treated Diane Maroger. Dr. Parchure massaged my lower back and foot.'

The next day, 'Dr. Parchure and Krishnaji decided Krishnaji will live to be 100.' [S chuckles.] 'And therefore, says Krishnaji, I must live to be eighty-two or so.' This is in 1978. Well, anyway, I won't do the math on that.

S: It means you're supposed to live at least two years longer than he does.

M: Yes. 'Dr. Parchure is doing my back and foot each day, activating nerves. It seems to be helping. My leg was warm at night, which is unusual. Krishnaji spoke to students alone. He was tired afterward. It was rather cold at lunch, and we only strolled in the grove with Dorothy in the afternoon. His teeth are hurting, so eating is difficult. He is without complaint with all this, takes it as a fact. His face is thin and tired, which rings my heart. With all this, he has made me send off a letter to Pama Patwardhan giving his agreement to a schedule in India that includes Rajghat and Bangalore, two more places than last year. This far ahead he will agree to any plan, and then it is too much when he comes to it. Pupul writes she will arrive here on the ninth of June and stay till the eighteenth. Krishnaji treated little Diane Maroger, as he has each day.'

The twenty-fourth. 'I met Mary C. and Mary L. at the Petersfield train station, and the publications committee met at 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji joined it after lunch. There were touchy matters, as always, between Foundations. The Indian book Insights is next to be published. It is a book of discussions with Krishnaji in India edited by Pupul and Sunanda. Their English is unacceptable. What to do? Krishnaji says they claim their English "shows how the Indian mind works"—whatever that means,' [chuckles] 'and hence, it mustn't be changed. It is just illiterate to those here.' [Chuckles.] 'An everlasting argument to placate the Indians, which I really don't follow. There was also more of the pros and cons of publishing more of the K-Bohm dialogues. Mary L. was strongly against, as before.' Eventually they were published. 'Erna and Theo have joined the fray in favor of them. I seem to be the only one who hasn't read the transcripts. I took the two Marys back to the train. The Linkses go to Venice on Saturday until the tenth. Krishnaji was present in the afternoon sessions and throughout the discussion of the Indian book. We walked gently in the grove later.'

May twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji and I went to London. We took Marie-Bertrande Maroger to the station, too. She went to the Chelsea Flower Show. Krishnaji and I went to Huntsman, the bank, etcetera. We lunched at Fortnum's. Browsed in Hatchards. With difficulty, we got a taxi to the dentist. Mr. Thompson pulled a third tooth, a lower front; the Novocain was painful and the extraction painful. "I yelled," Krishnaji said later. I ached sitting apart in the waiting room. We had trouble getting a taxi afterward. Krishnaji resists fiercely all efforts to get him to wait in the dentist's waiting room until I get the taxi. My concern irks him. His stubbornness makes me rather desperate. Where he is tired, he tries to carry every package we have, etcetera. Tuesday he has three hours with Thompson. Krishnaji agreed to let me ask Amanda Pallant to drive us to Waterloo afterward. He does not want to be driven all the way to Brockwood, firmly. His tooth today had pus under it too. It has been hurting him since we were in Victoria.' You see, he never complained.

S: Yes, I know. And we'll have to leave it here because we've run out of tape.

M: Oh, alright.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Aldo Moro had been a prime minister of Italy who had been kidnapped and murdered by the Red Brigades urban guerilla group.

Issue 52: May 26, 1978 to July 11, 1978

Mary calls attention to the value of her large diary, as opposed to her little daily diary, in this issue, as well she might. There are several instances in which Krishnaji makes fascinating comments or has extraordinary small conversations with her, and they would be lost to us if it were not for Mary recording them in her large diary. What is also striking is how deftly and nimbly Mary can follow Krishnaji's lead on how to proceed with the conversation: ending the topic when he is finished with it, delving into it when that seems appropriate, changing the subject when needed. It is difficult to imagine anyone else being as sensitive, effective, or supportive in these conversations; and it is impossible to overstate how fortunate we are that she took the time and trouble to write so much of it down.

Mary: So, you want me to start on May twenty-sixth, but there's nothing of note on that day. And the next day just says, 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed resting, but getting up in a dressing gown to treat the little Maroger child. "I've never done it so intensely," he said. Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrand say Diane has more energy and more strength since this healing started.'

Scott: Yes.

M: 'Also, Krishnaji spoke to the Bowman twins, Lee and Karen.' I don't know who they were.

S: They were two American students at Brockwood.

M: Oh?

S: Yes. I remember them well.

M: May twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. A very moving, far-off talk. At the end, it was on the religious life is to be free of the self. I was stirred to tears. He spoke from the far reaches of something sacred. He felt later that it had not been understood, and said, "They are not able to see it." It was a warm day, in the seventies. Krishnaji, Dorothy, I, and the two dogs went to see the bluebells along the road to West Meon, and wound up going around the block.' You know what I mean by around the block?

S: Yes, yes.

M: 'In the evening, we watched the first half of the movie The Godfather on television.'

On the twenty-ninth, 'It was another hot day. There was a school meeting in the afternoon, which I attended, before Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked the dogs. I telephoned Dr. Scheef, and we have an appointment with him on June twenty-eighth.' Dr. Scheef was the head of the clinic in Bonn.

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

S: Right. We've met him already.

M: Tuesday, the thirtieth. 'A letter came from my brother. He arrives at Gatwick next week, and leaves later that day from Heathrow'…well, it's all about his plans. 'I'll try to meet him. Krishnaji and I went to London. We lunched early at Fortnum's. Then, Krishnaji spent from 2 p.m. until 5:45 p.m. almost four hours' [said with exclamation in her voice] 'in Mr. Thompson's dentist's chair. Four teeth were prepared for crowns. Two teeth were extracted. Now, there is a two-week pause until the bridgework and crowns are ready. Krishnaji bore all this with total fortitude. Amanda Pallant came and was there with her car to drive us straight to Waterloo. We immediately caught the 6:20 p.m. train and, though men were standing in the aisles, we found two seats. I sat opposite and felt physically beaten by his face; drawn but bearing the pain and misery all quietly. It was 8:30 p.m. when we reached Brockwood. "I'm so glad you have a nice room to come to," he said. Notions of those awful houses in Wimbledon…' Anyway…

S: Those are the awful houses that used to be rented for him when he would go there.

M: Yes, yes. And he never complained.

S: And they were awful houses because Rajagopal wouldn't give any money.

M: That's right.

The next day, 'I woke up with a migraine at 3 a.m. It was a hot day. Betsy Drake came down from London on the noon train. I met her at Petersfield, she lunched at Brockwood, and we spent a pleasant afternoon. Krishnaji stayed in bed, but came into the West Wing kitchen to greet her. She was struck by his face, "marvelous looking." I showed her the gardens, which were in their fullest flowering.'

S: So, Betsy had never met Krishnaji before?

M: Not personally, I don't think. She offended me no end at one point. She came up to the talks in Ojai once, and I found she was sitting sketching people during the talk. [S chuckles.] So, I wasn't at all…well, I knew she just wasn't interested.

The first of June. 'It was a hot day, somewhere in the eighties. Krishnaji and I went to London. In the train he spoke again about the four hours on Tuesday in the dentist chair during the entire of which his mind was empty.'

S: Hm, remarkable.

M: I just can't…

S: It's not human!

M: No. [Both laugh.] And he didn't…or, at least, I'm saying he didn't, I don't know what he did, but I don't think he was trying to make it empty. I think it just was.

S: Yes.

M: That's a supposition on my part.

S: Yes.

M: But, I'm sure of it. [Chuckles.] For whatever that's worth. 'He said it hadn't struck him until afterward that his mind had been empty.' [Chuckles.] 'In the taxi on the way to Huntsman, he said that only when Mr. Thompson asked if he was alright, if it hurt, he would reply. Otherwise, his mind was empty. Then, he said, "All this way in the taxi, coming from the station, there has been nothing in my head. It's getting more and more this way." Then, he said that when he put his hands on people to heal, sometimes it is as though there were a flame, a little flame in the middle of his hand, and that when he started treating Diane Maroger, there was none, for a number of times, and then slowly, it began to happen. And then, he felt, he was able to help her. He said that, for instance, when he put his hand on Sacha de Manziarly when he was in the hospital and dying'—this was in Paris—'there was no flame, and from that he could tell that he could do nothing.' Isn't that interesting?

S: Remarkable. It's very interesting.

M: Very interesting. See, that's the value of the big book. This little one has nothing of this kind in it.

S: Yes, but the little diary is valuable anyway.

M: 'At Huntsman, he chose two good thin materials for trousers, a brushed cotton and a beige. We then walked to Fortnum's. At lunch, I asked him about his own response to seeing suffering in India, or a poor bent man that we saw shuffling along the Strand. Was what he felt "a reaction"? He knew I was thinking of his chiding me for taking on his pain at the dentist last Tuesday.' [S laughs heartily.] 'I mustn't, because he then feels it in me, and he doesn't want the burden on me. He spoke about going back to India in 1922, and the sights of misery were so appalling, that he could only walk at night.' I had forgotten that.

S: Hmm.

M: 'We went to Thompson, where only an adjustment to the present bridge had to be done. When we came out, we instantly caught a taxi, and then the 3:50 p.m. train at Waterloo just as they were blowing the whistle to leave. It was hot on the train. Brockwood was cool, a refuge. I showered and changed into clothes I will wear in India. I cabled my brother; I will meet him at Gatwick on Monday.'

The next day it just says, 'Warm again. Desk work. Staff meeting.'

There is little more for June third. 'It was warm and marvelously lovely. The grove has never been so beautiful. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I strolled in it. Krishnaji talked to Scott Forbes.' You'll have to ask him about that.

S: [chuckles] Scott Forbes has no memory of it at all, and he wasn't intelligent enough to make notes!

M: [laughs] So, it's lost to posterity.

June fourth. 'A man named Geoffrey Nicoletti in Philadelphia has been writing urgent letters to Krishnaji, to me, to David Bohm, and one came here for Alain Naudé, which I forwarded. He is hung up on resolving Krishnaji's teachings and life, to the implications of the life of Padre Pio, whom he greatly reveres. He speaks of the physical signs: the stigmata, healings, being in two places, etcetera, which he regards as evidence of something, all involved with faith, a belief in Jesus, etcetera; but then there's Krishnaji's denial of faith, etcetera. I read the latest letter to Krishnaji, and he suggested that he and I have a taped conversation in which I put forth the questions in Nicoletti's letters, and see what happens. We did this today, taping it on the Uher. Krishnaji said that the phenomena of so-called "sainthood" are familiar in various religions, and they can come about without the person having truly perceived truth. He spoke of waters in the harbor and the waters of the sea. They are the same waters, but those in the harbor are contained (i.e., still within a framework); whereas those of the sea are boundless. He questions any perception that doesn't discard all religious dogma. It is partial, and therefore not the ultimate. Nicoletti had mentioned kundalini, assuming Krishnaji to have had it, and that Padre Pio's experience could be so described. Krishnaji objected to the term, and said he questions most descriptions of kundalini as not being the real thing. Nicoletti also asked if Padre Pio would consider Krishnaji as a profound thinker, but incomplete in not having perceived the meaning of Jesus; and if Krishnaji would consider Padre Pio as one who had helped people through healing, etcetera, but who had fundamentally done them harm through using faith, belief, etcetera. Krishnaji said this was a question he didn't want to answer: to assess someone, "to say he is or is not." And he questioned comparing Krishnaji and Padre Pio. I'm going to get the tape transcribed somehow, and send a copy to Nicoletti.' I wonder if I did that? I must have.

S: Where is that tape?

M: Well, that I think is coming in the shipment because I found it there at Brockwood when I went through all my things before moving out.

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

'In the afternoon, Krishnaji talked privately to Ingrid as part of the five staff members from Brockwood to whom he looks for commitment to the place. The Marogers left for home after supper, little Diane with large eyes close to tears. My brother called from New York. He and Laurie arrive at Gatwick tomorrow; I will meet them.' Laurie is his daughter. 'We went for a walk at 6 p.m.' That's because it was cool then.

June fifth is: 'I left at 8:30 a.m. in the Mercedes for Gatwick. The country was lovely to drive through. I met Bud and Laurie, who arrived on Laker Airline, and drove them to London, Bud telling me of all their doings. He is full of enthusiasm. When we reached London, the preoccupation was where to park. We had decided to lunch at Claridge's, so I drove up to it and Bud got out and told the doorman, dressed in the usual Claridge's livery uniform, that we were lunching there, and his sister would like to leave her car, could they look after it? "Yes, sir!"' [S chuckles.] 'So we left keys, car, and luggage, and went amiably in, privilege not yet entirely dead, and very pleasant. We had a leisurely lunch, after which we went to Morgan Guarantee, about my brother's account, bought a sweater for Laurie, and came back to find the car waiting in the first parking meter space. I gave a befitting tip to the doorman, and off we went to Heathrow,' [humor in her voice] 'where I left them bound for Düsseldorf. Lisa flies there after an opening this evening at the Cooper-Hewitt Museum. She goes British Air, at their rates, but via Laker my brother and Laurie can fly round trip, New York-London, for $243.' [M and S both chuckle.] 'I drove back to Brockwood via the M3 in one-and-a-half hours in time for supper. It was good to see Bud. Laurie is a chunky child, un-charming in most ways to me, but it makes me sad to see what her upbringing accentuates.' I'm full of critical family remarks.

The next day, just 'desk work. I feel a cold coming on. I went to Petersfield on errands.'

June seventh. 'It's Mother's birthday, and Wooge'—that's my stepfather—'will be going to the cemetery. I sent some flowers. It is a pity—but pity is not a welcomed word, denoting a certain separation between the one who is feeling and the object. I feel a sad wish to comfort, to cushion, and protect from pain, somehow to conjure up a brightness that lived in so many summers of their lives; to have Wooge know it is always there if one can look; and to smile at Mother in a way that could tell her that in the end there is only the shine of what was good, and all the rest falls away. I went on an early train to London and by underground went to the hairdresser on Cadogan Street. She cut my hair quickly and fairly well. Then, I walked to Betsy's rented flat on Walton Street. We lunched and went to see the Robert Hirsch collection at the Royal Academy, which is to be sold at Sotheby's—drawings by Dürer, Rembrandt, medieval treasures, Cézanne watercolors, Lautrec, Redon, etcetera. Then, we walked to the theater, where we saw a 3:00 p.m. matinee of The Old Country, as guests of Betsy's friend, Faith Brook, who is in it. Anthony Quail played the part created by Alec Guinness. I haven't been to the theater in years and was pleased to be there, though I got rather sleepy in midstream.' [Chuckles.] We went backstage to see Faith Brook afterward, a nice, good actress, absorbed in the play and its world. We stayed almost an hour, and came out to rain and no taxis, so we walked till we finally found one on Bond Street. I dropped Betsy at her place, and I went on to Waterloo. Reached Petersfield by 8 p.m. "Was it worth it?" asked Krishnaji. Well, more or less, yes.'

S: [chuckles] So, Krishnaji wanted to ask you when you got back if the trip to London was worth it?

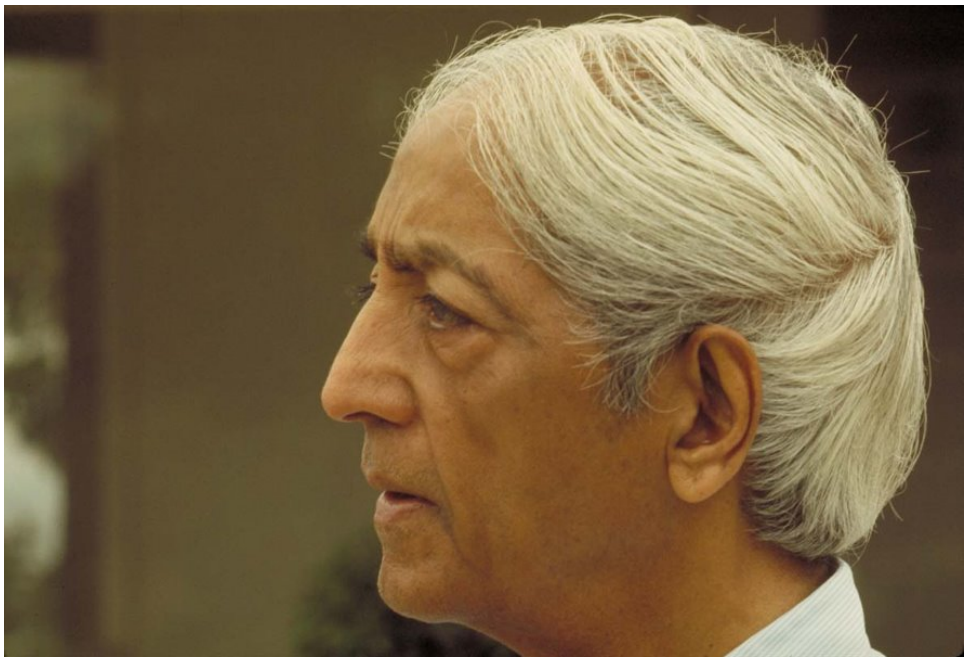
M: Yes. Well, he had to. It clearly was questionable in his mind. [Both laugh.]

S: Clearly.

M: June eighth. 'Krishnaji and I went to London. Huntsman was our first stop, of course. Then, during lunch at Fortnum's, Krishnaji said, "There's something in the head that is absolutely still, and that center of energy looks and sees. And when that is happening, the rest of the body is quiet, as though it were nonexistent."' See, things like that are…

S: Invaluable.

M: …invaluable and are only in this big diary. They'd be lost if it weren't for this.



S: Exactly.

M: And I couldn't remember them all.

S: Of course not.

M: But luckily I wrote it down.

S: Yes, yes. Very luckily.

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

M: 'I asked him, "When that silence looks, does it record?"'

'He said, "No, and that is the point of it."'

'I then asked, "If I were to ask you what you see, do you know what you see?"'

'He said, "Yes. The center of energy doesn't record. The tape records, the memory records, but not the center of energy." He said that the other day when news came about the Weideman house being sold, he thought of Rajagopal, and it kept coming back into his mind, and he said to himself "Why is this happening? No recording!" And from then on, he has not thought of it.'

‘I asked him if there is an action in this, and he said, “Yes. There is an action but I don’t know what it is. In the center of the head there is a sense of great space, stillness, and energy.” He said, “I discovered when I was putting my hands on little Diane—usually when I do that, I just put my hands on the person and look at the sky or the trees. But I discovered when I was doing it with her, that energy was not doing it, but that energy was there and is still continuing.”’

‘I asked him if this is something new, something different. And he said, “Entirely. I am just watching it go on. It is an extraordinary kind of stillness, quietness, I haven’t had before. I mustn’t talk too much about it.” And as he said this, he gestured with his hand across his forehead. “I shouldn’t talk about it. I talk about it to you, but it is something totally new. I haven’t had it before.”’

‘All this I recorded at the table with a Dictaphone. After lunch we went to Mr. Thompson, who prepared a fifth tooth of Krishnaji’s for a crown and installed a crown on one already prepared. It took two-and-a-half hours—2:30 p.m. to 5 p.m., and we got back to Brockwood by 7 o’clock.’

S: Now, wait a minute. So, you have a Dictaphone tape someplace of this?

M: But, I don’t remember having a Dictaphone at that point. It says, ‘All this I recorded at table with a Dictaphone.’ I wasn’t carrying a Dictaphone around, was I?

S: It seems so, and there’s supposedly a tape about this, someplace.

M: Really? Let’s see, we were in London, ‘Then, during lunch at Fortnum’s, Krishnaji said, “There’s something in the head that is absolutely still, and that center of energy looks and sees. And when that is happening, the rest of the body is quiet, as though it were nonexistent.”’ Then, I went on asking questions.

S: And Krishnaji very interestingly seems to say, that even though there is this center of stillness, the mind still can act as a tape recorder, and can record things.

M: Mmm.

S: So, somehow, I don’t know if that means that all the rest of us only have that tape recorder, and don’t have the deeper center of stillness…

M: I think that what you’re saying is true. I mean, likely…I don’t know.

S: Yes. But, I’m really interested at the moment in where this Dictaphone tape is. [Laughs.]

M: So am I [laughs].

S: So, you don’t have it here, you don’t suppose?

M: I don't think so.

S: Do you have any Dictaphone tapes here?

M: Not that I know of. But that doesn't mean I haven't. [S chuckles.] I've got stuff here and there that…

S: I know.

M: …I've got recordings that I made on equipment that you can't play anymore, stuffed there in that little study underneath something. I meant, when Tom was around and did things, to have them re-recorded, or something, because there are little spools that…

S: But that's something that the archives should do.

M: Yes. I must get them out and turn them over to…

S: Let's take a look for them.

M: Alright. I have no idea what's under there.

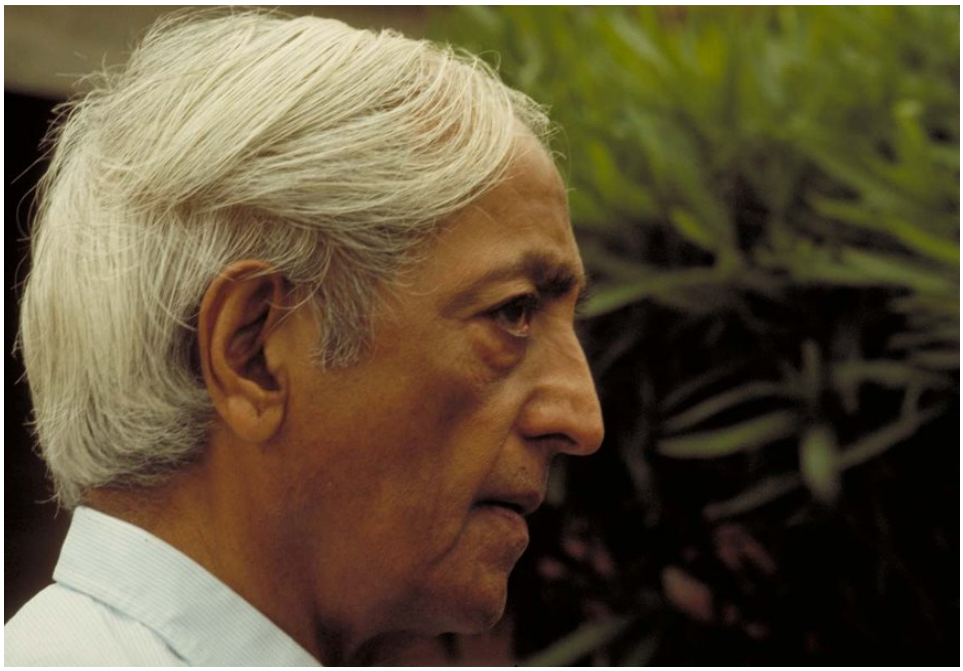
S: Alright. We'll take a look for them.

M: June ninth, 'Dorothy met Pupul on an early flight from Bombay. She's staying in the West Wing spare room. She is pleasant, and more relaxed than in the past.'

S: Pupul is more relaxed?

M: She is, yes.

June tenth, 'There was much talk with Pupul. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.'



The next day, 'I talked all morning with Pupul. In the afternoon, she and Krishnaji did a taped dialogue in which she asked him if there had been changes in his teachings. He said, "no." This was held in the West Wing drawing room, with the five particular Brockwood staff members, plus Dorothy, and the Digbys, who lunched at Brockwood and earlier had talked to Pupul about Indian publications, and the Marogers, who returned this weekend with their cousins, Jean-Claude and Lucie de Grémont, who are staying near Cheriton. All attended the discussion. Daughters Daphne Maroger and Pauline de Grémont, in their teens, are going to stay at Brockwood until the term ends. Bud telephoned from Paris where he, Lisa, and Laurie are staying until Saturday.'

There's really nothing the next day.

S: Now, according to the archives list, there's supposed to be the second videotaped discussion with Pupul on that day.

M: Well, I didn't write it down if there was.

And June thirteen just mentions a walk in the afternoon.

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

June fourteenth. 'Pupul, Dorothy, Doris, and I drove to Stonehenge.' [Laughs.] 'Pupul had never seen it and wanted to. In spite of tourists, the barbed wire, and the being kept at a distance, the stones retained their strange atmosphere, mystery, and silent dignity. We drove on toward Salisbury, looking for a place to have our picnic lunch, which we found on a slope by a small river, the Avon, I think. We spread out rugs and ate as we watched the swiftness of the river. There was a sleeping swan on her large nest, her mate on guard in the river, eyeing us sternly. Little moorhens and their chicks were diving for eatables. There were willows and wild roses, and I was lost again in the loveliness of this land. We went on to Salisbury and did some shopping in Boots[1], and went across to the cathedral. A pleasant day, which Krishnaji spent in bed.'

The fifteenth. 'Krishnaji, Pupul, and I went to London, and Krishnaji and I went to Huntsman. Pupul went to Hatchards. I went on to Hillier's to fit a pair of blue trousers, and I rejoined them at Fortnum's, where we lunched with Mary Links. Joe kindly came afterward because it was raining, and drove Krishnaji to the dentist, and me to the bank, then to the Swiss Embassy, where I got Krishnaji's Swiss visa. I was unable to find a taxi after that, so I walked to Portland Place, where Krishnaji's dentist was. Pupul arrived there, too, after rain and taxi problems. Krishnaji had four crowns, and a new bridge put in. Joe came back and took us all to Waterloo.'

There is nothing the next day but a staff meeting.

June seventeenth: ‘David Bohm held a meeting in the afternoon. On the walk were Krishnaji, Narayan, Dorothy, and me. Pupul gave a talk on India to the school in the evening.’

June eighteenth. ‘Pupul left at 7 a.m. with Dorothy driving her to Heathrow. I met Lailee’—that’s Krishnaji’s and my doctor in California—‘and her son Timur Tessamur at Petersfield. They lunched with us at Brockwood. Lailee was an enthusiastic guest. She met Dr. Parchure, and she’s going to send various vaccines for me to take before I go to India. I showed her and Timur the place. It was a warm and lovely day, but they had to catch the 3:20 p.m. train back to London. Krishnaji, Narayan, Dorothy, and I walked later.’

The next day, ‘There was a cable from Mavis Bennett to me saying Reg died very suddenly.’ Oh, he died. He was a nice man.

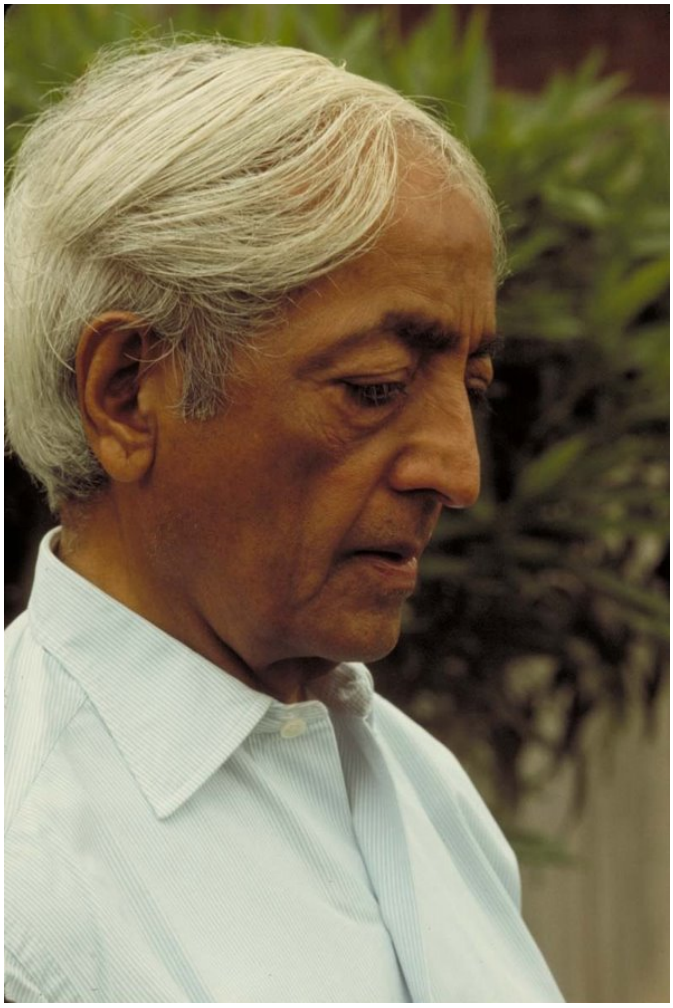
S: Yes, he was.

M: ‘Krishnaji, Dorothy, Doris, and I sent a cable back to her. I kept feeling Reg was something rare, in the original sense of the word, a good man. I drove to Nelly and George Digby’s in Sherbourne, Dorset, eighty-three miles from Brockwood. They have made most attractive a sixteenth-century inn that is part of the Digby estate and was lived in by George’s mother until her death a couple years ago. It is charming, as arranged by them. A friend, Hugh somebody, was at lunch and afterward we all went through Sherbourne Castle, built by Sir Walter Raleigh in 1594, the home where George grew up and now owned by George’s elder brother, who won’t live there, so it is open to the public. To me, it was an ugly, depressing place with towers, heraldic beasts like gargoyles, rooms in a long corridor shape, as was common in those days, and all looking out on a lake and large park considered splendid, but too bare of trees to me. In fact, I could hardly bear being there. George’s father was fox-hunting mad, with heads of foxes everywhere, and the sporting drawings of my youth: Lionel Edwards and Cecil Alden, commemorating horses and famous runs.’ I have had to confess that I went fox hunting in my youth. [S chuckles.] And suddenly last October, the House of Commons had thousands of fox hunting protesters besieging it. The papers were full of it, so was the television. And it made me laugh because I understood what both sides felt.

S: Yes.

M: I am, of course, totally against fox hunting now.

S: Yes, I know.



M: But I can see both sides of the whole thing. So, it was funny to me that, with a war going on and people being slaughtered, people still want their pleasures in killing animals, and protesting their rights to do so, righteous rights. Anyway, ‘It all seemed depressing to me, and gave me a sad glimpse of what George’s childhood must’ve been like for him. He is such a different sort of person. I fretted too because I had trouble letting Krishnaji know by telephone that I had arrived safely as I said I would. I finally got the message through that I was leaving, didn't stay to tea, but came whizzing back—the car like a racehorse. I passed Stonehenge again with young people streaming there on foot for the summer solstice. I got back in one hour and forty minutes, in time to fetch Krishnaji's supper. But I don't enjoy such long jaunts away from him.'

The twentieth just says: 'Desk.'

S: [chuckles] You read that with no joy whatsoever.

M: No.

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

June twenty-first. 'Krishnaji and I went to London. We had an early lunch with Mary and Joe at their flat. Joe then took Krishnaji to the dentist. A new bridge was adjusted; it feels excellent now, Krishnaji said afterward. Mary and I sat most pleasantly and talked till Joe brought Krishnaji back. Then Joe took both of us to Waterloo and we were back at Brockwood early.'

So, Thursday, the twenty-second. 'It rained, and I did desk work. Dr. Rahula, a Ceylonese Buddhist scholar, and Dr. Schloegl, a German woman, a sociologist who went to Japan and stayed twelve years in a Zen monastery, and who is also a Buddhist scholar, came for lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji, the two Buddhist scholars, Narayan, and David Bohm had a discussion, which was videotaped by Scott and company. Rahula talked about fifteen minutes without stopping at the beginning. He is hard to understand and pedantic. There was a staff meeting after supper. After supper, Esme and Verna showed me how to make tofu, which Krishnaji now eats instead of cheese.' Do you remember Verna Kreuger?[2]

S: Very well.

M: The next day, 'I took Dr. Parchure to Winchester. We got back by 11:30 a.m., in time for Krishnaji's second discussion with the two Buddhists, Narayan, and David. A third one was held in the afternoon. The discussion evoked much from Krishnaji, but little of interest from the others.'

June twenty-fourth. 'I went to London alone, did errands at Harrods, then got my hair cut. I lunched with Betsy at her flat, and was back to Brockwood in time for the walk with Krishnaji and Narayan. Krishnaji had talked to Soleil and to Terence Stamp, each privately.' Soleil? That sounds French. Do you know who that was?

S: Yes. Actually it was a girl from California. She came to Brockwood and started off…I don't remember what she was doing, but that didn't work out. However, she wanted to stay, so I took her on as the secretary for the video department. I think she left about a year later with Eric Schiffmann, the yoga teacher.

M: June twenty-fifth. 'I spent most of the day packing. Krishnaji stayed in bed. Donald Dennis with three other students washed and waxed the Mercedes, then I put it in the barn for the summer, covered with sheets, etcetera.'

The next day was 'a cold day. Krishnaji and I went to London, and right to the dentist for the new bridge to be smoothed at a spot that was irritating Krishnaji's lip, then back to the train, where we ate our sandwich lunch. We were back at Brockwood by 3 p.m. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I went for a walk across the fields. Then, more packing, tidying, and typing for me.'

June twenty-seventh. 'I was up early to finish packing and tidying. Krishnaji and I left Brockwood at 12:15 p.m. in the mini with Dorothy driving, Doris and Ingrid bringing luggage in the other car. We stopped for a picnic sandwich in the car by a field near Heathrow, where we stopped last year. Krishnaji and I took the 3:15 p.m. BE flight to Cologne. It was cold in England and cold in Germany. We taxied to Bonn and the Hotel Bristol, a totally charmless hotel with vile wallpaper in which I see Rorschach tests' [both laugh]. I used to administer Rorschach tests; I was rather professional about it. 'Rorschach test heads of ugly animals but, nevertheless, convenient and clean. I confirmed tomorrow's appointment with Dr. Scheef, and then we went for a walk.

Krishnaji remembers more or less where we went last September. We had supper in the dining room, thinking it would be quicker. It wasn't. The headwaiter is from India, and is tolerant of our vegetarian peculiarity. From his window, Krishnaji saw, across the city, a huge revolving Mercedes star. He was pleased.' Oh, you know, there was an ad.

S: Yes, yes.

M: June twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji likes sleeping under the continental quilt. "Nicely warm," he said. We walked the two blocks to the Janker Klinik shortly after 10 a.m., and saw Dr. Scheef at 11 a.m.—a man in a hurry. Krishnaji had various tests done, including phosphatase test, which I believe is to show any cancer cells. We were out in a little over half an hour. While waiting, I began to wonder what it is that makes people and nature cling to life.' [Laughs.] 'What wants to survive? I spoke of it to Krishnaji. He said he had never asked that, and would consider it. He began to speak of pleasure, the always turning to it, life being seen as pleasure or the possibility of it. I said that it was part, but was it the root? Krishnaji said, "I am not in it now. It's too big a question now." In a few minutes, he said suddenly, "The rock roses must be in bloom, and the creeper must have reached the trellis."' [S laughs.] 'So, we talked about Ojai a little, left the clinic, and walked to a nearby bank where I got Deutsche marks for travel checks, and then returned to Hotel Bristol for lunch, served quickly this time. We took naps and returned to the clinic at 3:30 p.m. Scheef says Krishnaji's tests are fine. Nevertheless, he gave some prescriptions to strengthen Krishnaji, and 350 enzyme tablets. He was in a hurry, and his telephone was ringing constantly. He leaves tomorrow for Jamaica. He didn't have the pink pills that help Krishnaji's hay fever, but said he would send some to Gstaad. I am to keep on with enzymes and Vitamin E, and so is Krishnaji. We went off after paying Krishnaji's bill for 155 Deutsche marks ($73) and tried unsuccessfully to fill the prescription. It was early closing day, and the only open pharmacist was missing an ingredient. We bought cherries on the street and ate them in our rooms before going down to supper.'

The next day, 'We left Hotel Bristol at 8 a.m. by taxi to Cologne Airport, and took the Swiss Air 9:30 a.m. flight to Zurich, where we changed planes for Geneva. There was a very thorough searching before boarding the plane. Good security. Two tough-looking women ran their hands up and down every inch of me. When the plane took off, it wasted no time gaining altitude. In Zurich, I discovered United Travel had booked us with a ticket earlier than the one in the computer, and on the travel memo they gave me, so we took an earlier flight, but our luggage, booked through from Bonn, came later.'

S: Oh, lord.

M: 'We waited in Geneva in the baggage area, and finally, our bags came. Switzerland is shining in the summer sun. We took a taxi to the Hotel des Bergues. Our first day here. Nice rooms, adjoining but not communicating, newly redone in old-fashioned French style. Krishnaji approved, "I like this hotel," better than the Hôtel du Rhône, where we used to stay. We lunched in the Amphitryon Dining Room, where, once again, it was pleasing in an old-fashioned way: snowy linens, two waiters serving deftly and with style. Quiet. It was mostly men lunching together; dignified and serious. Krishnaji said, "Nous sommes en régime" to cushion our vegetarian ordering.' [S laughs.]

S: He said "Nous sommes en régime" to the waiters?

M: To the headwaiter; explaining our eccentricity and mollifying them. He made it seem we were just on a diet. [Both laugh.] He was rather modest and apologetic about…

S: Yes.

M: 'We rested a little after lunch, and then walked across the bridge to Patek, where we fetched Krishnaji's steel watch, sent in March by Ted for cleaning and repair. Krishnaji watched with fascination the young technician who checked his gold watch. We walked on down to Jacquet for the annual ordering of ties, Krishnaji choosing with satisfaction ten; the first four for Joe Links, and then four for himself—the last two were at my urging. He didn't want more than Joe had. At the end,' [both laugh] 'at the end, his attention fled, as it often does, in choosing material for suits or other things for himself. But he was pleased with his visit. He spoke of Huntsman to the son of the owner who assists at these annual choosings, and so with cordial handshakes and escortings to the door, we emerged on the Rue de Rhône again and walked up past the fish store, with a smell I dislike, and so across the bridge to a chemist, for the prescription given yesterday by Dr. Scheef. We had a rest at the hotel. I rang Tannegg, and got a happy-sounding Fosca, and then Vanda. They had just arrived. Krishnaji and I dined at 7:30 p.m. in the Amphitryon. We had crème caramel for dessert, for protein, at Krishnaji's suggestion.' [Laughs.] It's got eggs in it!

S: Crème caramel for protein, is it?! [Laughing.]

M: Yes. [Laughing more.] Well, it's made of eggs; he was quite right, and I didn't object at all. 'I asked him at supper what was his earliest actual memory. He thinks it is standing in his rooms at Adyar, looking out at the river, oblivious of everything else. Did he directly remember Nitya? Yes, but as with other faces, it is hard to evoke his face. "I can recognize a photo and say 'Yes, that is him.' He seems to remember more the feeling, the relationship. I asked him if he remembered Rosalind Rajagopal, and he said he remembered her beating him, hitting him "in the groin." I felt sick.' [Long pause.] '"Those two must have set it all up." "I was made to feel guilty all the time of something. I wondered if it were my fault." "I don't want to have those two in my consciousness." So, we talked of other things, then went up to our rooms, and went to bed.'

June thirtieth. 'They are digging a large excavation for a building outside our rooms. Krishnaji was standing in the window when I brought him the vitamin tablets. "I like to watch all that." He noticed, too, a splendid Ferrari.' [S chuckles at M's mimicking of Krishnaji's voice.] 'We stayed in all morning. The concierge sent our suitcases to the station, and at 1 p.m., we lunched pleasantly in the Amphitryon. We had vichyssoise and omelet, etcetera. We took the 3:15 p.m. train, Krishnaji watching the lake all the way to Montreux, where we changed to the little blue mountain train that goes up to Gstaad.

From shortly after Montreux, Krishnaji recognized every glimpse of the road we usually drive. "Now we are in our country," he said. It had been warm in Geneva, and on the train too, but it was cool in Gstaad when we arrived at 6 p.m., and recent snow had left patches low on the mountains. The Bernerhof Hotel is being remodeled, and the little garden and tree opposite have been destroyed. The taxi man regretted it, too, as we went up to Tannegg. Fosca, a bit too deaf to hear the bell, nevertheless, looked well and her usual nice self. And Vanda was welcoming and warm. Soon Krishnaji had his tray in bed. Vanda and I ate in the dining room as always. I unpacked before going to bed. So, is it a sign of age to find ease with familiarity of things? Not entirely, I think.'

S: [chuckles] No, it isn't.

M: We now go to July first. 'I woke up with a pleasant feeling I didn't have to get up, but did. Krishnaji rested in the morning. At noon, a Hertz man brought from Berne a bright-green Renault; our summer's lift up and down the mountain. At 12:30 p.m., the Brockwood mini appeared with Donald Dennis driving, and inside were Dr. Parchure, Narayan, and Natasha. They were calling before going to their chalet in Schönried, arranged by Edgar Graf. "So healthy a place," said Parchure, "how can one be sick here?"' [Laughs.] 'At 4:30 p.m. Krishnaji walked down to have his hair cut by Mr. Nicolas, who cuts it well. I drove him up the hill after we bought some almond butter he had seen in Pernet's window.' Pernet was the local grocery store. 'He is still off all dairy food as they may encourage hay fever. When Scott Forbes brings a jar of Nagari from Brockwood, I will make tofu for Krishnaji.'

S: Yes. And just to explain your last comment, Scott Forbes was driving the great big video van, which was always also loaded up with various supplies. [Both laugh.]

M: Yes, oh, yes. Lots of things, carrying things that are indispensable.

S: Yes.

M: July second. 'Donald brought Dr. Parchure at 11 a.m., and both Krishnaji and I had a massage. He stayed to lunch with Vanda, Frances McCann, and I. Krishnaji stayed in bed until late afternoon when he and I went for a first walk up the hill and to the end of the wood. Krishnaji has suddenly developed considerable varicose veins in his left leg. Parchure went to John Bell in London and brought him some longer elastic stockings, which he wore today. I telephoned Filomena in the evening and said I would come to see her around the seventh of August.'

Then, for the next several days, there really isn't much except people to lunch, errands, etcetera. Oh, yes, on July fifth, 'Krishnaji had wanted some oil or cream for his face during massage, so I got him some Payot.' Payot is a well-known French face cream maker. 'I got some Payot for him and realized after that it cost $25.' [Laughs.] 'Krishnaji luckily hasn't noticed it. He looks forward to seeing whatever I bring back in the shopping basket.' He always did this; he used to do it at Brockwood.

S: Yes. I remember.

M: I would go and buy toothpaste and pencils and I don't know what, and he wanted to see it all. He wanted me to put it out on the kitchen table. [S laughs.] It says here: 'Even a tube of toothpaste is like a present.' [Laughs.] 'Krishnaji saw Silvius Russu[3] briefly. On a chilly walk under gray skies, we went halfway up the Turbach Road, Krishnaji wanting to stretch the distance a little each day. I think today's must've been three miles. On the way back, he said, "Soon the new ties will come."'

S: [laughs] Jacquet.

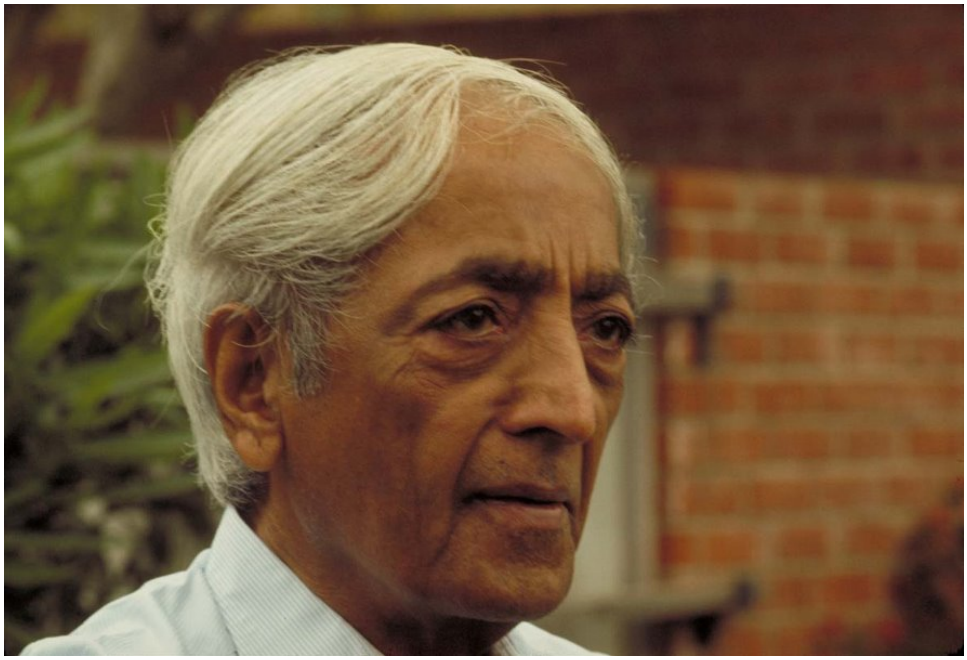
M: 'And then he added, "Little things please little minds."' [Both laugh.] 'As we were taking off our muddy boots, Edgar Graf appeared and later stayed till supper. The tent is being put up by Brockwood boys who got free space in the barracks to pay them for their work. Graf described to Vanda Barabino's present circumstances. Biella'—that was, oh dear, Barabino was a pain in the neck, really, and he had a school in Biella, in Italy, which wasn't a Krishnamurti school, but he tried to make it appear to be one—'Biella has failed. Barabino wrote a story for a movie, but nothing came of it. He still answers questions about Krishnaji's teachings as though he were the Italian spokesman, and of course, he has still not returned the mailing list.' We never could get the Italian mailing list out of him. 'Pietro Cragnolini is ailing and wants his name off The Bulletin. Mr. Letteri will take his place.'

July sixth. 'It was rainy and cold, and the snow was low on the mountains. Joan Wright brought two fine silk nightshirts she made for Krishnaji.' She used to make lovely things for him, particularly nightshirts that he liked.

S: And bathrobes.



M: Bathrobes, too.

The next day, 'I went to fetch Dr. Parchure at 6:30 a.m., then did letters. I fetched Mar de Manziarly to lunch. Krishnaji and I went to Saanen in the afternoon for a pair of walking shoes for him. The Simmonses and Doris arrived in the Land Rover.'

July eighth, 'There was fog and rain. I worked at the desk. I went to the tent, picked up Natasha, then we went to see Dorothy and Montague. Natasha lunched with Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and me. Krishnaji remained in his room. I later went down to get four boxes of Wobenzyme.' That was a two-year supply.

S: Is that an enzyme?

M: Some magical German pill. [S chuckles.] I may have some old ones still in the cabinet in there.

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

July ninth. 'Rain and fog. I drove Krishnaji to the tent for his opening Saanen talk on the sense of self. It was very fine. The tent was full in spite of cold, rain, and the cost of the Swiss franc. Coming back, Krishnaji said, "I had no idea what I was going to say when I sat down." Dr. Parchure came back with Vanda and Mrs. Walsh, and gave Krishnaji a massage without oil before lunch. In the afternoon, Evelyne rang. She and Lou arrived, and are staying in the same chalet as two years ago belonging to a friend. Krishnaji and I walked down the hill, around Alpina and up again. I read till 11 p.m., finishing the first volume of the Raj Quartet.'

The tenth, 'Evelyne and Lou came to lunch. They visited the Malibu house before leaving California. Lou wanted to see the slide area, which the Sandler office'—that's the real estate people—'say is making the house hard to sell. Lou said I must do something immediately, and suggested that Max'—that was the Ojai builder—'do it. Krishnaji agreed with this, and said if necessary, I should fly back there. Lou felt I should, in order to arrange the look of it. Krishnaji and I walked in the afternoon. In the evening, I telephoned Amanda and Phil Dunne and told them what Lou had said, and that I was going to ask Max to go and see the problem. I asked if they would meet him there, etcetera, and think about the look of it. They, of course, said yes. I had dialed directly, and it was wonderful to talk[4]. Then, I telephoned Max at his work phone on the site in Ojai. I got him instantly and explained it all. He said calmly in Max fashion, "I will do it."' [S chuckles.] 'Krishnaji was pleased. "At last," he said.' [S chuckles more.]

July eleventh. 'I fetched Dr. Parchure as usual at 6:30 a.m. The weather was clear for a change. Krishnaji gave the second public talk in the tent, and there was enormous energy in it. At lunch were Simonette di Cesaro'—that was a friend of Vanda's and a woman I've known; she's Italian, but used to live in India part of the time—'who has just bought a house in London. Rome is now too dangerous to live in, she says. To lunch were Narayan, Dr. Parchure, and Mr. and Mrs. David Mustart, friends of Naudé; he is a geologist teaching at San Francisco State.' It was fascinating; I didn't know about tectonic plates until this particular day. Now, we all have to know about it. 'Krishnaji joined everyone after lunch and sat talking until 6 o'clock about all kinds of things, including tectonic plates, the continents' movements, earthquakes, and ancient Indian history. When they finally left, Krishnaji and I went for a short walk down the hill and back. Krishnaji said it is possible some sort of disaster may occur in the next year and we must plan where we should be. Ojai, we both felt, would be best. We could live there as simply as elsewhere. We could even live and sleep in the kitchen if necessary. We must plan it a little, try to be prepared. Talk to the Lilliefelts. "Where I am, this body is, will be safe."' That's nice.

S: Alright. We should end it there because we don't have enough tape to do another day.

M: Mm, and there's a long entry coming.

S: Alright. So, that will be July twelfth?

M: That will be July twelfth.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Boots is a chain store which began in England as pharmacies, but they have expanded to sell a great many things like drug stores do in the United States.

[2] Verna was a very sweet American woman who came to Brockwood right at the beginning to work in the kitchen. She was the first Brockwood staff member, since it became a school, to die at Brockwood.

{3] An elderly Romanian man who had been dedicated to Krishnaji since the early 1920s.

[4] Long-distance calls used to be only made through long-distance operators, and often had to be booked ahead of time.

Issue 53: July 12, 1978 to August 16, 1978

The events of this issue take place entirely during Krishnaji's and Mary's stay in Switzerland for the Saanen talks. For me, there is more of the leisurely, while simultaneously intense, atmosphere of those periods conveyed here than in previous issues covering the same period. It was the most international of all Krishnaji's regular events, and thousands of people from around the world interested in Krishnaji's teachings, and often their families, descended on the small village of Saanen and the surrounding villages. Mary notes the change after the talks were over, and it was, indeed, very discernible. But for Mary and Krishnaji the work continues: the correspondence, the interviews, the meetings about organizational matters, and then with the change in venues, the preparation for the Brockwood talks. Mary expresses concern that Mary L. must finish the second volume of Krishnaji's biography because Mary L. has just turned seventy years old. But Mary herself is sixty-three at this point, and there is nothing about her being in the presence of Krishnaji that seems restful, or relaxed, or laid-back for someone of that age.

Scott: Alright, we begin, but there's only one microphone on, and that's Mary's, so I'll try to speak loudly so the transcriber can hear. Today is February thirteenth, 2005, Mary's ninetieth birthday!

Mary: No! Please! That is immaterial. [Chuckles.]

S: [laughs] And we are going to begin on July twelfth, 1978.

M: Yes. Well, we're in Saanen. 'The morning was fairly clear. I fetched Dr. Parchure at 6:30 a.m., and then went down to see Dorothy and Montague to deliver letters and asked if they would prefer to stay in the Land Rover instead of moving up to Tannegg when Vanda leaves on Friday.' They were living in their Land Rover in the camping site. Dorothy felt she was more available there to meet people who were interested in Brockwood; plus they just liked camping.

S: Yes.

M: And usually, when the talks were over, and we had the space downstairs in Chalet Tannegg, they would come up and stay there until they left for Brockwood. 'Doris had said earlier to me that this year they would sooner stay put, and they confirmed that. I said please do what really suits them. That is all Krishnaji or I want. I met Natasha[1] and brought her up for lunch. Vanda had asked Frode and Julie Desnick[2] up to lunch, and I picked them up when I found them walking up the hill.' [Chuckles.] 'In the middle of lunch, Max telephoned. He had been to Malibu after my call on Monday and again yesterday. Amanda and Phil, and also the county building and safety man, inspected it. All agreed on cutting a three-foot terrace to remove the filled area on the ocean side of the lawn, putting railroad ties in to hold it, then gravel on top. He will do it this week. I said not to stint on the cost, but do what is necessary. He said it would likely cost between $6,000 to $7,000. I told him to go ahead. He said he would also make steps down to the beach, which the house buyers are interested in. Krishnaji was very pleased. I took Natasha down the hill, then went to the bank, etcetera. When I came back, I interviewed a young woman, Genevieve Hahn, who has a child who wants to go to Oak Grove School[3]. I walked with Krishnaji in the evening, then telephoned Amanda and heard her views of the slide business. She and Phil approved. All is well in hand. How wonderfully helpful friends can be; and we wonder at the speed of all this and the impulse to help.'

July thirteenth. 'The morning was clear and sunny. I fetched Dr. Parchure at 6:30 a.m. Krishnaji gave his third Saanen talk. He gave it huge energy, and there was much on self-identity. "Where there is identity, there is no freedom." He had a massage by Dr. Parchure on his return from the talk. But, first, we went to Kohli.' Kohli is a man who had a shoe store, and there, we received Krishnaji's new walking shoes. At lunch, there was Suad al Radhi, Evelyne Blau, Narayan, Dr. Parchure, Vanda, and me. Krishnaji came in for coffee. Evelyne and I talked about Foundation matters until 4 o'clock. Later, Krishnaji wore his new shoes on the walk and is very pleased. He said, "Do you think…" I interrupted and said, "Yes," and he said, "You caught my thought."' [Chuckles.] 'I did. He thinks he should have a duplicate pair for Ojai.' [S laughs, then M laughs.] 'Vanda is not eating at lunch and barely at supper.' She was emaciated and she hardly ever ate anything, and you couldn't talk her out of it. 'Some sort of stomach upset, she said. She leaves tomorrow for Florence and will return on August sixth.'

The next day, 'again, I fetched Dr. Parchure. Vanda left for Florence at 8 a.m., and will return later. Dr. Parchure helped put chairs in the sitting room for thirty-two people. Scott Forbes came by early to regulate Krishnaji's watches[4].' [S laughs; M chuckles.] 'At 11:30 a.m., there was the annual meeting of committees and Foundation members. It began this year with a discussion of committee questions, and later Krishnaji joined in. There were reports on schools, which were given by Evelyne for Ojai; Dorothy, Brockwood; the Siddoos on Canada; and Narayan on India. It went on till almost 2 o'clock. Krishnaji had lunch alone. Mary Cadogan, Jane Hammond, Evelyne, and Dr. Parchure had lunch here, and then talked about fundraising. I fetched Narayan for a talk and walk with Krishnaji, while I did some marketing for Fosca and also ferried Fosca down to the stores. I felt hot and tired with an aching leg.'

July fifteenth, 'I fetched Dr. Parchure so he could move up to Tannegg into the downstairs room'—that's the one Vanda had vacated. 'At 9:30 a.m., I went to a hairdresser. Dorothy, Montague, and Dr. Parchure were at lunch.'

The sixteenth of July. 'It was a clear and warm morning. Krishnaji gave his fourth Saanen talk to a packed tent. Michael and Bonnie Mendizza have arrived and are staying at Evelyne's, and he took stills in the tent. It was a very strong talk. In the car afterward, Krishnaji said, "A lot of energy. How did you all stand it?"' [Both chuckle.] 'Jean-Michel Maroger and Diane were in the tent and came up afterward. Krishnaji put his hands on Diane. She can now stand and walk one or two steps on her own, though she is still in a brace. I went to fetch Anneke, who, as usual, is staying with Doris. She and Dr. Parchure were at lunch and afterward, Krishnaji put his hands on her.' He was always helping Anneke's health.

S: Yes.

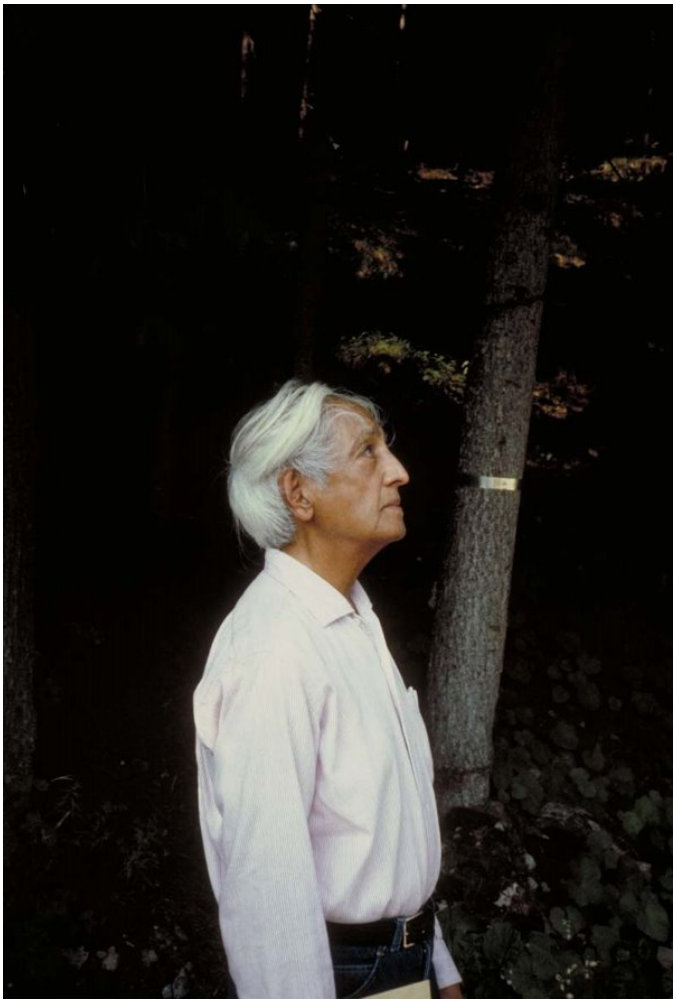
M: 'Krishnaji gave Brian Jenkins an interview at 4:30 p.m., the first ever for Brian. Meanwhile, I went to Mary Cadogan's at 4 p.m., and she and Edgar Graf and I discussed the Saanen Gathering Committee, the KFT, and the KFA all sharing Krishnaji's travel expenses to Switzerland and the Tannegg rental. Vanda will continue to contribute to the Tannegg rental, but only one quarter now. I had a long talk with Dr. Parchure at supper about Krishnaji's health. He watches carefully for any change to try to offset it and minimize it. He questioned me on any changes I may notice. Krishnaji's balance is less good. Parchure says that this is controlled by an anterior part of the brain and could be caused by lessening of the blood supply. He asked Krishnaji about this and will he continue throughout his life to have clear mental faculties. Krishnaji, who puts large responsibilities on Parchure for the rest of his body health, said, "Yes," his mind will be clear. Something else will look after that.' [Pause.]

'During this morning's talk, Krishnaji was on the verge of talking about yoga and then he veered away. I mentioned it after lunch while he was having what passes for coffee, i.e., Pionier, a cereal brown stuff.' [Seems to ask S:] Do you remember that horrid drink?

S: Yes, I remember that horrible stuff. We had it at Brockwood.

M: No caffeine at all. 'And Krishnaji said, "I'm going to destroy it."' That means yoga.

S: He's going to destroy yoga?



M: Yes. 'We talked about this on the walk yesterday. I had spoken of what seems to be a yoga-neurosis,' [chuckles] 'endless preoccupation with it, hours doing it, teaching it, talking about it, as in Vanda's case, Frances McCann's, and many others. It seems almost a narcissism in yoga, and the yoga now, according to Krishnaji and to Dr. Parchure, is gymnastics, not yoga.' They are. There is an obsession about yoga.

S: Yes, yes.

M: July seventeenth. 'A beautiful day, warm day. I worked on letters. No one to lunch but Dr. Parchure. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw Diane Maroger. I fetched the Siddoos and Scott and went to Evelyne's chalet for tea and a discussion of Michael Mendizza's Krishnamurti film. Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, Doris, Anneke, and Narayan were there. Doris was aggressive, demanding Mendizza's qualifications, and rejecting to tape our discussion until I asked others how they felt. After that, Doris backtracked. She attempted to monopolize the discussion for a while but others contributed. Evelyne presented plans very well. Scott Forbes came back to Tannegg to fetch Krishnaji's steel watch. He has talked about it to a Patek technician, and wants to take it to him in Geneva tomorrow. For Krishnaji, Scott is becoming a watch expert.' [S laughs.] 'We walked up on the hill and met Krishnaji returning under his sun umbrella from his walk. Scott pointed out the Wildhorn'—that's the mountain—'where he had gone yesterday with his mountain climbing friend.' [S chuckles.]

But you were denied mountain climbing soon after.

Krishnaji in Switzerland (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Yes, I was supposed to be denied, but I wasn't very obedient to that.

M: You were not? [S laughs mischievously.] You mean you sneakily went up mountains when we didn't know?

S: Well, Krishnaji prevented me [M chuckles] from going up one year, but he didn't say that climbing from then on was finished, although he did later. I mean, I never lied to him about it, or anything like that.

M: You just didn't mention it.

S: I just didn't mention it sometimes. [M laughs.] But the problem was that Krishnaji always knew.

M: Yes, he knew.

S: And he would scold me.

M: You see.

S: In fact, one time I did some climbing on the way to Saanen, and I hadn't told Krishnaji I was going to go climbing before Saanen. I usually only had time after the talks.

M: Mm, hm, mm, hm.

S: But when I drove up to see him at Tannegg to tell him I had arrived, as I usually did, he was at the door, anxiously waiting for me.

M: Mm, hm.

S: And he said, scolding, "Where have you been, what have you been doing?" And I replied, well…[Both laugh.] I think that was the year he wouldn't let me climb again.

M: Yes. Well, I know that he said to you, as he said to me, you are no longer responsible to yourself alone.

S: Yes. That's right.

M: Therefore, you cannot climb mountains, and I had to be careful driving a car, and I couldn't just fly around anyplace I wanted.

S: That's right. Yes.

M: So, I asked, well, does that mean that I shouldn't go and see my mother in New England? He said, no, no, that's alright for you to do that. So, it seemed to boil down to I shouldn't, for instance, fly up to lunch with someone in San Francisco. Which wasn't really necessary. I mustn't do unnecessary…

S: Right, unnecessary things.

M: Yes.

S: So, yes. My climbing had a severe crimp put in it. [Both chuckle.] And eventually, it was stopped.

M: Yes, yes. It's like…I think all of us would've liked to have gone up gliding in Saanen, including Krishnaji.

S: I did go up gliding there.

M: Did you?

S: But that was before I knew Krishnaji.

M: Well, that was excusable.

S: So, I got away with that one. [Laughs.]

M: He would liked to have gone, and the fact that he wouldn't let himself go gliding because it was unnecessary and somewhat dangerous, or, at least, he thought it might be, and so we should not go, too. [Chuckles.]

S: Yes, I know. We weren't allowed to take risks either. [Both chuckle.] "Your life no longer belongs to you."

M: Yes, yes.

S: That was his expression to me.

M: That was, yes. It was to me, too.

The eighteenth. 'The weather was hot, with showers in the afternoon. Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen talk. The Marogers, Jean-Michel, Diane, and her sister Daphne came to Tannegg right after the talk, and Krishnaji put his hands on Diane, while Daphne helped me with some French in a letter. Then, Krishnaji steadying her, holding one arm and her father the other, little Diane walked'—I have it underlined—'from Krishnaji's sitting room, across the hall, into the living room, and climbed into the armchair. It stopped the heart to see. I think, how can I know, but I think that Krishnaji has put a greater healing power into this child than any other since I have been around. Certainly, at Brockwood, he was intent on doing it. And now for the first time in her life, she has walked, carrying her own weight. Narayan was there during her appearance; the Marogers left and Narayan and Dr. Parchure were at lunch. Narayan leaves today for India. I went to the village on assorted errands; then to Jane Hammond to pick up KFT's share of the Tannegg rent to deposit it in Vanda's account, Swiss francs 2,400, and to go over a draft of a constitution for the Krishnamurti Learning Center of South Africa, which Patty and Lola Shepherd are starting.' Those were two sisters in South Africa and they started in…I think it was in Cape Town…

S: No. It was Durban.

M: Durban, was it?

S: Yes. I visited them there.

M: Oh, then you know.

S: Yes.

M: 'When I came back to Tannegg, Krishnaji was giving an interview to Reinhold Sindler, an Austrian; and waiting in hope of seeing Krishnaji were Juan Colell, just appointed secretary of the Fundación, his brother, and the new Spanish publisher of Krishnaji books, Mr. Agut, and his wife. When Krishnaji came out, he spoke to them briefly and was given copies of the Spanish paperback of Beyond Violence, Beginnings of Learning, Krishnamurti on Education, and the sample color of Krishnamurti's Notebook, which will come out in September. They left, and Krishnaji and I walked to the end of the wood.'

The next day. 'I had a migraine in the night. Evelyne and Michael Mendizza were here in the morning to discuss filming. Dorothy brought Anneke before lunch. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched together. I fetched Magdalina Jasciuska, the Polish sociologist, to see Krishnaji. He also saw Diane. I marketed. Krishnaji and I walked to the end of the wood.' Now, Magdalina Jasciuska will come into this more. She was a very nice woman, and she and her husband started the Polish Krishnamurti Committee.

July twentieth. 'I telephoned Filomena in Rome and told her I would come there August seventh. Krishnaji gave talk number six, a very moving one. The Marogers: Jean-Michel, Daphne, and Diane came to lunch. Krishnaji came to the table and told stories. Then he slept, and I did errands. Evelyne, Michael Mendizza, and Scott came, and Krishnaji did an audiotape on the meaning of "You are the world" for use in the film. Mendizza was shooting it, and Krishnaji wore a little microphone inside his shirt with a battery in his belt that will broadcast his voice to the camera and sound recording. At 4 p.m., Evelyne, Michael, and Scott came and recorded on audio Krishnaji talking on "You are the world," all of us joining in the discussion, but only some of Krishnaji will be in the edited version for voice-over in the film. He said everything that one could want on the subject. I walked them up the hill to show them Krishnaji's usual path for walking across the field for filming tomorrow. Then I telephoned Amanda. She reported that huge work had been done last weekend by Max and crew, making a terrace where the earth settled at the edge of the lawn, rounding the slide, making a berm across the property line by the nuns.' Nuns had bought the house next door. 'Max hurt his back, but is alright. More work is scheduled for this weekend. Amanda says it looks very well.'

July twenty-first. 'I drove to Chateau d'Oex for soybeans to make tofu for Krishnaji. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched at the table. It was a gray day, but after Krishnaji had seen Diane at 4 p.m., he went up the hill and was filmed by Michael and Bonnie Mendizza, Evelyne and Scott helping. He sat on the first bench, and spoke for one to two minutes on nature—if you are not sensitive to it, how can you be related to human beings.' That's what he talked about. 'Then, more along the path to the bench by the edge of the wood, where he did one minute on what brings people to these mountains, to the talks, the common problems which all mankind shares. It was cold and spatters of rain began as we finished. Krishnaji, as always, did it superbly, altering what he said with each take, unable to repeat himself.' [S chuckles.] 'It was tiring for him, and he felt the cold. Though I didn't feel much like it, I took Dr. Parchure at 8:30 p.m. to a photo slide showing on Dorothy's recommendation at the Landhaus in Saanen by a Swiss photographer named Blum.'

The twenty-second of July. 'The cold yesterday tired Krishnaji, so he rested. I did desk work in the morning, then fetched Anneke and Mar up to lunch. Anneke brought a book by Rajneesh in which he said some incorrect things about Krishnaji, which she found funny. I do not find malice about Krishnaji funny. Mar and Anneke chatted away about the old days. Mar was more tiresome than informative, but Anneke remains her pleasant self. It has been decided that the three people for the filmed discussion with Krishnaji on Monday will be Jean-Michel Maroger, Anneke, and Scott. Two Europeans, one American, and the Saanen audience. I walked with Krishnaji to the river after Krishnaji had seen Diane.'

July twenty-third. 'It was a beautiful day. Krishnaji gave the seventh Saanen talk, a long one-and-a-half hours and very moving one. Jean-Michel brought Diane for Krishnaji's touch right after the talk at Tannegg. I fetched Simonetta di Cesaro'—we've talked about her—'Suad al Radhi'—we've talked about her—'and Dr. Mark Brandes up the hill to lunch later. He is a German archeologist teaching at the University of Freiburg, who was brought by Suad twelve years ago to lunch here, and he came especially today to hear the talk and lunch. Before lunch, Krishnaji joined us and talked intently with Brandes about Sumerians.'

S: The Sumerians?

M: Mm. 'Brandes described how before 2,000 B.C., they began writing. At first, little clay objects were made, then they imprinted those objects on clay tablets. Krishnaji asked Brandes for archeology's view of our present civilization. He gave a pessimistic reply.' [Both chuckle.] 'Civilizations tend to destroy or be destroyed. Krishnaji said, "If you or some people see what is happening—the enormous technological advances and the lack of religious perception, what do you do? What will you do?"'—and I underline the you; he said it very emphatically.

S: Yes.

M: '"What will you do? Talk about it? Make people see?" Krishnaji ate in his room and came in for coffee. Brandes had to catch a train, so I took them down and then picked up Scott. Met Jean-Michel and Anneke, and guided them to Evelyne's chalet where we discussed with the Mendizzas and Evelyne the content of tomorrow's filmed dialogue between Krishnaji, Jean-Michel, Anneke, and Scott. I came back as Krishnaji was returning from a walk by himself. He was quite tired from the length of this morning's talk.'

The twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji was tired, so he didn't do his morning exercises. He had a long talk with Parchure about the Foundation activities in India. Krishnaji's plan for Parchure is to search for people interested in the teachings; and he questions how to finance it. I did errands in the village, looked for books for Krishnaji, etcetera. Evelyne and Mendizza came at 1:30 p.m. to set up camera lights for the dialogue with Krishnaji in the corner of the sitting room, where the bench is. At 3 p.m., Jean-Michel, Anneke, and Scott came as participants and discussed their opening question of what an individual can do in the face of a disordered world of violence, chicanery, etcetera. At 3:30 p.m., Daphne brought Diane, and Krishnaji gave her a treatment. The Marogers left after the filmed dialogue for their home in France. Krishnaji said to me that when he touched Diane's elbow, it was as if it were dissolving, becoming soft. The dialogue was filmed. Krishnaji went off for his walk, and close-ups were done of the other three. Max telephoned from Ojai to report on work done in Malibu; they have two more days of it. He is sending photos.'

Krishnaji & Mary in Switzerland (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: None of these interviews with Krishnaji that Michael Mendizza did are in the archives list.

M: No? Really?

S: Really, and that means the archives doesn't have them.

M: Well, let's do something about that.

S: I've got a note. There may be a more up-to-date archives list than this one I have.

M: I see.

S: I hope so, anyway.

M: The next day, 'I did desk work, ran errands, and made tofu. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched together. It was a quiet day of rest for Krishnaji. We walked as usual.'

July twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji gave the first public discussion. There was extraordinary rudeness and aggression from both Lulu Ani and Christian'—that terrible Norwegian—'and a loud complaint from Edward Ani that he has listened for forty years without any change in himself; Mrs. Ani harangued Krishnaji that it was because he hadn't explained it properly. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched quietly. Later, Krishnaji had a haircut. We talked about a headline in The Herald Tribune that said the world had spent $400 billion in 1976 on armaments, and from this, he said that the question this morning is one he must answer. "I shed a tear inwardly when I heard it." He asked as Edward Ani had asked, '"I've listened to you for forty years and nothing has changed. What will make it move?"'…'"A crisis? Sorrow? Pain? A devastating event? These are all outer. We depend on things to shake us. How am I to say, 'Be intelligent about the event'? They won't listen. They will ask, 'How am I to be intelligent when I'm not?' I would say, 'Do you really think you're not intelligent now?'"'…'"You, Maria, are a very good example. Would you have listened years ago before your husband died? You went through a devastating event before you came to this. Take Mima Porter. She had all that money; she took the opposite direction because of money, and money destroyed her. Look at Signora—yoga, it's her life now. Which means really that there are only a few who can be intelligent before the event, not after a motor accident, to say 'I must drive carefully.' How do you help them before, not after? Only be walking with them."' That's a strange comment. Mm.

S: Mm, yes.

M: 'Dr. Parchure and I had supper at 6 p.m. with Dorothy and Montague in their Land Rover. It was very nice. A delicious supper was cooked by Dorothy on her two-burner camping stove. It rained outside, but we were snug and warm, and it was very pleasant. Dorothy is dismayed to have found that the Anis have reservations for the Brockwood Gathering.' [S chuckles.]

The twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji held the second public discussion at which he began by speaking of the $400 billion spent on armaments, and went on to answer a question on change; to see without seeking what is happening, then intelligence can enter. I brought him back to the chalet, and then fetched Pascaline Mallet, Gisela Elmenhorst, and Magdalina Jasciuska up to lunch. The first two hadn't met the third. But, before we were halfway up the hill, they had found that they have Polish friends in common. The world of Krishnaji listeners,' I put. 'He came and sat with them after lunch, and then I drove them down again. At 4 p.m., Mr. Mirabet of Spain came, as in past years, to smile, shake Krishnaji's hands, and give 7,000 Swiss francs, which Krishnaji is giving to Brockwood.' That was that nice old Spaniard, who every year reverently came with quite a large sum of money to further the cause. 'Then, Krishnaji and I went up the hill with Michael Mendizza and Bonnie, and their son Eric was toddling about, and Scott was waiting. Krishnaji was filmed without voice walking along the path and then sitting down on the bench, for use later with a voice-over. The talking to the camera of last time is felt to be unnatural.' He was good on it…

S: Krishnaji was brilliant; but it wasn't a good idea, Krishnaji walking along and then suddenly turning to the camera and speaking to it.

M: Yes, that doesn't make sense.

July twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji held his third public discussion. I went back to the tent for Dr. Parchure and Mr. and Mrs. Waid, with whom Dr. Parchure stays in Bombay. He is very much the businessman and she is nice-looking and smiling, looking younger than the mother of two grown children. And I went down again to fetch Jackie Siddoo. Krishnaji sat both before and after lunch, but ate in his room. He talked at length with Jackie afterwards about Wolf Lake versus the present location for a school. It seems Sarjit has limits to how much she wants to invest and would like to wait five years before building at the lake. Jackie wants to press on. Krishnaji asked questions such as, "Are you willing to give everything you've got to this?"' [S laughs.] 'I asked him if he was implying that they should bankrupt themselves if necessary. "No, no," he said. But I was afraid Jackie might think he expected them to go that far. I took everyone back. Mr. and Mrs. Waid were having tea with Evelyne. I told Jackie that instead of his coming to Canada, she and Sarjit should spend as much time as possible where he is.'

The next day. 'Evelyne telephoned early, asking if I could come to a meeting in the afternoon to discuss Mr. Waid's suggestion that while Michael Mendizza does KFA filming in India, he also shoot footage to be made into a one-hour film on the Indian schools. She had enthused about this, and asked Dorothy if a film shouldn't also be done on Brockwood. Michael had sat up last night making cost estimates. Krishnaji gave his fourth public discussion in the tent and afterward had me speak to Mrs. Ani. I asked her why, in view of her hostility and her aggression shown toward Krishnaji and what he was saying on Wednesday, why she wanted to come to the Brockwood talks. I also mentioned her association with U.G. Krishnamurti and her joining in his malice toward Krishnaji. She called her husband and reported my question. I pointed out the limited Brockwood space, and our trying to give rooms to as many interested people as possible, so I question her coming. She said she didn't accept my description. I said her behavior in the tent came across as anger toward Krishnaji, and though I know little about U.G. Krishnamurti, people inevitably bring tales of his ugliness toward Krishnaji. As Krishnaji had to be rescued from the sun on the road, the conversation was short.' I had to pick him up as he was walking from the tent.

S: Yes.

M: Now, do we know about U.G. Krishnamurti?

S: Yes, I think we do.

M: Okay. 'Our conversation was short. Her husband asked if he could walk with me to the car, and said to me that his wife is abrasive. I agreed. Christian's behavior was brought in, and Ani said, "Oh, we're all somewhat childish." I said we are old enough not to be childish, and Christian's childishness can also be called common rudeness. I caught up with Krishnaji. After taking Krishnaji to Tannegg, I went back for Frances McCann. She and I lunched alone. Krishnaji joined us for coffee. I then went for an hour's visit with Joan Gordon at Alpina'—that's a hotel. 'Then, I took Dr. Parchure to Evelyne's meeting. Beside her and Mendizza, there were Dorothy and Suzanne and Hugues. Evelyne is enthusiastic about two films on the schools, but made it clear she cannot raise funds for anything but the KFA film. Estimates for a one-hour film for India was put at $24,000, and one for Brockwood at $9,000. Dorothy cautiously thought it might be possible. Parchure, who had spoken somewhat to Waid, was doubtful Waid would raise money for an Indian film, and it would be very difficult for Indians to do so. Evelyne was to meet the Waids in the evening, and Parchure lunches with them tomorrow. Evelyne flies to Los Angeles in the morning. The Mendizzas go on Friday.'

The thirtieth. 'Krishnaji ended this year's meetings with a fifth public discussion. Mr. Ani handed me a letter with a check to Brockwood for 150 pounds sterling, "in case we couldn't fill the room," and a lot of other nonsense. Dorothy and Montague came for lunch. Krishnaji and they were talking beforehand, and I was thinking that we had been able to get through this year's Saanen season without any specially crazy ladies, when at the door appeared a young German girl in a pink sari demanding to see Krishnaji.' There's always the [S chuckles] nutty female invasions that went on. [M chuckles, then both chuckle.] 'I made the usual spiel. "But I want to see him," she burst out, and tried to push her way in. It's the first time I've had to stop anybody physically. I held the door and blocked her way. She was alternately cajoling and angry, and then Krishnaji sent Dorothy to back me up.' [Chuckling.] 'We stood firm until the girl was completely outside and we locked the door.' [Both laugh.] 'Fosca reported that she hung around for quite a while.' Fosca could see out the kitchen window.

S: Oh, yes, which looks onto the driveway.

M: Yes. 'She must be the "crazy one" Dr. Parchure reported meeting in the tent, and Krishnaji said she pursued and grabbed him on the road. Krishnaji is against the school films. He thinks them a waste of monies needed for other things. Dorothy was not disappointed, as conveying the special quality of Brockwood on film would be difficult. Parchure, who lunched with the Waids, later reported that Waid was not prepared to raise any money at all, saying he is too busy. Sofia and Carlos Silva'—do you remember them?

S: Yes, I remember them.

M: …'came in briefly to see me at 4 p.m. She now does acupuncture in Rome. Krishnaji and I walked later. Frode caught up with us, coming to say goodbye; he leaves for Norway and then goes to Saint John's College in the U.S., a very special boy,' it says here. 'Evelyne left for Los Angeles.'

July thirty-first. ‘It is quiet at last. The people who came for the talks are leaving. Donald Dennis came to say goodbye. He, too, goes to Saint John’s College, as does Javier[5]. I was out when Donald came to the chalet, but ran into him in the village, and drove him to Dorothy’s in the camping site. She had just returned from the Diablerets. Dorothy, Montague, and Doris leave for Brockwood tomorrow. Krishnaji and I walked in the afternoon.’

August first. ‘It was a gray and foggy day. Krishnaji rested in bed. I did letters all day.’

The next day. ‘I worked at the desk all morning. Edgar Graf came to lunch, and Krishnaji came to the table. All seems to have gone well in the summer’s gathering. Edgar got sufficient donations to cover the costs in spite of the Swiss franc’s strength. The dollar dropped today to 1.70 Swiss francs to the dollar in the newspapers, but 1.63 was posted in the bank window. The village has different faces walking around now. Most familiar people are gone, though two came to the house wanting to see Krishnaji: a shy French boy, Gerard de Nouveau, a musician from Orleans. When he was told he couldn’t talk to Krishnaji, he asked if he could speak with me. So we did for a while. Shyness is so seldom seen.’ [Chuckles.] ‘Krishnaji did see Mr. Russu briefly at 4 p.m., and then we went for our walk. I reminded Krishnaji of the safe deposit box here and the money in it belonging to him, etcetera. He said, “As long as I am alive nothing will happen to you, if you are careful.”’ What does that have to do with the safe deposit box? [S laughs.] I don’t know. Anyway, that’s what my diary says.

The next day, ‘Krishnaji dictated letters. Dr. Parchure came for lunch, and Krishnaji was at the table. I went to the bank for an Alzina discussion with Mr. Hans Liechti.’ That’s the man in the bank. That was an account that I had jurisdiction over, but it was money at the Banc Cantonal given for Krishnaji.

S: Why the name Alzina?

M: It was invented by the man that looked after Frances’s investments, and at some point when he had come to turn over some of these things for Krishnaji’s use, he named the account Alzina, and so it was listed as Alzina.’

August fourth. ‘Nadia Kossiakof came in the afternoon. We talked, and later Krishnaji joined us. She described the horrors in Beirut where the Red Cross workers are deliberately fired on, and old women and children are shot. What should be one’s response to this, she asked. Krishnaji said, “What can one do? If you see a child being beaten, you act. But are you committed to something? If you have commitment, you are part of all that. If you see the danger of commitment, then you are free. And that intelligence will dictate.”’

The next day just says, ‘A quiet day. I worked at the desk. And we walked.’

August sixth, ‘To a letter from a man in Texas, who asked among other questions why one slips back from moments of clarity, Krishnaji dictated the following for me to put in my reply to the man, a William Bagley: "If I may point out, time as movement is not involved in having insight into one's own nature and structure. Time is our conditioning which is essentially thought. To perceive the whole movement of thought, in that very perception thought is aware of itself as being limited. And any action born of this limitation must inevitably bring about conflict, pain, and suffering. If one actually, not philosophically or theologically, perceives the truth of this, the truth of the nature of thought, then there is no falling away from that truth and coming back to it. One must also bear in mind that there is no path to truth and it can never be charted." He didn't sleep too well last night; he skipped his exercise this morning, and slept some more. He rested all morning, lunched with Dr. Parchure and me, and then took a nap. I too slept after lunch. The air was moist and heavy, rather enervating, but we went for our walk to the end of the wood. Krishnaji stopped as usual by the chickens, leaned over their pen'—there were some chickens up there by a chalet—'and said, "Pourquoi vous ne sortez pas?"' [M and S laugh.] That means, why don't you leave?

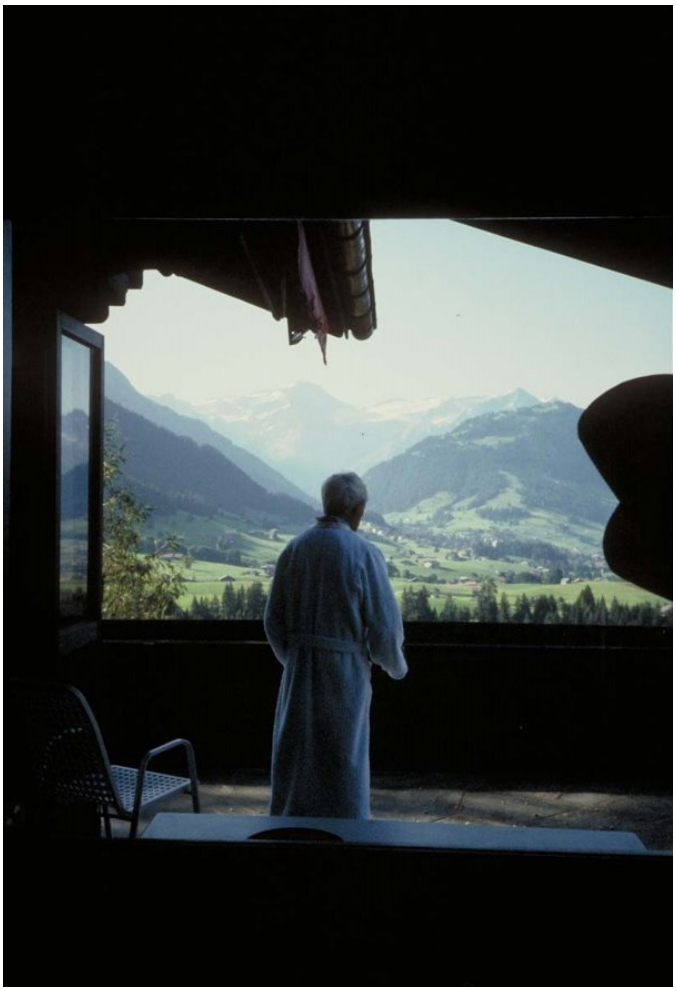
S: Yes!

M: 'There was a white cat in the newly cut field. Krishnaji approached it, but it flattened itself in a wild way, prepared to take off, then shot away toward Elizabeth Taylor's chalet when Krishnaji came close.' [Both laugh.] Elizabeth Taylor had a chalet that was just down the hill from the field that we walked across. 'Rain began as we reached Tannegg. In the evening, Vanda arrived back from Florence and Crans, where she put her grandson in camp. On the television news it said that the Pope has had a heart attack at Castel Gandolfo and received extreme unction. Krishnaji made no comment. When he said goodnight to me, he said, "Tomorrow I will send two angels with you, but not till tomorrow."' [Chuckles.] 'I go in the evening to Rome to spend two days with Filomena, returning here Thursday.'



August seventh. 'It was a gray morning. I was up early, washed my hair, and wrote another letter. Krishnaji slept well, and is feeling rested. I felt secure leaving him in Vanda's and Parchure's care, but there was that unease, a certain ache when I leave for outside reasons. He waved as I drove off at 10 a.m. in the little Renault. I went via Les Mosses through Aigle. The rain had commenced falling at Chateau d'Oex, and poured all the way to Geneva. Coming down the mountain, there was a sign: "Le pape est mort"'—the pope is dead. 'I read in the papers at the airport that he had died last evening at Castel Gandolfo after a heart attack. I reached Cointrin'—that's the name of the airfield in Geneva—'at 12:15 p.m., returned the Renault to Hertz, checked my small bag, and checked into the Alitalia 1:55 p.m. flight, which was rescheduled to leave at 3:00 p.m., so I ate a sandwich and read. Rain kept pouring. Each passenger was given a plastic umbrella, and we ran across the tarmac to the aircraft, arriving pretty wet. The hard-voiced stewardess made all the announcements in Italian, French, and English, rattling them off so fast it sounded like all one word. We flew through fog and clouds to Rome, arriving after 5 p.m., Rome time. The immigration man, more attentive these days than usual, looked in a book to see if my name might be there. I carried my bag out, and there was Filomena and her son Mario waiting in spite of my having said I would take a taxi. Filomena's a little older, but totally her dear self. All the family were waiting when we got back to their home. A big greeting. Katrina'—that's her sister—'is a bit paralyzed now on the left side. I'm sleeping, while I'm here, in their other house. I have Filomena's room, and she is in the back. I gave little presents to each. There were smiles, jokes, and the warm chatter of Italian family life. Filomena and I had the perfect supper for me: fruit including fresh figs and then a mozzarella. We talked and talked.'

The next day, 'Filomena and I spent a quiet day talking.'

August ninth. 'Filomena and I went shopping for a juice extractor. Mario drove us there and then drove us to San Pietro'—that's Saint Peter's. 'I went to see the Pietà.' You know, the Michelangelo statue of the dead Christ in the virgin's arms. 'It is now restored after the madman hit it with a hammer, and it is behind glass. Not very well lit but deeply moving as always. Preparations were going on for the lying in state of Pope Paul, whose body was to be brought to Rome from Castel Gandolfo in the late afternoon.' Castel Gandolfo's the papal country place…

S: Yes, yes.

Krishnaji in Switzerland (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: …where he'd go on summer holidays. 'Many Japanese tourists were milling about. Filomena touched the foot of a San Pietro statue, worn to no toes from its countless touchings. Rome, more than any other city I have been in, seems to reach further in time into a measureless past. The Michelangelo and Bernini, once again, were a gift to the eye and the spirit. The baroque gestures of the saints and putti'—putti are the little cherubs, they call them putti—'once again, make me smile inside. Papal deaths seem a part of my comings and goings to this city. It was Pius when I left in 1958, and Sam used to stop by the piazza to see if the white or black smoke would float from the chimney above the Sistine Chapel.'

S: Yes.

M: 'We then went to Ponte Milvio for figs, mozzarella, and parmigiano for me to take back to Gstaad.' Ponte Milvio is one of the ancient Roman bridges across the Tiber. 'The open-air market, noisy, cheerful, made me feel really here again. Filomena was intent, suspicious of every fruit; the salesman, young, relaxed, wooing the customers.' [Both chuckle.] '"Anche se non si compra ti ringraziamo," shouted one'—which means, even if you don't buy, we thank you. [S laughs.] 'In the cheese shop, it was nice, warm, and busy. The salesman wooed Filomena; Filomena said to him sternly in Italian, "See that you give me the best." "Si, signora, pense à me." Yes, signora, trust me. [Chuckles.] 'We had to go on to another place for the freshest figs. We came back for lunch, and I read most of afternoon. Filomena packed the figs and cheese in grape leaves in a box, packed so perfectly they could ride in my suitcase. At 5 p.m., Sofia or Sanguinetti, as she calls herself professionally—or are she and Carlos married after all? No matter.' [Chuckles.] 'She came to meet Filomena. The object is perhaps some relief from pain of arthritis in Filomena's neck and right shoulder. Sophia now does acupuncture and is said to be very good. She was just right with Filomena: cheerful, friendly, confident, asking just the right questions and explaining just enough to Filomena. She examined her and said her energy is excellent. Energy is the ingredient in everything these days. It puts one off a bit, but I reach for any hope of any relief for Filomena. Sofia is on holiday now. Filomena is to call her at the end of the month and make an appointment for treatments. Sofia told me that there would be no charge, which I said we couldn't let her do, but thanked her very much. I left funds with Filomena to pay for the treatments. It is now up to them, but I hope and hope. Filomena and I had a nice supper of fruit salad and mozzarella and watched on television the papal cortege coming through Rome from Castel Gandolfo to San Pietro. The piazza was filled.'

The tenth, 'Filomena and I had breakfast. She had packed the figs and cheese expertly. I said goodbye to the family, then Filomena and Mario took me to Fiumicino'—that's the Rome airport—'and, without delays, the Alitalia flight left at 12:50 p.m. for Geneva. I was glad to have been with Filomena, and felt some good for her in my coming. She was relaxed and smiling. Mario is, on the whole, older but not Filomena. In Geneva, Hertz provided a strident green Opel Kadett station wagon, and so I drove to Gstaad the Bulle way. Krishnaji had said to me when I left, "It will be fun to go off alone," and that is usually so for me. But going away from him geographically and for something outside of the ordinary and, therefore, strictly avoidable has little pleasure for me. Now, I was heading toward him, and so back on the right track.' [Both chuckle.] 'The drive wound its familiar way. He was awake when I arrived at 4:30 p.m. He had sat with some people Vanda had invited to lunch—Frances and some others. Krishnaji gave me the letters he wrote to me on the two days I was away, the eighth and ninth of August.[6] We went for the walk to the end of the wood. There was much snow here on Tuesday. The Wispile was white…'

S: It's the mountain that you can see right in front of the balcony of Tannegg.

M: Yes, that's right…'was white a third of the way down, but it has melted now, though much remains on the higher mountains. It looks very white and clean. Krishnaji said that he and Dr. Parchure demolished much of the nonsense about yoga to Vanda, and McCann was present and heard it too. He seems pleased.[7] He has started taking morning walks before his massage. A cassette had come from my brother telling me that my cousin's in the hospital again, an infection'…well, I don't want to read all that.

S: Yes. I understand.

M: 'Life seemed to have been very hard on her. If it were not for Krishnaji, I would go to her, but as with Father and Mother, Krishnaji comes first.'

The next day, 'I did letters in the morning and village errands. Then I telephoned Bud at the Vineyard. Lorna is somewhat better. Krishnaji, Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and I walked. The French air controllers had begun another slow-down strike.' They were always doing that.

August twelfth. 'At lunch were Dr. Liechty, Frances McCann, Marjolaine van der Straten, Duncan McCandless, and a Mark Wagner, a young American with an American father and a Mexican mother who came here for lunch Thursday and seemed bright to Krishnaji. After lunch, Krishnaji joined us. He talked to Dr. Liechty, and after she left, there was a chance for the young guests to ask questions. Mark had to be prodded by Frances, and asked something meaningless about the moon and relapsed into slack-looking silence. Duncan went on in his slightly jokey way and the time dragged on. I became impatient and felt a waste of Krishnaji's time, and an obviously lost nap. I took up the discussion to try to bring it to a culmination, as it couldn't go far as it was. I had an increasing migraine. Krishnaji, Vanda, and I walked. When we came back, we watched the funeral of Pope Paul in Saint Peter's Square. Krishnaji watched it, and said, "I can't feel a thing, can you?" He admired the rug spread under the coffin.' [Light chuckling.] 'A helicopter appeared; tiny over Saint Peter's Dome, and Krishnaji said, "le Saint-Esprit,"' the holy spirit. [Laughs more.] Oh dear. 'The migraine finally won at supper, and I went to lie down. Dr. Parchure worked on my head and neck, which relieved it, and I went to bed and sleep early. Perhaps I'm just tired.' [Light chuckle.]

The thirteenth of August. 'It was a rainy day. I telephoned Dorothy at Brockwood about our arrival and about Mark Wagner coming to the Brockwood talks, then started packing. There were no guests at lunch. A young American, Curtis Jones, appeared on the doorstep wanting help with some project on a Greek island. He was rather engaging, full of energy and purpose, but slightly eccentric. Krishnaji saw him through the window and talked to him a bit, and then turned him over to Dr. Parchure, as he has some notions of writing a book on the human body. Parchure says he knows nothing about it.' [Both laugh.] These people who would turn up and…

S: Yes, I know.

M: …flit in and out of the day. [Chuckles.] 'We brought him plates of food, and he talked a streak and finally accepted in a friendly fashion my saying that the Foundation couldn't offer money or sponsorship of his project. It would've been nice if all that earnest energy could've been turned in Krishnaji's direction, but he couldn't see beyond his own view, and lost the chance. I rested and read all afternoon and finished the second volume of the Raj Quartet.' I think I was reading that all summer.

The next day, 'I did packing and the last errands. Krishnaji had a haircut. A Pakistani man, who said he met Krishnaji fifty years ago, came to greet him. Then Krishnaji, Vanda, and I walked to the end of the wood. I had an on-and-off migraine, and Krishnaji cured it.'

August fifteenth. 'It was a sunny morning, and the mountains shone. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I said goodbye to Vanda and Fosca, and drove via Les Mosses and the autoroute to Geneva. I left the Hertz car, and we took Swiss Air to Heathrow, the flight going over Germany and Belgium to avoid French air space and the strike of air control workers. Mary and Joe, Dorothy, and Doris met us. Krishnaji and I drove back to Brockwood with Mary and Joe. They are staying another night before returning to London in order to be with us. Brockwood is green and beautiful after heavy rains all summer. Krishnaji had supper downstairs with the few who are here. There was a message to me from Betsy to telephone her on my arrival.'

August sixteenth. 'I unpacked, then talked most of the morning with Mary L. in the kitchen. After lunch, I unfurled the Mercedes from the barn and got it going. Mary came with me to the garage, and we exercised it a little. I asked her if she had worked on volume two of the Krishnaji biography. She said she has been making notes and wants to go ahead, but wonders how to handle the Rajagopal story. We talked about it, and I said that I hoped urgently that she will do the book. Mary was seventy at the end of July, all the more reason to want her to get on with it. We came back, and then Krishnaji, up from his nap, came with me and the Linkses in their car to Ovington, where we walked by the river. The beauty of it, the clear, swift waters and the green water weeds, the little ducks diving and swimming along the bottom, the slow sail of the swan, the warm smell of growing summer things gave a rapture. I walked to the water and felt dissolved as though it ran through all my senses. This countryside moves me in a way that the splendors of the Swiss mountains do not. We came back to the news that Mary and Joe's flat in London had been broken into. They left immediately, but later Mary rang to say that nothing was missing. A crow bar had been used to force the door, but inside the burglar alarm went off and the intruders fled. Immense relief for this flat is filled with personal treasures they have collected over their lives, things of great taste.'

S: We have to end it here, Mary, we're running out of tape.

M: Alright.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Natasha is the daughter of Narayan and Shakuntala.

[2] Frode and Julie were two students at Brockwood. Frode went on to become a trustee of the Krishnamurti Foundation of America.

[3] If this hasn't been mentioned before, The Oak Grove School was the Krishnamurti school in Ojai so named because it sits on the edge of the Oak Grove where Krishnaji gave his public talks in Ojai for decades.

[4] Krishnaji enjoyed his pocket watches being exactly to-the-second accurate, so the telephone time code number would be called, and his watches adjusted accordingly.

[5] Another student from Brockwood.

[6] Krishnaji wrote to Mary every day they were not together, usually when he was in India and she was in California; but he did the same even when they were just apart for a couple of days, as on this occasion.

[7] This conversation about yoga took place on August eighth, according to Krishnaji's letter to Mary. He writes, "Miss McCann was here for lunch and after Dr. P. was explaining what 'yoga' means and Mrs. Walsh joined later. I will tell you about it. Between Dr. P. and myself, we wiped away yoga, almost entirely. Yoga = exercise and not all the nonsense around it."

Issue 54: August 17, 1978 to October 25, 1978

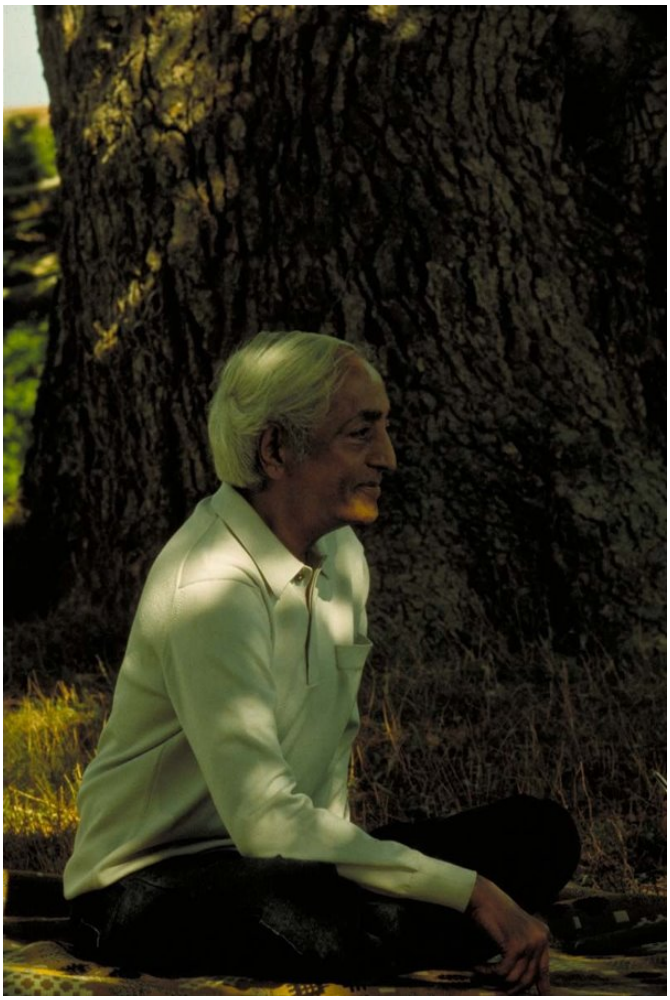
The activities we follow in this issue are typical of this time for Krishnaji and Mary, except for a small break they take to the Loire area of France. There are the public Brockwood talks and discussions, the beginning of a new school term at Brockwood, and Krishnaji's preparation to go to India for his winter program there. One of the unusual elements of this year is that Mary is preparing to go to India with Krishnaji, something she hadn't done since 1965.

Many readers of these memoirs have expressed appreciation for the hyperlinks allowing them to read the text of any talk or discussion that Mary has said she found to be especially good. Thanks to the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust and its archivist, this issue has the first hyperlinks to video tapes of such talks and discussions. We hope you enjoy them as much as we do.

Mary: We're beginning on August seventeenth, 1978. 'Krishnaji and I took the 11:23 a.m. train to London and were met at Waterloo by Mary and Joe. After Krishnaji gave Joe the Jacquet ties, so carefully chosen and ordered for him by Krishnaji in Geneva, Joe had said that he wanted Krishnaji never to have to take a taxi in London again!' [Both chuckle.] 'He drove us to Fortnum's, leaving Mary, Krishnaji, and me to lunch. During it, Mary questioned Krishnaji on the schools. She had heard from Erna in a letter yesterday that the KFA needs $950,000 by next April for a school building and a yearly $100,000 above the tuitions just to keep the school going. Krishnaji has not yet seen the letter, but listened to Mary on the effort that all this fundraising entails.' Obviously, Mary was [both chuckle] very much against it. 'Joe picked us up and took us to Portland Place, where Krishnaji had a 3 o'clock appointment with dentist Thompson. I came back with Mary and Joe to their flat and saw the damaged door.' You know, they had been broken into.

Scott: Yes, I remember our last discussion ended with that.

M: 'The door is now fitted with new locks, and I was glad to see their charming things all there and intact.' They had a lovely collection of many things.



S: Yes, yes.

M: 'Later, Joe drove Krishnaji and me to Waterloo. We bought two detective stories in Waterloo, and took the train, and I began volume three of the Raj Quartet.'

August eighteenth says: 'I worked at the desk, then went to Alresford on errands. It was a warm day, so Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked the dogs in the grove. Krishnaji asked, "Where are we going?" He spoke of Erna, who came to all this because of the teachings, and now has to spend all her time worrying about money. Krishnaji questioned school money being spent, and the energy expended for that and not on the teachings.'

S: Quite right.

M: I agreed with him, but [chuckles] it didn't turn out that way. 'Dorothy was, as usual, immediately defensive, which hinders Krishnaji's inquiry. Brockwood has reached a fairly firm footing, but he now wonders if we should go ahead with the Oak Grove School in Ojai, so late in the day. "I could be wrong," he said. Everyone is so busy making all these outward things happen that there is no time or energy for the inner. He long ago was impatient with me for these same questions he is now asking. He seemed troubled; yet, this morning, when I played records during his breakfast, he was smiling, listening with enjoyment to Joan Sutherland singing Bellini. He said, "It is sentimental, but it brings tears to the eyes," and smiling, rolled his eyes to the sound. A romantic.'

Krishnaji talking on lawn (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

August nineteenth. 'Krishnaji said upstairs after lunch, "I woke up this morning saying, 'What am I doing here?'…'These are children. I need someone to talk to, someone who will mine it out of me. I feel there is much more to be got out. Someone who can discuss these things—but they can't.'"'

S: He's saying that there's much more to get out of him.

M: Yes.

S: But that there's no one to talk with him to get it out.

M: Yes.

S: He always felt that, it seems.

M: He always felt that; someone to facilitate his expression of these things.

'And then I said, "Has there ever been anyone?"'

'Krishnaji replied, "No. Aldous was Christian in his upbringing. Then he went off into Buddhism, Vedanta, and all that. He couldn't."'

'I asked, "Anyone else?"'

'Krishnaji: "Rajagopal hadn't got the brains for this." He shrugged as he said that.'

'I asked about India, and Krishnaji said, "They discuss, but sometimes it forges something out of me. Achyut has gone into this, but he is too old now. He says that he has failed me."'

'And then, "Perhaps I will go away. Leave all this. I must be careful or I will do that."… "I will do whatever is decided. Don't you worry about this, or I can't talk to you." I do not worry. I am very still inside, but I too fail him in this. And to fail Krishnaji is a knife through one.'

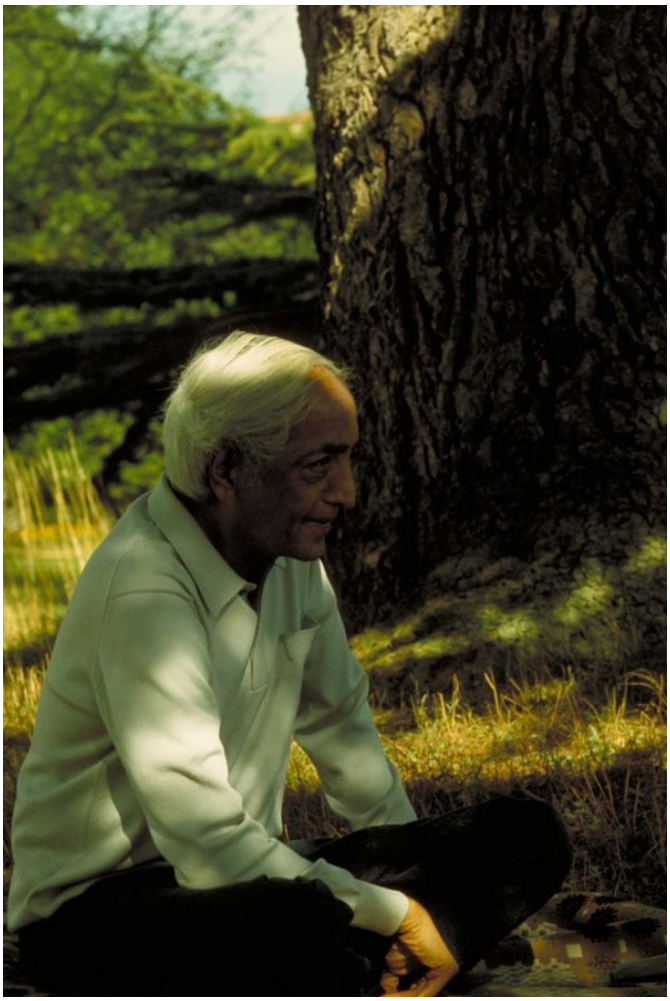
S: Quite so.

M: 'We worked, weeding in the garden.'

The next day, 'It is warm, and he was not feeling like the morning walk, but slept. He is thinking of these matters. He said, "I will write to Achyut to get some pandits and we will have a discussion."…"We will have a discussion and make a book out of it." My spirits rose a little. I worked in the tent. When Krishnaji came down, he, Dorothy, and I went for a walk in the grove and pruned bushes.' We did a lot of pruning in those days, and I liked that. Krishnaji did, too.

S: Alright, let me just clarify for a minute here. You said that you went and worked in the tent.

M: Chairs and things.



S: Right. There was a large marquee put out for the public talks.

M: Yes, two large marquees.

S: Right, one was for eating and one for the talks.

M: Yes.

S: Just to clarify; otherwise…

Krishnaji talking on lawn (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: Those tents are the tents I was talking about.

S: Right, otherwise, people in the future might think we made you sleep in a tent at Brockwood. [Both chuckle.]

M: A Georgian tent. [S laughs.]

August twenty-first. 'In the morning I went to Petersfield on errands: got plants for the West Wing, etcetera. It was a warm and lovely day. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I pruned bushes in the grove. Krishnaji is fired to clear all the deadwood, brambles, nettles, fox gloves, etcetera.' [S chuckles.]

The next day, 'I took Dr. Parchure to Petersfield Station for his day in London, and did more errands there. Edna Cleeve…' do you remember Edna?

S: I do indeed.

M: Edna Cleeve was the nice woman who came to clean in the West Wing. 'Edna and I prepared the West Wing dining room as a guest room for the gatherings. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I cleared weeds in the grove. Bonnie and Michael Mendizza and baby Eric arrived and are staying in Woodland Cottage[1].'

Wednesday, August twenty-third. 'Another warm day. Krishnaji dictated letters, which I typed. I made flight reservations for us on October thirtieth via Japan Air to Delhi and continuing on to Benares. A work party of everyone in the house, including Krishnaji, worked on weed clearance in the grove. I heard on the BBC that Charles Eames had died. Sad, sad news of a talented and nice man.' The Eames were great friends of the Dunnes, and people that I knew well.

S: Yes.

M: And they were very, very talented.

S: The Eames chairs.

M: Eames chairs. Yes.

S: Yes. Designers of all kinds of things.

M: I had wished that, if someone was ever to do a documentary on Krishnaji, it would be they. I would've tried to have the Eames do it, had they lived, because…

S: Did they make films?

M: Oh, yes.

S: Ah. I didn't know that.

M: They made a famous film when the Russians had a World Fair in Moscow, and they were given the job of explaining to the Russian public what the United States was like, in fifteen minutes. What they did was, they did a film montage of all kinds of things, forest and people. They started with the morning and people going to work; showing all kinds of people going to work, someone on a trolley, someone walking, someone on a bicycle, someone in a beautiful car, all going in the morning; children going to school, and then it went through the day, the sort of things that people did. In the process, it showed the country, mountains, and freeways, and streets, and all these things. They even showed Filomena's little dog, Monkey. [S laughs.] And this was shown on seven enormous screens in Moscow. People stood up to watch it. The public came in for fifteen minutes, and on seven huge screens as big as that wall, this was shown. So, everybody could see. And this was to give a picture of the United States to the Russian public.

S: How interesting. Was that the same year as the famous Kitchen Debate with Khrushchev and Nixon?

M: I don't remember. Perhaps.

August twenty-fourth. 'Evelyne Blau flew in from Los Angeles, arriving just before Krishnaji and I left for London. She is in the West Wing spare room. Krishnaji and I took the train from Petersfield, and Joe Links kindly met us and drove us to Huntsman. I walked to Hillier's on Cork Street to have my slacks altered, and to have a greenish heavy tweed pair made from tweed from Huntsman. Krishnaji and I lunched at Fortnum's, then Joe drove us to Portland Place for a 2 p.m. appointment with Mr. Thompson. He then took me to Morgan Bank and on to Sloan Street, where he left me at The General Trading Company.' That's a furniture place. 'I bought two dozen teaspoons we need.' I'm sure everyone in posterity will be fascinated by knowing that [S laughs]. 'Then I walked up the street to have my hair cut. Not too good, but it was much needed as it was too long. I got to Portland Place by 4 p.m., but Krishnaji didn't finish until 6 p.m. Four hours in the chair! Mr. Thompson prepared five more teeth for crowns. Joe, blessedly, took us right to Waterloo, and we arrived at Brockwood by 8:30 p.m. It was a grueling day for Krishnaji, but he said that he had "thought of nothing" the whole four hours.' That's the astounding statement.

The next day, 'Krishnaji rested all day. Edgar Graf arrived and is in the West Wing dining room, a mark of esteem from Krishnaji,' it says.

S: Yes, it is. That's what I was thinking, actually.

M: 'People are filling the house.'

August twenty-sixth says, 'A clear fine day. The larger tent with 2,000 chairs was full. Everything was very orderly. People entered in groups of fifty; our attempt to prevent people racing for seats seems to be working. Krishnaji's platform is on the north side this year, and there's a little enclosed curtain space just by his entrance where he can tidy his hair.'

Editor's Note: Krishnaji had to walk from the house across the extensive south lawn to the tent, and it was often windy and even raining. This little enclosure, which had a little mirror, gave him the chance to tidy himself before going on stage and in front of the video cameras. He would carry down his comb, comb his hair, hardly looking at himself, and immediately walk on stage (assuming the announcements were over).

'He was in fine form. We ate fruit and salad upstairs afterward and then returned to the tent for the hot food course. Krishnaji kept moving about so he doesn't get hemmed in.'

Krishnaji talking on lawn (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Yes, Krishnaji used to go back to the West Wing after the talk to kind of…

M: …unwind.

We ate fruit and salad upstairs afterward and then returned to the tent for the hot course. Krishnaji kept moving about so he doesn't get hemmed in.'

S: Maybe we should just say something about this because I can't remember if we've mentioned in previous discussion the eating routine after the Brockwood talks and discussion. There's no place to eat anyplace around Brockwood. So, Brockwood used to prepare meals, lunch, for these 2,000 or more people who came to the talks. People could buy the entire meal or just parts of it, which was an enormous achievement of military precision by Esme and Verna…

M: Yes, getting the food for 2,000 plus people, and getting it down to the tent.

S: Yes. But Krishnaji, after a talk, would go back up to the West Wing and kind of…

M: …unwind.

S: …what I used to call "come in for a landing," [both chuckle] and have the start of his normal lunch.

M: Yes, fruit and salad, and he would be quiet.

Krishnaji talking on lawn (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: But, then, he would go back down to the food tent and mix with people and eat a little of the hot food everyone else was eating.

M: Yes, that's exactly what happened.

S: Yes. But, he didn't sit down.

M: No. He stood up and moved, otherwise people would corner him.

S: Yes, yes. Poor Krishnaji.

M: Yes.

S: Okay. I'm just putting that down for the record. I think we've talked briefly about it before, but I can't remember.

M: I don't think we have, I don't know.

August twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji gave the second Brockwood talk of the year. The weather was fine, and the tent was full. As yesterday, we ate upstairs after the talk, and then he ate in the tent. Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, the dentist and his wife, came. After a rest, we pruned in the grove.'

Now, I find that the big book doesn't give anything again until October.

S: Really?

M: I regret, yes, so the following month will be rather quick.

S: I guess so.

M: For August twenty-eighth it just says, 'we pruned in the grove.'

S: [chuckles] This is going to be quick! [M laughs.]

M: The next day, Krishnaji gave the first public discussion, a very good one,' I say. 'In the afternoon, with huge energy, he led Dorothy and me in pruning in the grove. Edgar Graf left.'

August thirtieth, 'Mary and Joe drove down for lunch, and Mary had a long meeting with Evelyne on the chronology for the biography part of the film. Beginning at lunch, Krishnaji also talked to Mary and me about the necessity to raise funds, and its taking energy from everyone and at the expense of the teachings. Mary had suggested that the Ojai school building be stopped. Krishnaji said he had thought about it, but it must continue.'

The thirty-first. 'Krishnaji held the second public discussion in the tent. Evelyne's question aimed at a subject she wanted discussed for the film, on learning and relationship, was the dominant theme, and Krishnaji covered it fully. He ate no lunch as his stomach wasn't right. At 4 p.m., Michael Mendizza took over 100 slides of Krishnaji in the drawing room, while Dorothy and I talked to him. It began to rain, so we didn't go pruning. Evelyne interviewed Doris and then Dorothy on audiotape in the evening. I telephoned my stepfather at Martha's Vineyard. My cousin is still in the hospital. Tomorrow is the anniversary of my mother's death. I had to tell my stepfather Wooge that I'm going to India, so can't visit him at the Vineyard this autumn. He said he hadn't expected me at the Vineyard.'

Then there's really nothing until September second. 'The weather is still fine. Krishnaji gave his third talk, a very fine one. Krishnaji ate first, as usual, in the West Wing and then returned to the tent for the main dish. We walked quietly in the afternoon. Simonetta and a friend of hers, Lolita Pignotelli, came and spent the night. Simonetta was in the West Wing dining room.'

September third, 'The weather is perfect. Krishnaji gave the fourth talk on meditation, and it was extremely good. The tent overflowed with people. I made an appeal for donations. Krishnaji, as usual, ate upstairs and then returned to the tent. Jean-Michel Maroger is here for the day. Krishnaji set dates for our visit to their place in France for October second to eleventh. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Jean-Michel, and I walked. Simonetta left. Krishnaji and I had supper watching the new Pope celebrating mass in Saint Peter's Square. Then, we watched The Goodies!' I've forgotten about The Goodies.

S: [laughing] Oh yes.

M: What was The Goodies?

S: Oh, The Goodies was one of those ridiculous British farce comedy programs.

M: Yes, I remember now.

S: They were like Monty Python, but even more farcical and more frantic.

M: [laughing] I haven't thought of The Goodies in all these many decades!

S: Somehow right after watching the Pope being coronated, seems…[Both laugh.]

M: The next day it just says, 'People are leaving as the talks are over. It is a quiet day. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields that have just been reaped: golden and beautiful.'

September fifth, 'It rained. I worked at the desk. Krishnaji dictated the first of a new series of Letters to the Schools, which are to go to the Indian schools, Brockwood, the Oak Grove, and Wolf Lake.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held a discussion with as many students and staff as are here. It was photographed by Michael Mendizza. Later, he also photographed Krishnaji walking with Whisper in the grove.'

September seventh, 'Evelyne and Michael, Bonnie, and Eric left for Holland to photograph Castle Eerde before returning to the U.S. I went for tea with Phil and Christopher Fry; their garden is beautiful. It was a happy visit. I was back in time to give Krishnaji his tray.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went to Wickham to lunch at the Old House Hotel.' Do you remember that?

S: I remember it well.

M: 'It was very pleasant. We came back on the small roads. At 5 p.m., I went to the Alresford Surgery for a tetanus shot and the first cholera and typhoid and paratyphoid shots.' I was preparing to go to India.

The ninth, 'Krishnaji dictated the Letters to the Schools number two. I slept all afternoon, feverish from the shots. Krishnaji and Dorothy weeded in the grove.'

The tenth, 'My fever has gone, and I felt better. Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number three. We both rested after lunch. Krishnaji tried'—what? 'Krishnaji tried sliding down the banister a little' [both laugh] 'as we went out to do more weeding and pruning in the grove.'

S: Why not? He was only eighty-three! [Both laugh.]

M: Anyway, on the eleventh, it says: 'Krishnaji and I went to London. Mary and Joe met us at Waterloo, and took us to Huntsman.' [Laughs.] Another duplicate trip. 'I had a fitting at Hillier's on the greenish tweed trousers. Krishnaji and I bought pens in the Burlington Arcade.' He liked doing that. There was a pen shop…

S: Yes. It's wonderful.

M: It's not there anymore.

S: What? Oh, I thought it was still there.

M: Maybe it's somewhere else, but it's not in the Arcade because I went deliberately there a few years ago to buy a pen I like that I can't get in this country, and it was gone.

Anyway, 'we then lunched with Mary at Fortnum's. Joe took Krishnaji to Mr. Thompson at 2:30 p.m., and I did errands on foot—the bank, Culpepers…' What was Culpepers?

S: It's an herbal shop.

M: That's right.

S: It used to be on…oh, right near Wiggins, the coffee man. But then it moved.

M: Yes. I remember vaguely now…'and then I got a taxi at Claridge's…' It was near Claridge's.

S: Yes.

M: '…to Portland Place. Krishnaji was two hours in the chair. He had the loose upper front tooth out, and a replacement went in but he must go back Friday. Joe drove us to Waterloo. Home by 6:15 p.m. People are arriving for a seminar. Maurice Wilkins came.' He died recently.

S: Yes, I saw that in one of the weekly journals that I read. He was a very nice man.

M: Yes, a nice man.

September twelfth, 'Krishnaji held the first of daily seminars at 11:30 a.m. About seventy people came, and it started on the subject of "What does it mean to be a light to oneself?" but it veered off. We pruned in the afternoon, but for too long, and it was tiring. Krishnaji was full of energy. He had an hour's talk with Shakuntala, and also treated Harsh.'

The next day, 'in the early morning, Krishnaji had a talk with Dr. Parchure and me. Then, he conducted the second day of the seminar, and it went well. He got into the subject of fear. After lunch, Krishnaji called Dorothy for a talk on organization drowning the teachings, how to prevent it, etcetera. This seminar is too much for the staff after the gatherings. Jean-Michel Maroger joined it after an hour, and Krishnaji also said his time is underused during the European part of his year. He wants to talk less to students and more to the public and people capable of going with him.'

The next day was the seminar again, and more pruning in the grove.

September fifteenth, 'Krishnaji and I went to London. Joe met us and drove us to Huntsman.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji and I lunched at Fortnum's and shopped at Hatchards, and Krishnaji went with Joe to Mr. Thompson while I did errands. Joe drove Krishnaji and me to Waterloo.' Another identical day. 'In the evening, Maurice Wilkins, David Bohm, and David Shainberg discussed science and Krishnaji's teachings.'

On the sixteenth, 'Krishnaji held a fourth seminar meeting. Very good. We pruned and pruned.'

And it was the same for the next three days, 'Krishnaji held fifth seminar meeting. Good. Pruning.' You see, I'm trying to master the art of brevity. [Chuckles.]

S: [chuckles] And, unfortunately, succeeding brilliantly.

M: 'On the last day of the seminar, the nineteenth, there was a panel discussion with Shainberg, David Bohm, Dr. Parchure, Harsh, and me. Then everyone left.'

September twentieth, 'Krishnaji rested in bed all day, and I worked at the desk. All staff are starting a four-day holiday tomorrow. The ten students who are here are taking charge, including doing the meals.' Where were you?

S: I was there. [Both chuckle.]

M: September twenty-first, 'Krishnaji again spent the day in bed. I took the 9:23 a.m. train to London, and went for my Indian visa to the high commission, where Mr. Vethakan'—he was a nice man—'was helpful.' He worked for the embassy, and he came to the talks that year. 'Then to the French consulate for Krishnaji's visa. I had my hair cut, and caught the 2:50 p.m. from Waterloo. In the evening, I took Frances McCann and Brian Jenkins to Chichester Cathedral, where there was a performance of The Sleep of Prisoners. Christopher was there and had reserved front row seats for us.' That's one of his plays, and often they did his plays in the cathedral, which is a wonderful background for his sort of play.

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I went to London. Joe met us at Waterloo. I gave lunch at Cecconi to Krishnaji, Mary, Joe, Amanda, and Alain Naudé, who's here for a week before going to see his mother in South Africa.'

S: Where is that restaurant?

M: Vigo Street, I think. It has Bond Street on one side and Regent Street on the other side. It's an Italian place, and I didn't like it much. But anyway, that's what we did. 'Krishnaji had his haircut at Truefitt, and then we went back to the country.'

September twenty-third. 'Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number four in the morning. I took Dr. Parchure to Winchester in the afternoon for Adidas things for Krishnaji.' That would be shoes.

S: Yes, Adidas shoes, for walking in India.

M: That's right.

S: He used his Kohli shoes to walk in at Brockwood.

M: I think so. Yes. 'I did other errands in Winchester, and had a flu vaccine in the evening.' Why did I have it in the evening? Well, anyway, that's not important.

September twenty-fourth. 'I feel a bit fluey, feverish. Krishnaji dictated the fifth Letters to the Schools in the morning. I rested in afternoon, but went with Krishnaji for a walk across the fields.'

Not very much happened for the next two days except that Krishnaji dictated two more Letters to the Schools.

September twenty-seventh, 'Dr. Parchure left for India, and students who arrived from Ojai for the beginning of the school term here said there had been a fire in Ojai, in Matilija Canyon. Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number eight. Mary Cadogan came down at 11:30 a.m., and discussed publication matters that need to be discussed in India at trustee meetings. She may not be able to go. She and her husband Alec are going on holiday to California next week. I took her to Petersfield, then I worked in the grove, pruning with Krishnaji and Dorothy.'

The next day, 'There was rain in the morning. Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number nine. The Digbys came for lunch and reported on publication matters to Krishnaji. Then Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I pruned. We changed our flight to India from Japan Air to Air India.'

September twenty-ninth. 'Pope John Paul died after thirty-three days as Pope.' That's why the present one is called Pope John Paul II.

S: There is a large body of evidence that that pope was poisoned.

M: Yes, I've heard about that. Does anybody know who poisoned him?

S: [laughing] Well, this involves the scandal with the Bank Ambrosiano, which was an arm of the Vatican Bank, and it seems there was right wing and criminal money…

M: Yes, and some organization called something peculiar.

S: Yes. Apparently, the poisoned Pope was a very good, honest man, who really was a wonderful priest, and he rose up because of his integrity and wouldn't accept the corruption he found. There were all kinds of corrupt things that the Vatican Bank was involved in.

M: Yes.

S: And he was making complaints about it, and suddenly…

M: …he died…

S: Yes.

M: …after thirty-three days. That's really medieval.

Krishnaji talking on lawn (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Do you remember there was a lawyer and his wife from the Bahamas, who were interested in the teaching and who came to the Brockwood talks several times. Patrick Tooth, was his name, and he was the lead lawyer for the family of that Italian who was in charge of the Bank Ambrosiano and who was found hanged under Blackfriar's Bridge in London.

M: That's what I'm trying to remember. I remember the hanging under the bridge…

S: Yes, well, this man supposedly committed suicide by hanging himself under the bridge, but his hands were tied together. [Chuckles.] You know, there were lots of suspicious things like that.

M: I'm fishing in my memory for it, what was that illegal group, something with a number.

S: Yes, it was like P2 or something…

M: P2, yes, I think that's it.

S: Yes, they seem to have been involved in all the banking corruption. It was a secret and illegal order in Italy that was part of the Masons, and they were excommunicated by the Pope. So, this group existed in secret.

M: Yes.

S: But, secret though it was to the public, it turned out that all the chief politicians and police people were in it, and members of the Mafia, and all kinds of strange things went on with them and the Vatican Bank. I don't want to waste time on all this, but, for example, the Vatican, of course, has a very longstanding and strong stance against the use of contraceptives; and yet the Vatican Bank was the largest shareholder in Italy's biggest condom business.

M: Yes, [chuckling] I read that.

S: That was, at least, not illegal, but there were all kinds of just plain scams where billions of dollars disappeared, billions! And no one knows where this money went.

M: Yes. It sounds like the background for a good book.

S: Well, there was a very good book about all of this called In God's Name.

M: Yes, yes. I know about that. Diane has that.

S: This is interesting, but a diversion…

M: …from what we're doing. Well, anyway, the Pope died. 'Krishnaji and I went to London. Mary and Joe met us. Krishnaji and I lunched with Mary at Fortnum's. Krishnaji went to Huntsman afterward. I dropped by Paul Anstee's shop and then I joined Krishnaji and we came home.'

September thirtieth. 'A cold day. Krishnaji dictated letters all morning and I typed all day except during a meeting that Krishnaji called with Dorothy, Shakuntala, Ingrid, Harsh, Scott, and Stephen Smith. All students arrive for the start of term tomorrow.' Have you anything to comment on that?

S: No. I can't remember it at all.

M: October first. 'The school term began at Brockwood. Krishnaji talked to the school very movingly at 11:30 a.m. I did letters and packed. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked in the afternoon.'

For October second, the big diary recommences. 'At 11 a.m., Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to Heathrow. We stopped for a picnic lunch at our usual side road. A car was parked there, so we went further up the lane and turned into a quiet field where a magpie hopped and hunted. Krishnaji found it too early for lunch, but Dorothy and I took it as it came. Dorothy is feeling pleased with the shape of the school on the second day of the term. Relations seem straightened out and good. At Heathrow we waited for our flight. I read in the Herald Tribune'—oh, that somebody died that I used to know.

S: Who?

M: You didn't know him.

S: [laughs] Is there no significance…?

M: He was the first man I ever fell in love with.

S: Oh. [Laughter.]

M: And no comment from there on. Anyway, he died, and etcetera, which I'm not going into. [S chuckles.] 'I read it without surprise or reaction. Early times and people in my life without any threads today. The past has long been gone. At 2:30 p.m., Krishnaji and I took off for Paris and Roissy airport. Jean-Michel met us and we drove around Paris and south to the Marogers' place in Montrichard near Blois. Krishnaji sang one of his Sanskrit chants as we sped across the flat plains of France. The wind sound gave him semi-privacy and so he sang, feeling at ease. A sparrow hawk fluttered over a field and there were contrails of a very high-flying aircraft, pleasing as always to Krishnaji. "Maria," he touched my shoulder and pointed.'

S: Pointing to the contrails?

M: Yes. 'It was dark as we arrived at the house. For centuries it was part of an abbey and the walls are thick. There is an ancient silence in them. Marie-Bertrande and Diane and Jean-Michel's mother were waiting. Krishnaji has a large room, an apartment on the ground floor, and I am next to it. We ate at the table, fruit and vegetables from their garden, brown bread, and cheese. Krishnaji stuck to the tofu that I brought from Brockwood, wrapped in wet paper foil. It leaked in my handbag but seemed alright. To bed quite soon, both of us tired, but not too.'

Krishnaji with the Marogers (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

October third. 'Krishnaji slept very well, unusual in a new place. It is utterly quiet, and his room is apart from the rest of the house. The Marogers have thought of everything for his ease and comfort. Krishnaji brought his tracksuit with him so he can be warm while he exercises. And bouillottes…' Do you remember bouillottes? Bouillotte is the French word for hot water bottle. 'Bouillottes were provided to warm each bed. Autumn is here. There is early snow in the Pyrenees, and any night there will be frost here. Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number ten for January fifteenth distribution. It went well. He was filled with it, and wants to keep doing it. He walked around with Jean-Michel a little before lunch, rested only a short time afterward, and put his hands on Diane. She seems better, stronger, sits at the table, following all that is said, and smiles beamingly and shyly at Krishnaji. Krishnaji walked later with Jean-Michel, Marie-Bertrande, Madame Maroger, and me through the woods; Ikra, the nice German shepherd, coming enthusiastically with us. There were allées in the woods.' You know, the French have these rather formal woods…

S: Yes.

M: …with what they call allées.

S: They're like fire breaks in American forests.

M: Yes. But they're rather formal, making a French formality in a forest. 'There were allées in the French style. The open land is very flat and wide. Farms are being abandoned. Old farm buildings, beautiful in stone with rough plaster, are more expensive to repair than replace. So they're replaced with prefabricated bungalows. Corruption of the French countryside slowly is happening. The Marogers, who started farming here with much enthusiasm, cannot get more than one paid helper and are overwhelmed by the amount that needs to be done, and it is never caught up with. Krishnaji ate at the table, promising to go back to his normal regime of supper by himself tomorrow. We watched the news on TV at 8 p.m., and he turned out his light at 9:15 p.m. I read nonsense, The Holcroft Covenant, a thriller, until 10:15 p.m.' [Laughs]. 'Then, sleep. There is something about being here, in the middle of France, remote and quiet.'

October fourth. 'Krishnaji slept nine hours, feels well and entirely relaxed, away from the pressures at Brockwood, India, and Ojai. "How can we come back here?" he asked. There should be no difficulties. The Marogers are warmly welcoming, appreciating fully his presence, and wanting it to be a relaxed, quiet time for him. After breakfast, he dictated Letters to the Schools number eleven, which I won't send until February first. It was on corruption of the mind, and making an image away from the fact. "We work well together," he said at the completion of the letter. His head began toward the end.' You know, his headache began.

S: Yes.

M: 'In the afternoon, he put hands on Diane. Then, Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrande drove Krishnaji and me to Amboise, where Jean-Michel lived as a boy during the war years. We visited the pagoda built by the duc de Choiseul, and walked in the woods along the Loire for a bit, and came back via Montrichard and Pontlevoy. Krishnaji had supper on a tray in front of the TV in his little sitting room. We watched the 8 o'clock news, including the funeral in Saint Peter's Square of John Paul, rather a reprise of the previous Pope's funeral in August. And so to bed. For me, reading.'

The next day. 'It was a gray, cold morning. Krishnaji dictated the twelfth Letters to the Schools, mostly on energy, limitless energy, and our using energy in the psychological realm in service of the me. Jean-Michel and his brother Alain and his wife Claude, who live with their daughters, Anne and Natalie, were at lunch. They live in the other half of the house.' It's a funny house, which was part of an old abbey; and they split it in half, each family having a half. 'Later, Krishnaji, Jean-Michel, Marie-Bertrande, Alain, and mother and I walked in the Forêt de Chaumont; and we brought the German shepherd dog, Ikra, along. Krishnaji treated Diane.'

October sixth. 'It was a lovely, clear, and warmer morning. In the morning, Krishnaji dictated Letter to the Schools number thirteen on habit and tradition. "One can do the same thing at the same hour every day without it becoming a habit when there is an awareness of what is being done." He spoke of the vain repetition of ritual as utterly meaningless. I asked about his Sanskrit chanting. He said, "I chant for the noise of it." Krishnaji talked to Marie-Bertrande alone before lunch and later treated Diane. Lunch was out on the terrace under a parasol in a warm, indolent sun, precious and rare for October sixth. We had delicious, fresh flageolet beans and courgettes from the garden. At 3 p.m., we went to Chambord.' Krishnaji didn't like going into chateaus, you know, sightseeing. He wouldn't go into Amboise when we went there. 'Marie-Bertrand, I, and Ikra were in one car, and Jean-Michel and Madame Maroger in the other with Krishnaji. I went in to see the famous staircase and was surprised to see Krishnaji coming in with Jean-Michel. He was curious to see the staircase, too. He examined the chateau carefully, and thought the top too ornate. Marie-Bertrande and Madame Maroger went to Blois to fetch Diane from school. Jean-Michel, Krishnaji, and I walked with Ikra in the woods and then drove back along the Loire River. The light was beautiful. It flows across the landscape and through memories of French paintings, as Tuscany evokes Florentine paintings of the Renaissance. Krishnaji treated Diane when we got back.'

The seventh. 'Another gentle, sunny day. Ariane Maroger, the oldest daughter, arrived last night. She is studying at the Louvre. Krishnaji dictated the fourteenth Letters to the Schools, mostly on thought, a very fine one. Lunch was again on the terrace, and later we walked around the place and in the woods. Krishnaji, of course, treated Diane; she is walking a little by herself.'

The eighth. 'Another warm, lovely day. I did my exercise and washing, shoe cleaning, etcetera, a little earlier, and was quicker with breakfast. Tina, the Portuguese maid, is off on Sundays; today. Krishnaji dictated the fifteenth Letters to the Schools, mostly on wholeness of the mind, thought, desire, etcetera. Lunch was again on the terrace. I got punctuation up-to-date on all Letters to the Schools done here'—I was correcting my writing—'so perhaps I can dictate them on my return to Brockwood[2]. After lunch, we sat talking till almost 4 p.m., with questions to Krishnaji on what he meant by insight. It came across as a perception uninfluenced by thought, conditioning, or memory—an instantaneous seeing of the whole of something.' That's not in quotes—I'm just reporting. 'Everyone afterward walked about three kilometers along the road.'

October ninth. 'The weather is still warm, but it is beginning to change. Jean-Michel went to Nantes. Krishnaji took the day off from the letters and rested in all morning while I did regular letters. Krishnaji got up for lunch, which again is outside. I went with Marie-Bertrande to the open-air marché in Montrichard, then to Blois to fetch Diane and post letters.'

The next day. 'In the morning, Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number sixteen. The afternoon walk was through vineyards south of Pontlevoy. The sky and light were beautiful. A Greek or Romanian man, who has to do with Jean-Michel's shipping business, came for dinner.'

October eleventh. 'Krishnaji dictated the seventeenth Letters to the Schools. All the Marogers were at lunch, including Alain and Claude and their daughters Anne and Natalie. Krishnaji sat on the lawn till 4 o'clock talking, urged on by Jean-Michel's questions of the early days, Theosophy, theosophical notions, a little about the "process," etcetera. It seemed to amuse him. He reminded me of the photos taken many years ago when he sat in a field. He looked so young, talking with ease, entertaining his audience, fascinating them, telling it all lightly with humor, never indicating whether he believed it or not. He then "treated" Diane. And at 5 p.m., he, Jean-Michel, Marie-Bertrande, Alain Maroger, the mother, and I drove to a wood where we saw boars being raised, and walked a long road through the forest, with heather and the smell of autumn leaves. It was so beautiful, it was the breath of this season filling the senses. When we came back, Jean-Michel showed Krishnaji films he made at Brockwood, Saanen, and…Greece'…?

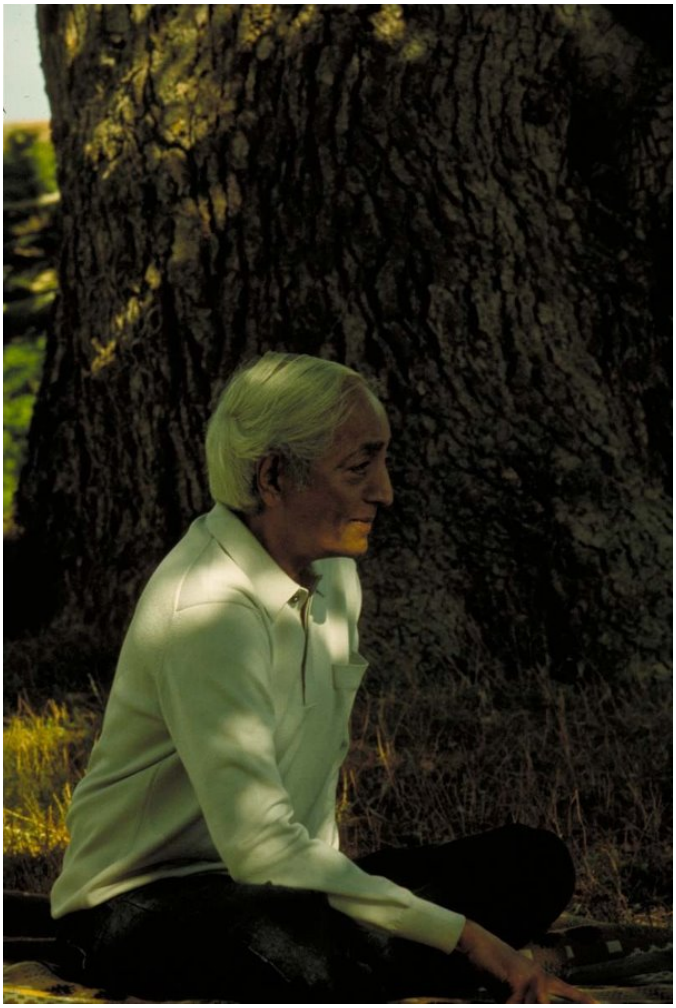
S: He was half-Greek.

M: I know but…oh, that's his own films and nothing to do with Krishnaji. I see, that's why. Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrande were both, oddly enough, half-Greek.

S: Ah, ha. I didn't know that.



Krishnaji with the Marogers (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: October twelfth. 'Krishnaji and I left La Mahaudière[3] at 10:20 a.m. with Jean-Michel and his mother. We drove to Le Roissy, had picnic sandwiches in the car, and Krishnaji and I went off into the reaches of that pretentious airport. While waiting for our BE flight, a young Englishman and girl recognized Krishnaji, and came enthusiastically to greet him. They had been to the Brockwood talks; he was named Dick Temple and was a dealer in religious art, her name was Melissa Morant. There was an interminable queue at passport control at Heathrow, but it was quick with the luggage. Dorothy met us and gave us all the Brockwood news on the way back. One teacher, Daniel, has already left. The Hammick boy'—oh, yes, Mr. Hammick's nephew. Mr. Hammick was one of the upper people in Huntsman.

S: Yes, I remember him. Yes.

M: And he had a nephew…

S: Yes, who came briefly to Brockwood.

Krishnaji talking on lawn (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: …who came to this school. It says. 'Hammick, nephew of the Huntsman tailor, felt Brockwood wasn't the right school for him, and he left.'

S: Yes, it didn't work out. I remember.

M: 'We reached Brockwood by 6 p.m. Lou Blau telephoned with a new offer from a buyer for Malibu. I agreed to what Lou outlined.'

The next day was 'unpacking, laundry, mail, etc. We walked across the fields with Dorothy. There was a staff meeting at 5 p.m. There was a letter from my stepfather that my cousin is now home from the hospital and that he, Wooge, had gone to stay with his son and daughter-in-law.'

On the fourteenth, 'Krishnaji dictated the eighteenth Letters to the Schools.' And all it says for the next day is that he spoke to the school.

October sixteenth. 'Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number nineteen. I read and punctuated earlier ones to Sheila, who will type them.' Who's Sheila?

S: She was someone who was your secretary. She would come in and do some letters for you.

M: For me?

S: Yes. You would dictate some things, and she would type them up. She was from the village. I don't think she did it for very long.

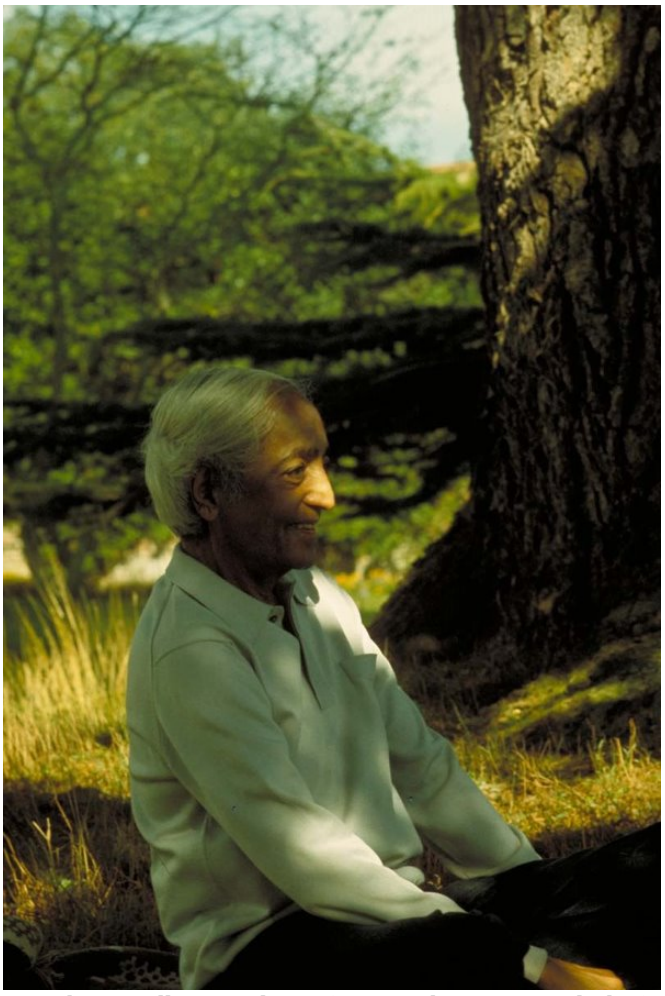
M: Yes, I remember her. 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked in the rain in the afternoon. Then there was a school meeting. On the evening news, there was the announcement that on the eighth ballot the cardinals chose a new Pope, Cardinal Wojtyla of Poland, who has taken the name of John Paul II. We saw him greet the enormous crowd outside Saint Peter's in excellent Italian. "I'm bored with the Pope," said Krishnaji.' [Both chuckle.]

The next day, 'Krishnaji talked to students. I went to Alresford and Winchester on errands. There was a walk in the afternoon, and I talked to Ginny Travers.'

October eighteenth. 'It was a cold, clear morning. We took the 10:23 a.m. train from Petersfield to London. Joe and Mary met us at Waterloo, dropped Krishnaji at Huntsman, and me at the Morgan Guarantee bank. I checked our seats on Air India, and got some writing paper at Smythson.'

S: Where were they located?

M: Bond Street, in the middle of Bond Street. It's all that blue kind of paper I use, you know. It's where these little daily diaries came from.



S: Where is it on…?

M: It's on the east side of Bond Street further up toward, I don't know…further up.

S: Past the camera place?

M: It's near the camera place, across the street. 'I bought some writing paper at Smythson and joined Krishnaji at Huntsman. In the Burlington Arcade he bought a case for his pens and then we went on to Fortnum's, where Mary lunched with us. I gave her the first six Letters to the Schools. At 2:15 p.m., Joe drove Krishnaji and me to Mr. Thompson. There was much laughter on the way at excerpts I read out from The Joys of Yiddish.' That was a very funny book that Joe gave us. 'It was written by a man called Leo Rosten. Krishnaji learned the meaning of "schmuck" and "nebbish." Krishnaji's teeth were checked and were found in working order. Thompson says he must use a Waterpik. He X-rayed the lower right molars for me where I had a slight ache, but nothing was amiss. Joe again took us to Waterloo where we had the time to buy three detective paperbacks and catch the 3:50 p.m. train to Petersfield.'

Krishnaji talking on lawn (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

October nineteenth. 'Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number twenty. "We work well," he said. He spent the remainder of the day in bed resting. At 5 p.m. I drove Frances McCann, Eleanor Hawksley, Karen Bowman, and Scott Forbes to Alresford Surgery for shots for India. I had my second cholera, typhoid, and typhoid-paratyphoid shots. Bud telephoned from New York. He and Lisa are flying to London for the weekend. I will lunch with them Sunday.'

The next day,'Krishnaji dictated the twenty-first Letters to the Schools. He wants to finish a year of them, which would be twenty-four[4], while we are here. Then, he wants to go on with a different set, dialogues, he says. "I can dig this way."' Dig into things, you know.

S: Yes, I understand.

M: Yes. '"I can dig this way." It appears he has found a way to challenge himself that he had thought he could get in the challenge of discussion with others. But there is no one with whom he has a challenging discussion. So he will challenge himself. I did correspondence with Sheila in the afternoon. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a meeting with the staff. Doris went on about everyone having opinions and how do we find intelligence. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked up and down the driveway twice for exercise. Then, there was a regular staff meeting after dinner.'

The twenty-first. 'Krishnaji dictated the twenty-second Letters to the Schools. He is eager to finish the twenty-fourth and start a new batch. His mind seems ablaze, and in the afternoon, when we went for our walk, he did a preliminary run, not walk, to the gate and back while Dorothy and I waited. Only then did we walk through the grove and across both fields. The autumn landscape is so beautiful; the crop of blackberries has a perfume. The heavy summer rains followed by long ripening days of sun have made them delicious. I spoke to my brother. He and Lisa came on Laker Airlines. They're staying at Claridge's.' [S laughs.] Why are you laughing?

S: Well, it's just funny, Freddy Laker's Airline, which I have traveled on several times, was the most cut-rate, bargain-basement, no-frills airline…

M: Yes. My brother always picks those kind of airlines…

S: And then he goes to stay at Claridge's. [Hearty laughter.]

M: That's standard with him; he's still doing it. I don't know if he's going to Claridge's because, well, he doesn't go to London much anymore.

S: Yes. Does he still fly the bargain-basement…?

M: Yes, and he has some new thing that's even cheaper than all that. [S laughs.] They go via Greenland or something, and I don't know where.

October twenty-second. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school and a mass of guests, but I took the 10:20 a.m. train to London, and joined Bud and Lisa at Claridge's. Their room was just beyond the one that Sam and I had the first year that we stayed there. Sam'—my husband—'made a movie at the studio MGM had just outside London.'

S: Was that Beau Brummell?

M: Beau Brummell? I can't remember now.

S: Quo Vadis?

M: No, not Quo Vadis. Anyway, he made it there; and so, they put us up at Claridge's. It was very splendid—we had a sitting room and a bedroom. 'London on a Sunday and Claridge's was quiet, relaxed, leisurely, and in its original dignity. It is order, not luxury, and that is attractive. Bud and Lisa lunched with me in the small Causerie dining room there.' It's a little side dining room, not the big one. 'We talked at length. Then, we went to the Victoria and Albert Museum, where Lisa had to see an exhibition that will be at the Cooper-Hewitt in January: drawings of the exteriors and interiors of castles, furniture, etcetera, for King Ludwig of Bavaria.' You know, those Bavarian, weird castles. 'We were able to capture a taxi, and I dropped them at the Royal Academy and went on to Waterloo and the 3:50 p.m. train back to Petersfield. They go to Paris in the afternoon for a week.'

October twenty-third. 'Krishnaji did the twenty-third Letters to the Schools, and changed the format to a dialogue between himself and a questioner, he doing the questions too at first, and then having me do the questions.'

S: So, he started off doing the question, then he wanted you to ask him the questions.

M: Yes. 'He seemed pleased by the way it went. He wants to do more this way. I dictated correspondence to Sheila in the afternoon, and got through the awful backlog, some of which I brought with me from California. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked on this marvelous afternoon. It was not cold, but had golden sunlight. There was a school meeting at 5 p.m. In the evening, Krishnaji and I watched sheep dog trials on TV and then a Panorama program on weapons in space. "Man has gone mad," said Krishnaji.'

The twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji said he had had a "marvelous night, an extraordinary meditation," he said, and said he had it less when he is talking, i.e., during the public meetings and seminars, etcetera. Now, it is beginning again. After breakfast, in the kitchen, he said, "It must have been extraordinary. I feel like going away and disappearing. I shouldn't talk about it. It isn't put in words." Then, "Someday I shall." Krishnaji talked to the students alone. Lou Blau rang in the evening, and said there was a fire in Malibu but the house is safe. It broke out in Kanan Canyon. Also, there was one in Mandeville Canyon but not near Sunset. Lou is sending papers for me to sign on the sale of the house, as they must be notarized before I go to India.'

October twenty-fifth. 'I took the 9:20 a.m. train to London, and did errands at Harrods, photocopying, etcetera. Then, Fleur lunched with me at Claridge's. She seems puffier, but otherwise, alright.' She's not well. 'She enjoys their place in Spain; it's quiet, and they never have to leave their own place. I had my hair cut by Mary Links's man, and caught the 4:20 p.m. train back. Just as I arrived at Brockwood, my cousin Lorna telephoned from the Vineyard. She had my letter and is home, much better; sounded alright. I telephoned Amanda; the fire came within three miles of their place. Barbara Poe's house in Mandeville is alright and Betsy's house is, too. Amanda said that Phil was working with Lori'—that was our shared gardener—'on leaves in the garden. I felt almost there. I spoke to Elfriede.'

S: Alright. Well, then, I think we need to end it there because we're not going to have enough tape for another full day.

M: Oh.

S: So, we'll begin next time with October twenty-sixth.

M: October twenty-sixth, I will mark that right now.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] That was one of the outlying cottages Brockwood had then.

[2] Mary seems to have taken down Krishnaji's dictation in her own version of shorthand, and then re-dictated them to her secretary at Brockwood to be typed.

[3] The name of the house.

[4] The letters were to be sent to the schools every other week.

Issue 55: October 26, 1978 to November 24, 1978

In this issue we see the first time that Mary has returned to India since her initial visit there in 1965. Everyone there has come to realize her importance to Krishnaji's work, and she is treated very differently than she was twelve years before, but the visit is still not without its challenges, as well as its charms. The discussion from which the transcripts were made for this issue took place in 2005—twenty-five years after the visit. Yes, Mary had made, at the time of the visit, detailed diary entries that are an aide mémoire for her; but it is interesting how very vivid the memories of that trip are for both of us.

Mary: We begin today on Thursday, the twenty-sixth of October, 1978. 'Krishnaji and I took the 11:23 a.m. train to London. Joe Links met us and dropped us on Jermyn Street. We lunched pleasantly with Mary at Fortnum's. It was congenial as always. I will miss our being together. We parted at Hatchards where Krishnaji bought some detectives and I bought my friend Christopher Fry's memories of his family called Can You Find Me. Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt, and I walked to Hill Street where I received, at the office of a friend of Lou Blau, the legal papers for the house sale sent to me by Lou Blau air freight on Tuesday. Some need notarization. As I was near the U.S. consulate, and didn't want to come into London tomorrow, I ran over to get it done, and hastened back on foot to Truefitt. I saw Krishnaji standing in the doorway. As I crossed Bond Street, a taxi with a light on appeared, so we grabbed it and went off to Waterloo just in time to jump on the 4:20 p.m.'

Scott: [chuckles] We should say that when a taxi's light is on, that means it's free to pick up passengers.

M: It's yours if you're nimble.

October twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number 24, a complete year. In the afternoon, I posted legal papers to Lou Blau. The Marogers with Diane arrived for a few days with a niece of Jean-Michel, Pauline de Grémont. They're here for a few days, and I put them all in the West Wing. Krishnaji spoke to the staff, which I missed.'

The next day, my diary just says: 'Packing. Desk. Walk. Krishnaji put his hands on Diane and also on Harsh.'

October twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji spoke to school. I telephoned Erna and did more packing. Walk.'

Monday, the thirtieth. 'I packed and put things in order all day. The Mercedes, which Krishnaji had washed yesterday with Eric, was put away for the winter—the battery was removed and it was covered up. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji, Dorothy, Jean-Michel, and Marie-Bertrande and I walked. The gray, autumn beauty of the land—a last enjoyment. At 5 p.m., Marie-Bertrande drove me to Alresford Surgery, where I had a gamma-globulin shot. I finished packing, doing laundry, and putting things in order. I was up till almost midnight doing last-minute things, but then I managed very little sleep.'

S: I can remember having gamma-globulin shots, but I can't remember what they were for?

M: I guess it was supposed to be protective of something, because we were leaving for India.

S: Yes.

M: October thirty-first. 'We left Brockwood at 6:45 a.m., Krishnaji and I with Dorothy, and Scott driving a second car with luggage and Doris. A few students were up to see Krishnaji off. The loveliness of autumn seemed to line the lanes we passed. We stopped for a picnic breakfast at the usual place near the airport. Esme had made us some delicate small sandwiches of marinated tofu. Our Air India flight scheduled for 9:15 a.m. actually took off a little before 11. We were laden with hand parcels: a seven-pound Cheshire cheese, a sun umbrella, plus my usual load. At the airport, Krishnaji said, "Let's buy some chocolates!" He wanted them as presents for people in India, so we bought some. We had the desired two farthest forward seats on the left side in the first class. But idiotically, Air India divides its smoking and nonsmoking section down the aisle, and we were afflicted with a pipe smoker only a few feet away on the other side of the aisle. We landed in Rome, went into the transit lounge, and there were Vanda, Filomena, Topazia, Mr. Turchi, and a Russian named Alexander Ladizensky, about whom Topazia and Vanda had telephoned earlier. He has been allowed to immigrate to Israel, but can go to the U.S. too, and his one thought is to see Krishnaji. My own one thought was to see Filomena. It made me truly happy to see her. She has had some acupuncture help from Sofia Sanguinetti, and she looks well.'

S: Ah, yes. The former Brockwood staff.

M: Yes. 'I knew Filomena would be there, so I brought her prescriptions of Dolobid, which she asked for after reading an article on them as "super-aspirina" for arthritis. I also brought Brockwood cassettes for Vanda and received pounds of cheese from her and a bag of fresh figs, nuts, raisins, and biscotti from Florence. Topazia, as usual, had something to hammer on about: a meeting of some psychologists who want Krishnaji to attend their conference in Rome next year. Krishnaji thought Vanda "looked old. Must be from all that yoga," he said.' [Both laugh heartily.] Oh dear. [More chuckling.] 'All the talk was tiring. I felt exhilarated by the success in seeing Filomena; she looked very nice in a blue cashmere cardigan I bought her in August, and she was very dear. So we flew on through the night over Turkey, Afghanistan, and Pakistan. No sleep at all for me, and very little for Krishnaji.'

The first of November. 'We landed in Delhi about 4 a.m. Sunanda and Pama met us with a car at the aircraft itself, and drove us to a VIP lounge where Krishnaji, Sunanda, and I sat while Pama and Mr. Mourli'—Mr. Mourli was a nice man who lived in Delhi, was friendly to Krishnaji, and always helpful–'took our passports through immigration and fetched the luggage. The latter took quite a while as one bag didn't turn up for about an hour. We then went upstairs to a transit passengers' hotel where they had a room and bath for each of us to rest in until the Benares flight. Krishnaji wanted to change to Indian clothes, which they had brought.' The Indians always felt he must wear his Indian clothes the minute he gets to India, and he rather liked his Indian clothes.

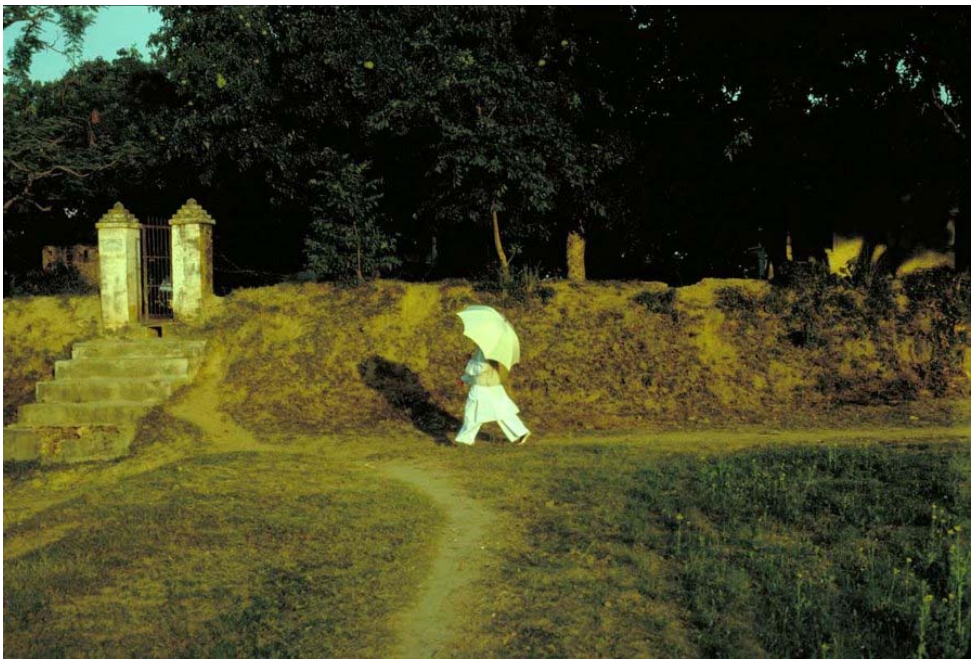
S: Yes, yes. [M chuckles.] And he looked incredibly elegant in them, too.

M: That he did. 'And I was glad to shower and change into fresh clothes, and lie down a little. The room was like a prison, but Sunanda had brought their own linen for the bed, and in spite of no sleep, it was refreshing.' It was very thoughtful.

S: Yes, that was.

M: 'They also brought a picnic breakfast. And then we went to the flight. Frances McCann, who left Brockwood Sunday with Chris Jones'—who's Chris Jones?

S: He was an American student. He and his brother Ken were students at Brockwood.



M: …'were on the same flight. I dozed as we made bumpy landings at Agra and Kahjuraho. Then, Varanasi'—that's another name for Benares. 'A hot, moist breath of tropical air invaded the plane as the door opened. Pupul, Ahalya, Radha Burnier, and Upasini were there to meet Krishnaji. He and I drove to Rajghat with Pupul and Upasini. It was then that I felt in India again. Before the eye saw, one knew it: the curious, intricate smell of India. Of what? Dust, spice, wood smoke, smoke from cow dung fires, incense, the tinge of oil in the air—complex as Indian cooking, it would tell me I was in India if I were blind. The land is very green from the recent floods, the air much moister and warm, the children, wandering cows and buffaloes, dark faces, brilliant colors, potholes everywhere. Almost all faces turning to watch the car pass. The eternal presence of poverty. Life lived here against odds that would probably destroy me. So we came to India and Rajghat. The school is on holiday; it's Diwali. It began yesterday, but there was nevertheless a crowd to greet Krishnaji. A young, shy girl gave me two bunches of tightly tied flowers. Ahalya, intent on making up to me for my lodgings here in 1965'… [M and S both chuckle]. That's another story!

S: Yes, we remember that one.

M: Yes…'had prepared two rooms for me to choose between, both in Krishnaji's house. I took one just under his, which I realized only later is normally Ahalya's own room. The usual high ceiling, plaster-walled room, cement floor with fresh-smelling matting, a bed with mosquito netting, dressing table, writing table, and a metal cupboard with a lock. The bathroom has a geyser[1]. So, I can heat my own water and fill the bucket, which is a great luxury here. There is also a low stool to sit on while soaping and pouring water over oneself, which then flows across the floor into a drain.' [Both chuckle.] I remember it well. I learned, in India, to do everything with one bucket of hot water, which meant not only bathing, but doing my laundry, too.

S: Yes.

Krishnaji walking in Rajghat (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: When I first went to India, I got only one bucket every morning, so I had to use it judiciously.

S: [laughter] I know. And I can remember one year I went to Rajghat and they had just installed a new electric geyser in my bathroom. But they hadn't grounded it. [M laughs.] Which meant I got a terrible shock trying to turn it on or turn it off.

M: What did it do when not grounded?

S: Well, that means that you get the electric current going through you. You know…

M: Oh!

S: Yes. So, I just got a terrible shock.

M: Do you mean a physical shock?

S: Yes, a terrible physical electric shock, it's just really…

M: Well, that's awful.

S: Yes, it was really lethal.

M: It's dangerous.

S: It was very dangerous. And I had to…

M: What'd you do?

S: Well, I told someone responsible, of course, but nothing happened about it, this being India, so I would turn it off and on with a stick. [M laughs.] I had to stand out of the room and reach around the corner and turn it on or off with a stick. Because, otherwise, if you were standing in the room and the floor was wet…

M: Yes, you'd be electrocuted.

S: Well, you know, it really was a very severe shock. So this is how I operated from then on.

M: Did you ever get it fixed? No?

S: I can't remember that. But I can remember thinking that this is so India. They've gone to all this expense of buying this thing, the trouble of installing it, but they didn't do it right. So, it actually was worse [hearty laugh] than the old previous arrangement, because it was dangerous.

M: Well, now, this is one of those things that, if all our voices percolate to India, do we censor this or not?

S: You know, this is the kind of thing that they know about, and Krishnaji was always hammering away at them about.

M: Well, they know about it, but for us to be giggling about it may offend.

S: [big laugh] By the time anyone hears or reads this, all the people responsible will be dead, so it won't matter.

M: Also, I hope that it somehow comes across that our criticisms or comments are about places for which we have great affection.

S: Yes, yes. They are.

M: 'Pupul is in her cottage, not far away. The others are in various guest cottages. Parameshwaran (who cooks for Krishnaji everywhere in India) is here. Before going to bed at night, I gave him the recipe and nagari for making the tofu. We had a late lunch. Krishnaji slept, but I unpacked and by suppertime was falling asleep at the table. I hadn't had more than three to four hours sleep since Sunday night.' This was on Wednesday. 'They say the river rose to almost the rim of the cliff here in the September floods, but now the Ganges is quiet, sleeping mildly, returned to its ancient ways.'

S: Wow. The cliffs are very high.

M: That's a lot of water.

November second. 'It was a quiet day. I helped Parameshwaran with his first making of tofu. Dr. Parchure brought his wife to meet me, a charming, shy, nice woman. I also met the young woman principal of Vasanta College, Ms. Schuetaschgal?' That doesn't sound right. I don't think that's correct.

S: Now, just to say, Vasanta College…

M: That's the women's college.

S: It was the women's college that was founded by Annie Besant. It was first called the Women's Hindu College, or something like that.

M: Yes. 'Our meals are cooked and served by Parameshwaran in the upstairs dining room on Krishnaji's floor. We have salads and all manner of very good food, immaculately cleaned. He is, of course, a Brahmin. In the late afternoon, Krishnaji, Ahalya, Upasini, and I walked around the new filled-in ravine; then down to the playing field where Krishnaji did five laps around it. I came back after three and bathed. It is very hot. Dr. Parchure gave me a foot massage. Both feet are swollen from the long flight and the heat.'

The third of November. 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a small group discussion on the self. Present were Pupul, Sunanda, Pama, Ahalya, Achyut, Radha B., Narayan just arrived, Parchure, Upasini, and Rajesh Dalal—a nice, bright, young man—Krishnakutti, Frances McCann, Mrs. Parchure, a few teachers, and Mr. and Mrs. Deshpande.' Do you remember that name?

S: Ah, yes.

M: 'He couldn't see the relevance of discussing the self.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji had at him. But it only silenced him. Krishnaji asked what we had all done with the gift of something true.' [Both chuckle.]

The fourth of November. 'Krishnaji rested today. Today is the twenty-year anniversary of my husband's death. How extraordinary life has been. I cannot judge it or assess it from the outside. It is as if it were not mine to speak of it. It has happened, and not of my planning. I went out early and stood watching the sunrise on the river, the slow, silent casting of nets from the fishing boats. There is something curiously still here, inside. My mind seems to be silent, without much movement, listening, and it isn't somehow mine. The possessor is absent, or has it merely stepped away? Krishnaji rested in the morning but was at the lunch table. Achyut and he have been discussing religious centers, apart from the schools, perhaps in the cities where books, tapes, etcetera would be available, and where people who are serious could be found to come to other small centers for a sort of retreat. Krishnaji wants to go into this. At 4 p.m., Dr. Parchure came and walked with me to his house where his wife gave me tea. After tea, Dr. Parchure left us alone to talk. She seems so nice, shy, and unsure of her ability in English, but she's actually quite proficient. I'm inclined to talk more than I want to, to help over the bumps, and was touched by her wanting to talk to me. She walked back with me. Krishnaji had been for a walk.'

November fifth, 'There was another small group discussion at 9:30 a.m. with the same cast as last Friday. Krishnaji used the analogy, "You have been given a baby. What have you done with it? Have you cared for it? Is it the most important thing in your life?" Pupul spoke of "clouding over"; one has clarity, then it clouds over. Krishnaji in effect said, "You let this cloud over because you are not serious. You have not accepted the baby's responsibility. You have not given it your being, your total energy. This is not the whole of your life." It hit hard at most of them. He spoke with great force. At lunch, he lingered at the table until 3 o'clock discussing whether Nagarjuna and Shankara'—these are great teachers in Buddhist and Hindu traditions—whether they 'had the insight of the Buddha, or whether intellect brought saints to see the limitations and the futility of intellect, until out of that and an ensuing search, there came an insight. Krishnaji felt that a Buddha and possibly Nagarjuna, "They were not intellectuals though they had great intellect." He felt that they had insight born of compassion. Then, from that, came intelligence.'

I'm glad this is written because in the dialogues I now go to, people have thought and they can never get out of it.

S: Yes.

M: And I can't ever seem to…I talk about it, but it doesn't seem to have any effect. What is insight and then intelligence. You know, Krishnaji used to say to us, when you see the limitations of what you're doing, an insight can come into that. And he used to say that thought can see its own limitations, and by seeing its own limitations…

S: …it is changed.

M: …insight comes in like a light.

S: Yes, yes, and it produces a change.

M: Exactly. This just doesn't convey when I talk about it.

S: I don't know if it conveys to anybody who hasn't experienced it.

M: But in a way, not in a profound religious sense, insights are…

S: Yes, we have little insights.

M: Yes. I'm sure everybody has had some little insight. Some of them are just—you know that sensation, suddenly seeing something quite differently. Yes. 'He was doubtful about Shankara. Radha Burnier, Achyut, Sunanda, and Pupul were at the table. Radha said that too little is clear about Shankara.' They're all very good on the history of these things, this group.

S: Yes.

M: 'As all the subsequent Shankara Charyas wrote'—you know, the people who followed him—'it is hard to be sure what is the writing of the original one. These lunches are too tiring. My leg aches sitting there so long, and Krishnaji, though he enjoys talking about it all, is tired by it. In the afternoon, Nandini and her older sister Amru arrived from Bombay. Nandini looks quite a bit older, but her manner is always gentle, friendly, and graceful. Krishnaji was rather hoarse on the walk. He did only two laps, said he was tired, came back, and started to talk to Nandini, but gave it up. I sent Dr. Parchure to see him, suspecting fever. It was—100-degree. Parchure mobilized things, spent the night in a room nearby, and prepared to fight the fever if it rose.'

The sixth. 'Krishnaji's fever is now sub-normal. He says he slept well. His voice was very hoarse, and he has a sore throat. He was mostly interested in the tailor who was coming to fit a kurta' [S laughs] 'and underclothes. The meeting with Buddhists tomorrow has been postponed. He stayed in bed all day, and in the evening his fever went down to 99.8. I walked around the campus with Ahalya, Nandini, Amru, and Mrs. Padma Santhanam.' Oh, I don't think she's appeared yet. Padma Santhanam comes from Madras. 'Elections are going on, and the county is fascinated by whether Mrs. Gandhi will win the election to Parliament. If she does, she will apparently become the leader of the opposition.'

November seventh. 'I tried on a kurta and a copy of my Courrèges trousers by the tailor, then went to Benares with Ahalya, Sunanda, Parchure, Narayan, and Upasini, where I bought some cotton for more kurtas. Benares is a nightmare of people, dust, dirt, crowding, noise, a torrent of life that would be my destruction if I were ever dropped into it. It is like the edge of a volcano, watching beings who are in it—surviving barely. A ghastly carnival celebrating nothing.' Have you been to Benares?

S: Oh, yes.

M: 'The clouds of dust and refuse, every vehicle has a horn screaming at every other vehicle, carts with porters, carts with shrill deafening music advertising movies, wandering about the streets pulled by tiny horses or a human being, donkeys carrying rubble herded by thin little boys, bicycles, streams of people. It is an ordeal just to drive through the streets. We stopped at the Theosophical Headquarters building in Benares to pick up Radha Burnier. It is called Shanti Kunj, and it is where Krishnaji and Mrs. Besant used to live. The garden there, in its age, had a luxuriance and quiet, astounding after the terrible streets. Radha, calm and clean, in a white sari, didn't mind as the dust poured in the car coming back. I had to wash eyes, nose, throat, and everything once we got back.

Krishnaji had slept all morning, no fever. He approved the three cottons I bought for kurtas. Mrs. Gandhi had won the election for a seat in Parliament.' [Chuckles.]

The eighth. 'Krishnaji is much better. He rested in bed except for attending a trustee meeting of the KF India, to which I was invited. I explained the state of finances in Ojai, and also the point of view of the U.S. and English Foundations that Krishnaji and his teachings are one, and our responsibility is to that. In the afternoon, I drove with Pupul, Nandini, Amru, and Sunanda to tea at the Agricultural College. A German girl who tried to force her way into Tannegg last summer was hanging around the gate. Pama stayed to dissuade her from being here, except at the public talks. We drove through villages of rubble, dust, swarms of people, and wandering animals, past camels slowly pulling their large flat feet down the dirty roads. Then, suddenly, there were fields of green with only an occasional buffalo, and the beauty of the land was a wave. We were on the road the Buddha once walked to Sarnath, and I thought how beautiful India must have been then, with very few people and the land in its pristine freshness. I walked back in the twilight in a pair of what Krishnaji calls "sand shoes," sneakers in my childhood.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji had supper on his veranda.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji is well. At 9:30 a.m., he held a discussion with all the students in the Assembly Hall. It was preceded by the children chanting as Krishnaji sat cross-legged on the small dais facing them. The rising beauty of the chant, and the extraordinary grace and majesty of Krishnaji brought tears—there are times when his presence is that of a god. The children were good at speaking up in spite of their shyness, but their sing-song English and the heavy consonants tripping over each other made Krishnaji use Rajesh as an interpreter.' [Both chuckle.] He couldn't understand their English. [Chuckles.] 'In the afternoon, a motorboat ride up the river past the Ghats was laid on with Nandini, Amru, Padma Santhanam, Frances McCann, Chris Jones, Krishnakutti, Rajesh, Mrs. Drassinower, and a difficult couple, the Levittons. Mrs. Levitton was a victim of polio and has to be carried or wheeled everywhere. She was very affable, and was an instant first-name user to me, though I didn't know hers. Her husband does acupressure and there was something unpleasant and unclean about him.' You see, these are the comments…

S: They're your impressions. We don't call them truth, and we won't send them a copy of this.

M: Alright. But I don't like to hurt…

S: I know…but this is life.

M: There's such a thing as discretion.

S: Not when you're writing history.

M: Hmm. 'The great and sacred river is filthy and brown; the city sewer gushes into it just upstream from where the Rajghat school is, downstream from the city ghats and where the clothes are washed by the dhobis.'

Krishnaji looking at the river Ganga (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: The laundry people.

M: The laundry people, all male…'where the dobhis wash the laundry. Just the bathing, teeth brushing, plunging in that goes on along the ghats makes me feel green.' [Chuckles.] 'Bodies are neatly queued on the burning ghats, waiting their turn, wrapped in bright cloth. Seven fires were going as we passed; the air was heavy with smog from all of it. Buffalos were being scrubbed by their owners, half-submerged in the river. Goats picked at invisible weeds on the cement. We came back in mid-channel. I have no further impulse to visit Benares.' [Chuckles.] I obviously didn't like it. I don't remember disliking it.

S: It's very difficult to like.

M: Yes, but it's interesting.

S: Yes, it is very interesting. [Laughs.]

M: 'A cable came from Evelyne. She arrives from California in Delhi tomorrow, and will be here on Monday.'

S: Ah, yes, Evelyne was coming with Michael Mendizza because he was filming that year.

M: Oh?

S: Yes.

M: November tenth. ‘At 9:30 a.m., an Indian television crew that is doing an hour’s film on Krishnaji and who photographed yesterday’s discussion with the students, filmed in 16mm black and white a question-and-answer session with Krishnaji. The questioners were Achyut, Pupul, and me.’ I was in for international effects. [Chuckles.] ‘The man in charge, a Mr. Leyti, had done his homework and made up the questions. We each were given two to ask. Mine were, “What place has knowledge in man’s search for enlightenment?” and the second one was, “You say conflict arises out of desire and choice; and they structure our lives. Can we be free of these?” In the afternoon, they photographed a similar session between Krishnaji and a few students. This I missed as before lunch Dr. Parchure gave me something for “dust allergy,” which turned out to be an antihistamine that made me sleep as though hit on the head. I came to at about 4 p.m., and walked with Krishnaji, Pama, and Upasini around the perimeter of the place. Krishnaji was tired in the evening, and he didn’t eat much supper.’

The eleventh. ‘At 9 a.m., Krishnaji gave the first Rajghat public talk in the assembly hall. It was filmed in part by the Indian TV crew. It was on disorder. He lunched at the table, but went quickly to rest and got up later only to greet the governor of Bengal. He did exercises in his room only. While at supper upstairs, Nandini, who with Amru had eaten at Vasanta Asharam, came running from downstairs saying that Mr. Levitton was in a temper from being told that he and his wife couldn’t come to Rishi Valley, and he had charged in demanding to see Krishnaji then and there. I went down to speak to him. He was furious. I said the obvious things, that Narayan’s decision was necessary due to the physical limitations of Rishi Valley, etcetera. He argued. I asked him why he couldn’t accept it with grace, which seemed to choke him with rage. He made Namaste’—that’s the Indian greeting with hands together—‘sarcastically and left. Narayan came a little later and said that he had told Levitton that the school would not be able to give aid to his wife’s infirmity while Krishnaji is there, i.e., carrying her around as Mr. Levitton gets Chris Jones to do here.’ He was exploiting Chris Jones—getting him to lug this fairly heavy woman all over the place. ‘Narayan explained that during Krishnaji’s stay, the school is so busy, but they were welcomed to spend a few days later on when some help could be provided. Later, while Narayan was eating dinner, Mr. Levitton came to his table and said, “I hope you don’t get a stroke and have to learn to live in a wheelchair.” Then, “He cursed me,” said Narayan in a matter-of-fact voice.’

November twelfth. ‘Krishnaji gave the second public talk at 9 a.m. The hall was overflowing with all kinds of people, but it seemed a superficial audience, easily inclined to laugh. At times, the questions are in such a heavily accented English that Krishnaji cannot understand them. I sat near the Tibetan Rinpoche, a young man in a dark red robe and yellow shawl. He crossed his legs and seemed not too comfortable, shifting on the hard bench. Krishnaji spoke further on disorder, on the seeing of it, which then brings about order. A man asked about dying, and Krishnaji shot back, “Have you ever tried it?” and reproved the laughter and went on, and spoke of dying to the self. He lunched at the table, rested, then saw some of the Patel family briefly. He talked to Ahalya, Parchure, Rajesh, and Upasini about Rajghat, and later did exercises in his room. I took a nap and walked as it was getting dark with Nandini and Pama. After supper, Pupul, Nandini, and Sunanda reminisced about Krishnaji in the late ’40s: Krishnaji’s gaiety in those days, how Rajagopal came to hear of Krishnaji's strange events at Ootacamund, and Pupul's and Nandini's report of that; how Rajagopal came to hear of Krishnaji's strange events at Ootacamund through grilling the servants, then made Pupul swear never to speak of it; of the nastiness of Rosalind to Krishnaji when she came to India in 1956, her berating him, yelling at him, and of her convincing Krishnaji that the CID[2] was opening his mail, of her speaking ill of Krishnaji to Pupul when Pupul visited Ojai, of the case between Nandini and her husband in which Nandini's charges of cruelty were answered in a brief which quoted pages of Krishnaji's public talks in which he said Indian women were considered chattels and that this, not the husband's behavior, caused her to leave him. The husband won the case and custody of their three children; she could see them only in the summer outside of Bombay, and only with his mother present. Devi'—that's her daughter—'was nine years old when this happened, and she became a little mother to her two brothers. A year later Pupul had to take Nandini to London for a cancer operation and later a removal of a kidney. Pupul spoke of papers she has, notes of meetings between Krishnaji and Jawaharlal Nehru, the Prime Minister of India, and with Indira Gandhi, of marvelous things Krishnaji used to say in discussions, which were not recorded.'

The thirteenth. 'At 9 a.m. in the assembly hall, Krishnaji held a discussion with a Tibetan Rinpoche and three other Buddhist scholars. Achyut translated the Hindi when necessary, helped by Pupul, Radha, Sunanda, and Deshpande. The Rinpoche began with a quiet, almost whispered, question about the observer and the ending of thought. Then another Buddhist held forth in Hindi and it took forty-five minutes before the basis of a question was accepted by all. Krishnaji kept having to ask what actually happens in daily life in relationship, and the Hindi-speaking Buddhists kept going off into theory. More and more, Krishnaji is emphasizing the actual, dismissing the theories, the ideas. This seems the point where people balk. They escape into the idea of something and away from the thing itself. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw the Patel family for what was to be a ten-minute meeting, but which went on one-and-a-quarter hours, sorting out their troubles. Evelyne, Michael Mendizza, and Robert Dunigan, in cowboy boots and hat, who is to do the sound recording, all arrived from Delhi. Evelyne is in the little guest house that Frances McCann relinquished. Evelyne brought pneumonia vaccine from Lailee Bakhtiar'—that's our doctor in Beverly Hills—'and an unclear message from Lou about the buyer not approving the geology report on the Malibu house. I went for a walk in the twilight with Krishnaji. After supper, Evelyne and Michael outlined plans for filming in India to Ahalya, Pupul, Nandini, Achyut, etcetera. It seemed to go down well. It was a noisy night with the village festival, chanting, and dogs barking.'

November fourteenth. 'A day of rest for Krishnaji. Evelyne, Michael, and Dunigan went into Benares. Evelyne came back in time for lunch. Radha and Professor Krishna of Benares Hindu University and his wife were at lunch. He told Krishnaji of the present university condition where threats with knives and guns are made by students to the teaching staff for grades, and when cheating for examines are denied.' I remember that, I was there. They'd come in with a gun and say, "What's my grade?" 'I walked with Krishnaji and Upasini around the playing fields.'

November fifteenth. ‘Krishnaji called me before breakfast. He had a feeling in the night that I was upset about something. I assured him that I wasn’t. At 9:30 a.m., he held a student discussion in the assembly hall. It was way over their heads. One Muslim girl asked, “Sir, what is religion?” Krishnaji replied it was what it is when you know what it is not.’ [Both laugh.] That must’ve baffled her. ‘They had trouble, too, with comparison, and understanding that there cannot be love when there is fear. He had difficulty understanding their questions. It may be not only the heavy Indian accent, but also a bit of deafness on Krishnaji’s part. I spoke to Parchure about it, and he will suggest hearing tests in Madras. There is a certain critical stance toward the school here. “This is all too difficult for you; you are not used to this,” he keeps saying, which of course is true, but it could come across as criticism. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji was filmed by Michael with the littlest children here outside the house, and then at a tree planting. Krishnaji, Upasini, Nandini, and I walked. I came back, bathed, and changed, and went with Krishnaji and others to chanting by Brahmin priests.’ Those were wonderful.

S: Yes.

M: They all chanted very loudly and vociferously, and it sounded wonderful. Hmm, hm.

The next day. ‘Nandini and I visited the art department of the school. Krishnaji saw a sannyasi. In the afternoon, Michael filmed him walking along the path by the houses with the Ganga in the background. Then, Krishnaji, Nandini, and I walked along the perimeter road. A village man came up the cliff from the river, suddenly saw Krishnaji, and prostrated himself, touching his head to Krishnaji’s feet.’ I remember that so well. He came up and he looked at Krishnaji as though he was seeing a god or something…

S: Yes.

M: …and threw himself on the ground at his feet. It was very touching. He was taken totally by surprise. ‘Krishnaji raised him up, greeted him silently, and walked on. A look of wild wonder and emotion was in the little man’s eyes as he watched Krishnaji, as though he had seen God. It wasn’t adulation, nor the see-a-famous-person look; it was wonder and adoration. In the evening, Oopali, a former Rishi Valley student and now professional dancer, gave a recital and we went to part of it.’ I remember that man, little old man, so very well; he’d scrambled up the bank, got up to the level part, and there was…

S: Krishnaji.

M: It was nice, very sweet.

The seventeenth. ‘Krishnaji talked to the teachers. I didn’t go, thinking that the fewer outsiders, the better. Instead, I did letters. In the afternoon, Michael filmed Krishnaji on the other side of the Varuna’—the little river that flows into the Ganga—‘walking on the farmland with his big sun umbrella. When this was done, we walked to the eastern end of the KFI land and came back past the Sanjivan Hospital, where Evelyne and I went in. A

Dr. Sharma, the one and only nurse, and a most hard-working woman, showed us around. It was pitiful to see how much is needed.' It was a very primitive hospital.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: I remember the beds were…there weren't any sheets on them.

S: Yes, just rope beds.

M: Rope with some kind of a plastic mattress. Not what you'd like. 'On our return, Dr. Parchure talked at length to me about it, and about his early life as a country doctor, living with his wife and two-year-old son in a thatched hut with poisonous caterpillars on the walls, crabs the baby reached for scuttling on the floor, and snakes falling from the ceiling.' He has extraordinary tales, and he tells them very well; he tells them straight, but I always wanted to record them because they were…

S: Yes, yes…extraordinary.

M: November eighteenth. 'I went with Achyut, Radha Burnier, Pupul, Nandini, and Evelyne to the Sarnath Museum. Pupul and Nandini then left before lunch for Bombay. In the afternoon, I had Mrs. Krishni to tea'—a very a nice woman—'now retired to Poona from teaching here.' She was a teacher when I'd been there before.

S: Right.

M: 'I remember her tireless kindness in looking after foreign guest meals in 1965. She had the eagerness to talk that is part of her friendliness, and a tendency to run on that seems a part of aging in some women. Krishnaji was visited by the Maharaja of Benares, a short man. I did some packing easily and quickly, as the dhobi brings the clothing so well folded.'

November nineteenth, 'The school was out to see Krishnaji off when we left for the airport at 8:45 a.m. Michael filmed it. Evelyne, in spite of her fever yesterday afternoon, was there, too. Krishnaji, Achyut, and I flew to Calcutta. Friends of Achyut's and admirers of Krishnaji came to the airport with their families—a Mr. Mehta, a large meat-eating Brahmin in a dhoti, and a Mr. Sen, wife, child, etcetera were there. They brought a three-course lunch, which was served to Krishnaji, Achyut, and me in a private apartment in the airport. The wives, daughters, and sisters served it. A stubby, rather rough-looking psychotherapy woman seized the opportunity by the throat to ask Krishnaji intense questions, the answers to which left her face scrunched up in puzzlement.' [Both chuckle.] 'The last one was, "Do you believe in God?" Krishnaji said, "Who invented God?" There was a shocked silence. "Obviously," he said, "man invented God."' [M laughs.] 'They all looked like a frozen frame in a moving picture. We were driven in a large private car to the aircraft stairs, an assistant of the airline took us aboard, and we left at 2:30 p.m. for Madras. The country was green flying over it. There, to meet Krishnaji, were Pama and Mrs. Jayalakshmi, who gave Krishnaji and me each a huge garland of roses, and tuberoses, and bead necklaces. Others were there, too, including Mrs. Santhanam, who lent her air-conditioned car to drive Krishnaji and me to Vasanta Vihar. Madras was warm and humid, but green and cleaner-looking than Benares. The air was soft and pleasant, not dusty and polluted. Vasanta Vihar is now painted white, which gives it a stately beauty instead of the dingy stained yellow of 1965. There were shrubs and plants everywhere. Waiting on the porch were Sunanda, Prema Srinivasan and her daughter, and Vatsala. The latter was arrow thin, with large dark eyes that veer away when looked at.' I don't seem to remember her. 'Her speech and movement is rapidly intense. She immediately asked me if I would like to take a walk. So, down the drive we went in the dark and up the road a bit before returning. She has examinations in German tomorrow and later again this week. Krishnaji's rooms are above his old ones, charmingly done, a sitting room with blue and white cushions I would like to have in Ojai,' [chuckles] 'the bedroom beyond with a small porch, and large, handsome bath. I have been given his old rooms on the ground floor just underneath, with a small sitting room, large bedroom; both clean and comfortable, attractive. Then I took a luxurious bath with ample hot water. In this heat, bathing becomes almost a rebirth. We dined in a new dining room, in the kitchen building, once a garage. It's back of the main house. Dining were Krishnaji, Achyut, Sunanda, Pama, and Vatsala, who has been living here for the past ten months. Early to bed as we are tired from journeying.'

The twentieth of November. 'It was hot and humid. Krishnaji wanted to talk to Achyut, Sunanda, Pama, and me about the Foundations' schools predominating over the teachings, and Rajghat problems. No sooner had we started than Mr. Santhanam walked in and sat down on the floor with the rest of us in Krishnaji's bedroom…and sat,' it says. [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji was irked and wanted him gone, so he got up, and Sunanda and I sorted his clothes for Rishi Valley. Achyut and Pama eased Santhanam into the sitting room, and talked to him about land for the school his wife is running but which belongs to KFI. He finally left and we resumed.'

S: We should just say that Mr. Santhanam, who was just mentioned, is the husband of Padma Santhanam, and that they eventually became the philanthropists who funded the school in Madras.

M: That's right. Mrs. Santhanam…

S: …was the guiding force.

M: Yes.

S: And she was really the one who had the interest in Krishnaji, not Mr. Santhanam.

M: I think so.

S: Mr. Santhanam, I think, had made his money from car parts. I think he had Lucas Car Parts, or something like that, and had the franchise for all of India. That's where all the money came from.

M: I knew there was a lot of money, and he was a big businessman, but I didn't know what he did.

S: Yes. I think it was that.

M: 'Krishnaji feels the schools have overshadowed the Foundations and the teachings, and taken all the energy, etcetera. He wants to change all that. He discussed Rajghat, the north splitting from the south someday, and how to prevent it. He questioned if the Foundation should run the hospital at Rajghat, the rural schools, etcetera. Achyut gave the pros on this. Later, Krishnaji came down and talked to me alone: "Do they know what I'm talking about?" At Rajghat, he felt "like going away." Also, he felt one night in meditation a tremendous force descend on him.' Dick Clarke and his daughter Heather Thornblod came to call.'

S: Oh, yes! I remember Dick Clarke! We should just say Dick Clarke was one of Krishnaji's tutors when Krishnaji was a little boy at the TS, and by now, Dick Clarke was about 500 years old.

M: Yes, but…

S: But spritely.

M: Very spritely. And still could bicycle, if you remember.

S: Yes! I remember well. He used to bicycle everywhere.

M: [chuckles] Anyway, they came to call. 'And Krishnaji had a word with the daughter.'

'Prema Srinivasan lunched with us. After lunch, Krishnaji had a long talk with Vatsala and later told me she wants to leave. She said she cannot live on words, and wants to get a job. He asked her what she was most interested in. She said she is serious about religion, but must do it her own way. He said she should, and she will stay only as long as he is here. He seemed to think that her not wishing to live on words meant it is only that to Sunanda and Pama, that that is all they offer. I wonder if it reflects Vatsala's own state. Krishnaji wonders about all the older ones here. Pupul in particular. He wants more young people in the Foundation. Afterward, and more briefly, he spoke to Prema's daughter. He then took me and Pama on a rather harried walk in the dark, past a place where gypsies were cooking their supper on an open fire. Buffaloes wandered, and it was again dusty and dirty. There was a discussion at supper with Achyut, Sunanda, Pama, Vatsala, and me on what is tradition. Krishnaji spoke about tradition, and said that all religion is based on tradition and is therefore meaningless. I asked if he was against tradition because it is second-hand, a pattern, a formula, etcetera; or did he also deny the original perception of the first teacher, the Buddha, etcetera? Did he deny that there had been truth for them, which may subsequently have been corrupted into tradition by the ones who heard it, didn't understand it, but passed it along? "Truth cannot be given to another," he said. I asked about a person who reads in one of his books, say, the observer is the observed, and instantly sees the truth of it, not intellectually, but truly sees it? Tradition is not there. Achyut spoke of a conversation with Krishnaji years ago in which Krishnaji had showed him the falseness of something that was weighing on him, and it had totally ended then, and it had never relapsed. "But I have other blindness," he said. Krishnaji then said insight in one thing shows us the totality of things. This seemed to upset Sunanda. "It is not one thing at a time," said Krishnaji. He asked, "What happens when I say that conflict harms the brain?" I said I instantly see it is true, but it is memory and seeing because I have experienced just that, and know the harm and it does not recur. One swiftly finds it is real because it would recur—but I didn't have to finish the sentence because Krishnaji, sitting across the table from me—there was that nonverbal exchange. Krishnaji's statement that truth cannot be given to another is clear—the person must come to it, but truth about the factual, psychological impediments are communicable by him, or his writings, I said. Only one who has understood can communicate this, he said. And he further said that the understanding, and therefore, the wiping out of one impediment, makes one see the whole field of impediments, and they cease to exist. This must be gone into further, says I.' I don't think I reported this very well.

S: One gets the gist of it. One gets the gist.

M: 'To bed right after dinner for early rise.'

November twenty-first. 'We got up at 3:15 a.m., bathed, dressed, and had luggage ready to load into Mrs. Santhanam's car. Dr Parchure, who arrived last night from Benares by train, took my bags. Sunanda, Pama, and Jayalakshmi were up to see us off, the latter will come with Narasimhan on the twenty-fifth. Parameshwaran rode in front, while Krishnaji, Achyut, and I were in the back. We left at 4:10 a.m., going westward along roads where trucks were coming from Bangalore with produce, and bullock carts, mountainous with hay, moved slowly toward us. The bullocks' eyes shown in the dark like cats' eyes. As it became lighter, the village huts of mud and thatch, though very poor, don't have the squalor of the north. Krishnaji took pleasure in the large tamarind trees along the road, telling me that the villagers do not cut them as they give valuable fruit, and each tree belongs to someone. Pale green rice fields appeared, and the soft mauve bloom of the sugar cane. We stopped once for petrol. Little thin-legged boys were carrying on their shoulders pots of water to the huts across the main road; some were brightly polished old brass pots, but too often they were a plastic copy. As we came near Chittoor, the land was like parts of California: low rocky hills, but there was water here. The monsoons have left river water and there are small lakes. Krishnaji pointed to a shrine on a fairly steep hilltop and said, "He used to climb up there alone, they have told me."' That meant himself when he was a boy.

S: So he doesn't remember doing it, but he was told.

M: Exactly. 'In Madanapalle, where he was born, there was all the comings and goings of a market, and he remembered the running joke in Laugh-In.' Laugh-In was a comedy program we liked to watch in California. I don't know if you remember…

S: Yes, I remember it.

M: It was funny, and they used to joke about "beautiful downtown Burbank,"…'and Krishnaji kept laughing at "beautiful downtown Madanapalle"' [S chuckles] 'all the way through the town. Achyut explained to us, as Krishnaji had no idea, how Rishi Valley came to be. Mrs. Besant had a Theosophical college in Madanapalle, and had offered it to Krishnaji for a school, but Krishnaji didn't want a school in the city. So they searched and found land in the valley, nearer to the Rishi Konda mountain. The valley then had no name, but the choice to Krishnaji was obvious. The school grounds were green with very many new trees. The part around the old guest house where Krishnaji stays is nicely planted and a stream runs through a stone channel. The school was waiting to greet him. Frances McCann is already here. Narayan has given me the room across from Krishnaji's on his floor. It is cool, clean, quiet, and good to be in the country after cities. I felt very glad to be here. I unpacked, and washed my hair. Parameshwaran, with two helpers, provides our meals in the kitchen and dining room next to my bedroom.' Do you remember, Krishnaji had the rooms on the left, then there was a big open space…

S: Yes.

M: …and then there was a little dining room and the kitchen; and in the back was a small bedroom, which is what I had. 'Krishnaji was a bit hoarse on leaving Madras, and this was worse at lunch. He went to bed, admitting reluctantly that his throat became sore on the flight.' What flight?

S: Flying from Benares to Madras, where you just came from?

M: Yes, yes. 'Dr. Parchure arrived in the afternoon, and says that Krishnaji's vocal chords are inflamed. He ran a fever of 99 degrees in the afternoon, but that dropped to 98.8 in the evening. Earlier in the afternoon, I had walked around and met Indira, Narayan's sister. Then, Narayan showed me the new guest house.'

S: We should just say that the reason people would get up so early to drive from Rishi Valley to Madras is that it was a four-hour drive, if all went well, but it was very hot.

M: Yes.

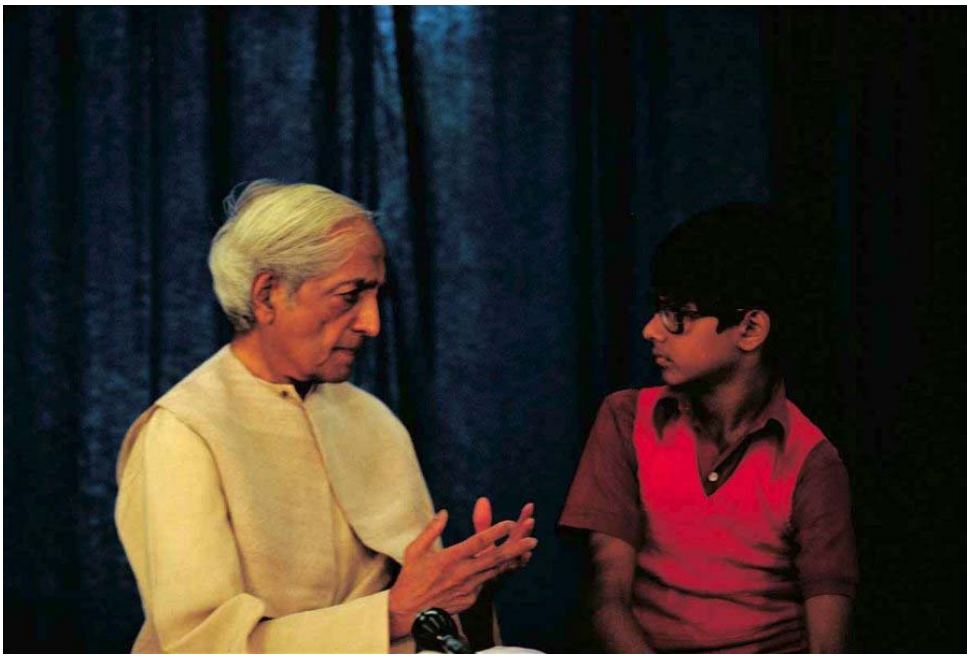
S: Very hot. So, if you wanted to get your traveling done before the heat of the day, you had to leave Madras at about 4 a.m.

M: Yes. It was cooler then, and the roads weren't quite as hectic.

S: Yes, not quite, but still at 4 a.m., there was a remarkable amount of traffic on the road.

M: Also, a lot of things in India happen early.

S: Yes.



Krishnaji walking in Rishi Valley (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: I remember that they used to have discussions with Krishnaji at 7 a.m. in the morning.

Now for November twenty-second. 'I went in early to Krishnaji and took his temperature. He had no fever. He had slept well. I went with Narayan to the chanting assembly of the school, then walked around with Frances a bit. I came back and unpacked Krishnaji's trunk of clothes. A tailor came, and he had old kurtas altered, all the time Krishnaji standing in a draft in his night clothes, rejecting the choga I got out for him'…A choga was a kind of coat, or I don't know what you'd call it; it's a long garment that you'd wear over your Indian clothes if you needed warmth.

S: Yes. It's more like a bathrobe without a belt.

M: Yes, it is…'rejecting the choga I got out for him stubbornly.' [Chuckles.] 'Narayan brought teachers: Prasad, Indira, and Mrs. Thomas to lunch. Sunanda and Pama rang from Madras; Evelyne had arrived but still has fever, and has gone to bed there.

Krishnaji with a Rishi Valley student (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

They will all motor here Saturday. Meanwhile, Michael Mendizza arrived in the afternoon. Dunigan, his sound man, walked out on him Sunday in Benares. He left without telling Michael, who was at the TS filming in the afternoon, and came back to find Dunigan gone, no note, nothing. Frances saw him on her 2 p.m. flight to Delhi. Michael says he can manage here and his wife Bonnie will join him in Madras. Narayan took me to see the new thatched building for the rural school, rather like the Ojai pavilion but in brick, eucalyptus rafters from the school grounds and thatch. It cost $1,000, and was very handsome.'

Editor's Note:* At this point in the discussion, Mary had a leg cramp, and asked for the tape recorder to be turned off as she tried to get rid of it. What follows is what was said when the recorder was turned back on. Obviously, Mary and I were talking about the nature of these discussions.

M: This has to be a memoir.

S: Yes, it is.

M: …which is what Krishnaji was referring to. It's what I was witness to during those years, filtered through my eyes and my brain…

S: Yes, well, that's just it. And I think, it's right to be up-front about all the limitations. So, you can say, 'I thought he was a wonderful person,' or 'I thought he was a terrible person,' and that is not the same thing as saying, 'he was a wonderful person,' or, 'he was a terrible person.' If it's at least continually implied, that this is just your perspective, then, I think you can say all kinds of things, and your subjectivity is taken into account.

Krishnaji with Rishi Valley students (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: Yes.

S: And what you're saying is terribly valuable, it's terribly valuable. Something like a book, as a finished product, is meant to be presented to the public, whereas these discussions, as they aren't. As these are, this is the raw data.

M: Yes, that's right. I was saying what I had, or what I heard or saw or thought that day.

S: Yes, exactly, and out of this raw data, scholars can make something that's polished for the public, or I can do editing down to something that's more for the public. As these discussions are, this is just the raw data, but it's incredibly evocative, and communicates a whole sense of that…well, it's an era. And really, it's an era that's gone; in absolute terms, it's gone. And so it's just terribly, terribly important; all the little details, all the different people that came and went, all the…it's very communicative. Anyway, let's go on.

Editor's Note: Readers of these memoirs should probably know that, despite the length of this account, more than half the volume of the transcripts has been edited out, without, I hope, removing anything of significance.

M: What was that last date we did?

S: Have we finished the twenty-second?

M: Um, yes. I said the rural school building cost $1,000.

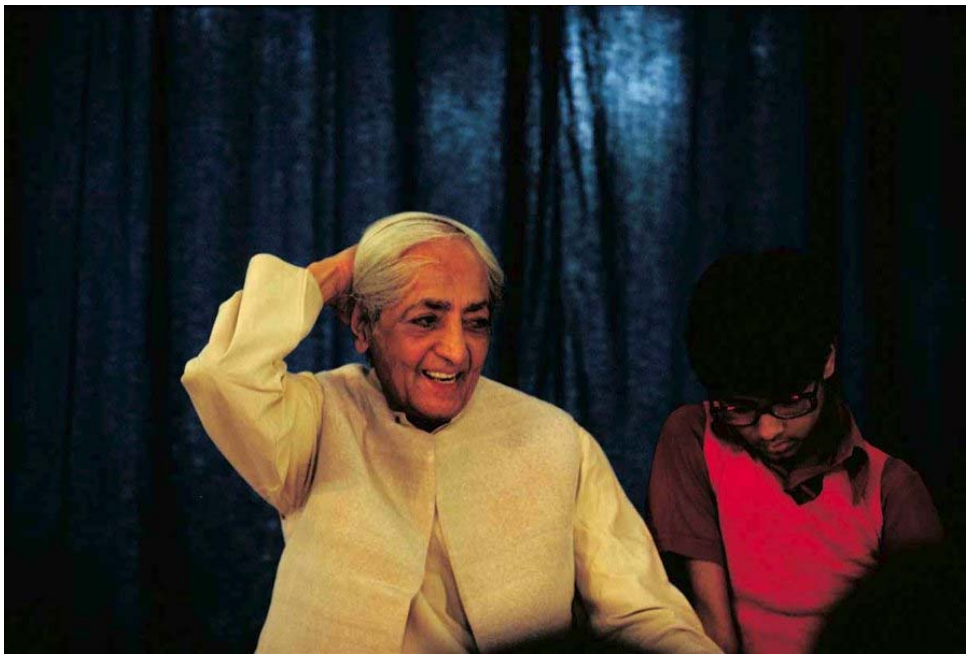
November twenty-third. ‘Krishnaji stayed in bed all day. I went to see Chris Jones, a Brockwood student who has been ill, then I walked, wrote letters, and had supper in the visitors’ dining hall. Kathy Harris and Julie Desnick arrived.’

Krishnaji walking in Rishi Valley (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Kathy Harris was a Brockwood staff member, and Julie Desnick was a student.

M: That’s right, and ‘they arrived from Brockwood. Also Joan Wright.’

The twenty-fourth. ‘In the morning, I went with Narayan to Madanapalle to buy kadhi cotton.’ It’s a hand-woven cotton, and very nice. ‘But the shops had closed. We walked past the house where Krishnaji was born, a narrow street with narrow houses and open drains outside. They appeared very small. A tailor lives and works in it on the ground floor, and a family lives upstairs is what a small sign said was “Sadhana Tutorial School.” The house must be deeper front to back than wide for it seemed tiny. We didn’t get a good look inside, as Narayan didn’t want to show much interest.’ The Indian Foundation were thinking of…



S: …buying it, yes.

M: 'If the buyer was known to be KFI, the price would inflate. It is hard to imagine that little baby being born there over eighty-three years ago. It seemed infinitely mysterious. Perhaps it was a nicer street then. The smallness of everything made it seem part of another time; and so it is, really. Krishnaji showed no interest at all in it when I told him where we had been. At lunch, Krishnaji came to the table with Mr. Gandhi, an architect, and Narayan. I have had an idea to make the end room where the meetings are held into a big handsome bedroom for Krishnaji. It would have light on three sides, and could easily be done with shutters. His present bedroom is small.' He had…

S: I know, I remember it.

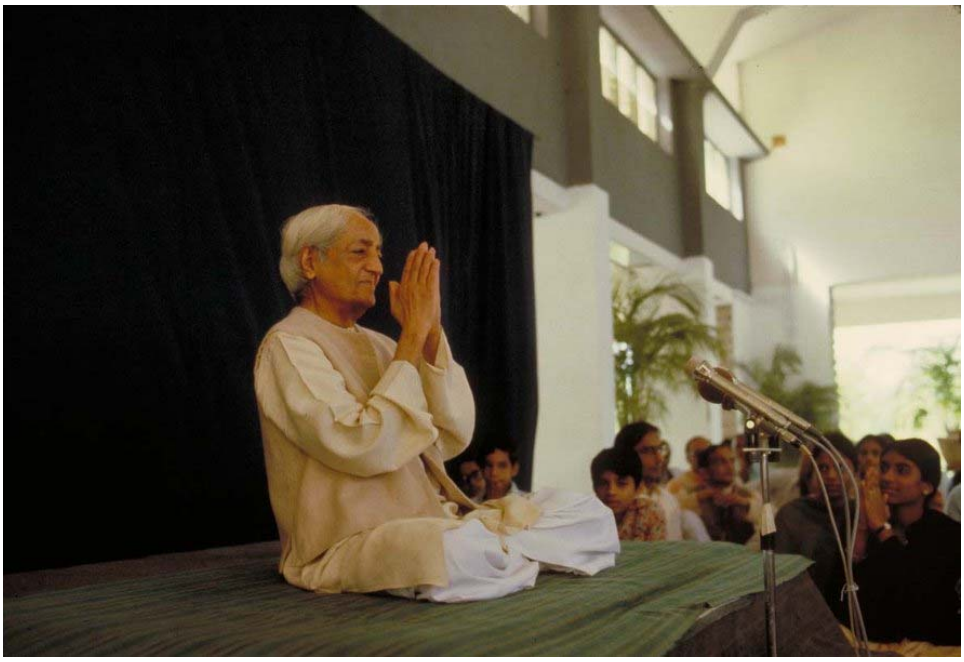
M: …yes, a little, tiny…

S: Little, tiny, ridiculous, lightless, airless room.

Krishnaji with Rishi Valley students (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: Yes. 'The alterations could easily be done with shutters. The present bedroom is small and dark, and in the mornings he needs a lamp to read. Then, I suggested enlarging the center room to include both verandas, making it a large space for meetings.' That, too, was eventually done. 'The architect says it is all feasible. In the afternoon it rained. I began Christopher Fry's memoir Can You Find Me. At 4:30 p.m., Vasanta Kumari, the woman singer who is going to live and teach here, sang for Krishnaji. Palgat Mani Iyer, the great mridangam player, also now living at Rishi Valley, was there also.' He was wonderful. Do you remember him?

S: Oh, yes! He was wonderful. We'll have to end it here as we're running out of tape.



FOOTNOTES:

[1] It is what they used to call electric hot water heaters in Indian bathrooms.

[2] Criminal Investigation Department.

Issue 56: November 25, 1978 to January 5, 1979

Mary and Krishnaji are in India throughout this issue, and the physical challenges are wearing on both of them. Mary's pros in describing India are often extraordinary and lyrical.

Krishnaji in Rishi Valley (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

Mary: So, we begin on November twenty-fifth, 1978. At this point we're at the Rishi Valley School in India. 'Evelyne and Sunanda arrived from Madras. Krishnaji, Narayan, and I lunched, and Sunanda joined us afterward. Krishnaji bore down very hard on what the Foundation is actually doing, and questioned what he is doing here. After more than forty years of talking, there is not one person "who will work at it, who will carry the flame through India." Narayan suggested an order, such as a monastic order, but Krishnaji said, "He has said no disciples."…"Don't call it that."…"Call it a group of people." He said again that he probably has another ten or fifteen years and doesn't want to just go around. He questioned whether he himself had been "irresponsible" in not meeting with just half a dozen people and seeing that they have this thing. It was a knife in me to hear him raise a question that it could be his fault. After all, he has poured out to others all these years. Toward the end of the conversation, it was tentatively planned that he should divide his time in India between Rishi Valley, Vasanta Vihar, and Bombay.'

Scott: Could we just stop and discuss something here for a minute, because I think what you were reading about how disappointed Krishnaji was, and saying that no one was carrying out what he talked about, etcetera, needs to be highlighted a bit.

M: Yes.

S: I think it's important just to note for the sake of history that this is not something that Krishnaji was just saying in his last year just because he was ill, which some people in India have been saying in the years since. No. This is something that he had been saying for almost a decade.

M: Yes. That's true.

S: And repeating it strongly and calling people to task and doing everything that he could.

M: Yes, and he used to say to all the places, in his last decade, "You're not using me. I'm wasting my time. What am I going to do when I go to Ojai or Brockwood or something?"

S: Yes, but that was a different matter. He said that in all the places he went to in his last years, but this sharp criticism of India and of the Indians was not something that he had in the other two places, in America or England. There was an edge to his criticism of the Indians, what they were doing, and the lightness with which they were taking it all or something like that.

Krishnaji with Achyut (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: Yes, it was much sharper in India. And he felt they were taking it all for granted. Anyway, 'Pupul, Nandini, and her daughter Devi, Achyut, Nelly Digby, and Eleanor Hawksley arrived in a van from Bangalore. Krishnaji went for a walk with Narayan and me, and met Jayalakshmi, her sister, and Narasimhan, who have come from Madras for one night. We continued to walk, and Krishnaji saw the newly thatched building at the rural school. Mr. Naidu'…Oh, he was a lovely man…

S: Yes! Yes.

M: He was the head of the garden.

S: He was the estate manager, really.

M: Yes, he was head of the whole place, physically.

S: Including running the farm.

M: I hope he's well. Anyway, 'Mr. Naidu, who is in charge of the farm, planting, etcetera, came along and pointed out new trees, and other rural developments. Krishnaji was pleased. Everyone but Krishnaji had supper in the visitors' dining room.'

The twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji was sick to his stomach from midnight till 6 a.m. Others were similarly ill, Frances, Michael, Julie, etcetera. There was something in yesterday's lunch, though Krishnaji ate here in the old guest house, while all the others ate in the visitors' dining room. Parchure is trying to figure it out. Krishnaji stayed in bed all day. The teachers' discussion was postponed. Jayalakshmi and Narasimhan had breakfast here with Narayan and me. They left in midmorning after seeing Krishnaji briefly in his room. I did letters, read, slept, and took a walk westward up the valley alone. Krishnaji felt better after his rest and the semi-fast. He got up at 5 p.m. and walked around outside the house. He seemed well by evening.'

The twenty-seventh. 'I woke up at 1:30 a.m. with a migraine. Later, I took Dr. Wolf's pills and Krishnaji put his hands on my head. It was a quiet morning. At lunch were Krishnaji, Evelyne, Nelly Digby, Narayan's sister Indira, Prasad, and me. Earlier, Nandini said that Nelly was abusive to the houseboy in a British memsahib style.' [S laughs.] 'Krishnaji wants me to tell her that she cannot behave like that.' [S laughs again.] And then I wrote one word: 'Difficult.' [S laughs again.] 'Scott Forbes and Pama arrived from Madras having extricated from customs the video equipment Frances has donated to KFI, and which Scott has come to set up and show people how to use.'

S: Yes, just for the sake of history, Frances was, I think, the largest contributor, but not the only one by any means. I raised funds from several people for that. And it was an absolute nightmare getting all of the video equipment and videotapes through Indian customs.

M: I'll bet it was.

S: So this was the introduction of the Indian Foundation to video recording Krishnaji's talks and discussions. [Both chuckle lightly.]

M: The next day. 'At 9:45, Krishnaji held a discussion with all the teachers, including Brockwood's Kathy Harris and Scott Forbes and all the Foundations' trustees. Afterward, Achyut and I had a long talk on the problems in Krishnamurti Foundations, and the tension between Pupul and Narayan. Achyut is friendly to both, but wishes Narayan had more of a feeling for the Foundation and working as a whole, not just for Rishi Valley. At lunch were Krishnaji, Narayan, Scott, Sunanda, Venkataraman (a math teacher), and me. At 4 p.m., there was a KFI trustee meeting. Krishnaji, Pupul, Nandini, Achyut, Sunanda, Pama, Narayan, and Rajesh. Krishnakutti and I were non-members invited to attend. Krishnaji asked whether he should become president of the KFI. Pupul had told him that she wishes to resign in his favor. She said she once opposed his being president, but now is for it with all her heart. Krishnaji said as things now stand, he is holding everything together, and there isn't a spirit of cooperation. Why not? He said again that the schools have swamped the teachings. And he asked why was there division in the Foundation? Pupul made an attempt to bring her differences with Narayan into the open, but she did it in such a challenging manner that he flared up. There were questions on how differences are handled in the English and American Foundations, and I said they were discussed and never became issues.' Well, I was being optimistic. [S laughs.] But this is 1978. More to come, obviously.

S: Yes.

Krishnaji with Rishi Valley students (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: 'I said that Krishnaji is president in both the U.S. and the United Kingdom because, after Rajagopal, we were intent on his having as complete power as was legally possible. Beyond that, we feel totally responsible to him. Krishnaji spoke of cooperation, the feeling of cooperation coming first, and from that, everything must flow. Afterward, Rajesh Dalal and I talked about all the things surrounding the teachings here and walked to the road and back.'

November twenty-ninth. 'I called on Evelyne and then Nelly in the morning. In the afternoon, Krishnaji held another KFI meeting at which he again wondered if he was not being responsible in seeing that a few came to total understanding, and again spoke of the Buddha, who had only two disciples who understood him and they both died before he did. It is an ache to hear him wonder if it his fault after sixty years of pouring light on everyone. Narayan, Nandini, Devi, and I walked with him. A little village boy brought him a newborn goat.' [Chuckles.] 'Black and white and tottery.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji held it, and the brown mother bleated protectively. A tiny flute sound came from the rocks on the hills. The player was invisible, but it was a faint thread around our walk in the evening. Sitting, and talking with Krishnaji, I could hear it faintly somewhere.' It was lovely, a little shepherd boy with the goats, and he would play his flute. It was just lovely.

S: Yes, very pastoral.

M: November thirtieth. 'Krishnaji spoke to the whole school in the assembly hall. Michael Mendizza filmed it. The young students spoke right up when he asked what they wanted to talk about. "Sir, what is will power?"' [Chuckles.] '"Sir, what is desire?" The last from a tiny boy. Krishnaji talked on learning and comparison and got a young boy and girl to sit beside him. Both of them entirely unselfconscious. The little boy with heavy glasses was utterly serious and honest.' What was his name? I used to know…Sanjay! 'When Krishnaji asked if he saw something, he wouldn't say he did until he'd considered it carefully. The children were wonderful, and Krishnaji enjoyed it. "Tell your teachers, no comparisons!"' [S laughs.] 'Scott, who did the sound for Michael, was laughing after Krishnaji's talk ended. When I asked him why, he told me it was because Krishnaji had a battery mic under his kurta for the film, so Scott could hear the children afterward, clustering around Krishnaji, and telling on their teachers who do, of course, compare!' [Hearty laughter by both.] I'd forgotten all that.

S: Yes, I'd forgotten it to until you just read this. [Still laughing.] And I can just see those little Indian students doing that too.

M: 'In the afternoon at 4 p.m., Krishnaji held another KFI meeting, which got so heavily psychological, it got nowhere. Narayan spoke of an area of loneliness, which resists all awareness, while simultaneously insisting that nothing was wrong in his relationships. Pupul before breakfast told me of nightmares and fears that affect her. There seems to be a tendency to make things into abstractions, fill herself with concepts, and not look into the personal problems. In many ways, they seem remarkably unaware of themselves. Scott was on the walk with Krishnaji and me, and later Sunanda and Rajesh joined us. We met small, dark-as-twigs gypsy women crossing the fields, instant begging and chattering at us. Krishnaji pulled out his pockets, so did Scott and I, to show we had nothing, but they laughed and kept chattering. A second pair came along and the performance repeated itself…' [S laughs.] Do you remember any of that?

S: I remember gypsy women were sometimes at Rishi Valley, but not that particular occasion.

M: '…the performance repeated itself, except that Krishnaji gave one his clean white handkerchief. On our return, Krishnaji talked to Vatsala, who was in a flurry of changing her mind.' Do you remember who she was?

S: If I remember correctly, she hadn't been a student at one of the schools, and was not quite a staff member, either. She might have been a university student and an expert on Heidegger, and that interested people in her.

M: Maybe.

S: A year before, or two years before, Krishnaji had given her some attention, talked with her, and people found her promising, but she was having some kind of metaphysical crisis during this year and then disappeared, and I can't remember ever seeing her again. I think that's who it is.

M: I can't remember seeing her again. Well, I wouldn't be in India every year. But I never heard another word that I can recall. Anyway, it says, 'Rajesh has talked to her. Now she thinks she may join one of the schools, but doesn't know, and is in confusion.'

'After supper, nine village men danced outside the school's dining hall. A tall man with a rattle moved in the center, calling the time, and the other eight danced in a circle around him, two older ones playing flutes with tassels on the end as they danced. The others had cymbals. Krishnaji came and stood watching. After about forty minutes, the students began to join in. At first, the older girls, then tides of little boys in their white pajama suits jumped in, then older people:' [chuckles] 'Karen and Chris from Brockwood, Kathy Harris, Devi'—that's Nandini's daughter—'even Nandini for a few minutes. Krishnaji was laughing, alight with the fun. He urged Pupul to join, and with a burst of enthusiasm, for a few minutes she did. "I want to dance," said Krishnaji and did it a little standing in the dark behind the circle of onlookers. At 9 p.m., we walked back to the guest house, and he was pleased and full of fun.' Do you remember that?

S: Yes, I do. And I remember Krishnaji's little almost invisible dance in the shadows.

M: The first of December. 'A quiet day of resting for Krishnaji. I did desk work and dictated from my notes of Letters to the Schools to Mr. Hari Harumi…'

S: Oh, yes. He was a man who did secretarial work.

M: That's right…'so he could type them. Krishnaji walked with Scott and me and we met gypsies.' Oh, so we met gypsies that day, too.

December second. 'At 9:45 a.m., Krishnaji held a discussion for teachers, including some from Bangalore. It was mostly on comparison. I wonder how many understood. In the afternoon, there was a concert, Palghat Mani Iyer on mridangam, and an albino fellow on a little drum shaped like a Camembert' [S laughs] 'and Vasanta Kumari singing accompanied by a young woman on violin. The singing left me fairly flat, but Mani Iyer was very good. Krishnaji sat in the middle on a mat with the young students all around him, and enjoyed Mani Iyer. We walked afterward.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held another teachers' discussion with the same group at 9:45 a.m. Much frustration. He said, "There is no distraction." And, "Distraction is thought." He seemed to me to take for granted one knew what he meant, and with, for instance, the subject of knowledge, which he discussed scathingly as "a means to livelihood and status" with teachers who have in part never heard him before and may not know he has a more nuanced view of it, this could be bewildering. He kept putting the question, "With ten students in front of you, how will you see that they have no distraction?" And at one point, he asked them how they will make the ten students understand the whole existence of man.' [Chuckles.] 'He is also intimidating in dismissing almost any reply they make with, "You're not answering my question." He made me feel at the end of one-and-a-half hours thankful that I'm not a teacher.' [Both laugh.] 'In the afternoon, he, Narayan, and I visited the dairy herd; graceful-eyed cows eating green hay, most of them a cross between Sindhi'—Sindhi is a breed of cow—'and Jersey. Little calves were shyly friendly. We walked across the stream, turned left and westward along the rice fields on a tiny path. It was away from everything, truly country, and I felt the niceness of that, the way I feel less often in India. There is something in the air that is constantly unpleasant. Is it a smell, a kind of sourness, part of the mildew in the buildings, a gray in the water, which though it comes from a well and is said to be very pure, never seems quite clean either on my clothes or self. Have I become too finicky, overly fastidious? The blankets on my bed are musty. The pillow used who knows how long is inside a thin pillow slip, there is no pad on the rubber mattress, and inside the rag-bare sheet smells of damp.' I'm sorry to go into all this…

S: No, no. It's fine…and it's very true.

M: 'I may be wrong in reacting, but there is what my mother used to call "feistiness"'… This is a word my mother made up, it's something sort of ick.

S: [laughing] Yes.

M: '…what my mother used to call "feastiness" about it all. But we did have a nice walk, got back across the little stream by jumping, and clambered up the bank while I kept a cautious watch for cobras, and came back along the Tetu Road.'

December fourth. 'At breakfast, Krishnaji talked vigorously about forming small groups of religiously committed people. He swept the value of the schools aside; he really was drastic. In the afternoon, he, Narayan, Nandini, Devi, and I walked about four miles.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave his second students' talk and discussion. The new video equipment brought and set up by Scott was used for the first time. Scott is training three teachers to man the three cameras, and one to be the director. Krishnaji again had a little boy named Sanjay sit beside him and a little girl on the other side. Very bright children. Krishnaji asked what causes fear, and Sanjay replied, "It is all in the mind, sir."' [Both chuckle.] ‘The older children don’t speak, but the young ones were quick and were really listening. At the end, Krishnaji asked everyone to sit quietly and asked if they understood why he suggested it. A little girl piped up, “Sir, it is to build up our energy.”’ [Both chuckle.] ‘At lunch were Narayan, Vatsala, Rajesh, and me. It rained, but we walked anyway at 5 o’clock. Evelyne gave me a letter sent by Lou about the geological report on my property, based on which the buyer called off the deal.’ I had a terrible time with the geologist on that.

S: Yes, selling the house.

Portrait of Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: ‘The report makes it appear that the land may go in a landslide. It said there are three slide areas. If the report is correct, the place could be unsellable. The letter is so drastic I simply read it with no reaction at all. I realize the financial implications can be considerable but can do nothing for the present. We’ll have to deal with it in February. Krishnaji said, “What will you do?” I replied, “I don’t know what I can do.”’

December sixth. ‘Nandini and Devi left early for Bombay. Sunanda and Pama went to Madras. Krishnaji held a meeting at 4 p.m. for some of the teachers. He spoke of seven things to give the students: 1. protection in freedom, 2. a sense of religious, righteous behavior, 3. an expectation of the highest excellence, 4. love and affection, which is security. Then, he added last year’s list, which was 1. a global outlook, 2. a concern for man, 3. a religious feeling. He kept asking what we can do as a group to give this to the children, how one is to have unyielding rectitude? He said that other groups have a belief, an authority to hold them together, to give them energy. But, he said, the very denial of authority and belief gives energy.’

‘Narayan spoke of a brotherhood of teachers and absence of fear.’

‘Krishnaji asked, “How will you bring this about? By working, you will not get it. You must get it, and then work at it.”’

‘Pupul brought up compassion as a central thing, and Narayan said, “If I see I am the world, there is a root of compassion.”’

‘Krishnaji asked, how will they prevent the children from being swallowed up by society? “Do you have a deep religious feeling? That is the rock, and from there you live.”…“Compassion means love, intelligence, an end to sorrow. Have you intelligence? You can’t give something you haven’t got. You have to have this quality of creation, newness, not innovation, or invention, but as an endless source, a river with no beginning and no end.”’

‘Krishnaji, Narayan, and I crossed the valley and climbed a stone path on the north side of the valley to a flat mesa. It was dark by the time we returned. Mr. and Mrs. Santhanam arrived. A Mr. Mueller had a run-in with me…’ Oh, that was that tiresome man.

S: Oh, yes, wasn’t he the one who made up stories about himself being a CIA agent, or being a spy?

M: Yes, he was weird.

S: Yes.

M: I don’t know what happened to him.

S: He was in Ojai for a while.

M: Yes, he was. And he was difficult wherever he was. Anyway, I had an argument with him on that day.

S: There was never a shortage of tiresome people.

M: No. [Laughter.]

December seventh. ‘Rain. Krishnaji talked to the students. The same two students sat with him on the platform and again the children were remarkable; they really think, and are unselfconscious. The ones about thirteen to fourteen years of age are the articulate ones. It was videotaped. I met Gita, a daughter of the dairy head, to whom the Moorheads are giving a year at Brockwood.’

S: Yes.

M: The Moorheads are an English couple. Have they appeared in this account yet?

S: Yes, they have. We've talked about them, and that they set up the dairy at Rishi Valley.

M: We did, alright. 'The Moorheads were giving Gita a year at Brockwood. She came and asked to talk to me, and so we did. She's seventeen years old, bright, serious, and has the makings of a teacher here. At lunch were the Santhanams, Pupul, Achyut, Narayan, and me. Later Ahalya, Upasini, and Mrs. Parchure arrived from Rajghat.'

S: Just to say for a minute that Gita, I think, spent two or three years at Brockwood and then…

M: She went to Australia.

S: …she met at Brockwood a young staff member; she was by then about twenty years old, and they got married. He was Australian, and they're now living happily in Australia.

M: Yes. I used to hear from her.

S: I did, too.

M: But I haven't heard in a long time.

S: I heard from her a couple years ago.

M: Yes, yes. She was a nice girl.

S: A very nice girl.

M: December eighth. 'I woke up at 2 a.m. with a headache, but Bufferin fixed it. Dr. Parchure gave Krishnaji the pneumonia vaccine sent by Lailee'—that's our doctor in California—'which came via Evelyne. Jayalakshmi brought a violinist T. Krishnan, and he and Mani Iyer gave a concert.' He was very good. I remember that well. You probably do, too.

S: Yes.

M: The next day just says: 'Rain. Krishnaji spoke to teachers at 9:45 a.m. I dictated letters, etcetera.'

And the day after it just says: 'A clear day. Krishnaji talked to teachers again at 9:45 a.m. Anantaswami V. Hari of Bangalore was at lunch. We go there Wednesday for the day.'

S: Now, Anantaswami, just to say, was a trustee of the Indian Foundation.

M: I think so. And he, I believe, put up a lot of the initial money for the school in Bangalore.

S: Yes, and his two children were lovely people who came to Brockwood.

M: Oh. I'd forgotten that.

December eleventh. 'Pupul recorded a question-and-answer session with Krishnaji. Present were Ahalya, Upasini, Rajesh, Pama, Scott, and me. Toward the end, he said that there must be: 1. No comparison; 2. Problems must be solved instantly; 3. No sorrow. He said if someone were to ask why should one keep listening to K? He would tell them to listen to him constantly, as often as he could, because "The flower is always new." At 6:15 in the evening, the school's annual dance performance was held under the banyan tree. Krishnaji sat on a mat with the children. The ballet was not very good, but three little boys played mridangam fiercely during intermission.' [Both chuckle.] Oh dear.

December twelfth, 'Krishnaji talked to school. The children were excellent.'

The next day, 'I was up at 4 a.m., bathed and dressed. Mr. Anantaswami came from Bangalore last night, and drove Krishnaji, Narayan, Pupul, and me to the new Krishnamurti school in Bangalore called The Valley School. Evelyne, Michael, and Dr. Parchure came in a separate car. We left at 5 a.m., and arrived at 8:15 a.m., and were given breakfast in The Valley School guest house by Mrs. Anantaswami and servants. We went to the school, and at 10 a.m. Krishnaji spoke to the students, after which we returned to the guest house, where he spoke to teachers. The children were under twelve years of age, but spoke right up.'

Portrait of Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

'Krishnaji: "Do you like your school?"'

'Children: "Yes!"' [Chuckles.]

‘Krishnaji: “Are you afraid of your teachers?”’

‘Children: ‘No!”’

‘Krishnaji: “What would you like?”’

‘Children: “To have a hostel.”’

‘Krishnaji: “Don’t you want to go home to your parents?”’

‘Children: “No!”’ [M and S both chuckle.]

‘The parents apparently are always busy. The teachers are new at this, but were intent on having a good school. They are leery of having a principal, but see the need for one. At the school, Michael Mendizza photographed Krishnaji with the children. After lunch at the guest house, there was a short rest. Then, Mr. Harry Khoday, who has paid for most of this school, and Pupul brought the First Minister of the state and a Mr. Urs to see Krishnaji. It was a sticky beginning.’ [Laughs.] I remember well, nobody spoke. Krishnaji sat on the sofa and the First Minister, a big portly man, sat on the right, and Pupul sat on the left, and I and whoever else was there were not part of the group—we modestly sat in the background. And nobody spoke! And I thought, well, it’s up to Pupul as she is supposed to have engineered this, and she’s the hostess type, but nothing happened. [Laughs more.] ‘Nobody spoke. Finally, Krishnaji began to question him on whether people in India will see what is happening to the world, etcetera, and are concerned. Krishnaji spoke with charm and intensity, and the Minister had the intelligence to appreciate it. Then, we left and were driven back to Rishi Valley by Mr. Khoday, who had most kindly not allowed Evelyne or me to pay for some silks from his factory that his brother brought, and which we wanted to buy. We reached Rishi Valley at 7 p.m. I went to bed without supper. Krishnaji has a boil forming above his left knee.’

The fourteenth of December. ‘Krishnaji spoke to the students. Again, it was very good. I took photos. The children, one of whom was Sanjay Ganapati Daychu’—spelling?—‘again sat beside Krishnaji, and it went very well. I took a roll of film of it. At lunch were Jayalakshmi, Dr. and Mrs. Parchure, Pama, and Narayan. In spite of his boil, Krishnaji walked down for a coconut tree planting. He planted the first one near the swimming pool. I planted one nearby. Then, he led a crowd across to the bridge and had each person plant one along the river. Jayalakshmi, Ahalya, Upasini, Dr. and Mrs. Parchure, Jayalakshmi’s sister, Rita Zampese, Mr. Deshpande, Indira, Narayan, and Scott. Most had to wade through the stream, Krishnaji urging them on from the bridge. Only Pupul evaded it by leaving.’

The fifteenth. ‘Pupul left for Delhi to see Mrs. Gandhi. The boil is hurting Krishnaji, and a Dr. Krishnamurti from Madanapalle came for lunch. Krishnaji stayed in bed but saw him. He and Dr. Parchure decided on an antibiotic, doxycycline, 100 milligrams, which Krishnaji took in the evening.’

There's little for the next day. 'Krishnaji's boil is beginning to drain and soften. Krishnaji was able to sit in the other room and hold a teacher discussion. "A fact is never a fragment." In the afternoon, I climbed the hill behind the playing fields.'

December seventeenth. 'In the morning, Krishnaji again held a teachers' discussion, and in the afternoon, he did one for filming, talking with Narayan, Prasad, Krishnakutti, Indira, Mrs. Major, and Venkataraman. Michael set it up in front of the guest house. Krishnaji's boil is not draining properly. Ahalya and I packed Krishnaji's clothes in metal trunks to take to Madras. Someone said that the U.S. and China have mounted an opening discussion of diplomatic relationship. News here is as remote as the moon.' I always felt that in Rishi Valley, that one was way far away from the whole world.

S: I know. Yes, yes.

M: The eighteenth: 'Krishnaji held a discussion with students of the two upper classes, with Narayan the only other person present. Afterward, Dr. Parchure cut open Krishnaji's boil using a freeze anesthetic, which lasts such a short time that Krishnaji had considerable pain, but as soon as it was over and bandaged he said the pain was gone and it felt much better. His and the only question is why and how he got it. Dr. Krishnamurti was at lunch'—that's that doctor from Madanapalle—'and two teachers, Dr. Parchure, and me. Krishnaji spent the rest of the day in bed reading. I, too, read all afternoon, Newsweek and Time from Narayan, and then went for a walk alone. The sky was beautiful with round, piling clouds. A sparrow hawk fluttered in place over the rice field, dived but rose with nothing.'

December nineteenth. 'In spite of the boil pain, Krishnaji insisted on talking to the students, and I packed in the afternoon. Mrs. Gandhi has been jailed for four days by Parliament, and was stripped of her membership in Parliament, denying her the seat she won in it a few weeks ago.'

December twentieth. 'Up at 3 a.m. and we left less than an hour later for Madras. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, Parameshwaran, and I were in the Santhanam car. We arrived at Vasanta Vihar by 8:30 a.m. and learned that all the others (Evelyne, Nelly, Frances, etcetera, etcetera) were to have left by car and van at 7:30 a.m., but were prevented by dangers of riots over Mrs. Gandhi going to jail. She is stronger in the south, and her followers have attacked trains, newspaper offices, etcetera. Four people were killed in Bangalore where Achyut, Ahalya, Mrs. Parchure, Upasini, and Rajesh are; so they, too, are immobilized for the moment as trains had been attacked. It can't last long as she will be out of jail in four days.' Where were you in all that?

S: I was stuck in Rishi Valley, and I remember it well. I was loading all the video equipment into the van, and was about to travel by car with Michael Mendizza and some others, when we were told at the last minute that no one could go. Of course, everyone was worried that you and Krishnaji wouldn't arrive safely.

M: Yes. We left so early, we didn't…[chuckles].

S: Yes, but there was no word until we phoned and learned that you'd arrived safely.

Krishnaji with Parameshwaran (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: 'I'm grateful we took off early as I had had enough of Rishi Valley and am glad to be here in Madras. My mysterious luck or fortitude in not being sick came to an end in the afternoon. I went with Prema Srinivasan to a tailor with some saris she got me, but he was closed, so I got some detective stories for Krishnaji and Newsweek and Time. When I came back I began to feel queasy. I ate only fruit and went to bed, but was sick at night.'

The next day. 'I felt weak but better, and had only a slight fever, 99.6. I slept most of the day, taking only fruit juice and tea. There is no news from Rishi Valley, but late at night the group who were in Bangalore (Achyut, Ahalya, Mrs. Parchure, Upasini, and Rajesh) arrived by train. I read a book just published called Krishnamurti's Boyhood by Dick Clarke.'

December twenty-second. 'I feel alright but am weak and eating only very lightly. The question is how to be adequately nourished between now and February, avoiding fried and spiced things, which make up almost all this cooking. Vediamo. Vediamo.' That's Italian for "we'll see." They say it all the time in Italy, "we'll see"—vediamo.

S: Yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'A letter came from Amanda saying a man is considering buying the Malibu house. This she has heard from Elfriede. Rajesh said he questioned some of the young men making trouble in Bangalore on what political party they represented. They said fifteen rupees a day, and an assurance they wouldn't be arrested.' So they were paid agitators.

S: Yes.

M: 'News came in the morning that the Rishi Valley group is on their way. Dick Clarke lunched here and presented his book to Krishnaji. I asked him what he meant at the end when he said that Theosophy takes in Krishnaji and the Krishnamurti Foundations. He replied that the Theosophists believe Theosophy takes in everything.' [Both laugh.] 'I pointed out that this is oddly construed. In the afternoon, the Rishi Valley vans and car brought the missing persons. It seems that trouble began at 6:30 a.m. on the twentieth at Madanapalle when Ulrich Bruger, Gisèle Balleys, and Mrs. Ridley were arriving there by car to take a bus to Madras, and a mob crowded in on the car threateningly. A man in the crowd said to let it go back to Rishi Valley, as no buses were running, but another group closed in and tried to force the doors open, telling them to get out of the car. The driver edged the car over a curb, as if to comply, then gunned the car and they escaped back to Rishi Valley.' Were you in that?

S: No, no. And I'd completely forgotten about that incident. Mrs. Ridley was just an elderly woman enthusiast from Sheffield, and Gisèle Balleys and Ulrich Bruger were just enthusiasts from Switzerland and not on any committee at the time. They were all going to get the bus from Madanapalle to Madras, because there weren't cars for everybody, obviously. When they got back to Rishi Valley and told us what had happened, we knew it was dangerous for the cars and van to leave. That's what I can remember now.

M: Yes, yes, yes. The mob closed in. 'So, they escaped back to Rishi Valley, but they are now here. Evelyne had tea. Evelyne, Nelly, Scott, etcetera are staying in the annex.'

S: This might need to be explained a bit more, because this was the year in which India was hosting the international trustees' meetings, and they were having Michael and company filming, and me recording and teaching them to make video recordings—they were having so many people that their normal facilities couldn't hold everybody. So, although they had previously constructed a two-story annex of bedrooms and bathrooms in back of Vasanta Vihar, that was not enough, so they built special bamboo and coconut palm leaf shelters on the roof of the annex for people to sleep.

M: They did? I hope you didn't have to sleep there, did you?

S: Yes. I did. I slept there. They didn't have any other places. I can remember Upasini was in a bed next to me; there was just rows of beds for the men. I think the women had the better accommodation in the permanent structure beneath us. And then to eat, they couldn't fit everyone in the dining hall, so they had to make a bamboo and coconut palm dining room. [Both laugh.] Anyway, continue.

M: 'I went for a walk with Krishnaji and Pama, driving to the beach past the TS and Damodar Gardens, which KFI is thinking of leasing.' That's part of the TS compound and indeed they did lease it for Mrs. Santhanam's Krishnamurti School. The School, they called it. 'We walked along the beach toward the river, the wind blowing in from the Bay of Bengal was clean and so was the sound of the sea, but the wide beach is not. The fisher folk live in hovels on the beach and relieve themselves along the edge of the tide. So one can't walk on the sand, but has to walk along an old disused road leading to the bridge across the river. Krishnaji strode along, vital, indomitable-looking, past the TS, past the part of the beach where he and his brother were noticed as boys and this strange story began. Krishnaji does not set foot on TS property and hasn't since the 1930s when he was made to feel unwelcome. The road we took to the beach goes around the TS property. Coming back, we met Achyut, who is staying in Radha Burnier's house. Back at Vasanta Vihar, Pupul had arrived from Bombay after a crowded time at the airport. Everyone, including Krishnaji, had supper at table in a coco-palm hut put up outside the dining room in the back garden.' [Chuckles.]

December twenty-third. 'I attended the KF of India trustee meeting. There was a discussion of Krishnaji's becoming president of the Foundation instead of Pupul. I don't see any big operational difference it would make, but it was decided that Krishnaji will give his answer tomorrow. Perhaps forming a small college at Rishi Valley was also discussed. Krishnaji spoke of the need for new good people. Rajesh said that the full sense of responsibility people start with seems to fade. Perhaps the enormity of the teachings causes this. Krishnaji said if he saw the truth of the teachings, he would start in a small way. "After all, it took (himself) fifty years."'

S: What's he saying?

M: Well, he's telling them if he was investigating the truth of the teachings, he would start in a small way. '"After all it took"'…and I put in parentheses (himself) '"…fifty years."…"I can't do anything tomorrow. If I want to do something, I want to do it today. If I had heard the Buddha, and his mind is too big for me, I would take what I can understand and keep moving."…"He says, no time—I would work on that. I don't know what he means. I would ask him."…"He says I will do this, I say, no time. If I am angry, I end it now, not tomorrow. I won't let anything enter into the field of time. I would ask, have I understood that—the word meaning, the inwardness of it? I can't capture the immensity (of it all), but I can begin with that."' Now, I put "of it all" in parentheses, which I think are mine, but the rest is a quote.

December twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji at the KFI trustee meeting accepted the presidency but wishes that Pupul and Achyut as vice presidents should act as "buffers" with regard to legal and other matters in his absence, or during any period in which he delegates his powers to them. Achyut demurred because he has accepted to start religious centers all over India, and therefore feels he should not take on an official position. Pupul made a plea to Achyut to accept nevertheless as he is uniquely able to protect KFI in the country today.[1] Achyut wants to do the religious work on his own so that if he makes mistakes, they're all his personally. Pupul refused to be a vice president without him. Krishnaji said that was blackmail.' [Chuckles.]

S: Yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'Krishnaji asked about his own responsibilities as president. He said the schools exist to carry out the teachings; the Foundations are totally responsible for the schools and so for the teachings. Under those circumstances, he asked Achyut to join. Achyut said he would do what Krishnaji wishes. Krishnaji said that was not enough. Then, Achyut accepted. Krishnaji then asked what we can do to make all the Foundations more responsible and active, creative, alive, and living the teachings. Are there too many members too casually involved? He is concerned with a separation if he dies. I asked about Krishnaji's powers as president, and if he had their agreement that he can, at any time, whether he is in India or elsewhere, overrule the vice presidents. Krishnaji asked at length, what is the responsibility of the Foundation members and what do they do? "Am I spilling my blood on a rock? It is not worth it?" Krishnaji said our trust is in the teachings, "and that trust is your life." It is the responsibility to see to each other and to keep in contact, not only verbally, but inwardly. At 5 p.m., Shankar drove Evelyne, Nelly, Julie, and me to the Music Academy, where M.S. Subbulakshmi sang. Shankar had invited me in Brockwood. We had to queue together, and it was a chance to observe the audience. High preponderance of what I think of as South Indian Brahmin faces, rather fine, slightly ovoid, with a certain dignity. It was a bit like the opening of the opera in New York: women in their most gleaming saris, dark, lustrous colors, diamonds in ear, and regrettably noses.' [S chuckles.] 'Subbulakshmi and niece Radha in brilliant yellow saris, surrounded by accompanists, sang for almost three hours marvelously. It was raining when we came out. Shankar drove Evelyne, Nelly, and me home before going back for the following concert at 8 o'clock. So passed Christmas Eve.'

Christmas day. 'Between 8 a.m. and 8 p.m., the monsoon poured over five inches of rain.' That is a real downpour. 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the first of the combined Foundations meetings, the only non-Indian members being Nelly, Evelyne, and myself. We went into the responsibilities of the Foundations. Krishnaji said, "The religious mind is without illusion," and later, "sorrow is illusion." At 3:30 p.m., Sunanda, Pama, Pupul, Nelly, Evelyne, and I had a publication meeting. India has agreed to let Harper bring out the meditations book in the autumn of 1979 in time for Christmas, and their own book, now retitled Explorations and Insights, is to follow early in 1980. At 5 p.m., when the rain slacked a little, Lakshmi Shankar came to sing for Krishnaji. It was in the hall, about thirty of us were there. Jayalakshmi brought Mani Iyer, who sat beside Krishnaji like a carved ball of dark wood. Then, their combined presence evoked singing that was marvelous, all devotional songs, they seemed to come from deep inside, a reverie, substances of longing, sorrow, and supplication. Sitting in the dark hall, she became an ancient monument figure. It seemed deep inside whatever is the Indian mind and heart, a distillation of centuries. At the end, she came forward, touched her forehead to the ground before Krishnaji, and turned slightly to touch Mani Iyer's feet, obeisance to God and to greatness. I talked afterward a little with Shankar's'—that's the student at Brockwood—'mother, Mrs. Ramachandrin, and his sister. Shankar and his parents had talked to Krishnaji before the concert. The rain continued. That was that Christmas in Madras.' It was wonderful when she sang.

S: Yes, yes.

M: December twenty-sixth. 'The rain continues. It was heavy in the night and all day. There is flooding. Krishnaji wanted to have others come to the 9:30 a.m. meeting, the second combined Foundations meetings, but I pointed out that Krishnamurti trustees had come all the way from England and America for meetings on Foundation matters, and so the meeting was with them only. "Would you be more responsible if I went away?" he asked. He told them how he had often told me that he wanted to disappear.'

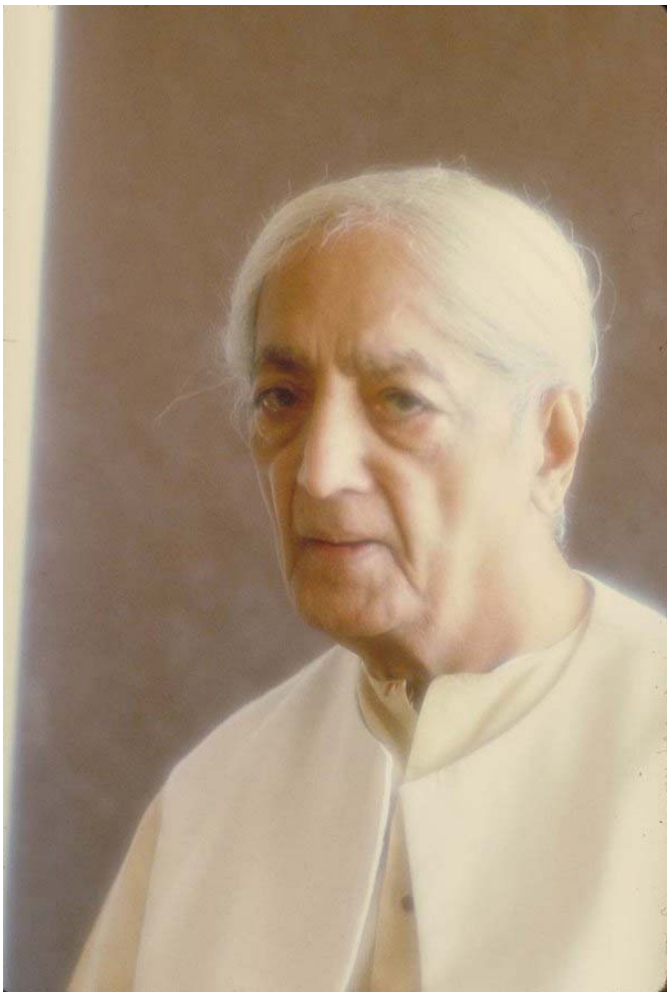
December twenty-seventh. 'The rain is continuing. At 9:30 a.m., there was the third and final combined Foundations meeting. The subject was the subtleties of interpretation and what it means to spread the teachings. We must speak out of what we understand. It may not be the totality of the teachings, but what we have seen we can communicate. At 4 p.m., we finished the international publications meeting.'

The twenty-eighth. 'The rain continues. In the morning, Pupul took Nelly, Evelyne, and me to the handicraft wholesaler where they proudly showed us their samples of lovely cottons, etcetera, but when we tried to buy some, almost all are unavailable. I did buy a green cotton full smock-like top for 4 rupees 25 ($2.94). In the afternoon, I went to town again with Evelyne and Scott, who were looking for presents. I bought some tussor silk for pants. The sights of the slums in the rain are numbing: women washing their cooking pots in street water, wet and filth everywhere. Outside the shop an old beggar angrily waved away a man with a child trying to keep the foreigners, us, for himself to beg. A snake charmer catching sight of me in the doorway waved his wretched cobra.'

S: Yes, yes. India.

M: December twenty-ninth. 'I woke up at 1 a.m. with stomach trouble. Dr. Parchure says it is a "chill in the stomach."' [S chuckles.] 'Whatever the cause, the two pills of something called Intestipan worked instantly, but I felt dead tired and weak all day. I stayed in my room, read, slept, and ate nothing but tea and toast. Nandini arrived last night. David Shainberg and son both arrive this evening. The rain continues. There have been fifteen inches since Monday.' That's in five days. 'Tomorrow the first talk is scheduled. Krishnaji says even a little sun will dry it out. He is bored with all this rain and inaction, and wants to talk.'



December thirtieth. 'Wisps of sunlight gave hope in the morning. Krishnaji and I walked down to look at the driveway, and a lake there had diminished considerably. But later the rain began again. Shainberg was at lunch upstairs, and later at supper, too. I feel better today and was at all meals. I slept after lunch. By 4 p.m., it was obvious the talk could not be held in the garden, so Krishnaji held a discussion in the hall. It was so crowded, I sat out in the landing on the staircase.' That's a big hall; it can hold a lot of people.

The last day of the year. 'Sun at last! A clear, beautiful day. I did some ironing on a stool with a towel on it and a tiny electric iron that has to be switched off after sitting and heating, and then on again when it cools, or there is a shock. At lunch, there was Krishnaji, Sunanda, Nandini, me, and a Dr. Ravindra, an Indian professor of physics and religion at Halifax University.' He's a nice man.

S: Yes.

M: 'In conversation, Krishnaji said a person with a total view could not be concerned with a particular one, i.e., such a person could never be a scientist, artist, etcetera. He or she would only be concerned with the totality; he would teach that, nothing else. I put forth a question of a person of genius, Beethoven, as Krishnaji likes him so much' [both chuckle], 'who might be an egocentric man but at moments of creation that ego was not functioning, was in suspension, a crack of light coming through. I said I wasn't discussing whether that light was the same as the total light but only whether the act of creation could come about in a non-ego instant. This led to relationship versus affect, between truth and actuality. Actuality cannot touch truth, hence there is no relationship, as Krishnaji defines it, but truth can affect actuality. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji held this year's first Madras public talk in the gardens of Vasanta Vihar. End of 1978.'

S: Terrific.

Portrait of Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: January first, 1979. 'Krishnaji came down early as he does each morning to wish me a good morning, but today he wished me a Happy New Year. He picked a little white blossom from the vine off the veranda and gave it to me. These have an intense, sweet smell. It was another clear, sunny day and a quiet one as Krishnaji rested until his second Madras talk in the garden at 5 p.m.'

The second. 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a discussion in the Vasanta Vihar hall with a small group who actually did the discussing sitting in a circle while a large group sat around as observers. The subject was: What is a religious life? Participating in the small group discussing with Krishnaji were: Achyut, Pupul, Sunanda, David Shainberg, Evelyne Blau, Nelly Digby, Narayan, Rajesh, Krishnakutti, and me. In the afternoon, the ever-around-the-corner stomach symptoms hit me again, but Dr. Parchure's pills controlled things, and I was able to go at 4 p.m. with Nandini and Pupul to tea at Mrs. Jayalakshmi's. Though it is only around the corner, she came quite formally to take us in her car. It is a different house, though nearby the one I went to in 1965. Her house is in the back, and her son and daughter-in-law live in one in the front. A pretty garden of flowering shrubs and stone statues separates the two houses.' That was where I first saw a collection of Nandis…'

S: Ah, Nandis, yes.

M: '…which led to my admiration and her asking, "Do you think Krishnaji would like one for Ojai?" I said, well, I can't speak for him, but I should imagine he would be delighted, but ask him. So, she did, and he said, "Oh yes." So, she had made what you see outside this house.[2] And then at some point later, when I wasn't there in India and the first one was delivered, he said, "Oh, that's nice. It'd be nice to have two of them." Well, you know, it's quite an investment [S laughs] because it's big, as you know.

S: Yes, and they're carved out of granite.

M: …made out of black granite. So, he had spoken, and that was it.

S: [laughs again] And a second one was produced.

M: We will get, if we live so long as to finish these discussions, to another trip when I was there when they were delivered, and they were put, if you remember, there was the office, and then some steps down to the ground, and there were two…

S: Ah, yes, ledges. On the level of the top step.

M: Yes. And so, they were placed there. And when we came out in the morning, they'd been garlanded in marigolds. [Laughs.]

S: [softly] Yes, yes, I remember. I was there that year as well. [Chuckles again.]

M: As I said, '…a pretty garden of flowering shrubs and stone statues separates the two houses. Parameshwaran was there to serve. "He belongs to me," said Jayalakshmi.' [S laughs.] 'Apparently, she employed him first and one feels each plays the correct and pleasing role in the other's life. This has been some kind barrier between Jayalakshmi and Pupul and Nandini.'

S: Yes.

M: 'I brought this meeting about by asking if I could come to see her and bring Nandini and Pupul. She showed us photos of Krishnaji at my request, which led to looking with admiration at her collection of bronze and stone statues. But what really broke the ice was our asking to see her saris.'

S: Yes. She had extraordinary saris, I remember.

M: 'She brought out superb South Indian saris of heavy Kancheepuram silks.' Kancheepuram is where they were made. Both Pupul and she knew the very weavers of some. She knew Pupul's knowledge of them equaled her own, and her face lit up talking about them. We were a proper audience. I spoke of one she wore last weekend, a beauty of dark blue and turquoise, and she gave it to me! It is splendidly beautiful, and with Nandini's help, I wore it in the evening. Nandini put it on me, then we went upstairs for Krishnaji's inspection. He looked very critically, walked around me, and said, "Excellent, you can wear them."' [S laughs.] 'I relaxed into the sense of wearing something beautiful and therefore felt at ease. I was told I looked right by the critical eyes of the ladies, so I abandoned my assertions that Western women look to be in a costume when they wear saris.' That's what I always felt, Western women looked idiotic in saris.

S: That's true. And I have said to many people that you're the only Western woman I ever saw who could wear a sari.

M: I've seen others, but I can't think who.

S: You're the only one I've seen.

M: Well, I don't do it very often. In fact, I don't do it anymore. I'm wondering where this particular sari is. I had it at Brockwood. Anyway, 'So, I abandoned my assertion that Western women look to be in costume when they try to wear saris and went off in this one to a dinner at Prema Srinivasan's. All but Krishnaji went. Her house is so like a Beverly Hills home, with flowers and sandalwood. A woman sang before dinner. We dined at tables on a terrace. The food was excellent, and Prema's taste and care were in everything.'

S: I remember that dinner.

M: Yes. Yes, I do, too.

January third. 'Again, the small group discussed at 9:30 a.m. with Krishnaji while a large group listened. I stayed out of it this time because Michael was to film it. But because of complaints about the lights, he didn't. At lunch were Krishnaji, David Shainberg,

Professor Ravi Ravindra, Nandini, Pama, and I. At 5 p.m., Sunanda, Pupul, and I went to Prema's to look at sample saris she is collecting for an October showing in Bombay. She works with weavers in Kancheepuram, and I ordered a very pretty one, and Sunanda gave me a creamy cotton one she had from the last sale. Dr. Sudarshan sat in with Krishnaji at supper.' Have we met him in this? I don't think so. He was a physicist.

S: That's right. Wasn't he eventually at the University of Texas, or something like that?

M: I think so.

The fourth of January. 'At 9:30 a.m., there was again a small group discussing with Krishnaji in the hall with a large group listening. I rejoined the small group. The theme was still what is a religious life, but a professor from Madras University slowed it down with questions on technique. During the discussion, Evelyne received a telephone call from Lou that her sister had died suddenly of a heart attack in New York. Evelyne was very upset. Lou urged her to fly home now, but after telephoning the family, she hesitated, wanting to finish the film work here. Her mother has not been told. I arranged for her to use the telephone in Sunanda's room. Krishnaji came in with me, telling me, "You be there when I see her," and said to her that he was sorry, holding her hand with both of his. She didn't come to lunch but made a decision to complete her work here, and then fly back. Shainberg was at lunch, but later flew with his son Steven to Delhi and on to New York. In the afternoon, Krishnaji and two cars of us drove with Padma Santhanam to a beach south of Madras where there is land to build an enlargement of The School.' That's the Krishnamurti Foundation School in Madras. Krishnaji didn't like it at all: a flat expanse of sand, no trees or vegetation, too far to bring children, etcetera. We came back past the TS Damodar Gardens, which is for sale, and Krishnaji is now keen for that. Evelyne joined us for supper.'

S: I remember the first version of The School before it was moved to the Damodar Gardens. It was made mostly out of bamboo, with a banana and coconut leaf roof. It was beautiful. It was just so charming, so sweet, and I was so impressed with it because these wonderful flimsy little buildings were so elegant with these beautiful little children in them.

M: Yes.

S: It was just magical. [M chuckles.]

M: January fifth. 'At 8 a.m., while Krishnaji spent the day resting, three cars of us drove to Kancheepuram. Evelyne didn't come. I was with Nandini, Prema, and Scott. Prema was very informative historically, and she had arranged the day. We visited a big temple first, and saw the temple elephant confined with leg chains as he is on a must…' You know?

S: Yes. And I remember him holding up his leg with his chain.

M: Yes, it was terrible.

S: And just looking so piteously at us, showing us his terrible situation. It was really, really awful.

M: 'We threw him a large bunch of bananas, which he ate as if it were one. And he seemed to sense our sympathy, holding up a leg that seemed to have a sore. I had my first glimpse of Brahmin priests, heads shaven to a pigtail or bun in the back, earrings in the right ear, of course the sacred thread, complicated dhoti swaddling them, then a large v of white ash with vertical red line on the forehead, chest, and each upper arm. We were shown by the light of a paper dipped in oil, the statues of a deity in a dark shrine. Then, the head priest, a hugely fat one, put in our cupped palms water with saffron and camphor to touch with lips and pour remains on one's head. A round crown was touched to each head. Then some leaves in each palm, all this a blessing. Prema had arranged a showing of the temple jewels'—that was fascinating—'which were carried forth in chests and taken out one by one for us to see but not touch. A crown for the god in gold inlayed with uncut diamonds, huge emeralds, smaller goddess crowns, some long necklaces, and most exquisite, a little hand, a palm of blessing about five inches high, all gold, and the palm encrusted with diamonds.' Do you remember that?

S: Yes, very much so.

M: 'All these are shown on certain festivals when they ornament the statues of the deities. We then went into another temple with a large and splendid Nandi facing it. Inside the courtyard, there were niches with bas-reliefs of Shiva and Parvati. Many of Shiva dancing, a smile on his face, right leg straight up alongside his ear, and a bashful Parvati…' That was the consort of Shiva.

S: Yes.

M: '…kneeling beside him. This was something about Shiva's dance, when he out-danced his wife.' [Chuckles.] 'Everything he did, she did, until finally he won by raising the leg up.' She was too bashful to do that. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'In one most charming niche, there was a Nandi dancing beside Shiva, all smiles. One can see fragments of the paint that was on all these, but it is largely gone.' They are restoring some of the statues, but it is ugly, fake-looking restoration. 'We then went to a sari shop for the famous Kancheepuram heavy silk saris.' That's where those all come from, very South Indian. Apparently, if you know about such things, you can tell by looking at a woman's sari where it came from, or if it came from there. 'A pre-Pongal sale was on, so there was not too much choice left. But I bought one for Mrs. Parchure, and one for Evelyne, who didn't come, and green and red one for me.' I don't remember it; I've given away most of my Indian clothes. 'Then, amazingly, we were served lunch brought by Prema in a back room. Lunch for fourteen, even water and towels and soap to wash our hands were brought. After lunch we went to the weavers where the saris are made, and Pupul was greeted as an empress.' [S chuckles.] She knew all of these when she was doing the handcraft business. ‘The best weaver of all, now retired, was sent for, and came quickly to greet and be greeted. They showed their present wares, and Pupul saw how the level had deteriorated in the short time since she gave up all this. There were three saris left from her designs. Nandini bought two, and I bought one as a present for Sunanda. We drove back to Vasanta Vihar. Krishnaji came, and inspected the loot with interest and approval.’

S: Yes.

M: ‘Mrs. Parchure was very shy, but I think was pleased with her sari. So was Evelyne with hers, a red, very traditional one, and wore it to the Santhanams, where all of us except Krishnaji, including the Brockwood people, Frances, Eleanor, Kathy, Julie, were invited. I wore a gray print sari. Nandini brought it and helped me to put it on. The food was very good and simpler than we have had. The house was large and comfortable with a large garden.’

S: We have to end it there as we’re out of tape.

M: Alright, we pick it up from here next time.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Achyut was a nationally acclaimed freedom fighter for many years, fighting for India’s independence.

[2] They were at the remodeled Pine Cottage during this recording.

Issue 57: January 6, 1979 to February 4, 1979

Krishnaji's tour of India finally comes to an end with some public talks in Madras and Bombay that Mary feels are exceptional, but the tolls of this tour on both Krishnaji and Mary are substantive. Mary and Dr. Parchure are both worried about the consequences for Krishnaji. And we can clearly see why Krishnaji, in previous years and in subsequent years, discouraged Mary from coming to India for her own sake.

While in Madras, Krishnaji has an interesting discussion on what he, Krishnaji, was like as a boy, with a man who had tutored Krishnaji when he was young. The substance of that discussion is not directly reported by Mary, but Mary's reflections on that discussion are fascinating, and ring true.

For the first time we get to see, through Mary's eyes, the frantic, frenetic, hysterical crowds in Bombay that we have only been told about in previous issues, and which really existed nowhere else.

Mary: We begin today on January sixth, 1979, and we're in Madras. 'As I seem to have embarked on wearing saris, I was glad to go to town with Prema to arrange the making of the blouses and extra petticoats that wearing saris requires. Also, I went in earlier with Nandini for essentials of life: a box of tissues, some medicine, and for the obvious Newsweek and Time. At 4 p.m., I put on a cotton sari by myself, which for now amuses Krishnaji,' [S chuckles] 'and which I feared, but of which he approves. And at 5 p.m., he gave his third talk, a very great one[1], which seemed to fill the mind and dissolve it. I feel silent, disembodied after such a talk.'

The next day: 'In the morning, Evelyne, Michael, and Bonnie shot film of the TS beach and other places Krishnaji used to walk. Nelly and I went there at 10 a.m. to join them. Joy Mills and a Mr. Ballard were in Krishnaji's old quarters and balcony, and Joy Mills recounted events of the early days. It was strange to be in those rooms and that place. Uma, Narayan's sister, and her husband, Ramaswamy, were at lunch. She is shy, smiling slowly when you talk to her, but withdraws into a quiet melancholy. Krishnaji teases her, is wooing her to leave a good teaching job at Delhi University to come with her husband to start a college at Rishi Valley. He is sweeping in his enthusiasm and disregards all the practical problems involved.' [Chuckling; S chuckles, too.] 'At 5 p.m., Krishnaji gave his fourth talk. "Order is sequence in space."' That was a quote from the talk. 'He had a cough, problem. Dr. Parchure brought him a glass of water and laid it on the dais, but he didn't see it until Kathy Harris pushed it forward. The talk was tremendous[2]; he went into fear, thought, and the foundations of order.'

The eighth. 'Mrs. Gandhi came to Madras to see Krishnaji. She arrived here with Pupul at 10:45 a.m. and spent an hour with Krishnaji, after which she rested in Pupul's cottage. Then, before lunch, she met in the hall those who were lunching here, Evelyne, Nelly, Frances, Scott, etcetera. Pupul then brought her to Krishnaji's upstairs dining room, and left her with me while she went to speak to Krishnaji.' You have to make conversation for something like that.

S: Yes, of course.

M: 'I asked her about the jail she was recently in for a week. What was it like? She answered quite readily, a cell for six but she had it to herself, beds are raised, stone shelves. Hers had no mattress but a quilt to lie on and one over her. "I am used to a hard bed so it was alright."' [S chuckles.] 'Food was brought from her home, newspapers were allowed, and she brought books. The bars on the window bothered her, which was a little surprising to me as all houses in India seem to have barred windows.'

S: Yes. [Chuckles.]

M: 'But she hung blankets over the ones in her cell. It was the cell in which she had put George Fernandez when she was Prime Minister.' Fernandez was critical or something, so she jailed him.

S: Ah, yes, yes.

M: 'On Christmas Day, she invited an Australian girl in an adjoining cell to have lunch with her, thinking she must be a Christian. The Australian turned out to have been converted to Islam.' [Both laugh.] 'She was in on a drug smuggling charge.' [Laughs again.] 'Krishnaji, Mrs. Gandhi, Pupul, and I were at the lunch table. Krishnaji went out of his way to be the host; to entertain her, he told her some of his best funny stories. She listened expressionless until the joke at the end, then smiled.' [S chuckles.] 'It was as if she were barely listening until the cue came to smile. Krishnaji tells these stories with such charm and enjoyment that it is always a pleasure to listen to him, but there was no relaxation with her. Mrs. Gandhi is a smallish, very held-in woman. She wore a black and white sari, not the taste of Pupul's, but she has nice neat feet and cared-for toenails.' You can't say I don't give you descriptions in this thing. [S laughs heartily.]

S: Historically, all very important.

M: It doesn't say whether…no, she wouldn't paint her nails; they don't in India, at least they didn't then. 'She was uncertain about removing her sandals outside the dining room and followed what Pupul did. After lunch, she went off in her car accompanied by an enormous, tough-looking bodyguard. She reappeared in the big hall shortly after 5 p.m. when M.S. Subbulakshmi had begun to sing. Pupul went to sit by her. She listened without expression. One felt a woman in whom there was little enjoyment or affection. After about forty minutes, she left quietly and Krishnaji got up to see her to her car. In the morning, she had spent an hour with him, and he said that they talked for only about ten minutes of that time; the rest was sitting silently. I had the impression that if she gave up politics, she would be left with nothing, without inner resources. The concert was very fine, but too long.'

S: In another year, there was another experience of her funny lack of feeling or sensitivity.

M: Well, you must've been present in all this.

S: Yes. And at that other year, when she came to Rishi Valley.

M: Mmm, to case it for the grandchildren?

S: Yes, I think so, and it was a child, I think, of…

M: Must've been Sanjay.

S: It might have been, or it might have been Rajiv, as I met him also at some point; but I can't remember when. Anyway, we were at a school dance performance under that gorgeous banyan tree; I was sitting just behind Indira and this irksome child, who turns to his grandmother, Indira, and says, "How long do you think it would take to cut down this tree?" [M chuckles.] And instead of saying something like, "Oh, why would you want to cut this down?" or "It would be a pity to cut down such a venerable old tree," or anything like that, she said, "Well, it would depend on the saw that you used." I was astonished. There was no appreciation of that tree, of its beauty, that is a magnificent tree. It's one of the biggest in India, isn't it?

M: I don't know if it's the biggest or one of the biggest, but it's a very ancient and beautiful tree, and was one of the reasons that Krishnaji wanted the school there.

S: Yes.

M: It's enormous!

January ninth. 'At 7:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a public discussion in the garden. Mostly blustery dull questions were asked.' I'm very judgmental.

S: [chuckles] I would call it discerning.

M: The next day: 'I went with Nelly to Madras Museum to see bronzes and wood carvings, which I enjoyed very much. Nelly never stops twitching with criticism of everything, but I think she had enjoyed things. We stopped at the Bank of America to cash travelers' checks, which takes a long time in a long line. Between the heat and standing, my leg got very puffy. Pupul left for Bombay. Krishnaji rested. Scott Forbes left for Brockwood. Soon we will all start moving westward. I look forward to it.'

The next day there is only 'at 7:30 a.m. another public discussion held by Krishnaji in the garden.'

January twelfth. ‘At 7:30 a.m., Sunanda, Prema, Nelly, and I went in Prema’s car to Mahabalipuram. We paused to look at a large hotel called Fisherman’s Cove on a beautiful beach. The temple by the sea was beautiful. We went to others and then had a picnic breakfast supplied by Prema, sitting in the shade of a huge rock. She does everything so nicely and with such enthusiasm. We saw the long rock carving of Krishna holding up the mountain against a storm, a lovely carving of a cow being milked and licking her little calf which nestles against her. Other carvings, too, of gods and a man doing difficult austerities with a Nandi copying him.’ [Chuckles.] ‘We came back with air conditioning in the car, stopped at Prema’s beach house for coconut juice, and were back at Vasanta Vihar for lunch. Evelyne left at 4 p.m. for Delhi and on to Los Angeles. At 5 p.m., there was a concert by Palghat Mani Iyer and Professor Ramanathan, who sang very well, and later told me he is at Wesleyan University.’

S: The university here in America?

M: Yes. They have a big Indian music program.

S: Mmm.

M: Philippa studied there.

January thirteenth. ‘I woke up with a sore throat. There was a discussion at breakfast with Krishnaji, Achyut, Sunanda, Radha, and I on what Krishnaji means by no recording. I asked if he meant no recall. He said, “In insight, there is no recording.” I asked him about the Notebook that he wrote, in which he describes what happened earlier. He said, it was not written using memory. The words happened at the moment of writing. Before the talk, Krishnaji’s fifth in Madras, Narayan spoke about the schools and I made an appeal for donations explaining a little about the American and English Foundations. Krishnaji gave a deeply moving talk[3] on a religious life.’

The fourteenth. ‘Krishnaji called me to talk to him with Achyut and Sunanda about the TS and Damodar Gardens, which the KFI wants to get for enlargement of the Madras school. Radha told Achyut that they might want two TS members on the board. Krishnaji asked me what I thought. I spoke for myself and perhaps those like Erna and Theo who feel that a TS member on the board is a blurring of Krishnaji’s break with the TS. Krishnaji got impatient with what I said; I stayed with it, and pointed out his statement that he would have not allowed Rajagopal to edit his books if he’d known he was still a member of the TS. Krishnaji wants this land, and said I was being stupid. I said, perhaps, but he asked me what I thought about the land, so I told him. Achyut tried to minimize the importance; he is trying to make the TS’s demands acceptable to us, instead of the other way around. I said Radha, because of her personal qualities, has been accepted in spite of being with the TS—she was already a trustee—and that has rankled with some. Finally, Krishnaji said, “Do you feel it?” meaning something else was at work. I said, I didn’t have his perception, and the decision was obviously his. But he wouldn’t accept that. “It is your responsibility.” I said he was trying to force me to say something I didn’t feel. Either I said it or kept silent. Finally, we were “interrupted” so it ended. But later he told me that he had felt "a presence" in the room as we talked. That one must remain open to "something" being at work. The TS was meant to help the work of the World Teacher; perhaps this is an opening. At lunch were Krishnaji, Mr. and Mrs. John Coats, Joy Mills, Radha, Achyut, Pama, and me. Mr. Coats was amiably chatty, and his wife was the same. Only at the end of lunch did Krishnaji bring up interest in getting the land. Coats and Joy Mills said they thought it a good idea. It was agreed that some of us should look at the land tomorrow. On leaving, Joy Mills asked Krishnaji, rather archly, if he would like to live in his old rooms at the TS.' [S laughs.] The TS people were always trying to net him, as it were, or catch him again.

S: Yes, yes. Yes.

M: 'He looked startled and a little suspicious. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji gave his sixth and final talk of the series, a long, deep one[4] on many things. His voice was deep and from far off. He put tremendous energy into it, and at the end sat in silence while the large crowd seemed not to breathe. As he moved toward the house, people flowed in a tide around him, touching him in worship. He went upstairs alone, and some impulse made me follow. He stood in the dark, and held onto me for a moment when I came to him, and felt he would faint. He sat on the floor, and said, "Don't touch me now."' He had fainted sometimes; I was always afraid he'd hurt himself.

S: Yes.

M: 'I sat near him and in a few seconds he fainted slowly toward me. He lay there several minutes, then came to and said he was alright. He went into the bathroom, washed, changed from a dhoti to pajamas[5] and said he wanted to walk. The crowd had streamed away, so he went out and walked with Jayalakshmi. At supper, he ate with everyone as usual, and afterwards stayed far too long talking to the Bangalore school people: Kabir, and Anataswami, and a third one.' I don't remember who the third one was.

S: Let me just mention something about Coats here, John Coats.

M: Mm.

S: And I don't know if I mentioned this earlier or not, but on my first visit to India, I was given an introduction to him, because I wanted to see the TS, and the library, where Krishnaji had lived, etcetera. Anyway, he was absolutely charming to me, but the remarkable thing is that he told me that his Uncle Coats had owned Brockwood.

M: Yes, he built the tower.

S: …yes, had built the tower, and that John Coats had played at Brockwood, visiting him when he was a boy. [M chuckles.] So, there's this funny…I don't know what it is.

M: He also, I think it was this meal, although I don't mention it in here, when I was put next to him, I told him about when we bought Brockwood that we heard there was a buried treasure.

S: Yes.

M: We hadn't found it, but I asked, if we ever do find it, does it belong to us or to him? And he said, "My dear, it belongs to you." [Both laugh heartily.]

S: He was a very nice man.

M: Yes, a nice man.

The fifteenth. 'At breakfast were Krishnaji, Nelly, Radha, Achyut, Pama, and me. There was a discussion of Sanskrit meanings, Buddhist doctrine, etcetera. At 10 a.m., Achyut, Pama, Sunanda, and I met Radha and John Coats and went to look at Damodar Gardens then Besant Gardens as possible school sites. I think the TS needs money and wants to sell. Present market prices are two lakhs[6] an acre, which would make buying prohibitive. Damodar Gardens' houses and thirteen acres are suitable but there is presently an inactive plan by the city to enlarge the road, which would ruin it. Besant Gardens is larger, about forty to fifty acres we could use. I have a feeling that their price and demands will be stiff. Krishnaji during all this was meeting some students and having a quiet lunch. He needs rest and is not taking it. Nelly and Eleanor Hawksley left in the afternoon and so did the Mendizzas. I rested in the afternoon with my sniffles. Vatsala came and went. Sunanda says she went to a cricket match on Saturday in preference to Krishnaji's talk.' I remember that. It was very much noted that she did that in preference to the talk.

S: Yes.

M: The sixteenth. 'At breakfast, Krishnaji, Radha, Sunanda, Pama, and I had a discussion on reincarnation of which this is a rough summary: There is a stream, which is thought, attachments, etcetera. Thought is a material process. If when the body dies, attachment, etcetera, has not been understood and ended, that attachment, that thought continues as part of the stream. It can manifest in another but it is not reincarnation of a total person. Ego is an illusion.' [Chuckles.] 'The desire for reincarnation—the wanting another chance is part of attachment, thought, the stream. Karma—cause and effect, is meaningless if one sees this. After breakfast, Sunanda and I went to buy suitcases. I sent flowers to Jayalakshmi, Prema, and Radha. There was an Indian Express man at lunch. Mrs. Gandhi, when she came to Madras, said she would come to see Krishnaji, which was printed, so people are asking what Krishnaji said to her. The Indian Express man asked Krishnaji, but he smiled and shook his head. At 6 p.m., Sunanda and I went to a Kalakshetra dance performance put on by Rukmini Devi.' Rukmini Devi, if she hasn't already appeared in this account, she was the aunt of Radha; she was also the wife of, um…

S: George Arundale.

M: Yes, from the old Theosophical days.

S: So, she was really Rukmini Arundale.

M: Yes, but they call her Rukmini Devi at her dance school.

S: And also, she is the aunt of Professor Krishna.

M: That's right. 'Rukmini Arundale, hard-faced and swollen-looking, lumbered about in an orange sari looking something like Marlon Brando in The Godfather. She didn't return Sunanda's Namaste gesture…'

S: Yes.

M: 'I didn't expect any recognition from her having come to tea at the thatched cottage in Huizen.' Huizen was where we stayed in 1967…

S: In Holland?

M: In Holland.

S: Yes. Oh, she was there at that time, I remember your telling about it.

M: '…but she eyed us as we sat in the theater waiting for the performance to start. So, perhaps is keeping tabs.' I remember she came to Huizen to see what this was, who are these new people around Krishnaji. It was quite something. She sat appraising and looking at everything. Krishnaji was extremely polite with her at the time. 'We left after one act as Prema had to…' do something about dinner. 'Krishnaji, Pama, Parchure, Vatsala, and Prema's children.' Oh, we were dining with her, that's it.

January seventeenth. 'Mr. and Mrs. Rex Henry were at breakfast. Afterward, Amru'—she is another of Pupul's sisters, also then in Bombay—'and then Sivakamu and her brother Yadnya came to greet Krishnaji. Sunanda and I went with Padma Santhanam to visit The School KFI. It's a nice building, plaster half the way up, then lattice sides and palm leaf thatch on the roof. Children are two-and-a-half to ten years of age. It seems an excellent school. The children sang, danced, and did a little play—most endearing children. One little boy with enormous black eyes was as beautiful a child as I've ever seen. A little French girl was looking at pictures by herself, not understanding English, and it was touching as she was so pleased when I talked to her in French. She came and sat with me when the other children danced. Padma is responsible for this school, and it is a fine job. She and her husband lunched with us at Vasanta Vihar. At 4 p.m., I went to tea with Mr. and Mrs. Rex Henry at the Olcott Bungalow in the TS. We sat on the porch outside and were joined by Dick Clarke. He was more than willing to discuss Esoteric Section meetings when I said I knew nothing about it. It seems they meet weekly, members only, and they must be punctual at 8 a.m. and give a password to get in, sign an attendance book, then facing the pictures.' Now the pictures, were you ever in that room?

S: Yes.

M: They have pictures of the Masters.

S: Yes, painted by…

M: By some woman.

S: Yes.

M: 'They sign an attendance book and then facing the pictures of the Masters, they recite together some sort of salute, sit, and then the one conducting the meeting (usually Radha) addresses them, speaking on something for forty-five minutes, after which there is some sort of pledge, and it is promptly over.'

S: The ES, just to say, is the Esoteric Section of the Theosophical Society, an elite inner circle, and Radha is the head of it.

M: Yes. 'He went on to say that Radha would speak on something like probation and the Masters, and he once asked her how she reconciles such things with her interest in Krishnaji, but got an inconclusive reply.' [Both chuckle.]

The eighteenth of January. Let me speak to you off the recorder.

[The tape recorder cuts off, and then on again.]

'Radha came to breakfast.'

S: Yes, and just to explain here why the recorder was switched off and on again, you were telling me that you want me to be careful about whether or not, and when, if ever, what you are about to tell me should ever go out. Okay.

M: Alright. And then, before my reading it, I'll just say that I'm asking Scott please to not reveal this in any way that would cause difficulties for Radha.

S: Yes.[7]

M: 'So, she came to breakfast. The conversation turned to Arundale and Rukmini, etcetera. Radha described Rukmini's neglect of him when he was ill and dying; though diabetic, he was fed sugar by some quack doctor. Also, Rukmini used to hang around with musicians in the days when she still danced.[8] Arundale would sometimes accompany her on tours, and young Radha Burnier was brought along to fill in and dance the dance program when Rukmini began to be heavy. It was Radha at these times who tried to help Arundale when he was ill. In his last days, he said to Rukmini, "You're a hard woman." So went the reporting on all this ancient history.'

'Krishnaji said he would like to ask the only surviving person who "knew the boy" [meaning himseslf] when he was found, Dick Clarke, about what happened. So, it was arranged that Jayalakshmi would invite him for lunch. It was a very hot day but a bit cooler at Jayalakshmi's when we all went there at 12:30 p.m. Krishnaji had on a dhoti and looked resplendent. Present were the Henrys, Mr. and Mrs. John Coats, Dick Clarke, the Santhanams, Sunanda, Pama, and me. It began with singing by a man from Kalakshetra accompanied by flute, mridangam, and tamboure. During this, Subbulakshmi, husband Sudarshan, niece Radha, and the latter's little girl came to listen. The child crawled over and sat half in my lap. After singing, nine Brahmin priests chanted; they wore their costume of dhoti, shaven heads, Vishnu marks on forehead, arms, earrings, and hand rings, etcetera. They looked a little like Iroquois.'

S: [chuckles] Yes.

M: 'The chanting went on rather relentlessly. At one point, I thought they had gone beyond stopping and would continue all day. But some sort of high sign was given for it slowed down to an om, and ended. Krishnaji handed out the rewards like diplomas: a dhoti, a banana, certain traditional leaves, and a piece of paper money. They all plucked at the money. Somehow it all seemed a business affair, in spite of their extraordinary appearance, they could have come to sell insurance. They looked around, scratched themselves while chanting, and it was very perfunctory. Subbulakshmi and family departed, and the rest sat down to Mrs. Jayalakshmi's sumptuous meal. I counted over nineteen separate things, vegetables, etcetera, without counting sweets or drinks.'

S: Yes.

M: [chuckles] 'Toward the end of lunch, Krishnaji began to ask Dick Clarke about what Krishnaji was like when they found him. Clarke seemed to remember it all clearly. Krishnaji kept at him with questions, holding Clarke's left hand and ticking off the questions on his fingers.' [Chuckles.] 'Sunanda took down in shorthand the whole conversation, which went on until 5 o'clock. I recorded bits of it on my Dictaphone. The Coats family listened raptly to it, but he and Radha had to leave midway for a TS meeting. Krishnaji seemed to feel that what "the boy" was like and whatever went on in his mind—as he kept asking—eluded him.' In other words, he seemed to feel that it eluded him.

S: And it eluded Krishnaji?

M: Yes. 'But for me, the picture was a true line throughout; the dreamy child who when punished by the school master would stand on the veranda until told to leave, who often had to be fetched home by his little brother[9], was a gentle, compliant boy who replied to his TS elders, "Whatever you say" when asked about doing something. He was polite and accepting, but not really touched by their world; it went in one ear and out the other.

He learned outward things: manners, speech, witnessed the TS goings-on, but it left little mark; he was elsewhere. He remembers vaguely standing by the Adyar River for hours, staring at it, vacant. This vacancy was some otherness that protected him, let whatever he is grow, mature very slowly. It protected him from most of the pulls of life later on, from the brutalities of Rajagopal and Rosalind. It is there today when he is "off," when he sits in Hamish Thompson's dental chair for four hours without a thought; his reality, his native place is elsewhere, as it were. I said all this to him later and at supper when we all talked a bit about it. In the Rajagopal and Rosalind times, he said he was sometimes physically beaten, but he didn't resist their violence as he hadn't fought against the wretched schoolmaster as a child. It all left no scars, just as the Theosophical beliefs did not condition his mind. Later on, returning from Jayalakshmi's, we walked near the beach, Sunanda, Pama, and Vatsala, who goes to Rishi Valley to teach, and me.'

S: Just a minute—it's just that these notes and your Dictaphone recording do not appear in the archive list, but I've seen that transcript that you made, or maybe Sunanda's notes; I have seen those with Dick Clarke talking with Krishnaji about the childhood.

M: Yes, I remember the conversation, mostly, but I don't know where the notes are.

S: I've seen the notes.

M: Oh, good.

January nineteenth. 'Very hot. This climate is becoming a bit too much. Packed. Frances McCann and Anantanarayenen to lunch. Thinking of yesterday, I told Krishnaji that though he doesn't talk definitively about what happened to him as a boy, what the concept of Masters really is, etcetera, unless he makes some statement, his own words written as a boy recounting the initiations, going to visit Masters, etcetera, will stand as his testimony. I asked to read that statement to him and let him consider if he wishes to comment. He thought for an instant only and then said, "Alright. Remind me about all this when we get to Ojai, and I'll make a statement." Radha and Vatsala at supper with Krishnaji, Sunanda, Pama, and me. We leave early tomorrow.'

The twentieth. 'Up at 4:15 a.m. Bathed and ready to leave by 5:15 a.m. Sunanda is coming next week, but Krishnaji, Pama, and I said goodbye to Parameshwaran and all the staff and left for the airport at 6 a.m. Yesterday, I gave Parameshwaran a dhoti and 700 rupees, and he seemed pleased and talked of what he would buy for his son Mani. Ganesh, the servant who cleans my room, etcetera touched my feet in farewell, which I tried to stop. Nataraj had gone ahead with the luggage and tickets, so when we arrived at the airport, there was only the farewells. Jayalakshmi had more beads for Krishnaji and for me. I felt a renewed sense of friendship with her. The Henrys were there and various others. We boarded, had a bit of a wait until some fog burned away, and then flew off. The captain invited Krishnaji and me (because I was with him) to come into the cockpit.' [Chuckles.] 'The view from there was marvelous, and a complexity of instruments at the center of the controls of the Boeing 707 that was beyond me. We landed in Bombay and coolness; a marvelous life-giving cool. There to meet us were Nandini, Pupul, and Asit, at whose apartment we are staying. We drove in his fifteen-year-old 190-D Mercedes, air-conditioned, etcetera, into the city. It seems already in the West, with twenty-story buildings everywhere, traffic that could be in Los Angeles—the feel of a Western city. Asit and his wife Minakshi, the daughters Clea, who's at Rishi Valley School, and Sonali, live in a very modern apartment on the sixth floor. Krishnaji has one bedroom; I have the other; Pupul and Nandini's mother's servants, who have cooked for Krishnaji for years, are here—Vimabhai, a thin, ancient, smiling woman in a sari that swaddles her and is often around the head, too, and a toothless man. Also the Chandmals' maid. All is very comfortable here, and one feels halfway to the West, too. The extravagance of being cool again plus an excellent simple tasting lunch began the climb up to normality again for me. Nandini's sons, Gansham and Vikram, came to see Krishnaji. I had letters from Amanda.'

January twenty-first. 'There was a conversation at breakfast between Krishnaji, Pupul, Nandini, Achyut, Pama, Asit, and me on whether the "flame" of the teachings can be handed on. Is insight total, or can it be confined to a particular area or subject? I had a nap in the afternoon, and then at 6 p.m. we all walked around the race course—a good place to walk, and the only open space for miles around.'

The twenty-second. 'A handful of local psychoanalysts led by a Mr. Nathain came to talk to Krishnaji at 9:30 a.m. They hadn't a clue.' [Chuckles.] 'Afterwards, Pupul and Nandini took me to the cottage industries.' That was a place where they sold all the handcrafted things; they had all sorts of things there. 'I bought a silk sari. I had another nap in the afternoon, and again we all walked around the race course.'

The next day. 'I shopped with Nandini and Minakshi Chandmal at the Taj Hotel. Another nap in the afternoon. Sunanda arrived with the balance of shirts from Kannan.' Kannan was the tailor and shirt-maker and all that in Madras. I know you got some of his things, too.

S: Yes. I came to know him well over the years. He had been a student at Rishi Valley, and he had a son there who eventually came to Brockwood.

M: 'Asit took many photos of Krishnaji, and again we walked around the race course.'

The twenty-fourth. 'I went with Nandini to the Kolhapuri chappal store in the morning. Then lunched alone with Krishnaji. Krishnaji's first talk was at 6:15 p.m. I went ahead at 5 p.m. with Pupul. There was a huge crowd. The usual familiar faces were in the foreground, Rajneesh's U.S. followers smoking pot, all kinds and ages of people. I sat with Nandini and family members behind and to the side of Krishnaji on a small platform in order to get quickly to the car parked just behind.' It was a few feet, and we could rush to the car. 'Krishnaji came with Asit. In the talks, he answered his own question, which he has been putting to us: "What is the cause of the degeneration in this country, in the world?" It is the intellect, its overuse. Everything is reduced to a theory or a concept. We do not see things as they are, holistically, but as theories. When Krishnaji stopped speaking, he sat silently for a few moments, and Nandini and I went straight to the car, only yards away. But as Krishnaji rose, so did a wave of people pressing forward to touch him for darshan'—you know, people think they get a blessing if they can touch a holy man. 'He was caught against the wall by people kissing his hands, his feet, touching him, and in a hysteria of reverence. Asit fought to keep the door of the car open and let him get in. It took minutes. And when he managed it, hands came through the window to touch him. Krishnaji was a figure of compassion, touching as many hands as he could, saying, "Be careful. Be careful." Nandini called out, "You will be hurt." And the answer came back in Marathi, "It doesn't matter." The chauffeur edged the car forward, but the crowd ahead obliterated the road. It took about ten minutes to drive the 100 or so feet to the street. In the morning, Krishnaji had said, "What will I talk about? Well, I suppose it will come. The day it doesn't, I'll shut up shop."' [S chuckles.]

January twenty-fifth. 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji talked to Pupul, Nandini, Asit, Dr. Parchure, Radha, Achyut, Pama, Sunanda, and me about the events in Madras, and Ootacamund in 1948, in Gstaad and Malibu, etcetera'—usually referred to as "the process"—'in response to the question about what these events meant. He said he remembers none of it. Pupul described her and Nandini's witness to the 1948 events, and I described similar things that had happened to Krishnaji in my presence. Krishnaji asked if we could have imagined it, and this was ruled out. There was too much similarity in our reporting, and some of the events reported in Pergine[10], and later with Vanda that she had reported. The conversation lasted till 12:45 p.m., and was taped on cassette by Asit. It will probably be kept as a confidential record for a while in the three archives. It was too long to report here, but no clear answer emerged. The subject needs further talk, and Krishnaji seemed disposed to continue it while here. Mr. and Mrs. Patel came to lunch and brought firey food.' [S chuckles.] 'At 5 p.m., I went with Sunanda and Pama for a drive and had tea at an enormous new hotel, the Oberroi Sheraton. It could've been in Los Angeles, New York, or Las Vegas. I was dazed to find Wednesday's Herald Tribune on sale, the first glimpse since October thirty-first. England is deep in snow; Heathrow and Gatwick are closed. I dined with Sunanda and Pama and Radha across the street from where Krishnaji and I are staying, on the twenty-fifth-floor VIP penthouse of the Indian Express guest apartment, which has been lent to them and Achyut by Mr. Goenkar, who owns the Indian Express newspaper—it is a pro-Janata and anti-Indira political party.'

January twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji held a discussion at 9:30 a.m. with about sixty invited guests. It was not a good group for discussion. At lunch were Radha, Frances McCann, Sunanda, Pama, Krishnaji, and me. Radha has given me the list of the manuscripts and letters, etcetera, sent to Krishnaji in 1950 that was part of the archives from the TS and that Rajagopal is withholding from KFA. Nandini brought me a lovely brown and black cotton sari. We walked on the race course in the late afternoon. People have discovered his walking there, and one determined family of three marched ten feet behind him all the way around.' [Both chuckle.]

S: Yes. I saw that happen in later years when I was there.

M: The next day, 'In the morning, Pupul, Nandini, Devi, Mina, and Gansham Mehta'—oh, Gansham is Nandini's son and I think Mina is his wife—'and I went shopping, first to an art place where I bought some little enamel birds, a box, and a necklace as gifts. Then, we walked across the street to the cottage industries where I bought a cotton kaftan. I had a quiet lunch with Krishnaji. At 5 p.m., I went with Pupul and Minakshi to the place where Krishnaji was to speak. Rajesh and Upasini were there from Rajghat. At 6:15 p.m., Krishnaji gave his second Bombay talk to a huge crowd. It was on: "Fear is based on thought and time." Again, he was engulfed by a crowd afterward. A man rubbed Krishnaji's hand over his face; another put Krishnaji's fingers in his mouth, so that Krishnaji sat in the car when he finally reached it with his hands palm up, unclean. Nandini, sitting between us, had to get his handkerchief and rub something off his nose. Hands, hundreds of hands, were thrust through the partly opened window, and Krishnaji touched them all as the car crept forward. People marched behind, their hands on the car, as though in that way they kept a contact with him. One man before the talk demanded to be allowed to come and live on the landing outside the door of the flat. When Nandini said it was not possible, he said, "You are keeping me from my god."' [S chuckles.] 'It was very hot during the talk, oppressive to me. Krishnaji had a slight cold when we got back.' There's something hysterical about the Indian crowds.

S: Absolutely. Yes, absolutely hysterical.

M: If it's politics, somebody gets shot because of…

S: Yes. Look at all the people who were killed in riots because Indira Gandhi was being put in jail for four days.

M: Yes.

S: I know, I know.

M: I suppose it's not unique, but it's certainly prevalent in India, or was then, and this was 1979.

S: Yes. I imagine it still is.

M: January twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji has no cold symptoms. Newspapers said that Nelson Rockefeller died in New York. Various people dropped in here during the morning. At lunch were Krishnaji, Narayan, Asit, Minakshi, and me. At 5 p.m., I went with Pupul and Devi to the JJ Arts'—that's where he gave the talks in Bombay; it was a big open space…did you ever go to the Bombay talks?

S: Oh, yes, yes.

M: …in the middle of Bombay—'where at 6:15 p.m. Krishnaji gave his third Bombay talk, an overwhelming one, deeply moving. It was sacred. The crowd poured through toward him afterward, and what seemed a thousand hands stretching to touch him. He looked dazed, as he so often does after such a talk, but seemed to want to give something to each in the milling crowd. His palms together, he turned to face them all, and finally in the car, through the partly opened window, he let the thrusting hands touch his, as the car moved slowly forward. I felt unable to speak after such a talk, but later had to go with Minakshi, Sonali, and Dr. Parchure to dine with Mr. and Mrs. Parekh, Rishi Valley parents and host to Narayan, Prasad, etcetera. Radha, Achyut, Pama, Sunanda, and Frances were there. I came back directly afterward. Krishnaji was in bed reading and feeling alright. No cold. The vast energy that is within him is beyond explaining.'

The next day. 'All morning there was a meeting of KFI trustees in which I was included. Krishnaji had a letter from Jean-Michel Maroger that Marie-Bertrande and Diane fell down stone stairs at Diane's school in Blois. Marie-Bertrande was unhurt, but Diane broke a left thighbone, a clean fracture. Marie-Bertrand was carrying Diane when she fell. It is extraordinary that no other bones were broken in such a fall. One wonders if Krishnaji's healing has made the child stronger. We walked again around the race course.'

January thirtieth. 'There was another KFI trustee meeting which Krishnaji attended for a while. Devi took me for some last-minute shopping. I got a bag for Sunanda, eighty-three dollars worth of cheese—gruyere, camembert, etcetera' [both chuckle]—'as presents for Pupul, Nandini, and the Chandmals. I found a book too on Dürer for the Chandmals. I lunched with them in the Taj at the Rendez-Vous Restaurant, a French restaurant on the top floor. I came back for a nap and later walked on the race course. Krishnaji's voice is getting hoarse. The race course is windy, but he said it wasn't, and walked anyway. I came back and discovered, while I was absent this morning, that he told the KFI board, at their urging, that he would give six talks in Bombay next year instead of four, and stay in India until February. I asked why he planned as many talks in Bombay as in the whole of the U.S. I tallied the talks and discussions with schools and groups here this year: thirty-seven. I said I was not asking for an equal number in the U.S., but two less in Bombay next year.' They would talk him into these things.

S: I know.

M: 'Krishnaji said, "We'll see,"' [S chuckles] 'which isn't good enough. I appealed to Pupul to cut the program down.'

The thirty-first. 'I went with Nandini, Sunanda, and Frances to Bal Anand, Nandini's school for small and very poor children. Rajesh met us there, and took me to the nearby house of two of these children, a room about twelve feet by twelve feet where the family of twelve people live. It was so dark, I could scarcely see inside. The mother was washing clothes on the pavement of the courtyard under a water spigot. The mother and father smiled and made signs of welcome. They offered Rajesh food.'… Some of these people … [with quiet sadness in her voice].

S: I know, it's extraordinary.

M: Heartbreaking.

S: I know. It is.

M: 'At 6:15 p.m., Krishnaji gave his fourth Bombay talk. Very fine. Again the crowd was immense and surrounded the car afterward. With some, it was a delicacy of reverence and touching, not grabbing his hands but touching quickly and lightly. After the talks, I would've sooner been quiet, but after several postponements, there was a dinner for Nandini, Devi, and me at the Tantias' house. It was late. The younger daughter Sudha came for us with a car. It was nearby, a large flat with inlaid wood and paneling. We dined at a long table. The seating was all men on one side, i.e., Mr. Tantia, Gansham, and Vikram; and then Devi, Nandini, and Mina, and me on the other side. Sudha and her mother were at each end. Mr. Tantia was pleasant and chatty. They want to come to Brockwood Park and Saanen. I gave information but fear they envisage being with Krishnaji more than is possible, which is going to be disappointing. I got back to the flat far too late.'

February first. 'I packed, and had a long talk with Dr. Parchure, who reported his conversation of this morning with Krishnaji. As his doctor, who has been given responsibility of Krishnaji's health, he needed Krishnaji to tell him whether he wished to do everything as fully as he wants and then "disappear," or did he wish to live a long time and conserve the body in strength. Krishnaji said he wanted to live a long time. In that case, said Dr. Parchure, the intelligence of the body was either not functioning or not being listened to. "Your body is giving you signs," but Krishnaji pays no attention. The falling sick here in India with minor infections is a sign of the bodily resistance lowering. Krishnaji doesn't give it the necessary rest to build his strength. His feet have been constantly swollen in India, another sign of lessened function. Krishnaji was somewhat impatient with all this, but listened. Dr. Parchure said he must have two days of total rest after each talk, with no two-hour discussions at the breakfast table; he must have at least one meal a day in bed, feet up and not hanging down. And he must rest before traveling to a new place and also on arrival. Krishnaji's voice was hoarse, a sign he is overusing it. Today, he should've rested but tides of people came to pay respects and say goodbye, bringing useless presents of huge boxes of dried fruit that we can't take. In the afternoon, I found the mad German girl who tried to force her way into Tannegg, and I put her out. And Mrs. Billimoria sent a mother with a son who wants to be a woman, and Krishnaji talked to them both. Finally, they all left. Pupul and Nandini were at supper. Krishnaji went to bed afterward, and so did I. We managed to sleep intermittently until midnight. Then, we had to go to the airport.'

February second. 'Pama had taken the luggage, tickets, and our passports last night, so there was little for us to do but dress, and be ready to leave the flat at 1 a.m. Asit drove Krishnaji, me, Pupul, Nandini, and Vikram to the airport. A mass were waiting to see Krishnaji off. Achyut, Ahalya, Upasini, Frances McCann, etcetera, were in the VIP lounge provided. Krishnaji was dressed in his Huntsman jacket and trousers, and I was back in slacks, sweater, shoes, and stockings, my native costume again. The flight was called, and when the British Airways plane was loaded and ready to go, a signal came and Krishnaji, Pama, and I drove in a chauffeured car out onto the runway to the foot of the steps of the aircraft. Very VIP. We didn't have the first row in the first class, but the second. Not as a VIP should be treated.' [Both laugh.] 'The flight took off at 3:20 a.m., and was to have been nonstop to London, but after three hours we came down for fuel in Bahrain. Krishnaji and I for exercise paced the length of the well-kept modern air terminal. We had left Bombay at 3:20 a.m. and were due at Heathrow at 7 a.m., but it wasn't until 9:30 a.m. when we reached Heathrow. We had to wrestle our own bags; not a porter in sight. I went looking for one or a trolley, and of course, Krishnaji in my absence lifted six of the bags off the turntable. He then found a trolley, and was irritable when I wouldn't let him load it and push it alone. Doris was waiting inside, and Dorothy and Ingrid were at the cars. They had brought overcoats for us. The cold air and wintry beauty of the countryside made my spirits soar. Snow and ice had kept cars from using the lanes, but it had warmed and rained yesterday, and there is sun today. So we saw only patches of snow and Brockwood welcomed Krishnaji. The house is warm and comfortable. We both felt dazed from travel. Everything looks so clean. It is a luxury to take a drink of water from the tap, to read news of the world, to eat simple food. It is a delight to be here. I slept in the afternoon after Krishnaji had lunch downstairs and then gone to bed. It was happiness to put his tray together for supper. Everyone is smiling. Alas, Scott is ill in his cottage; he has hepatitis.'

S: Ah, so that was the year I got hepatitis. Yes. I think I picked it up in Syria.

M: Yes. 'Scott must have caught it in Damascus where he spent a week on his way back.' I remember that.

S: Yes. I do too, regretfully.

M: The next day. 'It was lovely to wake up here, to light a fire in the grate, exercise a little, and then make a delicious breakfast of buttered toast, porridge, etcetera, and eat it slowly at the table in our own little kitchen. The tall trees are bare and beautiful, and the sun came to spend the day, wiping away the silver frost that covered the fields at daylight. My whole organism feels different here, somehow back to normal. The swelling and pain going out of my lower leg and foot, the constant heat was a constant attack on the body in India. This is the climate where I feel best. How narrow is the margin of health in these matters. Obviously different for each body. Krishnaji's swelling is leaving his feet. He thinks it is the carrot juice he now drinks.' [Both chuckle.] 'I think it is the absence of heat. He got up for lunch, took a long nap, and at 4:30 p.m., with Dorothy and the two dogs, we walked up and down the drive. The cold air felt as if it was cleaning my blood. I telephoned Filomena in Rome. They've all had flu, but she sounded alright, and it made me glad to hear her voice. Then I telephoned Vanda in Florence, and Krishnaji spoke to her briefly. Earlier, I spoke to Phyl Fry'—that's Christopher's wife. 'Sounds of friends' voices make me smile inside. Krishnaji rested most of the day. We watched TV, The Two Ronnies'—do you remember that program?

S: [laughing] Yes, I do. [M laughs too.]

M: February fourth. 'Yesterday's sunshine went off behind clouds, but the day stayed dry. Mary and Joe drove down in mid-morning and we talked at length. Krishnaji joined us at 12:30 p.m. Mary is pleased with the six shirts he had made for her, and Joe liked the two Indian scarves. After lunch we all sat in our little kitchen over coffee and biscuits and talked. They left at 4 p.m., and Krishnaji took a nap. He wasn't feeling like going out, nor was I. Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrande Maroger are coming on Tuesday.'

S: Okay. We should end it there.

M: Alright.

S: So, we'll begin again on February fifth next time.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Hyperlink to text of January 6, 1979.

[2] Hyperlink to text of January 7, 1979.

[3] Hyperlink to text of January 13, 1979.

[4] Hyperlink to text of January 14, 1979.

[5] Pajamas are the white cotton trousers that are daily wear for men in India.

[6] A lakh is 100,000.

[7] Radha Burnier and Rukmini Arundale have both died.

[8] On the surface this indicates nothing, but that she "hung around with musicians" was comment-worthy by Radha, says a great deal.

[9] Because the school master would sometimes neglect to tell him to leave, and just left himself.

[10] A place in Italy where "the process" was witnessed by several people in 1924. See Krishnamurti: The Years of Awakening by Mary Lutyens.

Issue 58: February 5, 1979 to April 16, 1979

After a brief stay at Brockwood en route to California after their long trip to India, Mary and Krishnaji return to Ojai, where the freshness of their new surroundings reinvigorates them. For much of this issue, Mary and Krishnaji deal with the aftermath of their trip to India, and Mary tries to solve the problem of her Malibu house sliding into the sea.

Mary: We begin on February fifth, 1979. Krishnaji and I are at Brockwood for a few days for Krishnaji's usual stopover on his way from India to California. My diary reads: 'Doris lent me her little car, and I went to Petersfield and caught the 9:20 a.m. to London. There was a dustman's strike, but the English are tidy and pile their refuse neatly in black plastic bags.' [S laughs.] 'The city seemed otherwise normal and more relaxed and quiet at this wintry time of the year. It had the wintry gray air remembered from the two years Sam and I spent in London when I had the private pleasure of exploring the city by myself, walking in the grayness, which seemed the breath of London. Today I did two errands, a new watchband from the Swiss watch place on Bond Street, and I met Paul Anstee at Christie's in South Kensington to see a Japanese vase he suggested as the lamp material I asked him to find.' That's that green one on the table in the living room.

Scott: Ah, yes. A nice one.

M: It was going to be auctioned, and he spotted it for me. 'I decided to bid on it. We had a sandwich in the basement lunch place nearby and just after 2:00 went to the auction where Paul bid on the vase for me. It went for eighty pounds, and I had decided to go higher.' [Both chuckle.] 'I brought it back in a Harrods shopping bag. Now, how do I get it to Ojai?' [Both chuckle again.] 'Walked up and down the drive with Krishnaji on my return and went to a school meeting.'

S: Now, you must've taken Doris's car to the station…

M: I did.

S: …well, I'm saying the reason is that the gray Mercedes was still put up for the winter, as you were only at Brockwood for a short while, so you didn't want to take it out of storage.

M: Well, I daresay you're right, but I don't remember.

S: Well, it must've been. Anyway, just for the record.

M: February sixth, 'Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrande Maroger arrived for two days. Mary Cadogan came to lunch. Krishnaji agreed to go to France sometime this year, probably early in October to do a video interview answering questions from French students.' That never happened. 'We discussed Indian matters with Mary Cadogan. At lunch, she described her meeting Rajagopal with her husband when they were in Ojai. He was the kindly old gentleman and spoke only well of Krishnaji.' One of his acts. [S chuckles.] 'All the rest of the day, I packed, washed, ironed, and all was in order by the time I went to bed at 10:30 p.m. Krishnaji said he felt tired. I suspect the accumulated fatigue from India, which he somehow keeps at bay when he is busy, will seep out now. It will be good to be quiet and in one place for a while.'

February seventh. 'It was a foggy morning. I made our breakfast and was ready to go early. The Marogers said goodbye to us as they were going up to London for the day before returning to France. Eleanor Hawksley provided a Boots shopping bag on wheels, which was perfect for carrying by hand to Ojai the vase bought on Monday. Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me, and Esme and George Carnes followed with the luggage. We left at 10:30 a.m. and went past the cottage so Scott, isolated by hepatitis…'

S: Ah, yes, I'd forgotten this.

M: Oh, yes. '… could wave.'

S: Oh, how nice of you and Krishnaji to do that.

M: It was terrible, you picked up hepatitis in…

S: …in Syria, on the way back from India. Yes.

M: Yes, I remember it. We were quite indignant because as far as one knew, you hadn't eaten anything or been anywhere we hadn't been but you had stopped in Syria on the way back.

S: Yes, yes, yes, yes.

M: Well, you waved. [Both chuckle.] 'At Heathrow, after checking in, we learned our 1 p.m. flight was delayed by fog, which prevented our incoming flight from landing. We sat in the TWA lounge, read, surviving on two cheese sandwiches till our flight, which got in at 3:30 so we could take off at 4:30. We had the two single forward seats in the nose that Krishnaji likes, and he took the one on the left, which he prefers. We read papers, magazines, and thrillers all the ten-and-a-half-hour flight but also slept fitfully. Landed in Los Angeles at 9:30 p.m. It took an hour to round up our six bags and two packages (Indian oil and six meters of sofa cushion material provided by an English decorator, D. Saxby) to go through customs. Mark had the school van to collect us, and we drove past Malibu to Ojai. I was too numb from travel to feel the difference, if any, of not coming home to Malibu. Erna, Theo, Michael, Laura, and Ted were waiting up to greet Krishnaji. The house was beautiful, filled with flowers, in exquisite readiness by Elfriede. The greeting committee soon left, and Krishnaji, quite wide awake, walked from room to room saying, "Do you feel the atmosphere?" and then "I'm glad you have a beautiful house to live in. It is more beautiful than Malibu, and you have a beautiful room in…what's that place we just came from? Brockwood!"' [Both chuckle.] 'And so we have come back.'

The eighth. ‘After only about two hours’ sleep, I woke up, then stayed awake. I telephoned my brother, as he and his wife Lisa were having breakfast. Then, telephoned Amanda for a happy, long chatter. Krishnaji stayed in bed all morning, but came with Erna, Theo, and me to lunch at Arya Vihara. Both slept all afternoon. Dieter’s son came to wake up the two Mercedes.’ They were put up on blocks while we were away. ‘Krishnaji and I had supper on trays with television and quickly went back to bed and slept afterward. The silence and peace of this house is something alive.’

There’s nothing for the next day but, ‘Errands in the village, and slept all afternoon.’

February tenth. ‘I telephoned my stepfather Wooge, but spoke only to my cousin Sally; he is suffering from the effects of an antibiotic taken for an infection. He was in the room, so she seemed rather reticent to speak. This morning, Krishnaji woke up at 1:30 a.m. and stayed awake, and I did more or less the same, so we both refrained from an afternoon nap to try to adjust to the time zone. Krishnaji said he had felt the full atmosphere of this house almost to the point of fainting in bed yesterday. He said when he goes into the living room, it is so strong, “it is like a temple, one goes very quietly.” It is interesting that it is the living room—a new construction, unlike his bedroom and sitting room in the old cottage where he lived so long. The living room is where the jewels were placed in the foundation by Theo at Krishnaji’s suggestion. Theo has given me a map of where “it” is in the foundation of the school main building—always to the northeast. Evelyne and Lou Blau lunched with us at Arya Vihara. Later, Lou, on the telephone, urged me to get an engineer to advise about the Malibu house…’ The Malibu house was sliding into the ocean.

S: You said the northeast for the jewels; was it always the northeast?

M: Yes, yes. Northeast. That I’m sure of. From my memory, not just from what it says; and that’s where you put them…

S: Yes, that’s where I put them at Brockwood, in the Centre and the school.

M: Northeast, definitely.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Um, ‘…about the engineer to advise about the Malibu house. I will talk to him after I’ve gone back to look at it, as it is now. I marketed in the afternoon. Took a small walk with Krishnaji. My cold has come back.’

The eleventh of February. ‘Krishnaji wanted to talk to Erna and Theo, so we did that all morning. Max Falk was at lunch, and afterward Krishnaji and I with Max, Mark, Erna, and Theo visited the new school buildings, which are very handsome. They are larger and better than I visualized. The residence’s main house is particularly good-looking with many good details. The school classroom buildings are woven among the oak trees, scarcely visible from afar, and fulfill the notion of a multiplicity of connected units, which can be added onto, are functional, and don't look institutional. Zelma Wilson'—that was the architect—'who designed it has done well. So has Carey Smoot, in spite of all the difficulties.' He designed the first building, that wooden one.

S: The one with the wavy roof?

M: Yes, the wavy roof one. 'We walked through Oak Grove and saw that the stable has been moved way back from Besant Road, and then saw the new school vegetable garden made by Carol Andre. Mark asked on behalf of Jackie Kornfeld, who is urging it, whether Krishnaji would speak in New York. I repeated what Parchure had said about his health in Bombay, and Krishnaji let us agree to say no.' Parchure was saying that he does too much.

S: Yes.

M: The twelfth is only: 'Elfriede came to clean; Alasdair Coyne came about the garden. Krishnaji and I took a walk to the dip and back. Early to sleep.'

February thirteenth. 'My cold is better. I made our breakfast and left at 8:30 a.m., Krishnaji remaining in Ojai. I drove to the Dunnes' and sat and talked with them for over an hour. It was a quiet joy to see them again after nine months. Then, I went across the canyon and saw the alterations Max made last summer in terracing the lawn space. It looks very nice, but there continue to be disquieting cracks in the ground, and some of the railroad ties he put in to hold the ground are askew. Elfriede showed me fine line cracks in the tile'—that house had a tile floor—'in the living room. They had been under a rug, so we can't be sure if they're new. It made me weep to see the beloved house again, but it has been well cared for by Elfriede and Fred and Lori, who was there weeding along the entrance. The garden is healthy and tidy. It is a blessed place no matter what geologic strangeness is going on. I went to town with clothes for the cleaners, and bought a Norelco razor for Krishnaji.' He was always buying new razors, because he liked the newest electric razor.

S: I know. I remember.

M: And then he would give the old ones away.

S: I got many of them, almost always Brauns, sometimes Philips, but it was…

M: Yes. It depended on what was the latest.

S: Yes, exactly. [Chuckles.]

M: 'I also got some detectives for Krishnaji from Winky. Then, went to Helen for a needed haircut. Ran into Betsy at Lindberg's and drove back to Ojai through rain. But it was 6:20 p.m. and dark when I pulled into the garage. Krishnaji came out with an umbrella in his bathrobe and helped me carry the packages. He said they had had an interesting talk at lunch. Bud and Lisa telephoned as I got in to wish me happy birthday. Krishnaji doesn't remember or consider birthdays, which is as it should be.' [S chuckles.] 'Michael had left our salad and soup, so we soon had our trays. Washing up in the kitchen, Krishnaji said he had become afraid alone in the house when it became dark. He had locked all the doors and windows. "I don't know what I was afraid of, but it was gone the moment you were here."'

S: So, he wasn't afraid on your behalf.

M: No. I seem to have some protective something because, I think I've already said, he told me once that he would not go out at night anymore in the dark, alone. And I asked, "Well, what if I were with you?" "Oh," he said, "then, of course, I'd go." I don't know what it was. He's not a man who feared things.

S: No. No.

M: It was…I don't know what. I don't want to make up things or what it might be or even imagine.

S: No, but, it's perhaps it's like the…

M: He had this thing about being protected.

S: Yes.

M: And I somehow felt as though I were an instrument of whatever protected him. It wasn't me, it was…they had to have a tool to do it, and I was available.

S: It's similar to, at the end of his life, when he said, "Don't leave the body alone." It's as if there were things that…well, one has a choice of saying, either there was nothing to be afraid of, and it was all in his imagination; or one has to say that there were things that he was sensitive to that were threatening…

M: Yes.

S: … but that were not threatening when he was with someone who really cared for him and who would protect him, or who was an instrument.

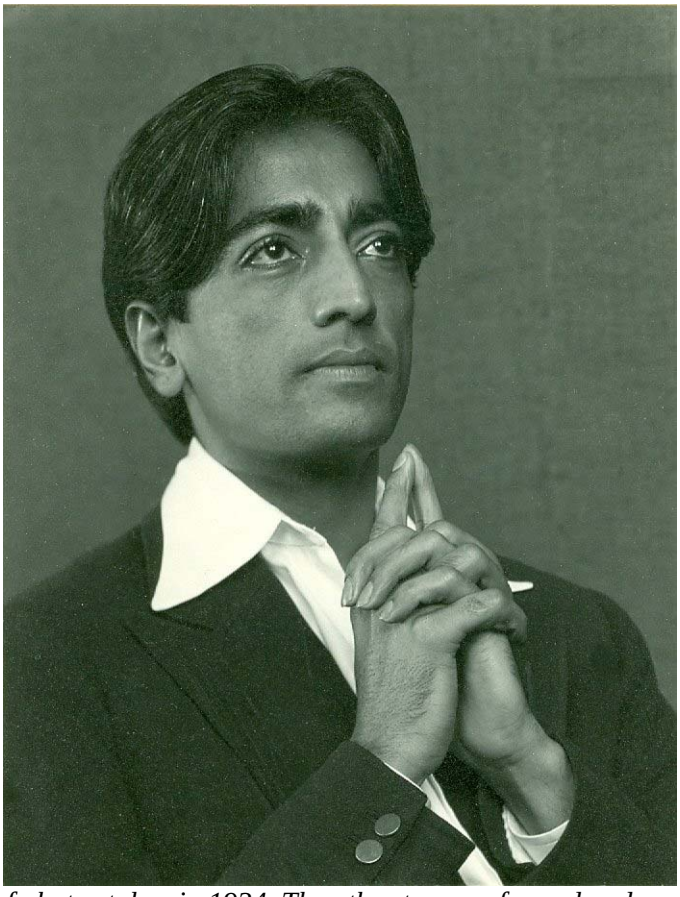
M: And yet he also said, which is sort of the opposite of that, that he is protected.

S: Yes.

M: But, evil wants to get at good, and as it can't get at him because he's protected…

S: It goes around him.

M: It goes around him. I'm sure he said that to you.



S: Yes, yes, he said that to me, too. But this is something…

M: You must be careful, you mustn't go mountain climbing, or whatever it was you wanted to do.

S: Yes, but this is something slightly different.

M: Yes.

S: Because this is him saying there was something he felt that was threatening, but that left when you came; and in your words, you were an instrument for some kind of protection, so that when you were present, it was alright, which is interesting. It's very interesting.

Third in a series of photos taken in 1934. The other two are framed and appeared in previous issues. This one was among Mary's papers.

M: [pause] Yes. And I know when he went and had the operation in the hospital, he was very…instructing me what I must do because he could easily slip away, and I must not let that happen. Well, indeed, it did come up after the prostate operation that we've already covered in these discussions, when he started talking to his brother…

S: Yes, I remember.

M: …and that's when I intervened, interrupted. I said, "Krishnaji," you know, grounded him, "the operation's over and you're fine" and "You'll be well soon" and "We've got lots to do" and I went on talking, talking, talking. And then he said to Nitya, "Nitya, I won't be coming now. I'll be coming later, much later." Make what you can of these things.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Yes. I'm harking on, but he was quite definite in instructing me what I must do, or he might slip away.

S: Yes. What did he tell you that you had to do?

M: He didn't tell me what to do exactly, but I somehow knew, I don't know. I had to talk to him, to keep him…not…

S: …not let him slip away.

M: …not let him slip away. And I reminded him of things we were going to do. I just kept talking, and with big eyes, he listened to me. And then, for me, the fact that he then said to Nitya, "I'm not coming now, but later." It was sort of…grounding him…is the only word I can use, in everyday life, things he would be doing and wanting to do, and the responsibilities. I didn't put it that way, but that was the gist of it—that he had too much to do with the rest of his life to let it end. [Long pause.]

Anyway, just going back a little, 'Michael left our salad and soup, so we soon had our trays. Washing up in the kitchen, Krishnaji said that he had become afraid alone in the house when it became dark. He had locked all the doors and windows. "I don't know what I was afraid of, but it was gone the moment you were here." Then, a little later, he stood suddenly still and said his head was bad and gave a cry, "What is happening? Why is it so bad?" I watched lest he faint as he returned to his room. He sat on the bed several times, appearing to start to faint and then coming to, then he was sick several times, vomiting in the bathroom. "Is this going to start again? Why?" At one point, he wanted to go back to the kitchen to finish the dishes and to interrupt what was happening, but was persuaded not to. He was able to do his teeth, wash, etcetera, and then went back to bed, promising to call me if it got worse.' [Long pause.]

The fourteenth. 'Krishnaji's head was bad all day. He got up for lunch and went for a haircut to Meiners Oaks. I did errands in the village. Alasdair planted twenty more Ceanothus on the east side of the house. Krishnaji and I walked with Erna and Theo. Lou Blau told me in detail of an offer on Malibu. Will make a counteroffer on Monday. Krishnaji's head was too bad for him to get out of bed after the walk; he watched TV looking tired and in pain. He said it hadn't been this bad in years.'

The next day just says that I have a cold, that I felt poorly, was in all day, and that Krishnaji and I both slept in the afternoon. And really nothing the next day except 'no walk.'

February seventeenth, 'Krishnaji's head has been better though the pain is present in the background. It is quiet when he's doing something, but rises when he is quiet. I'm feeling better. On Thursday, the cold settled in my sinuses, so yesterday I telephoned Lailee Bakhtiar, who prescribed tetracycline, and it is working. Sinus pain disappeared immediately, and the heavy cold is getting better instead of worse. After breakfast, I telephoned Philippa and David in Connecticut, and it was almost as nice as seeing them. In the morning, Krishnaji, full of energy, suggested starting a new series in his Letters to the Schools. So, he went to it, dictating to me number twenty-five, which will be dated and sent out on next September first[1]. He completed the first twenty-four, a year's supply, at Brockwood before we left for India in October. New teachers and the Hookers were at lunch at Arya Vihara. We rested in the afternoon, then Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I walked down McAndrew Road and back. Krishnaji said to me, "We should see more of them and gossip together."' [Both M and S chuckle.]

S: Erna and Theo?

M: Yes, 'So, we wound up taking the pot of soup Michael delivers to us every evening over to the Lilliefelts' and had a pleasant supper there. We got on to the subject of the Theosophical Society, the Esoteric Section, what the young Krishnaji thought, Masters or not, etcetera. Krishnaji said of his memory that he chiefly didn't remember things about himself. He did remember, and corrected Erna, on where people were living in the TS headquarters. He said that that wasn't about himself. He repeated the vague memory he described in India of standing as a boy by the Adyar River utterly empty, and "having a good time." I asked if he could remember directly Dr. Besant, and he said he could a little, but only in her latter years.'

The eighteenth. 'Krishnaji dictated number twenty-six of the Letters to the Schools. In the middle of it, the doorbell rang and there was the Russian physics teacher named Alexander Ladizensky, whom Vanda brought to the Rome airport to meet Krishnaji as we were in transit to Delhi in October. He got an exit permit to immigrate to Israel but wanted to come to where Krishnaji is. I rang Theo, who came right over and talked to him until we could all meet at lunch at Arya Vihara.' Theo could speak Russian. 'He sat next to Krishnaji at lunch and Krishnaji questioned him about Russia. Fritz, afterward, took him to find lodging, and introduce him to other Russian émigrés, and tomorrow, perhaps, Max can give him temporary work on the school buildings as he seems to do with all comers. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I walked down Thacher Road and around the block. In the evening we watched the second Roots: The Later Generations.' I don't remember what that was, some television thing.

S: Roots was about an African-American man who goes back and finds his roots in Africa and in America.

M: Oh, yes. I remember it dimly. On the nineteenth, there's only that Krishnaji dictated another Letters to the Schools.

February twentieth. 'It rained. Krishnaji dictated another Letters to the Schools. Elfriede came to clean. Mr. G.N. Dalal of Bombay came from Los Angeles by Greyhound bus, and I met him at Ventura. The bus was late, and we got to the cottage by 6:40 p.m. Krishnaji, worried, was waiting outside with Mark. Dalal is staying in the guest apartment. He gave Krishnaji a donation for the Foundation for $5,000. All, including Krishnaji, had supper at Arya Vihara.'

February twenty-first. 'Mr. Dalal had breakfast with the Lilliefelts and spent the day being shown everything, then lunched with Krishnaji and others at Arya Vihara, and walked with Krishnaji. I drove to Beverly Hills the inland way, gave the Christie vase to be made into a lamp to Mr. Schwartz, as well as the fabric I brought from Saxby in London to be made into pillows. I did miscellaneous errands and got back to Ojai by 5 p.m.'

The twenty-second. 'Mr. Dalal had breakfast here with me, then left with Theo for the Oxnard Airport. In the meantime, last night, Professor Ravi Ravindra and his Canadian wife Sally, who seventeen years ago taught at Rajghat, arrived and are staying at the Lilliefelts'. They were shown around the school in the morning, and we all lunched at Arya Vihara. There was a discussion at the lunch table on what is knowing, which was taped by Fritz. At 5 p.m., after a rest, Krishnaji and I, the Ravindras, and the Lilliefelts walked around the block. The Ravindras leave tomorrow morning and return to Halifax, where he teaches and they live with two children. Krishnaji likes Ravi.' Ravi's a nice man.

S: Yes.

M: February twenty-third has only, 'Desk. Krishnaji rested.'

The twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number twenty-nine. I did desk work in the afternoon. Spoke to Naudé. We walked with the Lilliefelts.'

February twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji lunched with the Lilliefelts and then spent the afternoon looking at the school buildings and walking over the land there. I left after breakfast in the green Mercedes for Malibu and the Dunnes'. Spent a happy morning sitting and talking and having lunch in the familiar Dunne way, on trays on the terrace. We sautéed cheese sandwiches, which Amanda said I taught her to make on Kearsarge Street.' I lived in a house that I owned on Kearsarge Street in Los Angeles, years ago! [S chuckles.] Decades, decades.

S: And that's where you taught her how to make these cheese sandwiches?

M: Well, there's nothing to making them. You just put them on the grill.

S: [laughs] But this is the first we've heard of Kearsarge Street.

M: That's right. Well, Sam and I lived there a little bit when we married. And then as soon as we built Malibu, we moved to Malibu. 'Malibu was beautiful…'

S: What number was your house on Kearsarge Street?

M: 11923? I don't know. 9207? I don't know. [S laughs.] There's no use digging in the attic of my mind for inconsequential details, Mr. Forbes! [S laughing.]

S: Why not? Inconsequential details are all that I have in mine.

M: [chuckles] Anyway. 'Malibu was beautiful; the sky and the ocean were blue in the clear golden air across the canyon to my place, which looked green and very beautiful. It was a very happy day. I left at 3 p.m. Marketed at the Trancas market, got back to Ojai by 5 p.m., and was making soup for our supper by the time Krishnaji returned from his afternoon with the Lilliefelts. The Siddoo sisters arrived at 7 p.m.'

February twenty-sixth. 'The last eclipse of the sun in this century was around 8 this morning. The garden was in a strange twilight. From the kitchen window I saw Krishnaji in bare feet and only in his nightshirt out on the path. "I wanted to see the eclipse," he said.' [Both chuckle.] 'I rushed him into warmth and a denatured but closer view on television.' [Both chuckle more.] 'In the morning, he spoke alone with Jackie and Sarjit Siddoo. Elfriede cleaned. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji, the Siddoos, the Lilliefelts, Mark, Fritz, and I discussed the problems of Canada and the Wolf Lake School. It is costing them $9,000 a month of their own funds just as it is, with only twelve students. Unless they spend millions on more land and building, it cannot expand on the present site. Exactly what I foresaw'—[both chuckle] how annoying such foresight is—'has happened.' [Chuckles.] Know-it-all, here. 'They had no idea what a school entailed.' It was true.

S: Yes, I know.

M: 'Krishnaji, in summing up the situation, said he is not urging them to do anything, but his descriptions of, "If you are serious, you will ask what is right, not the cost," makes an overwhelming pressure.' [S chuckles.] 'He was impatient when I pointed that out. He denies that it's pressure. Then, he gave the example of his telling Narayan to be willing to give up his whole life to Rishi Valley "or, never mind; die, starve, it doesn't matter what."' [S laughs. M laughs, too.] Oh dear. 'The Siddoos say they can afford to carry on for two more years, but if they fold, they will be impoverished. If they cannot swing the school now, and it seems an insupportable burden as is, in my view, they should get out before they go broke, not wait for that to happen.' That seems reasonable. [S chuckles] 'Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, and I walked to the dip on Grand Avenue.'

The twenty-seventh says, 'Krishnaji dictated the thirtieth Letters to the Schools. I worked at the desk the rest of the day.'

February twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji dictated the thirty-first Letters to the Schools. A pool man came and with Theo tried to figure out how to make the pump in the ornamental pool less noisy. I spoke to Lou Blau. The last bid was unacceptable.' Then, I went on about who should represent it for selling the house. No use talking about that. 'In the afternoon, Krishnaji talked to a Mr. and Mrs. Farkas, parents in Oak Grove. Mr. Farkas wants to return to Hungary to spread Krishnaji's teachings, a perilous venture. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji, the Siddoos, the Lilliefelts, Mark, and I talked again about Canadian school matters. The Siddoos want to go ahead. In the evening, we watched the television: As You Like It by the Royal Shakespeare Company.'

S: Before we go on, what's happened to the Siddoos?

M: Well, they sort of um…the place…well, I don't know. They're somewhere, but they're not running the place up there. It's no longer…

S: It's no longer a school, but it became an information center for a while, didn't it?

M: Well, that was just a title, really. I don't know where they are, actually. I haven't heard from them.

S: Don't they show up at international meetings?

M: No. Next year when we have all the Foundations meeting here, they may turn up, just to turn up. I don't know. I'm sure there's some information, but I don't have it.

March first says, 'Desk, etcetera. The Siddoos leave. I went to the village, then walked with Krishnaji and the Lilliefelts. The weather is cold. Krishnaji and I watched a film of an Indian leopard. It rained in the morning.'

March second. 'I got a plumber to get a spoon out of the waste disposal'—you [chuckles] have to know all the details—'and finished in time for going ahead with the planned trip to Santa Barbara. I drove Krishnaji, Erna, and Theo in the green Mercedes. It was a lovely day. The bright sun of California. The landscape is very green. We went the inland way, and Krishnaji was pleased with the fullness of Lake Casitas.' Lake Casitas is quite beautiful—it's a manmade lake, as you may know.

S: Yes. It's very beautiful.

M: Very beautiful. 'This was my first touring of Santa Barbara since we moved. We lunched in a small restaurant called The Tea Room, sitting under an arbor. Krishnaji had a large enchilada, salad, and cheesecake. We wandered through El Paseo and bought books, then health foods, and drove back to Ojai, where we went for a short walk. In the evening, Lou Blau telephoned that the real estate people want me to "do something" to improve the earth on the ocean side of Malibu. What?' [S chuckles again.] 'The earth is moving; I don't know why or what can be done.' That's part of living here.

March third. ‘At 11:30 a.m., parents and teachers came for a discussion with Krishnaji. They asked about authority. I worked on letters.’

S: So, if they “came for a discussion,” the discussion must’ve been here in the house.

M: Yes. Yes, if they came, they came here.

S: Right.

M: The fourth. ‘There was another meeting here between Krishnaji and the parents and teachers of Oak Grove School. We walked in the late afternoon with the Lilliefelts.’

The next day. ‘A warm, beautiful day. Alasdair planted pots, etcetera. Scott Eckersley made a wooden cover and insulated the pump for the ornamental pool so it is silent. I telephoned an engineer about the Malibu earth. In the afternoon, Krishnaji laid basins around the newly planted tangelo trees and I watered all the plants.’ He liked to garden.

The sixth, it just says, ‘Desk. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion here with Oak Grove School parents and teachers.’

March seventh. ‘It was a warm, beautiful day. I drove to Beverly Hills. Had my hair cut. Had the car washed. Marketed in Malibu, then went to the house, where I met a geologist about the earth movement. He found cracking in an arc running from the narrow part on the point, up near the easterly olive tree, and around to the edge of Filomena’s garden. He said there were two remedies: huge earth removal to ease the weight, or drainage of underground water via pipes similar to what was done before, but more extensive. He would draw up plans and get a rig to do it. The county is due to do the same with the entire area above the Malibu road but it may take three years if they do it; mine needs doing right now. He left. The house was quiet, beautiful, and alive. Its familiar sounds: one’s foot on the steps down to the bedrooms, door sounds, wound around my heart.’ You know, there are sounds, I’m sure you know, in all houses.

S: Yes. Just even the way things echo around different houses.

M: Yes. ‘Fred was home. He and Elfriede lifted one of the smaller ocean stones’—that I think are like sculptures, that are right outside—‘into the car, and I brought it back to Ojai. Came back to Ojai by 5:45 p.m. and met Krishnaji and the Lilliefelts walking. Theo had planted seventy-nine agave Americana the length of the south side of the driveway. They should form an imposing fence.’ They do.

March eighth. ‘At 10:30 a.m., there was a KFA trustee meeting. Krishnaji stayed in bed as it was all on finances. All were present except Alan Kishbaugh. Alan Hooker was considered as a trustee, but his proclivity for giving talks on Krishnaji’s teachings, which have been said to be tinged with interpretation, put it off. We continued after lunch. Professor Ravi Ravindra arrived from Halifax. Krishnaji had asked him to come back and wants to talk to him about being involved in the work in some way. Krishnaji hasn’t said what he has in mind, and throws it back to the Lilliefelts and me: What do we think Ravindra could do? We reply that it is his idea, etcetera. Krishnaji talked to Ravindra alone. I spoke to Lou Blau last night about going ahead with the geologic plan and told the geologist to do it. I told the real estate people about it, and the house is temporarily removed from the market until the work is completed. Amanda and Phil returned today from San Francisco.'

March ninth. 'Krishnaji, Ravindra, and I had breakfast in the kitchen. Then, Krishnaji and he talked in the living room. I lit the fireplace in the living room for the first time since we have lived here. When Krishnaji came in and saw it, his face lit up with the look of surprise and delight that is my delight to see. Around 11 a.m., he called me and the Lilliefelts to join the conversation, and while we talked, he stood thumbing Mary L.'s biography in his loose, long towel robe' [chuckles] 'with another familiar look of an abstracted child—far off—his face rounded as that of a child.' [M seems to explain:] His face would change in so many ways.

S: Yes.

M: 'At 4 p.m., there was another K-teacher-parent discussion. Afterward, Krishnaji, Ravi, Theo, Max, and I went for a walk.'

March tenth. 'Ravi breakfasted here. I do not think he is interested enough to change his life and join us. There was another K-teacher-parent-etcetera discussion at 11:30 a.m. Ravindra left after lunch for England, but agreed to Krishnaji's suggestion that he might become a trustee of the Canadian Krishnamurti Foundation. This will come as a surprise to the Siddoos.' [Chuckles.] 'Ravi said he would "help," finding scientists to discuss with Krishnaji, perhaps raise money. He will visit Brockwood on his present trip to England, and will speak to David Bohm, who he knows slightly and is associated with on some "threshold committee." Krishnaji said, "We don't want to lose you." At 5 p.m. there was a walk with Krishnaji, Erna Theo, and I.'

The next day, 'At 3 p.m., I went to a discussion of teachers and parents of older students about adding another year for them at Oak Grove. It was held at AV. Afterward, I walked with Krishnaji and the Lilliefelts.'

March twelfth, 'Krishnaji dictated letters in the morning. A Dr. J. Martin, a professor at UC Irvine, came to lunch and talked afterward to Krishnaji. He wants to write an article about him.'

March thirteen. 'Without breakfast, Krishnaji and I drove to Lailee's office for a 10:30 a.m. fasting blood, etcetera, test.' It was our annual checkup. 'Krishnaji preferred to go by the beach road. Both of us find the valley way repellant and seemingly endless freeway and the smoggy vulgarity of southern California sprawl lines that road. The ocean is a far, far better thing. Krishnaji's blood pressure must've been low, for Lailee had to do another vein to get enough blood. She's just back from a quick trip to Paris to meet her family who are refugees from Iran. Her cousin, who was the prime minister when Khomeini returned, is in hiding. Krishnaji has a slight earache, and she gave a prescription for an antibiotic and some ear drops. Later, when I asked Krishnaji on the way home how his ear felt, he said, "Better. I think the antibiotic prescription scared it."' [M and S both chuckle.] We hadn't filled the prescription yet. 'After the blood giving, we had the prescribed breakfast at Lindberg's, acceptably quiet and clean for Krishnaji. We spent the required two-hour interval shopping before giving the second post-meal blood samples. Then to Bullock's in Westwood for jeans and socks for Krishnaji. I found his size nine-and-a-half in the boys' department.' He liked shopping at Bullock's. 'It was raining outside, and the store was not crowded. I bought some sheets for the guest room in Ojai and Brockwood, went to Winky for books, and returned to Lailee at 2 p.m. to give the second blood samples. Then, we drove to Malibu. The geologist was there. He said the enlarged cracks near the house suggested a need perhaps to dig immediately four or five wells in the lawn and pump out the water. I told him to proceed. It is as if everything has gone wrong there since we left it. We stopped briefly at the Dunnes'. Philippa arrived last night for a ten-day visit. It was lovely to see her. She will come up to Ojai Thursday. We returned to Ojai, Krishnaji driving from Zuma Beach to the usual place, looking pleased and at home at the wheel. He insisted on stopping at Dieter's for a Valvoline fluid that prevents rattle when added to the fuel and, in spite of a long day and driving, he said he wasn't tired. The outing may have diverted him. He, of course, hadn't seen the Malibu changes Max made last summer and he thought it looked rather nice. In the evening, the geologist Ramiras called, and will meet both horizontal and vertical drillers there tomorrow and let me know the plan and costs.'

S: If Krishnaji started driving at Zuma Beach usually, where would he stop?

M: He would stop when we started getting near Oxnard traffic. In those days, we used to drive through Oxnard.

S: Right.

M: And he didn't like that. I mean, he didn't want to drive in towns and traffic. So, he would drive the section before that, then I'd take over. 'The geologist called in the evening as he has both horizontal and vertical drillers meeting him at Malibu tomorrow.'

March fourteenth. 'There was news on TV that while Carter was flying back to Washington from Israel and Egypt, the Israeli cabinet voted for the peace proposal, and it was just accepted by both Begin and Sadat. If the Knesset next accepts it, then the peace treaty will be signed. One hardly dares to believe this, at last, is at hand. Carter deserves immense respect for having gone all-out to solve this. I took Krishnaji to the Oak Grove School where he talked with the children, and while he was doing that, I fetched Mar de Manziarly to the house. She is staying with her sister for a month. The geologist rang with a numbing drilling bid for the horizontal drainage. Five 200-feet-long draining pipes to be put into the hills and under the house for $23,000.' Everything went wrong. 'He said he would try to get another bid by late afternoon. Krishnaji, Mar, Erna, Theo, etcetera lunched at Arya Vihara. Then, Erna and Theo took me to a benefit movie in Ojai of Ingmar Bergman's Autumn Sonata with Ingrid Bergman and Liv Ullmann. Krishnaji was asleep when I got back. I had telephone calls about different bids by the drillers. Somebody in San Francisco will do it for around $7,000. I agreed to it. They come down tomorrow and start work Friday.'

March fifteenth. 'It rained on and off. Philippa was to arrive early but was delayed by an overturned truck on the coast road. I took Krishnaji to the school Pavilion, where he talked again with the children, and it was photographed by Michael Mendizza for use in the film. I came back and found Philippa had arrived. We sat by the fire and talked till Krishnaji returned, and we all lunched at Arya Vihara. An editor of a Santa Barbara magazine, Jerry Dunn, was at lunch and afterward interviewed Krishnaji about schools, etcetera for his publication. We hope to make Oak Grove better known and possibly get more local students. A photo for the magazine was taken. Meanwhile, Philippa and I sat in the kitchen, had coffee, and talked till she left at 3:30 p.m. I wish I could be with her and David more. Krishnaji's teaching is what they need and could become alive to them. Elfriede telephoned that the geologist says rain is coming to Malibu and the lawn must be covered with plastic. She wanted my permission to get it from the Malibu Lumber Company. Luckily, Lori was there, so she and he did it just before the rain began. Krishnaji went to bed and read. I did letters and played records. Sunanda's notes of the January eighteenth conversation between Krishnaji and Dick Clarke arrived.'

March sixteenth. 'The drilling for the drain pipes starts in Malibu. At noon, Dr. Rahula, and Professor and Mrs. Jacques Maquet, head of anthropology at UCLA, came and lunched with us at Arya Vihara. Then, Krishnaji talked alone with Rahula; and then, Krishnaji, Rahula, and Maquet had a discussion, which Ted taped. Erna, Theo, Fritz, Mark, and I sat in on it. Rain, so no walk.'

The next day, 'It was a beautiful, clear day. I drove to Malibu, saw the geologist and the drilling, then went to lunch for Philippa at the Dunnes'. I saw Ray Eames'—wife of Charlie Eames, you know, the designer of the chair in the other room—'Lailee, the Dreyfuses, Joe Cohen, Evelyn Keyes, and Winky. Drove back to Ojai by 5 p.m., and walked with Krishnaji and the Lilliefelts. Krishnaji had talked for an hour with David Moody.'

March eighteenth, 'Rain on and off. Worked all day on income tax. Krishnaji and I went for a walk. The drilling continues in Malibu.'

There's really nothing for the next day.

March twentieth. 'Krishnaji and I left at 11:30 a.m. and drove to Malibu. Elfriede served us lunch in the kitchen. Philippa came over to say goodbye as she returns to Connecticut tomorrow. I watched her walk away up the path, as she and her siblings had all their lives. The drilling in the hillside is in its fifth day. So far, only one pipe is giving water. At 2:30 p.m. we went to Lailee's office, where we got the reports on our annual checkups. Krishnaji had a hearing test and is quite deaf in the high registers. His blood pressure was 130/80, cholesterol 190, uric acid 7'—was 10 last year, it says—'blood sugar 90 fasting and one day after food. So, all is good. The boils he had in India were not diabetic. His blood count was fine. EKG fine. The only question is his stomachache, which occurs from time to time. When he showed Lailee where it hurts, she said it was the gall bladder place, and suggested an upper GI X-ray, but he pooh-poohed it and said the barium swallowing would make him sick.' Well, it was, obviously, as we know from hindsight, gall bladder. 'We were finished by 4 p.m., but Krishnaji wanted to go back to Bullock's for more jeans,' [chuckle] 'which we did and also got him another tracksuit to wear while doing his morning exercises. We drove back to Ojai along the beach road, Krishnaji driving his usual stretch. Today has been a strenuous one, but he said he wasn't a bit tired. I feel blessed by this.'

March twenty-first. 'I feel my cold coming back. I drove early to Los Angeles about income tax. Then to have teeth cleaned. Went to Malibu in the afternoon, and arranged for a new drainpipe to be put down the hillside to receive water from the drilling. Got back to Ojai by 5:30 p.m.'

For the next day there is only, 'Desk, etcetera. Walk in afternoon. Saral and David Bohm arrived from England, and are in the guest house.'

Then really nothing until the twenty-fourth. 'At 11:30 a.m., there was the start of a discussion with Krishnaji: David and a group from San Francisco selected by Fritz from the class he gave at JFK University. On the walk with Krishnaji was Alan Kishbaugh, Erna, Theo, and me.'

The next day, 'The second day of discussion. Krishnaji thinks the discussion group is unintelligent.' [M and S chuckle.]

March twenty-sixth, 'The third discussion with Krishnaji. Drilling has ended in Malibu. Lailee says Krishnaji tests negative for parasites.' After India, you always have to be tested.

S: Yes, yes.

M: 'She advised me to have tests as I feel so poorly. Went to Ojai Valley Hospital for this. Rain in the night.'

The next day. 'One-and-a-half inches of rain in Malibu. Fourth discussion with Krishnaji. Desk work.'

March twenty-eighth. 'Three-and-a-half inches fell here last night, total of two for the storm in Malibu. I heard from Amanda and Phil and the geologist with the plumber all at the house. There was the fifth group discussion with Krishnaji at 11:30 a.m. I slept in the afternoon, feeling weak and ill from the pills for parasites.'

The next day, 'The rain stopped. There was the sixth group discussion in the morning. Krishnaji was very moving at the end. In the afternoon, there was a trustee meeting with Krishnaji present part of the time. At 4 p.m., Dr. Lailia Gramm, one in the morning discussion group, joined us to discuss putting together an educational conference in April of 1980. The pool man worked on the ornamental pond. Krishnaji watched an old Danny Kaye movie in the evening. I telephoned Brockwood and spoke to Doris—Dorothy is in Wales—to say that Krishnaji and I postponed our arrival there till May fifteenth.'

The next day was 'the seventh and final meeting of the discussion group.'

March thirty-first, 'Miranda arrived in Malibu. It was a quiet day here, and I took the last of the pills, but still feel sick from them.'

April first. 'A beautiful, clear day, warm, clean, and shining. Krishnaji had planned to come with me to Malibu where Miranda arrived yesterday. He wished to wander around the place while I went across the canyon to the Dunnes'. We would have had a sandwich lunch, but last night he felt tired, as well he might after the past week of group discussions with a group that contributed little, so he stayed home and lunched at the Lilliefelts' with them and the Bohms. He stayed there talking till 4 p.m. I drove sedately in the green Mercedes, going slowly as I am only emerging from ten days of sick-making anti-parasite medicine, and also hadn't a full tank. A gas shortage closes most stations on Sunday, but I had a hunch I might find an open one in Oxnard, which I did and filled up. I went straight to the Dunnes', and though I hadn't seen Miranda in about two years, it seemed no time to either of us. We sat on the terrace and talked of her reporting life'—she was a reporter for the television news in those days—'at present in Buffalo at the ABC station there, and about the story she has been investigating, the Love Canal chemical dumping…'

S: I remember.

M: You remember that?

S: Yes.

M: '…which has disastrously affected people living there. It is an awful story. Miranda is only here in Malibu till Tuesday. She looks well but thin, works very hard, and is enthused about it. I sat with Amanda and Phil a bit. Then went over to look at the earth cracks. Fred was trying to siphon the last week's rainwater out of the plastic sheeting on the gravel part. The cracks are deeper and wider. The earth has not stabilized yet, and it is one week since they finished the hydroger in the hillside. According to the geologist, we must wait another week to see their effect. I looked at the drainpipes finished yesterday to connect with the six new hydrogers and three old ones and carry any water away from them to the bottom of the canyon. Malibu was at its loveliest. The hillside was covered in wild daisies and nasturtiums blown from some re-scattered seeds years ago, the earth and air were shining. But for the earth cracks, it would've been all peace and beauty, the quiet beckoning to stay in a trance of light and the air of spring on this deceptively lovely edge of the continent. I left instead, marketed, and drove back to Ojai by 5:30 p.m. Krishnaji had discussed with the Lilliefelts and the Bohms the Fritz situation. It is not clear yet. I made soup and artichokes for our supper.'

S: The Fritz situation being that…

M: Fritz was not turning out well.

S: Yes, exactly, I'm just trying to be explicit for the record.

M: It had to end sooner or later.

S: Yes. In what way was it not going well?

M: Well, he was being a guru, and he was doing sort of psychological meetings with people. And he was the boss and knew it all. He was wrong for the job.

S: Yes.

M: April second. 'A quiet day. Renée Weber had lunch with us. She's staying at Arya Vihara. I walked with Krishnaji, Erna, and Theo. Watched the Bill Moyers program on TV.'

The next day, 'I drove to Beverly Hills. Went to the dentist; had a fitting; a haircut; and did various errands. Came back to Ojai by 5:30 p.m., having had the car washed in Ventura on route. Miranda returns to Buffalo.'

April fourth. 'It was a beautiful day. I discussed an automatic watering system for the plants around the house, also planting more orange trees. I fetched Mar de Manziarly to lunch. I walked with Krishnaji and Erna.'

The fifth. 'Another clear, warm day. Desk work. Frances McCann came to lunch. Krishnaji went to look at the Grove with Theo and Mark. I stayed with the typewriter. Then, we both watered the plants.'

There is really nothing the next day, then April seventh, 'The morning was cloudy and cool, but there was no rain. So, at 11:30 a.m., for the first time in two years, Krishnaji was able to speak in his Oak Grove. The first talk was today, and it was very moving. He looked extraordinarily beautiful. As always, he asked me what he should wear, and I urged his heavy mustard-colored Huntsman corduroys, with a green Indian shirt and taupe cardigan—all exceedingly becoming.' [S chuckles.] 'Age vanishes; his face is unlined and shines. He began his talk differently, speaking of goodness, what it is not, why man doesn't have it; how no system, belief, etcetera will bring it about; how only in understanding oneself can a different dimension come about and man can go beyond it. He spoke quietly, with that depth of voice that usually comes for the deepest meditation of his talks, but today it was there from the start. A large audience, in spite of the gas shortage, listened intently. I sat on the ground where I must've sat years ago when I first heard him speak there. His presence, his voice, the atmosphere of the Grove make me feel my life had begun there all those years ago. Is it thirty-five? Now, I live here with him, with all that is beyond describing. I cannot say how it came about. It happened. I did not imagine it, seek it. It happened, and I have been blessed beyond all other life. On the way back in the car, he said, "I was so filled with that, that I was trembling." And coming back through the village, he said, "Drive slowly. I want to faint." He bent slowly forward, but didn't quite faint, and was alright when he reached the house. Alan Kishbaugh lunched with us here in the cottage. I had cooked early the first lunch since we returned from India. It was pleasant to be cooking again, and it is part of the intimacy of home. Later, we walked, Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and Alan Kishbaugh.'

Alan Kishbaugh helping Krishnaji into the grey Mercedes in the Oak Grove after a talk (Copyright Reza Ganjavi)

April eighth. 'It was a clear, beautiful day, and it was beautiful in the Oak Grove where Krishnaji gave his second talk. He stopped neatly after an hour, and we were the first car to leave. We came back on the winding, quieter road, and Krishnaji said, "The minute I stop talking, my head begins." He looked close to fainting in the car but didn't. I had made lunch earlier and Erna, Theo, and Alan Kishbaugh ate with us. Both of us were tired in the afternoon but we walked to the Lilliefelts' and down Grand Avenue. Krishnaji was sick to his stomach; said he ate too much at lunch. Took some bicarbonate of soda at the Lilliefelts', vomited, and felt better. He had only some V8 juice for supper.'

April ninth, 'I worked at the desk, etcetera. Elfriede came to clean. She goes on holiday to Germany on the twenty-first and won't be back here till her return, June fifth, when she will clean the house and put it to bed until our return. We will be in England then. I marketed. A short walk with Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and Alan. I watched part of the Academy Awards on television.'

The tenth, ‘It was windy and clear. Krishnaji held public discussion number one in the Oak Grove. We lunched at Arya Vihara, took naps in the afternoon, and walked with Erna and Theo.’

The next day, ‘I watered and cared for plants most of morning. Krishnaji did some too in the afternoon.’

April twelfth, ‘Krishnaji held the second public discussion in the Oak Grove. Later in the afternoon, we went through the administration building, then the Grove, vegetable garden, etcetera.’

The thirteenth. ‘It was a warm, beautiful day. I did desk work and marketing. In the afternoon, I went to a party at Joe and Carol’s in Meiners Oaks. All the Brockwood people who are here were there. I took Frances McCann home by 6 p.m. Krishnaji had watered all the plants.’

April fourteenth. ‘Another warm, beautiful day for Krishnaji’s third talk in the Oak Grove. There was a large crowd. I sat up on the hill and could hear perfectly as if I was only a yard away from him. The beauty of the trees, the fresh grass, the air alive with ripening summer, and something blessed in that grove seemed the surrounding of his voice and words. We drove back slowly as usual. He lay down for a while while I finished cooking our lunch. Alan Kishbaugh, for the first time, has brought a friend to the talks, and they are both staying at Erna and Theo’s, so he brought her here for lunch: Stella Resnick, a gestalt psychologist. Krishnaji talked a little to her about what she does. At 4 p.m., Alfonso Colón, his nephew Jose, and brother-in-law Armando Riesco, and Hugo Baldi from Argentina came to see Krishnaji. Afterward, we went for a short walk, helped ourselves to a few of the Lilliefelts’ tangelos, but only ones that had fallen on the ground,’ [chuckles] ‘and came back to supper. Ginny and Bill Travers’ film about the lion that Krishnaji and I had seen at their place at Sussex was on television.’ Do remember that?

S: Yes, yes.

M: April fifteenth. ‘It’s Easter Sunday. I telephoned my stepfather, who is now at the Vineyard, and then my cousin Lorna. His voice sounded stronger. He is pleased to be home.’ Anyway, it goes on about my stepfather’s health, but I won’t go into that. ‘At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his fourth talk in the Oak Grove on another perfect day. Lakshmi Shankar and entourage were to arrive for the talk; Evelyne’s having arranged for her to fly back from an engagement in Chicago to sing here at the school for Krishnaji and a benefit concert for the school. After the talk, Krishnaji seemed close to fainting in the car, swaying, but didn’t actually faint. He lay down while I completed cooking. Erna, Alan K., and Stella Resnick lunched with us, but Theo went off to cope with Lakshmi Shankar, who had arrived somehow at Rajagopal’s’ [chuckles] ‘by mistake. She came with her daughter and son-in-law, and an older man to play tabla and his wife, to greet Krishnaji briefly. They touched his feet, and we all sat for a short while before Mark took them to Evelyne’s cottage to change and freshen up. I had barely time to load the dishwasher before Krishnaji and I drove to the Pavilion, and at 4 p.m., Lakshmi sang most beautifully for Krishnaji and the audience, who paid $20 for tickets inside, and $10 on the porch, as donations to the school. Refreshments were served under the trees, and Krishnaji stayed until Lakshmi Shankar left. She seems a nice woman. She had picked slokas and bhajans that she knew Krishnaji would like. To my surprise, she and her daughter kissed me goodbye, most un-Indian, but friendly. Krishnaji watered the patio plants on our return while I fixed supper.'

S: Okay, we're going to have to stop it there because we're not going to have enough tape for the sixteenth.

M: Okay. Alright.

FOOTNOTE:

[1] These letters were dated the day they were meant to be sent to the schools, not the date they were written.

Issue 59: April 16, 1979 to June 19, 1979

This issue contains one of more interesting statements that Krishnaji made about himself. In several previous issues we have seen him question why he had remained so "vague" or "vacant" as a boy, how was he able to avoid the conditioning of his childhood. In discussing with Mary and Mary Lutyens material for the second volume of this biography that Mary L. was writing, Krishnaji, in this issue, questions the source of his insight. After dismissing the popular theories, he says that perhaps he "could not answer the question," but that the two Marys might be able to, and if they did, then he would know if it was right. At another point, Krishnaji says that he didn't think it was "right" for him to make certain investigations into that source of his nature. It seems sufficient to just witness that nature.

Mary: Alright. We begin on April sixteenth, 1979. 'I cleaned house because Elfriede's not coming to clean as she leaves this week for a visit to Germany. A Mrs. Nicolosi and three young people lunched with everyone at Arya Vihara. The Bohms are here. In the afternoon, the Brockwood people who are here for the talks came for tea, and I brought them over to see the cottage. The Malibu Coast Highway is closed to all traffic because of rocks falling.'

The seventeenth. 'Krishnaji gave the third public talk in the Oak Grove. Michael Mendizza filmed parts of it and had David Moody ask for the film, "What is the relation between love and freedom?" To this Krishnaji added, "Responsibility." Walking out after the talk, Krishnaji passed Austin Bee, who was standing behind the cassette stand. Krishnaji stopped and asked, "Who are you, sir?" Bee gave his name, and Krishnaji shook hands with him.' This needs a little background. Austin Bee was assistant and secretary of Rajagopal and ran the K & R office, and was consistently rude to Krishnaji the few times I ever met him. [Laughs.]

Scott: [Chuckles.] And Krishnaji didn't recognize him.

M: No. 'Bee gave his name, and Krishnaji shook hands with him. When I reached the car, a figure was standing there in the shade behind it. At first glance, I didn't see who it was, but then as I was opening the car door, I saw it was Rajagopal, rather shrunken, face more wizened and monkey-like.' He always had a simian look to me.

S: Yes, you've said that.

M: 'He stared at me and I said, "How do you do, Rajagopal," but didn't go to him. Krishnaji was approaching and I introduced to him, before he reached the car, a Frenchman who was waiting to salute him. Krishnaji then went toward his side of the car, saw Rajagopal, but didn't recognize him, either. He asked, "Who are you?"'

'"I'm Rajagopal." He gave Krishnaji a package and said, "This is for you." Krishnaji took his hand and held it, and then Rajagopal said he must go, people were watching. He walked up the road and Krishnaji stood looking shocked and *distrait[1] as he sometimes does after a talk. He had sent word to Blackburn to speak to him after the talk, but now he told Blackburn to meet him at the cottage.' He was very often disoriented after a talk, somehow.

S: Yes, yes. I know. We've discussed this.

M: I wanted to keep people away from him. But he would chide me when I did that.

Mary and Scott at the time the discussion on this issue occurred (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: I know. Still, he needed some kind of protection.

M: Yes. 'He got in the car and urged me to drive away quickly. He looked at his hand, which had a scent that Rajagopal uses, and it disgusted Krishnaji. He said, "What is the matter with my hand? It is unclean. It is not my hand." He held it out the window and said several times, "It is not my hand. It has touched something unclean. That man is evil." He held it without touching anything, as he did in Bombay after the mob had soiled his hands.' They used to grab him…

S: Yes, I know.

M: Yes, you know. And I would have to go in the bathroom, turn on the tap and get the soap so…

S: …he wouldn't have to touch anything. Yes.

M: …he would wash his hands quickly with soap…

S: Yes.

M: …to get off this, this contact, and it was really not just imagined. Some people put his hand in their mouth. It's disgusting. 'The Blackburns were waiting when we got there, but he told them to wait outside. We went into the kitchen, I turned on the tap in the laundry and he washed the hand thoroughly before going out to tell Blackburn that whatever Blackburn is saying—he has now become a sort of guru and she does "healing"—that it has nothing to do with what Krishnaji is doing. We had lunch at Arya Vihara with Erna, Theo, Alan K., and Michael. After lunch, Krishnaji dictated a letter to Rajagopal suggesting they talk things over. The package turned out to be a quartz wristwatch. Krishnaji said, "He knows I don't ever wear a wristwatch. I will give it to Narayan." He felt clean again after the washing. Later we took a walk. The landslide at Big Rock outside Malibu is still raining rocks on the Pacific Coast Highway, which may be closed for weeks or longer.'

S: It's really genuinely nutty for someone to give Krishnaji a wristwatch, knowing he never uses wristwatches; and a quartz one when he has those fabulous mechanical Patek Philippes which he so enjoys. It's very strange.

M: Nothing coming from Rajagopal was ever too strange.

April eighteenth, 'I was unable to get diesel in Ojai. I went into Ventura for kitchen things, marketed, etcetera, but got back for lunch at Arya Vihara. Ruth McCandless was there. Rajagopal had telephoned while I was out and called again during lunch. He said he just wanted to point out that the instructions for using the quartz watch are in the box. I asked him if he wanted to speak to Krishnaji after lunch. He said no. I asked him if he had received Krishnaji's letter. He said, "What letter?" I said it had been posted yesterday and if he hadn't received it, it was probably in his letterbox. Krishnaji made me rest after lunch. He claims I am overtired and this seems to irritate him. Later, he said I continue to make faces and hand gestures.' He was always aware of when I fidgeted. [S chuckles.] 'Perhaps I do, but his irritability seems to be a sign of his own fatigue, too. Miranda was on the 7 o'clock ABC news, nationally reporting on the Hooker Chemical company abuses in Niagara Falls. We saw only the back of her head and hand holding the microphone doing the interview, but her voice was strong and incisive.'

The next day, 'It was another beautiful day. Krishnaji held the fourth public discussion in the Oak Grove. It lasted one-and-a-half hours. We lunched at Arya Vihara. At 4 p.m., we had forty people to tea, mostly people who have come a long distance for the talks: New York, Canada, South America, etcetera. A letter came from Rajagopal, or rather an envelope addressed to me with JK initials under my name. It was a brochure on the watch.' [Laughs.]

S: In case his gift wasn't sufficiently appreciated? [Laughs.]

M: Yes, that's right.

April twentieth. 'I spent the day doing desk work, house work, and errands. Krishnaji did basins around the new orange trees, and we walked to the dip.'

April twenty-first, 'Krishnaji says I still move my hands and mouth unnecessarily, and is determined to help me stop it.' [S chuckles.] 'He now sits opposite me on the floor and I'm absolutely still for some minutes. He says Brahmin boys used to be taught this.' [Both chuckle.] 'I find it very easy. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his fifth Ojai talk in the Oak Grove after which we had lunch alone at home. Krishnaji napped briefly. Vicky Orfaly came by briefly to see the house, bringing a Scriabin recording. At 4 p.m., I went with Krishnaji to the formal dedication of the Oak Grove School buildings. We went through the main house with Mark and the architects, Ron Gammel, etcetera. It looked very nice. Then, with a large crowd looking on and helping, Krishnaji planted a sizable fig tree, the kind that becomes enormous, ficus macrophylla[2]. Next, with the architect Zelma Wilson joined by Max, we went through the school classroom building, also very good-looking.' She designed that one. 'Krishnaji wanted to designate where a wooden fence should go around the Oak Grove itself. So, we walked over there and he will make a statement for posterity that this part of the land must not be built upon or used for purposes other than quiet, serious ones, etcetera. We came back and showed Gammel and colleagues the cottage.'

April twenty-second. 'Krishnaji gave his sixth talk in the Oak Grove, completing this year's series, a very beautiful talk. Mrs. Vigeveno was standing behind the car when I came out. I went up to her and asked her how she was. She said she wanted to greet Krishnaji. She did so and gave him a note from Rajagopal, which said that he, Rajagopal, knew of nothing that needed to be settled between them, but that he wanted to see Krishnaji, "once more." Krishnaji and I had lunch alone, and he rested. Lacerta and Bandi came by at 3 p.m.; they are staying with the Paxtons, who are friends of theirs.' Those are two old friends of mine; Lacerta was German-born, I think. Bandi was the nickname of the husband of a friend of hers and a friend of mine, whose real name was Andrew Marton[3]; his nickname was Bandi. 'Then, at 4 p.m., there was a KFA trustee meeting, mostly to discuss Fritz and the adult center. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Ruth, Alan, with David Bohm and Mark included. Krishnaji is uneasy about Fritz for he has no contact with him, and fears that this is all intellectual with him. He seems serious about the teachings but with no passion in it. Krishnaji suggests Margrete has lessened the spirit for the teachings that Fritz seemed to have when he joined us. Later Krishnaji and I watered all the plants.'

April twenty-third. 'I did house cleaning, etcetera. John Rubel'—that's an architect—'brought clients of Charles Moore to see the house.' Charles Moore was the architect of the new part of this cottage, and John Rubel was a colleague. 'At 4 p.m., Krishnaji had an hour's talk with Fritz. I went to the first meeting to be held in the main house at the school, where parents and staff talked to Brockwood people: Stephen, Wendy, Verna, Matthew Mitchell, Denise, and Francisco.' Who was Francisco?

S: Oh, I remember him. He was a Brockwood staff member.

M: The twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji dictated letters, including one to Rajagopal in which he said that he was sorry that Rajagopal had again closed the door between them, that Krishnaji had wanted to talk over, among other matters, the archives, which were his and not Rajagopal's. He said the door was always open, "wherever I am." Balasundaram, who arrived for the last two talks and is staying with Colonel Noyes, had been invited to lunch at Arya Vihara. He arrived here at 11 a.m., so I had to spend a much-needed-for-other-things hour talking to him before Krishnaji appeared and we went to lunch at Arya Vihara at noon.' Do you remember Colonel Noyes?

S: I do remember Colonel Noyes. His granddaughter came to Brockwood.

M: The next day just says, 'I worked at the desk all day. Krishnaji mostly rested, but talked again to Fritz in the afternoon. We walked to the dip.'

The twenty-sixth of April. 'Krishnaji helped me clean the living room,' [chuckles] 'he with the wide broom and I with a vacuum.' He liked to push those big brooms. 'Earlier, I had washed the floors of the kitchen and hall. Later, Erna told me that Laura would like to clean this house as a job, so she came over and we talked over her cleaning the floors, bathrooms, vacuuming, etcetera and she will start Monday at $5…$5 an hour'!? Times have changed.

S: [laughs] Yes, times have changed.

M: Who was Laura? [Pause.]

S: Well, before this, you mentioned that Ted had a girlfriend named Laura. Perhaps it is she.

M: That's right. That's who it was. It was nice for her to offer to do the house. 'If this works, it will be an excellent arrangement. Elfriede will close and open the house, but cannot keep coming up here from Malibu every week in the future. Laura now lives in the back of the office and is very thorough besides being a nice person. If she does vacuuming, the bathrooms, and the floors once a week, I can do everything else easily. During lunch, Rajagopal telephoned me to ask what Krishnaji was doing during the next days. When was he leaving? I told him that Krishnaji was leaving on the fifteenth. Rajagopal said, "I hope I will see you," and hung up. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion mostly with David Bohm, but trustees and the Oak Grove School staff were present and some joined in. "Is separateness caused by desire?" was the question.'

April twenty-seventh. 'I worked most of the day at the desk. Max came to put missing hardware on some of the doors and windows. I picked up our tickets for London for May fifteenth. Krishnaji had his hair cut at Meiners Oaks.'

A photo of Mary from 1935

The next day, 'Again, I spent much of the day doing desk work. Alasdair planted four more tall ceanothus and cut the hedge by the garage. At 4 p.m., there was a meeting with Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Alan, Ruth, and me, plus Mark, Fritz, and Margrete, about the uses of Arya Vihara, which it was decided should now be called the Old House.' We kept trying to call it that, but nobody did it. [S laughs.] 'We discussed the activity there, who lives there, etcetera. Fritz and Margrete are going to move upstairs when Mark moves to Oak Grove.' Mark and Asha lived upstairs in those days, where Doug now lives. 'Michael remains where he is. The west room will be for the library where Krishnaji's books will be available for visitors, the east room will be for tape listening, and the middle room will be a quiet room. There was talk of a need for a certain atmosphere. Also, it was raised by Krishnaji that we should decide whether visitors or teachers can share rooms with unmarried partners.' [Chuckles.] 'And it was decided that they could not.' That's an ancient, long-gone matter.

S: Yes. [Laughs.]

M: 'Then it was decided that only permanent residents, i.e., Fritz, Margrete, and Michael, live there, except for times when Krishnaji's talks are on and we have visitors from other Krishnamurti Foundations. Fritz and Margrete agreed to all this but perhaps too readily. Later Krishnaji was full of doubts about them. He doesn't think Fritz understands the teachings; that it is all intellectual.'

S: Now, let me just recap here for a minute. This was an agreement reached by everyone that non-married couples would not stay together at Arya Vihara, and Fritz and Margrete were married by then.

M: Yes, I think they were by then, because we didn't know he was planning to marry when Krishnaji offered him the job, and he went back to…where did he come from?

S: Germany, but she was Danish.

M: She was Danish, and he reappeared with her.

The twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji asked Erna and Theo over after breakfast to speak of the Fritz business. He feels strongly that it is not going to work out, that Fritz hasn't a feeling for all this, has no communication with him, and that it is all talk. We questioned the whole adult center activity. Erna and I feel that we should let Fritz and Margrete have more of a try. Theo is more pessimistic. Both were at lunch, but walking back from the Old House, David Bohm told Krishnaji in confidence that Fritz is quite upset, and though Fritz didn't say so, Dave feels they want to leave. We told this to Erna and Theo at 3:30 p.m. so that we could consider what to do with the Old House if they do leave. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with Dave, the rest of us, and Oak Grove School teachers. A continuation of Thursday's meeting. "Is thought based on desire? Is there an action not based on this?" I spoke to my stepfather at Martha's Vineyard. His eyes are bad and the lonely meals are hard on him.'

S: What was Fritz upset about?

M: I don't know. I don't think they liked the job, and felt things were not working.

S: He felt, if I remember correctly, and I might be wrong in this, but he seemed to have some notion that he was going to be more central.

M: What?

S: Well, he was the one who…

M: …who understood everything.

S: Yes, and who people would come to—to discuss things when Krishnaji was no longer there. So, he was expecting to be put into a position of prominence that never panned out.

M: In fact, he must've picked up, from all these meetings alone with Krishnaji, that things were not working.

S: Yes, he must've picked that up, and he was not being given the prominence and the accolades that he expected. I remember this; I'm pretty sure that what I've just said is correct. I wasn't in Ojai at the time, but Fritz and I had several conversations at Brockwood and Saanen, and there was always that feeling, from Margrete, too.

M: Yes. And I think she rather encouraged that. Fritz wasn't being treated with proper respect, though she didn't say that, but that was the atmosphere.

S: Yes. Well, he had a Ph.D. in physics, and he should've been treated almost like David Bohm, who was looked up to by people.

M: Yes. The thirtieth. 'Laura did the cleaning. Saral and David Bohm left for Canada after lunch. Krishnaji had a glaucoma pressure check, and was found to have no problems. At 4 p.m., Balasundaram came to see Krishnaji and talked for an hour. The geologist telephoned me with problems in getting a permit for the earth project in Malibu, so I talked to the county office. Krishnaji and I walked with Erna and Theo to the dip.'

The first of May. 'Each morning, Krishnaji sits quietly opposite of me on the floor to teach me to be still,' [S chuckles] 'not move my hands, face, etcetera, unnecessarily. Then, he does a vigorous massage of neck and back to help circulation in my leg and keep away headaches. Sometimes he jokes when I thank him, "I must help my benefactress."' [Both laugh.] 'This morning, he said, "I wouldn't do it if I didn't like you. Remember that." Pause, then, "Well, I guess I would, but you know what I mean."' [Both chuckle.] 'I did much laundry, but Laura Martin, having done the floors yesterday, a business arrangement between us that I hope will be permanent, was a considerable help. I worked at the desk most of the morning. Evelyne and the Mendizzas, the Bohms, and Michael were at lunch, and at 4 p.m., Krishnaji and I joined them by the school where Krishnaji was photographed walking, also in the Oak Grove. He is quite bored with this filming and luckily this was the final chore in it for him. It took almost two hours. But earlier after lunch, Michael Mendizza had shown us a few clips of the film, which made me feel it may turn out well. I said I would like to see the text of the narration when it is done and also the film itself before it is final. This could be on my return in November. They agree. A note from Rajagopal came for Krishnaji with a clipping of a sentimental poem on friendship and two lines underneath saying this is what he would feel all his life, and even afterward. Krishnaji was so disgusted he barely glanced at it. It was one of those "Friendship is when…etcetera, etcetera." The temptation is to reply that friendship isn't when one steals, etcetera, etcetera.' [Chuckles.] 'Balasundaram came and talked to Krishnaji for an hour yesterday. He had seen Rajagopal, and said that he had urged him to return the archives and be friendly before he dies. He said Rajagopal refused to discuss the archives, and was keeping things to defend himself, "in case they attack me," and said, "They are hoping for my demise." Balasundaram himself headed off Krishnaji's asking him to return the Rishi Valley tapes he had made off with when he left Rishi Valley by weeping and saying that Krishnaji and his teachings meant everything to him. Devious fellows,' I say. 'In the evening I wrote a letter to the L.A. County about a permit to correct the Malibu landslide danger and posted it in hopes a permit will be issued and this mountainously complicated thing can begin. It has been one difficulty after another in Malibu since we left.'

May second. ‘I spent most of the day working at the desk. Balasundaram lunched with us at the Old House. Krishnaji discussed with Erna, Theo, Mark, and me about Fritz. My brother rang from New York. He and Lisa are going to San Francisco tomorrow on business and to see Liddy’—that’s one of my brother’s daughters.

May third. ‘Krishnaji talked with Fritz at 10:30 a.m. Then, Krishnaji, Fritz, Margrete, Mark, Erna, Theo, and I talked anew about the adult center and the use of the Old House. It was a different atmosphere and a more constructive talk. Krishnaji “really worked,” he said, at getting through to Fritz, and things seemed better. I had to skip lunch and go to the bank for a cashier’s check for the L.A. County engineer to put up a surety bond for each piling project at the “toe” of the hillside in Malibu in order to get a permit. Amanda and Phil arrived at 2:30 p.m. and we spent a pleasant time sitting and talking. Phil took the check to deliver for me to the county office in Malibu. After they left, Krishnaji washed the green car and I had a staggering estimate from some earth moving contractor in Topanga of $26,000. After a long discussion with him, I got it down to $15,000 to $17,000. It will be on a time basis. All this has become a mounting disaster.’

May fourth. ‘In the British election, Labor’s Callaghan is out and Margaret Thatcher becomes prime minister. Krishnaji cannot watch her on TV. “That awful bourgeois woman. He now has two bête noire in England, Thatcher and the Queen.”’ [S chuckles.] ‘At 11 a.m., Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went in the green Mercedes to Santa Barbara where at the IRS office, in less than five minutes, we got Krishnaji’s tax clearance, which he needs as a resident each time he leaves the county.’ Well, he had no income, no nothing, so it was easy. ‘We stopped at the Danish store and bought teakwood oil for cleaning the furniture.’ The teakwood furniture needs oiling or it did then. ‘Then, we lunched at The Tea House, after which we drove pleasantly back along the beach and then through the mountains, which pleased Krishnaji. Lake Casitas was beautiful. At lunch, Krishnaji asked what each would do if we had a lot of money; “something extravagant” he was asking for. None of us could come up with a sufficiently frivolous answer.’ [Chuckles.] ‘Good works were out, taken for granted. But after them, what? Krishnaji, laughing, said, “I’d probably keep getting the newest Mercedes, not going anywhere, just washing it every week.”’ [Both laugh.] ‘I thought I might keep Rajagopal tied up in law courts until he handed over everything to Krishnaji and did penance.’ [S chuckles.] ‘We queued up for gas in Ojai with about ten other cars ahead of us. The shortage is beginning to tie up California. Balasundaram telephoned to say goodbye and to tell us that Rajagopal had rung him six times last night wanting to see Balasundaram again and asking if we had sent him as an emissary. I spoke to the geologist. The permit was finally issued this morning and the earthwork begun. The earth moving man, on his own, asked Phil and Amanda if some earth could be piled temporarily on their side of the bottom of the canyon, and they agreed. It is still a cliffhanger whether we will get a permit to move sufficient earth smoothly from Cal Trans’—Cal Trans is the California Transit Authority, the road people—‘as there is litigation over the Big Rock slide.’ That’s part way down the highway toward Santa Monica, which is always sliding. ‘Krishnaji wants to come with me to Malibu tomorrow. He wants to drive his car, and is shy to do it when the Lilliefelts are there, as today. He said, “They might worry.”’ [Chuckles.]

May fifth, 'Lorna'—that's my cousin—'called about my stepfather's health. Krishnaji and I left for Malibu at 10:30 a.m. in the green Mercedes, Krishnaji driving the usual part from the poplar trees on the Pacific Coast Highway. There was hardly a car on the road along the ocean due to the Pacific Coast Highway closure at Big Rock.' Big Rock was to the south of Malibu, toward Santa Monica, but we come from the north, so we could get where we wanted to go. 'We went right to the Dunnes', and walked down their road to the bottom of our canyon, where I met the man from Topanga Unlimited, which is doing the earth piling. We discussed and signed an agreement for a $15,000-to-$20,000 cost. Walked back up with Krishnaji and ate a rice salad and fruit that we had brought, sitting on the terrace with Amanda and Phil. Krishnaji was amused by a newspaper column that Phil read about the fencing of California and of its Governor Moonbeam.' Do you remember Governor Moonbeam? [Laughing.]

S: Yes, Brown!

M: That's right. [Chuckles.] 'We watched the Kentucky Darby on television…' Derby, we say in this country, Derby. One has to be careful between the Darby in England and the Derby here. 'It was won by Spectacular Bid. Then, Krishnaji and I went over to our side, saw Fred, and saw the deterioration of the earth. Cracks are eight to ten feet wide; in places, they go down six feet. I don't know how to arrange it after the earth slide is arrested; but think planning should wait until it is certain that no more movement is expected, and my return in November. Except for the disaster area, the place looks so beautiful. Roses are enormous and in full bloom. I gathered an armful. We drove back. Krishnaji again at the wheel for the usual part. "May I talk seriously?" he said as we were away up the quiet, empty road.' [Long pause.] '"Because of our relationship, I'd never leave you. That will never change. There is something sacred in it. People don't understand this." He's thinking about what he will say tomorrow in the discussion with the staff on the business of relationships, and in particular, the not sharing of rooms by unmarried couples. He had been sorting out in conversations, the past few days, the differences in relationship seriousness.' I'm surprised that there were such discussions.

S: I am, too.

M: Yes. I don't remember them.

The next day. 'At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a continuation of last Sunday's discussion with the staff. The discussion was on the relationship in which there is no self. Max and his brother, Alan Tansill, were also there. I told Max about Malibu and he is going to take a look on Wednesday. Afterward, Theo brought Krishnaji five little silver boxes gilded inside and put in each tiny pieces of jewels. This is Theo's gift and project, and he is very intense about it. We sat around the table as he arranged it all before Krishnaji. Then, Krishnaji stayed alone with them for about five minutes and did whatever he does while we sat in the living room. Krishnaji closed the boxes, then called us back and the boxes were put in a bag, which Krishnaji will keep on his person for some days. Later, one box will go in the school building in some secret place, and one in the Grove. The others are to be kept for the future. There is, of course, one in this house, put in the foundation by

Theo when it was being built, and one similarly in the school main house. This is an ancient Indian notion of bringing a certain atmosphere, a religious quality to a place. Krishnaji jokes about it lightly, but it was his idea to do it, eagerly accepted by Theo as his task. At 10 p.m., I telephoned Filomena in Rome. It was May seventh in Rome and her birthday. She said she'd fallen and broken her hip last week, but she is not in a cast and she is alright. Her voice sounded strong and well.'

S: I wonder where Theo put the others.

M: I don't remember. How many were there? [Pause.] It says five little silver boxes he brought.

S: Yes, but then one was…

M: One was…well, he'd already put the one in this house.

S: He'd already put those in, yes. And he'd already put the one in the schoolhouse.

M: In the schoolhouse, and one in the Grove.

S: So, I wonder what happened to them?

M: I don't know. Erna would've had them when Theo died. I don't know. That was Theo's project.

The next day there isn't anything but desk work and housework.

The eighth of May, 'I left early for errands in Los Angeles, to Bamberger about taxes, and payments for the earth piling in Malibu; then to Helen for a haircut, and finally bought a new suitcase. There were long lines at all gas stations. I heard that the Pacific Coast Highway, which has been open for three days, had to be closed again after another slide at Big Rock. Got back to Ojai before 5 p.m., but joined a queue at the Chevron station, and after forty-five minutes, was able to fill the diesel in the Mercedes, so at least it will have fuel when I return in the autumn. Krishnaji was watering the plants. Alain Naudé called; he plans to drive down here from San Francisco tomorrow in his new Honda if he can get gas. He has his U.S. citizenship.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated letters, including a reply to Rajagopal's sending him a corny clipping on friendship. Alain rang in the afternoon, saying he had to turn back to San Francisco for lack of gas.'

May tenth, 'Automatic sprinklers were put in along the walk up to the front door here. Dr. Geschickter, who years ago was assistant to Dr. Bloodgood'—Bloodgood was the head of orthopedics at Johns Hopkins who prescribed the experimental radiation treatment for the tumor in my leg in 1931, and has followed my case—'came to tea with his sister-in-law and her husband. He gave me some useful advice on the leg, including not to let blood sugar levels drop, i.e., if suddenly tired, eat something. And said that radiation of the leg wasn't the kind that is accumulative in the body, but to avoid X-rays. Krishnaji received a letter from Rajagopal and had me telephone him to review his accusations that when KF India had published the collected works, it was "in complete violation of the letter and the spirit of the settlement." Also, he affirmed his statement that he had not removed anything from the archives. What ensued was an interminable, impossible conversation. I tried to make the points that the KF India had not published any collected works. The only collected works I knew of in India were by Chetena.' Do you remember that other publisher, Chetena? 'That I had met the head of Chetena in Bombay and asked him if he were publishing without Rajagopal's permission and he said he hadn't "up to a point." Rajagopal didn't pursue this and said, "Never mind about it." I then spoke of his denial of removing archives material, and asked if that meant he was restoring the missing material?'

A fashion photo of Mary

'Rajagopal: "All the letters that you and others have been claiming do not belong to the archives. Everything that belongs in the archives are there."' That means he had them at his house. 'He said the archives were not defined. I said, on the contrary, they were spelled out in the legal agreement, etcetera. He denied that the letters, Krishnaji's manuscript, and materials sent by Jinarajadasa for Krishnaji belong to the archives. He said if there is anything specific Krishnaji wants to see, he should list things specifically, and then he would make a copy'—meaning he, Rajagopal—'he denied that he had withheld part of Pupul's account of events in Ootacamund even though Pupul says much of it is missing in the copies that Rajagopal gave. He said if Krishnaji wants something, which he remembers and which might be there, he will be glad to make a copy, but he must know exactly what it is, and it still may not be there. Rajagopal said, "I don't claim anything is mine, but everything which has been sent for the archives is already in the archives." I asked if he once said original manuscripts had been destroyed by him. He replied, "I said 'may have.'" He said, "If they are gone, I have not got them. I can't produce them. For the last fifty years I have been doing this work. What is the reason you question me now?" I said he was not giving sensible answers, and asked if he had the manuscripts, was he willing for Krishnaji to look at them?'

'Rajagopal: "He can see anything he wants to in my house." He said there were only typewritten manuscripts, not in Krishnaji's handwriting.'

'I asked what happened to the original; they are the most valuable and precious part of any archive material.'

'Rajagopal: "He can see whatever there is, but he must ask exactly what manuscripts, not generally this or that. He must be specific. Whatever is not there cannot be produced. If you don't believe me, I am sorry."'

'I asked again about Pupul's statement. And he said, "Why should you accept her statement? She may have forgotten. Anyway, nothing can be done about it. I can't produce them, and if you don't believe it and he doesn't believe what I am telling you, it is too bad. I do not wish to talk to him indirectly. There is no point in talking. For ten years, I've been trying to talk to him, not in connection with these things. I have been treated as someone who has done something wrong. I am not coming to him as a penitent. I am talking of that. It is not possible to divorce the work I am doing, to live completely isolated. There are things which are of concern to both of us."'

'I said, "We are all trying to find some way so that things can be sorted out in a friendly, amicable way and establish an amicable relationship between us."' These are the kind of conversations I used to have with him. [S chuckles.] Absolutely intransigent; lying and so forth.

The next day, 'I am mostly doing desk work. Sprinklers continue to be put in. Rajagopal telephoned me to acknowledge that Krishnaji's letter came to him.'

May twelfth is 'Krishnaji's eighty-fourth birthday, though, as always, he waved away any mention of it. It was a very hot day, but the adobe walls keep that wing cool and comfortable. I did desk work all day, including writing a letter to Rajagopal, putting on paper what I had said variously in Thursday's telephone conversation.'

The next day, 'It is a hot day in the nineties. The air conditioning in the old part of the cottage is not working. I spent much of the day packing. Talked to Bud, Miranda, etcetera. Krishnaji washed the green car.'

And for the following day I am still, 'Packing. Krishnaji washed the gray Mercedes before Dieter came to put both cars up on blocks for the summer. I telephoned my stepfather at the Vineyard, and said I would come to see him in November.'

The next is both May sixteenth and seventeenth as we were crossing time zones. 'I finally finished packing, and did all the laundry I could. Rajagopal telephoned to say he was "verbally acknowledging" my letter, and also to ask if Krishnaji and I were going to New York. "I just wondered in case I want to telephone."' [Chuckles.]

S: He was nutty.

M: Completely nutty. 'There was a noon lunch at Arya Vihara, and at 1:30 p.m., Krishnaji, Mark, and I left in the school van. We went the inland way as the Pacific Coast Highway is closed again by the Big Rock slide. We got to LAX by 4 p.m., and checked in. I sat with the hand luggage, while Krishnaji and Mark stood looking at the aircraft.' Krishnaji used to wander around in airports, and I was afraid to leave the hand luggage in case it'd be stolen. And he would go off, and I…[both laugh] was afraid I'd lose him, or something.

S: Yes.

M: It was very frustrating. [S chuckles again.] 'Krishnaji and Mark stood looking at the aircraft, a 747, and Krishnaji noticed a crack near one of the doors. Pretty soon some ground crew noticed it too, and instead of boarding and taking off at 5:30 p.m., we sat till 9 p.m., and left in a substitute plane, which stopped to refuel in New York at 5 a.m. where Krishnaji and I walked around for exercise for forty-five minutes. It was too early to telephone my brother. So, on we flew and landed at Heathrow at 6 p.m., a relatively quiet time there. So, a porter and luggage were quickly had. Dorothy, in her Cortina, took Krishnaji and me, and Ingrid and Stephen took the luggage. It was 9 p.m. when we reached Brockwood, but still light. The students and staff were on the driveway to greet Krishnaji. He and I had supper quickly, alone in our little kitchen. "How quiet it is," said Krishnaji. How green Brockwood is—the spring has been cold and late, so the leaves on the beech trees are just beginning. I went straight to bed and deeply to sleep.'

May seventeenth, 'I woke up a little after 4 a.m., and felt like getting up, so I unpacked, bathed, dressed, and all was in order before getting breakfast. A satisfaction. Krishnaji slept most of the morning, but got up for lunch. Narayan, Venkataraman, and Mrs. Premilla Rajan were here from Rishi Valley. Dr. Parchure arrived from Bombay in the evening. I talked to Mary Links; she and Joe are just back from Venice.'

The eighteenth: 'In the morning, I talked in the kitchen to Dr. Parchure at length. Edna Cleeve came to clean. I ran the washing machine, which leaked, and the ceiling in the hall below fell in. The rug is badly spotted.' [Laughs.] There was always a leak!

S: I know [laughing].

M: 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and the dogs and I walked across the fields. I feel again the wordless love for and beauty of this land. Went to the staff meeting at 5 p.m., and eased into Brockwood life as if it were an uninterrupted thread from Ojai, which, of course, it is.' [With great feeling in her voice:] I love Brockwood so much.

S: Yes, I do too. I do too.

M: I want to cry when I read about it.

S: Yes.

M: The nineteenth. 'I did desk work. There was a long discussion at lunch about the purposes of the schools. We walked.'

May twentieth. 'Krishnaji talked to the school. John McGreevy…' Oh, he was the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation man who did that film with Krishnaji walking through the garden and Krishnaji never liked that thing.

S: Was that the one that Krishnaji was speaking through the glass of the window?

M: Yes.

S: That was a terrible film.

M: Yes, anyway, 'John McGreevy, who did the Canadian Broadcasting Company film on Krishnaji, and his colleague Jennifer Pancher came to talk and lunch. He has just done a series on various cities of the world seen through the eyes of individuals. For example, he did one on Leningrad with Peter Ustinov, and just completed one on London with Jonathan Miller. McGreevy said that Miller is going to do a series of his own and should talk to Krishnaji. At 6:30 p.m., the students put on Anouilh's Antigone in the Assembly Hall. Daphne Maroger played Antigone. Krishnaji attended and stayed for all of it; he thought they were very good. There was a "Greek" supper afterward. The whole school seemed happy and united.'

S: Kathy produced that. I think that was Kathy's first drama production at Brockwood.

M: Oh, yes, I remember she did that.

S: It was one of the best, that and the other play that she did were the two best plays that we had ever done at Brockwood.

M: She should've gone on doing that.

S: I know.

M: May twenty-first. ‘Krishnaji slept poorly. We’re changing his supper menu from soup to a cooked vegetable. Krishnaji saw Shankar Ramachandran, a student, after lunch. We walked a little. There was a school meeting.’

The next day. ‘I went to Winchester on errands, and Krishnaji spoke to students. We walked in the afternoon, then I telephoned Vanda.’

May twenty-third was ‘a quiet day. I worked at my desk and walked in the afternoon with Krishnaji. The car was given a new battery and put in running order. I telephoned Filomena in Rome.’

May twenty-fourth. ‘We took the 10:20 a.m. train to London. Mary and Joe met us at Waterloo and drove Krishnaji to Huntsman. I went to the bank and then met Krishnaji at Truefitt where he had his hair cut. Then we walked to Fortnum’s where Mary joined us for lunch. She told Krishnaji she will do the second volume of his biography. She has just finished a book about her grandfather, Edward Robert Lytton Bulwer-Lytton, 1st Earl of Lytton and Viceroy of India, and will next do one on her father, the famous architect, Sir Edward Lutyens, and then do Krishnaji’s. She says she’s figured out a way to do it without a whitewash of the troubles with Rajagopal. It will be on the teachings and much less personal material than the earlier one. Krishnaji was very pleased, and I feel a huge sense of something good happening. I feared she didn’t want to take on the second volume. I have a deep sense of good in her making the decision to do it. Joe kindly drove Krishnaji to the dentist. I did some more errands and then went to Portland Place’—that’s where the dentist was—‘in time for Joe to take both of us back to Waterloo.’

The twenty-fifth, ‘I met Mary Cadogan at 11 a.m. at Petersfield. She stayed to lunch. Krishnaji talked to the staff in the afternoon at 5 p.m.’

Then there’s not much for the next two days except that on the twenty-seventh, ‘Krishnaji spoke to school at noon.’

May twenty-eighth. ‘Krishnaji dictated the thirty-second Letters to the Schools to be mailed out next December fifteenth. I talked to Ginny Travers’—that’s Virginia McKenna. ‘She’s in rehearsal for the opening of The King and I with Yul Brynner.’

The next day. ‘Krishnaji spoke to students while the staff had a meeting. After lunch, I took Narayan, Shakuntala, Natasha, and Premilla Rajan to Winchester.’

May thirtieth. ‘I telephoned to Dr. Scheef to tell him we won’t go to Bonn this year, but he said he will send medication for us to someone in Germany who will bring it to Saanen. I made our travel reservations for London to Geneva for July first. In the afternoon, Krishnaji discussed student exchanges between Brockwood and India with Dorothy, Narayan, Dr. Parchure, Venkataraman, Mrs. Rajan, Scott, Kathy, Julie Desnick, and Kathy Harris.’

May thirty-first. 'Krishnaji, Narayan, and I took the 10:23 a.m. train to London. Joe met us, dropped Narayan in Piccadilly, and Krishnaji and me at Huntsman. We later took a taxi to Mary and Joe's, and lunched with them at their flat. Krishnaji talked a bit to Mary about the biography, especially the question of what gives him his insight. Is it the Maitreya theory, Krishnaji's own development, or is there some other thing manifesting? Krishnaji says he doesn't know. He has feelings that he shouldn't ask, but perhaps in going into it with Mary and me, we can find an answer.' That's when he made that curious statement. 'Mary is eager to talk to him on these matters, and will come down to Brockwood Monday. Joe took Krishnaji to Mr. Thompson at 2:45 p.m., and took me later to join him. Thompson operated on Krishnaji's upper right gum, cleaned out some infection, and sewed it up with a pack. It took about an hour.' He had horrible things happen to him. 'Joe took us back to Waterloo where we caught the 4:20 p.m. back to Petersfield.'

June first. 'Krishnaji is not in too much pain, he says. But he chews only on one side. He is laughing at the TIME magazine saying that some call Mrs. Thatcher "Attila the Hen."' [Both laugh.] 'I took Premilla Rajan to Winchester. We walked along the river Itchen, did an hour's tour of Winchester College together, then I took her around, saw the cathedral and we were back in time for lunch. I went alone to Petersfield afterward to get plants, etcetera, for the house. Radha Burnier arrived just in time to attend a staff meeting with Krishnaji, a discussion of what is opinion.'

June second. 'Dorothy drove Krishnaji, Radha Burnier, and me to London. We had a picnic hamper and intended to have lunch in Hyde Park, but it was crowded. So, we went looking for a quiet place on side streets and wound up at a free parking space in the shade opposite Mary and Joe's. We ate our picnic nicely in the car and then went to see the Indian film highly recommended by Pupul, Satyajit Ray's The Chess Players.' [Chuckles.] Did you ever see that?

S: No.

M: 'Not marvelous, but alright. Got back by 7:30 p.m. Radha and I had supper in the West Wing kitchen. On my way back, Krishnaji intently quizzed us on "What has man done in these thousands of years?"' [Light chuckle.] 'Developed outwardly but not inwardly. How true.'

S: Yes.

M: June third, 'The Marogers, Jean-Michel, Marie-Bertrande, Diane, and cousin Pauline de Grémont arrived.' Do you remember her?

S: Oh, yes.

M: She was nice. 'Krishnaji spoke to the whole school at noon. In the afternoon, he treated Diane, and then had a long talk with Jean-Michel, Marie-Bertrande, and me about Diane. Her bones are getting stronger, but she has not grown in length. She is now twelve-and-a-half and her classmates in school are shooting up. Her parents are obviously very concerned. Krishnaji was very intense. He said, "I would give my life to her if I could." I had been silently thinking the same. Krishnaji talked at first as if he were telling the parents what Diane faces, something they live with every day, worry over, and have faced all these years. He told them about Isabelle Mallet, who was disabled and fell in love with him, and asked to be loved, etcetera. This is when he was young. He said, "I was too young to understand what she really wanted. I liked her, went to see her every day, but was too innocent to understand." He told about the woman in Madras with a broken hip whom he saw and she was cured, and Fresia, whose cardio X-rays changed overnight. "What we need is a miracle," he said.'

June fourth, 'Mary Links and Amanda came at 11 a.m. We sat in Krishnaji's room and he talked about the biography. What had kept him "vacant" as a boy? Either some power that wished to manifest—like the Maitreya theory. Or was there an innate something in the boy, an evolution through incarnations, which Krishnaji said is superstition. Or was there a power of goodness, which entered the boy. "I've always felt protected," he said. And then, "If I enter an airplane, it will not fall." But he kept asking and asking the question of how was the boy vacant and what kept him that way? We stopped while he dressed, and Mary and I talked alone in the drawing room. Then, after lunch we resumed with Krishnaji continuing the same inquiry. I took partial notes. Toward the end of the discussion, he said that perhaps he could not answer the question, but perhaps Mary or I could, and if we did, then he would know if it was right.' This is that well-known conversation.

S: Yes.

M: 'He said the Maitreya or reincarnated body prepared over a number of lives theories were "suspect." It would mean that it was restricted to him, and the teachings say that all can achieve it or "It is not worth it otherwise." At 4 p.m., he saw Diane. Then the walk was with Narayan, Dorothy, and me. In the evening he talked to Narayan with Dr. Parchure and me present. He is concerned that Narayan might become authoritarian and set in his ways, as others have before him.'

The next day it just says: 'Krishnaji spoke to students. I went to a staff meeting. Krishnaji treated Diane.'

June sixth. 'I took the 9:23 a.m. train to London, determined to use the Underground and, on it, got to Connaught Street, where Mr. Gordon of Mayfair, Mary's hairdresser, cut my hair acceptably. Then I went to Diemel on Bond Street and got some underthings for Krishnaji, including trunks, as they are called, that don't have elastic. They button.' [Chuckles.] Didn't you inherit some of his Diemel undershirts?"

S: Yes, I did, and have them to this day.

M: 'I fetched new eyeglasses. Then went to see Betsy, who has taken Liz Pringle's small house off the Fulham Road. A nice little house with a tiny garden and very nice Jamaican maid. Betsy is intent on buying a flat in London. I caught the 4:20 p.m. back to Petersfield. Had supper on a tray with Krishnaji and watched Dave Allen on TV,' [both chuckle] 'a very funny man. Krishnaji had treated Diane.'

Mary in 1979, at Brockwood. This is the year covered in this issue (Copyright Mary Zimbalist).

June seventh, 'Krishnaji and I went to London on the 10:23 a.m. train. Joe Links, once again, kindly met Krishnaji and drove us to Huntsman. We shopped for a present for Vanda, and found a beige jersey at Peal's. We bought some books at Hatchards and then lunched with Mary and Alain Naudé, who arrived from San Francisco yesterday. He is going on after a week to see Vanda in Florence, then to Zurich to see Dr. Künzli, who was an orthopedic whiz, about a homeopathy book translation.' Alain had translated one of those bible homeopathic things.

S: I remember.

M: 'A pleasant, talkative lunch, but Krishnaji feels he has lost touch with Alain. "He has left us." I think he means the teachings, as well as us, though on the surface we are friendly and have much to laugh and chat about. Joe again, the endlessly kind man, drove Krishnaji and me to Mr. Thompson, where the stitches from last week's gum operation were removed in fifteen minutes, and we were off to Waterloo.'

June eighth. ‘I worked at the desk most of the morning while Krishnaji rested. He saw Diane, and at 5 p.m., talked to the staff about thinking together.’ [S chuckles.] Does that ring a bell in your brain?

S: Boy, does it ever. [M chuckles.]

M: The next day just says, ‘Krishnaji dictated letters, treated Diane at 4 p.m., and talked to Gizelle Questiau. We walked in a rapture of flowers.’ [S laughs.]

June tenth.‘Krishnaji talked to the school. Balasundaram arrived in the afternoon to spend three days. He and Narayan have not met or spoken in some years, not since Narayan took over the principal-ship from Balasundaram at Rishi Valley. Probably it is good for them to be thrown together here. Krishnaji saw Diane and asked the Marogers to stay on another three days. He told me that when he treats her, the room becomes filled with something. We walked. I moved the Marogers up to the West Wing dining room, as Radha is still in the guest room.’

There’s nothing of note for the next day, but for the twelfth it says: ‘I did desk work, but Krishnaji spoke to students, while there was a staff meeting, which I attended. The Marogers left. I put Narayan in the West Wing dining room.’

June thirteenth, ‘I went to London alone for Krishnaji’s Swiss visa and miscellaneous errands, taking the Tube and walking. Yesterday, Elfriede rang me from Malibu, but I was on a walk and not given the message till just as I was leaving this morning. So I went into Claridge’s and called her from there. She is just back from a six-weeks holiday in Germany, and wanted permission to have Calvin do the weeds, which are too much for Lorry. The earth has sunk so that the leach field has to be relocated. She said a prospective buyer has been around. I was too tired to go to the museum as I had intended. So I went back to Brockwood, and early to sleep.’

The fourteenth. ‘Sarjit Siddoo, her husband, and her child are here. Balasundaram left. I took Radha Burnier to the Petersfield train station in the afternoon. Krishnaji talked to Sarjit Siddoo’s husband. It rains and then it rains.’

June fifteenth. ‘It is a cold day. I spent most of it doing desk work. Krishnaji talked to the student, Shankar, after lunch. We had a short walk, then he talked to the staff at 5 p.m.’

The next day, ‘There is some sun. I typed Letters to the Schools. Krishnaji talked to Shankar again in the morning, and the staff had a meeting with Shankar in afternoon. He has decided to go to a U.S. university. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields. Betsy telephoned. She has made an offer on a flat.’

The seventeenth, ‘Krishnaji talked to the school. I typed Letters to the Schools. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji did a discussion, which Scott videotaped, with five teachers: Harsh, Stephen, Wendy, Brian Nicholson, and Matthew Mitchell. We walked afterward.’

The next day just says, ‘I worked on typing the Letters to the Schools and doing housework. Walked across the fields. A warm day.’

June nineteenth. ‘A warm day, the first one here. Krishnaji spoke alone with the students at noon, while I went to a staff meeting. Krishnaji saw Denise Sullivan after lunch.’ Who was Denise Sullivan?

S: She was a teacher.

M: Oh. ‘And later, he, Dorothy, and I pruned rhododendron blossoms in the grove, but Krishnaji began to feel hay fever and returned to the house. I talked with Fleur in London.’

S: Okay. We have to end it there, I’m afraid.

M: Alright.

S: We’ve run out of tape.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] French for “faraway,” “vacant,” “abstracted,” etcetera.

[2] Interestingly, a type of banyan tree that he was so fond of in India.

[3] A film director, producer, and editor who, as second unit director, directed the chariot race in Sam’s film, Ben Hur.

Issue 60: June 20, 1979 to October 10, 1979

This issue seems to glide sweetly through the summer of 1979, from Brockwood to Saanen and back to Brockwood without anything major occurring. But Krishnaji's health and fatigue are worrying, especially considering he is about to return to India which always depleted him.

Mary: We start today's discussion with the events of June 20, 1979, and for that day my diary reads, 'It is a hot day. Krishnaji did a videotaped discussion with Brockwood teachers. I went to London with Dorothy and some students. I went alone to Harrods for some photocopying, then to a Victoria and Albert Museum exhibit and looked at other things till mid-afternoon. After that, I went to Betsy's for tea and a rest. Finally, I went by bus and Tube to the Roundhouse theater and joined the Brockwood group, where we saw Ibsen's Lady from the Sea played by Vanessa Redgrave and Terence Stamp. I drove home with Dorothy and some others, getting back by 1 a.m.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I went to the Petersfield train station to go to London, but the train was late and Krishnaji was sick to his stomach, so we came back to Brockwood and he spent the day in bed. It is a colic pain with nausea, but it went away. We were to have had lunch with Mary L. and discuss the new biography, but she may come down here next week.'

On June twenty-second it only says that, 'I did desk work all day. The weather was cold and damp again. Krishnaji rested all day except for getting up for lunch.' And the following day it just says that, 'Krishnaji did a videotaped discussion with teachers in the afternoon.'

June twenty-fourth. 'At noon, Krishnaji talked to the whole school. Lou Blau telephoned me after being in Malibu with the geologist and Max, and they agreed to take $10,000 off the price of the house for the leach field problems.' The ground had sunk so badly that the leach field was damaged and had to be replaced.

June twenty-fifth, 'I met Mary Links at the Petersfield station. We talked with Krishnaji before and after lunch on things for the second volume of the biography. I made notes as I did last time.' I would make notes of these discussions and then send them off to Mary.

The next day it just says, 'Krishnaji talked to the students alone[1]. I went to the staff meeting.' When Krishnaji talked alone to the students, the staff would usually have a staff meeting.

June twenty-seventh, 'I went alone to London and did several errands, and bought an Aquascutum coat. Then I went to a matinee of The King and I with Ginny McKenna and Yul Brynner.' They were the actors. 'I went backstage afterward and had tea with Ginny, took the Tube back to Waterloo, and the 7:20 p.m. train back to Petersfield. Krishnaji had talked to Kathy Harris and Dr. Rahula.'

June twenty-eighth. ‘Krishnaji held two videotaped discussions with Dr. Rahula, Phiroz Mehta, Narayan, Dr. Parchure, Stephen Smith, Shakuntala, Scott Forbes, and me. The first was in the morning and again in the afternoon.’

For the next two days, most of what was happening was packing.

July first. ‘I did as much laundry as possible before lunch at 12:30 p.m. George Digby and Sybil Dobinson were there. Dorothy, Montague, and Doris left in the Land Rover for Saanen. Ingrid drove Krishnaji and me to Heathrow, where at 3:55 p.m. we went by Swiss Air to Geneva and the Hôtel des Bergues. After arriving, I rang Vanda at Tannegg, where she and Fosca had just arrived. We dined in the Amphitryon pleasantly.’ That was the restaurant in the hotel, and it was a favorite restaurant.

July second. ‘We got up late and, after breakfast, went to Jacquet.’ That was where he had ties made. ‘We lunched at the Amphitryon, then went to Patek, Grand Passage for an Adidas training suit for Krishnaji, and the newest Braun shaver.’ [S chuckles.] ‘Hertz delivered a Ford Fiesta to the hotel, and we drove off along the lake, up through Lausanne and so via Bulle, etcetera, to Gstaad, arriving at Chalet Tannegg at 6:30 p.m. Vanda was there, also the David Mustarts’—that sounds familiar but brings nothing to my memory. ‘They left.’ [S laughs.] Never to be seen again as far as I can remember. ‘Waiting for me was a letter from Henry Bamberger’—that’s the man who pays the bills for me—‘about data on payments of the Ojai building for tax purposes.’

July third. ‘We slept late. It was a quiet day, and the weather was cold. Krishnaji stayed in bed. Dr. Parchure arrived with Harsh and Claire. I wrote to Henry about finances.’

The fourth. ‘I went with Dr. Parchure and Ulrich Brugger to see Chalet Rehbock, where Dr. Parchure and others from Brockwood are staying. It is near the Park Hotel. Then I did errands. Krishnaji rested but came to the lunch table, and Frances and Mar de Manziarly lunched with us. In the afternoon, Krishnaji had a haircut, and in the evening, Bamberger telephoned me about permission to pay Max for the grading of the Malibu land. Earth piling is completed and Ramiras, the geologist, is paid. Dr. Parchure confirmed my fear for Verna.’ Oh dear, yes; Verna had a malignancy, and she died very soon after we learned of it.

Scott: Oh, yes. Verna Kreuger. She was a lovely woman. She worked in the kitchen at Brockwood from the earliest days.

M: A lovely woman. And had a terrible cancer, breast cancer, which she revealed only to Dr. Parchure before he left, and she died a few days later, as I recall.

S: Yes. She was the first person to die at Brockwood after we acquired it.

M: The next day. ‘I went to fetch Dr. Parchure for Krishnaji’s early exercises, then went to the bank and did other errands in the village. I needed to find something to protect the carpets when Krishnaji got his oil massage from Dr. Parchure. Krishnaji came to the table with Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and me for lunch. He didn't walk for fear of the sun and hay fever.'

July sixth. 'I fetched Dr. Parchure to Tannegg, and again did errands in the village. Vanda invited Sofia and Carlos Silva to lunch.' They were ex-Brockwood people who now lived in Rome, and she was an acupuncturist who treated Filomena.

S: Yes, I remember them.

M: 'I telephoned Ingrid at Brockwood about Shakuntala coming here. Verna is worse.'

July seventh. 'Again, I fetched Dr. Parchure to Tannegg. Dorothy, Montague, and Doris arrived in the Land Rover, so I went to see them in the Saanen camping ground, and told them about Verna's illness. Krishnaji wrote to Verna and so did I.'

July eighth. 'I fetched Dr. Parchure to Tannegg at 6:15 a.m. as Krishnaji needed to be ready to give his first Saanen talk in the tent at 10:30. It was on thinking together. He spoke for exactly one hour. Dr. Parchure returned with us in the car and he gave Krishnaji a massage. Krishnaji came to the lunch table, and Peter Racz was there.' He was South American, and was around for a while. I've forgotten what…

S: Was he a student at Brockwood?

M: I think so.

S: I can't remember him.

M: Anyway, he was at lunch. 'It was a gray day, so Krishnaji was able to go out. I had fetched medicines from Dr. Scheef brought to Saanen by Ingeborg von Massenbach.' She brought what Krishnaji called "the pink pills."' I don't know what they were.

S: Ah yes. "The magic pink pills."

M: Yes, that's right, "the magic pink pills." [Laughs]

S: [chuckles] But they worked wonders with Krishnaji's hay fever.

M: They did. 'So, Krishnaji now has 200 pink pills against hay fever. We had our own first walk through the woods. Dorothy spoke to Ingrid by phone, who said that the doctor gave Verna only ten days more to live. Ingrid went up to give Dorothy's messages to Verna, and told her that Krishnaji's and my letters were on their way. She responded and then quietly died. Krishnaji had seen the Siddoos in the afternoon.'

July ninth. 'I fetched Dr. Parchure, as usual, then went to see Dorothy briefly. I brought Mar de Manziarly up for lunch, after which I worked at the desk. Later in the afternoon, I shopped with Dr. Parchure. Sofia was at supper with Vanda and me. When I took her down afterward, I met Shakuntala at the Gstaad station at 7:20 p.m. I tripped in my sandals and tore a ligament in my second left foot toe.' [Chuckles.] How can you…? Anyway, 'I took Shaku to Mrs. Bosevain's Chalet Rehbock. Mrs. Bosevain lived at Chalet Rehbock, where Dr. Parchure, Denise, and Srinivasan are staying. Shaku told me further details of Verna.'

July tenth. 'My foot is fairly sore but I can walk. Dr. Parchure splinted it to the adjoining toe. Krishnaji gave his second Saanen talk, which was more on thinking together and what is a good society. He was bothered by hay fever, though he takes one pink pill each night. Mr. Mirabet, the Spaniard, came at 4 p.m. to make his yearly contribution. Jean-Michel Maroger brought Diane and his mother. Diane is stronger, walks better, can stand without support. Sofia gave me Chinese massage.' Chinese? Really?

July eleventh. 'Krishnaji's hay fever has gone into his bronchial tubes. I fetched Shakuntala to lunch. Frances brought Ronnie Naidu of South Africa.' I can't remember him. 'Anneke came to see Krishnaji at 4 p.m., and Diane saw Krishnaji at 4:30 p.m. Sofia gave my foot another massage. Krishnaji had a slight fever in the evening. Dr. Parchure came and slept in the adjoining room,' next to Krishnaji's room.

S: Yes, I remember it.

M: July twelfth. 'Krishnaji has no fever but his voice is very hoarse. He wouldn't cancel the talk, and as he spoke, his voice cleared somewhat. He came back and went to bed but got up to see Diane in the afternoon. In late afternoon, in Saanen, Diane fell from her tricycle and fractured her upper right leg.' That child, if she fell down, she would break major bones.

S: Yes.

M: 'Daphne telephoned to tell us about Diane, and later Jean-Michel rang. She is in traction in the hospital and they will stay here until she can be moved to La Maudière.' La Maudière was their home in France.

The thirteenth. 'At 11 a.m. there was the annual meeting of all the committees of the different countries at Tannegg. Krishnaji came to it. There was a discussion of the role of committees in preventing interpretation, etcetera. Mary Cadogan, Jane Hammond, Anneke, Dr. Parchure, Vanda, and I were at lunch. At 3 p.m., there was a continuation of the meeting without Krishnaji which was held at Chalet Haldi in Saanen.' I forget—I think some of the committee people were staying there or something. 'Jean-Michel came to look at the apartment downstairs for Diane and Marie-Bertrande.'

The next day, 'Vanda left for Florence. Jean-Michel rented the downstairs east apartment and we provided the middle room for Diane as the hospital traction bed can get through its exterior door. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched at the table. After lunch, the van came with Diane in her bed and about ten Brockwood young men carried the bed carefully in.' [Chuckles.] 'It just fit in the doorway. Krishnaji came down and saw Diane. In the evening, he had a lot of coughing.'

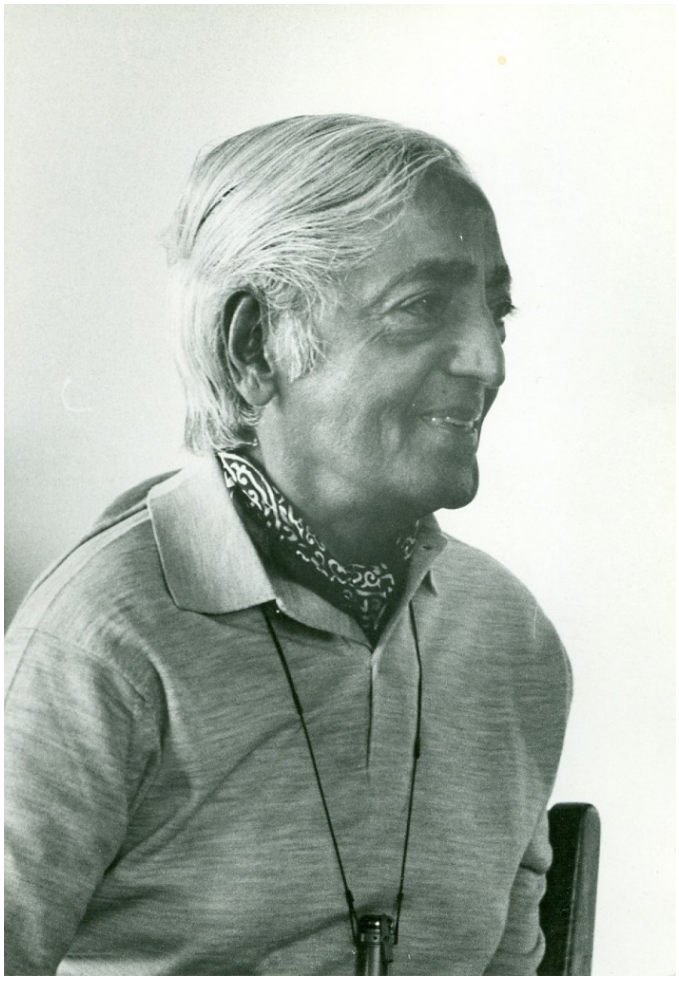
July fifteenth. 'Krishnaji gave the fourth Saanen talk. Dr. Lichti came to lunch with Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me.'

The next day. 'Both Siddoo sisters came at 4 p.m. to see Krishnaji. He settled Sarjit Siddoo's monastic notions of the school; celibacy is not required.' [Both laugh.] 'Edgar Graf arrived for the first time this summer. He is better and will stay a bit. He is still in charge of the Saanen Gathering though he has not been here.'



July seventeenth. 'Dr. Parchure moved up to Tannegg in the early morning, then I took him down to the tent. I did some marketing, then went with Krishnaji to the tent for his fifth Saanen talk. Krishnaji bought a pair of loafers on the way back. Scott Forbes, Kathy, and Dr. Parchure were at lunch. Krishnaji ate on a tray. At 4 p.m., he gave an interview for Dutch Radio to a Dorith Witte.' She represented the Dutch Radio. 'And at 5 p.m., Magda from Barcelona brought an old Spaniard and his wife to meet Krishnaji.' Magda was a nice Spanish woman.

July eighteenth. 'A letter came from Erna about Essie Bates giving a $50,000 trust donation for the Ojai school.' My goodness. 'Dorothy came up and told of a German lady wishing to make regular donations to Brockwood and a Greek lady, Mrs. Elly Abravanel, came to tell Krishnaji she wished to start a Krishnamurti school in Greece. Some nice young French people came to see Krishnaji but saw only me. [Chuckles.] Still they were very pleasant—Roger Nichol and Geneviève. I don't know who they were, but they were nice. The latter sent a plant. I fetched Anneke and Mar de Manziarly to lunch; Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure were there, too. When I took them back, and I fetched Pascaline Mallet up for tea. Mar gave me copies of her childhood diaries for the archives.' I gave them to the Brockwood archives.

The nineteenth. 'Krishnaji accidentally bent his dental bridge a little. He gave Saanen talk number six. The topic was, "Can we discover a central fact that will answer all problems?"' [Chuckles.] 'He said, "Knowledge is part of ignorance because it is always incomplete" and "Observation, action, and intelligence, from this comes love, compassion. When there is compassion, there is no pain, conflict, or suffering." Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched at the table. At 4:30 p.m., Dorothy and both Siddoos came to discuss schools and were joined at 5:30 p.m. by the Greek woman, Mrs. Elly Abravanel and a friend. She wishes to start a school in Greece. I took Daphne and we had supper with Brockwood students in their Chalet Cigale. It was very nice.'

Then there isn't anything of note until the twenty-second, when Krishnaji gave the seventh talk. 'On the way to the tent Krishnaji said, "What will I speak about?" He began with, "Why are you so quiet?" and he went on to speak of that. What is one searching for, etcetera. The mind is a still mind. He finished in an hour, as he has each talk this summer. He rested and I made a fruit dish for lunch. We were all at the table: Krishnaji, Suzanne, Hugues, their daughter Marjolaine, Jean-Michel and Daphne, Dorothy, and Montague.

Krishnaji became tired and so slept. A young French boy came to the door wanting to talk to Krishnaji. I spoke to him for a while. Krishnaji visited Diane, as he does twice every day.'

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

July twenty-third. 'Letters from Mary and Joe, who are happily spending their summer at Brockwood…' Do you remember how they would often spend their summer at Brockwood while we were all in Switzerland?

S: Yes, I do.

M: '…and from Amanda, who said Phil's book has been taken by McGraw-Hill. I marketed. At lunch were only Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure and me. Krishnaji saw Diane as usual. We went on the first walk since Krishnaji's bronchitis, to the end of the wood. My foot was well enough to go, too.' [Both chuckle.]

Then there isn't much until July twenty-fifth. 'I took Dr. Parchure to the tent, then returned for Krishnaji. At 10:30 a.m., he began the first of five daily public discussions in the tent. Edward Ani and Christian did their act together.' In fact, Krishnaji stopped taking questions from the audience because of them.

S: Yes, they were so aggressive and antagonistic and confrontational.

M: Yes.

S: There's an interesting letter in your files from Ani saying that, apparently, because you had confronted him after one of these times, and he was saying, yes, he realizes his wife is very difficult; he's going to stop coming to the talks or the discussions, not because he's any less enthusiastic but only because you claim that his behavior hasn't been right. And he professes to be absolutely stunned that he's been a problem.

M: Well, here it says: 'Edward Ani and Christian did their double act to chivy Krishnaji. Ani said, "Why don't you go?" Peter Racz was at lunch with Krishnaji and me and Dr. Parchure. Dr. Parchure went with Edgar Graf to see an acupuncturist in Berne. I went to supper with Scott and Kathy. Harsh, Claire, Brian Nicholson, and Dorothy were there, too. Marie-Bertrande arrived in Gstaad.'

The twenty-sixth. 'I drove Dr. Parchure to the tent early. Then came back for Krishnaji and the second public discussion. There was no heckling. Krishnaji spoke on love, what it is not, etcetera; on listening, and that a lack of love prevents listening. If you do not listen, which implies change, do not try to blame the speaker. It is your fault. Marie-Bertrande, Jean-Michel, Nadia and Nicolas Kossiakof, and Dr. Parchure were at lunch with Krishnaji and me. It is the first meeting of the Marogers and the Kossiakofs. Krishnaji was tired. He saw Diane in the morning and at 4 p.m., but didn't feel like a walk.'

July twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji held the third public discussion. Harsh, Claire, and Brian Nicholson to lunch. Krishnaji came to the table. He talked alone with Harsh afterward. I drove Harsh back to Saanen. I did marketing and errands. Krishnaji and I walked to the end of the woods, and Krishnaji saw Diane as usual.'

On the twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji held the fourth public discussion, after which we lunched alone.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held the fifth and final public discussion of this summer. Christian was loud and insulting, demanding that Krishnaji reveal "his secret," something he withholds. It was ugly. Krishnaji held the meeting together and went on. Dorothy and Montague lunched with Krishnaji and me. We discussed Kathy Harris's complaints and attitudes in the school on sex.' I don't know what that was. 'We took a walk to the end of the wood.'

July thirtieth. 'It was a hot, beautiful day. Jackie Siddoo came by to say goodbye to Krishnaji, and he told her not to hesitate to close the school if it didn't work out. He also told her that he knew about her husband's talk against Brockwood and himself. Krishnaji and I lunched downstairs with Marie-Bertrande, Jean-Michel, Daphne, and Diane. Marie-Bertrande and Jean-Michel came up afterward, and Krishnaji discussed with them and me what Brockwood's policy should be on sex.' It doesn't say what we said. [S chuckles.] 'I did errands and bought travel tickets. An Italian woman reached for Krishnaji through his bathroom window,' [both laugh] 'trying to grab him.' His bathroom window looked out on the entrance and driveway. [M laughs again.] 'I saw Dorothy and Montague in the campground. They leave tomorrow for Brockwood. Frances McCann came to supper with me. Krishnaji saw Harsh and Claire at 4 p.m. Dr. Parchure went to talk to U.G. Krishnamurti.' He was a ratty little man, who was very antagonistic to Krishnaji, and all the time he would get people to come and criticize Krishnaji, and have his little group over which he would preside.

S: Yes. He'd have his own little meetings, and he'd criticize Krishnamurti terribly for having his meetings, but he'd have his meetings at the same time in Saanen and drew people like Ani and Christian…

M: Like Ani, yes. They were thick with U.G. Krishnamurti.

S: Yes. I think he used to fire them up to be ugly and nasty in the dialogues.

M: I think so. And he came to Saanen, as far as I can see, just because of the crowd that Krishnaji attracted, and to be against Krishnaji.

S: Yes.

M: He didn't come there the rest of the year.

S: I know, I know. [Both chuckle.]

M: July thirty-first. 'Krishnaji dictated ten letters. He saw Diane, talked to Daphne, and talked to Jean-Michel. At lunch, there was Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw Diane as usual, and we walked to the end of the wood.'

August first, 'Krishnaji slept poorly. He is tired. He rested in the morning, and did no exercise. He saw Diane and talked a bit with Marie-Bertrande. He, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched. I typed all morning and slept all afternoon. No walk. It's a Swiss holiday.'

The next day, 'I worked at the desk. Krishnaji is still tired but saw the Kossiakofs in the afternoon.'

August third. 'I went with Dr. Parchure to buy Vitamin B for Fosca. Krishnaji rested, saw Diane, lunched with me and Dr. Parchure. At 4 p.m., we went to buy a pair of sandals for him to wear in India. He had a haircut. At 5 p.m., Ortolani came to see him briefly.' We've identified Bruno Ortolani?

S: Yes.

M: ‘He was a nice man, an old friend of Krishnaji’s from Italy, obviously. He’s the one who, when he’d speak up in the tent, Krishnaji would say, “Darling sir,” etcetera. ‘It is the fiftieth anniversary of his dissolution of the Order of the Star[2].’

S: Ah, yes.

M: ‘I had a visit with the Marogers. Ariane has joined them.’ That was the eldest daughter, and the only one who didn’t come to Brockwood.

The fourth. ‘I did marketing. Diane had her leg X-rayed. It is healing well. Krishnaji is still feeling tired. The Marogers asked me to come up the Wassengrat’—that’s a mountain in Schönried. ‘Marie-Bertrande and I walked down from the ski lift, while Jean-Michel and Ariane went to the top. I was back by 5:30 p.m. Krishnaji had walked to the river. He went to sleep early.’

August fifth. ‘Krishnaji slept well, almost nine hours. It was a cloudless, shining morning. Krishnaji “did” my foot and said it was less swollen. He ascribed it to my exercise yesterday going up the Wassengrat with the Marogers and said I should walk more. I said yes. He then said, “You say, ‘yes.’ When?”’ [Both chuckle.] ‘So now, at his urging, at 7 a.m., I went up the hill and then through the woods where it was so cold my hands were numb. When I was finally in the sun, I held them out and handfuls of sunlight warmed them. How beautiful is the world in the early morning. I had a long talk at breakfast with Dr. Parchure about Krishnaji’s health. Krishnaji has low blood pressure, a slow pulse and, with age, his metabolism slows, so Parchure tries to keep the body fit and stimulated through exercise without tiring Krishnaji. Krishnaji inclines to overdo things; he pushes his body, and is no longer a good judge of its capacities. Krishnaji will seldom stop an exercise on his own. Parchure watches his face. If Krishnaji glances at him, Parchure interprets it that he needs Parchure to call a halt. He spoke of the likely manner of Krishnaji’s death. He doesn’t feel it will be a disease, cancer, etcetera.’ Well, he was wrong. ‘Or of a heart attack in a sudden seizure way, but a slowing down of the body. He said that if Krishnaji becomes unconscious with cold hands and feet, I should rub them to stimulate circulation lest he slip away. But he thinks Krishnaji will know the time of his death and will tell me and then there should be no interference. Parchure talked to Krishnaji during the massage about some of these things, and Krishnaji brought it up at lunch. Parchure was able to get him to see the problem of getting Krishnaji to realize his own physical capabilities, to harbor his strength and energies. We brought up the subject of the public discussions. Krishnaji now thinks it was the unpleasantness in the tent Sunday that has left him so tired all week, and agreed that we should try the old way of having written questions from the audience and he answering them rather than these “dialogues” that don’t work with a thousand people. He also brought up the “interpretation” problem, and his telling trustees to speak, which has the danger of starting interpretations. Krishnaji said, “It doesn’t work.” I told him of my conversation with a man named Weeks, who seemed pleased when I cautioned him that I was speaking without any spiritual authority, and that I could see him going off and saying, “The people around Krishnaji don’t know what Krishnaji is talking about either.”’ [M and S both chuckle.] ‘Krishnaji laughed and said, “You can’t win.”’ [S laughs again.] ‘He went back to the health question and said he has always felt protected. Something, a "they" is looking after him for the purpose of the teachings. He feels that "they" will decide the time and manner of his death and he will know it. He asked Dr. Parchure how the Buddha died; apparently of eating bad food, but who knows, really. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon and so did I. Then, we went for the same walk to the river. I spoke to Filomena in Rome about my arrival Friday, and then I spoke to Vanda in Florence about her arrival here Thursday. After supper, I read to Krishnaji excerpts from Mar de Manziarly's diary, which she has given me for the archives. It contains parts of letters from Nitya. One, when he'—that's Nitya—'spoke of tiring things "and the most tiring thing of all is Theosophy."' [S chuckles] 'And his description of CWL's boys in Australia: "They were all kings and saints in former lives, but now, unhappily, Australians."' [Laughter.] 'Krishnaji's face lit up with laughter and youth. And then a quotation from Krishnaji, "It's strange; I can't remember him," he said. But his laughter had a bright flash of recognition in it. "I wonder what he would have done if he had lived, but that is speculation and we mustn't speculate." I still get that feeling of sadness when I read or think of Nitya, a sense of loss.' There is something about Nitya that I always found anguishing…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …the tragedy of his sickness and dying and…

S: And the hole it left in Krishnaji's life.

M: Yes. And everything that they'd planned to do together.

S: Yes. And he would've protected Krishnaji. There wouldn't have been the Rajagopal nonsense.

M: That's right, there would not have been Rajagopal. It's one of those strange things of, I don't know, of fate or something.

August sixth. 'Pupul wrote in June asking me to ask Krishnaji about "the missing years" of 1939 to 1947, the war years, when he stayed in Ojai. What did he do? Whom did he see, etcetera. She says he reappeared in India in 1947 differently. I asked Krishnaji Pupul's questions, and taped his replies. At lunch there was only Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me. In the afternoon, I went to the bank to review the Alzina account, and did some errands. When I came back, Krishnaji had hoarseness and a slight cold, so I went on the walk alone.'

The next day, 'I walked toward Gruben in the early morning, then did letters, and errands in the village. Krishnaji still has a slight cold. In the evening I went with Jean-Michel, Ariane, and Daphne to a concert in the Saanen church—the Berlin String Quartet played Beethoven, Hindemith, and Mozart. Marie-Bertrande is not feeling well.'

August eighth. ‘I climbed partway up the Hornberg in the early morning. On my return, I made fruit salad, etcetera, for a buffet lunch. At lunch were Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, Marie-Bertrande, Jean-Michel, Ariane, Daphne, Jane Ross…’ Who was Jane Ross?

S: She was a very nice student at Brockwood.

M: Ah…‘and Diane was carried upstairs on her board. Also, their friend, Madame Solange de Marignac, who had a long private conversation with Krishnaji in the afternoon. She is hooked on Rajneesh.’ [Both chuckle lightly.] ‘I talked with Marie-Bertrande, and Krishnaji joined us.’

The next day it just says that I walked through the woods in the morning and Vanda arrived from Florence in the afternoon.

August tenth. ‘Jean-Michel, Diane, Daphne, and Jane Ross leave for La Maudière’—Marie-Bertrande and Ariane had already gone. ‘I left at 9:45 a.m. and drove via Le Col du Pillon and Aigle to the Geneva Airport. I returned the car to Hertz and flew to Rome at 2 p.m. Filomena and her son Mario met me. I went with them to Filomena’s flat where I stay till Sunday. Catherina’—that’s her sister—‘Mistika’—that’s her niece—‘Vincenza’—a cousin of somebody—‘Lelo’—a grandson—‘and Peppino’—another grandson—‘were there. We talked at length.’

August eleventh. ‘I was in Rome, and spent a quiet day talking with Filomena. It was warm but not hot. In Gstaad, Radha Burnier came to lunch and saw Krishnaji before returning to India Monday.’

The next day, ‘Mario and Filomena took me to Fiumicino.’ That’s the airport. ‘I flew back on Alitalia to Geneva, picked up a larger Hertz, a Taunus, and left at 2:30 p.m. for Gstaad, going via Bulle, and arriving at 4:45 p.m. to find Krishnaji looking out his bathroom window. He said, “I knew you were coming. The deva told me.”’ [Both laugh.] ‘We went for a walk to the end of the wood. Frances McCann came to supper with Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and me.’

August thirteenth, ‘A lovely day, but I felt more like moving slowly than climbing up the hill. I started packing for our Wednesday departure. Dr. Parchure said he had talked at length with Krishnaji about looking after his health, and Krishnaji has agreed to be mindful of drafts, etcetera, and listen to me when I suggest covering his throat when he walks at Brockwood.’ [Chuckles.] ‘At lunch there was Krishnaji, Vanda, Parchure, and me. At 4:30 p.m., I took Krishnaji to the village for a haircut. We came back and walked to the river. He said, “I want to talk to you seriously. Please listen. You must outlive me. I’m going to live a long time and you must be well. I can’t have another person look after me, so you must take care of yourself.”…Then another quote, “I am looked after,” he pointed up at the clouds.’ [Chuckles.] ‘“You understand?”…“You need to rest, to be alone. I see that is good for you. So when you go back to Ojai, you must arrange it and not the everlasting letters, typing, and Foundation things. I will write to you, but you mustn’t have all those nonsensical letters. In India I will give them to Sunanda.”’

‘I asked him, apart from looking after him, if he had another reason I should survive him.’

‘“I have no one else but you. I’m not being selfish.”’

‘I said, apart from that, was there something I must do when he is no longer alive.’

‘“Could be.”…“Someone must see to it that it doesn’t go to pieces”’—you know…

S: Yes.

M: ‘We talked about the responsibility of Foundation members to talk or not to talk, but he didn’t make it any clearer. There should not be a ban on talking, but they mustn’t interpret. Others will, but Foundation members mustn’t. But where is the line? Right now he is critical of Pama having spoken on a tour that he and Sunanda have just made with the videos in South India, because he thinks that Pama doesn’t understand the teachings. It’s okay for Sunanda to have talked. Pupul won’t talk, he said, but she is about to write a book. It will inevitably be seen as a book written by someone close to Krishnaji and the Foundation. Where is the line in all this? He says he will go into it, and it has changed his mind about urging people to talk. But he seems presently to duck the question. Talking of Ojai, he said he wished he could find a little place where he could get away where no one would know where he is, somewhere near the beach, near Santa Barbara perhaps.’ He had this feeling often, of wanting to get away where nobody knew where he was.

S: Yes. We’ve talked about this.

M: And one reason he seemed to enjoy the driving to Saanen from Brockwood was that really nobody knew where he was, expect that he was somewhere in France.

S: Yes, yes.

M: He felt a pressure, and he felt it particularly strongly in Gstaad when all the people were there and the talks were going on. He said it was like a psychic pressure, everybody intent on him.

The next day says, ‘Packing, packing, packing. Lunch was with Krishnaji, Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and me. Nadia Kossiakof came at 4 p.m. to say goodbye to Krishnaji. We went afterward for the last of this summer’s walks to the end of the wood. He paused by the edge of the field, stared at the mountains a few moments and said, “A l’année prochaine.”’ [S chuckles.] ‘The packing was all done by the evening, and we were ready to leave in the morning.’

August fifteenth. ‘Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I said goodbye to Vanda and Fosca, and left at 10 a.m. for Geneva via Les Mosses, Aigle, and the autoroute. We arrived at the airport in one hour and ten minutes, 160 kilometers.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘I dropped the car with Hertz, and we took the 1:30 p.m. Swiss Air to London. There was an endless wait in immigration—too many flights had arrived at once. Dorothy met us, and Jim in another car took the luggage. Brockwood was looking beautiful. Krishnaji had supper downstairs with the few who are here. We took the Mercedes around the lanes to be sure its battery was charged. We both feel it is good to be back. I talked to Mary Links and unpacked.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji, Doctor Parchure, and I took the 10:23 a.m. to London. Joe met us at Waterloo and drove us to Berkley Square, where Dr. Parchure had an ear test. Krishnaji came with me to Morgan Guarantee where I closed my account, and then we went to Culpeper's for sundries. Then we looked for a beige cardigan as I had foolishly left mine in the Geneva Airport yesterday.'

S: Would that have been at Peal's?

M: Probably. 'At Fortnum's, Mary and Joe lunched with us at 12:45 p.m. Joe took Krishnaji to the dentist for an adjustment to his bridge, and me to the hairdresser to get my hair cut. I met Krishnaji at the dentist, and Joe drove us both back to Waterloo, where we caught the 4:20 p.m. to Petersfield.'

August seventeenth. 'Krishnaji rested while I did laundry and other household chores. After lunch I went to Alresford and opened a checking account at the Westminster Bank, then back to do the entire walk with Krishnaji and Dorothy in the grove, which has been tidied. It is most beautifully neat and we did further weeding and pruning. Madrisa Samuel rang from Varengeville.' Madrisa Samuel was a friend of Pascaline Mallet. Varengeville is where the Mallets live in Normandy or Brittany, I forget which…

S: And Krishnaji used to stay there.

M: Yes, he used to stay there. 'Madrisa called to tell me that Pascaline is ill and in pain; so they cannot come to the Gathering. They are taking X-rays today for her intestinal pain.'

There's really nothing the next day except that I helped make scones for the Gathering.

The nineteenth. 'I worked mostly at the desk. The Digbys came to lunch and we talked afterward with Krishnaji about publishing. Should more of the dialogues with David Bohm be published? During the late afternoon walk with Krishnaji and Dorothy, she twisted an ankle.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji was tired, so he stayed in bed all day, and I had a long talk with Dr. Parchure about this. In the afternoon I went to the bank in Alresford and scraped the side of the Mercedes getting out of the parking lot. Then I went to Winchester to get a handbag as a gift for Mrs. Parchure. I felt dizzy for a few minutes.'

August twenty-first. 'Using a school car, I went to meet John and Barbara Briggs at Petersfield at noon, then showed them around Brockwood. They lunched with us and afterward John interviewed Krishnaji for World Paper.' I don't know what that was.

‘Then I took them back to the train. Krishnaji and Dorothy took a small walk. A report from Louis Blau on the house sale is discouraging.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji rested. I worked mostly at my desk. We took a small walk in the afternoon. Krishnaji had a cable from Rajagopal sending love, etcetera, and greetings to me.’ [S chuckles.]

August twenty-third. ‘Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I went to London where Joe again met us and dropped Parchure at the ear place. We went to Mary and Joe’s flat, where we lunched and talked. Joe eventually took Krishnaji to the dentist, where Thompson spent two-and-a-half hours fixing the bridge Krishnaji had dropped at Tannegg. I stayed and talked with Mary. Then, Joe took me to Portland Place, where Dr. Parchure met us; and when Mr. Thompson was finished with Krishnaji, Joe took us to Waterloo. Scott Forbes and Kathy arrived from the U.S. They were married in Maine.’ [S chuckles.]

August twenty-fourth. ‘Krishnaji rested. I helped in the tent preparations. The Digbys arrived in time for supper and are in the West Wing spare room. Also Edgar Graf came and is in the West Wing dining room made into a guest room. We are now 140 people at meals in the house. A letter and miscellaneous papers about the Malibu house finally came from Louis Blau. He and Evelyne will be in London next week. The house news is pessimistic.’

The next day, ‘Rain. Krishnaji did exercises and had the usual oil massage by Dr. Parchure before breakfast. At 11:30 a.m., he gave the first of this year’s Brockwood talks in a huge marquee. Before the talk, I announced the change of discussion plans, and asked for written questions, which will be given to Krishnaji. After the talk, Krishnaji and I had fruit and salad in the West Wing kitchen, then returned to the tent for the hot course. I sat by the Oak Grove School picture exhibition and talked to Joan Gordon and others. Later I walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy and made yogurt.’

August twenty-sixth. ‘The weather was better. We had the same schedule as yesterday. Krishnaji gave a deeply moving talk number two[3] on “senses have no past.” “Knowledge is part of ignorance as it is always incomplete.” Mary Links and Amanda were there, also the Hamish Thompsons’—that’s the dentist and his wife—‘and John Briggs. Krishnaji, Mary, Amanda, and I had coffee in our kitchen. We had only a short walk at 5 p.m. This morning, Dr. Parchure had me come to observe Krishnaji’s exercise so I can keep track in his absence. Krishnaji thinks it’s unnecessary.’ [Both chuckle.]

August twenty-seventh, ‘I did exercises with Krishnaji. Later he and I sorted the over ninety questions handed in for the question-and-answer sessions. I typed the ones he chose. After lunch, Krishnaji briefly saw Carlos and Emy Ban, a Brazilian couple, then Krishnaji and I walked.’ There’s a note in the little book that says: ‘Mountbatten and Brabourne grandson killed by an IRA bomb in a boat.’ That was because I knew the Brabournes—she was Lord Mountbatten’s daughter, and I had known them in California.

August twenty-eighth. ‘Krishnaji held the first public discussion or question-and-answer session with the new arrangements. He read a written-in question, answered it, and went on to the next one. He did five in all today. It went very well[4]. In the afternoon he talked to a woman, a Mrs. Ann Alexander.’ I don’t know who that was. ‘Krishnaji and I took a short walk. After supper I talked to a Gordon Hall.’ I also can’t remember who that was, ‘then to Shakuntala Krishna, who has a son at Wolf Lake.’

The twenty-ninth. ‘I took the Mercedes to the Mercedes agency in Chichester for repair to the damage I did the other day. Dorothy followed and brought me back. At 3:30 p.m. there was a trustee meeting with Krishnaji, Dorothy, David Bohm, the Digbys, Mary Cadogan, Dr. Parchure, and me about what Krishnaji wants us to do about speaking on the teachings. The decision was to speak only out of our own understanding, making clear to others that it is only that.’ That was the good of all that. He said you can say whatever you want to say, but you must label it as your understanding and not what Krishnamurti means. And that was a vast relief to me, because it was a clear definition.

S: Right.

M: ‘Krishnaji emphasized that, “The Foundations are not”—underlined—“spiritual organizations and have no”—underlined—“spiritual authority.” We then went for a short walk, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I. After dinner we sorted questions for tomorrow’s meeting.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer meeting in the marquee. It went very well[5]. We had fruit and salad in the West Wing kitchen and then the rest in the tent. In the evening I talked briefly to Shakuntala Krishna, a teacher and mother of a boy at the Wolf Lake School. Louis Blau telephoned from London. The buyer for Malibu has backed out after Lou refused his low bid.’

The thirty-first, ‘I borrowed Dorothy’s Cortina and took Anneke, Joan Wright, and Dr. Parchure to Winchester shopping. We were back in time for me to fetch Krishnaji’s lunch tray. He spent the day in bed resting. I talked to John Briggs in the afternoon and to Mrs. Alexander in the evening. Also I talked to a Brazilian, Mr. Vanderlucio Q. Abelha about a film on Brockwood.’ People all the time wanted to do films.

September first. ‘The suggested brewer’s yeast at breakfast upset Krishnaji’s stomach. He gave the third Brockwood talk but ate no lunch. He did sit with Mary and Joe while we had coffee in the kitchen. At 2:30 p.m., I attended a Publication Committee meeting. It was decided not to publish the rest of the Krishnaji and Bohm dialogues now but make them available at centers for people to read on request. The next book is tentatively on questions and answers. Krishnaji came at 5 p.m. and took Dorothy and me away for a walk.’ This decision upset Saral Bohm very much.

S: Yes. We’ve talked about these tapes before.

M: The second was ‘a sunny day. Krishnaji gave the fourth and final talk, ate as usual in the kitchen, and then in the tent. People began to leave.’

September third, ‘Krishnaji rested. I did much laundry and the pipes again broke, leaking water in the kitchen and some through to the hall below.’ [Both chuckle.]

The next day. ‘Dorothy and I drove to Heathrow to see Dr. Parchure off to Bombay. He went on a Syrian airline and we stayed with him through the check-in. Dorothy and I got back in time to walk with Krishnaji. Our new walk is through the grove, around the field, down along fields by the pheasant wood to the lower field, and then up the drive.’ That’s the best walk.

S: Yes.

M: ‘I talked to Betsy in London.’

September fifth, ‘The Mountbatten funeral in Westminster Abbey was on television. I watched it on Krishnaji’s set while he read detective stories in bed, now and then glancing at the screen and making caustic comments on how silly it all was.’ [Chuckles.] ‘His objections to royalty were all he saw in it. I found it very moving in the sense of something deep in the bones of British ways and feelings splendidly done and in a kind of language of form that is part of these people, a majesty of tradition in the face of the squalid evil of the murder and the deep affection for the man himself, a pageant of honor to an uncommon Englishman. Krishnaji had no use for it, but endured my watching with occasional jibes.’ [Laughs.] ‘I did letters and we walked in the afternoon.’ [S laughs too.] He was very anti-royalist.

S: Yes. [M chuckles again.] I’m sympathetic with that.

M: The sixth. ‘It was a very warm day. In Doris’s Mini, we went to Petersfield and took the 10:23 a.m. train to London. Looking out at the office buildings, Krishnaji repeated his nine-to-five office disdain. “I would never do it.”’

‘M: “What would you do?”’

‘K: “I don’t know—something else.”’

M: [Chuckles.] ‘“What if there were no choices? What if you were on the dole? Or a black person, eighteen years old, unable to get any job?”’

‘K: “I’d do something about it. I am a revolutionary.”’ [Both M and S chuckle.]

‘Joe met us at Waterloo and took us to Huntsman. Krishnaji fitted two trousers. We walked to Hatchards, then…’ This is absolutely standard issue.

S: I know, exactly. [Both laugh.]

M: I don't have to read it. You know what it says.

S: That's right; this is the pilgrimage, and as you describe it, I'm seeing the whole path along which you walk.

M: 'We went through the arcade.'

S: Of course, the Burlington Arcade.

M: '…to Hatchards, then joined Mary for lunch at Fortnum's. Talked of the second volume of the biography. The question was of how he got the way he is. He said the choices were, "a biologic freak, a medium, or three, a late maturing mind." He said if he were writing, he would consider all these very carefully, or is it something else? He would be with the person, K, and he would study him, question him. He, Krishnaji, discards the freak, and the medium. He said he did mature very late, really when he was sixty-five.' [Both laugh.]

S: Oh, good, there's hope for me yet.

M: 'Today he would never put up with what Rajagopal and Rosalind did. He would throw them out. Mary said that Rajagopal doesn't realize how Krishnaji has changed, and so attributes it all to "wicked influences"'—that's me.

S: [laughing] Yes.

M: 'I bought some coffee, cheese, and chocolates for Krishnaji and we walked to Truefitt where Krishnaji had his hair cut, then Joe drove us back to Waterloo.' That's an absolutely prototype day.

S: Yes, exactly. [Both chuckle again.]

M: The exception for this day is that, 'I left my briefcase on the train. I realized this at the Petersfield station, told the ticket office, took Krishnaji to Brockwood, and returned at 6:20 p.m. for the briefcase, which was brought back by the train on its return trip to London.' That was nice of them. 'I spoke to the Marogers; they will bring Diane here next week.'

The seventh. 'A warm, lovely day. Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number thirty-three to be sent out on January first. Dorothy lent me her car to go to Winchester on errands.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number thirty-four. I helped get lunch in the kitchen. There was a letter from Erna about Krishnaji and the Templeton Award.' That was some man who gives an award to great people who are doing great things. It was discussed that he would get it, or he did get it, I can't remember which, but

Krishnaji didn't want to accept it. 'The Oak Grove School's present monthly deficit is over $6,000.'

S: [chuckles] We should be so lucky these days.

M: Yes. [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went for a walk.'

September ninth. 'Krishnaji dictated the thirty-fifth Letters to the Schools. We took a short walk, then worked on the rhododendrons in the grove.'

The tenth. 'Again I borrowed Dorothy's Cortina, went to Petersfield, and took the 9:20 a.m. train to London, then the Underground to Marble Arch, walked to the hairdresser's, had my hair cut, walked to Nelson's, and ate my sandwich in Grosvenor Square. Did various errands, bought a pair of Ferragamo shoes and a beige cardigan at W. Bill, chocolates at Fortnum's, and cheese at Paxton.' Paxton is on the street behind Fortnum's—what is that street behind?

S: Jermyn Street.

M: Yes. 'And so back on the Underground to Waterloo. I got plants at Petersfield before driving back to Brockwood.'

The eleventh: 'Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number thirty-six. He said earlier in the morning that he had been sitting very straight in bed, mind empty, and there came a feeling as if something "were pouring into my head. It lasted ten to fifteen seconds to a minute. It was not imagination." In the afternoon, we went for an earlier walk, and then at 6:30, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went out'—underlined—'to dine at the Old House in Wickham. It is no longer open for lunch. Krishnaji wanted to go, so we went out feeling very festive, having ordered our vegetarian fare ahead of time. We had an intricate and excellent salad, then a quiche of spinach and tomato, new potatoes, and string beans from their garden. For dessert, Krishnaji chose crème brûlée with an amazing relish and no ill effects.' [Chuckles.] 'We were back by 9:30 p.m. A fine evening.' You can't say I don't provide details!

S: [laughing] Yes, and these are all very important.

M: September twelfth. 'Narasimhan telephoned from London to say that Jayalakshmi is back in Madras from New York. Marie-Bertrande and Jean-Michel Maroger arrived for the seminar, but Diane did not come. It's too much to move her. They are staying in the West Wing guest room. Suzanne and Marjolaine are also here for the seminar, and so is Maurice Wilkins and the Bohms, etcetera. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked in the afternoon. I spoke to Betsy on her birthday.'

The next day. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a seminar on "The world is becoming increasingly violent and disordered. What can we do as human beings to change it?" About eighty people in all are taking part.' That's a lot of people.

S: It was a nightmare to video, I remember.

M: Yes, it would be. 'In the afternoon, Krishnaji talked to David Bohm and me about Erna's suggestion that Krishnaji reconsider the Templeton Award. Krishnaji still feels it would be wrong to accept an award for teaching.' He didn't want to accept it, I think, because he didn't think it was right to be paid for what he did.'

S: Yes.

M: 'We also discussed at length the KFA's financial problems with the Oak Grove School. The walk was with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me. After supper, I watched a video of the Buddhist discussion Krishnaji held on June twenty-eighth with Dr. Rahula, Phiroz Mehta, etcetera. I talked to my brother and his wife, who are in London at Claridge's until Sunday.'

September fourteenth, 'Krishnaji held the second session of seminar. After lunch, I did errands at Alresford and Petersfield, borrowing Dorothy's car. I was back in time for the usual walk, but Krishnaji felt tired afterward. I went to the staff meeting at 7 p.m.'

The fifteenth. 'Krishnaji held the third seminar session at 11:30 a.m. I left immediately afterward and caught the 1:33 p.m. train to London and went to Claridge's to meet my brother and his wife. We spent all afternoon talking, and I caught the 6:50 p.m. train back to Petersfield. Bud and Lisa return to New York tomorrow.'

September sixteenth, 'Krishnaji held the fourth seminar. Marie-Bertrande told me about some worrying eye trouble that Jean-Michel is having. Krishnaji, in the evening, put his hands on him. The walk in the afternoon was with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Marie-Bertrande, Jean-Michel, and me.'

The seventeenth. 'Krishnaji held the fifth seminar on "What happens when there's no sense of individuality?" and "What is action without the actors?" After lunch, Krishnaji, Marie-Bertrande, and I talked to Jean-Michel about having his symptoms diagnosed. Jean-Michel came on the walk. In the morning Krishnaji had said that a curious feeling came on him. He said, "I felt like a young boy."'

September eighteenth. 'Krishnaji held the sixth seminar, completing it. Most people left. The Marogers went to London, and came back at 8 p.m. They ate supper in the West Wing kitchen, and then they left to catch the ferry from Southampton. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked in the afternoon in a light rain.'

September nineteenth. 'It rained, and the house was quiet again. I worked at the desk all day. Krishnaji and I walked.'

The next day. 'In the morning, I worked at the desk. In the afternoon, I drove to Alresford to post a tax letter; then to Petersfield to meet Betsy, who came for a night. Got back in time for a walk; Krishnaji, Dorothy, Betsy, and me. I had a long talk with Betsy after supper.'

September twenty-first. 'It was a lovely, clear morning. Betsy had breakfast with me in the kitchen. Then Krishnaji dictated a long letter to Erna about the Ojai school, work in the USA, and his continuing aversion to accepting the Templeton Award. I took Betsy to Petersfield to get the train back to London. I got back in time for lunch. After typing Krishnaji's letters, he, Dorothy, and I went for a walk. I telephoned Erna and Theo about the fire in Ojai on Sulphur Mountain.'

The twenty-second. 'The weather is colder. I attended a staff meeting at 9 a.m., and Krishnaji held the first of three discussions with the staff at 11:30 a.m. School policies on sex seem to be a current concern. The walk was with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held the second discussion with the staff. Walk as usual, but mostly we worked on rhododendrons.'

September twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji held the third discussion with the staff—awareness on conflict dissolves it. He left dealing with school problems to the awareness of the staff acting together, which upset Dorothy. The Santa Barbara Magazine with an article on Krishnaji and the Oak Grove School arrived. Again a short walk and work on the rhododendrons.'

The twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji dictated letters. He was tired in the afternoon, so we only worked a little on the rhododendrons in the grove. There was a meeting with Brian Jenkins, Dorothy, Stephen, Shakuntala, Kathy Harris, and John King about Brian going to India and other matters.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji's voice is thick, but he has no sore throat or cough. He did exercise and went down to lunch but didn't walk. I fetched Usha Goenka, the Tantia's daughter from Bombay, at Petersfield. She lunched here and left later in the afternoon.'

September twenty-seventh. 'I fetched the Marogers with Daphne. Daphne is here to attend school, he is here for the video interview with Krishnaji and Jean-Louis Dewez. Jean-Michel is in the West Wing. Krishnaji's voice is still hoarse, so he spent the day in bed. I worked most of the day at the desk. New students arrived, thirty-seven of them. Krishnaji placed his hands on Jean-Michel to cure his eye and ear trouble.'

S: At this period we had the new students arrive a few days before the students continuing on from the previous year.

M: September twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji's voice is better, almost clear. At 11:30 a.m. in the West Wing drawing room, Krishnaji did a videotaped one-hour discussion with Jean-Louis Dewez. Jean-Louis put his questions in French, and Krishnaji answered mostly in English. Jean-Michel will later add the French translation for showing the videotape in France. In the afternoon, they did a second hour videotaped interview on education. All this was done in color. Krishnaji insisted on a walk, so he, Dorothy, and I went across the fields to the west on a still, perfect afternoon. There was no wind. It was so beautiful. Krishnaji put his hands on Jean-Michel.' That was to try to help his eyes.

September twenty-ninth. 'The former students arrive for the start of the term. I worked on the transcription of answers Krishnaji gave to the questions Pupul wanted me to ask him on war years in Ojai, 1939 to 1947. Krishnaji was up for lunch and walked in the afternoon with Dorothy and me across the fields. I looked at yesterday's video. Later, I watched with Krishnaji the pope's arrival in Dublin.' [Chuckles.]

September thirtieth. 'It was the opening day of term. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji spoke to the school on what it is all about. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields. Krishnaji had a stomachache after supper, but it subsided.'

October first. 'I went to London, fetched my eyeglasses, did errands, met Paul Anstee, and went with him looking for a mirror for Ojai's hall. We didn't find one. He took me to Waterloo and so I got back to Brockwood by 6:20 p.m.'

The second. 'Krishnaji spoke alone with the students, while the staff had a meeting, which I attended. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields. The dogs chased a fawn. A vet came and the fawn is being cared for in the barn.'

S: I remember, a fawn was attacked by…

M: Whisper?

S: No, Kip. Whisper wouldn't have hurt anything, but Whisper, I think, joined Kip in the chase, but Kip savaged the fawn.

M: Oh, dear. I don't remember it.

S: Yes. Kip was not a nice dog.

M: That's horrid. Dear me.

The next day. 'The fawn is still alive. I typed Letters to the Schools. Walked across the fields with Krishnaji and Dorothy.'

The fourth. 'I typed most of the day. Krishnaji talked alone with students. There was the usual walk in the afternoon.'

October fifth 'was a beautiful, still, golden day. I typed most of the morning, but managed to get to Petersfield for some errands. There was another staff meeting.'

The sixth. 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed. I typed. I walked alone and gathered firewood.'

The seventh. ‘Krishnaji spoke to the whole school at noon. Then, he and I walked with Whisper in the afternoon, and he said how lucky we are to live in this beautiful place.’

The next day, ‘I again typed. Krishnaji saw Brian Jenkins after lunch. He and I walked in a light rain. There was a school meeting at 5 p.m.’

October ninth. ‘Krishnaji talked to the staff from noon until 2 p.m. Some of them are very resistant to David Shama and his plans to build at Brockwood. Krishnaji talked to Scott after lunch. We had the usual walk, and then there was a meeting between Krishnaji, David Shama, Dorothy, and me.’

October tenth. ‘It is the beginning of Krishnaji’s three-week rest. It was a rainy day. I typed in the morning. Krishnaji and I had lunch in the West Wing. At 4 p.m., Brian Jenkins drove Krishnaji and me to Chichester where I picked up the Mercedes with the door repaired and repainted, etcetera, but still no door handle. Krishnaji and I drove home in it.’

The eleventh. ‘Krishnaji and I went to London on the 10:20 a.m. train. Joe met us and drove us first to Christie’s, where I had Pascaline’s pin evaluated.’ She gave a pin as a donation to Brockwood. ‘Then we went to Huntsman for Krishnaji’s fitting. Mary lunched with us at Fortnum’s, and it was very leisurely, as the Thompson dental appointment was postponed till Monday. We bought books at Hatchards, cheese at Paxton, and then got a taxi to Waterloo. We were back at Brockwood by 6 p.m. I had a 7 p.m. meeting about Brian Jenkins’ plans with Brian, Dorothy, Stephen, Kathy Harris, Shakuntala, and John King.’ Do you remember what that was about?

S: Brian had inherited some money, and he had some plan…I can’t remember. I don’t think anything came of it.

We’re going to have to end this here. We’ve run out of tape again.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] These discussions that Krishnaji had with only students were never recorded, but on the several occasions I questioned students about these talks after they occurred, the students definitely felt they were different to the talks in which the staff were present. This difference could have been at least partly because the students felt freer without the staff, or it might have been because Krishnaji only needed to address the younger person’s mindset, or because the audience would have been a third smaller without the adults present and so more intimate, or perhaps something else. Whatever the reason, the students felt the talks that were just for them were different, and they valued them.

[2] This was Krishnaji’s famous break with Theosophy and all that they had created supposedly for him and his work.

[3] A link to the text of the second Brockwood Talk in 1979.

[4] A link to the text of the first question-and-answer session at Brockwood, 1979.

[5] A link to the text of the second question-and-answer session at Brockwood, 1979.

Issue 61: October 11, 1979 to February 18, 1980

This issue feels like a watershed of some kind. Not only is it the sixty-first issue (which for some reason was more momentous than the fifty-first issue), but Mary's recounting finally gets out of the 1970s. She and I had, for quite some time, joked that we never thought we would ever get out of the 1970s, and now that I look at the dates our discussions took place, I understand why. Our discussions progressed from 1969 to 1970 on June twentieth, 1995. We doggedly proceeded through the 1970s until the discussion for this issue, which took place on March twenty-eighth, 2005. So it took us almost ten years to cover the ten years of the 1970s. And the 1970s seemed like such extraordinary years in which Mary's and Krishnaji's worlds changed enormously—Brockwood became established; the Oak Grove School was created; the Foundations hit their stride with publishing and disseminating Krishnaji's work; the systematic videotaping of Krishnaji's teachings was established in Europe, America, and India; and the first attempts at collecting archives independently of Rajagopal were started. The sweetness of the relationship between Krishnaji and Mary seems also to have grown and changed. In 1970 Krishnaji was addressing her in letters as "Ma très chère Madame" (while just a couple of years before, it was "Mrs. Zimbalist") to addressing her in letters during his trip to India covered in this issue as "My dearest Maria."

Perhaps most important to we who read these memoirs: By 1980, Mary became the person to whom he could most reveal his inner life, and she wrote in her diaries a great deal of what he revealed.

Perhaps also this issue feels special as it is being published on the one hundred and nineteenth anniversary of Krishnaji's birth.

Mary: So, today, we begin our discussion on October eleventh, 1979. And for that day my diary reads, 'Krishnaji and I went to London on the 10:20 a.m. train from Petersfield. Joe met us and drove us first to Christie's, where I had Pascaline's pin evaluated.' She donated a jeweled pin to Brockwood. 'Then we went to Huntsman for Krishnaji's fitting. Mary lunched with us at Fortnum's, and it was very leisurely, as the Thompson dental appointment was postponed till Monday. We bought books at Hatchards, cheese at Paxton, and then got a taxi to Waterloo. We were back at Brockwood by 6 p.m. I had a 7 p.m. meeting with Dorothy, Stephen, Kathy Harris, Shakuntala, John King, and Brian Jenkins about Brian Jenkins' plans.' Do you remember what that was about?

Scott: Brian had inherited some money, and he had some plan…I don't know what. I don't think anything came of it.

M: The next day, 'Krishnaji stayed in bed, had his lunch in bed, and only got up for a walk in the afternoon at 4:30. I went to Alresford on errands and attended the staff meeting at 5 p.m.'

October thirteenth, 'I spent most of the day typing, and Krishnaji rested. The little fawn chased by the dogs had to be put down, as its front legs are paralyzed.' You remember that?

S: I do, yes.

M: 'Dorothy lunched with Krishnaji and me in the West Wing dining room. Later, we walked across the fields.'

The fourteenth. 'Again, I spent most of the day typing. Dorothy came up to talk to Krishnaji about the Brian Nicholson problem.' Who was he? Oh, he was that…

S: Brian Nicholson was a Brockwood teacher…

M: …teacher and who went off to another place.

S: Yes, and he thought he was Dorothy's heir apparent.

M: That's right. [Light chuckle.]

The fifteenth. 'Krishnaji and I went to London at 11:30 a.m. Joe met us and dropped us at Fortnum's, where Krishnaji and I lunched. Joe came back and took Krishnaji to Mr. Thompson the dentist. I did errands. A box…' Oh, something I bought, you don't want to know what I bought…

S: Yes, we do.

M: No! [S laughs.] That's silly. It was a present for my sister-in-law.

S: Okay [Pause.] …What color was it? [Laughs.] I'm only kidding.

M: [Laughs.] You'll just have to remain in your thick fog of ignorance!

S: Yes, I will. Still more is lost to history. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'I took Pascaline's pin to Phillips'—they sell things like that—'then to Mallett's on Davies Street, looking for a mirror for Ojai, and then to Nelson for Krishnaji'—Nelson's was…

S: The homeopathy place.

M: Yes. 'And finally to Thompson's, where at 5 p.m. Krishnaji was through, and Joe drove us to Waterloo. We were back by 7 p.m. We had supper and then watched TV and fought flies.' Every autumn we had terrible fly trouble in Krishnaji's room at Brockwood.

S: Yes. I remember.

M: They came out of the woodwork.

S: Yes. We finally tracked down what it was, but it wasn't until after Krishnaji died, I think. In the window casements, they would lay eggs, and there was nothing you could do to get rid of them unless you injected something through all the holes, because when the window would warm up with the sun, they all hatched and came out at once. And of course, it was cold outside, so where do all these millions of flies go? Inside.

M: Onto Krishnaji's ceiling.

S: Exactly.

M: The sixteenth of October, 'Krishnaji is tired. There was a telephone call from Pama Patwardhan in Bangalore saying that the Benares meetings had been canceled due to electricity and water shortages. Krishnaji will go to Madras and then Rishi Valley. We lunched alone in the West Wing, Krishnaji in his dressing gown. Later we went for the usual walk.'

The next day there was really nothing, but on the eighteenth, 'I took the 9:23 a.m. to London, and brought Krishnaji's dental bridge to the dentist laboratory. I then walked to Bruton Street, saw Fleur Cowles' exhibition'—a friend of mine—'at Partridges, and did some shopping. I ate a sandwich sitting in South Molton Street on a bench, returned to fetch the bridge, then went to meet Betsy to see the flat she has bought in Cheyne Gardens. I went with her to look at sofa fabrics. We walked back to her rented house in Seymour Walk, where we had tea and I fetched an electric typewriter I bought from her for Brockwood. I took it by taxi back to Waterloo and caught the 5:10 p.m.'

October nineteenth. 'Mary Links arrived at 10:30 a.m. to spend the weekend with us, staying in the West Wing guest room. And by 11 a.m., she, Krishnaji, and I were seated around the kitchen table to go into questions Mary has for the second volume of Krishnaji's biography, which she will start when she finishes the one on her father that she is doing now. This week her book The Lyttons in India was published. I'm reading it.' That's about her…

S: Grandfather.

M: Grandfather, yes. He was viceroy of India. 'She went over with Krishnaji many parts of his life, but one important clarification was Krishnaji's explaining, again, that though he was perhaps born with a certain temperament, apparently egoless, free of most of human beings' usual conditions, and though he went through the suffering of the process, this didn't mean that others had to be born to it or go through something similar. Out of whatever he is, he has shown certain things, and if one sees and understands, it can come about in them. There was much talk about "the emptiness" of the boy and why the adoration, etcetera, that went on did not corrupt him. Here, similes seem to me to confuse things. We were also trying to find out what Krishnaji actually means by 'no memory'—it is clear that he has extremely little memory, as we usually think of it; but he also seems to mean, "no reaction," rather than literally being a blank.' That's my interpretation. 'He also does remember things in his life as a result of being told about them by someone else.' That refers a lot to Shiva Rao, who told him a lot about his childhood, which he didn't remember directly.

S: Yes, he remembers what he was told.

M: 'At 1 p.m., I went down and brought up our lunch and served it in the West Wing dining room, using, at last, that room for what it was intended. Later in the afternoon, we, along with Dorothy, started for a walk, but Dorothy and I went only to the grove as we had to go to a staff meeting; but Mary L. and Krishnaji continued. In the evening, Mary and I sat in the drawing room and talked at some length.'

The next day, 'There was another long talk in the morning, Krishnaji, Mary Links, and I in the West Wing dining room on questions for the biography. It was his language that was theosophical in the early days, not his beliefs; and later, he found his own language. We lunched again in the West Wing dining room, and walked later across the fields. David Bohm arrived at suppertime back from conferences in Spain and the U.S.'

October twenty-first. 'Krishnaji talked again with Mary about his life all morning until Joe arrived at noon. The four of us had lunch in the West Wing dining room. Mary and Joe left at 3:30 p.m., and later Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields.'

The twenty-second. 'I worked most of the day at the desk and doing laundry. After lunch upstairs, Krishnaji came down to talk to Robert Wiffen.' Do we know Robert Wiffen? He was the other architect who helped do the Cloisters.

S: The Cloisters and the Assembly Hall.

M: Oh, yes. That is important.

S: He was also the consulting architect for things like when we were putting in the fire escapes and things like that.

M: He worked with Ian.

S: He worked with Ian Hammond, but he was like Ian Hammond's underling or something because…

M: Yes, he was Ian's number two.

S: Yes, Ian didn't really show up very often; but Robert Wiffen did. He was the on-site person; the person who'd actually come and make sure things were done correctly. He was a very nice man, very nice man, and deeply interested in Krishnaji.

M: Yes, so, 'Krishnaji came down to talk to Robert Wiffen and Dorothy about building quarters for staff.' That's why he was there. 'Later, we only had a short walk as Dorothy and I needed to go to the school meeting.'

October twenty-third, 'Krishnaji and I took the 10:23 a.m. train to London. Joe met us at Waterloo and dropped us at Vigo Street. Krishnaji fitted corduroy trousers at Huntsman. We walked to Fortnum's. It was cold and brisk, the first wintry day. Krishnaji wore his heavy gray flannel suit with a waistcoat. I had on a Chanel winter tweed I've had now for years and seldom wear. We bought chocolates for Krishnaji to take to India, then went up to the fourth floor and lunched with Mary. She put it strongly that if Radha Burnier remains both the head of the Esoteric Section of the Theosophical Society and a KF India trustee, especially now that Damodar Gardens and probably part of Besant Gardens are leased to the KFI for a school, no one will believe that Krishnaji is not connected to the Theosophical Society.' She was very strong about that. 'He said he would discuss it in India. He said he did not want this connection in anybody's minds. I had brought typed notes that I took on Sunday for Mary of the conversation she had with Krishnaji for the biography.'

S: Hm, do you have copies of those notes?

M: Good question. I don't know.

S: Can we look?

M: Yes, of course. I have a lot of stuff of Mary's.

'It developed in further talk at the lunch table that, in Mary's view, Rajagopal and Rosalind didn't care if Krishnaji lived or died, which she thought even though she still had remnants of her early remembrances that Rosalind was pleasant. Krishnaji told a new anecdote I had not heard before, that Rosalind knocked him down the concrete steps of the patio at Arya Vihara and he was knocked out. It means there was no end to the ugliness of what Krishnaji was subjected to. We said goodbye to Mary and walked to Truefitt, where Krishnaji had his hair cut. I bought a heavy cardigan at the Irish shop. We found a taxi and just caught an about-to-leave train at Waterloo. Krishnaji slept in the train. On returning, I found a letter from Amanda.' Well, then, that's all about the family things, not relevant to this.

There's really nothing of significance until the twenty-fifth, when 'Krishnaji dictated the thirty-seventh Letters to the Schools. We lunched on trays, and he stayed in bed until 4 p.m. when we walked across the fields. He received a letter from Mary Links reiterating what she had said about Radha Burnier, strongly putting her questioning of Radha Burnier being a trustee of KFI when she is head of the Esoteric Section. Krishnaji is reluctant to have to do something about this, but sees the implications, especially now that KFI is using Damodar Gardens for The School. He likes Radha and she is an excellent KFI member, but the Theosophical Society connection is wrong, and he feels it is.' I think all of us felt it was.

S: Yes, yes.

M: But because she's so nice and we like her, and she tries to do everything properly, nothing has been done about it.

The twenty-sixth of October. 'I worked at the desk in the morning. Krishnaji remained in bed, and we lunched on trays in his room. Afterward I drove in mist and rain to East Dean for tea with Phyl and Christopher Fry. Christopher came out to the car, welcoming me and showing me changes in their garden, which is blooming with dahlias, but still has snapdragons and roses. Phyl was very dear as always, perhaps a little more abstracted, but she remembers all sorts of details. It is her manner, which sometimes makes her seem to come from far away when she speaks. They have found a new painter they like.' They sort of collected paintings by favored painters. 'Andrew Hemingway.' Oh—I bought one of his. It's in the West Wing as you come in to the left, it's a thing in a barn or something.

S: Ah, ha. Yes.

M: 'Their friend David Tindle'—he's a great friend of theirs and a very good painter—'has an exhibition on in London. I'm sorry to have missed it. They will go to Vienna in the spring of 1984 for Christopher to direct The Lady's Not for Burning. As always, I felt deeply glad to be with them.' They were two of the nicest people I'll ever know.

S: Oh, how nice.

M: And they were two people as one person, really.

S: Hm, yes, how nice.

M: Phyl died not too long after this. 'These once-a-year afternoons having tea by the fire and talking with them mean very much to me. I drove back carefully through the rain. Krishnaji had admonished me intently to drive carefully. He, it seems, increasingly wants me to be on guard. "Do nothing unnecessary and be careful," he said. I was back by 6:30 p.m. In the evening, I telephoned to Filomena in Rome. All is about the same with her and her family. I told her about Miranda's new job and having seen the Frys, which pleased her. At 8 p.m., Mary Cadogan telephoned. She had been rung by Erna who, on return from Canada with Theo, had received the text of a book of Krishnaji's poems that Rajagopal is bringing out.' He had the right—I think I've talked about it—to republish anything that had been published before he lost the…

S: The court case.

M: Yes. In other words, the pre-'68 material. He could republish, as it was already done, but—and this was in the judge's decision—it had to be done as originally published. 'Erna received the text of Krishnaji's poems that Rajagopal was bringing out, and was disturbed to find that The Path, from 1924, was included, in spite of the settlement statement that Krishnaji didn't want anything pre-1926 included in future editions. Also, there were “insane” changes to the text. Erna wants a protest letter by the Publications Committee if Krishnaji agrees. Krishnaji stood beside me as Mary told me all this, and said he would absolutely not agree to any changes. Mary rang Erna back to tell her this. Erna was to have talked to Lou Blau, but hadn’t reached him by the time that Mary called her. She will do so over the weekend. But Erna had a call from Rajagopal in the meantime; he learned from Harper’s Carlson’—Carlson was the editor at Harper for Krishnaji books—‘that Erna had seen the text and objected. Rajagopal said he had the right to edit. She said he had no right to change words, etcetera. He said, you are trying to frustrate me like Doris Pratt’s letter. We will have to see our solicitors.’ So that was the beginning of the next lawsuit.

October twenty-seventh. ‘Krishnaji dictated a letter to Rajagopal refusing permission to make any changes. He and I both talked to Mary Lutyens about this, and also about her letter to Krishnaji about Radha Burnier’s trusteeship in KFI. Doris says her letter to Rajagopal was objecting to his giving material on Krishnaji to an Ojai newspaper which did a review of “spiritual” groups in the valley. Krishnaji this morning said the resting he has done these three weeks has been remarkable.’ He had taken three weeks to rest, more or less. “Something extraordinary has been happening. I can’t describe it.” He said we must remember and do it again in the future. Doing his exercises, then spending all day in bed, including lunch on a tray, then getting up for a good walk, then back to bed seems to be the recipe. He reads, sleeps, watches TV, and seems to relax and rest at a more thorough level. But he did say, at one point, that as soon as he really rests, his head starts. The usual pain. His seeing and saying how good the rest is made me happy to the point of tears.’

The twenty-eighth. ‘There was frost on the lawn, and it was fifty-nine degrees in my room. My electric heater is kept in Krishnaji’s bathroom. I turn it on when I get up at 6 a.m., so that it will be warm for his bath. So, as there is little heat in the radiators these days, I light my tiny fireplace. It is nice to sit a few feet from it, and Krishnaji likes it when he comes in for me to help him with one of his two exercises: he sits and I stretch his elbows over his head, also pull his arms straight up while pressing his back with my knee.’ [Both chuckle.] I don’t remember that. ‘I talked to Mary Links. She suggested that The Path might be acceptable to Krishnaji as it was written in Ojai after his experiences[1] began there. I got a copy from an archive, showed it to Krishnaji. He thumbed a few pages and listened to my reading a letter in the biography that he had written to Lady Emily while he was writing the piece in 1922, which was later published as The Path. Later I read it all. A strange outpouring of that strange mind; very beautiful. Krishnaji agreed, and so did I, that it could be republished providing Rajagopal makes no changes’—underlined—‘in any text. I rang Mary Cadogan to tell her this so that when Erna telephones here they will both know. Krishnaji went downstairs to lunch with the school. Summertime ended this morning, so when we walked at 4 p.m. across the fields, it was cold, and became dark soon after we got back. The earth smelled of autumn. The grass in the field was dry as hair. We heard the whistle of the Watercress Express train that goes from Alton to Alresford. I have just begun to pack.’

S: Oh, I'd forgotten about the Watercress Express: an antique steam train with old carriages that is maintained by enthusiasts.

M: Yes. And it goes just a few miles.

S: Yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: The twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji's voice was a little hoarse, so he rested in bed all day. We lunched on trays. Much of the morning went in telephone conversations with Mary Cadogan and Mary Links about Rajagopal's publishing The Path, etcetera. Krishnaji revised the draft of his letter to Rajagopal, which I am sending to Erna in which he said the agreement called for no changes in text, and while The Path was pre-1926, he might consent to its republication providing no changes are made in any of his writings.' I'd forgotten that the legal agreement of the first suit with Rajagopal was that Rajagopal couldn't publish anything pre-1926, and The Path was 1924. 'Mary Cadogan says Erna says Rajagopal has revised The Path into a poem format. Mary Links suggested Krishnaji appoint me to make decisions on these publication matters during his absence from the U.S. He gave me a written letter of appointment. I packed in the afternoon, and went to the school meeting.' I'd forgotten that he had appointed me to do that.

October thirtieth. 'In the morning, Krishnaji had make a note for Letters to the Schools when he returns. "When attention is profound it includes everything." I suggested he do one on man's impulse to worship; what it is. It was a gray day and though Krishnaji's hoarseness is gone, it was better he not go out. He packed and I packed. We lunched on trays in the dining room.' He liked to do his own packing. You, I think, got into that.

S: Yes. Yes, I was involved in his packing. [Chuckles.]

M: 'We lunched on trays in the dining room, and afterward he talked to Daphne, Blake, and Chris Koster for a short time.' Those are students.

S: Yes.

M: 'They say that they and a few others are "serious," and what could they do about it?' Those were all good young people.

S: Yes, they were.

M: 'Later, with Edna Cleeve, I went over things to be done this winter, and I kept packing, doing laundry, ironing, and putting things in order until it was finished at about 10 p.m. Dorothy came up at 4:30 p.m., and we sat and talked and then we went to hear, for the first time, the hi-fi system built by Harsh and students in the Assembly Hall. The car was put away for the winter. Krishnaji gave me a letter to read on the plane tomorrow, and he came in as usual before bedtime and put his hands on my head and eyes—the delicate blessing of his touch. He went to sleep at 8:30 p.m.' He was always healing me in some way. He felt my eyes, that I shouldn't wear glasses, and he put his hand on my back.'

The thirty-first. 'I was up at 5 a.m., made our usual nettle tea, and sterilized the dishes as we have been doing each day.' Why was I doing that?

S: I don't know.

M: I don't remember. 'Krishnaji did his exercises and so did I, against our long hours of sitting in planes. I bathed, dressed, and had my bags ready by 9:30 a.m. I packed two large cheddar cheeses for Krishnaji to take as presents. We had breakfast in the kitchen. He has been telling me I must be very careful, very attentive when I drive. I asked if he had a feeling I was to have an accident. He said when he is with me, nothing will happen, but I must be careful because there is danger to someone very close to him. "Where there is good, evil wants to get at it," and it can't touch him but will try to hurt the one who is close to him, so I must be watchful, attentive.' He said that to you, too?

S: Yes, he did.

M: Mmm. 'At breakfast, he said, "Give fifteen minutes a day to sitting quietly, finding out what is attention. Go into it deeply." He gave me a letter last night to read on the plane. His flight to Delhi on British Air was to go at 13:45, and Dorothy and Doris were to take him. Mine to Boston was two hours earlier. Ingrid kindly offered to take me in her car. All his things were in order. He blessed me. There, the whole life with him is a blessing. Some of the school were out on the driveway to say goodbye to me, and Krishnaji was standing in his white towel bathrobe at the kitchen window above. It was an aching pain to leave. Heathrow was a jam of passengers, with the three check-in windows for the TWA flight not manned until half an hour after the check-in time. Ingrid came in and accompanied me as far as passport control and then stayed on to see Krishnaji off when Dorothy would bring him for his 13:45 British Air flight to Delhi. He is due there nonstop at 3:30 tomorrow morning, to be met by Pama and Pupul. They then fly at 6 a.m. on to Madras, arriving there by 9:30 a.m. local time.' My god, I do have details.

S: Good.

M: 'My TWA flight left forty-five minutes late. Once airborne, I could read Krishnaji's letter as he instructed me. It was short and said everything I care about: "Partir, c'est mourir un peu."[2]…"Be exceedingly watchful. Be very attentive driving. This attention must flow from the inner to the outer."…"What a beastly day. Stia bene e sempre sia benedetta."' In Italian, that means: Be well and always be blessed. 'I felt as though his hands touching me, were coming with me—the piece of paper carries his care and blessing.'

'I landed in Boston at 2 p.m., coming in over the new Kennedy Library, opened ten days ago. There were no luggage carts, so I struggled to get the three bags to the customs inspector, the solitary porter for the whole hall helped to get them to the curbside, and I bribed the taxi driver to get them to the Air New England flight check-in, where Bud had made a reservation for me on the 5 o'clock flight to the Vineyard. It was a dash to the small plane. We stopped at Nantucket and then continued to the Vineyard. Lorna was there'—my cousin—'and I got the bags into her car. I am staying comfortably upstairs in her little house. I went over to see Wooge'—that's my stepfather…well, that was his nickname. His real name was Francis Huger McAdoo, and Huger in the South—it's a southern name—is pronounced 'Yougee,' and he was called Yougee McAdoo, but the children all corrupted it into Wooge. So, 'I went over to see Wooge. He was upstairs in bed and sadly deteriorated from the two years ago when I last saw him. He is almost blind and seems only marginally aware, like Father'—that's my father—'in his last days. Lynn'—that was the wonderful nurse—'is looking after him devotedly, and there is a nice young cook and relief nurse. At last, Elmholm'—Elmholm is the name of the house—'seems to be working properly. Lorna made our supper. And so to bed. I was pretty tired.'

And that ends the big diary for 1979, so all the entries until February fourth, 1980, will be short ones because we only have my small daily diary.

S: Well, that's much better than nothing.

M: November first. 'Krishnaji should be in Madras. I spoke on the telephone to Bud. He will fly up here tomorrow. I went over to see Wooge, who seems barely here, very physically deteriorated. He was in his armchair and dressed, but spends most of his time in bed. He is almost blind. I read to him. I went with Lorna to the village, and had a rest after lunch. I feel quite tired. Lorna and I had supper on trays by the fire and the TV news. I talked to Amanda and Phil, and also to Erna.'

The second. 'Wooge was downstairs and more able to talk. I sat with him for over an hour. I walked to the village to post the first letter to Krishnaji in Rishi Valley. Lorna and I had a pizza lunch, then took flowers to Mother's grave and Gertrude's grave'—that was Mother's sister, my aunt, mother of Lorna. 'Lorna and I met Bud, who arrived at 5:15 p.m. on a charter plane. We cooked supper, and all three had a pleasant evening of talk. Bud taped reminisces of our early days.' You're not the only taper. [S laughs.]

The third. 'Bud had breakfast here at Lorna's. Then he and I went to Seven Gates'—that was a farm when I was a child. It was owned by the Webb family, and it was split up into different sites for houses, but nobody could build a house that was seen by another house. It was nicely arranged, and most of it is all kept wild; my brother has a house there. And so we went to Seven Gates 'to see his Japanese house'—it's an old-style Japanese house built by a great Japanese craftsman, and there's not a nail in it; it's all done with wood joints. 'I came back and visited Wooge, who was tired and wished to sleep. Bud, Lorna, and I lunched here, rested, and had tea by the fire. Later we went to Edgartown, where Lorna and Bud dined with me.'

The next day, ‘It was a beautiful autumn day. Bud and I spent over an hour with Wooge, talking over past times, and Bud taped some of it. We said goodbye, Bud and I flew in a small charter plane to Peterborough, New Jersey, where Bud’s wife Lisa, and two of his children, Laurie and Lindsey, met us. We drove into New York. In Iran, students seized the U.S. embassy and took hostages.’

November fifth. ‘I cabled Krishnaji that I’m in New York, did errands for Belgian shoes, etcetera, and lunched with Bud in a restaurant around the corner. We went to the bank on business things, and then I went to Bendel’s and bought a cosmetics case. Bud, Lisa, and I dined at the apartment. I have made reservations to go to San Francisco this weekend for Liddy’s wedding.’ Liddy is my niece, one of my brother’s daughters.

The sixth. ‘I was in most of the day doing a business review with Bud, and later, the family lawyer, Mitchell Booth, came by to revise my will. We dined at Chez Pascal. Krishnaji was scheduled to go from Madras this day to Rishi Valley.’

November seventh. ‘I talked by phone to Lorna; her son-in-law, Mike Kennedy[3], stationed by the State Department in Tehran, is one of the hostages taken when the students there seized the U.S. embassy. I spoke to Alain Naudé. He will meet me in San Francisco Friday. I went to the Cooper Hewitt’—that’s the museum that Lisa was the head of—‘then on to Midtown on errands. After visiting downtown with Bud to see Liberty Tower’—that was a building that he was partly invested in—‘we picked up Lisa, and then to 12th Street’ to pick up Jim Kraft, the new director of The New School. We went across the Brooklyn Bridge to dine at the Riverview Café’—that’s a really nice place because you see across the East River all the blaze of the New York lights. ‘The Riverview Café, chef Laurence Forgione, made us special things that were very good. The view of the Manhattan across the East River is beautiful.’

The eighth. ‘I went to the Metropolitan Museum, then to Mitchell Booth’s office to sign my revised will. Came back to the apartment and met Philippa and David. We talked all afternoon and then we went to a Chinese restaurant on 86th Street for dinner.’

November ninth. ‘I took the United 11:45 a.m. plane to San Francisco and Bud and Lisa went on another airline. Alain met me. We stopped to see his newly rented house and then he dropped me at the Huntington Hotel. Bud and Lisa were already there. We dined at L’Etoile Restaurant downstairs. Bud, Lisa, Alain, and Miranda who moved here last week and is doing news reporting for CBS News, and whom I saw at 6:30 on the TV news. We had a festive dinner.’

The next day, ‘I went to see Blanche Mathias at 10 a.m.’ That was the old friend of Krishnaji’s who lived across the street from the Huntington, and I know we’ve talked about her.

S: Right.

M: 'I lunched with Bud and Lisa at the Huntington Big 4 Restaurant, then we went to Macy's to get presents for Liddy'—that's the bride-to-be. 'In a rented car we drove to a house in Redwood City, bought by Liddy and Jerry Latter'—that's the one she was marrying. 'Toodie was there already with her children'—that's another daughter of Bud's. 'I saw, for the first time, Liddy's little girl Cathy, called Toto, and met Jerry, whom Liddy marries tomorrow. We went to their friend's house for dinner. Jenny'—that's their mother—'my brother's first wife, and sister Helen…' You don't want all this stuff.

S: Yes we do. We want it all. [Chuckles.]

M: Who is going to care, except you? And I can't believe that you're interested.

S: But you know me.

M: Anyway, they were all at dinner.

November eleventh. 'Bud, Lisa, and I drove to the Woodside House of Helen Miller, where Liddy and Jerry were married in a Buddhist ceremony.' I think they made it up. [S laughs.] 'They had a not-very-Buddhist-looking Buddhist…'

S: Yes, it's very Californian, that.

M: Yes.

S: You make up your own, yes.

M: 'Much milling around. Then, lunch with lots of people. We came back to San Francisco. Miranda came at 6 p.m., and we walked across the street to the Mark Hopkins Hotel and had supper and talked.'

The twelfth. 'I had breakfast with Bud and Lisa, then took the 10 a.m. United flight to Santa Barbara. Erna and Theo met me. We lunched at the school, then came to the cottage. It was strange to come back to it alone.'

Most of the next three days don't have Krishnaji-related things until November sixteenth, when, 'I wrote to Rajagopal, enclosing Krishnaji's letter to him and a copy of Krishnaji's authorization to me to act with regard to K & R Publications. I fetched diesel and left the green Mercedes for servicing at Dieter's. I mailed a letter to Krishnaji.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji's first letter of the year from India arrived, posted from Madras November fifth. He went to Rishi Valley on the sixth. At 10 a.m., I went to a seminar at Arya Vihara organized by Fritz. There were eighteen people in all. I lunched there and went to a second session in the afternoon.'

Again, it's mostly non-Krishnaji-related things until November twenty-sixth, when 'Erna and I talked to Clayton Carlson at Harper & Row. He has spoken sharply to Rajagopal about his changes in the text of Krishnaji's poems, etcetera, and they are to be put back as originally published. Alasdair came, and we went over plants, etcetera. The second letter from Krishnaji arrived, written November seventh to the seventeenth in Rishi Valley.'

On most of these days that I'm skipping I have notations that I was working at my desk that day. I also attended a weeklong seminar organized by Fritz at Arya Vihara. Then on December fourth, 'I got a cable from Krishnaji that he hasn't received any of my letters. I sent him a reply by cable and a long letter.'

On December eighth, 'It was the last of the seminar meetings and I got another letter from Krishnaji posted in Rishi Valley November twenty-ninth.'

December tenth. 'I got confirmation from Clayton Carlson at Harper that a revised-into-original-form manuscript of From Darkness to Light will be sent to us at the end of the week.'

The next day, 'I sent Krishnaji copies of all my letters that he hasn't received.'

For December fourteenth, I have it that Krishnaji was to go that day from Rishi Valley to Madras.

December fifteenth. 'I spent a quiet day at home. Letter number four from Krishnaji arrived, sent December sixth from Rishi Valley. He had just received my first letter from Ojai.'

December twenty-first, 'Erna and I went over the corrected manuscript of From Darkness to Light, but it got complicated to read together, so each of us took half to check at home.'

Editor's Note: We have been providing links to the public talks and public discussions which Mary thought were special. Of course, we have no indication from Mary about the talks and discussions that occurred in India in the years she didn't go to India. But we do, sometimes, get indications from Krishnaji himself in his letters to Mary. In his writing to Mary on December twenty-third, he mentions this about his talk the previous day. "Pupul & the others said that what one said was totally new and Pupul bent down to touch the feet; after the talk etc. people were touching with their forehead to the ground where one had walked! … It's too long & too complicated to report what the talk was about; it passed out of one, words cascading." As readers may wish to read the text of this talk, a link to it is provided here.

December twenty-third. 'Breakfast in bed.' It is so notable to have breakfast in bed that I note it.

S: It's not the same thing, though, when you serve it to yourself.

M: Yes, well, I had a sort of high double act. I would assemble all the things for my breakfast, and then I set it up beforehand as though it was set up for me…

S: …by someone else.

M: Yes. I always set it up the night before, then my breakfast tray is ready for me.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And I would also turn down my bed before I went to bed.

S: Right. As if someone had done it for you. [Both laugh.]

M: Well, it's a pleasant illusion.

S: Yes, I agree. [More laughter.]

M: 'I worked on proofreading'—that's what I was doing in bed—'then lunched at 3 p.m. with the Hookers at the Ranch House. I was back by 5 p.m. and proofread until 10 p.m.'

The next day, 'I got Krishnaji's fifth letter sent from Madras on the fourteenth. Rain came at last. I had Christmas Eve supper with Erna and Theo at 6 p.m.'

Christmas Day. 'I telephoned Wooge and spoke to Ann'—that's one of his daughters—'and Lorna. I also telephoned Dorothy at Brockwood, Sam's brother and sister, and learned that her husband had died last summer. I drove down in the afternoon to the Dunnes', and spent the night there.'

December twenty-sixth. 'I had a pleasant morning talking to Amanda and Phil. Joan and John Houseman came to lunch.' John Houseman, does that mean anything to you?

S: Yes, it does.

M: I first knew him when he was a partner of Orson Welles, and I worked on radio things with Orson, back in New York. When Orson died, John came out to California; he and his wife Joan lived in Malibu, actually. And they were friends of the Dunnes, too. 'I drove back to Ojai.'

The twenty-seventh, 'John McGreevy brought a friend and sculptor, Jonathan Hirschfeld, to lunch.' John McGreevy was a Canadian who made that rather mannered thing of Krishnaji walking around the garden. You remember?

S: Yes. Yes, I remember.

M: 'McGreevy is to find out if Bill Moyers might do an interview with Krishnaji.' I wish that had happened.

S: Yes.

M: 'The Russians invaded Afghanistan.'

December twenty-ninth. 'I finished proofreading From Darkness to Light, correcting the butchery done to poems by Rajagopal. In the afternoon, I walked with Erna and Theo around the block.'

And the last day of the year says: 'I went over corrected proofs of From Darkness to Light with Erna and Theo and sent them to Harper. I posted a letter to Krishnaji addressed to Bombay, marketed, and cooked dinner for Erna and Theo. They left before 10 p.m., and I sat up and passed into the new year and the '80s, listening to one of Krishnaji's talks.' I thought that was the way to do it.

S: Oh, how nice, how nice.

M: 'Bud, Lisa, and Laurie had telephoned earlier from Paris.' End of 1979, and so, finally the end of the 1970s.

S: 1970s, oh good, thank god. We thought we'd never get out of them.[4]

Alright, so now we're beginning January first, 1980.

M: Hurray! Alright. January first, 1980. It starts in Ojai, and it says: 'Asit Chandmal rang from San Francisco with news of Krishnaji. Asit returns to Bombay tomorrow. Krishnaji goes there from Madras on the tenth, and Asit will advise him on ways to get here in case the political situations worsen.' I don't know whether that was situations in India or what.

S: I would imagine it was flying over the Middle East back to England.

M: Perhaps it will unfold. 'A quiet day. I mostly did letters. Went for a walk. It is as warm as summer.'

Then, again, I'll skip a lot of days until January ninth. 'Krishnaji's seventh letter, written from December twenty-first to the twenty-ninth and posted in Madras. Letter number six is missing.' He used to write a little bit each day.

S: Yes.

M: 'Harper and Row telephoned about the publisher's note in the poem book. I rewrote part of it.'

January eleventh, 'I got a letter from Dr. Parchure on a health diet of Krishnaji. Carol and Joe Zorski came to supper at 6 p.m. Krishnaji went from Madras to Bombay.'

The next day. 'The rain stopped. I telephoned New York and spoke to Lisa. Bud, who has had pneumonia, is better. I also spoke to Toodie'—that's the daughter—'who went there for the weekend. Drove to Malibu and lunched with the Dunnes. Ray Eames, Barbara Poe'—that's a friend—'Joe Cohn'—that's a friend of Sam's and mine and he was the executive producer of Sam in the studio; they had people who did business and then producers who did movies, and he was a great old friend of Sam's and mine, and he was with Sam in Rome when Sam died—'Joyce and Jules Buck'—that's another friend—'Polly Pierson, Evelyn Keyes were there. I went across the canyon. The fault has reopened along the same place. The earth was to have been fixed. Also a slide on the west side is moving. Four-and-a-half inches of rain in the last few days did it. Came back by 6 p.m. and found the missing sixth letter from Krishnaji posted in Madras had come. I agreed to Alan Hooker becoming a trustee.' The land situation in Malibu was very worrying.

Then we skip to January fifteenth, when 'I telephoned Mary Cadogan to be sure she booked Krishnaji's ticket from London to Los Angeles. The Hookers and Lilliefelts came to tea. As Krishnaji has agreed, the Foundation invited Alan Hooker to become a trustee in place of Ruth Tettemer, who was retiring. Mrs. Gandhi became prime minister again.'

The next day, 'I typed Letters to the Schools, had them photocopied, and sent them off. There was another offer on the Malibu house.'

January nineteenth, 'The Hidleys and the Zutaverns and their daughters Kate and Vicky came at 2 p.m. to ask me about Brockwood.' Hidley was a psychiatrist in Ojai, and he was…

S: Yes. And eventually his daughter Kate came to Brockwood as a student, and he had discussions that were videotaped with he and Sheldrake and Krishnaji here.

M: Yes, in the living room here. And the Zutaverns were friends of theirs, I guess.

S: Vicky Zutavern came to Brockwood, also.

M: That's right. 'Walked with Erna and Theo around the block. I saw Louisa Kennedy on television reading a letter from her husband Mike.' He was still a hostage in Tehran.

Then we'll skip again until January twenty-third. 'Krishnaji's ninth letter arrived, sent on January tenth.'

And the next day, 'Krishnaji's eighth letter arrived.'

January twenty-seventh. 'I went to a seminar at Arya Vihara at 10 a.m., then lunched there. My real estate person telephoned that a buyer, a Mrs. McNichol, has accepted my counteroffer on the Malibu house.'

S: Oh, eureka.

M: Yes, exactly.

January twenty-ninth, 'Mr. Schwartz brought the Saarinen chair recovered in red'—which is Krishnaji's bedroom chair.

January thirty-first. 'I went to Beverly Hills on various errands, but was back in Ojai by 5:30 p.m. By then Krishnaji was in the air from Bombay to London.'

The first of February. 'Krishnaji, having left Bombay at 3:40 a.m., arrived in London at 6 a.m. Ojai time. I telephoned Brockwood. He was safely there and sounded well. I lunched at Arya Vihara with Evelyne, the Lilliefelts, and seminar people. The trustees had an informal meeting in the afternoon.'

February second. 'I was home all day preparing the house for Krishnaji's arrival. There is a new outdoor table, inset with tiles from the Malibu house that's out on the patio, and two benches made by a carpenter.'

February fourth, and we are back to the bigger diary. 'The house is polished and so was the green Mercedes today. The house rose beds are made, and the lantana, camellias, jasmine, rosemary, and rock roses are planted. Two hanging baskets of cyclamen are on the north patio. Some painting has been done, and the front door oiled, etcetera.' In those days, the front door was natural wood and you just oiled it. But it got spattered with rain, so I painted it later. 'The yard was swept. The house and I are waiting for Krishnaji's arrival tomorrow.'

February fifth. 'Lorna telephoned at 9:30 a.m. Wooge had died about half an hour earlier at Elmholm. Pneumonia took his life as it had Mother's, but really it was the body's final failing. Sally and Peter'—that's one of his daughters and her husband—'had been with him last week and Sally was unsure if he had really known they were there. Francis'—that's Wooge's son—'was arriving today. Wooge was a very dear man in all our lives. I was about to leave for the airport when Lorna rang, but Krishnaji's TWA flight due at 2:40 p.m. was late by two hours leaving London, because of engine trouble. I saw him debark through a window and there was Asit with him. Krishnaji was in his gray herringbone overcoat and wore a shirt made in India from the Viyella I found for him at Liberty's.' [Chuckles.] 'He looked well and less tired than he should've been. I thought he told me on the telephone last Friday when he was at Brockwood that "Asit is coming," but I understood Asit was coming later. I rang Erna to get the guest room opened up. When they finally emerged, we set off for Ojai. Krishnaji was pleased to see the gray Mercedes. It had been washed in West Los Angeles an hour earlier. It was dark as we passed Malibu and 8 p.m. when we came up the drive in Ojai. Erna, Theo, Mark, Asha, Fritz, Margrete, Michael Krohnen, and Alan Hooker, newly a trustee, were waiting by the pepper tree to greet him. I had made soup in the morning and we had supper after Krishnaji had inspected and shown Asit the house. Krishnaji, at last, home and in his bed.'

February sixth. 'Krishnaji was up very early but went back to sleep again till 6 a.m., when we went into the still-dark kitchen and had nettle tea. I telephoned Bud. Wooge's funeral is on Saturday. Bud saw Wooge last Thursday. I telephoned Francis at Elmholm. Asit came for breakfast with Krishnaji and me in the kitchen; Krishnaji sitting in front of the Norwegian stove. We had Erna and Theo come over at 11:30 a.m., and Krishnaji had Asit tell us about a computer scheme to invest in.' Thank god I didn't do it. [S chuckles.] 'Krishnaji thought it might help the Foundations, but we had to explain that the Foundations cannot invest in speculations. I got lunch, and we five sat at the lunch table till after 4 p.m., Krishnaji wanting to talk, unwilling to rest. Radha Burnier has resigned from the KFI to run for president of the Theosophical Society after John Coats' death. Rukmini Arundale, her aunt, is the opposing candidate. Krishnaji covered all the Indian news. Finally, he went back to bed, and had supper on a tray while I gave Asit dinner in the kitchen. After Asit had gone, Krishnaji told me of the something new that is going on inside him. It began in Rishi Valley. He said, "It could be the committee—or some other." What other? I asked. He didn't know. "We will write about it"…"I am further away"…"Pupul and Nandini noticed it, and said, 'We have lost you, you are not with us.'" Krishnaji is "cooking" Asit, thinks him very bright and if this financial thing goes through, Asit in five years will be free and able to devote himself to Krishnaji's work.' [S chuckles.] 'Krishnaji wants to put money into the scheme. Finally, at 11 p.m., he went to bed. He told me again that he wrote to me every day or I "would fade from my consciousness."' He said the reason he wrote so often was so he wouldn't…um…

S: Forget you.

M: …forget me. [S laughs heartily.]

S: Flattering!

M: Somehow, it seemed quite normal. [M chuckles.]

S: Now, what is this "committee" he mentions?

M: Well.

S: I know.

M: Who knows.

S: From somewhere other.

M: Something that may or may not arrange and decide things.

S: Right. So this is some group that on some nonphysical level…

M: Undefined group.

S: Right, that decides things.

M: That decides things. And you can do your own casting if you choose to fantasize…

S: Right, of who's on the committee.

M: But I don't attempt to straighten it out.

S: No. I'm just asking this for the record. [Chuckles.]

M: One can imagine things but I don't…

S: Right.

M: …I don't believe what I imagine, necessarily.

S: Yes.

M: The seventh. 'Krishnaji was awake at 6 a.m., and talked at length to me till almost 8 a.m. There's something that began in Rishi Valley that has given him tremendous energy. The brain is charged. "I have changed my idea of how long I will live, maybe much longer." Asit came for breakfast. Michael is now to do the luncheons at Arya Vihara. So, Krishnaji, Asit, Erna, Theo, and I lunched there today. At 4 p.m., we walked down Thacher Road and around the block.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji slept in the morning. We lunched again at Arya Vihara and walked up Horn Canyon. Krishnaji thinks it is thirty years since he has walked that far up there. The real estate man says that the buyer, Mrs. McNichols, wants to start the escrow immediately, as soon as my lawyer okays her financial situation.' Oh, good.

The ninth. 'Wooge's funeral and burial at the Vineyard is today. The Island is apparently covered with snow and sunlight. Bud telephoned me during our dinnertime on his return to New York from the Vineyard. Almost all the family were there. Dear, dear Wooge. Bud was a pallbearer and he broke down at the funeral.' Wooge was a really better father to my brother than his own father was.

S: Yes.

M: …because he was around more.

S: And he did things like read stories and played games…

M: Yes, you know, and the quizzes Wooge made up. And all that sort of family life…

S: Yes.

M: He was very much a part of that, and as a stepfather, he was perfection, because he was funny and affectionate and fond of us, and never took any authority over us, never told us what to do and not to do.

S: Yes.

M: He was just a lovely person. A nice man in every way. 'Krishnaji began his exercises.

Krishnaji talked to Asit, Erna, Theo, and me on how to hold the Foundations together. We all lunched at Arya Vihara. Max came and fixed the door. We walked down McAndrew.'

The tenth. 'I talked to Sally and Anne at Elmholm'—they were Wooge's two daughters by his first marriage. 'Krishnaji, Asit, Erna, Theo, etcetera lunched at Arya Vihara, and later walked around the block.'

February eleventh. 'Asit at breakfast discussed photography and checked all my equipment. He has taken constant photographs of Krishnaji here and in India.' By the way, all those pictures are now in KFA. He bequeathed them. 'I gave him an introduction to Clayton Carlson at Harper & Row to discuss a book of pictures of Krishnaji. Later, I took Asit in the green Mercedes to the Santa Barbara Airport, where he flew to San Francisco. Krishnaji was tired and turned out the light right after supper at 8 p.m. I spoke to Lorna at the Vineyard, and saw Louisa on television today. It is the 100th day the hostages have been held in Tehran.'

The twelfth. 'Krishnaji slept nine-and-a-half hours in the night, stayed in bed all day and slept on and off another three hours. "This is luxury," he said.' [Both chuckle.] 'He dreamt I said, "I must write a book!"' Meaning that he dreamt that I said I must write a book. 'He read some poetry. He asked for the Oxford book of poetry, for some Keats, Shakespeare, Swinburne, Hopkins, O'Shaughnessy. When I said that Hopkins was a Jesuit, Krishnaji said, "Oh, that rather spoils it."' [S laughs, then M chuckles.] Oh dear.

February thirteenth. 'Krishnaji wished me a happy birthday.' He usually didn't know it was my birthday. I don't know how he knew, but anyway, he did. 'He said, "We've had a marvelous relationship. It must be that way always. I am speaking as the World Teacher. You are blessed."'

S: Oh, how sweet, how nice. [M chuckles.]

M: 'Later, Bud and Lisa telephoned, Naudé, too, and Winky. It was a rainy day. Electricians put extra plugs in the patio. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji talked almost two hours at the table, questioning Mark on the school, etcetera. Then he rested. Erna and Theo came to go on a walk, but the rain was heavy so we had tea in front of the Norwegian stove and then watched President Carter's news conference on television.' That's a great way to spend your birthday. 'Supper and early to bed.'

Then nothing really until the fifteenth. 'It continues to rain. Two inches in the night here, but more in Los Angeles. I went to Dieter's with the green car, and left it there. Alan Kishbaugh picked me up and drove me back to Ojai. He, Erna, and I discussed publication matters. It was Krishnaji's "day off," so he didn't exercise, but stayed in bed all morning. He got up at noon and we all lunched at Arya Vihara. There was a discussion with Mark of the teachers' discontent and other problems. I spoke to the real estate man, an appointment to start the escrow is on Tuesday. Alan took me back to fetch the car. Krishnaji had walked in spite of the light rain with Erna and Theo. He said he had told them, "You are not using me enough here, " and said we must discuss this.'

February sixteenth. 'It rained heavily all night. Krishnaji had Erna and Theo come over at 10 a.m. We sat by the fire and he put to us the question of his not being "used" enough here. "Am I just going to talk to the teachers who understand nothing for two months? It is a waste."' [Both chuckle lightly.] 'He needs the challenge of someone who can push him deeper, someone who has gone into all this. How can we find such a person? He dismisses scientists as not really interested, artists, musicians, journalists, and religiously oriented people as already committed to their own beliefs, etcetera. The ordinary individual is hard to find. Where are the serious, intelligent ones who go in his direction? "Maybe there aren't any. Maybe this is the way it is supposed to be. I'm not frustrated, but it is a waste." There is a danger, too, that he will get further and further away. He feels this. It is a lack that confronts him everywhere. At present there is much going on in India but it is an outward response and activity, people offering to help start schools, donate their services, but not this inward exploring. It is intensely painful to me. His frequent telling that the Buddha had only two disciples who understood him, and they both died before he did, is like a knife wound. One wants to give him everything, and this is the most essential of gifts, but I am unable to search for people. I am doubtful of my own capabilities in exploring with him. I understand many things, but make no claims to anything. Am I wrong? Am I hiding in a kind of withdrawal from pushing in this direction? My instincts are to protect him, cherish the man and his energies, but perhaps he needs the demands of challenge. Can I do that? I have felt the physical fatigue for a number of months, but energy comes when it is needed and demanded. The rain poured down. We lunched at Arya Vihara. We had invited Maris Lindley to please her. There was a telephone call from Betsy, who has sold her house to an Iranian for the full price in cash. I spoke to Amanda. The Pacific Coast Highway is closed. Malibu has no electricity, and the rain is heavy. Ojai is also cut off. Krishnaji came into the study at 4 p.m., and as there was a lull in the rain, we walked down to the Lilliefelts' and then to the dip. The torrent of brown water was thundering over rocks that had washed into the road. Krishnaji watched it like a child. At the Lilliefelts', while waiting for them, he said, "I am thirsty," and drank a little rain off the leaves of a trumpet vine.'

February seventeenth. 'The rain continues. Ojai is cut off. Malibu is cut off. We lunched at Arya Vihara, then watched the winter Olympics at Lake Placid on television. The earth is sliding more at my place in Malibu.' Thank god, it was sold. 'Nothing can be done. Blau telephoned to be optimistic that the escrow will start Tuesday in spite of all this.' So, we must not have stopped worrying. [S chuckles.]

The eighteenth. ‘The rain was intermittent through the day. Southern California is in chaos. Malibu remains isolated. My place is crumbling along the fault. Whether the buyer, Mrs. McNichols, will end the escrow remains to be seen tomorrow. Lou Blau called last night to say he thought she would not, which raised my rain-soaked spirits. Krishnaji and I stayed in all day except for lunch at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji found a copy of La Fontaine’s Fables, which I had bound years ago when I did book binding. “I used to do that,” he said unexpectedly.’

‘“When?” I asked.’

‘“Madame de Manziarly did it and showed me how.”’

‘In the evening we watched the ice hockey, which Krishnaji found very skillful, and the men’s giant slalom in the winter Olympics.’ I like watching that, I must say.

S: That was the eighteenth, and we have to leave it there because we’re running out of tape.

M: Okay.

S: So, we’ll begin next time on February nineteenth.

M: The nineteenth, good. That’s wonderful.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] “The process.”

[2] A quote from the French poet Edmond Haraucourt: “To part is to die a little.”

[3] Moorhead C. Kennedy, nicknamed Mike.

[4] It looks from this manuscript like we just carried on with the next day, year, and decade; but, in fact, Mary and I turned off the tape recorder and had a little celebration that we had finally gotten through the 1970s.

Issue 62: February 19, 1980 to April 20, 1980

A positive development that appears in this issue is that Mary finally sells her Malibu house. There is something typical about Mary in this: She has no loss of affection for that house she had built and lived in for so long, but she sees it as the past, and actively embraces her present.

The Oak Grove School and the Adult Center at Arya Vihara in Ojai are not going well, and Krishnaji is drawn into trying to fix them. Interestingly, we see an increase in Mary's role that will continue until the end of Krishnaji's life: Krishnaji asks Mary to be the initial intermediary to talk to people, sometimes before Krishnaji does and sometimes instead of his doing so.

Most worrying for Mary and others is that Krishnaji tells them that he is being "wasted" in Ojai, and that some force or collections of forces that determine his life may prevent him from coming to Ojai if a better use of his time is not found.

Mary: We begin on February nineteenth. 'I telephoned Bud on his birthday; he and Lisa go to Palm Beach on museum matters, then to Panama for some sun, returning March second. A new storm brought torrents of rain, so heavy that we had to wait at Arya Vihara after lunch for it to abate before walking home. Krishnaji spoke at lunch to the Lees, the Wilhelms, the Lilliefelts, Michael, etcetera on distrust among the teachers, how to change it, what is thinking together (not from personal bias and not about something). The escrow on the Malibu house, which was to commence today, didn't as the bank misplaced some papers. Also, the real estate broker is stuck in Topanga by floods and mudslides.' [Both laugh.] 'All parts of L.A. are flooded. Houses are destroyed by mudslides. Even if the escrow starts, when the process is completed, the Malibu place has to be in the condition in which it was at the start, or the buyer can refuse to buy. So there is no telling what will happen because of the rains. I talked to Betsy; her escrow starts tomorrow.'

February twentieth. 'It was clear in the morning and then the rain returned and continued all day. We lunched at Arya Vihara. The real estate man telephoned in the morning to say the escrow on the Malibu land is starting today. At 4:30 p.m., I took Krishnaji to the barber in Meiners Oaks, where he had his hair cut. This morning he had not gotten up by 6:30, as usual, so I went into his room. He had the covers up to his chin, lying, as he does so neatly, in a straight line, but he was not asleep. He spoke but was vague, disinclined to get up, and when he did, he said he was "elsewhere" and "not quite here." Beyond finding out that he was not sick, I asked nothing but felt his "absence," which seemed to last until he later came into the kitchen where his breakfast tray was ready. He did no exercise.'

The twenty-first. 'The rain has gone at last. Krishnaji was up at the usual time, and did his exercises. The real estate man rang to say the escrow papers are in Louis Blau's office. Blau said the escrow person at the bank is revising them, and he will try to bring them for my signature this weekend as he is coming to Ojai with Evelyne. Krishnaji dictated a description, which Mary L. had requested, of the change in Krishnaji's meditation which began in Rishi Valley in November and continues here. He said it is completely different and new, a movement that reached the source of all energy, a sense of the absolute; the whole universe is in it. There is the perception that there is nothing beyond this. "This is ultimate, the beginning and the ending, the absolute. There is only a sense of incredible vastness and immense beauty."'

S: We have that description. We came across that.

M: You did?

S: Yes. We came across that, and it was one of the things that we turned over to the archives.

M: We did?

S: Yes.

M: You see, that quote I just gave you alone makes this, all these notes that I scribbled all these years ago, valuable.

S: Absolutely. I completely agree.

M: Well, it says, '"…vastness and immense beauty." When asked how one knows it is the source of all energy, he said, "One can only reply, with complete humility, that it is so."' I think that's in the account.

'Letters had just come from Mary Links and Mary Cadogan, both disturbed by a letter from an R. Toddywalla in Bombay.' [Laughs.] Now, there's a name! This is a Theosophist who kept writing to Krishnaji, urging him to say that he was really a Theosophist. [S chuckles.] 'So, a letter from R. Toddywalla in Bombay in which he keeps referring to Krishnaji having told him that he was joining the Theosophical Society. Krishnaji dictated a letter in reply that this is not so. In the letter, he repeated that if Mrs. Arundale became president of the Theosophical Society, "It would be a disaster." He asked me to show his reply to Erna, who also was disturbed by Toddywalla's assertion, and she also felt that Krishnaji should not do politics for Radha. So, after lunch, he drafted another, better reply. In the course of doing this, with Erna and Theo present, he had me read what he had dictated in the morning on meditation. He said that during the war years here in Ojai, he had no meditation. "Only when away from those two."' And then I have in parentheses: 'Rosalind and Rajagopal.'

S: So, meditation didn't occur when he was near them?

M: No.

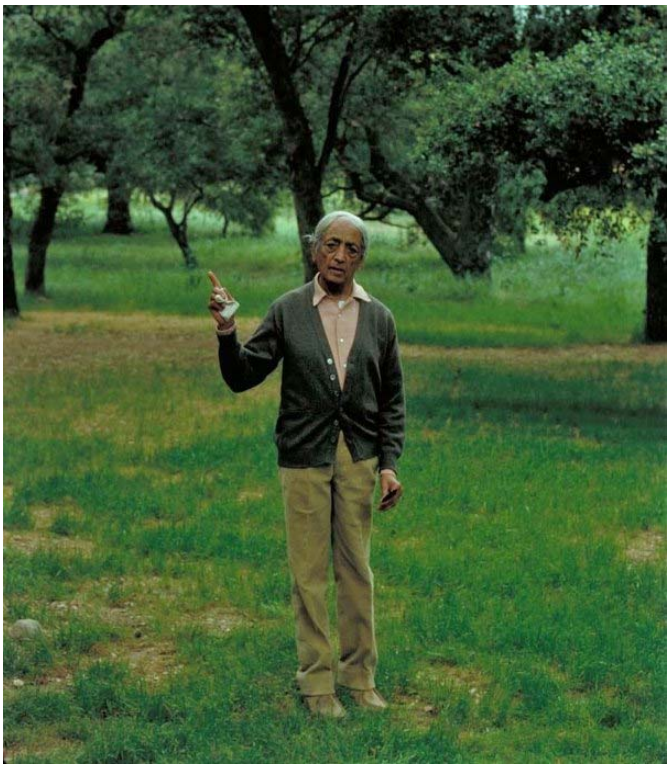
S: Hm.

M: 'And today he said, "The body feels very young. Meditation has done something to the brain. I am not tired. On the contrary. Something has happened to the body, something I cannot put my finger on has happened to the whole mind. It is not what it was. What it was, was alright, but it is something entirely different. You have no idea how I worked in India at Rishi valley—the teachers and school, but I wasn't tired. I was like a flame."'

February twenty-second. 'No rain. Krishnaji dictated a few letters. Theo met Asit at the Santa Barbara airport. He has finished his current business in San Francisco and is here for the weekend before flying to Singapore on Monday. We all had a late lunch at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji is very interested in Asit's business in San Francisco, an unusual interest for him. He wanted to put his small savings from the Miss Dodge money into Asit's venture but apparently this will not be possible.' Krishnaji's small savings; he got £500 a year from Ms. Dodge.

S: Yes, I remember.

M: And he wanted to invest it in Asit's ventures. Thank god, it couldn't be done. [S laughs.] 'Krishnaji rested while Asit came with me to the village marketing. Then, Krishnaji, Asit, Erna, and Theo went for a walk while I cooked supper. We ate in the kitchen and watched Washington Week in Review.' Washington Week in Review, for those who don't know, has been going on in my life for years, every Friday night, and Krishnaji liked it very much.



S: So, he liked that too? Oh, good.

M: Yes, we used to watch it. The main television was in his room. I moved it to my room afterwards, but it used to be in his room. He would always have supper in bed, as you know, and I would sit in the big red chair.

S: Right.

M: And we would have supper on trays that way. And the big television was next to the big red chair, so he would look at it. There was a small television in the kitchen. Anyway, 'we watched Washington Week in Review and then the Olympics. Narasimhan telephoned to inquire how Krishnaji is.'

The twenty-third. 'At 11 a.m., there was the annual KFA trustee meeting. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Alan Hooker, Evelyne Blau, and Asit came as a guest trustee from KFI. Lou Blau joined us for lunch at Arya Vihara and attended the afternoon session. We discussed Rajagopal's violations of the settlement agreement. Erna raised the question of inequity to me in my remaining payment, due in 1981, on the purchase of the McAndrew Road property. I did not attend this discussion.' In order to make it all legal, there was a…

Krishnaji in the Oak Grove (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Yes, you've explained all this before.

M: I had to buy this place.

S: You bought this place and then you donated it.

M: And then I donated it to the Foundation.

S: Right, with the right to live here for your lifetime.

M: Yes. 'I did not attend this discussion. On my return, all agreed that Lou should review the situation, then we adjourned. Krishnaji, Asit, Erna, Theo, and I walked down McAndrew Road and back. Asit leaves Monday for Singapore.'

February twenty-fourth. 'Max, Katie Marx, and Thomas dug up the pool on the front patio; it will be planted instead.' It was useless as a pool; it had mosquitoes in it. 'Margaret Dodd came to see Asit and discuss a book he wants to do of photos.' She had something to do with publication. 'She lunched with us at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji was a bit tired from no nap due to the KFA meeting yesterday. The Blaus have tried to see Rajagopal as Lou has never met him and thought he could prevail in getting a donation from him,' [chuckle in voice] 'but Rajagopal said he didn't feel well. Lou reviewed the settlement agreement and thinks we should attempt to photocopy archive documents. He brought up the Berwick TV interview of Krishnaji, which Evelyne arranged and I opposed. We disagreed. I put on the Berwick program for Krishnaji to see; it was an interview of Norman Mailer, and Krishnaji didn't want to watch after about ten minutes. I watched from another set. We went for a short walk to the dip. I sat up till late looking at Asit's pictures of Krishnaji.' I've forgotten what all that was about.

The twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji and I said goodbye to Asit at 5:30 a.m., and Theo drove him to Ventura where he took the bus to Los Angeles and a flight to Singapore. Evelyne telephoned about the Berwick interview; she didn't cancel it when we said "no" in January, hoping, I suppose, that Krishnaji would decide otherwise on arrival. So, I put it to him and Erna and Theo at lunch, and offered no opinion of my own. Evelyne feels, rightly, that it is a chance to get footage of Krishnaji at no expense, but in the end Krishnaji decided it would be too tiring, three hours to get to NBC in Burbank and back. And they want to tape it at night.'

S: Oh…

M: He interviewed people on—I've forgotten what on. I didn't think he was suitable. [S laughs.] 'We walked with Erna and Theo in the afternoon and looked at baby goats.' [Chuckles.]

S: [laughs] Not something you do every morning.

M: February twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji talked to Mark Lee and Erna, Theo, and me. Lunched at Arya Vihara. It was a warm day.'

The twenty-seventh. 'There was a telephone call from a young woman with leukemia named Angela Arzunian, asking to see Krishnaji. He agreed, and she came in the afternoon. He saw her for about forty minutes, and said she did most of the talking. He listened, and held her hand. She had read all the books, knew what he had said about death, and is not afraid. She has only a short time to live. In the evening, we saw a television documentary on young people in deep trouble with the law. Krishnaji watched. "What is wrong in this country!"…"I could weep for these young people."'

The next day. 'Krishnaji slept poorly, woke in the night thinking, "I am being wasted. What am I doing here for four months? Just talking to those teachers?" At lunch, he brought it up again. We were alone and having our first meal at the new table on the patio. "What am I to do? I am not being used. The committee might say, 'You're not doing anything. Leave!'" And later on the walk with Erna and Theo, he raised it. "What am I doing just talking to these teachers who understand nothing?" We frantically asked him what he should be doing. "Talking," he said.'

S: [chuckled] But not to those teachers, obviously.

M: No. '"Since that thing happened in Rishi Valley, there is much more, much more to be got out." In all the past, no one has helped him to reveal his teaching, but now it seems he needs the affect of someone being able to question, to spur him to go more deeply. The responsibility seems to be on us to provide—so this agonizing warning.'

February twenty-ninth, leap year day. 'Krishnaji slept well, nine hours. At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji talked in the living room with Mark, Fritz, Erna, Theo, and me about the school. The teachers have a lack of trust, are "suffering," according to Fritz who, though he says he doesn't agree with them, is rather their spokesperson. They feel they are not consulted enough. Toward the end of the discussion, Krishnaji said he would meet with us and two or three teachers on Wednesday to work out "the rules of the game" in the school. Then, have meetings on Thursday and Friday with all of them to go into it. Then, enough on schools; he said some of what he had said yesterday. "What am I to do here for four months?" The others left while I got our lunch and stood talking about what could be done to find people able to discuss with him. Krishnaji had me ask Erna and Theo back to lunch with us, as we had just enough; and the four of us had lunch on the terrace. Krishnaji took a nap for two hours, and then we went for a walk with Erna and Theo down to Reeves Road and back. Max has gone to Malibu to put the railroad ties back, to fix the roof leaks, etcetera.'

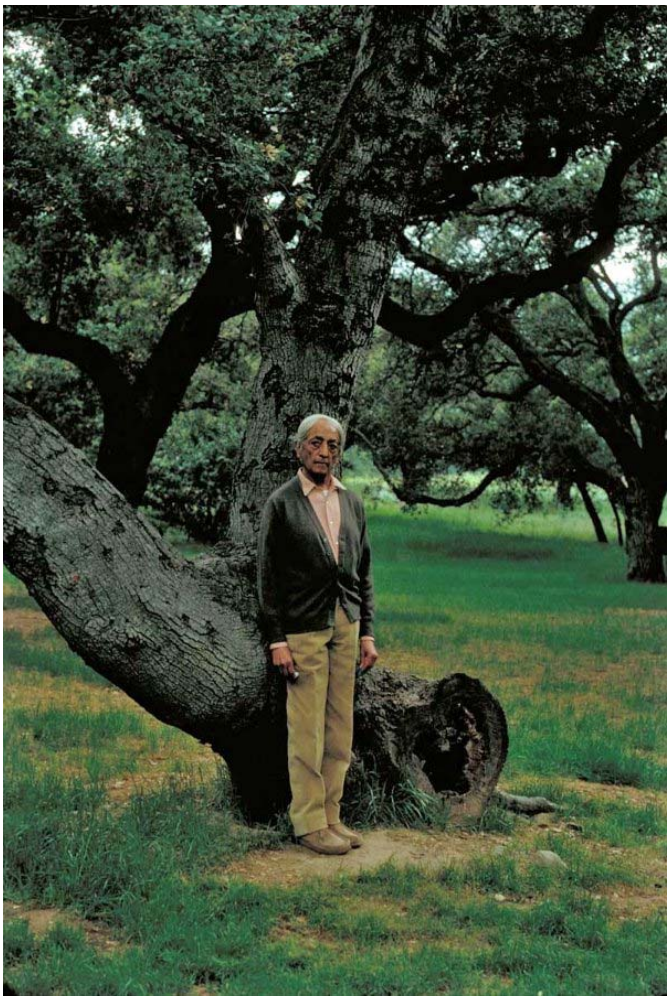
The first of March. 'After breakfast, Krishnaji had a stomach cramp and felt ill. When we went to lunch at Arya Vihara, he ate very little and then went back to bed. I had a long talk with Erna and Theo, Fritz, and Margrete about the school and possibly a few teachers to work closely with Mark to change the division between Mark and the staff. Krishnaji remained in bed and had a light supper. I made him a vegetable broth, which he had with dry toast and an apple. He thinks yogurt made him sick but felt better in the evening. Max, Katie Marx, a bulldozer man, Lorry, Elfriede, and Fred all worked to improve the railroad ties around the pine tree in Malibu. If the weather holds, they will continue tomorrow.'

March second. 'Krishnaji was weak in the morning but ate a normal breakfast. In mid-morning, he sent for Mark, and talked to him with me present, about the school. The rain began again in mid-morning and ended the work that Max was doing in Malibu. Krishnaji and I lunched at Arya Vihara. There were some teachers there. Elfriede rang me at 5 p.m. and said torrential rains in Malibu washed out the work that Max had done. Krishnaji and I tried to walk but had to turn back as we got so wet. I spoke to David Bohm in London about discussions he wants to have with Krishnaji when he is here. He and Saral arrive on the twenty-seventh.'

The next day. 'Rain turned to showers. Krishnaji was much better. We walked in the afternoon. And' [chuckles] 'he asked me why haven't I "this thing."'

S: This thing being this religious thing?

M: Yes. '"What's the point if someone so close to me doesn't have it?" He then asked me if I thought like a woman.' [S chuckles.] 'It developed, that he meant did I think beyond the reactions and the nature of a woman. "Is that you? Is it that you do not see instantly the whole of a problem? I want to change you." That's what we were talking about yesterday, seeing the whole.'



S: Ah, yes.

M: That's because I'm a woman?

S: I don't think so.

M: I think it's more widespread than that. [Chuckles.]

S: [laughs] Yes.

Krishnaji in the Oak Grove (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: The fourth. 'At 11:00 a.m. Krishnaji had Erna, Theo, and Alan Hooker as trustees come and talk about meetings with teachers beginning tomorrow. We discussed the functions and responsibilities of trustees, of the school director, etcetera. We lunched at Arya Vihara and later walked down Reeves Road.'

March fifth. 'There was a meeting after breakfast at 9:30 a.m. of Krishnaji, Mark Lee, the Lilliefelts, Alan Hooker, and me. It was another rainy day. We telephoned Mary Links and Krishnaji reassured her that he is not joining the Theosophical Society and has so answered the Toddywalla letter. She and Joe sounded like they were in the room; it was lovely to talk to them. We lunched at Arya Vihara, and at 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a meeting here with trustees and the Oak Grove School staff. It went on till 6:30 p.m. The real estate man telephoned that Mrs. McNichols has signed the escrow for the house.' She was an indomitable buyer. Thank god.

S: I guess so.

M: The sixth. 'I spoke to Amanda on her birthday, then went to Ventura to fetch a new hearing device, marketed and got back as Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, etcetera, and the David Moodys, too, were finishing lunch. At 4 p.m. Krishnaji held a second discussion with Oak Grove teachers and a resolution of their differences seems to be happening. Alain Naudé arrived, having driven down from San Francisco. He is spending the weekend in the guest house. We had supper on trays in Krishnaji's room. The escrow on Malibu had begun!'

March seventh. 'Max reported on how he can re-fix the railroad ties around the pine tree in Malibu. We breakfasted in the kitchen. The weather was suddenly beautiful. Krishnaji and Alain talked in the living room while I tended house plants, and the gramophone rang with Pavarotti singing Neapolitan songs.' [S chuckles.] Krishnaji liked that.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: 'Krishnaji later said he had hardly heard what Alain was saying because the atmosphere in the room was so strong. "I must sit in there each morning." We all lunched at Arya Vihara. Alain met the Wilhelms, Michael, and David Moody. At 4 p.m., there was the third teacher meeting, which lasted till 6:30 p.m. Evelyne was there, and Lou telephoned during it to tell me that all is well with the escrow. The building and termite report was excellent, and he is sending it to me for signature. The sale of the house is a triumph.' [Both chuckle.] So it was.

S: Sliding down the hill.

M: Yes. 'Krishnaji was tired after the meeting. He, Alain, and I had supper on trays in front of Krishnaji's television.'

The eighth. 'Alain had breakfast with the Lilliefelts, returned, and had a private talk for about an hour with Krishnaji. We all lunched at Arya Vihara. Various teachers were there. After a rest, Krishnaji, Alain, Erna, Theo, and I walked down McAndrew joined by a waiting Japanese man who wanted to see Krishnaji, and invited himself to come along. This sort of thing makes me cranky.' [S chuckles.] 'Toward the end of the walk, Alain said to me one of his reasons for coming here is because Mary L. had told him that both Krishnaji and I felt some unfinished something from years ago. He said he had talked to Krishnaji in the morning and now wanted to clear it up with me. I said for myself, I felt then and still felt, that he had acted wrongly when he left, but he had a right to act as he chose. It was over and gone and didn't color my friendship for him today. He defended his actions, saying he was accused unjustly, etcetera, and he said both sides acted wrongly. His words were wanting things to be right, but there was, I felt, an insistence in him that he had been right. By this time, we were back at the gate. The others were catching up, so I spoke in as friendly a way as I could, warmly of past times, when we were all together. I fixed our supper and all three ate in front of Krishnaji's television.'

The ninth. 'It was a beautiful day. Krishnaji, Alain, and I had breakfast in the kitchen. Alain left at 10:30 a.m. for San Francisco, after Krishnaji had again invited him to stay at Brockwood if and when he comes to London. "Naudé is tiring," said Krishnaji after he left, but he feels perhaps Naudé would like to come back to some degree. It was vague, and we'll see. I had a long pleasant chat with Amanda on the telephone and later with Bud in New York. He and Lisa were on Contadora Island in Panama when they were invited by the wife of the shah of Iran to call and spent two hours with her alone.' They were sort of acquaintances of hers. They'd been invited when the shah was still shah, and they had invited a lot of people, distinguished people, to come to Tehran.

S: There was a big event, like the 2,000th anniversary of the Persian Empire, or something like that.

M: Yes, it was something like that, and they were invited and went. So, anyway, they saw the wife in Panama. 'Lisa brought museum articles she thought would be of interest to the empress, and the empress poured out her thoughts. At one point, Bud mentioned the husband of his niece, who is a hostage in Tehran, and spoke of Louisa's going to Paris as the guest of the French government to speak on television. "Is she the woman?" said the empress. She had heard of what Louisa had said, and said it had "given me the strength to carry on." Bud said there's little protection for her. The Panamanian government was so welcoming at first, but is now dickering with the Iranians. She cannot see her children, as she fears for their safety. After lunch at Arya Vihara, we saw a videotape of a Nova program on arteries, blood cells, etcetera, photographed inside the body. After a rest, we walked with Erna and Theo, and ran into the Blaus, who are house-hunting for their daughter Eloise, so they came in briefly.'

The next day. 'There was a meeting of Erna and Theo, Alan Hooker, Mark, me, and Carol Andre on the future of the school vegetable garden. It is too expensive to continue. Carol is to leave. After lunch and a rest, Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I walked in the Topa Topa Ranch grove.' We had permission from the Topa Topa owners.

S: Oh, how nice.

M: March eleventh. 'In the afternoon, I went to an Oak Grove School teacher and parent meeting. Carol Andre is no longer on the staff; will stay on until the garden is changed, and turned over to the staff and many volunteers who will look after permanent plants. It was a calm meeting. I came back and walked with Krishnaji. Max went to Malibu to mend the railroad ties trying to hold the earth.'

The twelfth. 'It was a lovely, clear day. At 11 a.m., we went with Erna and Theo to Santa Barbara, going through the Casitas Pass'—that's the inland way. 'The lake was full, the hills were so very green, and the ceanothus was in bloom. We went at first to buy a training suit for Krishnaji, then to Danica House for teak oil, to a French bakery, and then lunched in a small French restaurant called Mousse Odile. We had to wait but the food was good. Afterward we went to Kaiser Health Food there, then drove to the botanical gardens where we walked about. Then we drove to Montecito, bought cheese and vegetables, and came home after casing the barber at the Biltmore Hotel for Krishnaji and a hairdresser for me. The ocean was welcome to both of us as we drove back. It smelled of the sea, and soft, moist air. We were back at 6 p.m. Krishnaji was not too tired. We had supper with the fresh vegetables and goat cheese we had bought. Elfriede telephoned to thank me for a check, and say that Max had done part of the work on the railroad ties around the pine tree and will continue tomorrow. Mr. Chapman had a stroke and died.' Mr. Chapman was a very funny old man who lived up in the hills, and used to do gardening for the Dunnes and for me.

March thirteenth. 'Max is working in Malibu. Sidney Field came to lunch at Arya Vihara with Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Michael, and me. He told of robberies and of the dangers of life in his section of Hollywood. Also, he reminisced and said he hadn't ever spoken to Rajagopal since a telephone conversation in which Rajagopal was complaining of his health and having a hernia. Sidney had told him, "Well, that's what comes with lifting other people's property."' [Both M and S laugh heartily.] Good for Sidney. 'In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I walked through the avocado and orange trees of the Topa Topa Ranch, a very pleasant walk. We discussed the renewed crisis in school. Laura Martin is resigning, and she says the trouble between Mark and the staff still exists. We decided to talk to Mark tomorrow morning and then see the teachers without him in the afternoon.'

S: Is Sidney Field still alive?[1]

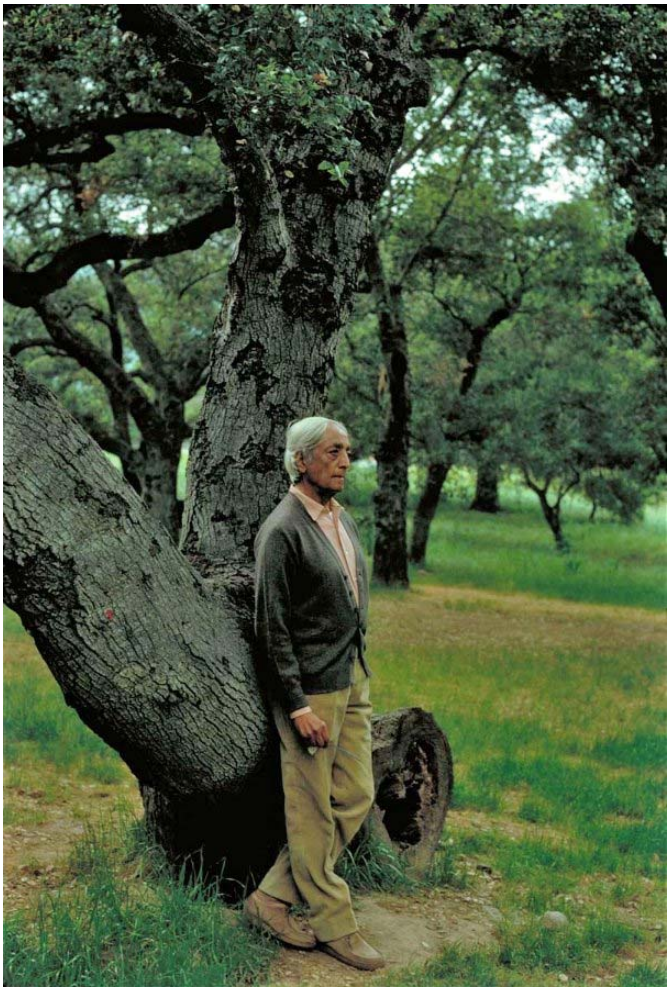
M: No. At least I don't think so. I would've been hearing from him if he was. No. He must've died.[2]

S: To me, Sidney Field's biography of Krishnaji is one of the best ones; it is terribly touching and he conveys a sense of Krishnaji.



M: Yes, it does. That's a very, very good one. He was a very good friend to Krishnaji.

S: I never met him. I'd love to have met him.

M: He was very nice. [Laughs.] I'd forgotten about all that—Rajagopal's hernia from lifting other people's property. [Laughs more.] Anyway.

March fourteenth. 'At 8 a.m., Krishnaji, Mark, Erna, Theo, Hooker, and I met. Krishnaji told Mark we would see the teachers in the afternoon without his being there. That meeting was held at 4 p.m. All the staff came. Krishnaji worked very hard at trying to get to the root of the problem. It is a lack of common ground, i.e., bringing about a different human being in the school, the children. All else is peripheral. He got most of them to see this though Laura and her husband, and Margrete Heising, Fritz's wife, remain uncommitted. Later, Krishnaji chided me for not going deeper, but only discussing on the periphery. "You should've solved it, you and the Lilliefelts," he said.' [S chuckles.]

Krishnaji in the Oak Grove (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

March fifteenth. 'At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a two-and-a-quarter-hour meeting with parents, teachers, and few others. I invited Kathleen Quinn. It was good, but it went on too long. Max had been invited but finished work in Malibu; he sent me photos of his work via Katie Marx.'

March sixteenth. 'At 10 a.m., Krishnaji, Mark, and David Moody, who will join the school in September, Erna, Theo, Alan Hooker, and I met and discussed Friday's teacher meeting with Mark. Mark was remarkably open and un-defensive in all this. It is good that Moody was there seeing all sides. At 4 p.m., the second parent-teachers-etcetera discussion was held for one hour and twenty minutes. Max came on the walk afterward with Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and me.'

The seventeenth. 'I woke up at 3 a.m., and did proofreading on the final version of From Darkness to Light just received from Harper & Row. I had surprising energy all day. In the afternoon, Krishnaji and I washed the green car and then went for a walk with Erna and Theo through the Topa Topa grove.'

The next day, 'There was sudden thunder and rain in the morning. Elfriede reports a pipe near Filomena's room burst yesterday, but she got the plumber to fix it.'

S: Oh, poor Malibu.

M: 'After lunch, Krishnaji and I drove to the Biltmore Hotel in Montecito, where Krishnaji had a good haircut. The day had cleared and the world was windy and shining. On the way home, we stopped for more goat cheese from Provence. Krishnaji drove along the ocean, looking pleased and very young. He hoped for a train, and one came by, keeping us company as far as Ventura.' [Light chuckling.] 'He told me that years ago, when he used to drive by himself, when a train would be parallel with the road, he would drive fast. And the train engineer would shake his finger out the window at him, and he would stop racing.' [S laughs, M laughs too.]

The nineteenth. 'I worked at the desk most of the day. Krishnaji saw David Moody at 11 a.m., and Laura Martin and her husband at 4 p.m. while I marketed. There was the walk as usual.'

March twentieth. 'I fixed our breakfast and then I left at 7 a.m. for Malibu. The coast road has just opened after landslides, and the rain has brought out more than ever before the yellow tufted daisies that Krishnaji and I like so much. I reached the house at 8:30 a.m., talked to Elfriede and later to Lorry. Elfriede is prepared to move out and into a trailer on her own land as soon as the escrow closes.' She and her husband had a piece of land up in the hills.

S: Yes.

M: 'I saw all that Max had done. The earth continues to sink like an elevator beyond the fault, but it was a lovely day. The roses were blooming. The sea air shone. The house was dear as it always has been and as beautiful, a familiar-as-ever part of my life. I shall very probably never go there again. I leave it with undiminished affection but no pain. Went over to see Amanda and Phil and learned that they too are thinking it may be time for them to sell and reshape their lives while they are still able to choose. They are thinking of San Francisco.' They never did move. 'It is indeed a day of turning. I went on into town to Dr. Olson about a skin thing that has to be removed, then had my hair cut. At 4 p.m., I met Tootie'—that's Bud's eldest daughter—'at a car rental place in Santa Monica to put my credit card on line so she can rent a car. She is no longer with Lance whatever-his-name-was. I came back along the ocean and drove in as Krishnaji was returning from his walk with the Lilliefelts. "I knew you were coming," he said.' [Both chuckle.] He had a great way of, of something…'Krishnaji had seen Fritz at 4 p.m.'

The twenty-first. 'Krishnaji came with me to Green Thumb Nursery to choose a ficus to go in the corner of the new flower bed where the pool was.' You're looking at it now.

‘We bought little plants too and got back just in time for lunch. In the afternoon, Thomas planted everything in the little garden using two of the Malibu sea rocks. It was finished and looking charming by the time we came back from our walk. Krishnaji was pleased.’

March twenty-second. ‘Krishnaji met with Erna, Theo, Alan Hooker, Mark, David Moody, and me about Moody’s draft of a statement on a definition of “common ground” for the school, and we spent an hour amending it. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with parents, teachers, etcetera, which Krishnaji thought went well. Louis Blau sent the final papers with Evelyne for me to sign. He says Mrs. McNichols wishes to close the escrow Wednesday. The shah of Iran leaves Panama for Egypt. Louisa Kennedy is interviewed about its effect on the hostages on CBS.’

The twenty-third. ‘Krishnaji held the fourth parent-teacher discussion at 4 p.m. I signed the grant-deed at the notary, and Evelyne took it to Lou. I spoke to Miranda in Malibu, also Lisa in New York.’

There isn’t anything the next day.

On the twenty-fifth, ‘Krishnaji says we ought to go to Sri Lanka in the autumn. He forgot to tell me. He said Dr. Parchure predicted I would object—Krishnaji taking on too much.’ Well, anyway, we went. [S laughs.] ‘The buyer of the house, Mrs. McNichols, telephoned to say, “It is such a beautiful house.” It will be hers tomorrow. I replied in kind. It rained. I went to the Department of Motor Vehicles in Ventura about missing license tags.’

March twenty-sixth. ‘I was up early and proofread the final version of From Darkness to Light, finishing my share. Erna and Theo are doing the rest. An appraiser came about the art and china in the house. Krishnaji talked alone with the Siddoos. Frances McCann was at lunch, having arrived from Brockwood last night, and is spending the week at Arya Vihara before moving to a motel. She was nervously talkative at lunch in her mother-y way, which Krishnaji finds trying. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji, the trustees, and Oak Grove staff met to go over the “common ground” statement. It lasted over two hours. Lou Blau telephoned to say escrow was closing and the title will pass on Malibu tomorrow morning when the sale will be recorded.’

The next day. ‘The Malibu house belongs to the new owner. Elfriede has a bad cold but is moving into a trailer on their land in Corral Canyon. Mrs. McNichols has moved into the house, even though it has no leach field. Lou telephoned to say the funds could be telegraphed where I would like them, which I said is to Wellington.’ They’re my brokers in New York. ‘It is, at last, all done. The dear and blessed house is gone. I can no longer care for it. It is the past and closed. I am immensely relieved. Krishnaji went with Theo to visit the school. I marketed and made our supper. In the late afternoon, Saral and Dave Bohm arrived from London for about three weeks. The Siddoos leave.’

March twenty-eighth. ‘Krishnaji’s “day off.” No exercise. Krishnaji says Theo told him that he and Erna eat sandwiches and salad at night. He thinks we should, too. The yam we had last night disagreed with him and it came up. But only it. “My stomach is very clever.

It rejects only what it doesn't like." He dictated letters in the morning. He is interested in going over the archive photos collected by Mendizza in Adyar and in identifying people in them, which I write down. The Bohms were at lunch. The appalling state of the world was talked of at table, seemingly insoluble problems and the drift toward war or starvation. "The world is mad," said Krishnaji to me as we walked back through the orange trees on this beautiful day. Later, he wanted to finish the photographs, and then we walked with Erna and Theo through Topa Topa. The valley is beginning to fill with the scent of orange blossoms. The mourning doves make their gentle sound, and we have been hearing great horned owls at night.'

S: How nice.

M: March twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji is increasingly disturbed over Fritz and Margrete. He feels the atmosphere in the school and Arya Vihara is not good. He talked to David Moody at Moody's request after lunch. At 4 p.m., he held a fifth discussion with teachers-parents-etcetera, including the Bohms. Later, Krishnaji told me, "You must think like me, not like Mrs. Zimbalist."' [Both M and S laugh.] He called me Mrs. Zimbalist for the first seven years he was my houseguest.

S: Yes. I remember. It's extraordinary. [Both laugh more.]

M: Oh, dear.

S: But then, he called you Maria in such a beautiful way.

M: Yes. Well, there were too many Marys.

S: I know there were. But it was also like when I heard him calling my name on a tape, his pronunciation of names was so singular and really very beautiful.

M: It was lovely. Yes, I liked being called Maria.

S: Yes.

M: Vanda resented it because she had a sister who died whose name was Maria, so that name was taken, so to speak.

S: Ah, ha, yes, right.

M: But, it didn't change anything. 'There were severe admonitions brought on by my not sharing his more severe misgivings about elements he feels are destructive to the work here. I had a long talk with Bud in New York about business things. Bud offered the Paris apartment for Krishnaji and me in June if we want to go there. Miranda telephoned; she has to return to San Francisco tonight, but will come down another weekend and come here then.'

The next day, ‘Krishnaji held sixth meeting with parents, teachers, etcetera.’

The thirty-first. ‘I spent most of the day working at my desk, and Krishnaji spent the day in bed. I made our lunch here.’

April first. ‘It was a quiet morning for Krishnaji, but a very busy one for me. Mr. Schwartz delivered the bed table for Krishnaji’s room. Amanda reported on meeting with Ruth Carter on what their place would sell for. At lunch at Arya Vihara were Erna and Theo, Fritz, Michael, and Robin Slanager who arrived yesterday and may help at the school. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a taped discussion with Dave Bohm. Present were: Erna, Theo, Hooker, Fritz, David Moody, and Robin. Krishnaji began by asking, “Did mankind go wrong? If so, when and where?” Eventually he described his own meditation, which is not deliberate. He wakes up meditating. In Rishi Valley it happened that he touched what he described as the source of energy. Toward the end, he spoke of a destruction (of all conscious thought, etcetera, as we know it) and that is a beginning. “Is it creation?” As he was speaking, I had the vivid sense of destruction and creation being one ultimate action in reality. We went for a short walk with Erna and Theo. Margrete has resigned from the school, is angry and disturbed. Krishnaji feels something must be done. He had earlier asked me to talk to Fritz. Krishnaji said I must “stay young,” and he is effecting this when he does my back and head.’ He put his hands on my back when it was sore. That’s going to help me be young. That’s what it did, maybe, I guess.

S: Yes, yes. It really worked. [both chuckle]

M: April second, ‘I fetched Mar de Manziarly from her sister’s road and brought her to lunch with Krishnaji at Arya Vihara. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji had a one-and-a-half-hour taped discussion again with David, a continuation from yesterday on: Did man take a wrong turn? And what lies beyond emptiness and silence? “There is something.” It was an extraordinary conversation, as if Krishnaji was seeing beyond human perception. It is too difficult to report here. He ended it with his funny story about the man who died and met Saint Peter, was accepted in heaven but given a chance to visit “down there,” which he did and was received by marvelous girls, etcetera; so he chose that, went down again, but was beaten up on his arrival. Why?, he asks, when that wasn’t his first experience. “Oh, you were a tourist then.”’ [S laughs.] ‘Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went for a short walk.’

April third, ‘We left at 10:30 a.m. in the green Mercedes and drove the coast road, Krishnaji taking the wheel at the usual place by the poplar trees and giving it back to me at Zuma Beach. We had a picnic lunch in the car on a shady street in Beverly Hills. At 1:30, Krishnaji had an ear exam by Dr. Seymour Brockman and a hearing test. He has seventy percent loss in the high frequencies. The doctor suggested a hearing aid for special occasions, like hearing questions during talks or discussions. Krishnaji is disinclined.’ [S chuckles.] One reason I got a hearing aid for myself…

S: Was to encourage him?

M: …yes, to encourage him, but it had no effect. [S laughs.] 'We stopped at Lindberg's for vitamins, etcetera. Then, to Malibu to see the Dunnes. Krishnaji was anxious to get home, so we didn't stay long. Krishnaji drove the usual stretch on the way back. "Some car." His face lights up at the car, at flowers along the road, and for me this is a spreading of delight at seeing him at the wheel of his car, pleased, enjoying, young, and with a glow in his face. We arrived home at exactly 6:30 p.m. I realized that today, passing the Malibu house for the first time since the sale that it is part of a past, all of it.'

There's really nothing the next day, but on the fifth, 'at 4 p.m. there was a trustee-parent meeting at the Pavilion.'

S: Oh, not with Krishnaji?

M: No.

S: Interesting.

M: The sixth, Easter Sunday. 'It was a beautiful day. Krishnaji watched TV all morning from the Pope in Rome to the Reverend Schuller, whom he watches with incredulous amazement that people are so taken in.' Reverend Schuller was a fascination for Krishnaji because he was so awful; he was one of those television evangelist preachers.

S: Yes. I find him fascinating as well.

M: Well, then, you know. He built the Crystal Cathedral and it went on and on. Krishnaji would stare at this in fascinated horror.

S: Yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'I worked at the desk. Joy Mills, now at Krotona, came to lunch at Arya Vihara and for coffee at the cottage afterward. Krishnaji is interested in the probability of Radha Burnier winning the election for the presidency of the Theosophical Society over her aunt Rukmini Arundale. Mills is confident she will. Joy Mills had withdrawn her own candidacy in Radha's favor. People on Rukmini's side were saying Krishnaji wants to take over the Theosophical Society. Later on the walk, Erna asked him if he does. "Just the land," he said.' [S laughs; M laughs, too.] He liked having land.

S: Yes, yes.

M: He was always, when we were looking for a place for the school, before we settled on the land we got, he would say, "More, buy more acres," forty acres, fifty acres. [Both laughing.]

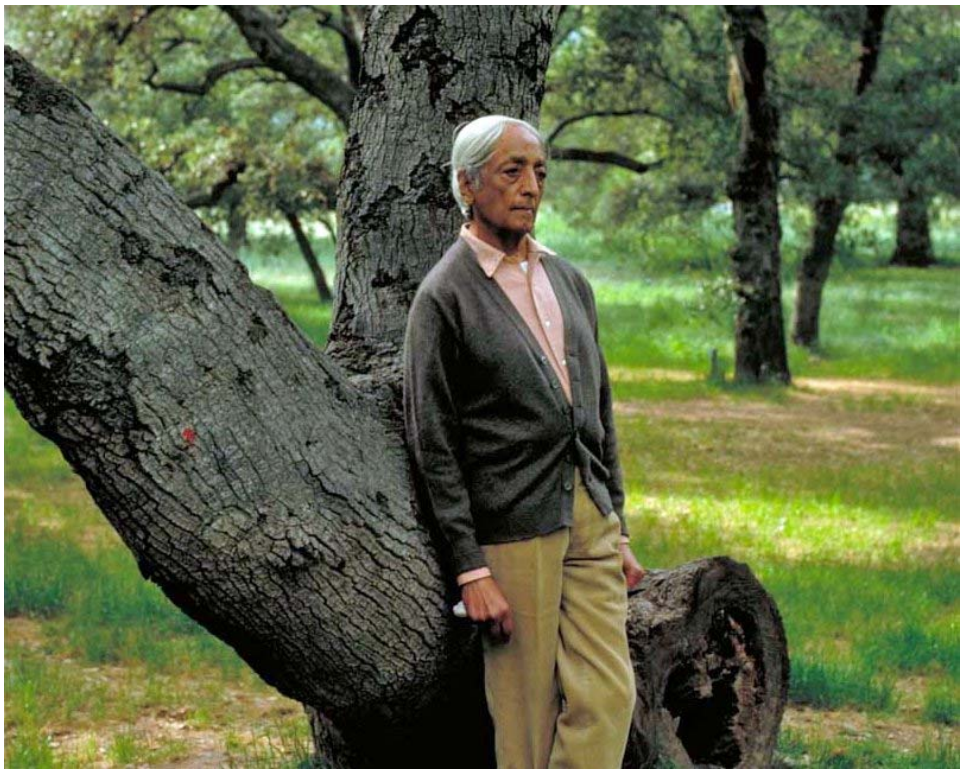
S: Quite right.

M: Again, there's nothing of significance the next day, but on the eighth, 'I worked at the desk in the morning. After lunch, at Krishnaji's urging, I talked to Fritz about Margrete's antagonisms, some to Krishnaji. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a taped discussion with Bohm and Fritz. Afterward, he and I watered the garden.'

The next day was 'a warm day. I worked at the desk all morning. At 12:30 p.m., Evelyne and Michael Mendizza came and did some movie shots of Krishnaji watering plants, walking with David Bohm, and chatting with him at Arya Vihara. Cynthia Wood came to lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview for Ojai News to Lamar Hoover'—he was the longtime, very nice editor of the Ojai News, and then he moved away and we didn't see him anymore. 'We walked with Erna and Theo in the orange grove on the Topa Topa Ranch.'

April tenth. 'Malibu is cut off by a slide, breaking the telephone lines. It was a warm day. I worked at the desk all morning. I spoke to Lorna at the Vineyard. Louisa has had a telephone call from Mike at the embassy in Tehran. On TV, militants threatened to kill hostages if [there was] any military action, including by Iraq, which they consider to be a U.S. puppet. There was much discussion about this at lunch. Krishnaji jokingly but vehemently said he would blockade the Gulf unless the hostages were freed or if they are harmed. He would seize the Iranian oil fields and warn Russia not to interfere.' [S chuckles.] '"Then, I'd say 'I'm a pacifist.'"' [S laughs.] Laughing, he said this. 'At 4 p.m., there was a discussion with Krishnaji and David Bohm, with Fritz and David Moody joining in. What will make man change? was the topic.'

April eleventh. 'It was a hot, windy day. Krishnaji wants vines on his porch and came with me to Green Thumb Nursery in Ventura. It was dusty and strenuous but we found what we were after. We talked in the car about this first attempt to start an adult center in Ojai. Krishnaji feels acutely that it is wrong, is not developing, mustn't go on. He is intense and disturbed about it. We got back in time for lunch. "Why are we both tired?" he asked. After lunch, he talked with Erna and Theo and me until 4:30 about the Fritz and Mark problems. David Bohm came in for part of the Fritz discussion. It seems that Fritz has thought of doing something else; teaching philosophy somewhere. Bohm will sound out Fritz on this. It would detach Fritz from our work and undo what has turned out wrongly. That left us with the Mark problem and the question of why some staff are leaving. Is it Mark's fault? Krishnaji feels strongly that Asha is part of Mark's apparent weakness and is an irritant in the school. Erna is depressed and concerned. We have to get at the reasons some staff are leaving. Is it something in Mark? Krishnaji said again, "I am wasted here." And later to me, "Why am I doing all this?" I asked why he gets involved in all these schools everywhere. Is that his job? He said, "The Committee may say that's enough."'



S: The Committee being, again, the…

M: We don't know what the Committee is, but we know it is unknown.

S: An unknown assemblage of whatever. [Chuckles.]

M: It has to do with his life and fate.

S: Yes.

Krishnaji in the Oak Grove (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: April twelfth. 'It was a hot day. I worked at the desk in the morning. After lunch, Krishnaji talked with Erna, Theo, Hooker, and me about Mark and the school difficulties. Erna had talked to Darcey and others'—Darcey was a teacher in the school—'on why they were leaving the school. One fact is Asha's meddling. This confirmed Krishnaji's opinion, and that she has no business in the school, etcetera. He was very drastic, but it ended up that I am to talk to Mark and tell him Asha must not be part of the school. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held another discussion particularly with David Bohm, but Fritz and David Moody were in it partially. Krishnaji had chided me for not joining in, so I did, minimally. It began with Dave asking about "the ground" and what is the relationship of a person to that. Krishnaji led one through this subject brilliantly. The total destroyer, a sword cutting away the delusions of the mind. He looked tired at the end and has the beginnings of hay fever. He expended much energy people he feels are destructive to the work, and he was scathing.'

April thirteenth, 'Krishnaji had streaming hay fever, so he was in bed most of the day but got up for lunch. In the afternoon, he gave an interview to Sasha, the Russian that Vanda brought to the airport in Rome in November 1978, and who later came here. Krishnaji also talked privately with Dr. Netzer, a parent in the school, an intelligent man, Krishnaji said. His hay fever was severe in the evening. Max and Alan Tansill brought an air cleaning machine, but Max was unable to start it.' Alan Tansill was the brother or adopted brother or brother thing to Max. They shared childhood and life together. That was in the little book.

The fourteenth. 'Krishnaji felt weak with hay fever. It begins to bring congestion to his chest. I had a conversation with Naudé in San Francisco, about the effect of "constitutional remedy," phosphorus, which Krishnaji took on March twenty-third. But today, Krishnaji decided to take Dr. Scheef's pink pills, which are the only thing that controls the hay fever.'

S: Ah, yes, "the magic pink pills," yes.

M: He stayed in bed all day. I worked at the desk, marketed, then made his lunch here. He was better by evening. A white wisteria vine and pink dipladenia were planted by Krishnaji's porch.' I don't remember those. We've got rose bushes out there now.

April fifteenth. 'Krishnaji is better. As a result of Saturday's conversation between Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Hooker, etcetera, I saw Mark alone and told him we felt Asha must not interfere in school matters. He listened with remarkable openness. Krishnaji got up for lunch. In the afternoon he had another discussion with David Bohm. His voice was a little thick, but his energy had returned.'

The sixteenth. 'I left at 7:30 a.m. and went via Malibu to Beverly Hills. It was a hot day. I did lots of errands, had my hair cut, then spent half an hour with the Dunnes on the way home. Krishnaji had talked to Mark in the morning. He also talked to Dave, who says that Fritz wants to leave. Krishnaji, Erna, and Theo were starting on a walk as I arrived at 6 p.m., so I joined them but felt tired.'

April seventeenth. 'After breakfast, Krishnaji said that he wanted a serious talk with me. We sat in the living room. He said he's wasting his time here with school problems and talking to teachers who don't understand. He's been here three months, and what? He has woken up with intimations three times that he is being wasted. Ojai, he feels, is a sacred place, and he likes this house, but it is a waste for him. He could write, but he should be having living discussions; someone to talk to who can help him to go deeper. Bohm helps, but he can talk to him at Brockwood. More is happening there. If he doesn't do something, something else will take a hand, something will make it impossible for him to be here. He wants to prevent that. What to do? He said sometimes it is as if something very far were calling him. "Something beyond the stars." He said I am the closest person to him, but that doesn't make a difference. He had me call in Erna, Theo, and as Mark was with Erna in the office, Krishnaji had him come, too. He had me begin to report what he had said, and then he picked it up and said, "I have been sent." He held another discussion with David Bohm from 4 p.m. to 5:40 p.m. It was an absorbing one. An air cleaner is installed on the furnace with air conditioning.' That was in hopes of helping Krishnaji's…

S: Yes, hay fever. Let's just talk for a minute about this because this is something that is remarkable, what you've just read.

M: I know, and it was extremely disturbing.

S: Of course. It has to be extremely disturbing. He was intimating that if his time is not used, something may prevent him from coming back here.

M: That's right.

S: So, something may prevent him from not using his time well by conspiring to keep him where it would be used well.

M: That's right. His duty is to keep talking.

S: Yes, and not just any talking; it has to be…

M: No. Not with teachers and about school problems.

S: It has to be valuable talk.

M: It has to be about the teachings.

S: Yes. And what's interesting also is that he felt that there was more going on at Brockwood than there was here. And I remember this period at Brockwood well, and it was full of conflict.

M: Yes! That was when there was practically open warfare.

S: Well, that took a little while, but it eventually became open warfare.

M: Yes, that's when he said, "Unless you people settle these things between you, I will go into the West Wing and close the door."

S: Exactly. Krishnaji threatened to leave, it was so terrible. But just before that, apparently, because that was about '85. It was '84 to '85, so this is just before that period, but it's interesting that Krishnaji felt that there was more going on there than here.

M: Yes. It may have just been that he was bothered by the lack here and, uh…

S: When I came here bringing Krishnaji from India on his last trip, we'll come to this obviously, but at that time, he had asked me, and had Erna ask me, to go to the school and figure out what was wrong.

M: Did he?

S: Oh, yes, they both did. We'll come to it. But I remember feeling that the place wasn't alive, that in a way, maybe because everybody went home at 3 o'clock, or something like that, it was dead.

M: Well, this is just me speaking, not Krishnaji or anybody else; but I've always felt that I was part of Brockwood, and of course, I never go to the school here. At Brockwood, we were living in a house together.

S: Yes, it was something living and constantly ongoing.

M: You're all part of a whole.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Also, here it's full of parents. We never had parent problems at Brockwood.

S: Thank god! I know, and parents are a big problem.

M: They are. And here they are a dominant problem, and they still are. I used to think, thank god Brockwood has students whose parents are mostly all living in other countries, so we never had to cope with the parents.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Because they are a dominant problem.

S: I know. Yes. Anyway, back to our story, but it's just interesting, and it's very significant that Krishnaji felt that even though he loved the house here and he liked being here, he may be prevented from being here if he's not allowed to carry on his work.

M: And this was the place, really, we were all here because of the pepper tree and this house…

S: Exactly.

M: …and "the process" that happened to him here. Mary L. always said to the degree that he has a home, this is it.

S: Yes, yes. But his work is what comes first.

M: Yes. And if he doesn't do his work…

S: Yes. And doing his work required having people that he could do it with. It's all terribly significant.

M: His work was the important thing in his life.

S: Yes, yes. The teachings was everything.

M: Yes.

April eighteenth. ‘It was a very hot day. Scott Forbes is on holiday from Brockwood and came to lunch. I fetched him from the Zorskies.’ You were staying with the Zorskies.’

S: Yes, I remember. I came to see if I would want to leave Brockwood and come to work at the school here. So I went to the Oak Grove School, looked around, got a feel of the place, had an interview with Mark and thought, “No, I don’t want to work here.”

M: Well, you were right because this was…

S: Yes. Well, anyway. [Laughs.]

M: April nineteenth. ‘The weather is still hot. Krishnaji saw Mark, Asha, Erna, Theo, Alan Hooker, Evelyne, and me for a discussion of the school and in particular Asha’s position in it. It was made very clear that Asha may not interfere, as she has constantly in school affairs, and may not be on the staff, etcetera. The position of wives in businesses, etcetera, was explained. Krishnaji led all this. She appeared to concur, but after she and Mark left, she didn’t take it well. Mark came here to tell me this. At 4 p.m. Krishnaji held another discussion with David.’

FOOTNOTES:

[1] This was recorded in 2005.

[2] Wikipedia listed Sidney Field as having died in 1975, but IMDb credits him with a screenplay in 1985 and his biography of Krishnaji, The Reluctant Messiah, was published in 1989.

Issue 63: April 20, 1980 to July 10, 1980

In this issue, Krishnaji initiates changes that he hopes will solve the problems of the Oak Grove School. Changes also occur that will solve the growing dissatisfaction with the adult center activities. We also see Rajagopal continue to violate the terms of the settlement agreement, and the seeds for the next series of legal actions are sown. Otherwise, we see the typical end of spring and early summer; leaving Ojai, going to Brockwood, and then on to Saanen.

Mary: We pick up our story on April twentieth, 1980. 'Krishnaji saw Fritz and Margrete in a rigorous discussion of their role in all that is wrong at Arya Vihara and the Oak Grove School. Fritz was so shaken by Margrete's reaction that he couldn't speak. Later, Fritz, but not Margrete, was at lunch, after which he, David, and Saral went to Berkeley where Dave is lecturing and holding discussions. David and Saral will go on to British Columbia in a week and Fritz will return here. Fritz told Krishnaji that he and Margrete must leave, then, just after lunch, he reversed himself and said he wants to stay. Krishnaji said they would talk on his return from Berkeley. During all the above in the morning, Miranda and Amanda came in to see me. Miranda hadn't seen the house until now. We spent a happy hour together. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went for a walk in the afternoon.'

Scott: Maybe it's worth just talking about something here for a minute.

M: What?

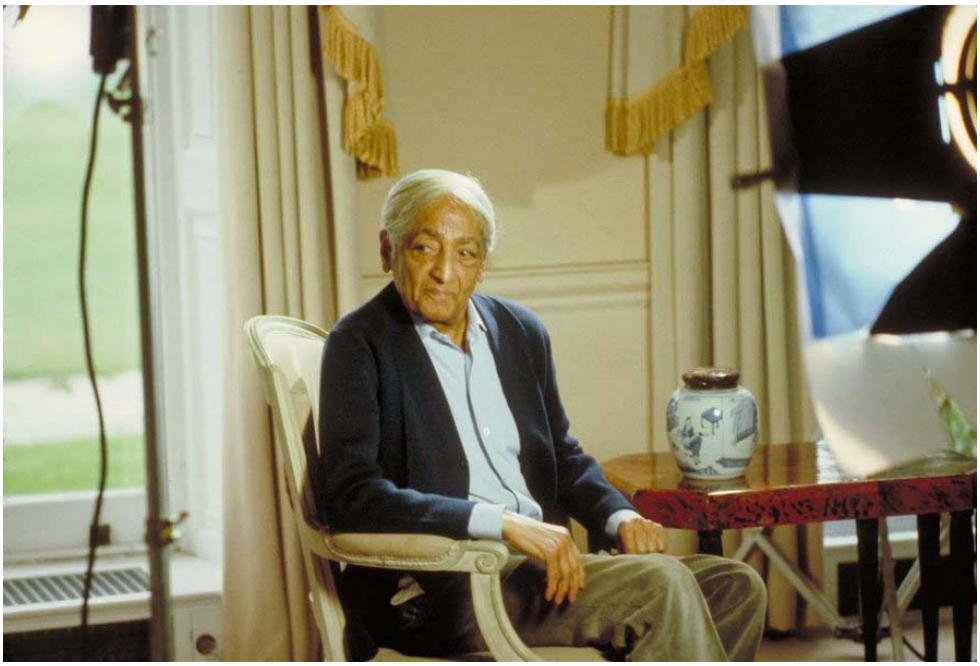
S: Well, I think a lot of people would be surprised that Krishnaji, who had such extraordinary insights into the most fundamental and important things in life, could be so enthusiastic about people who would turn out to go wrong.

M: I asked him about that.

S: And what did he say?

M: I didn't say it about those people, but someone did something nasty, and I said, "But Krishnaji, didn't you know that he was that sort of person?" And he replied, "I don't look into people unless they ask me to."

S: Yes.



M: He always said it would be like reading their private letters—it's private.

S: Yes. But I think that there's something else, which is that Krishnaji did see people's good points and their strengths.

M: Yes.

S: And I suppose that's often what people presented to him.

M: Of course.

Krishnaji waiting to start video recording (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: And they didn't present their weaknesses and that's what he didn't look into. So there's Krishnaji, actively seeing the good side of people because that's what was not intrusive to look at…

M: Yes.

S: …but then there was another thing, too, which I feel I saw happening at different times: If a person takes the teachings at all seriously, it puts tremendous pressure on the ego and/or self. The effect is either like a spring that you just push it down, or you actually do something to destroy, diminish, disempower, or something the ego and/or self. And for a lot of people who just push it down…

M: It springs back.

S: …it springs back, and it springs back higher and stronger than it was initially. I think this often happened, and people who started off looking like they had potential would just become egocentric.

M: I think so.

S: There's something about the ego and the self—it just springs back vehemently if one doesn't do the work seriously enough on oneself. Maybe this is sufficient, what we've said, because otherwise it's very mysterious. Why didn't Krishnaji get rid of Rajagopal years ago? Why didn't Krishnaji see all the…

M: Well, I said that to him: "How could you stand these two people? Now that you tell me what they were like?" And as he said more than once in latter years, "The only thing I regret in my life is having anything to do with those two."

S: Yes.

M: But he did.

S: But he also went along with a lot of really dodgy characters who would come into his life, came into his work, who would start off seemingly quite good, and end up being terrible.

M: Mmm. Yes. Of course, he was disinclined to criticize people or react the way probably the rest of us react when something seems wrong with a person.

S: Yes, we recoil.

M: We react. We recoil. And he was too generous.

S: Alright, well maybe there's nothing more to be said about this but I think it deserves mentioning, because otherwise it would seem, well…and this is the kind of thing that some of the Indian Foundation people would say, that he's just incompetent in the world, you know, in the everyday reality, which was just not so.

M: No. I know. But he was willing to put up with a lot of things he had to put up with.

S: Exactly, yes.

M: And that, I think, was a trait with him. He used to tell me sometimes that in his early days, when he was traveling around and he'd have to stay in someone's house that was dirty and where the food was awful, that he never complained and he never rejected and he never…So he would put up with things.

S: He'd put up with things. Yes.

M: And he put up with the two worst people in his life.

S: Yes, yes. Perhaps we should go on.

M: Alright. April twenty-first. 'There was a faint rain. I saw my niece Louisa Kennedy on television talking about the Tehran hostages and her husband. Erna, Theo, and Scott were at lunch. Krishnaji and I went to the hearing aid place in Ventura where he was fitted for ear molds,' which he never used. 'Some azaleas were planted near the camellias.'

The twenty-second: 'There was rain, and it was cold. Krishnaji saw Mark and Asha in the morning. To lunch were Mr. Merali and Robin Slanager. Krishnaji talked to Erna, Theo, and me all afternoon. We walked.'

The next day. 'I went out early to the market, the bank, etc. At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji had a meeting with Mark, David Moody, Erna, Theo, Alan Hooker, and me about Moody being the assistant school director, and Erna handling the school finances. At 4 p.m., Mr. Merali, Erna, and Theo came to tea. We discussed Mr. Merali's donation. We all went for a walk. The weather still very cold.'

April twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji and I went with Erna and Theo to Santa Barbara for Krishnaji's IRS clearance to leave the country. We lunched at El Paseo. Krishnaji had a haircut at the Biltmore, and we came home, then went for a walk.'

The twenty-fifth. 'An attempt to rescue the hostages in Iran had to be aborted because of helicopter trouble. Eight of the servicemen were killed in a collision. President Carter announced it. Television programs covered it all day. Louisa was interviewed in London. Krishnaji had a quiet morning while I worked at the desk. Mr. Merali joined us for a walk in the afternoon. We watched television news most of the evening.'

April twenty-sixth. 'At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji talked to David Moody and then to him and his wife, Vivian. Krishnaji called me in. Then David, Erna, and I talked. I finished my share of the final check of the text of From Darkness to Light, the book of the early poems sent by Harper & Row. Max came to fix the door and lunched. At 2:30 p.m., Erna, Mark, David Moody, and I discussed school business. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji met with teachers and trustees and explained Mark now being simply the administrative director of the school, David now being the educational director, and Erna handling all the school finances.'

The twenty-seventh. 'Dorothy telephoned from Brockwood and later we telephoned back.' Doesn't say what it's about. 'At 11 a.m., Evelyne came with Michael and Bonnie Mendizza and showed Erna, Theo, Alan Hooker, and me parts of the Krishnaji biographical film. We all lunched at Arya Vihara, and Krishnaji gave an extraordinary account of his early days. We viewed more film in the afternoon.'

April twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji had a toothache and had it pulled by Dr. Meinig.' Meinig was the local dentist that Krishnaji had been to for years. 'He had lunch in bed while I had Amanda and Winky to lunch in the kitchen. Bud telephoned about Mother's estate still not being settled and its effect on Wooge's estate. I took Krishnaji at 3:30 p.m. to Ventura, where he got a pair of hearing instruments. We came back in pelting rain.'

The twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji feels better. At 10:30 a.m., he saw Fritz and Margrete; they have decided to move north to around San Francisco where Fritz will perhaps be part of the academic circle. This solves the problem. Krishnaji called in Erna and me to hear their decision. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji had his second meeting with teachers about the new arrangements with David Moody and his job. Also Krishnaji announced that Fritz and Margrete were leaving.'

April thirtieth. 'I went to a pottery exhibit at the Oak Grove School, then bought eight more roses that Krishnaji wants, and marketed. Mr. Merali was at lunch. He made a large donation to KFA. Later we all walked in a light rain.'

The first of May, 'Erna and I talk to a parent, Mrs. St. John. I then typed letters. After lunch, Krishnaji was photographed for the Ojai Valley News. I worked at the desk and later Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I walked.'

The next day just says, 'Desk. Errands. Walk. Eight more rose bushes planted.' [Both chuckle.]

May third. 'Krishnaji gave his first talk in the Oak Grove. It was a beautiful day. Elfriede came with Fred to photograph the house. Krishnaji and I lunched alone with Michael at Arya Vihara.'

The fourth, 'Krishnaji gave his second talk in the Oak Grove. Toodie and her children were there. I sat with them. Krishnaji and I lunched alone again with Michael at Arya Vihara.'

The fifth of May. 'Krishnaji went to the dentist, Dr. Meinig, at 8:30 a.m. with Theo. On his return, we sorted questions handed in for tomorrow and I typed them. Mr. Merali was at lunch, and he came on the walk later. Krishnaji said to me, "Catch my thought." I saw instantly that he wanted me to help him move two new roses in cans on the driveway.' [Both laugh.]

S: Good for you.

M: Yes. [More laughter.] How smart I was.

May sixth. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a public question-and-answer meeting in the Oak Grove instead of a discussion. He read and then answered three questions chosen by him from those that had been handed in. After lunch at Arya Vihara, Alan Kishbaugh brought a record for Krishnaji. In the evening I telephoned Filomena in Rome to wish her happy birthday. It was early tomorrow her time.'

May seventh. 'I did desk work, marketing, and errands. Alfonso and Alene Colón, Mr. and Mrs. Zapata, Dr. Thumula, and Mr. Álvarez came to lunch at Arya Vihara. I sorted questions for the public meeting with Krishnaji. We went for a walk to the dip. It was a cold day.'

Krishnaji waiting to start video recording (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The eighth. 'Krishnaji held a second question-and-answer meeting in the Oak Grove. The weather was cold. Afterward he spoke to Blackburn for half an hour outside the cottage, then we lunched alone with Michael at Arya Vihara. We walked to the dip and back at five. It was a drizzly afternoon.'

May ninth. 'I did errands and more desk work. Mr. Merali, and a lawyer friend and wife, came for lunch. They then came back with Erna, Theo, and Alan Hooker to discuss finances here at the cottage. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went for a walk at five. The Bohms and David Shainberg arrived from Vancouver to spend the weekend.'

May tenth. 'There had been rain in the night, but it was clear by the time of Krishnaji's third Ojai talk in the Oak Grove at 11:30 a.m. We lunched at Arya Vihara. David Shainberg came in as we were finishing and he and Krishnaji talked. I came back to the cottage at three. Toodie, Chelsea, and Zoey'—Toodie is Bud's daughter and those are her two daughters—'who had been at the talk, came by. Later, Krishnaji and I walked to the dip in rain showers, and saw a double rainbow. Asit arrived from Singapore. He is staying at Arya Vihara.'

The eleventh of May. 'Krishnaji gave his fourth Ojai talk in the Oak Grove. Dr. and Mrs. Maquet, David Shainberg, and the Bohms came to lunch.' I can't quite remember exactly who Maquet was. I think he was academic in some way, French, doing something at UCLA, and he'd known Krishnaji. He used to turn up occasionally, but I don't know too much about him.

The next day. 'Krishnaji's eighty-fifth birthday.' We don't mention it, but it was.

S: [laughs] Of course.

M: 'Up early. Telephoned to Philippa and David, and then Bud about business things. It was a busy morning. The Bohms left for London. Krishnaji went to the dentist, Dr. Meinig, at 9:30 a.m., Shainberg and a doctor friend came here. Asit, Ted Cartee, Frances McCann, Evelyne, the Lilliefelts, Hooker, the Moodys, and Alan Kishbaugh were all at lunch. The four trustees and Asit and Merali met with Krishnaji about his activities next winter and ways to have television interviews. There was a decision to have Krishnamurti Information Centers around the country.'

The thirteenth. 'The weather was cold but nice. Krishnaji held the third question-and-answer meeting in the Oak Grove. At lunch, there was Asit, Alan K., Michael, and David and Vivian Moody. Without a nap he then saw Ray McCoy who was to teach at Rajghat, [Both chuckle.] and Narayan's brother Krishnamurti'—that's another Krishnamurti—'and then we walked to the dip.'

May fourteenth. 'I left at 7 a.m. for Malibu, and went to see Elfriede and their house being built in Corral Canyon, then to see Amanda. Phil was ill with a cold. To Henry Bamberger at 11 a.m. about summing up the costs of both the Malibu and Ojai houses, tax matters, etc. Then I had a haircut, bought sandals for Krishnaji and me'—for our upcoming India trip—'and arranged further car rental for Toodie. I marketed in Malibu on the way home. Got back at 6 p.m. just as Krishnaji was returning from a walk.'

May fifteenth. 'Krishnaji held another question-and-answer meeting in the Oak Grove. Narayan's brother, G. Krishnamurti, and professor Khare'—he was an Indian who taught somewhere in Southern California—'were at lunch. Instead of a walk, he talked to Erna, Theo, Evelyne, and me about starting Krishnamurti Information Centers around the country. Krishnaji and I were both tired.'

The sixteenth. 'I went to a meeting in the Pavilion of people interested in having Krishnamurti Information Centers in their localities, then lunched at Arya Vihara with the Lilliefelts, the Lees, Hooker, Evelyne, and Ray McCoy. There was a trustee meeting briefly afterward on accepting a house from Essie Bates.' Essie Bates was an Ojai real estate woman who was giving it to the Foundation as a donation. 'Krishnaji and I walked later.'

The next day. 'A warm beautiful day. Krishnaji gave his fifth talk in the Oak Grove. The audience seemed hypnotized. His voice was very deep and from far off. Max had come in the early morning and planted a talisman rose in the rose bed. He lunched with us at Arya Vihara, along with Dr. Jerry Bosak, a young friend of the Shainbergs. While Krishnaji napped, Toodie and her three children came to call. They left at 4 p.m., and at 4:30, Krishnaji and I went to a party at the Oak Grove School for helpers and visitors from far away. We stayed half an hour and came home.'

May eighteenth. 'An even warmer and more beautiful day than yesterday. Krishnaji gave his sixth and final Ojai talk for this year in the Oak Grove. Very wide and a marvelous one[1] on action, death, and meditation. Toodie, Liddie, and family again attended. At lunch, Dr. Bosak, Mr. Merali, David Moody, and Michael. It was too hot to walk. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I sat on the terrace and talked.'

The nineteenth. 'It was another warm day. I took Krishnaji to the dentist, Dr. Meinig, at 10 a.m. I did errands while he was there. Then, on impulse, we went for a drive up Maricopa Highway. Krishnaji was delighted, and declared it "a place to worship" and "house of the gods." We came back in time for lunch at Arya Vihara. Bill Burmeister was there, both Moodys, Fritz, Hooker, Erna, Theo, and Michael. In the afternoon I worked on papers at the desk, and organized things to pack. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I walked. Donald Ingram Smith saw Rajagopal and says he's giving the archives to the Huntington Library.' This was a violation of the legal agreement.

May twentieth. 'I spent much of the day packing. Krishnaji telephoned Rajagopal to say that he had heard about the Huntington Library getting the archives, and it must not be done. Rajagopal said he understood'—which, of course, meant nothing. 'A letter from Betty Eisner came to me offering to talk to Rajagopal on Krishnaji's behalf to arrange a meeting.' This was the idiocy of an old friend of mine wanting to help, and thinking she could help fix things where everybody else had failed. 'We walked with Erna and Theo.'

The twenty-first. 'Krishnaji wrote to Rajagopal and had the Lilliefelts, Hooker, and me sign it with him. I packed and dictated letters for Willa'—Willa was the very nice secretary who worked for Erna—'to type and send. Alasdair and a helper put all the potted plants on the back terrace.'

May twenty-second. 'I wrote a brief reply to Betty Eisner, talked to Amanda, finished packing, then disconnected the furnace, etcetera to close the house. We had an early lunch at Arya Vihara, and at 2:30 p.m. Krishnaji and I left Ojai in the school van with Mark driving, stopped briefly at Oak Grove School, and went on to the LA airport. Asit met us there. He was coming from San Francisco, and he, Krishnaji, and I took TWA flight at 5:30 p.m. for London.'

The twenty-third. 'We had little sleep on the plane'—unlike you—'and arrived at Heathrow at 11:40 a.m. Dorothy and Ingrid met us, and we got to Brockwood a little after 2 p.m. Everyone was out to meet Krishnaji. We had lunch in the West Wing kitchen and slept most of the afternoon. Dr. Parchure has arrived and so has Narayan. I talked to Mary Links. Bud called from Paris. He and Lisa just arrived there from New York.'

S: [laughs] Hold on, only because I've just had this flash of recognition about our poor transcriber and eventual readers. When you said, "We had little sleep on the plane unlike you," you're referring to me. [Laughs.]

M: Yes, I'm referring to the present Scott Forbes, sitting here, who sleeps wonderfully on airplanes. [Both laugh.]

S: Yes, I usually fall asleep very quickly on airplanes. Okay, continue.

M: [chuckles] It's a gift, a gift, a genetic blessing.

May twenty-fourth, and we are now at Brockwood. 'We are all mixed up in time. We unpacked, and napped heavily. After lunch Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper and Kip, and I walked in the grove. Everything was in flower, including the handkerchief tree, which was beautiful. The Bohms are here. I finished unpacking.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji had slept poorly. At the lunch table, Krishnaji, Bohm, and Asit decided to hold a discussion at 4 p.m. to which some of the staff came and the Moorheads, Parchure, Narayan, etc. It went on till 6 p.m. The discussion was set off by a newspaper account of a Japanese doctor saying the brain cells don't degenerate if a person exercises his brain.' Quite true.

The twenty-sixth. 'Monday was a bank holiday. Krishnaji slept eleven hours. It was a quiet day. Asit took pictures of Krishnaji. We all walked.'

May twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji didn't sleep last night. The Mercedes was put in commission and I went to Alresford to the bank and other errands. Then after lunch, I drove to Winchester where I got our travel tickets at Thomas Cook, and bought some jerseys for Krishnaji. I returned to join Dorothy and Krishnaji on the walk across the fields. I telephoned Dr. Scheef in Bonn and made an appointment for Krishnaji to see him at the end of June.'

The twenty-eighth of May. 'Krishnaji, Asit, Dr. Parchure, and I went to London on the 10:23 a.m. train from Petersfield. Asit is returning to India. Joe Links met Krishnaji and me, and we lunched with him and Mary at their flat on Hyde Park Street. Mary and I sat and talked while Joe drove Krishnaji to the dentist, Mr. Thompson, then brought him and Dr. Parchure back and took us to Waterloo. We were back at Brockwood in time for a short walk.'

The next day was, 'a quiet day. I cleaned the guest room in preparation for the Marogers, and made hotel reservations for Krishnaji and me in Bonn and Geneva.'

May thirtieth. 'The Marogers arrived with Diane for the weekend. I put them in the West Wing. Sunanda and Pama telephoned from London. They just arrived from India, and they're coming here on June tenth. I had a nap after lunch, a short walk with Krishnaji, and then attended the staff meeting.'

The next day, 'I telephoned Vanda in Florence, then had a long talk with Marie-Bertrande Maroger. The house is full of people. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields.'

June first. 'Krishnaji talked to the school at noon, and then at 4 p.m. did a videotaped discussion with David Bohm and Narayan. We had only a short walk. In the morning, I had a talk with Narayan, and then another with Marie-Bertrande before she, Jean-Michel, and Diane left after supper for the ferry to France. In the evening I spoke to Lisa in Paris. Bud was out.'

June second. ‘Krishnaji slept late. After lunch, he saw Gita, a Brockwood student who had come from Rishi Valley. I went to Alresford and Petersfield on errands.’

June third. ‘It was a warm day. I met Mary Cadogan at the Petersfield station, and discussed Foundation things with her most of the day. Edgar Graf is pulling out of the Saanen Gathering Committee. I walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy, and spoke on the phone to Betsy, now in her London flat.’

The next day was, ‘a hot day. We took the 10:20 a.m. train to London. Joe met us, and took us to Huntsman. Krishnaji chose material for two pairs of trousers for me, and he ordered two pairs for himself. We shopped at Fortnum, then Mary joined us for lunch. Krishnaji talked to her for the biography, all about the two Rajagopals. He then had a haircut at Truefitt, while I got a pair of black pumps at Ferragamo. We went to Asprey for a new wallet for me, then by taxi to Waterloo.’

June fifth. ‘Krishnaji talked to the students. Dorothy felt faint on getting up this morning, so she stayed in bed. Vasanta Kumari, and an accompanist, came to lunch, and at 7:30 p.m., she sang for Krishnaji and the school.’ She was a very good Indian singer.

June sixth. ‘I went to Winchester for errands in the morning, walked early with Krishnaji, then attended the staff meeting at 5 p.m. Mr. and Mrs. Merali arrived, and are to stay a bit. They are in the Cloisters.’

June seventh. ‘At 4 p.m., Krishnaji, David Bohm, and Narayan held a videotaped discussion. After that, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked with the dogs. Mar de Manziarly telephoned from Paris. She cannot come to Gstaad because she has a heart condition. She will see us in Geneva.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji spoke to the school at noon. I spoke to Ginny Travers and to Christopher Fry.’

June ninth. ‘I drove to Chichester to have a new handle put on the car door. I walked around the city until the car was ready, and bought a watercolor by Andrew Hemingway, a painter the Frys told me about last year. I picked up plants for the house in Petersfield and got back to Brockwood by 3:30 p.m. Krishnaji spoke to students. He, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields. There was the first letter from Amanda. Philippa and David are there.’

The tenth of June. ‘It was a rainy day. I met Sunanda, Pama, and Radha Burnier at the Petersfield station. Radha came only for the day, while Sunanda and Pama are staying in the West Wing for a few days. They talked with Krishnaji in the morning. Krishnaji walked with Dorothy, but I slept.’

The next day was, ‘a gray day. I spent most of it working at my desk, but walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy.’

June twelfth. ‘I met Mary Cadogan at the Petersfield station, and brought her back to Brockwood for a Saanen Gatherings meeting, which consisted of Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, Gisèle Balleys, and Brian Jenkins. Mary Links with Amanda, and the Digbys came to lunch. Afterward, there was a publication committee meeting with Sunanda and Pama. At last, after about eight years, a publishing agreement between KF India and KFT was made.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘Krishnaji came in afterward. George Digby argued with Krishnaji about some of his statements. Example: God is total disorder.’ [Both laugh.] George couldn’t stomach that. ‘Krishnaji and I went for a short walk.’

The next day it just says, ‘Krishnaji spoke to staff at 4 p.m.’

Then there’s really nothing the day after, and all I have for the fifteenth is, ‘Krishnaji spoke to school.’ I’m getting rather terse. [Chuckles.]

June sixteenth. ‘I did house work and desk work.’ [Both chuckle.]

S: Yes, very terse.

M: ‘I looked at a videotaped Bernard Levin interview to decide whether to advise Krishnaji to let Levin interview him for the BBC. I felt generally in favor.’ [Both chuckle.] I wasn’t a big enthusiast, but I thought it was better to do it than not do it.

The seventeenth of June. ‘There was rain on and off most of the day, but clear in the afternoon for our walk. I spent the rest of the day at the desk. I got a letter from Erna enclosing copies of Lou Blau’s letter to the attorney general, Tapper, about my buying the McAndrew Road property.’ That had to go through the attorney general because it was a trustee buying a house owned by a trust and all that.

S: Sure, yes.

M: ‘Also, lawyer Cohen about the Huntington Library and Rajagopal.’ Cohen was our lawyer dealing with Rajagopal. A very nice man.

There’s nothing of note for the next two days, and all there is for the twentieth of note is, ‘I talked with Scott about Krishnaji.’ Have you any memory of that?

S: None. [Both chuckle.]

M: The twenty-first. ‘I went to Petersfield for some household items. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji spoke to the staff on silence, and perception versus ordinary thinking. Perhaps thinking, in the ordinary sense, if much energy and interest is put into it, can bring about perception.’ That’s not very clear, but anyway, that’s what my diary says.

June twenty-second. ‘Rita Zampese brought Krishnaji’s and my railroad tickets to go from Bonn to Geneva. At noon, Krishnaji spoke to the school on values, and living without them. He had a slow, far-off voice, and was very quiet. He felt it should be printed. It "touched on new things," he said. The walk was with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me. In the evening, there was a school concert. Krishnaji was tired and didn't go.'

Krishnaji waiting to start video recording (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: You said that Rita brought railroad tickets?

M: Yes. She must have picked them up for me in London or something. I can't remember. That summer, we flew to Bonn but then we went by train to Geneva.

S: Right, sure.

M: Now the big diary starts up again, so we'll have more details.

S: Good, finally. Otherwise we were just racing through history here. [Both chuckle.]

M: So June twenty-third. 'There were rain showers most of the day. On the early news on the radio I heard that Sanjay Gandhi had been killed in a small plane crash. I went and told Krishnaji, who was doing pranayama with Dr. Parchure. Krishnaji nodded gravely and went on with his breathing exercise. I also told Sunanda, who was very shocked, and Pama. Later, Krishnaji sent a cable to Pupul saying, "Please give Mrs. Gandhi my profound sympathy and affection." Sunanda and Pama saw Krishnaji and me off to London: they and Merali waited for him to come down the staircase in the full elegance of his London clothes and umbrella.' [Both chuckle.] 'Sunanda and Pama then left with Merali for Belgium, where they will visit him and his wife, then go to Paris for the weekend, and then drive with Merali's nephew to Gstaad. Krishnaji and I took the 10:23 a.m. train to London, and Joe Links met us at Waterloo. He gave me a copy of his new book, Travels in Europe.' As well as art books, Joe wrote travel books, very good ones, particularly about Venice. That was his specialty. 'They dropped me at Sotheby's, where

I left a large book of lithographs and poems donated in France for the Rajghat Sanjeevan Hospital. Luckily, Sotheby's took it, as I could never have carried it back.' [Both laugh.] Someone, I can't remember who, donated it. 'If it sells, it will be in the fall. Meanwhile, Krishnaji fitted at Huntsman, where I joined him, after which we walked to the pen shop in the Burlington Arcade, where his Lamy pen was fixed and he bought a spare.' He liked to look at the pens there. 'Then to lunch with Mary at Fortnum. He told her if he were writing the biography of himself, he would want to write about how "this mind" came to be untouched. It was raining, and Joe very kindly drove Krishnaji to the dentist and then afterward to Waterloo. We were back by 5:20 p.m.'

S: What happened to Krishnaji's pens?

M: I don't know. He probably gave them away or something. Lamys are very hard to get. I have a Lamy and Kathy kindly got me refills for it at Harrods. I couldn't get them here.

S: I have one of Krishnaji's pens that has his name engraved on it, but I don't think it's a Lamy.

M: I don't know. He gave things away a lot. [Chuckles.]

The twenty-fourth. 'I packed and did laundry all day. A mad group from Barcelona had invaded Brockwood yesterday while we were in London, and were insisting on seeing Krishnaji.' Oh, they were really mad. 'They insisted on giving him a message. He agreed to see them briefly at 4 p.m. There were three men and a woman, a wife of one of the men, and it turned out that it was she who had a message for Krishnaji. She said that Master Morya told her on the astral plane to tell Krishnaji that he is too intellectual, hard, and has no love. Also that Saanen is finished. He should talk in'—I have in parentheses—'(guess where?) Barcelona. When Krishnaji said he didn't believe a word of all this, that it was nonsense, she sobbed that it was making her suffer that he didn't do what was said. I wanted to say, "Elle est folle" to one of the men but didn't.'

S: [chuckles] Yes, "she is crazy."

M: 'People are mad everywhere, but the Spanish ones seem to gravitate toward Krishnaji. The older man has given Krishnaji nine of his books. We walked later and finished packing at midnight.' [Chuckles.]

S: There is something special about the Spanish.

M: Yes, they're very insistent on what they think.

S: But it also gets very emotional very quickly.

M: Yes, it's still going on with the Spanish committee—and the Spanish publication committee.

S: I know. The Spanish Foundation, the Spanish publications committee, the different Spanish committees from South America.

M: And they fight each other, too.

S: Yes, it's lawsuits, and everything. Different opinions go very quickly from being slightly off to being completely berserk. [Both chuckle.]

M: I think they're having a lawsuit with the Argentinian one at the moment. It's been going on for some time. But I don't, thank god, have to do anything about it.

June twenty-fifth. 'I finished the laundry, and doing some kitchen and other household things right up to our departure at 11 a.m. Dorothy drove us to Heathrow, with Stephen Smith bringing our four bags in another car. The countryside was glowing from all the rain. The fields of barley are green to yellow to orange all at once. A most breathtaking beauty. At Heathrow, Rita Zampese met us and, as we were flying on Lufthansa, her company'—oh, she met us because it was her company.

S: Right, she worked for Lufthansa.

M: Yes. 'She had very kindly booked our train and tickets, too, from Bonn to Geneva. And today she scorted Krishnaji and me right into our seats on the plane.' It was nice of her indeed. 'An hour's flight and we landed in Cologne. There was a porter, a rare bird,' [chuckles] 'and in a few minutes we were whirling along the autobahn in a Mercedes station wagon taxi. Krishnaji all alive and watching with a look of a child having fun.' [Both chuckle.] 'The speedometer touched 160 km, and Krishnaji seemed pleased. Germany is the land of Mercedes. We are again at the Hotel Bristol in what looks like the same stolid but quiet rooms, numbers 704 and 705, of our last visit. We both fell asleep, and it wasn't until I woke up and went into Krishnaji's room that I saw he had slept in a chair instead of the bed. He said, "I was too tired to take off my shoes and trousers, so I stayed in the chair."' [S chuckles.] 'We had dinner in the large, ugly, and ornate hotel dining room where the same Indian headwaiter coped with our vegetarianism.' [Chuckles.]

The twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji slept "so-so." He said, "It's an odd thing, I meditate more easily here than at Brockwood. I woke up around 4 a.m., meditated, read, meditated. There, I think it's because there are too many boys and girls with their problems."' [Both chuckle.]

S: Yes, there were.

M: There were. 'I said, "But this is a hotel full of people."'

'Krishnaji replied, "Yes, but it's impersonal. I cleansed the room and it's alright. I watched the trains go by. I should have cleaned your room."' By cleaning, I must explain what he means.

S: Yes.

M: Although, I don't think I can explain it. He would do something to the atmosphere in rooms.

S: He'd walk around it.

M: Well, yes, sometimes. Usually he wanted to do it alone. You were perhaps privileged to witness it. But anyway, he did it and he did it in hotel rooms. It was something to do with…with human…

S: I can't remember if I saw him do it or he told me what he does, but it was a kind of chasing something out.

M: Yes.

S: Yes.

M: I'll go back a little bit. 'He said, "I should have cleaned your room. Brockwood is not a sacred place like Ojai, like your big room."' I think he means the big room here in this house.

S: In Ojai, the big living room, right.

M: The big living room. 'Then I say, "The Grove is sacred." Krishnaji's face lighting up, replied, "Oh, the Grove. Yes."'

'Me speaking: "Couldn't we make the house part of it sacred?"'

'Krishnaji: "You can't make these things. There I try to meditate, but it doesn't come."'

'M: "Has it always been like this at Brockwood?"'

'Krishnaji: "More or less."'

'M: "It would be interesting to see if it were different when the house is empty."'

'Krishnaji: "Oh, that might be different." He put on a new dressing gown made by a tailor in Madras, a gray silk seersucker got by Prema Srinivasan.'

S: Yes, we still have that one.

M: 'He put it on for the first time and pronounced it alright. He had two pillows, one small, that were uncomfortable— but he did nothing to rearrange them, like sleeping in the chair yesterday.' He wouldn't, you know, his comfort didn't…

S: He accepted.

M: Yes, 'He has no physical instinct to make himself comfortable. He just endures the discomfort. We went to Dr. Scheef at 10 a.m. Krishnaji had blood and urine tests. Dr. Scheef felt the place in Krishnaji's abdomen where Dr. Parchure felt a lump and prescribed X-rays tomorrow morning. As it was raining, we spent most of the day in the hotel, sleeping and reading. It cleared at 5 p.m., and we went for a walk and to buy fruit—cherries, nectarines, peaches, and fragrant strawberries. We came back and ate them in our rooms before dining downstairs. At supper'—oh, this is nice, I remember this—'Krishnaji made up a science fiction story. In his story, everyone in the world, in the local language, heard a voice say, "We've had enough. You have a week to make peace, open your borders, dissolve your arms, and learn to live together. This is God speaking."' [Both chuckle.] I remember it so well. '"If people didn't respond properly, all the trains in the world would stop for one hour."' [S laughing.] '"What next? They have to be threatened with something or they won't listen." We never figured out the next step, as it had to be one that wouldn't hurt anyone. But Krishnaji was full of laughter at the voice in every place. The House of Commons, the Kremlin, the White House, the Congress, the Vatican, in every house, in forests, remote deserts, everywhere.' [Both laugh.] 'We had crème caramel and went off to read and sleep. Tomorrow went round in my head.' [Laughs.] He had fun making up these wondrous, fanciful things. There was another time when all guns wouldn't shoot. This took place in the dining room in this rather stately, dreary hotel.

June twenty-seventh. 'No breakfast before the doctor's exam. We got to the clinic at 8:30 a.m. Krishnaji had an abdominal X-ray, having to swallow some liquid—barium or an equivalent—which luckily didn't make him vomit. That was soon over. Next an injection of whatever makes the liver show up, and a liver scan was done; all remarkably quickly. But this was followed by over an hour's wait in Dr. Scheef's office. Jean-Michel had sent me this morning reports of medical tests on Diane in case Dr. Scheef had any light to throw. He has a colleague who is doing some research on Diane's condition. The colleague said that at present, there is nothing beyond what her doctor, at Mount Sinai in New York, would know; but Dr. Scheef will be kept informed and let the Marogers know if there is any development.'

'At last, Scheef returned and said that Krishnaji's occasional pain and lump in the abdomen is a diaphragmatic hernia and nothing of consequence. A towering relief for me. Though, when the possibilities flew like crows in my head last night, I somehow felt it would not be serious. His kidneys, spleen, liver, pancreas are all fine. The liver is not enlarged as one of those quacks suggested. Knowing all this from Scheef is enormous peace of mind. He gave us, for free, 700 Wobenzyms and 800 tablets for me. Also we got Krishnaji 500 pink pills, the magic ones against hay fever, but these we must pay for: 225 Deutche marks.'

'On the way back to the hotel, Krishnaji asked me what I would have done if he had had a malignancy. Apparently he would have left it to me.' [S chuckles.] 'Later he said he couldn't put such a responsibility on me. He would decide, but with my advice. We rested in the afternoon, then went to pay the Apotheker for the 500 pink pills, and to buy some more cherries. At supper, Krishnaji continued his plans for reforming humanity. Since it doesn't act properly, the gods'—it seems there are a bunch of them—'put one god in charge of humanity. And so the question is how to make them reform.' [Chuckles.] Krishnaji figured out the way gods can stop man's bad behavior. '"They must choose. We cannot do it for them."…"I must find the way." Then after a while, he said, "I think I've got it. There are the good guys and the bad guys. Up to forty years of age, everyone can choose to be good; and those that do, live on to be very old, maybe 150, free from disease. At age thirty-five, the bad guys have five years; and if they do nothing bad in these five years, they are in the good column. But if they do…"'[both laugh]—I'm quoting, this is all in quotes—'"but if they do wrong, they die at forty. Anyone who has made it past forty and does wrong dies right away."' [Both laugh.] He enlarged on all this…'

S: Right, so, we've left aside the not hurting anybody business now. [Both laugh.]

M: 'He enlarged on all this with a mischievous look.' [Both laugh.] Oh dear. That was all so humorous.

Krishnaji waiting to start video recording (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The twenty-eighth. 'We checked out of the Bristol Hotel and walked to the station, a hotel man following with our luggage. We took the TEE train "Rheingold," which goes along the Rhine. The train was late due to damage it incurred in Amsterdam, and there was no dining car because that was one of the cars injured in Amsterdam, so no lunch. The Rhine river was gray. The sky was gray. Krishnaji watched it but I sank into a book. As we neared Basel, we neared our first problem. There, the train was to split in two parts, and our part was to be uncoupled and left. We had been unable to get seats in Bonn in the forward cars that would go on to Berne, but as people got off before that, we thought we might be able to find seats when we got to Basel. The problem was: how to get our four bags forward four cars in 3 minutes while the train stopped in Basel.' [Chuckles.] So, you know, at the end of the carriages there's a little place for the door to get out. We got there with the bags. 'We got set on our mark there and the instant the train stopped, Krishnaji rushed to find a porter—none—or a cart. He found the latter. I dragged the bags off the train onto it and we raced forward with the trainmen helping us, and got onto the Berne section just as the uncoupling clanged apart. We were off to Berne, but, of course, there was the same problem there for the train to Geneva. Again, we got a cart and loaded it, but had time, as there was a wait for the new train. I eyed a robust-looking Indian in a turban to help get our bags on the train, but Krishnaji wouldn't let me ask for his help.' [Both laugh.] 'Then I saw a tall, rather distinguished-looking Swiss Army officer and I asked him for his help. He lifted one bag in and other people helped with the rest and finally we made it. We were on the Geneva train in Switzerland rolling through the familiar neatness and beauty of the Swiss landscape.' [Laughs.] I remember saying to this Swiss Army officer, "Sir, I am traveling with a very distinguished gentleman who is not very strong." And then he rather aloofly but very politely helped. [S laughs.]

I mention the beauty of the Swiss landscape; then I write, 'I seem to have a closed mind in Germany. I do not know the place, but bad associations float up. Waiting for the train in Bonn, a closed goods train came rushing through, and the dark image of the war and of Jews packed into such a train was there for me. So it was good to roll along toward Geneva and finally to arrive at the Hôtel des Bergues, where we had immaculate, newly decorated rooms. We unpacked, changed, and by 7:30 were quietly, comfortably having a delicious dinner in the Amphytrion Restaurant. Neither of us had been hungry all day but after all the exertions, it was a very pleasant dinner. Krishnaji says I must not worry when traveling with him. All will turn out all right. But I do not think train rides will be our choice in the future when laden with luggage.'

S: Yes, it's impossible now without porters.

M: Yes. [Chuckles.] 'There was a note waiting for us when we got to the Hôtel des Bergues from Gisèle Balleys that Mr. Rusu died yesterday'—your friend, Mr. Rusu. Romanian. A nice, nice man.

S: Yes. A very, very nice man; and completely devoted to Krishnaji, since the '20s.

June twenty-ninth. 'A quiet, restful day. I read and wrote letters in the morning. We lunched in the Amphytrion, and rested all afternoon. Went for a small walk at six. It's pleasant to rest, read, and do nothing all day. Dined in the Amphytrion, and so to bed. I have a cold but it's not too bad. Mar de Manziarly telephoned. She lunches with us tomorrow.'

The thirtieth. 'We went to Jacquet, where Krishnaji chose silks for neckties for himself and Joe Links. Mar de Manziarly came to lunch. She has had heart trouble, so she cannot go to Saanen because of the altitude and is staying here with Marianne Borel in Geneva.'

Do you remember her? She was a French woman. 'Krishnaji put his hands to help her. Then we all lunched in the Amphytrion. Krishnaji was rather distrait.[2] Mar, pinched by age and failing health, still wants rather desperately to be jovial.' [S laughs.] You know that mannerism.

S: Yes, and it's very French—"gai," they would say.

M: Yes, very French. 'We invited her to Brockwood so Krishnaji can treat her daily for a while. It was a rather bleak lunch but the food pleased. After a nap, Krishnaji and I went to Patek for a watch check, then to Grand Passage, where we got a wristwatch for Krishnaji to give Chinna.'

S: Who was Chinna?

M: Someone in India. I think he was a servant. 'We also got a dress for Fosca and a blouse for Filomena. We dined quietly, and then to bed. At supper, Krishnaji spoke of the Rosalind and Rajagopal days from 1935 to 1947: the quarrels, Rajagopal's angers, both trying to humiliate him in public, ordering him around. She knocked Krishnaji down the stairs at Arya Vihara and luckily Weideman caught him'—that was a man that used to live around here. '"They must've thought I was an idiot to put up with it," he said. "If my mind worked then as it does now, I would have said, 'Enough. Go, both of you.' I could have then. I still had the power. Amma"'—that's Mrs. Besant—'"had told me, 'You are the ultimate head.' It was before Rajagopal got control."'

'I asked, "Why didn't you?"'

'Krishnaji replied, "I just didn't care. That was the way it was. I accepted it. Once Rajagopal had been angry, [and] I told him he was a bully and he piped down. The next day it was the same thing all over again."'

July first. 'We rested, packed, and had lunch in the Amphytrion. At 3:30 p.m., Hertz delivered a beige Ford Fiesta, and we set off for Gstaad via the Route du Lac to Morges and then over to the road to Oron, Bulle and so through the valley, arriving, as always, in rain. Gstaad has more snow on the mountains than I can remember in July. We were at Tannegg by 6:20 p.m. Vanda and Fosca had arrived on Sunday. So another summer here begins.'

S: [chuckles] Yes. Extraordinary. That's so evocative for me.

M: It is for me. I realized listening to some of the records of music I've got, ones that I bought there, the whole valley—I see it when I hear the music. It evokes the mountains, but more than that, the whole feeling of those summers there. It was an enormously marvelous time of my life.

S: Yes, yes, yes. And mine. And mine, too.

M: July second. 'Rain. I slept till 8:30 a.m. There was a letter from Erna with a memorandum of a meeting with Stanley Cohen, our KFA lawyer, about Rajagopal giving the archives to the Huntington Library. Cohen advised, and Erna, Theo, and Alan Hooker concur, that we must act to stop Rajagopal or we risk losing our rights under the settlement agreement. The possible steps were outlined, all involving going to court. It will be costly, but all feel it is necessary. Krishnaji concurs strongly and so I wrote this to Erna. I did shopping in the morning. Krishnaji stayed in bed. He gave me some of the precious pink pills for hay fever from Scheef, and they seem to help my cold. In the afternoon, Sunanda, Pama, and Parchure arrived with Kaim, the nephew of Merali. They are in a chalet on Neuret Road. Vanda has put herself in a tiny room and insisted on Parchure moving right into the downstairs one. So I went and fetched him. Krishnaji's voice is a little hoarse.'

S: You know, just coming back here for just a second to what we were saying before about remembering the summers in Saanen…

M: It glows in my mind.

S: Yes, and mine. And what's very peculiar for me is that, although I stayed for many years in the same chalet in Saanen, with a beautiful view over Rougemont and that end of the valley, and I've known those mountains from so many different perspectives.

M: Yes, you used to climb them.

S: But when I think of Saanen, the picture that comes most vividly and immediately into my mind is the view out of the living room window of Tannegg. For some reason, I don't know whether it was because it was something I looked at with Krishnaji, or it was associated with the two of you there, or Krishnaji there or what—but that picture is the essence of Saanen for me. The view out of that window.

M: Yes. Well, it was an extraordinary time for me. It glowed. It was…

S: Yes, I suppose what I'm saying is that there are other aspects of that same valley I saw more frequently and for longer periods of time. Years in the same chalet. And yet I think, because of its association with Krishnaji, that is the image that is most vividly in my mind. And it says something about the intensity of what one lived around Krishnaji.

M: Yes. There's an association that I spoke of…of the music that evokes it for me, it is not that the view of Wasserngrat and the whole thing. But it's of out of my window in Caprice. I looked—I've forgotten the mountain's name, but it was…oh…My flat was right along the railroad and I looked at those mountains. And I see those mountains when I play that music; that's the association. And there's a kind of radiance about the light in the mountains and the music. It's all intertwined, so when I hear some of the music that I bought that summer, it brings it back.

S: Yes, yes.

M: But it brings back the whole glow of the Swiss summers. It was wonderful.

S: Yes. Absolutely marvelous.

M: July third. 'I ran errands in the morning, then brought Sunanda and Pama up to lunch. It was Vanda's first meeting with the Patwardhans, and Krishnaji came in before and after, but lunched alone on a tray in his room. Krishnaji had put his hands on Sunanda and will do so every day to help her arthritis. Vanda immediately set to stretching her knee where the pain is located.' You were in terrible peril of Vanda attacking you with…

S: [laughs] Her yoga, yes.

M: …her yoga. I finally cured her of it by just relentless resistance. [Both chuckle.] At least for me. 'In the evening, Radha Burnier arrived at the Patwardhans' chalet where she is staying, and telephoned Krishnaji. He came into the living room to take the call and, of course, it was to tell him that she had been elected president of the Theosophical Society. She won with 9,300 votes to Rukmini's 5,400. Krishnaji said, "Good,"' [chuckles] 'and when he hung up, he said, "Now I can walk through the TS instead of on that filthy road."' He would never walk through it because they'd thrown him out or wouldn't let him live there.

S: Yes. Yes, I remember.

M: So he would walk around it on the filthy road to get to the beach. 'He is pleased. He also had a gleam in his eye denoting something. We will see.' I don't know what that means.

S: It's yours. "We will see" what the gleam means.

M: Why the gleam, yes. [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji's voice is still hoarse.'

July fourth. 'The crazy Spaniards who came to Brockwood are at Saanen led by the little old man who calls himself Jaime Escoi. A second man, something Conola, came with letters to Tannegg this morning demanding to see Krishnaji. I sent them away. Shortly after a letter came, saying Krishnaji had talked to him on the astral plane. Krishnaji's mission in Saanen is finished and it is now in Spain, etc. Then came a telegram from Escoi saying Krishnaji's health decreases from day to day from his obstinacy and he will die here since he is separating himself from Scorpio and other gibberish.' [S chuckles.] They used to call me up and say, "He didn't look very well in the tent this morning." In that tone of voice and I finally said: "Do not call again," and hung up. [Chuckles.] 'I went to the tent in the morning to see how things are coming, and there talked to Gisèle, etcetera. Dorothy came by. Montague is ill but medicine given by a Saanen doctor has helped. Radha, Pama, and Sunanda came to lunch. Krishnaji congratulated the president with much teasing and laughter. Radha said she won clearly in India and Europe, but only by four votes in the U.S.' [Both chuckle.] 'Some of Rukmini's more heated followers may contest it but cannot alter the outcome. She is calm about it all, laughing like a young girl at Krishnaji's jokes and teasing. He asked her what she wanted to do with the TS and then answered for her: to call in the heads of it and end divisions, beliefs, etc. and rapidly the subject turned to what it is that has made mankind get caught in conflict, knowledge, etc. There was the usual references to what tradition has said, etc. and, as always, they were found wanting. Krishnaji tentatively brought up man's struggle for survival in which knowledge was necessary and this invaded the psychological field. Krishnaji ate alone but talked most of the afternoon with Radha and the rest of us. His voice was less hoarse.' [Both chuckle.]

The fifth. 'Last night at 10 p.m. a telegram came from the filthy little old Spaniard saying, along with other gibberish, that Krishnaji's health was failing and he would die in Saanen unless he learned about ego from this and left Saanen for Spain. Early this morning, the French-speaking one telephoned. He asked me if Krishnaji had received the telegram? Yes, I answered. Did he want an interview with them? I replied that their telegram was shameful and shows total disrespect for Krishnaji. I went on that Krishnaji desires to have no communication with them and I don't either. He then asked about Krishnaji's health and I said, "He is very well," and hung up. Telegrams kept coming in all day. All gibberish about Masters and astral conversations and about how this man's incarnation was to set Krishnaji straight, etcetera. Sick minds,' I said.

S: Yes, yes.

M: 'I got Krishnaji a navy waterproof warm jacket, which he likes very much, as well as a heavy cotton training suit. Also pleasing. Sunanda came for treatment at 4 p.m. accompanied by Pama and Radha. There was more of yesterday's conversation on man's entrapment in the field of knowledge and what went wrong with humanity. Radha had got through by telephone to Adyar, and Mr. Surendra Narayan, the vice president. She will leave here Friday for Adyar. Krishnaji gives signs of interest in the TS as if it were something he could capture and change.' [Both chuckle.] 'I have some misgivings about his understanding of how misinterpreted any connection between him and the TS can be.'

July sixth. 'There was fog and rain. Over Vanda's protest, I drove her and Parchure to the tent, and then came back to drive Krishnaji there. The Spanish gnome was there to waylay him, but Scott and I kept him away from Krishnaji. A very fine talk[3] laid the direction of the series: the horrors and sufferings in the world, the kidnappings, terrorism, cruelty of man, of man's doing, how did this come about, the dependence on knowledge, is thought the cause of it? It was raining when Krishnaji finished and he got right into the car. He had lunch on a tray, and there were no guests. Scott came to check his watches. Sunanda came up for treatment with Pama and Radha. They left, with Scott taking them home, and Krishnaji and I went for our first walk, which was in the rain up the hill and through the woods, picking our way through mud as we had never seen it there.'

'Krishnaji's voice was clear and strong this morning, and he was warm, comfortable, and handsome in his new navy waterproof jacket. In the earlier afternoon, the French-speaking Spaniard had telephoned saying the old one, Escoi, had seen that Krishnaji's health is deteriorating and when would we see them. I said Krishnaji wished no communication whatsoever with them. Another crazy telegram came within an hour and during supper. Both of them, plus a third man, arrived at the doorstep. I blew up and said everything I could think of in French. They said they loved Krishnaji. I said to insult and attempt to harass and ignore his replies and say he would die if he didn't agree to their demands was hardly love. They went on about Master Kuthumi and I said all this was déséquilibré et fantaisie and to stop the nonsense of telegrams. It would be on my head, they said, and that we would hear no more. Krishnaji laughed when I reported it all and said, "This is old stuff. This is what Arundale did to me." Vanda said they weren't bad, they were stupid. Once again defending persons who attack Krishnaji. She appears to view no one as having any animosity. It is because they love him, said she. That is their pretension, said I. What, in fact, they are up to is aggression to get their own way. But what I discussed later with Dr. Parchure is the growing prevalence of people plunging into occult fantasies and seeking satisfaction in unrealities rather than the old physical pleasures. Delusions proliferate and does Theosophy give orthodoxy to all this? I touched on this with Krishnaji, who said I knew nothing of real Theosophy, that it was Leadbeater who encouraged all this. I didn't pursue it then, but my question remains.'

July seventh. 'Touches of sun at last. I ran errands in the morning, then Radha, Sunanda, and Pama came to lunch. Krishnaji joined us afterward and there was talk most of the afternoon. Krishnaji inquired what sort of persons Radha thought the early TS people were. Olcott was a good organizer, she said. I asked if Blavatsky had something original or only put together various beliefs. Radha said she thought, "She had something." Later, as Krishnaji prepared for the walk and was putting on a coat to go for the walk, he said quickly and suddenly'…[pause]…sorry, this is private.

S: Right. Okay.

M: 'And then on the walk, he said, "Do you remember Maricopa? Those mountains! California. This is…too closed in."' I'm surprised about that.

S: The Swiss mountains are much tighter.

M: I guess so. I don't know. Anyway.

S: [chuckling] Mary, may I ask…Are you saying it is private because he said something nice about you?

M: No comment. [With mock sternness. S laughs then Mary chuckles.]

July eighth. Do you want to know about the eighth?

S: Yes, we do. [Chuckles.]

M: 'Rain again. Vanda refuses my driving her to or from the tent. She went by taxi.' [S chuckles.] 'Krishnaji gave the second Saanen talk. Very fine.[4] He continued the exploration of the causes of man's violence, conflict, thought. "Allegiance to anything is the beginning of corruption." Both Kossiakofs came to lunch. Nicolas is almost blind. He is very pessimistic about the world. Economic disintegration, he feels, is inevitable. I drove them back to Caprice where they were staying. Radha, Sunanda, and Pama came to tea. Krishnaji came in from the nap at 5 p.m. He treated Sunanda but he was too tired for a walk and it was also too late.'

Krishnaji waiting to start video recording (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

July ninth. 'Krishnaji said this morning that meditation came so strongly in the night that at 1:30 a.m., he had to sit up. At lunch was Simonetta, who has completed her work for the Tibetans near Mysore and in September will go to Pakistan to help with Afghan refugees, and Suad Al Radhi bringing gifts of Iraqi glass, dates, and other sweets from Beirut, and Frances McCann. Vanda invited Dr. Frederick Leboyer for coffee.' He was that birthing expert who was advising everybody. 'He took center stage and talked of his learning to sing in Madras, to study breathing; and now his maternity patients are to sing instead of scream when they give birth.' [Both chuckle.] Always something nutty comes out of it. 'Krishnaji sat politely silent through all this and then we went off for a walk to Alpina and back, neither of us caring for Leboyer. A phony, we thought. Naudé in London may come here.' [Both chuckle.]

The tenth: 'Rain. Krishnaji's third Saanen talk. Radha, Sunanda, Pama came to lunch, after which I took them home. Sunanda and Pama returned later as Leboyer was to demonstrate and teach his singing. Frances was there, too. He clammed up in front of the Indians, so they, Krishnaji, and I left him with Vanda and Frances, the two enthusiasts.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji and I walked to the Palace Hotel and back. A letter arrived from Amanda and Phil, including very good reviews of Phil's memoir Take Two, which is coming out in August.'

S: I think we're going to have to leave it there because we've run out of tape.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] A link to the video of this talk.

[2] There is no good equivalent for this in English. It can mean "inattentive," "abstracted," "faraway," etcetera, but the French word is the best I can think of to describe this state of being that would sometimes come over Krishnaji.

[3] The video of this first talk in Saanen.

[4] A video of the second Saanen talk.

Issue 64: July 11, 1980 to November 3, 1980

The Saanen and Brockwood Gatherings go well with their question-and-answer sessions at the end instead of the discussions which had been so disrupted in recent years. Krishnaji decides on a new direction for Brockwood, with which most people seem to be enthusiastic. In November we see Krishnaji and Mary arrive in India for the start of Krishnaji's India tour, something Mary did not usually attend.

Mary: Today we begin our recollections for July eleventh, 1980, and we're in Gstaad for the Saanen talks. My diary reads: 'At 10 a.m., Mary Cadogan, Jane Hammond, and Scott came. Mary and I discussed Saanen matters. At 11 a.m., there was the annual meeting of the various international committees and foundations. Krishnaji had Sunanda describe the work in India. Then he called for greater communication between everyone and described the new Krishnaji Information Centers in the U.S. Out of this came a plan to have these international committees meet at Brockwood after the gatherings there. Mary, Jane, and Scott stayed to lunch. In the afternoon, the meeting of the international committees, minus Krishnaji, continued at the Sport Golf Hotel in Saanenmöser.'

Scott: Right, I remember that year. The Germans had rented the Sport Golf Hotel in Saanenmöser, and there was a continuation in the afternoon of the meeting in the morning.

M: Yes. Oh, that's what it is. 'I drove the Patwardhans and Parchure there, but I left at 5 p.m. to pick up Krishnaji, who had walked down the hill to have his hair cut by Monsieur Nicolas in Gstaad. The mad Spaniards came to the house.' [Both laugh.] Oh, lord. 'And after a long discussion on the doorstep, they shook hands, accepting that Krishnaji will not talk to them or come to Barcelona.' [Both chuckle.] Oh dear.

Now we go to the July twelfth. 'There was some sun that day. I went to Rougemont to look at two Buddha statues at the antiquaire, Monsieur Rossier's.'

S: Where is that?

M: That's down on the left. [Chuckles.]

S: On the left on the main street?

M: On the main street.

S: I can't picture it.

M: 'I marketed, and then the Marogers came to lunch. They are here for the weekend, and afterward they took Krishnaji and me for a ride in their new Citroën. We stopped in Rougemont to see the Buddhas, but Krishnaji didn't like them. I didn't much, either. We picked up Sunanda on the way back. Krishnaji talked to her and gave her a treatment. I drove her home, and then Krishnaji and I went for a walk.'

The thirteenth. 'Rain. Krishnaji gave the fourth Saanen talk. At lunch were Kathy and Scott, and Natasha, invited by me; and invited by Vanda an R. Porchelli, and an American boy, David Eddie. Nadia Kossiakof came at 3:30 p.m. to talk to me and to Krishnaji at 4 p.m. Sunanda and Pama brought a Romanian lady, Magda Sichitiu, and her little girl, Rukmini, who share their chalet. Krishnaji talked to them. I took everyone home in relays and then Krishnaji and I walked in the rain to the Palace Hotel and back. Krishnaji, after his morning talk, had me write down, "The past is giving meaning to the present and therefore the present has no meaning."'

S: Hm.

M: That's interesting.

S: Just an aside on this, Magda was actually introduced to Krishnaji and his teachings by Silvius Russu, because Silvius Russu was a long-standing friend of her parents.

M: Oh, I didn't know that.

S: And the first time I met Magda was with Silvius. I can't remember what I said—but something like it was nice to meet some old family friend of his or something like that, and he looked a little distant, and said, "Never trust Romanians." [Laughs.] And this is, you know, from a Romanian.

M: I don't want to record the following, if you'll turn it off.

S: Alright.

<Tape cuts out, then back on.>

S: We're back recording again.

M: The fourteenth. 'There was some sun today. I ran errands, and Asit telephoned from Singapore to say he is coming here from August ninth to the thirteenth. The Marogers came to lunch. Krishnaji talked alone with Marie-Bertrande and put his hands, as she had been sick last night. Sunanda, Pama, Mary Cadogan, and Dorothy came for coffee. Also at 2:30 p.m., a Madame Nefferts of Swiss German television came with Gisèle Balleys, Ulrich Bruger, and a Mr. Schneider to talk to me about a program on Krishnaji. I agreed to it, so they will videotape in the tent tomorrow and have a short video interview with Krishnaji here at Tannegg afterwards. I fell asleep for a short time, then took the Patwardhans home while Krishnaji went for a ride to Lauenen with the Marogers. They leave tomorrow. Krishnaji and I walked to the river. One of two non-rainy days we've had.' [Both chuckle.]

July fifteenth. ‘The rain returned. Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen talk. It was filmed unobtrusively by the German Swiss TV company. At lunch were Frances and an Italian woman, Anna someone, who has done a thesis on Krishnaji. At 3:30 p.m., the television crew set up in the living room at Tannegg, and at 4 p.m., Madame Nefferts did a fifteen-minute filmed interview with him, asking three questions.’ I should have written down what the three questions are.

S: That’s alright, we’ve got the interview.

M: Anyway, ‘it will be broadcast in September. Sunanda and Pama appeared and later I took them back. I joined Krishnaji on the walk to the Alpina Road’—that was sort of a loop for a short walk, it was peaceful—‘as it was too wet to walk in the woods. They are widening the road below the Meurice Hotel, destroying a stone wall, trees, and its narrowness, and with it the sense I get there of an old-fashioned middle-Europe look. The smallness of the road was its character.’

The next day. ‘Still another gray, wet morning. Vanda left on the 7 a.m. train for Florence. Fosca says the secretary telephoned her yesterday and that Vanda’s brother, who was in very poor health, wants to see her, but as she’s coming today not to tell her. She went off without breakfast, independent in a taxi, and Fosca wept. “La Signora,” she wept, “vive come una zingara.”’ [Both chuckle.] That means the signora lives like a gypsy.

‘It was quiet in the house. Krishnaji noticed it. No one came to lunch so he came to the table with Dr. Parchure and me. We spoke of Mark Lee. Krishnaji is also concerned about Vanda. At 4 p.m., Mr. Mirabet brought his annual donation of 8,000 Swiss francs’—he was a very nice old man. ‘At 4:30, both Siddoo sisters came for two hours. They asked Krishnaji if he had lost interest in their school. He said they must keep in closer contact with him. Sarjit tried to get him to make a tour of Canada. I reminded her that here, at Tannegg, it was agreed when they first spoke of their school that they undertook it knowing that Krishnaji couldn’t be there. Krishnaji said that he wants to live another ten or fifteen years, and if he travels more than now, that will not be possible. So no question of speaking across Canada. Sarjit, full of “yes, buts,” pointed to his going to Ceylon this year. Krishnaji said he last spoke there in the early ’50s. They have asked him back ever since, and so this year he will go. Sarjit then denied she had said Krishnaji should speak across Canada—only in Vancouver. Krishnaji left it open, but with no commitment. After two hours, they left in Jackie’s newly bought Mercedes. She has become a Swiss resident and bought a flat in Gstaad. There’s lesser Canadian income tax if you live abroad. Both sisters feel their school is now going well. They feel attached to the bone, and that David Bohm made the difference in the school improving. Sunanda had a treatment from Krishnaji, and then there was no time left for a walk. It rained, anyway.’

July seventeenth. ‘There was a little less rain today. Krishnaji gave his sixth talk. I fetched Anneke up to lunch. There was just Krishnaji, she, and I at the table. Anneke was full of talk about a Dutch psychiatrist, Jan Foudraine, a Rajneesh follower. Anneke kept saying "Bhagwan," which tightened Krishnaji's face fastidiously' [both chuckle], 'and Foudraine came at 4 p.m. for an interview with Krishnaji. A large, gray-haired man with a beard and the rusty costume with beads and locket. He was with Krishnaji until 5:30 p.m. Half an hour before he left, Sunanda and Pama came. After Foudraine left, Krishnaji, they, and I sat and talked till after 7 p.m. with much laughter, Krishnaji's face alight with amusement. It was too late for a walk, so he sat on though it was late, after which he was essentially tired. I hoped the fun would take the place of the good of a walk.'

The eighteenth. 'In the morning, I did errands. The Patwardhans came to lunch. A letter came to Krishnaji from Rajagopal, written July ninth in reply to Krishnaji's from Ojai of May twenty-first, saying that he'—that means Rajagopal—'had never violated the settlement agreement. That he had collected correspondence and other items for over sixty years as a personal project'—this is how he justified his actions, you know, he just stole all the archives and claimed they were his—'and that "neither you nor any organization has any valid claim to them."' That's Rajagopal's letter. 'Furthermore, he said that he'—Rajagopal—'is willing to "join hands once again if you will ask your trustees to cease their harassment of the K and R Foundation." There was also a two-page letter to Krishnaji dated June twenty-third and sent to Brockwood, signed by Austin Bee, Mima Porter, and Annie Vigeveno, obviously written by Rajagopal (his style is very evident), and it mentioned a stonewall on everything. It begins, "Dear Mr. Krishnamurti," and is insulting. A copy came to me as a trustee. The Patwardhans lunched with Krishnaji and me and the letters were read to them. At 3:30 p.m. I drove them to Saanenmöser for another getting-together of the foreign committees. Mary Cadogan has left, but Dorothy was there. There was mostly talk about how Krishnaji Information Centers should work. Scott was there about the international endowment fund, which seems to elicit little interest. A Ms. Ruth Jacobs, who has got Krishnaji played on cable television in New York, was invited by me. Suzanne van der Straten came. It broke up at 6:30 p.m.'

The nineteenth. 'The Patwardhans came by in the morning, but I did errands. Only Krishnaji, Parchure, and I were at lunch. At 4:30 p.m., an old Spaniard, Mr. Martinez, and wife came to give a donation'—that's not the crazy Spaniards, they're nice Spaniards. 'At 4 p.m., the Siddoos saw Krishnaji briefly. Then he and I walked to the river.'

July twentieth. 'It was clear early, then the clouds regrouped. Krishnaji gave his seventh Saanen talk to a packed tent on meditation, but it was an odd talk; a bit disconnected, pausing into three anecdotes and more, saying that what must be done before meditation can be done. "Don't meditate," he said referring to what most people do. Only when the mind has seen all its habits, shortcomings, etcetera, and is free, can meditation really begin. Rain began as he came out of the tent. The Patwardhans, Pascal, and Baboo Merali (that's the nickname for Merali I'm supposed to call him, which I do with reluctance)' [both chuckle] 'his nephew Kaim, and niece Zubeda came to lunch. As today was the last of the talks, Krishnaji joined at the table. Merali had brought two Indian dishes. After they left, Sunanda had a healing, then I drove her and Pama to their chalet. I came back and took a nap. There was a windstorm that woke up both Krishnaji and me, but we were both tired, so we didn't go for a walk. I am clamped into a thriller, The Bourne Identity by R. Ludlum.' [Chuckles.]

S: Oh, yes, I remember it.

M: I remember nothing about it but the title, but it was a good one, apparently. [S chuckles.]

The next day. 'There was rain and fog.' [Chuckles.] 'I worked at the desk all morning. There was just Krishnaji, Parchure, and I at lunch. There was talk of kundalini, and I recorded part of it. We were interrupted by Brian Jenkins wishing to mediate between the Bangalore school and KFI. Robin Chavreul, his wife, and baby came to greet Krishnaji. Sunanda came for healing. I took her home. There was no rest for Krishnaji.'

July twenty-second. 'Sun! Naudé telephoned from somewhere in Switzerland. He's coming here in August. I marketed early, and had lunch with the van der Stratens, Simmonses, and Patwardhans. Krishnaji had his lunch on a tray but came in afterwards. He slept all afternoon while Sunanda, Pama, Parchure, and I sorted written questions for tomorrow. It was a beautiful cloudless day spent, alas, indoors.'

The twenty-third. 'It was a beautiful day. Krishnaji held the first of five question-and-answer sessions. He's taking only written questions, and he answered three today, most marvelously.[1] At lunch were Jackie Siddoo, Kathy, and Scott. The later two stayed to discuss video matters with me. The Patwardhans came in later and we all sat with Krishnaji until almost 6 p.m.'

July twenty-fourth. 'The weather is fine, and Krishnaji had the second, very good, question-and-answer meeting.[2] We had a quiet lunch with no guests. Sunanda and Pama came to see Krishnaji about India in the afternoon. I had Gisela Elmenhorst to tea with me. I took everyone home.'

The twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji held the third question-and-answer meeting. They go very well.[3] After it, Sunanda and Pama came to Tannegg to say goodbye, then left for Geneva and India. There was no one else at lunch. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji saw a young German, Theo Metzinger, and had him see Dr. Parchure. Krishnaji and I walked to the river.'

July twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji held the fourth question meeting. Before it, I made an appeal for funds. What was needed for this year was Swiss francs 40,000, and we really need 6,000 more to make up that sum. Rita Zampese came to lunch with Krishnaji and me. After a nap and a walk with Krishnaji to the river, I sorted questions for tomorrow and Krishnaji dictated some.'

S: Yes, if he didn't think the questions were good enough, he would dictate some.

M: Yes, well, or if he wanted to talk about something that wasn't mentioned.

The twenty-seventh. ‘Krishnaji held the fifth and final question-and-answer meeting, which wound up this year’s Saanen Gathering. Krishnaji answered eight written questions. I brought Suad Al Radhi back for lunch. I slept in the afternoon, and Krishnaji slept till 7 p.m., so there was no walk. I spoke briefly to Vanda and Alain, who was with her in Florence. The Shah of Iran died in Egypt. It is no help in the hostage release.’

July twenty-eighth. ‘It was a sunny quiet day. Hilda and Herri Moorhead came to lunch. At 4 p.m., Dorothy, Harsh, and Claire came to discuss with Krishnaji and me the problem of Anand, their four-year-old son, and the need for a school at Brockwood for children of staff. It was more or less agreed that something must be done. Krishnaji and I went for a walk. Scott joined us to say goodbye. The tent is down. The donations reached 45,000 Swiss francs yesterday and people are leaving.’

The next day we were mostly just quiet, and on the thirtieth, ‘Dorothy came up in a taxi to say goodbye. She, Montague, and Doris leave in the Land Rover for Brockwood and are going quickly or slowly depending on Montague’s health and the weather. I had typewriter trouble, so I rented one from Madame Cadoneau.’ Remember Madame Cadoneau?

S: [laughs] Yes. The stationery store.

M: Yes, she ran the stationery store, that’s right. I typed letters that Krishnaji had dictated and sent Bamberger a check for my taxes. Ortolani and his wife came by. They are going to Brockwood. Krishnaji and I walked to the river.’

July thirty-first. ‘It was a hot day. I spent most of it doing desk work and running errands, while Krishnaji rested. It was too hot to walk, so we took a quiet ride to Gsteig.’

August first. ‘This is a Swiss national holiday. It was warm and clear. I did letters all day. Krishnaji slept two hours in the afternoon and didn’t feel like a walk.’

The second of August. ‘It was another hot day. Krishnaji began dictating Letters to the Schools again. Today’s was number thirty-eight, the first since before his going to India last year.’ Goodness. ‘After lunch, Krishnaji held another conversation with Dr. Parchure and me on kundalini, and I taped it on the little Sony. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji came with me to the village to order’ [chuckles] ‘a new Philips razor and look at Omega watches. It is too hot for a walk, and Krishnaji is tired.’

The third. ‘Again, it was hot. I did letters all morning. At lunch, Krishnaji asked Dr. Parchure and me what is the right thing to do with those, as in India, who make sacrifices, give up jobs, etcetera and come to him. The conversation lasted three hours. It was exhausting. Krishnaji rejected all practical considerations and said I was not going with his thought. It was too late for a walk when we stopped talking, and too hot.’

August fourth. ‘It is slightly cooler today. I again spent the morning doing letters. We sat only one hour at lunch, timed by Krishnaji.’ [S chuckles.] I don’t understand.

S: He probably timed the lunch so that the conversation wouldn't go on and you could get off for your walk in the afternoon.

M: Well, I guess so. 'Krishnaji and I went for a walk in the woods.' Yes, I think you're right. 'There was a letter from Sunanda saying that Radha gave a press conference in Madras on her becoming president and said the future of the Theosophical Society is to follow the teachings of Krishnamurti.' Good for her.

The fifth. 'It is a little cooler. I did letters all morning and went to Saanen for fruit in the afternoon. Krishnaji and I walked twice through the words in the late afternoon. He was tired but he had rested all day.'

August sixth. 'I plowed through the letter pile, and the end is in sight!' Exclamation point. 'I ran errands in the late morning, and we had a quiet lunch; Krishnaji, Parchure, and me. Then a nap and reading. Krishnaji did three laps through the woods in the cool of the afternoon.' That means going through the woods and turning around, just staying in the shade.

S: Yes. Right. [Chuckles.]

M: The seventh. 'It was a cooler, beautiful morning. Krishnaji dictated letters to Erna about Rajagopal's letter to him of July ninth, and the K and R trustees' insulting letter of June twenty-third. Cohen has had no reply from Rajagopal's lawyer, Christensen. Krishnaji did other letters, including replying to Radha's letter of invitation to visit Adyar when he is in Madras. I typed most of the day. At 2 p.m., I went to the Cantonal Bank, for the annual review of the Alzina account with Mr. Liechti.' That was that sum of money that was donated for Krishnaji's use when Rajagopal had refused to give him money to live on, and they were investing it, and I was supposed to look after it. 'At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji saw Frances McCann at her request. Krishnaji says she does not listen. He and I went for a walk to the river. Krishnaji twice said on the way back that it had tired him. "No more on the river road," he says.' I don't know why, I suppose it was sunny, I don't know.

S: Yes, when it was sunny, it was sunny on that road.

M: August eighth. 'There was heavy rain, then it cleared. I finished typing and posting letters, then marketed and took Fosca down to the village. I also took Krishnaji to look at razors.' [Chuckled.] 'Then we walked only in the woods. I got two aerograms from Amanda.'

The ninth. 'Asit and Minakshi telephoned from Geneva, and I arranged to meet them from the 2:30 p.m. train. I have rented a bedroom and bathroom in the downstairs east flat for them. Asit bought me a Nikon F3 camera body only in Singapore.' He was forever talking about the latest Nikon, and Krishnaji was always cheering me on get one, and then objecting when I wanted to use it on him. [S laughs.] I would say, "My only interest is in photographing you, and I don't need a new one to do it." But, of course, that never worked. Anyway, Asit brought me that. 'They have not been able to get these yet in Europe. I gave them a late lunch. Later, after 5 p.m., Krishnaji, Asit, and I walked just to the edge of the river and back, not up the road. Krishnaji said he was tired in the evening.'

S: Also, the walk up the road by the river was quite a steep climb.

M: Yes, it was uphill all the way. I think the sun was part of it.

August tenth. 'Krishnaji slept well but didn't feel like exercise. I took the Chandmals for a drive in the morning. We all napped in the afternoon, then had a walk in the woods. The Chandmals and I dined with Suzanne and Hugues van der Straten and went to a Menuhin concert. The students of Menuhin School played. Alain telephoned from Vanda's in Florence, saying that he is arriving by train here tomorrow.'

The eleventh. 'I took the Chandmals to the village shopping, and met Alain at 11:30 a.m. He has the little room off the dining room to stay in. All were at the lunch table. Much homeopathy talk. Krishnaji, Asit, Alain, and I went for a walk three times through the woods.'

August twelfth. 'It rained on and off. I took the Chandmals and Alain to the village for shopping in the morning, and in the afternoon, I took Alain so he could have tea with Frances. I fetched him later, and walked with Krishnaji and Asit in the woods. Alain had dinner with the van der Stratens, and Dr. Parchure and I dined with Asit and Minakshi at the Olden Hotel.'

August thirteenth. 'I took the Chandmals to the 7:45 a.m. train; they fly to London, New York, San Francisco, and then come back to Brockwood on September fifth. I went with Alain as he shopped in the village. Krishnaji, Alain, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched in. Jackie Siddoo presented financial accounts of the Wolf Lake School at 4:30 p.m., and I had supper at Jackie's. Alain left on the 8:50 p.m. train for London.'

The next day was 'a clear, cloudless day, so after breakfast, Dr. Parchure and I went up the Diablerets. This was his first touch of snow.'

S: I thought he'd been in the Himalayas.

M: Maybe it was just for Switzerland. 'We got back in time for lunch. I marketed, then walked with Krishnaji through the woods.'

The fifteenth. 'I ran errands in the morning, and in the afternoon went with Krishnaji to the village for a new razor and to have his hair cut. At 5 p.m., Suzanne and Hugues came and, in spite of the rain, we all went for a walk through the woods.'

August sixteenth. 'I left at 9:40 a.m. for the Geneva airport. There was a delay at Hertz that prevented my telephoning Tannegg to tell Krishnaji I had reached the airport safely, so I was in despair on my flight to Rome.' I was supposed to call and let him know I was alright, but I didn't have time. 'There was a huge crowd there, and it took one hour to go through passport control. Filomena and Mario, her son, met me. As I reached Filomena's, the phone was ringing. It was Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and Vanda, who had arrived at Tannegg in the afternoon. Krishnaji was worried. I felt sick at having worried him. I had the usual time with Filomena's family. She and I had supper alone and talked.'

The next day is just a quiet day with Filomena, then on the eighteenth, 'Filomena and Mario took me back to the airport where I took the Alitalia 11:30 a.m. plane back to Geneva. I picked up a Ford station wagon from Hertz, and drove to Gstaad, getting there after 3 p.m. I am unutterably glad to be back. Krishnaji, Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and I talked. Later, Krishnaji and I did our three laps through the woods.'

The nineteenth, 'I slept well. I spoke to my brother, then packed all day and did last-minute errands.'

August twentieth. 'Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I left Vanda, Fosca, and Tannegg at 7:50 a.m. and drove via Pillon and Aigle to the Geneva airport. We flew on Swiss Air at 1:20 p.m. to Heathrow, arriving at 3 p.m. Dorothy in the Cortina and others met us, and by 5 p.m., we were back at Brockwood. We went for a short walk in the grove and had supper at 6 p.m. Krishnaji ate downstairs in the school dining room again.'

August twenty-first. 'I spent most of the day unpacking and putting things in order. Instead of a walk, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I worked in the grove pulling brambles, nettles, and dead rhododendron blossoms. Krishnaji had supper downstairs.'

The twenty-second. 'Krishnaji rested, and lunched in bed. I went to Alresford and Winchester in the afternoon. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I worked again in the grove and Krishnaji had supper in the dining room.'

Then for the next three days, Krishnaji mostly rested.

On August twenty-sixth, 'Krishnaji and I went to London on the 10:23 a.m. train. Joe Links met us.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji gave him the Jacquet ties he had had made for him. Krishnaji went to Huntsman and I to Wallace Heaton.' That's a place that sells photographic equipment. 'I purchased lenses for the Nikon F3. Then I met Krishnaji at Huntsman and we walked to Fortnum, where Mary lunched with us. Krishnaji and I walked back to Wallace Heaton, where I paid for equipment after trading in my Leicaflex, and we then took a taxi to Waterloo, so back to Brockwood by 6 p.m.'

Then more rest for Krishnaji and desk work for me.

On the twenty-eighth, 'I went back to London for a haircut, to Heaton for other Nikon lenses, then bought cheese for Krishnaji, and had lunch with Betsy at her Cheyne Gardens flat. I caught the 4:30 p.m. back to Petersfield.'

The next day. ‘It rained most of the day. I fetched Mary Cadogan from the Petersfield station, also Danah Zohar Marshall and husband. She interviewed Krishnaji in the afternoon for the Sunday Times. It was too wet to walk. People are arriving for the Brockwood Gathering.’

August thirtieth. ‘It was cloudy, then clear. Krishnaji gave his first Brockwood talk at 11:30 a.m. We had fruit and salad upstairs, and then went to the tent briefly for the hot course. Both took naps, then we took a short walk. I invited Margaret Dodd to spend the night in the West Wing guest room. She came to talk and to show a proposal for photos and text for a Krishnaji book to the publication committee.’

The thirty-first. ‘Perfect weather. Krishnaji gave the second Brockwood talk, a very fine one.[4] Mary and Joe came, and they had fruit and salad with Krishnaji and me upstairs. Margaret Dodd presented her book proposal to Krishnaji and the publication committee. Mary and I had coffee and talked before she and Joe left.’

September first. ‘I sorted questions that had been handed in, and Krishnaji chose ones for tomorrow. We walked in the grove and did some work there.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji held the first question-and-answer meeting[5] in the tent. We lunched upstairs and then he returned to the tent briefly for the hot food, as usual. We walked in the afternoon.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji dictated letters, rested, and chose questions for tomorrow’s question-and-answer meeting. And the day after, he held that meeting, and answered nine questions.’

Then there’s really nothing the next day, but on September sixth, ‘I went to fetch Asit and Minakshi Chandmal at the Petersfield train station. They came from California and leave tomorrow for Bombay. Krishnaji gave talk number three. Very fine,’[6] (underlined).

The seventh. ‘Krishnaji gave the fourth Brockwood talk, and afterward he gave an interview to Richard Henwood. The walk was just with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me. At 6 p.m., Asit and Minakshi left for the airport and Bombay.’

September eighth. ‘The Gathering is over, so the house is beginning to empty. I did desk work, laundry, etcetera. Dorothy, who was stung in the mouth by a wasp, didn’t come on the walk, so Krishnaji and I, with the dog Whisper, went across the fields. It was a wonder of beauty.’

The ninth. ‘Krishnaji did exercises as usual with Dr. Parchure in the morning, but then spent the rest of the day in bed. I went to a three-hour staff meeting beginning at 3 p.m.’ [S chuckles.]

September tenth. ‘Krishnaji and I took the train to London. Mary and Joe met us at Waterloo. Krishnaji had a Huntsman fitting, then I had a Hilliers fitting on two pair of slacks, with Krishnaji overseeing it.' He had to see how long the slacks were; it should break at the instep.

S: Exactly, yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'We lunched with Mary at Fortnum, then I went at three with Rita Zampese to Qantas about our tickets to India. I rejoined Krishnaji at Hatchards, and we went by taxi to Waterloo and so home.'

The next two days are desk work for me, errands to Alresford and Winchester, and, of course, walks in the afternoon.

September thirteenth. 'I worked mostly at my desk, but in the afternoon, international committee members arrived for a weeklong series of meetings with Krishnaji and David Bohm.'

The fourteenth. 'Krishnaji and David Bohm held a videotaped conversation with committee members; the Brockwood staff were present, but not participating. In the afternoon, there was a tea for everyone. Krishnaji came in for a little while and then we walked.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji talked to the guests and staff in the morning. In the afternoon, Mary Cadogan and I held a meeting for committee members about Krishnamurti Information Centers. I walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy across the fields.'

September sixteenth. 'The Marogers arrived for breakfast and are staying in the West Wing. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji and David held another videotaped conversation with others listening. In the afternoon, Krishnaji talked to the staff only about a kindergarten for Harsh's and Claire's son Anand. Krishnaji is disgusted at the staff's reactions.' [Both chuckle.]

The seventeenth. 'Krishnaji spent all day in bed resting, with lunch on a tray. David Bohm held a discussion at 11:30 a.m. In the afternoon, Mary Cadogan and I met with a French-language group consisting of Jean-Michel Maroger, Pascaline Mallet, and Betsy Debass, all from France; Gisèle Balleys for the French-speaking Swiss; and Robert Linssen for the French-speaking Belgians. We talked about French books and the need for more translations. Then, Mary and I met the Spaniards, Juan and Ramon Colell about the Fundación. Alfonso Colón has resigned as its president, and Raúl Dávila, the vice person, is the acting president.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held another videotaped conversation with Dave Bohm. I talked to Mary Cadogan after lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji talked to the staff. He said he would talk to them every day, or as often as they wished. There was a discussion on "thinking together."' [Both chuckle.]

S: After all the talks on that, I don't know why we weren't able to do more of it—we were only able to talk about it.

M: Yes, we could only talk about thinking together, not actually do it.

September nineteenth. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji talked to everybody, and in the afternoon he talked to the Marogers.'

The next day, 'Again at 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji talked to David and everyone else present. After lunch, all the international committee members left. The Marogers left after supper, but in the afternoon, Krishnaji, the Marogers, Dorothy, David Bohm, Dr. Parchure, and I met in the dining room and the Marogers spoke of wanting to do something with either La Mahaudière'—that's their place—'or another place if they move, that will benefit or be allied with Brockwood. They are separating from the farming project of Jean-Michel's mother and brother.' That property was co-owned by the brother and the mother. Nothing came of that, as I recall.

The twenty-first. 'Krishnaji talked to staff in the morning, and was deeply exasperated. He talked to me about it after lunch. There was a staff meeting on school matters in the afternoon and a walk.'

The twenty-second. 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed. Everyone had a day off. I cooked lunch upstairs for Krishnaji, Dorothy, and Dr. Parchure; then I went to get the inspection certificate for the Mercedes in Alresford. After supper, Dr. Parchure and I talked at length in the kitchen. Krishnaji came in and asked what we were discussing. Out of this came a long talk between the three of us on Krishnaji's feelings about Brockwood, a need for people he can explore with, etcetera. Dr. Parchure gave Krishnaji and me flu shots.'

September twenty-third. 'Krishnaji was awake from midnight on. Nevertheless, he held a discussion with the staff at 11:30 a.m., then he slept in the afternoon, and then walked.'

The twenty-fourth. 'It was a lovely day. Krishnaji and I took the 10:23 a.m. train to London. Joe Links met us at Waterloo. He dropped me at American Express so I could get travelers' checks, then I walked to Huntsman, where Krishnaji chose a brown tweed for a jacket and a light gray flannel for two pairs of trousers. Mary Links met us at Fortnum's and gave Krishnaji her just-published book about her father. Krishnaji and I bought cheeses on the way back. He had a haircut at Truefitt. And so to Waterloo and back to Brockwood.'

September twenty-fifth. 'Dr. Parchure left at 6:45 a.m. for Heathrow and India. I did desk work all morning. In the afternoon, I went to meet Radhika and Hans Herzberger and their daughters, Sunanda, age 14, and Maya, age 10, at the Winchester bus station. They are at Oxford for a year while Hans is at All Souls. Sunanda is a new student at Brockwood. Radhika and Hans were in the West Wing for the weekend. Other new students all arrived today for the start of the school year. There were two from Oak Grove, Kate Hidley and Vicky Zudavern. Krishnaji, Dorothy, the Herzbergers, and I were on the walk.'

The next day. 'I again spent most of the day working at the desk. Krishnaji held a staff meeting at 11:30 a.m., which the Herzbergers attended, and in the afternoon, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. Krishnaji put his hands on the Herzberger child.'

September twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji rested. He did no exercise, but was up for lunch. Krishnaji put his hands on.' I don't know who. 'At 4 p.m., Krishnaji and David had another videotaped discussion with only Dorothy, Saral, the Herzbergers, and I present. In the evening, I had a talk with Dave and Saral about people to talk to Krishnaji in Ojai next spring.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji talked to the entire school. I took Radha, Hans, and Maya to the Winchester coach station, where they went by bus to Oxford. I got back in time for lunch. We walked briefly in the afternoon.'

The next day was just my doing desk work and Krishnaji resting. But on the thirtieth, 'I went on the 9:30 a.m. train to London, where I applied for an absentee ballot at the U.S. embassy, and got visas for Krishnaji and me for Sri Lanka from the high commission. Then I went to John Bell and Croyden for a new electric under-blanket for Krishnaji, and got the 3:50 p.m. train back to Petersfield.'

October first. 'Thames Television came to do an interview with Krishnaji. They also interviewed some students and two staff in the morning, and Krishnaji answering questions in the afternoon. The interviewer's name was Elaine Grand.'

The second. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji talked to staff. Dorothy was not well before lunch, and went to lie down. I went to talk to her afterward at Krishnaji's suggestion. She is deeply discouraged and upset, feeling that she has lost Krishnaji's confidence. Krishnaji and I went together to talk to her, and out of it came a largely new direction for Brockwood: no younger students[7]; more older ones; and the inclusion of any-age serious people. The primary purpose of Brockwood must be the exploration of Krishnaji's teachings. Dorothy changed visibly and came on the walk. Krishnaji is enthused, and me too. He wanted to talk to the staff immediately, but will wait until Saturday.' That was a Thursday.

October third: 'I met Mary Links at the Petersfield train station. She came to talk to Krishnaji about the second volume of the biography, and to spend the night. Krishnaji told her of the new plan for Brockwood. We talked all afternoon, and with Dorothy we walked. I called Mary Cadogan about the new plan, and she is enthused, too.'

The fourth of October. 'Krishnaji, Mary, and I talked all morning about the biography, until Joe arrived for lunch. Krishnaji, Mary, Joe, and I had coffee upstairs, and Krishnaji asked Joe's opinion of the proposed change at Brockwood. Joe suggested Dorothy have sole decision-making in running it. The Linkses left, and on the walk, Krishnaji told

Dorothy he delegates decisions to her under the new plan. He also held a staff meeting at 4 p.m., and told them of the plan, and most are enthusiastic.'

The fifth. 'Krishnaji talked to the school. After the walk in the afternoon, Krishnaji was tired.'

October sixth. 'Krishnaji slept very well: nine hours. Jean-Michel Maroger arrived. At lunch, Krishnaji invited him to be a trustee of the KFT, and Jean-Michel accepted. At 3:45 p.m., Krishnaji held a videotaped discussion with Jean-Louis Dewez. The latter asked questions in French and Krishnaji answered in English. There was a school meeting at 5 p.m., which I felt I needed to attend, so Krishnaji went alone with Whisper for his walk. Gale winds are blowing.'

The seventh. 'It is cold and the wind is continuing. Krishnaji rested in the morning, but dictated letters. In the afternoon, he did another videotaped discussion for France with Jean-Louis Dewez, and also included Jean-Michel and Daphne Maroger, Stephen Smith'—Brockwood's French teacher—'and Didier Bertrande'—a French student. 'Then Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went for a walk. Jean-Michel and Jean-Louis left for France. A Moroccan-French man doing a thesis on Krishnaji arrived.'

October eighth. 'I took the 9:30 a.m. train to London to get our Indian visas, then did various errands, and was back by 5 p.m. Krishnaji had talked with Harsh and later with the Moroccan.'

October ninth. 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, the Moroccan man, and I took the 10:23 a.m. train to London. Joe met us and drove Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me to Huntsman. Dorothy went elsewhere and, after Krishnaji's fitting, Krishnaji and I went on with Joe to his apartment, where he, Mary, Amanda, Krishnaji, and I had lunch. Joe drove Krishnaji to his dentist appointment with Mr. Thompson at 3:30 p.m. I shopped for fruit and cheese on the Marylebone High Street, and got a Braun shaver for Krishnaji. He didn't like it, so it had to be returned. Krishnaji had one small filling. Joe drove us back to Waterloo, where Dorothy met us, and so, back to Brockwood by 6 p.m.'

The tenth. 'In the morning, I went to Alresford on errands. Krishnaji lunched on a tray in bed, resting. It was raining, but we still went for the walk. There was a staff meeting at 5 p.m., but before that, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I talked with Harsh and Claire Tankha about their difficulties for an hour, and Krishnaji went on talking for another hour with them after Dorothy and I had to go to the staff meeting.'

October eleventh. 'Krishnaji rested but came down for a walk and then for a special supper in honor of a young Chinese pianist who played at Brockwood Park eight years ago, and is now a concert pianist. He played for the school in the evening and Krishnaji stayed for the first half. The new electric under-blanket came for Krishnaji's bed.'

S: Yes, perhaps we should just say for the record that the Yehudi Menuhin Music School was not that far from Brockwood. We always had very good relations with them, and often their brilliantly gifted students would come and play at Brockwood.

M: Yes. And eventually, Peter, the man who ran it, came a lot to Brockwood, helping the students with music.

S: He didn't run the school; he ran something like the piano department, and he would come on weekends and teach piano at Brockwood.

M: That's right. And still is doing it to this day.

S: Oh, how wonderful.

M: Yes, at least I saw him here last October.[8]

S: Oh, good. He is a nice man.

M: A very nice man.

October twelfth. 'Krishnaji got up for lunch with the school. There was a conversation at the table after reading a newspaper article on the effects of the A-bomb. "Dreadful," said Krishnaji. The Bohms, Dorothy, and me were half-joking as there seems to be no adequate serious response to such horror. Krishnaji said if he discussed it with a head of government, they would say, "But our neighbor has it." He would say, "Get together and agree." We went for a walk, Krishnaji, Dorothy, the dogs, and me at 4:30 p.m., as it is beginning to get dark early.'

The thirteenth. 'I went early for my typhoid, paratyphoid, and cholera shots at the Alresford Surgery. Krishnaji spent the day in bed until walk time. The Digbys came for lunch, and George gave a talk to the school on silks and rugs.[9] There was a school meeting at 5 p.m. I felt feverish and sore from the shots.'

There was nothing much the next day, just Krishnaji resting and I was working at the desk.

On the fifteenth, 'I went by the 9:23 a.m. train to London, where I went first to fetch my passport and visa from the Indian high commission, then to American Express for more travelers' checks, and bought myself sports shoes for walking in India, and a Water Pik. Fleur lunched with me at Claridge's, and Betsy joined us for coffee. I then did more errands, including picking up the Hillier trousers. I caught the 3:50 p.m. train from Waterloo.'

October sixteenth. 'In the morning, Krishnaji, while remaining in bed, did audiotaped replies to questions submitted by Gary Null of station WBAI in New York for broadcast there. He got up for lunch and later walked with Dorothy and me and the dogs. Krishnaji woke up in the night with some extraordinary feeling in his head, something he said was ecstatic.'

The seventeenth. 'It was rainy and cold. Krishnaji again had strange feelings in the night. In the morning he replied to the rest of the questions on tape for WBAI in New York. He had lunch in bed, but got out for a walk with Dorothy and me. There was a staff meeting.'

October eighteenth. 'It was a cold, clear day. Krishnaji hadn't slept too well, so he stayed in bed until it was time for the walk. He, Dorothy, the dogs, and I went across the fields and up the drive. The dogs found a fox in the wood caught in a wire trap.' Oh, that's that awful thing. 'Dorothy and I rushed back to get Gary or John King. John King came back and released the fox.' I remember that so well. It was a beautiful, beautiful, big, red dog fox and he was being strangled in this awful wire. Krishnaji kept the dogs away, and then when John King came, he sort of straddled the fox and with the wire clipper cut the thing that was strangling it. And then he pulled his hands apart, and the fox was a streak of red and gone. [S laughs.] It was most extraordinary. A beautiful animal. How can they be so brutal?

S: Yes. Oh, they can be.

M: 'My cold is fairly heavy,' it says here. 'Krishnaji and I watched a film on TV of the hijacking of a subway train until almost 11 p.m.'

For the next two days there is really nothing as Krishnaji was mostly resting.

October twenty-first. 'My brother telephoned from New York. He and Lisa go to Bonn Thursday; then he will fly here Sunday, spend the day with me, but go on to Paris in the evening while Lisa goes to Munich and then meets him in Paris. Mary Links sent a draft of a statement on Krishnaji's teaching to me to use in the biography. Krishnaji dictated a different one to me. Krishnaji was up for lunch and talked briefly afterward to an Italian, Mr. Stasi, who lives in South Africa and wants to start a school there. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked with the dogs as usual.'

Again, nothing of note the next day, but on the twenty-third, 'Krishnaji and I to London. Joe met us at Waterloo and dropped us at Huntsman. We chose two tweeds for skirts for me, then we met Mary Links at Fortnum. I gave her the notes for the biography. After lunch, I went for a haircut while Mary walked Krishnaji to Truefitt for his haircut. I went to Culpeper's for more herbs prescribed by Amanda Pallant, and then met Krishnaji at Huntsman and from there we took a taxi back to Waterloo.'

October twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji rested in the morning. I met Mary Cadogan at 10 a.m. at Petersfield. We went over Foundation matters, then the Digbys, the Hammonds, the Linkses, and Sybil Dobinson came at noon. While Joe worked on his own things in the dining room, the rest of us held publication committee meetings both before and after lunch. Krishnaji joined everyone at lunch, and afterward he went for a drive with Joe' [chuckles]. 'It was a lovely autumn day. The Linkses and the rest left, then Krishnaji,

Dorothy, and I went for a short walk. At 6 p.m., I met at Petersfield a Madame Nicole Phillipeau from Grenoble who wrote an excellent letter to Krishnaji, and came to meet him.'

The twenty-fifth. 'At 12 p.m., Krishnaji saw Nicole Phillipeau, and at 4 p.m., he talked to the staff about the new plan to have older students. Radhi and Hans Herzberger are here for the weekend, and they came on the walk.'

The twenty-sixth. 'Summertime ends, so the clock goes back one hour. I left at 7 a.m. and drove to Heathrow. Bud arrived from Bonn at 9 a.m., and we drove back through the rain to Brockwood. We talked on our lunch together, then continued to talk. At 3:30 p.m., I drove him back to Heathrow for a 4:45 p.m. flight to Paris, where he will meet Lisa, who will join him there tomorrow from Germany. I got back to Brockwood after 6 p.m.'

The next three days is more shots for me, packing, telephoning, etcetera.

On the thirtieth, 'I packed and packed. I arranged for Bud's camera, which he accidentally left here, to go to Paris with Pauline d' Egrémont and telephoned him there about it. He and Lisa go back to New York on Sunday. I got everything done before going to bed.'

Now the big diary resumes, so we'll have more details. October thirty-first. 'Krishnaji woke me at 5 a.m. I made our nettle tea, but neither of us felt like food. The bags were all ready by 7 a.m., and the school had formed a circle in the West Wing hall to see Krishnaji off. We left shortly after 7 a.m. with Dorothy; Ingrid and Doris took our seven bags in another car. Krishnaji said, "I got up at 4:30 a.m. and I'm still not ready."' [Both chuckle.] 'All was with a flurry getting off. It was a clear morning with marvelous hoarfrost on the fields and trees. The beauty of this land, the seasons, the northern air was a gift before the heat of India.' I remember that so well because I knew I was going where it would be very hot, and to see the hoarfrost on every little twig and blade of grass made me say to myself, "Remember this when you get where you're going." [S chuckles.]

'We had egg sandwiches while driving and a Cox apple, but after we were in the airport, Krishnaji felt ill with stomach pains. Our flight was delayed, so we sat quietly until he felt better, and was able to get a cart for all of our hand luggage and ride up in a lift with it all. He again sat quietly while I fetched magazines and gradually the pain subsided. We telephoned Mary Links, and Krishnaji said goodbye to her. Our Qantas flight left at 12:30 p.m. instead of 9:30 a.m. We had the forward seats and lots of room with the new "sleeper" seats that pull out. Krishnaji said he woke up at 12:30 a.m., couldn't sleep, got up, looked around, and picked up flies (we've had swarms), got back in bed, and was awake till 2:30 a.m. He had the most extraordinary feelings of "great clarity and don't measure with words." I write this page in the aircraft in Bahrain, where we have had to land. The flight was supposed to be nonstop, but because the flying space is congested due to the Iran-Iraq war, extra fuel was used so we had to stop in Bahrain for fuel. We are due in Bombay at 11:30 p.m., but will be hours late.'

Krishnaji at the gate of the Theosophical Society (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

November first. 'We landed at 4:30 a.m. Asit and Pama had a car right up to the plane. A government man was there to expedite us through the formalities, but only two of our seven bags appeared. There is a strike of luggage handlers, so the other five bags, with everything we need, were not unloaded and went on to Perth, Australia.' [Chuckles.] 'Asit tried to take Krishnaji to the nearby Centaur Hotel where we had rooms, but Krishnaji insisted on returning to the airport until I was through with the luggage formalities. It took two hours to find someone, fill out forms, etc. We all finally went to the hotel. The one bag of mine had an old pajama suit so I showered and put that on.' You know, pants and kurta.

S: Yes, that's the Indian pajamas, which are actually outdoor clothing.

M: Yes. 'Luckily sandals, too.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji's only bag had a Water Pik, cheese, and herbs in it,' [both chuckle] 'but Pama had brought Krishnaji's Indian clothes. Nandini came at 7 a.m., bringing breakfast. Balasundaram turned up unexpectedly. All had breakfast and sat about until 9:30 a.m., when the Indian Airline left at 10:30 a.m. for Madras. Nandini, Krishnaji, Pama, and I flew on. Pupul, Achyut, Radha Burnier, Padma Santhanam, and Jayalakshmi were all at the Madras airport to greet Krishnaji. Sunanda, Prema, and Malini were at Vasanta Vihar. I have my old room, but enter it from the back, as the sitting room is now a separate room and has a bath addition. Pupul and Nandini have that.' [Chuckles.] 'Lunch was in the new dining room built with screens off the kitchen.' Remember that?

S: I remember it well.

M: 'Dr. Parchure was here. Also Rajesh. Parameshwaran was there for cooking. Krishnaji and I had been up for thirty-one hours straight by the end of lunch. But Krishnaji in his Indian clothes, that Pama had brought to the airport, looked young and radiant.' [Both chuckle.] 'He said to me on the plane that when he closes his eyes, the thing he spoke of yesterday, the clarity, is still going on. I bathed then slept in the afternoon. It is hot and moist. The crows and the koels were noisy.' [S chuckles.]

Krishnaji at the Theosophical Headquarters (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

Krishnaji with Radha at her house (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

Sunday the second. 'Everyone breakfasted in the dining room at 8 a.m. Krishnaji put the question: Has the religious mind of India, which is centered in doubt, as different from that of the West, which is founded on faith, been influenced and taken over by the West and hence is disappearing? He strongly said that if it is dead, then something new can be born. In death there is beginning. The evidence of decay is the rising preoccupation with astrology, magic, gurus, etcetera. This went on for two-and-a-half hours. I felt dissolved with the need for more sleep, the heat, and the travel wear and tear. I slept one-and-a-half hours till lunch and again afterward. Radha Burnier and her aunt, Dr. Sivakamu, came in the afternoon, and Krishnaji asked when he should make his walk through the Theosophical Society grounds. Radha said whenever he chose. Krishnaji said tomorrow afternoon and jokingly crossed himself several times.' [Both laugh.] 'It was almost put off, but Pupul wants to be present and she goes back to Delhi after Colombo. Asit telephoned twice during the day but has no news of the missing luggage. Then he rang that it has been found in Perth, but it may not get back to Bombay till Tuesday, in which case I would not leave for Colombo till it arrives. But at 9 p.m., he rang and Pupul came to tell me that the bags are in Bombay and will arrive here tomorrow. Asit must have pulled all strings to get them to return to Bombay on some other airline. Krishnaji has said all along they would be returned. He had sent an angel.' [Both chuckle.] 'The angel must've worked closely with Asit.' [S chuckles.] 'Pupul talked with Sunanda, Nandini, Ahalya, and me about the book she is doing on Krishnaji in India, and told of an incident when Shiva Rao was declared dying by doctors some years ago while Krishnaji was staying in their house. Pupul and others were concerned that Krishnaji should be there, but Krishnaji told her, 'Death will not come while I am in the house.'

Krishnaji at Radha's house on beach (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

November third. 'There was another long talk at breakfast about a possible conference next year in Delhi on the crisis in the human condition. Values were discussed, and Krishnaji said, "I have no values." I see immediately what he means but others argued. At 10 a.m., I went with Prema to try to find a cotton kaftan. Everything was shoddy, but I found one long blouse I can wear with pants. Prema was as kind as ever. She has had a bad year with two deaths in her life. Narayan, whose mother was operated on this morning for a burst appendix, was at lunch, and got a quizzing from Krishnaji and Pupul about the school. At 5 p.m., Radha came with her aunt, Dr. Sivakamu, and Dr. Sivakamu's brother, who wanted to see Krishnaji. Then, we all went to the gates of the TS, where we all got out. A crowd of TS members were waiting, and Krishnaji greeted them with the gesture of namaste. Everyone was smiling. Radha looked very happy. Krishnaji was at his shining handsomest; charming as no one else can be. And so, this first step into the TS for Krishnaji in forty-six years began.' You were there, weren't you?

S: I remember being on what was billed as Krishnaji's first walk through the TS, but I wasn't on this, I don't think, so this is all very confusing for me. You and Krishnaji went onto Colombo, but I didn't go to Colombo, and your diaries haven't mentioned me as being there, so I don't think I was there yet. So, what I'm thinking of must be some other walk.

M: No. You didn't go on to Colombo.

S: But I was there for what I though was the first walk.

M: I know. I remember you and what's his name…on his bicycle.

S: Dick Clarke.

M: Dick Clarke. And it was dark when we got there. We walked in the dark. I remember that.

S: I don't remember the first walk in the TS being in the dark. I guess we'll see, but it's confusing.

M: Alright. 'Krishnaji and Radha strode off at a good clip for this walk through the grounds that he had said he would make if she became president. Dick Clarke, in his nineties, peddled his bicycle behind them with the studious walkers following. Radha pointed out various places as we went along. At her house by the beach, Achyut, Sunanda, Pupul, and Nandini, who went by car, all had fruit juice, and Krishnaji, Radha, Pama, and I walked back to the gate going along the river. Krishnaji told me he recognized nothing, but thought he might recognize the river path where he used to walk as a boy. But when he came to it, he didn't. We stopped by the place where Mrs. Besant was cremated, and then came to what used to be a water tank and has since been embellished. This he remembered a little bit. As we walked by the elephant heads on the main building, he remembered they impressed him when he was very young.' And they would, you know. The very large elephant heads on the outside of the building would be fascinating to anybody, but to a little boy, especially.

'Looking up at his old rooms he said he didn't really remember them. We went into the main hall and he looked about without saying anything. We walked on to the gate. By now it was dark and we waited on a bench for the car to come and take us back to Vasanta Vihar. Krishnaji told me he remembers virtually nothing of it. "It is a dead place," he said. At 9 p.m., Pama and I went with a Qantas man to the Madras airport to retrieve the missing luggage, which Asit had seen to in Bombay. He and Devi Mangaldas'—that's the daughter of Nandini—'arrived on the same plane. Asit had spent six hours in Bombay yesterday getting it unloaded or they might have gone on to London.' [Chuckles.] 'I at last saw the bags, but there was no custom man on duty to clear them, so I couldn't get them. Unless they can be cleared tomorrow morning at 8 a.m., all will be in vain, as I need Krishnaji's passport to clear them, and he needs his passport to go to Colombo on the 9:30 a.m. plane.' [Both chuckle.]

S: A typical Indian situation.

M: [laughs] So that was the third.

S: So we'll stop as we've run out of tape.

Krishnaji at the gate of the Theosophical Society (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

FOOTNOTES:

[1] For the video tape of this first question-and-answer meeting.

[2] For the video tape of this second question-and-answer meeting.

[3] For the video tape of this third question-and-answer meeting.

[4] For the video tape of the second Brockwood talk of that year.

[5] These had previously been called “discussions.”

[6] For the video tape of the third Brockwood talk of that year.

[7] For the first five or ten years of Brockwood, students as young as ten years of age were accepted.

[8] This discussion took place in April of 2005.

[9] He was the curator for textiles at the Victoria and Albert Museum in London, and had a fabulous collection.

Issue 65: November 4, 1980 to December 17, 1980

Krishnaji and Mary are in India in this issue, and Krishnaji makes his first trip to Sri Lanka in fifty years. This trip to India is clearly physically demanding and draining for both Krishnaji and Mary, and Dr. Parchure is worried because Krishnaji is pushing his body beyond its limits.

Mary: We pick our story back up on November fourth, 1980, and we're in Madras. You may remember that we just arrived in India from England, and Qantas, the airline we flew on, had lost our luggage. 'At 8 a.m., I went to the airport with Pama and a Qantas Airlines man. I got the luggage examined and released. There were endless forms to be filled and signed; then, with porters running, we rushed to the departure gate where, at 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji and the rest who were going to Colombo were waiting to board. Dr. Parchure, who forgot he had currency in his luggage, was stopped, fined, and couldn't go on his flight, which was to go ahead with Parameshwaran, so he took two of our bags back to Vasanta Vihar. He will follow with Achyut, Ahalya, and Rajesh on Friday. There was a mob scene getting off. I became a machine of passports, keys, and papers, no longer caring about how I looked. I wore slacks that I flew in from London and the same shirt, fortunately laundered, have washed my hair and brushed it. There is no way to set it, but luckily the short haircut in London makes it not too bad.'

'We, at last, got onto the plane, and in not much over an hour we landed in Colombo. Krishnaji is again a guest of the state. Officials met him; and a minister, Dr. Adikaram, and he were driven into Colombo.' Dr. Adikaram was a nice old man who was the head of the Krishnamurti Center in Sri Lanka, chancellor of the university, and had known Krishnaji forever. 'Pupul, Nandini, and I were in a second car. We are staying at Acland House, a government guest house built by the British. It has large rooms with a dining room sixty feet long' [chuckles]. 'Parameshwaran oversees the food cooking and three young Navy bearers serve. Krishnaji has the largest and best bedroom with hot water and air conditioning. Pupul and Nandini share another room, but have only cold water. I have a small but adequate room, but it has an air conditioner. The weather is very hot and very damp (just as I feared). We are very near the equator' [chuckles]. 'Because it is a government naval place, there are difficulties about others visiting, like the Patwardhans, Asit, and Devi. Devi was told that her mother, Nandini, would have to come downstairs to see her; she can't go up to Nandini's room. Dr. Adikaram is caught in the middle.' I can still see our arrival, because here I was not properly dressed, and of course all the other women were in beautiful saris.

Scott: Yes, and elegant.

M: Exactly, elegant. And the most elegant one of all was Krishnaji in his Indian clothes, and there I was [chuckles] in the slacks that I'd left Brockwood in. And luckily I'd bought that shirt and then, whatever it was, and it was laundered, so I was clean. But I was flanked by beautifully dressed Pupul and Nandini into this government limousine [chuckles].

S: Yes. And here you're frantically looking after passports and bags and things like that and, of course, Nandini and Pupul don't touch a thing.

M: No, they don't do any of that.

S: No. They don't even carry a handbag. I mean, they just have nothing. Somebody else—some underling—is doing all those things. [Laughs.]

M: I remember Nandini had a little bit of trouble leaving India. She had absolutely beautiful, heavy gold bracelets and because they were so large, it was suggested that she was getting gold out of India. And that was a problem in Madras. She said, "These have been on my arm for the last…"—I forget how many years, she'd worn them all her life—she never took them off. And in the end, they looked the other way. [Both laugh.]

'Some bureaucratic knot has occurred as there are many rooms empty here but only four of us can stay. There is a government car for Krishnaji's use, and we drove to a park and walked. I am at last in proper clothes and have the luxury of my toilet article box. Today is Election Day in the U.S.' [Both chuckle.]

November fifth. 'Some TV technician said that Reagan has won by a landslide. All our people were at lunch, and there was a long conversation. Krishnaji later said to me, "You can't have this sort of conversation except in India." I went with Pupul and Nandini, the Patwardhans, Devi, and a Ceylonese lady for a little shopping. Kleenex was the prize' [chuckles]. 'I walked with Krishnaji and Dr. Adikaram in the park. It was very hot. Krishnaji picks up a trail of admirers who march behind him, which he dislikes' [chuckles]. 'The heat bothered me. A cold bath seemed like a life-saving thing. Asit and Devi sat with Krishnaji and me at dinner, and later went out.'

The sixth. 'The newspapers carried confirmation and some details of the Carter defeat by Reagan. McGovern and Birch Bayh are also defeated. Republicans have a majority in the Senate. At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji went with Dr. Adikaram to see Prime Minister R. Premadasa. In India, the prime minister calls on Krishnaji, a religious leader being second to no one.' But we were in another country.

S: A Buddhist country, yes.

M: Yes [chuckles]. 'Krishnaji doesn't consider this, but he felt somewhat uncomfortable there. Meanwhile, Devi, Nandini, Sunanda, Pama, and I went with a friend of Dr. Adikaram to see the Kalema Buddhist temple. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji was interviewed by Minister of State de Alwis for television.'

S: And that was for Colombo TV?

M: Yes. 'At 5:30 p.m., Asit took Krishnaji and me for a walk by the sea. Krishnaji liked it better than the park, which he thinks irritated his eyes. The sea air is better. The air seemed un-refreshing to me; sticky and heavy.'

November seventh. ‘At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held a press conference with about thirty journalists. Asit took photographs and then left for Bombay after talking briefly to me about Narayan in lieu of being able to talk to Krishnaji. After the press conference, Krishnaji talked individually for forty-five minutes to a Dutch journalist, Paul Marynis of NRC Handelsblad. Dr. Parchure, Ahalya, Achyut, and Rajesh arrived from Madras, and are all staying at the Ramakrishna Mission. I walked with Krishnaji by the sea. He told me that he’d had a good meditation in the night.’

The eighth. ‘Dr. Parchure came at 6:30 a.m. and resumed exercises, massage, etcetera for Krishnaji. After breakfast, he also massaged my still swollen foot. I went shopping with Devi, Ahalya, Pupul, and Nandini. Newspapers all carry articles on Krishnaji’s press conference. At 5:30 p.m., Krishnaji gave his first Colombo talk in John De Silva Memorial Hall. The audience was over 3,000 and overflowed the hall. They appeared stunned by the presence of Krishnaji. He came in slowly, resplendent, wearing a dhoti as he does for talks. Quietly climbed onto a settee, sitting cross-legged, putting his watch beside him. He made the namaste hands together greeting to the audience, which had risen in greeting to him. And then he sat for a while in silence. Majestic. Beautiful. Later, Dr. Adikaram said the audience felt overwhelmed as if in the presence of the Buddha. He began to speak very simply, as to an audience that knew nothing of his teaching. There were several interruptions. A man near where Pupul, Nandini, and I sat had an epileptic fit, and Dr. Parchure, also nearby, saw to him. Two men in the audience interrupted to ask what was being done for the sick, and a Buddhist monk wanted to say something. Krishnaji quietly suggested he come to the public discussion on Wednesday, and then continued his talk. Later, he said the lack of light in the hall made him unable to see the audience, except a man in the very front row who kept looking around, not listening. “I was in despair,” said Krishnaji at the dinner table.’ He liked to connect with the audience visually.

S: Yes, yes.

M: November ninth. ‘Krishnaji was disturbed about Rishi Valley and what he is told of Narayan’s shortcomings. Pupul irritated him at the lunch table discussing this. Her aggressive voice and manner and wagging finger.’ She was a great finger-wagger.

S: Yes.

M: ‘She repeats things over and over, and Krishnaji wants to find a solution. He came in later to talk to me about it. I suggested a less heavy-handed approach to Narayan to give him help and not tear him apart. At 5:30 p.m., Krishnaji gave a second Colombo talk on “reading the book which is you.” A very fine one.’

The next day—

S: Can we just stop and talk for a minute about this Narayan situation because, just to be fair, Pupul didn’t want Narayan to begin with.

M: No. No, she didn't.

S: And she pretty much had it in for him and was looking for opportunities to ambush him. And Asit, being her nephew, just joined her in this.

M: Asit was not a person to have liked Narayan.

S: No. No. So I really felt, Narayan was just a sitting target with them waiting for him to make one false step, and when he did, Pupul was just going to be there at his jugular.

M: Exactly. You're quite correct.

S: It was unfair because he was a nice man.

M: Yes. He was a nice man.

S: Anyway, go on. The next day, the tenth.

M: So, to continue, November tenth. 'At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with about sixty invited people. And at 4 p.m., another one with thirty Buddhist monks. The latter were dull and immature in Krishnaji's view, though he was very patient with them. Afterward, he and I walked by the sea and were able to get TIME and Newsweek at Galle Face Hotel.' Galle Face is a place, slightly, if I remember, south of Colombo.

The eleventh. 'Pupul, Ahalya, and I left at 7:30 a.m. in an air-conditioned car that I hired' [chuckles] 'and drove to Kandy about three hours away. We visited the Peradeniya Gardens. There were marvelous orchids and trees from all over Asia, one of which was a 100-year-old great, spreading tent of a tree like a geodesic dome as big as an aircraft hangar in the middle of a field. I wanted to go under and inside it and found, to my amazement, it was a Ficus benjamina, the houseplant of California.'

S: Right, just a little houseplant [laughs].

M: Yes, which is like these ficus trees you see out the window. And then at that point in my life I thought of Ficus benjamina as something you'd put on a table.

S: Exactly, yes.

M: 'Driving there and back I saw five elephants. One was being scrubbed by four men in a muddy river and two were obviously walking home after their bath.' [Both chuckle.] The air conditioning made the trip possible for me. For the first time here, I was cool most of the day. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji went with Dr. Adikaram to meet the president of Sri Lanka, a Mr. Jayawardene, who had invited him. He spent one-and-a-half hours talking to him. In the evening, Pupul, Nandini, and I watched the television broadcast of the interview between Krishnaji and the minister of state done here last Thursday.'

November twelfth. ‘After breakfast, Krishnaji talked to KFI people including Narayan, Rajesh, and a new doctor couple who are at Rajghat about the responsibility to people like them who have come for the teachings and not to work at schools, etcetera. Afterward, I went with Pupul, Nandini, Devi, and Rajesh to the Colombo Museum and to a tourist shop. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a public discussion at the university of which Dr. Adikaram is the chancellor. The hall was jammed with over 4,000 people. Krishnaji took spoken questions from an audience for one-and-a-half hours. Then, he and I left and drove to Galle Face Hotel, where we walked in the dark and rain along the sea walls. In the evening, Pupul asked Krishnaji how much his early life had influenced him. He replied, “Scarcely at all,” and went on to say that most change in him came about after he had left Rajagopal.

Editor’s Note: This is perhaps the greatest statement of praise that could be made of Mary, because Krishnaji could not have left Rajagopal without Mary’s support, and the court case that recovered Krishnaji’s copyright and the land and Pine Cottage in Ojai could not have occurred without Mary’s support.

Pupul talked about the book she is writing on Krishnaji in India. Krishnaji suggested she share chronology dates with Mary Links. At first, Pupul was reluctant, but later, when she realized she needed Western dates, she said they could exchange.’ [S chuckles.] ‘She said she was not going to answer so many of Mary’s questions about Rajagopal having taken all the contents, including silver, at Vasanta Vihar.[1] I was able to get her to look up whether Rajagopal was in India in November 1957 when, if I remember correctly, Krishnaji was bullied into signing over his copyright to KWINC. Mary Lutyens has no record of Rajagopal in India then. But Pupul says he was, and left Delhi in January 1958. He has not been back since.’

November thirteenth. ‘Krishnaji was to rest, but talked much of the morning. I went shopping with Nandini, Devi, and Ahalya. It was very hot. Pupul left for Delhi. Nandini, Mr. Ranganathan, and I walked with Krishnaji by the sea.’

The fourteenth. ‘I had a long talk with Dr. Parchure about Krishnaji’s disregard for his bodily health. His brain is full of energy but his body is tired. The swelling in his feet has not gone down. Parchure feels he should have adjusted to the heat by now, and wants him to have a cardiogram in Madras. He asked Krishnaji where is his “intelligence of the body that he speaks of? Either it doesn’t exist or Krishnaji is ignoring it. The body is dragging with fatigue, though the mind is very alert.” I asked how I can constructively back up Parchure’s suggestions to Krishnaji. Krishnaji feels I get emotional, and so discounts what I say. This makes for only partial frankness. If this is so, as it apparently is, I must quietly be rational in talking to him, no matter what I feel. Krishnaji is presently irrational about his own health and capabilities. It is as if his mind is given greater energy, which he regards as given for the purpose of his work, and he expects his body to do more than it should. I have to learn to act differently with him, offer only what will effectively reach his mind, watch carefully my reactions, and how I express things to him. It will take great care.’

‘Instead of resting this morning, he talked to Narayan, Sunanda, Pama, Achyut, Dr. Parchure, and me about Rishi Valley, the need for new teachers with a “global outlook.” Out of this came an idea for a center, but not at any of the schools, for people who come only for the teachings. And Krishnaji spoke of this leading to a “Renaissance.” He asked what I thought, and I said I doubted that people once said, “Let us make a Renaissance.” They simply did what they saw needed doing and then later it was called that. We must see what is needed now and do it. “Let’s do it,” he said. At 4 p.m., there was a tea for all members and helpers of the Krishnamurti Center in Sri Lanka who have done so much to arrange for Krishnaji’s visit. Krishnaji attended for an hour. Then he briefly saw the minister of education. Krishnaji, Nandini, and I, taking along Mr. Weeraperuna, went for a walk by the sea on the Galle Face green.’

November fifteenth. ‘Sunanda and Pama flew back to Madras. For most of the day, I stayed in my room doing letters and working on the chronology for Mary L. Krishnaji gave his third Colombo talk at 5:30. A very fine one on pleasure, desire, life, death. Dr. Adikaram, who was bitten by a dog several days ago, didn’t come to fetch Krishnaji. Another talkative man escorted Krishnaji and bothered him with questions. After supper with Nandini and me, he watched a TV English drama and looked very tired.’

The sixteenth of November: ‘Krishnaji rested as much as possible. I worked on the chronology for Mary, reviewing 1967, that astonishing and blessed year, especially May in Holland in the thatched farmhouse.’ That was a lovely, lovely farmhouse with thatch on the roof, and the Bois Boulogne house in Paris, and June in Gstaad. At 5:30 p.m., Krishnaji gave a fourth and last Colombo talk. I came back with him and Dr. Adikaram. Krishnaji and I dined alone as Nandini went somewhere with Devi and others. After a talk the Buddha only might have made, Krishnaji watched an old Perry Mason episode on TV, which relaxed him and he went to bed at nine.’ [Both chuckle.]

The next day, ‘several government ministers came to lunch. Krishnaji, Nandini, Devi, and I walked at the Galle Face Green in the late afternoon. I packed.’

The eighteenth of November: ‘After an early lunch at Acland House and a formal distribution of envelopes with tips to the staff of nine, we left. Krishnaji was driven to the airport by the minister of state, while another government car followed with Nandini, Devi, Mrs. Nataraj, and me.’ Mr. Nataraj is a nice man from Colombo who worked at Vasanta Vihar.

S: I remember him, yes.

M: ‘We then all sat in a special lounge, with various ministers making conversation with Krishnaji, and all the Sri Lanka Krishnamurti group sitting silently, staring at him. We were driven from the lounge to the aircraft stairs in the car of the Indian high commissioner, who was on the same flight. At last we left, and my spirits rose with the plane. Sri Lanka has much good, but not for me’ [both chuckle]. ‘The ringing wet heat is such that I’m physically struggling with it all the time, and there is little beauty to be seen except in the vegetation. I was delighted to leave the whole place. Dr. Adikaram is a rather touching little old man with some sense of what Krishnaji is about and says. But others in his group, though helpful, and endlessly kind to all of us, are nevertheless a very ordinary group. In Madras, it was arranged for Krishnaji to sail through immigration and customs, but he insisted on standing with me until all our four bags appeared. One was almost lost, but when it was recovered, we then went swiftly in Mrs. Santhanam's car and were away. Krishnaji stared at the crowds of people on the roads. "India, I'm afraid, is hopeless," he said. At Vasanta Vihar, there was Jayalakshmi with two large, black granite nandis she has had sculpted for the Ojai house. They are plump and quite engaging. Krishnaji is delighted with them. He petted them. She said she could have priests come and do something traditional to consecrate them. They are to guard the house.' If you look out the window, you can see one of them.

Krishnaji having fun with all his garlands and the Nandis he received (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Yes [chuckles]. They're still on guard.

M: 'How they will get from the veranda here to the patio in Ojai is an interesting problem; presumably, it will be done. Theo and Alan Hooker, who were due to arrive here, have not turned up. It was slightly cooler at Vasanta Vihar, and I feel better being here.' [Both chuckle.]

The nineteenth: 'Theo and Alan Hooker turned up in a taxi as we were finishing breakfast. They had been stuck in Bahrain. In the morning, Nandini, Devi, and I went with Prema to shop. I got two cottons for sari blouses and a sample for Krishnaji for underclothes. In the afternoon, the tailor came to measure; also a cobbler came to copy sandals. I went with Krishnaji and Radha to her house in the TS and from there walked on the beach. Pama went to invite Rukmini Arundale on Krishnaji's behalf to lunch tomorrow or Friday. She said she had to consult her diary and would let him know.' [Both chuckle.] Oh dear, dear, dear.

S: But she never showed up, did she?

M: No. She didn't. [Both chuckle.] As I recall. I don't remember.

S: I didn't think she did.

M: The next day, 'Radha came and sat with us at breakfast. She says her aunt Rukmini Arundale is afraid of Krishnaji.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji said, "She is? Good. I will exploit that," with a look of glee on his face.' [Both chuckle.]

S: Which, of course, he would never have done.

M: No [S laughs], but his attitude was…

S: I know, I know.

M: 'Later, a message came. Rukmini Arundale had consulted her diary and cannot come for lunch. She has no free time. Kindly tell Krishnaji. End of subject. Sunanda will not invite her again. In the morning, Devi left for home. Nandini, Ahalya, and I went to the bank to cash travelers' checks and to Spencer's.' That's the name of that store I was trying to remember.

S: Oh, yes. That funny little department store.

M: Yes, kind of a department store. It was a very important store in Madras.

S: It was the only place you could get all kinds of Western things.

M: Yes, that's right.

S: And it was a fun little hangover from English colonialism. I can remember the first time I went into Spencer's, they were playing canned music. Obviously it was around Christmas time, and the music they were playing was, "I'm Dreaming of a White Christmas"—in Madras! [Both laugh.] It has never snowed there, probably not even during the Ice Age.

M: Oh, that's funny. [Both laugh.] Well, anyway, 'we went to Spencer's and then to a bookstore. In the afternoon, Nandini and I went with Prema to a warehouse of Pupul's firm, and to Radha Silks'—that's a good store—'where I got two-by-two thin cotton…' Two-by-two has something to do with the weight, I think, wasn't it?

S: No, I think it's the weave of it.

M: The weave of it. I've forgotten all that.

S: Yes.

M: '…two-by-two cotton for three more kurtas. Krishnaji had gone with Radha and Achyut for a walk by the time I got back. Alan Hooker said he felt, and Dorothy concurred, when he paused en route at Brockwood from California, that Mark should come to the teacher meetings at Rishi Valley. Krishnaji agreed. Alan said he would anonymously pay for one ticket for Mark, but not for Asha and child. In the evening, Theo, Sunanda, and Pama telephoned first to Erna for her opinion—a yes—and then to Mark. He will come as soon as he can. Yesterday, Dr. Parchure was concerned about the swelling in Krishnaji's feet not going down. To rule out causes like heart, kidneys, etcetera another doctor came and gave a cardiogram and relevant samples have been sent to a lab. As his heart is fine, the new doctor could not account for the swelling. So Dr. P. did simple remedies. In the afternoon, his legs were packed in cold mud and then his feet were put in cold water. Then pressure bandages were wound round and he went for his walk. The swelling subsided.' [Both chuckle.]

The next day it just says, 'Packed. Jayalakshmi at lunch said that the nandis are to be shipped to Ojai.' [Chuckles.]

November twenty-second: 'A hot night. I awoke at 2 a.m., got up at 3, and at 4:15 a.m. Krishnaji, Nandini, Dr. Parchure, and I left Vasanta Vihar in the Santhanams' car, with all the luggage in the trunk and on a roof rack. Krishnaji sat in front with the driver, alert, watching every move all the way. Nandini and I dozed. The headlights, blaring horns, and diesel fumes make it a tortuous drive. Huge silent carts of hay pulled by patient diminutive bullocks loom in ghostly slow ways in the night. We reached Rishi Valley at 9:15 a.m. All of the school stood in a circle by the old guest house to greet Krishnaji. The rest of us were given bouquets. It was nice to see the changes upstairs. The suggestions I made two years ago had turned out well. The large end of the room is a fine bedroom for Krishnaji.' He was sleeping in that little tiny miserable one.

S: Yes, that tiny dark back room. I remember.

M: 'His old little room is now his dressing room. And the middle room has been changed to include the balconies at either side, giving an airy, much more pleasing room for meetings. I am in my old room downstairs, repainted with small attentions to make it nicer, all seen to by Usha Goenka. Her two sons are in the school here, and she lives in the Moorheads' old house, working in the rural school, and seeing to a proper diet in the school's food, better arrangements for guests, etcetera. We had breakfast. I unpacked and settled my things. Asit arrived from Bombay with his two daughters to start their term. He is staying here for ten days. At 5:30 p.m., Krishnaji, Narayan, and I walked to the school gate and west toward Rishi Konda and back across the fields and past the banyan tree. The valley is greener, though only medium rains have fallen this year. So many trees have been planted, and the ones we planted two years ago are growing. The strangely rocked hills seem to sleep. The urgency of Krishnaji's planting, his enthusiasm, has made this place blessed and beautiful. He was persuaded by Dr. Parchure and me to have his supper in bed. Nandini and I went to the outdoor supper in the full moon. We ate with Mrs. Parchure, and after we went to where the whole school watched old Laurel and Hardy movies.' [Both chuckle.] 'Avalanches of laughter resounded in the valley.' That was nice, I'd forgotten that.

S: I had too. They played those old comedies often on weekends.

M: November twenty-third. 'Krishnaji said he woke at 1 a.m. with something happening in the top of his head. It had to do with Rishi Konda.' And I have in parentheses: '(the mountain west of Rishi Valley, a sacred something about it). After breakfast, Krishnaji talked to Asit a bit and then called me to join in. Then he spoke with Narayan about Usha and their relationship. Did they wish to marry? No. Then it was a private matter between them but they must undo the gossip that has sprung up. It is up to them to figure out how. They both seemed happy that Krishnaji had not been drastic. All this took the morning. After 5 p.m., Krishnaji, Naidu, Narayan, Nandini, and I walked all over the westernmost thirty acres, where Naidu has just planted a thousand more mango trees. We saw trays of silkworms devouring mulberry leaves. Little white worms smaller than a cigarette. They do this nonstop for five days and then spin their cocoons. Then a man brings them disaster.' [S chuckles.]

S: We should just say here something that again pertains to Narayan. Narayan's relationship with Usha was what Pupul was using to attack him.

M: Funnily, I don't remember Usha.

S: I do, and I knew that's what this was going to be about when you first started talking about her a minute ago. Pupul was insisting that Narayan's and Usha's relationship was bringing the school into disrepute, and that it was undermining the moral development of the students. But no one knew about this relationship until they were told by trustees about it. It was ridiculous. She was a nice woman. But eventually so much trouble was caused that she, I think, had to go.

M: Oh, dear.

S: I know. It was terrible.

M: For some reason, I don't remember her. But I could tell from what I wrote that she had done all these good things. That she was a nice person, and I obviously liked her.

S: Yes, she was a nice person.

M: The twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji held a long talk over the breakfast table over the structure of the school. Asit was pointing out errors and Narayan was being defensive. As a result, Narayan, Asit, and Mr. Vethakan (now an administrator here) met the accountant and revised the system so that monthly accounts are presented. After lunch, Krishnaji talked with Mrs. Thomas and her husband about her becoming headmistress. She asked for twenty-four hours to think it over. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji talked to Rajesh, and offered him a job of running the junior school and being on the committee of three with Narayan and Mrs. Thomas to run the school. Krishnaji was tired, but had galloped through changes he wished to make. He, Nandini, Rajesh, and I took a late walk. Later, Asit spent two hours in the evening talking to Mr. and Mrs. Thomas about the school and expressing much criticism.'

November twenty-fifth: 'Sunanda, Pama, Achyut, and Ahalya arrived from Madras. Pupul telephoned Sunanda that Mrs. Gandhi is coming here to see Krishnaji on December twentieth. Nandini and I visited the art department of the junior school in the morning. Nari Gandhi'—that's the architect—'Theo, and Alan Hooker were at lunch. Nandini and I called on Mrs. Parchure. Asit reported his conversation with Mr. and Mrs. Thomas to Krishnaji, and Krishnaji sent for me. Krishnaji is disturbed by the reported lack of discipline in the school, and the cynicism said to exist among the older boys, one of whom was heard to say'—I was the one who heard it—'"Heil Hitler" when Krishnaji arrived. Krishnaji was shocked by this, feels great blame is attached to Narayan, and is going to call him to account tomorrow, but feels sad for him and wants him to succeed. The tension over all this has upset Krishnaji's stomach. Though it was almost dark, Krishnaji, Asit, Nandini, and I walked down to the gate.'

The twenty-sixth: 'After breakfast, Krishnaji had Narayan, Asit, and me in for a two-and-a-half hour discussion. Asit, who had cross-checked all his facts, laid them out without emotion for Narayan to answer. Narayan accepted all suggestions. Krishnaji slept two hours in the afternoon and went for only a very short walk.'

The next day: 'It is Thanksgiving Day in the U.S. Krishnaji talked alone with the two senior classes of students, and in the afternoon held discussions with trustees and some of the teachers. We walked to the bridge as it was getting dark. I finished the chronology of 1967 for Mary L. and posted it to her.'

November twenty-eighth: 'Krishnaji talked at breakfast about vision, what it is, and the need for it in the school. Then he rested for most of the day. Nandini and I went with Usha Goenka to visit the rural school. In the afternoon, Usha came to talk to me about her position in Rishi Valley, and I gave her cautionary advice. There was a walk with Krishnaji and Narayan up the hill behind the playing fields, where the government has planted eucalyptus trees.'

The twenty-ninth. 'Perhaps a corner was turned today. Narayan was not defensive when Krishnaji questioned the fitness and his friend's, Mr. Vethakan's, use at Rishi Valley. When Krishnaji went to have his hair cut, Narayan spoke very openly and well to the rest of us at the breakfast table on school matters. Later, he and KFI members held a long meeting on the school finances and structure. I walked with Krishnaji and Theo. In the evening, Asit, who had talked at length with Usha, told Krishnaji he now feels very well about everything. Krishnaji was amazed and smiling, laughing at the turn in Narayan's personal life. I suggested, as a turn away from all this pressure on Narayan, that tomorrow in front of us all, that Krishnaji tell Narayan that he is the person who can do the most essential and creative things in these schools, which is to talk about the teachings, and that Narayan should concentrate on this.' Golly, what goings-on it was.

November thirtieth. 'There was a meeting in the morning where Krishnaji set forth the new structure of the school. Mrs. Thomas is headmistress, Venkataraman heads the senior school, Rajesh heads the junior school. Narayan remains principal and is part of the group that runs the school. The group is Narayan, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas, Venkataraman, Rajesh, and a financial administrator to be found by Asit. Krishnaji enlarged on Narayan's special responsibilities beyond principalship, which are to see that Krishnaji's teachings are understood in the school and are a part of it. In the afternoon, Krishnaji held a small group discussion. Mark Lee arrived in the evening from Ojai. He brought Asha and the daughter Nandini, but only as far as Delhi.'

December first. 'Mark came to breakfast. At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the first teachers' meeting. Most of the Bangalore and Madras teachers have come for these meetings; closing their schools for a week to do so. After the meeting, Theo read to Krishnaji and me a letter brought by Mark from Erna. It said that at Stanley Cohen's office, she had signed legal papers starting legal actions against Rajagopal. We are now committed to another legal fray. Theo was in tears toward the end of Erna's letter because of her being alone to face all this. He wants to leave immediately and go back to Ojai. Krishnaji asked if I should go, too. It was decided to wait two days, and then Theo would decide about his own leaving to support Erna. When Theo left, Krishnaji asked me if this is going to lead to a serious battle. I said it could and it should be realized that he may be subpoenaed, etcetera. "I'll go at it," he said. "I am much stronger and more able than I was ten years ago." The compelling factor, according to our lawyer Cohen, is that if we do not act now, we will let go by default what we won in the earlier case. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a private discussion with trustees and a few teachers on the topic he and Asit had been discussing on and off since Ojai: What is intelligence? How does a human brain differ from a computer? Toward the end, Krishnaji spoke of the perception of beauty that is beyond and not related to taste, aesthetics, etcetera. Then we walked. In the evening, Pupul and Achyut arrived. Pupul is full of plans for Mrs. Gandhi's visit here on the twentieth. This evening, I went with Nandini, Asit, Sunanda, and Pama to dine at Usha's. She lives in the old Moorhead house. Radha Burnier is in Rishi Valley, too.'

The second of December: 'Pupul was brought up-to-date at breakfast by Krishnaji, Asit, etcetera. At 4 p.m., there was another private discussion, but too many people slowed it down. Krishnaji, Radha, Asit, and I walked. At breakfast, Krishnaji said, "Ugliness is darkness." Pupul spoke of gurus, and said that Krishnaji was essentially a guru. Krishnaji spoke of light, and he disagreed. "There is only light. You don't say, 'I have come to light. I am that light.' There is light. This has deeper significance; that other is too childish," he said. "After all, goodness is that: to have total light. I think that is logical, sense. But gurus in the usual sense is leading you to light."…"Light is compassion. See the difference. Jesus is supposed to have said, 'I am the light.'"…"I shrink from that," said Krishnaji. He then went on to ask how Rishi Valley can be made beautiful. Ugliness is darkness, and here they don't see that. At 4 p.m., there was another small group discussion, which was held back by too many people. The walk was with Krishnaji, Radha Burnier, Asit, and me.' All these quotes within quotes must be awfully hard to transcribe, I'm sorry.

S: That's alright. It is hard, but that's alright. We have a very brave transcriber.

M: The third. 'I went to what the school calls "a chanting assembly."' The whole school chants. 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a second teachers' discussion on what is learning. At 4 p.m., I went with Krishnaji to a recital in the assembly hall of North Indian singing by Pandit Jasraj. He teaches Usha. He sang marvelously. At 5:30 p.m., Krishnaji excused himself, and he, Asit, Radha B., and I went for a walk. On our return in the dark, we stopped outside the hall, listened to the continued singing, and finally Krishnaji went in and sat in front until the end of the recital, which was after 8 o'clock. I had supper upstairs with him. He told me "that face" has been with him for four days. Whenever he closes his eyes, it is there; and with his eyes open, he sees it in his room. On the walk, he wanted to stop, close his eyes and look at it. During the music, it was not there.' You know this, "the face."

S: Yes, "the face," yes.

M: 'He also showed me a small gold locket with JK engraved on it and a photograph of him when he was very young. He had me open it very carefully, and inside there were tiny jewels, the jewels that are in Pine Cottage. I made a necklace of thread so that he could wear it next to his skin for a couple of days. He had told Radha about the bad atmosphere in Adyar. She got the jewels and gave them in the locket to him, and when he returns them in their locket to her, they will go into the northeast corner of the main hall at Adyar.'

December fourth. 'It rained gently all day. It was much needed. At 9:30 a.m., the small group discussion resumed on the difference between the computer and the human brain and what is intelligence. Krishnaji took it inevitably to the teachings and to a possible technological takeover of most functions, to genetic and biochemical maneuverings that will control man, and offer him an infinite state of pleasure and hence a deterioration of the brain through lack of use. Carrying this to its logical extreme, man will be destroyed by his technology. Krishnaji then said that all this is within the field of the known. All the computer, technology, and all human thinking. Only the unknown is outside of this. He stopped there for today, but for me the implications were enormous. Man remaining in the known will be destroyed. But unlike the computer, does not man have the ability to move into the unknown where thought is not? And is this not the central function of man? It was an absorbing discussion, a momentous one.'

'Parchure came afterward to do my foot and said that Krishnaji is now too tired to do any exercise in the mornings, but will not hear of cutting down his activities. He is forcing his body to keep up with his mind, but at what cost? At 4 p.m., Krishnaji talked again, this time to the Bangalore school people, shaking them up, and taking the arrogance out of some. Why must he have to do this? When at 6 p.m. it was over, in the dark rain, he wanted to walk, so we sloshed down to the gate and back. I had supper alone with him upstairs.'

December fifth: 'At 9:30 a.m., there was a teachers' discussion on beauty, taste, etcetera. Krishnaji's voice toward the end was deep, quiet, and filled with otherness. It rained at walk time, but we went anyway.'

The next day: 'At breakfast were Krishnaji, Pupul, Nandini, Achyut, Sunanda, Asit, and me. Krishnaji talked of the need for a sense of sacredness, which he feels in Rishi Valley is being nurtured. Narayan came in and sat during the whole discussion, which lasted till 12:40 p.m. Krishnaji told of the jewels put in the Ojai house and the atmosphere there. He told too of his having worn them for Radha this week so that she can place them in Adyar. Pupul said similarly they had been placed in the assembly hall here. "Then why are they not working?" Krishnaji asked. He felt it has been spoiled by activities—by playing drums, etcetera, and that Visalakshi'—that was Balasundaram's wife—'had practiced black arts there. Something sacred must be respected, not begged for help. Then it can act. They talked of putting jewels somewhere else—at astachal'—that's, you know, where…

S: Yes, where the school goes to watch the sunset.

M: Yes. 'Asit then asked if this sacredness, which can be given to stones, could be given to a living thing, a tree. And if a tree, why not a person? "I think so," said Krishnaji. He said he was not positive, but it might. There was much discussion of this. Pupul recorded part of it on a cassette and Sunanda made shorthand notes and will give the transcription to each of us present.' Did we get a copy?

S: Yes. It's in the archives list.

M: I don't remember getting a transcript.

S: Well, you might not have gotten one. It's on the archives list, so the archives has a copy.

M: Good. 'Krishnaji described the time he had pain and had me place my hands on his head while he placed his hand on mine. He also spoke of liking to stay here in Rishi Valley, that he couldn't, but would like to. All of them were for this. I listened without reaction, though my own feelings are very different. Krishnaji spoke of energy which, at one level, is in both the good and the bad, but beyond is the unlimited energy, which is the source of everything—the universal energy and beyond good and bad.'

December seventh: 'Krishnaji says he thought over in the night what he had said yesterday and it is not possible: A human being is different from a jewel. He said this briefly en passant. When I asked him later what had made him change his mind, he said, "It is obvious: Human beings are too corrupt to receive it. And if they are not, then they have no need of blessing. They have it already." A sequel to that tape needs to be made.

If not amended, it can cause much misconception. In the morning, he held a last teachers' discussion. Most of them left after lunch. Theo went to Bangalore with the Bangalore group in their van. He wants to telephone Erna from there. He has been unable to get through from here. Ahalya left for Rajghat. Krishnaji and I walked in the late afternoon. Nandini came a little way, but was tired.'

The eighth: 'Nandini and Asit left early for Bombay. Krishnaji spent all day resting in bed and had meals on a tray. I ate in the dining hall. Sunanda and Pama left for Madras. Around 6:30 p.m., a message came that Mrs. Simmons was telephoning Krishnaji, and would he telephone Brockwood Park? This surprised and worried him, as Dorothy knows Krishnaji never takes calls. Narayan took me to his house and at 6:45 p.m., put the call into the operator to make the call to England. He had supper brought to me while we waited. Meanwhile, a Kathakali dance group from Kerala, sent by Jayalakshmi, gave a performance under the banyan tree. It took so long to get a connection to England that I joined Krishnaji and everyone there for part of the dance performance. There were extraordinary costumes and makeup. I used the Nikon F3 to photograph it, then went back and waited, but the call couldn't go through. Krishnaji came there and waited with me until 11:45 p.m., but finally we gave up. He must have been upset by it, for he was awake all night.' Oh, lord.

December ninth: 'Krishnaji was awake until 5 a.m. Being up late, and the phone call disturbed him. The call to Brockwood was put in again in the morning. It was after 3 p.m. when the connection was finally made and I spoke to Dorothy. It was a very poor connection. I could barely make out what she was saying, but she was asking Krishnaji to cable Frances McCann the following: "Please leave Brockwood immediately until everyone feels you are fully recovered. Be guided by Mrs. Simmons." Krishnaji okayed the cable, and it was sent immediately, double express. Krishnaji spent the whole day in bed resting and catching up on sleep.' Frances had had a mental breakdown.

S: Yes. It's astonishing she wasn't in India. She normally went to India.

M: Well, at some point, given her increasing frailty, Krishnaji had told her that she shouldn't go to India, that it was bad for her, that India made her worse. I don't remember when that was, but I know that he said it to her.

S: Right, right.

M: December tenth. 'Krishnaji slept well. In the morning, he called Narayan and me and began by telling Narayan of his affection for him. "I have known you for thirty years. You are not my relative, I have no relatives,[2] but I have affection for you." Narayan seemed moved by this and was able to talk to Krishnaji without the nervousness he said he has always had in the past in talking to Krishnaji. The situation with Usha was gone into and later Narayan went to fetch her to join in the discussion. Afterward, she talked again to me alone. It went smoothly, perhaps too smoothly. Does she really want to live and work in Rishi Valley? I hope so. After lunch, Krishnaji told me of the curious occurrence when he lay down to rest: "There was a sudden sense of power." I asked if it were different from the energy that he had felt so strongly here last year. "That was energy, this was power; and I said, 'Be careful, watch it—it can be dangerous.' I looked at it very carefully." Krishnaji, Pupul, Narayan, Achyut, and I walked over the proposed route for Krishnaji to walk with Mrs. Gandhi on the twentieth. Security necessities are an issue.'

December eleventh. 'Pupul left early for Delhi. At 10 a.m., Krishnaji spoke to the school. The children, who were silent at first, then became responsive. On the walk, I asked Krishnaji if the sense of power was still there. He said it was, but he is very careful about it.'

The next day, it just says that Krishnaji rested and that Theo returned from Bangalore.

December thirteenth. 'In the morning, Krishnaji talked to the school about robot technology, which was just reported at length in TIME magazine, and what it will mean in their lives. Dorothy, Mary C., and Scott Forbes arrived via Bangalore from London.'

S: Yes, I knew I wasn't at that first walk of Krishnaji's through the TS that you talked about before. But then he must have had another "ceremonial" walk or something like that, because I was there. I remember it, you know, Dick Clarke on the bicycle and the whole thing.

M: I know you were there.

S: Also, I remember Usha and all the difficulty made about her and Narayan.

M: So you came to Rishi Valley on the thirteenth.

S: I guess so. I was also there when Indira Gandhi came, and I remember meeting her and Rajiv.

M: Yes, we're coming to that. 'Dorothy told Krishnaji and me of Frances's deterioration, which necessitated the cable from him—which was just two days before. 'She was talking of black magic, brushing imaginary toads off people's shoulders, lying down in the halls, and refusing to leave Brockwood. Krishnaji's cable was effective, and she has gone to stay with the Carneses in Yorkshire. This is hardly a solution, but it enabled Dorothy to leave yesterday. Frances refuses to go to her sister's, who was informed, but is hostile to all of us. Dorothy and Mary are in the back rooms here in the old guest house. Krishnaji took them, Mark, Theo, and Hooker for a walk, ending up at 6 p.m. at the assembly where there was a very boring performance by the rural school children.'

S: It was the Carneses, Esme and George Carnes, staff members at Brockwood, who Frances went to stay with.

M: Yes.

The fourteenth: ‘It was a quiet day on the whole.’ [Chuckles.] ‘At 4 p.m., Krishnaji called the Rishi Valley committee, i.e., Narayan, Mrs. Thomas, Mr. Thomas, Venkataraman, Rajesh, plus Achyut and me, to discuss school affairs.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji spoke to the school. At 3 p.m., I met with U.S., English, and Canadian trustees to talk over things. Krishnaji and most guests walked to the rural school to see the crafts the children had made, and then we went on with a walk.’

December sixteenth: ‘In the morning, Krishnaji spoke to the upper two classes. At 3 p.m., I went to another meeting with Dorothy, Mary C., the Siddoos, Theo, Hooker, Scott, and Mark. We finally went into and settled the question Scott has posed about an international endowment fund. Most think it is too cumbersome and feasible in only a few countries, and the American trustees feel the KFA would be affected adversely. In the end, it was agreed that Mary Cadogan suggest that committees inquire if they can get tax-exempt status for donations in their countries and thereby be able to make contributions to the schools. These get-togethers and discussions amongst ourselves have made a good ambience. Krishnaji walked with Asit and me. Dr. Parchure feared Krishnaji was catching a cold, but Krishnaji wanted to walk. We went on the path he may or may not use with Mrs. Gandhi. It has been nicely prepared by government people, but both her security and some of us would prefer there would be no such walk. In the evening, Krishnaji said to me, “Love has no death,” and that he must go into that.’

December seventeenth: ‘At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji spoke to the school. It was a very lively meeting. I had lunch in the guest dining room, then went in the van with Mark, Dorothy, Mary C., the Siddoos, Scott, and Hooker to Madanapalle to see the house where Krishnaji was born. Mr. Joythi, who runs a yardage store nearby, had the key because he said he was buying the house to keep until the Foundation bought it, and he took us there. This time I saw what Pupul had described as the puja room where his mother chose to give birth to Krishnaji.’ That turned out to be untrue, you know.

S: Yes, I know. [Chuckles.]

M: ‘It is a tiny room about six feet across. Today it is used to store wood and the door opens onto the street. In those days, there was a door into the interior of the house, the front room, but this appears to have been walled off. We had to step into it one by one, so small is it, and crowded with debris. It is hard to put that house and that distant day into any context with Krishnaji. There was such a strange feeling to go through the whole house, climbing up to the uppermost roof. Some women sat on the floor, on the ground floor, and smiled back when I greeted and thanked them. The floor above is called a tutorial school. The walls are solid, with heavy plaster, thick, like the older houses here. The floor is cement. It cannot have changed, except in details, since Krishnaji’s childhood. According to Mary’s book, he lived there until he was about eighteen months old, when the family moved to Cuddapah, where Krishnaji nearly died of malaria. Later, in 1907, the father brought his family back to Madanapalle, and Krishna and Nitya went to school there until the father retired in 1909 and went to Adyar. The house is on a side street, has open drains along the base of the buildings. Nearby, we went to Mr. Joythi’s store and bought Kerala towels, refusing offers of tea, and a "lady's convenience"' [both M and S chuckle]. 'Later, the same group and Theo drove in the van to Horsley Hills. On our return, Sunanda, Pama, and Merali had arrived from Madras.'

S: We should just say something about Horsley Hills because that was a special school.

M: It still exists.

S: Yes, it probably does. It was started by an Englishman who had worked for a long time at Rishi Valley, I think.

M: There was some connection. I don't remember what.

S: Rishi Valley was a private school for the children of parents who could afford such things, and he wanted to start his own school but for poor village children, and it was really a model school. It was beautiful, well run; really a wonderful little rural school.

M: Well, I'm told that now, I'm not sure how, but it's still going and Rishi Valley has a stronger connection.

S: Probably. We'll have to end it there for today, Mary.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Presumably, Rajagopal didn't sneak downstairs in the middle of the night and put things, like the silverware, in his suitcase; he must have had help from people there to ship things to him in Ojai. This refusal of Pupul's to answer these questions from Mary L. is curious.

[2] Narayan was Krishnaji's nephew; the son of a brother from whom he had been estranged since Krishnaji was adopted by the Theosophists at the age of fourteen.

Issue 66: December 18, 1980 to March 6, 1981

This issue seems to fly along mostly, I believe, because Mary only has her little daily diary on which she can draw. Being in India was so physiologically and psychologically draining for her that at one point, both Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure wonder if she shouldn't leave. She doesn't, but the result for us is an account of daily activities that can't afford the emotional expression we have become used to from her. We see her emotions open up and flourish as soon as she is back at Brockwood for a few days, and then back in Ojai.

But all the time she is away, she is compiling notes for the second volume of Mary Lutyens' biography of Krishnaji. And she spends the last part of her time in Madras collecting evidence for the second court case against Rajagopal.

When I think of Mary at this time: sixty-six years old, and frail, I am astounded by the sheer energy she expends on travel and doing all that she did for Krishnaji.

Mary: We're beginning on December eighteenth, 1980 when Krishnaji and I are in Rishi Valley. 'Krishnaji called Achyut, Sunanda, Pama, Asit, Dr. Parchure, and me to his room after breakfast. We sat on the floor and discussed Narayan's position and role here. Krishnaji wants Narayan to devote himself to the teachings and nothing else. The committee must be responsible for everything else. The talk went on till 12:15 p.m. This was to be a day of rest for Krishnaji, but again, he has brushed that aside. Dr. Parchure is asking whether Krishnaji is awake to his dissipation of energy, his irritability at times, and an inattention. Krishnaji says it is not irritability; it is urgency. In the afternoon, he spoke to Narayan alone and said it went well. He said he asked Narayan, if an angel appeared and asked him what he most wanted, what would be his reply?' [M chuckles.] '"Enlightenment," said Narayan. Krishnaji was pleased. Then Krishnaji asked, "More than that lady?"' I'll bet he was talking about…

Scott: Usha?

M: Yes.

S: Whether Narayan wanted enlightenment more than he wanted Usha?

M: I think so. [Chuckles.] 'At 3:30 p.m., the trustees, other than Krishnaji, met at Narayan's to discuss videos and tapes; who makes and sells them, who has jurisdiction, in other words. The school grounds were noisy with helicopters casing the football field where landing sites have been made, but they seemed overly cautious and afraid to land. I left at 5 p.m., and went for a walk with Krishnaji, Asit, and Hooker over the chosen path for Krishnaji to possibly walk with Mrs. Gandhi on Saturday. It has been smoothed and covered in red earth. Krishnaji was pleased by it. Much activity has been going on all day, with knots of men standing about, supervising others' labors.'

Krishnaji speaking with staff at Rishi Valley, in front of the old guest house. Narayan is sitting to the left of Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimbalist).

S: [laughs] Very Indian!

M: December nineteenth. 'There are immense preparations going on for the prime minister's visit, and the school grounds are filled up with soldiers and officials; plans are changed and amended with each new word from Delhi on who, how, and when the prime minister's group will come. Krishnaji called a meeting of Pupul, Achyut, Sunanda, Pama, Asit, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas, Rajesh, Venkataraman, Krishnakutti, and me to discuss the new setup for the school, and suggested that Krishnakutty travel around India for the KFI; finding good teachers, students. There was an absurdly long debate on students' blue jeans:' [*both M and S chuckl*e] 'faded ones are banned, but this has been amended to mean' [both chuckle more] 'they must be clean, not skin-tight, and not patched.' [More chuckles.] 'Asit was impassioned for jeans—because he had two daughters in the school who wore them.'

S: Yes.

M: 'Achyut held out for a religious atmosphere…' [More laughter from both M and S.] Oh, dear!

S: That grown people could give time with Krishnaji to this!

M: Yes. '…but it wasn't clear how jeans deny a religious atmosphere.' [More chuckles.] 'What a waste of Krishnaji's attention and energy. This is supposed to be his day of rest. In the afternoon, I had a tea for the trustees of KFT'—that's the trust in England—'KFA, and Canada. I walked with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Mary C., and Scott over the route which Krishnaji will walk with Mrs. Gandhi.'

The twentieth. ‘News of Mrs. Gandhi’s arrival kept changing. We were given badges with our names, and copies of the minute-to-minute program. She finally arrived at 1:40 p.m. by car with her son Rajiv, his wife Sonia, and their two children (a boy and a girl), plus a secretary, a doctor, ministers, and unknown others. Students and villagers met her at the gate. I used the Nikon there and at the planting of a Ficus benjamina, then, in the assembly hall, where first Krishnaji spoke and then Mrs. Gandhi. She spoke spontaneously and conventionally. Some of the brighter students with whom I talked later at Shanti Menon’s Hostel’—that’s one of the hostels where the children sleep—‘said she obviously didn’t know what Krishnaji teaches. I spent about two hours at the hostel having tea and talking to keep out of the old guest house, where Krishnaji and Pupul gave tea to Mrs. Gandhi and family. Then, she and Krishnaji talked privately for about an hour, after which Krishnaji took her for the walk along the new path, photographed by Asit and guarded by 450 security people!’ [S laughs, then M laughs.] There weren’t enough trees for them to hide behind.

S: I think the population of the county doubled!

M: ‘Separately, she toured the school grounds by car, inspecting some of the hostels and the rural center. At 7 p.m., under the banyan tree, there was mridangam playing and a ballet. Supper was under moonlight, opposite the dining hall, a long table was set in the middle. Krishnaji had Mrs. Gandhi on his right and son Rajiv on his left. Her family were there, but otherwise, there was only the foreign guests, Dorothy, Mary Cadogan, Theo, Hooker, the Siddoos, Mark, Merali, Scott, and me. We at the head table got waited on, whereas everyone else ate buffet-style. I sat opposite Mrs. Gandhi and granddaughter, a quite Western-looking little girl in pigtails with a lilting, precise voice. Asit’s youngest daughter Sonali, who had been one of the students delegated to be with the grandchildren, told her father that she and her brother talk to each other in children’s pidgin English.’ [Chuckles.] I’d forgotten this. [S laughs.] You know, you have to insert something in everything you say.

S: Yes, yes, yes.

M: Anyway, ‘Sonali understood this, and said Rajiv’s children were superciliously critical of everything. It was 9 p.m. when Krishnaji, very tired, finally got to bed.’

December twenty-first. ‘Yesterday, Mrs. Gandhi made an unplanned visit to Thettu[1] and the villagers came to dance for her at 6:30 a.m. this morning in front of the new guest house where she spent the night. I went to see, and then disappeared into my room. Mrs. Gandhi, her family, and Pupul came for breakfast with Krishnaji before leaving, with the cars lined up outside. She is precise in ignoring no one. There was a farewell gesture to the little…’ I remember this vividly, she was… well, she was a politician.

S: She was indeed, yes.

M: Yes. ‘She is precise in ignoring no one. There was the farewell gesture to the little bent old sweeper woman, who daily whisks the earthen driveway, and she waved to me.’

I was standing up in the building. I didn't go down to see her off as I felt it would be an intrusion. Anyway, 'she caught sight of me in the doorway and waved to me, taking a step forward to do so. The cavalcade swept away, and the place seemed to exhale. The electricity promptly failed. Krishnaji and I went upstairs for our own breakfast. Achyut had spoken with a minister, and ten lakhs are to be spent…' Now, I can't remember how many a lakh is.

S: I think a lakh is 100,000. If so, then ten lakhs of rupees is one million rupees. They had funny number denotations—but useful, in a way. Do you remember the crore?

M: Yes. What was that?

S: A crore was, I think, 100 lakhs, so it would be ten million, but I'm not sure anymore.

M: That's a lot. Anyway, '…ten lakhs are to be spent on enlarging a rain catchment on Rishi Konda, which will ensure the whole valley against drought. This and extra telephone lines, and repair of the roads are the promised tangible consequences of the visit. It is said that Rajiv would like to send his children to the school, but his wife doesn't want to be separated from them. In my eye, Mrs. Gandhi is more of what she seemed two years ago: concentrated, controlled, imprisoned in her life and its power, and lack of affection; at once in the center of possibilities, and cut off from freedom, enjoyment, trust. The death of her son, Sanjay, may have increased all this. The determination remains, but it is without focus, and it is hardening, stalling. Krishnaji, from sitting out last night, and the upsetting of his schedule, has begun to have a cold. Dr. Parchure came to tell me that Krishnaji was planning to go in an open jeep over the dusty, rough roads to look at a dam site on Rishi Konda. I went to talk to him, and he was adamant about it. But, after I left, he called me back, and backed down a little. In the end, he didn't go. I did his packing and mine.'

The next day. 'We left Rishi Valley at 6 a.m. instead of the usual 4 a.m. Krishnaji, Asit, Dr. Parchure, and me in the Santhanam car. All the school was out to see Krishnaji off. We stopped for fruit, eating by the roadside. All the villagers that passed stopped to stare in amazement at Krishnaji, saying something we could not understand in Telugu.' Telugu is the language of that region. 'In the car, Krishnaji, for Asit, gave a chart of the Theosophic hierarchy: initiates, disciples, arhats, bodhisattvas. Krishnaji, according to Theosophy, is an arhat, i.e., beyond the opposites, beyond ego, a master. He said that an arhat, or bodhisattva, supposedly can live on in his body or give it up. He said that if he did not travel about so much and consequently wear out his body, he probably might live much longer, but, he said with a laugh, an astrologer had just told him he would live another twenty years.'[2]

S: Hm.

M: 'I said, what about settling down in one place right now and keeping the body as it is. "No, it's too late," he said. All this was said in an amused way, not seriously. We reached Vasanta Vihar at 10:45 a.m., unpacked, and had lunch in the upstairs dining room; just Krishnaji, Sunanda, Pama, Asit, Parchure, and I. I took a nap and a bath and went with Krishnaji, Radha, and Asit to Radha's house. We walked on the beach. The air from the sea was cool and clean. The sound of the surf was good to my ears. I had had a headache during the drive, and at around 11 a.m., I was nauseated, and again at 2 p.m.'

December twenty-third: 'I stayed in bed with a slight fever and slept most of the day. Dr. Parchure gave me pills and put me on a liquid diet. I felt only weak, the nausea is gone, but sleeping away healed greatly. Dorothy, Mary Cadogan, Theo, and Hooker arrived, and are staying here. Scott, Ray McCoy'—I don't remember Ray being there, but he must've been—'Harsh, Claire, and Anand'—that's their child—'are staying in a house rented for guests. The Siddoos are in a hotel.'

S: Oh, that's right. I'd forgotten that. Jayalakshmi rented the house.

M: Did she?

S: Yes.

M: That's what she also did for me when I first came, as I reported earlier.

S: Yes.

M: And, not just for me, but for me, Frances McCann, and Naudé. She rented a house and rented all the furniture; it had been empty.

S: Yes, for us also she rented all the furniture, and supplied the servants…

M: Well, she lent her Brahmin cook to us for one meal a day, which was generous.

S: Yes, we had a cook, and we had a guard.

M: A guard, yes.

S: And someone to clean, I think. [Chuckles.]

M: The twenty-fourth: 'I had no fever in the morning, but it came again in the afternoon. I stayed in bed all day. I got a long letter from Amanda. I read, slept, and worked on biographic notes for Mary Links. Krishnaji talked to the Siddoos, Theo, Hooker, and Asit, about their problems. I was able to attend a press conference that Krishnaji gave in the morning.'

Christmas Day. 'I stayed in bed all day reading and doing notes for Mary Links, except for lunch with everyone, where I just sat with everyone, not eating anything. Then, back to rest. My fever was down to ninety-nine. Krishnaji is worried, and so Dr. Parchure is being over-cautious, putting me on a fat-free diet so I can have special plain things cooked and served on a tray.' The constant non-plain food was part of my troubles in India. Somehow, it was alright for a while and then…

S: Yes, most bodies that aren't used to it just get exhausted.

M: My digestion finally said enough!

S: Yes, yes.

M: And I was always eating the least spicy food, the same thing that Krishnaji was getting as Parameshwaran always went very light on chilies.

S: Yes, but even then.

M: December twenty-sixth: 'I stayed in my room resting all day, but Dr. Parchure okayed a walk in the afternoon. I went with Krishnaji and others by car to Radha Burnier's house and walked on the beach. The sea air was the best cure for me. The annual Theosophical Society Convention is on, so there were many people wandering around. I had no fever today.'

The twenty-seventh. 'I was quiet all day, still getting all my meals on a tray. I have no fever. I got up for Krishnaji's first Madras talk at 5:30 p.m. in the garden. There was a very large crowd. Krishnaji had me sit apart to not be in the crowd with germs. He spoke on corruption in this country, and in mankind. The root is attachment. He felt after the talk, that there had been no communication with the audience; but Asit and others said the contrary. The crowds closed in on him at the end, touching his feet, his hands. It makes him squeamish.'

December twenty-eighth. 'I felt weak, so I stayed quietly in my room till 5:30 p.m., when Krishnaji gave his second talk in the garden. He was engulfed afterward by devotional crowds.'

The twenty-ninth. 'I finally felt well again, and resumed normal life: meals at the table, etcetera. Krishnaji, Pama, Theo, Scott, and I walked on the beach after driving to Radha's house. At 6 p.m., she joined us, and said the TS convention members wanted to greet Krishnaji if he would walk through the grounds. So, even though he had been tired earlier, he set off at a military pace with Radha, Scott, and I behind. As the march progressed, it became quite a parade. It was getting dark by then, and hands in namaste greetings and faces flickered along the road. A few times, Radha paused to introduce someone to Krishnaji; smiles, the greeting, and off we went again. My strength had come back, and my running shoes carried me along like roller skates. The car took us from the gate.'

S: So this is the "ceremonial" walk I remember, rather than the first one.

M: It must've been. Yes, because it was late. It was dark by the end, I remember. That makes sense.

S: But again, there was Dick Clarke on his bicycle and the whole thing.

M: I know. [Both chuckle.]

S: Okay.

M: 'The day was not over for me. It is Sunanda's birthday, and Merali had twenty-five of us to dine at the Taj Hotel. Parameshwaran gave me a tray first, and so I ate nothing else at the Taj, and didn't feel too tired.'

December thirtieth: 'At 9:30 a.m. in the big hall, Krishnaji held what was to be a computer-versus-human-brain discussion with Asit and Harsh mainly, but with Achyut, Sunanda, and I participating, too. There was a sizable crowd of listeners present. It was a continuation of Krishnaji's exploration of whether the human brain has capabilities beyond the computer. He brought it to the point where thought sees it is mechanical and limited, and is silent. Joy Mills was at lunch. Later we walked on the beach, and the sea wind was the breath of health.'

'The Siddoos have been eating worms a bit at being in a hotel.' [Both laugh.] 'They were asked to come early, and all the trustees, minus Krishnaji, plus Mark, Scott, and Ray McCoy, who is now going to Wolf Lake School, held a meeting to talk over anything and everything. It lasted all morning and cleared the air. In the afternoon, a few—Dorothy, Mary, Theo, Alan Hooker, and Scott—went to hear Radha address the TS convention. I walked on the beach with Krishnaji and Pama. We were joined by Rita Zampese, who is here for two weeks. Krishnaji had his usual supper in bed. The rest of us had it in the dining room, and there was not a trace of it being New Year's Eve.' [Chuckles.] 'Sunanda's arthritis had kept her in bed all day. Mary, Dorothy, Dr. Parchure, and I went up to see her after supper. She was merry and chatty as always, and showed us a necklace she had had put together of rudraksha beads.'

S: What are they? I know it's a nut from a tree, but perhaps you can explain for others.

M: Yes, it's the thing I've always got around my neck.

S: I know, I know.

M: It's a nut from a tree that grows in India and elsewhere in Asia, too, and it's considered something sacred about it, for some reason, because all sannyasis always wear them.

S: Right.

M: But non-sannyasi women wear them rather the way women wear pearls in the West, a necklace of little ones.

S: Yes. But, a big, double one…

M: …is mine.

S: …like you have, is a rare one.

M: Yes, and it's alone and just on a chain.

S: Yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: Anyway, 'she showed us a necklace she had had put together of rudraksha beads and coral. The beads are seeds of a tree that is supposed to have mysterious qualities. Sunanda demonstrated and held her necklace over a Krishnaji book; in a few moments, it started swinging in a clockwise positive direction. She moved her hand a little, to place it over a different part of the same book, and the necklace reversed and swung the other way. Why? Consternation. I jumped up to look, and the necklace was now over "edited by D. Rajagopal"' [laughter] 'in huge letters! When she moved it back to Krishnaji's name, and it went clockwise. She then held it over our hands, and all were clockwise.'

And that completes 1980!

S: Terrific. Isn't that wonderful? [Laughs.] Well, we whipped through 1980, I have to say, mostly because there wasn't much of the big diary.

M: Yes.

S: Good. So, now we're in 1981.

M: January first. 'I woke up early and began the year in the best of ways: by going upstairs to greet Krishnaji before I saw anyone else. He came down and brought me a white fragrant blossom he finds in the garden. So, the year began with his blessing. At 9:30 a.m., in the big hall, he held what was to be a continuation of Tuesday's discussion of the human brain versus computers. Is there something the brain can do that is beyond the computer? Unfortunately, too many people were there. Narayan's brother, Krishna, who is a computer expert, was brought into it by Krishnaji, but a review of the previous discussion had to be made for him and also for a biology fan who spoke up, so there was too much backtracking. Such discussions should be limited to those who have participated from the beginning. In fact, because Krishnaji instinctively tries to bring the audience along, the discussion is held down. In this one, Krishnaji spoke of something beyond the brain, which he called "mind." Krishnaji kept the "mind" apart, and it was only at the end, with time running out, that he spoke of "mind" as something outside and beyond human thought, something timeless, boundless.' I must remember that when we get into these discussions here about brain and mind, and everybody misuses the words.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: 'At 6 p.m., a flutist came with a violinist and mridangam player, and they played for Krishnaji most magically. It was again, for me, a time when Indian music is like water flowing, carrying one, and one is in it and of it.'

Now, I'm afraid this is going to be skimpy until February, as I only have entries in my little daily diary.

S: Oh! Okay.

Krishnaji in Madras (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: So for January third, there is only something about my getting our tickets back to London from Bombay on February fifteenth, and 'Krishnaji gave his third Madras talk.'

On the fourth, 'Mary Cadogan, Theo, and I worked on her affidavit about KWINC. We telephoned Erna. The connection was so bad that it was very hard to hear, but we managed. There was a meeting of Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, Pama, Merali, Scott, and me about video funds. Krishnaji gave his fourth Madras talk at 5:30 p.m.'

The next day, 'I went into the city to get my visa renewed, but they said it was too soon. I must do it in Bombay. At 4 p.m., I met Radha Burnier in her TS office at Adyar, and with her went through files for material about the transfer of Krishnaji's archives to him in the 1950s, to support our case that the archives were not sent to Rajagopal. From there, we went on to Radha's house, where Krishnaji came, bringing Scott and Malini for a walk on the beach.'

On the sixth, there is only, 'I went shopping with Prema, and at 4 p.m., Lakshmi Shankar sang for Krishnaji, after which we went for a walk on the beach.'

The seventh. 'I went to the American consul with Mary Cadogan and Theo about Mary's sworn affidavit on archives sent to Krishnaji and not to KWINC. I walked on the beach with Krishnaji, Pama, Radha, and her niece Shubha. When we came back, there was chanting by Brahmin priests.' That was wonderful.

S: I remember it. It was quite extraordinary.

M: The next day. 'At 9:30 a.m., there was a meeting with Krishnaji of the Indian, English, U.S., and Canadian trustees, after which there was a large lunch and party at Jayalakshmi's for everyone. At 4:30 p.m., the students of the Krishnamurti school in Madras put on a play at the school in Damodar Gardens. Krishnaji went. We walked on the beach afterward.'

January ninth, 'There was again a 9:30 a.m. meeting of Krishnaji and all trustees, and this time the available teachers were included. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji talked with Narayan, Rajesh, Sunanda, Pupul, Nandini, Mrs. Thomas, Achyut, and me on how Narayan can bring about a "genius" mind like Krishnaji's in students. The walk with Krishnaji on the beach was with Radha, Nandini, Theo, and Scott.'

The next day, 'All the trustees and teachers met usefully. At 3:30 p.m., I went to Radha's office in the TS and composed the text of her statement on the archives being sent by Jinarajadasa to Krishnaji, not to Rajagopal.' It was important for the case to have this statement that the archives were sent to Krishnaji, and not to Rajagopal, because he claimed that everything was his.

S: Yes.

M: 'I came back with Radha to Vasanta Vihar in time for Krishnaji's fifth talk.'

On the eleventh, 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a teachers' meeting. I slept in the afternoon. Krishnaji, at 5:30 p.m., gave his sixth and last Madras talk for the year. Harsh, Claire, their child, and Mark Lee left. Pupul gave me a most beautiful sari.'

January twelfth. 'I went into Madras center to change travelers' checks and to the U.S. consulate and other errands. Dr. Sivakamu and Radha came to lunch'—she was another of Radha's aunts.

S: She apparently used to play on the beach with Krishnaji and Nitya before they were "discovered." At least, that's what she told me.

M: Yes, yes. 'At 4, Krishnaji chanted with Venkatachalam and Narayan. Except for Krishnaji, all of us dined at Prema Srinivasan's.'

The next day, 'I went with Pupul, Radha, Theo, and Jamni Thadhanam to the U.S. consulate, where Pupul, Radha, and Jamni had notarized statements.' Jamni had been secretary for Jinarajadasa, who was the president of the TS when the archives were sent, and it was she who did the actual posting of the archives to Krishnaji in Ojai at the request of Jinarajadasa. It proved that the archives weren't sent to Rajagopal, but were sent to Krishnaji.' I remember I brought back photocopies of all this. Anyway, we got statements about all this notarized. 'Pupul soon left, but the rest of us were there all morning, getting papers copied, etcetera. Radha lunched with us at Vasanta Vihar, and after, we made files of these papers and originals of the Krishnaji-Jinarajadasa correspondence for Theo to take to Erna. We walked on the beach with Krishnaji, Radha, Scott, and Rinpoche Sandher.'

The next day, 'Dorothy was ill in the night but left anyway with Mary Cadogan and Scott for Bombay to continue on to London.' That's when what you mentioned yesterday happened.

S: Yes. Yes. She was incredibly ill on this voyage and needed such looking after. She had to lie down in the aisle of the airplane because she couldn't sit upright, she was so ill.

M: 'At 9:30, Krishnaji held the first seminar discussion with invited scholars. A Rinpoche from Benares, and Professor Khare'—he was an Indian who taught in this country. 'I was a participant. It was videotaped. I had a nap in the afternoon and a walk with Krishnaji, Rajesh, Radha, and Rinpoche. Alan Hooker and Theo, with all the papers, left for Bombay and on to Ojai. Krishnaji, with Dr. Parchure, thinks I should leave India for my health.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji withdraws on my leaving. At 9:30 a.m., a second seminar meeting was held with Krishnaji, Rinpoche Sandher, Pandit Jagannath Upadhyaya, Professor Brij Khare, a Ceylon lawyer, Pupul, Sunanda, Achyut, and some others. There was too much rain to walk in the afternoon. Pupul and I dined with Radha Burnier, her aunt, Dr. Sivakamu, Achyut, Rinpoche Sandher, and Pandit Jagannath Upadhyaya.'

January sixteenth. 'Today was the third and last of the seminar discussions here. Krishnaji was ablaze and I talked afterward with a Daniel Rogan, an American who wrote to him and will come to the Ojai talks and see if there's work for him. Narayan came to talk to me after lunch. Then, Subbulakshmi sang at 4 p.m.; not too well and too long. At 6 p.m., Rinpoche, Radha, Pama, and I walked on the beach. There was a cable from Mary C.; she, Dorothy, and Scott arrived safely, and Dorothy is recovering.' You get those weird sicknesses in India; suddenly you get sick.

S: Yes, yes.

M: At least, we who haven't the right resistance do.

S: The Indians do, too, and they die like flies. Look at the mortality rates. There's the myth that only Westerners get sick there, but lots of times, Indians get laid up as well.

M: The next day. ‘At 7:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a question-and-answer meeting. Afterward, I did desk work. Pupul left in the afternoon. The beach walk with Krishnaji included Radha and Murli Rao.’ He was a nice man who lived in Delhi.

January eighteenth. ‘I worked all day on dates for Mary. Krishnaji continues to see people, like Malini. A sannyasi talked to Dr. Parchure about herbs. The walk was with Krishnaji, Radha, and Pama.’

The next day. ‘I packed. Krishnaji talked most of the morning with Pandit Jagannath Upadhyaya. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw Malini again, and she has finally decided to go to a U.S. university for a degree in education. Krishnaji, Pama, Radha, and I walked on the beach.’

The twentieth. ‘After doing some errands in town, Krishnaji, Achyut, Sunanda, Pama, and I went to lunch with Radha and her aunt Dr. Sivakamu. Krishnaji reminisced and teased Sivakamu about her brother-in-law, Arundale, and all the sins of those days!’[3] [Both chuckle.] ‘Jamni Thadhanam was also at the lunch table. On Radha’s and my suggestion, Krishnaji visited some of the rooms in the TS headquarters: Dr. Besant’s, his own, and Leadbeater’s. He remembered almost nothing of them.’ I think that’s when he said that he didn’t remember the big room that he and Nitya had, but he remembered Mrs. Besant’s small office room next to it, and he remembered her sitting on the…what was it called? A chowki?

S: Something like that.

M: It’s a sort of big, shapeless settee sort of thing. He remembered her sitting there, writing letters, and he would sit somewhere else in the room and doze. That’s what he told me at the time, but I hadn’t written it in this book. ‘When we came back to Vasanta Vihar, a tree expert, Raja Shikran, planted more trees. At 6 p.m., Krishnaji went back for his walk on the beach with Radha and saw the full moon rise out of the sea.’

The next day, ‘The newspapers say the U.S. Tehran hostages have been released. Reagan was inaugurated president yesterday. Up at 4:30 a.m. Krishnaji, Achyut, and I took a 7 a.m. flight to Bombay. We were met by Nandini, Asit, etcetera. Krishnaji and I are again staying in Asit’s flat on Peddar Road.’ Asit and his wife used to move out, and they turned their flat, which was a nice flat in what was known as Sterling Apartments, at times over for Krishnaji’s use.

S: Yes.

M: It was nice of them, and they left two servants, a couple who did the cooking and the cleaning, and all the rest of it.

January twenty-second. ‘We stayed in quietly except for a walk around the race track at 6 p.m.’ That was the Bombay Race Track, and it was a good place to walk. ‘Asit brought two computer experts to lunch, one Indian, Ashok someone, and the other was an American, Pat…' Mc-something. 'Vikram brought three issues of Herald Tribune, that the hostages were released just after Reagan's inauguration Tuesday, and flown to Athens briefly and on to Wiesbaden, for debriefing. Reagan had Carter go there to receive them yesterday.'

The next day, 'I copied biography notes for Mary Links all morning, then lunched with Krishnaji, Asit, and Radha Burnier. We talked at length about the brain and the mind. I read and rested in the afternoon, then walked after 6 p.m. on the racecourse, Krishnaji, Asit, Devi, Nandini, and me. Krishnaji and I had supper alone.'

January twenty-fourth. 'I went shopping alone to the cottage industries in Malabar, but was back for lunch. Later, I went with Krishnaji and Asit to the J.J. School of Arts, where at 6:15 p.m., Krishnaji gave his first Bombay talk of the year. People were prevented from mobbing him as he got into the car to leave, but were outside waiting to touch his hands through the car window. Nandini returned with us.' That was really sort of horrible.

S: I know.

M: They stuck their hands in and tried to grab him.

The next day 'was a quiet day. The Patwardhans came in the morning for a while. Krishnaji rested. I worked on the biography notes for Mary. Krishnaji had a long private talk with Asit. Krishnaji, he, and I lunched. There was a nap and rest. Again, Asit and I drove with Krishnaji to the second Bombay talk held at 6:15 p.m. Supper afterward was with Krishnaji, Nandini, Asit, and me. Today the American hostages fly from Wiesbaden to the U.S.'

The twenty-sixth. 'People came and went in the morning. I worked on the notes for Mary Links,' and there's really nothing of note.

January twenty-seventh. 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with about twenty-eight people on the effects of computers. All thought is mechanical, therefore, it's the same as the computer, and if that is all there is, there is a deterioration of mind. Afterward, I went with Devi to shop, worked on notes, and then walked on the racecourse with Krishnaji, Asit, and Devi.'

There was nothing of significance on the twenty-eighth, but on the twenty-ninth there was the second discussion here at the apartment.

Again, there is nothing significant until January thirty-first, when Krishnaji gave his third talk, which was in the evening. He said on the way home that 'he almost stopped talking and left as he just couldn't feel communication with the audience.' All these days I continue to work on the notes for Mary L.'s biography.

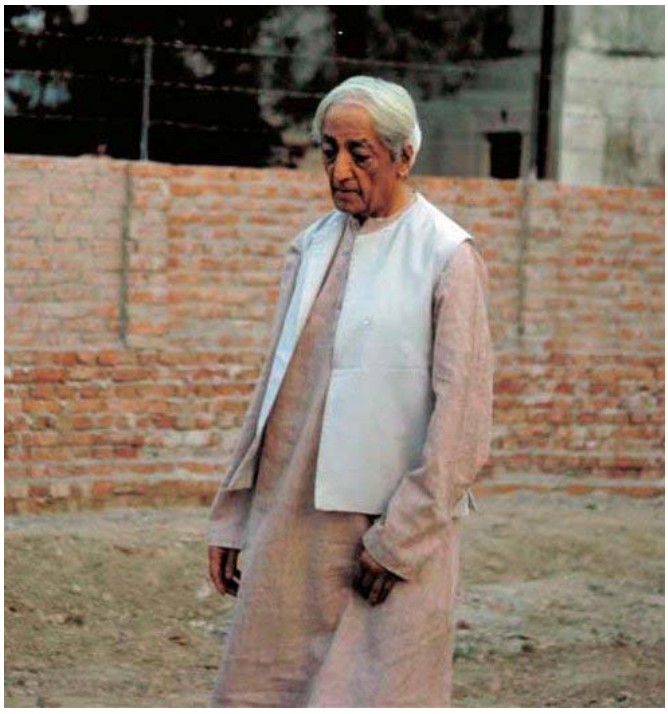
February first. ‘Krishnaji rested all morning, and we had lunch alone. At 5:50 p.m., Krishnaji, Nandini, and I went to Krishnaji’s fourth Bombay talk, which was at 6:15 p.m., on beauty, listening, fear. Fear is time and thought. The audience was no different, but it sat utterly still, as the fullness of Krishnaji’s talk rose out of him,’ and they felt something happen. ‘Frenzied hands again reaching to touch him through the car window.’

February second. ‘People came and went, seeing Krishnaji. There was a meeting with him of the Rajghat group. After lunch, Krishnaji gave an interview to Leela Naidu Moraes. The walk with Krishnaji included Nandini, Asit, Devi, Gamsham, and Shubha’—that is the niece of Radha—‘and me. Narayan says he is unwell and can’t come to Bombay, but Krishnaji felt that, for his own sake, he must come.’

The third. ‘There was an interview of Krishnaji by Pupul, filmed for Indian television.’ Then just the usual lunch with people and walk.

February fourth. ‘Narayan arrived from Rishi Valley, and at 5 p.m., Krishnaji had a long talk with him about Usha.’ In the evening there was a dinner given by Amru. She is a sister of Pupul, I think, and Nandini. ‘She gave dinner for Krishnaji and the whole group.’

For February fifth, we have the big diary again, so we won’t be quite as skimpy. ‘At 10 a.m., there was a KF India trustee meeting to which I was invited. Merali was made a member.’ Then for some reason I have these four points:



‘1. Radhika Herzberger and her husband are coming to Rishi Valley in July 1982.’ That is Pupul’s daughter, and her husband Hans. ‘Radhika will be on the executive committee for Rishi Valley.’

‘2. The three Patwardhans’ home is Vasanta Vihar, permanently.’ That would be Sunanda, Pama, and Achyut. ‘KFI members will have the right to live at schools in their old age, if KFI agrees.’

‘3. Teachers will be expected to transfer to other KFI schools for periods of one year from time to time.’

‘4. Narayan is to create, at Rishi Valley, a place where the catalyst that changed Krishnaji as a boy can again take place. “The door is waiting to be opened.” At Madras, too, someone must be there to provide the atmosphere, and it must be for students who are there for Krishnaji’s teachings, and nothing else. There will be no education to become engineers, etcetera, but only a total involvement with Krishnaji’s teachings. “If you do this, the door will open, something will take place. I say this with scientific clarity. This has not happened because I have not stayed in one place.”…“If I stayed in one place, I would do it, but it is not my dharma. My job is different.” There is no goal in this. “Either you are inviting something tremendous, or you invite the devil, like any little ashram.”…“That is the devil, the real dangers—the Rajneesh, the Mahesh Yogi, etcetera.” …“If you ask heaven to bless you, it will bless this. The Foundation is nothing without this, and the Foundation has not done it. The door is there to be opened. It is not me. The thing is waiting, hoping. It needs brains, a global brain. Don't say, 'I haven't got it.' All that is gone. It is a child waiting to be born." He said to Narayan, to Sunanda, to Upasani, and to Krishnakutti, "You have said you would do it, and there is no going back. You must have a vital brain, global and dynamic. If you are a woman, you are not a woman anymore, even if you wear a woman's body. You may have been egotistic in the school, but not here. And if you are not here, you will not do all that there."' I think that means that if you are not here, like that, you will not do all that there, you will not do what you're supposed to be doing.

Krishnaji walking in Madras (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The next day there was really nothing of note, but on the seventh Krishnaji gave his fifth Bombay talk.

February eighth. 'Krishnaji had a long talk with Narayan in the morning, while I worked on notes for Mary L. Krishnaji and I lunched alone. At 6:15 p.m., Krishnaji gave his sixth Bombay talk, a very fine one. The audience sat hardly breathing. "Religion is skeptical inquiry."…"Meditation is the understanding and ending of knowledge." There was a frenzy of hands trying to touch him through the car window afterward.'

The ninth. 'Krishnaji had a long talk with Narayan. People came and went. Sunanda and I talked, after which I continued to work on notes for Mary L. Krishnaji asked me if yesterday's talk was special, and he said, "It has done something to me."'

February tenth. 'At 9:30 a.m., there was a discussion with about sixty people on values, seeing outwardly, and sensitivity. It lasted two hours. Pupul asked Ms. Vimala Deshpande to get my visa extended to the fifteenth.' I forget who that was. 'Dr. Parchure's son, Vikram, is getting married, which was arranged by his brother, Vishwas. [chuckles] It's a family where all the weddings are arranged by nearest and dearest.

S: Of course, of course. A proper…yes.

M: The eleventh of February. 'At 6 a.m., Krishnaji, Pupul, Nandini, Devi, and I in one car; and Sunanda, Achyut, Parchure, and others in two other cars drove one-and-a-half hours to look at land near a bird sanctuary as a possible site for another school. Krishnaji disliked it, and clearly, it was too near Bombay's pollution.' I remember it. They had animals in cages, and it was awful. 'We came back by 9:30 a.m., and Krishnaji was very "off." When we were there, he said, "Where am I?" He was horrified by the caged hawks and owls. He and I lunched alone. He said, "I feel like never coming back here." He keeps asking for the reason for the degeneration of India. He is repelled, but said, "I feel I must save this bloody country." In the afternoon, he had interviews and walked on the race course.'

Twelfth of February. 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held another discussion with about sixty people. Devi and I went shopping. Leela Naidu was to cook a French dinner, but she came late with it and was drunk. Krishnaji, Pupul, Nandini, Devi, and I were there.'

February thirteenth, my birthday. 'I was given a present of a necklace from Nandini and Pupul. Krishnaji rested and slept in the morning. He and I lunched alone. He saw Leela Naidu at 5 p.m. At supper, Pupul described going to see the Nizams' Jewels for the Indian government.' The Nizams were, I don't know what, like maharajahs or something, and the Indian government forced them to sell their collection of jewels to the government at a much reduced price.

S: Yes.

M: 'I had flowers and a chocolate birthday cake from Asit.' [Chuckles.]

The fourteenth. 'I finished packing. People came and went. Krishnaji walked, but I had packed my walking shoes in a bag to leave at Vasanta Vihar, so I didn't go. After supper, Krishnaji and I both tried unsuccessfully to sleep. Pama took the luggage and passports, etcetera, to check in Krishnaji and me.' We were taking one of those middle-of-the-night flights.

February fifteenth. 'Krishnaji and I were up at 2:30 a.m. Pupul, Nandini came at 3, and we drove to the new Bombay Airport. Almost everyone was there to see Krishnaji off. We flew on Qantas at 4:50 a.m., nonstop to London. First class was almost empty, and it was a smooth ten-hour flight. We arrived at Heathrow at 9:35 a.m., and were quickly through formalities. Dorothy and Scott were there to meet us. It was lovely to see frost on the fields, the beauty of winter and bare trees. It is bliss to be here. Krishnaji came downstairs to lunch but slept all afternoon. I spoke by phone to Mary L. Dorothy and I took the dogs for a short walk.' [Chuckles.] I remember in the airport at Bombay, they gave us a special sitting room, and all the enthusiasts crammed in and sat, staring at Krishnaji.

S: Who was there?

M: People I didn't know.

S: Right. So all kinds of unknown admirers.

M: Unknown people who came to see him off and sat and stared at him; and he said to me something about he felt like a monkey being stared at.

S: Yes.

M: But what shocked them, and visibly shocked them, was that when I came in, separately, Krishnaji got up.

S: Of course.

M: Krishnaji was an old-fashioned gentleman, and when a lady comes in, you get up. They were shocked he was getting up for a woman, you know.

S: Oh, yes, yes.

M: [chuckles] But it was so funny to see it and their reactions.

S: Of course, yes.

M: Anyway, so we're back at Brockwood. [S chuckles.]

February sixteenth. 'Frost is all beauty to me. I feel the delight of cold weather. In the morning, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I discussed what should be done about Frances, who is quiet here now, but unsound. Krishnaji talked to her, with Dorothy and me present, and offered to help her. He will put his hands on her, starting today, and will see her every day in Ojai for the same. But she must stop all yoga, meditation, and whatever else she was doing. She agreed to his conditions, and so Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went for a walk. I went to the school meeting. In the evening, I talked at length to Shakuntala about Narayan's situation, which Dorothy has already told her about, at Narayan's request.' That was when they were still married. Anyway.

S: Yes, but they'd been separated for many years.

M: Yes.

The seventeenth. 'Mary and Joe came at 11 a.m. and talked with Krishnaji and me. We lunched and talked more till 3:30 p.m. Krishnaji treated Frances. I telephoned Filomena.

She has a broken arm. I also telephoned Vanda, Phyl Fry, and Betsy. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.'

The eighteenth. 'In Doris's little car, I went to Alresford, to the bank, the cleaners, and to cable Bud in New York on his birthday. Terence Stamp brought Bernard Levin at noon to meet Krishnaji. Levin wanted to meet Krishnaji about his TV program. He is doing a series of twelve half-hour weekly interviews, and would like Krishnaji to be the last. It could be taped at Brockwood, immediately on his return from Ojai, around the twenty-fifth of May, for broadcast on the thirty-first of May. Krishnaji talked at length with him after lunch, and then with Radhika and Hans Herzberger, who arrived. Mary Cadogan was also at lunch, and we went over Foundation affairs. Krishnaji again treated Frances. When Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I started out at 3 p.m. for the walk, it began to snow! It's so beautiful.' [Chuckles.]

The next day. 'The Digbys and the Moorheads came to lunch. George told Krishnaji that he must give up editing. Krishnaji treated Frances, and she is to go to Ojai for further treatment. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I planted beech trees in the new grove, to the south of the apple orchard.'

February twentieth. 'We left Brockwood with Dorothy at 8:45 a.m. for Heathrow. Krishnaji and I flew on TWA at 11:20 a.m., and arrived at Los Angeles about 3 p.m. It was slow in customs, but we were out by 4 p.m. Mark and David Moody drove us to Ojai. The Lilliefelts, the Hookers, etcetera were waiting to greet Krishnaji. Elfriede'—that's my housekeeper—'had cleaned the house to perfection. We had a light supper and went right to sleep. Krishnaji said later that he'd had a good meditation on the plane. "Not people drinking and smoking around." I telephoned Amanda.'

S: In other words, there weren't people smoking and drinking around…

M: Correct.

S: …which is why he had a good meditation.

M: Well, apparently.

S: Or, they're somehow associated.

M: Yes.

The twenty-first. 'I woke up at 3 a.m., and tried unsuccessfully to get the radiant heater going, so I went back to sleep. When I woke up, I telephoned my brother in New York, and then talked to Amanda and later to Miranda. We lunched at Arya Vihara, after which I took KMN2—that's my gray car—to fill it with diesel, and marketed. Early to sleep.'

February twenty-second, and we finally have the big diary again. We're in Ojai. 'There are such gaps in this record, I am discouraged at its incompleteness. Krishnaji and I left Brockwood Friday, the twentieth, and flew to Los Angeles. In the long emptiness over Greenland and Northern Canada, while I slept, Krishnaji told me later that a "good meditation" came to him. We had the two seats he likes: the two forward ones in the nose of the 747, where one feels least in contact with the other passengers. Krishnaji said there weren't people drinking and smoking, which made a difference. Mark Lee and David Moody met us. We reached Ojai in the dark after 6 p.m. Erna, Theo, Hooker, etcetera were there to greet Krishnaji. The house was immaculate from Elfriede's cleaning the day before, and was bright with flowers. So, we are here at last. It is somewhat less familiar to me than Brockwood was for the few days there. Perhaps because something responded in my very bones to the wintry countryside after India, the beauty of bare trees, the delight of frost, etcetera, the lawns and fields, the clean coldness. But this Ojai house will become alive as we live here. The pepper tree in the back is gone'—that's not the pepper tree, but another pepper tree—'from some sort of root rot. To prevent it from falling on the house in a wind, it was cut down. Erna and Theo have reported to Krishnaji and me on the state of the case against Rajagopal. Lawyer Cohen is coming here on Tuesday'—that would be in two days—'to discuss Krishnaji's and my depositions. This morning, while Krishnaji was talking to the Lilliefelts, Hooker, Mark, and Moody about the school, Michael telephoned that Rajagopal was calling the Arya Vihara number with a message that it was urgent that Krishnaji call him. Krishnaji didn't. But his ever-present hope that Rajagopal will somehow emerge with some decency was evident. He would've liked to telephone him, but realized that he mustn't without consulting Cohen. Rajagopal telephoned Arya Vihara again at 1 p.m. Michael answered and said that Krishnaji wasn't there, which was so, but that Krishnaji had received Rajagopal's message. Then, in the middle of lunch, a wire came from Rajagopal to Krishnaji saying that "court orders would reveal all your letters to Rosalind and to me if the case is pursued."' That's the blackmail.

S: Yes.

M: I'm afraid there's a big gap again before we get back to the big book.

S: When's the big book start again?

M: June at Brockwood.

S: June!

M: The twenty-third. 'We were in all day, except for lunch at Arya Vihara. The radiant heat system was fixed and serviced. Krishnaji slept most of the afternoon. Cohen telephoned Erna, reporting his telephone call with Christensen'—that's Rajagopal's lawyer—'in which there was a not-very-polite threat of letter disclosures. Krishnaji was not upset by this. He says he is stronger now than in the other case. My own wish to protect him remains in spite of the disgust at the outrageous behavior by Rajagopal.'

The next day, 'Stanley Cohen came to discuss the case with Erna and me. Then, Krishnaji joined us for two hours. Then, briefly we reported where we are to other trustees, Theo,

Hooker, and Kishbaugh. After Cohen left, we lunched at Arya Vihara, and then held a trustee meeting in the afternoon.'

February twenty-fifth. 'I left at 8 a.m., and drove to Los Angeles. I left specimens for Dr. Lailee, dropped six rolls of film at Lens Art, bought croissants, had my hair cut, and went to Gizelle for alterations. Then to Bullock's for a belt for Krishnaji, and at 4 p.m., I arrived at the Dunnes' to spend a happy hour with them. Phil gave me an inscribed copy of his book Take Two'—that's the title of his memoirs book. 'I telephoned Krishnaji as he asked to let him know when I was there. I left at 5 p.m. and drove through rain back to Ojai, arriving, as promised, at 6:30 p.m. Krishnaji has a hoarse voice and spent the day in bed.'

Krishnaji walking (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

For the next three days, I worked on the accumulated mail, and Krishnaji stayed in bed, feeling weak, and with a hoarse throat.

March first. 'I marketed. It rained. Krishnaji is better and we ate lunch in the dining room. It cleared in the afternoon. Then, my stepbrothers and stepsisters Ann, Bobby, Sally, and Peter, en route to Santa Barbara and Napa Valley, came by for tea and to meet Krishnaji, then he and I went for a walk to the Lilliefelts' after he treated Frances.'

The next day. 'There was rain on and off. Dennis came to do the weekly cleaning.' That's Dennis Gottschalk, who's now working for the KFA. 'The Marogers telephoned from Oxnard. They had arrived early from Japan. I went to fetch them. Meanwhile, Krishnaji went with Theo to the dentist, Dr. Meinig, who pulled an infected upper left molar.' He had more tooth trouble. 'He had supper in bed. The Marogers and I ate in the dining room. They are in the guest house.'

March third. ‘It was a beautiful day. Krishnaji, the Marogers, and I walked through the Oak Grove and visited the school, then drove to Lake Casitas and came back in time for lunch at Arya Vihara. We spent a quiet afternoon. Krishnaji’s tooth is not hurting him much. Marogers and I had supper in the dining room and Krishnaji had it in bed.’

The fourth. ‘The rain has returned. I took Jean-Michel to the bank. Erna sold Essie Bates’ bequest of an oriental rug for $8,000.’ Essie Bates, I think I mentioned before, was a real estate woman, and she left money and some things to the Foundation. ‘I did various errands, and everyone lunched at Arya Vihara. After a rest, I prepared dinner. Krishnaji and I walked down to the Lilliefelts’ to have tea with them and the Marogers. The Marogers’ friend, Hertha Melas, who lives and works at a school in Idyllwild, joined us for dinner. Krishnaji ate at the table, too.’

The next day. ‘The Marogers left with their friend for Idyllwild and then the LA Airport to return to France. Krishnaji rested most of the day.’

March sixth. ‘It is Amanda’s birthday and we talked. Professor Brij Khare came with video technicians to look at the living room for a recording of meetings on the weekend of the twenty-first. He stayed to lunch. I marketed. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji talked to Mark and David Moody, Erna, and I about teacher and parent meetings. Krishnaji and I watched the last evening news broadcast by Walter Cronkite, who is retiring from it, though he will do other projects. Dan Rather will take his place Monday.’

S: Alright. We have to call it quits there. We’ve run out of tape again.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] The small village right next to the school.

[2] He lived only just over five more years.

[3] It was considered a scandal when Rukmini married George Arundale just after she turned sixteen and he was forty-two.

Issue 67: March 7, 1981 to June 25, 1981

Mary: We begin on March seventh, 1981, and Krishnaji and I are in Ojai. 'A desk day.' Well, it goes on about Frances McCann not following Krishnaji's suggestions and so he feels he can't help her.

I spent the next day, 'reviewing papers, and then at 6 p.m., Dr. Hidley came to consult about how best to help Frances.'

March ninth, 'Rajagopal's lawyer, Mr. Terry Avchen, took my deposition in the morning and afternoon. Our lawyer, Mr. Comus, was present throughout. Mrs. Vigeveno turned up. It was held in the sitting room of the guest house. Erna was also present. It finished at 4 p.m. When I went back to Pine Cottage, Krishnaji had Dr. Hidley with him. We walked to the dip. I am very tired.'

The next day, 'I continued with yesterday's deposition with the same people present. It was finished at 12:30 p.m.'

The eleventh. 'Christensen'—that's Rajagopal's lawyer—'telephoned our lawyer, Mr. Cohen, postponing Krishnaji's deposition from tomorrow until the twentieth, after Rajagopal's deposition on the eighteenth. He also suggested a compromise. If we withdraw contempt from the charges, the lawyers could discuss who owns the archives.'

'Evelyne and Michael Mendizza came to talk to me, Erna, Theo, and Alan Kishbaugh about making another film of Krishnaji. We straightened out the differing points of view. After lunch, Krishnaji and I went to the Green Thumb Nursery and chose trees to replace the pepper trees, one on each side of the house, as well as other plants.'

The twelfth. 'Krishnaji dictated letters. I telephoned Mary in London about Krishnaji's asking her to be chairman of the publications committee to replace George Digby.'

Scott: This is Mary Lutyens?

M: Yes. 'Digby is retiring from publications. I also telephoned Brockwood. Dorothy is not well. She's gone for a rest to Cambridge. Shakuntala said Natasha is going to her father, Narayan, during spring vacation. I also spoke with Doris and told her how helpful her Herald of the Star discoveries were in my deposition. Alasdair planted the bushes we bought yesterday. Alain Naudé arrived for supper and spent the night. He's on his way to San Diego.'

March thirteenth. 'I spent the morning talking to Alain, who left after lunch for San Diego, then I worked at my desk. I walked with Krishnaji, and we were joined by Erna and Theo as we went down McAndrew Road. A mirror arrived that had been in my room in New York as a child, and then in the dining room at Elmholm'—Elmholm was the family summer home, and subsequently my mother's home in Vineyard Haven. We will put in the entry here.' It was in all these houses in my childhood.

S: How nice.

M: 'I also unpacked four candelabra that Aunt Sue gave to Mother, and which Bud sent to me, after Mother left Elmholm furniture to my brother and me.' Those are those candelabra on the dining room table.

On the next two days, Krishnaji talked to parents and staff of the Oak Grove School. Krishnaji felt ill on the afternoon of the fifteenth.

On the sixteenth, 'Krishnaji is better but felt delicate. Alain, who arrived here last night, talked to Krishnaji about his own life, and Krishnaji called me in to hear his suggestion that Alain go about finding serious, concerned people for the teachings. Alain went to visit the Lilliefelts. Krishnaji had supper alone in bed while Alain and I ate in the kitchen.'

March seventeenth. 'Alain left. Krishnaji and I went to Green Thumb Nursery again and bought more shrubs and flowers. Ruth, Albion Patterson, and Catherine Kiernan came to lunch at Arya Vihara. I read my deposition in the afternoon. Rajagopal's and Krishnaji's were scheduled for this week, but are postponed due to the settlement talk. Krishnaji and I walked down the road.'

There's nothing for the next day other than Krishnaji working in the garden with Alasdair. And the day after is just me getting my annual check-up and some errands.

March twentieth, 'I worked most of the day at my desk, while Krishnaji and Alasdair finished planting the camellias and the azalea beds by the guest house. David and Saral Bohm arrived in the evening. They're staying here till April sixteenth.'

March twenty-first. 'At 10:30 a.m., Professor Brij Khare came and brought five high school students to discuss with Krishnaji as the first of a three-day seminar. It was videotaped in color. In the afternoon, Krishnaji helped Alasdair plant *podocarpas*in place of camellias on the east side of the house by the hall window.'

The next day, 'At 9:30, Krishnaji discussed with college students brought by Khare, and at 11 a.m., Krishnaji conducted another discussion, this time with four high school teachers. Both were videotaped in color. In the afternoon, Krishnaji again planted shrubs in the garden with Alasdair. Max did repairs on the house. I did income tax preparation.'

The twenty-third. 'At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a dialogue with Khare and a group of college professors. It was videotaped and completed the series. Krishnaji helped Alasdair plant a pittosporum tree outside my bedroom window. I worked on tax data. Miranda telephoned, and said she is coming down in two weeks.'

March twenty-fourth. 'Two people came to lunch who were inspecting the Oak Grove for the school accreditation. Afterwards, Krishnaji went with Theo to the dentist, and I went to Green Thumb for more shrubs and flowers, then to Cohen's office to sign my deposition. I talked to both Cohen and Comis. Meanwhile, Krishnaji and Alasdair planted a bigger pittosporum next to where the pepper tree was. The Siddoos arrived to stay at the Lilliefelts'.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji received a threatening letter from Mima Porter.' [Chuckles.] 'Cohen advises no reply. Krishnaji saw the Siddoos for an hour. They decided to close their Wolf Lake School for at least a year. I worked on income tax matters and marketed. Krishnaji did more planting with Alasdair, and we put climbing roses up my porch.' They're in bloom right now, pretty pink ones. [S chuckles.]

The twenty-sixth, 'I continued on income tax work. Krishnaji rested. At 4 p.m., the Siddoos, who had asked for a meeting, came here with Erna and Theo, Alan Hooker, Mark, David Moody, and the Bohms to talk with Krishnaji about school problems.' Since they were closing their school, I'm not sure what school problems they were interested in.

The next day, 'I left at 7:15 a.m. for Beverly Hills for an eye exam. Then, to Henry Bamberger about income tax matters. Then more errands in Beverly Hills and Westwood. I saw Winky, bought records, cassettes, and a Sony Walkman, and got home by 5:45 p.m. Krishnaji was gardening. "I felt you coming," he said. And then he said, "Gardening agrees with me. I must do it at Brockwood." Then later he said, "You must outlive me."'

'Me: "Why?"'

'Krishnaji: "To look after this person."'

'Me: "Others would line up to do that."' [Chuckles.]

Waiting to be interviewed on TV in the West Wing of Brockwood (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

‘Krishnaji: “I don’t want them.”’ [S chuckles warmly.]

March twenty-eighth. ‘Krishnaji had another discussion with teachers and parents of the Oak Grove School at 11 a.m. Asit arrived from New York. At the Los Angeles airport, he got a Hertz car, and will stay for a few days. He had supper with Krishnaji and me.’

The next day, ‘Asit had breakfast with Krishnaji and me. At 11 a.m., there was a teacher’s meeting with Krishnaji. In the afternoon, Krishnaji did more planting with Alasdair on the east side of the house.’

There’s really nothing the next day, and on the day after, there is only that Krishnaji talked to the teachers at 4 p.m.

April first, ‘A couple named Jacobson came to see Krishnaji briefly at 12:30 p.m. Jackie Kornfeld, who is in Ojai for a week, came to lunch. David and Saral returned from Los Angeles and Laguna, and there was a discussion on computers between Krishnaji, Asit, and David, with teachers and others listening. In the middle of it, Krishnaji began to call David by his first name for the first time.’ [Chuckles.] He’d only known him for twenty years, roughly. [Both laugh again.]

S: Yes, well, one doesn’t want to become familiar too soon. [Chuckles.]

M: No. Exactly. He called me Mrs. Zimbalist for the first seven years that he was my house guest. [Both laugh.] One mustn’t rush into…uh…

S: Exactly, overfamiliarity.

M: The second. ‘I took Asit out to breakfast at the Oxnard Hilton Inn from where he caught his bus to the Los Angeles Airport and onto Singapore. I drove to Malibu and spent the morning and lunched with Amanda and Phil. Amanda and I went up Corral Canyon to see Elfriede and her house, then I returned to Ojai. Krishnaji, in the afternoon, had given an interview to Patricia Hunt-Perry.’ Do you remember her?

S: Yes, I do.

M: April third, ‘At 11 a.m., there was a discussion between Krishnaji and invited guests: D. Bohm, Dr. Ovenden, Rabbi Singer, Dr. Sarkar, Dr. van Groenou, somebody Rexroth, and Dr. Patricia Hunt-Perry. David Shainberg arrived in the afternoon. All but Shainberg lunched at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji gardened with Alasdair in the afternoon. I went to tea and a discussion without Krishnaji at Arya Vihara at 5 p.m. I also ordered gravel for the east garden.’

The next day, ‘Again, at 11 a.m., the second meeting of the discussion group. All were at lunch at Arya Vihara. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw privately Rabbi Dr. Singer, one of the group.’

April fifth. ‘There was the third and final discussion with the group at 11 a.m. Krishnaji and I both had a quiet afternoon.’

The next day, ‘I spent most of the day working at my desk. Jackie Kornfeld saw Krishnaji at 12:30 p.m. Gravel was delivered to the east garden. Krishnaji worked with Alasdair, laying a sprinkler system. He also went to the dentist and has a new plate.’

The seventh. ‘I continued my desk work and did laundry. I went with Krishnaji to the dentist, Dr. Meinig, to have the new dental plate adjusted. Then, Krishnaji wanted to be in on the spreading of the gravel in the east garden. It is complete and looks very nice. Krishnaji is pleased.’

S: Let me just ask you about something that I’ve been curious about. All of this dental work that Krishnaji had…

M: He was always going to the dentist.

S: Right. But, before you were in the picture, what dental work had he had?

M: I don’t know.

S: I’m wondering if he had to have all this work because it had previously been neglected.

M: Well, he must have, but in fact, I don’t know. I have no answer. But he always had dental trouble when I knew him. Krishnaji had been to Dr. Meinig, this one mentioned here, before. He knew him, and he was the only dentist in town. He was a good dentist. So, he took care of Krishnaji and he took care of me too when I moved here. And when he retired, the person who took over his practice, I’m still going to him here in Ojai.

S: Alright. I just asked because I wondered if Krishnaji’s teeth weren’t looked after properly before you came into the picture; whether this was just another area in which, you know, things were neglected.

M: I don’t know. I mean, he must’ve gone. Everybody goes to the dentist.

S: Yes, but if he only went when there was trouble, that’s not preventative treatment.

M: I don’t know. I’ve nothing that I can answer.

April eighth. ‘I went to Los Angeles, to a doctor for my peripheral vision tests, then met Mr. Schwartz at the Fabric House’—that was the man who got me into wholesale places for furniture ‘and got something for the sofa in the guest house. I had my hair cut. Left some photos at Lens Art, did other errands, and got back by 6:30 p.m. Krishnaji had seen teachers in a long discussion. Erna says that Rajagopal claims he is in bed with cataracts and a hernia and hasn’t been able to sort out his papers, so next week’s examination by Erna and me of the materials Rajagopal claims are his is impossible.' We wanted to visit the archives. We had the court agreement which determined that we could go to the archives anytime we wanted, and he always tried to abort it, or postpone it. 'Narasimhan telephoned to know Krishnaji's whereabouts.'

The next day was 'desk work and housekeeping for me, and bad news from my tax man about the large sum I owe on the sale of the Malibu house. Krishnaji went to the dentist Meinig in the morning with Theo. David Shainberg left.'

April tenth, 'In the morning, I did desk work, then after lunch, Krishnaji and I went to the Oak Grove to help plant fifty trees around the main school building.'

The eleventh. 'Krishnaji held another discussion with parents and teachers of the Oak Grove School. Max put wooden dividers in the china cupboard to protect them from earthquakes. It was Krishnaji's idea.' You know, those little vertical stops so that, when the house shakes from earthquakes, the dishes don't fall on the floor.

S: Right. [Laughs.]

M: Krishnaji thought of that.

S: Did he, now?

M: 'Max also finished the front door, and put copper gutters on the roof over the front door. Krishnaji planted Cape jasmine with Alasdair while I walked around the block with Erna and Theo. Krishnaji and I both fell asleep at supper while eating' [both laugh] 'with the trays.' We used to sit in his room, he in his bed with a tray, and I had my tray in that big red Saarinen chair, and we watched the news on television.

S: Right.

M: April twelfth, 'Miranda and Amanda drove up and spent two hours with me in the morning. They left before one, as Miranda had to get back to San Francisco. Meanwhile, at Arya Vihara, Krishnaji talked to teachers and parents. I marketed and walked around the block with Erna and Theo. Krishnaji was tired, so he watered the garden a bit. After supper, he went early to sleep.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated letters, after which I worked at the desk most of the day. Krishnaji finished planting with Alasdair a Cape honeysuckle on the east side of the house, and was tired in the evening.'

The fourteenth. 'Krishnaji slept well but is still tired. We watched the space shuttle return to Earth and land perfectly on a dry lakebed at Edward's Air Force Base. Krishnaji said, "How marvelous," and then, "They don't have to go through customs."' [Both laugh.] 'The Bohms and Willa watched it here too.' Willa was a very good, nice secretary in those days for Erna and the Foundation. 'Krishnaji went to the dentist Meinig with Theo, while I continued with my desk work. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji and David did a dialogue on sacredness and why most of mankind doesn't reach it. Booth was absent, so I taped it on the Nagra.' Booth?

S: Booth Harris. He was from the South, and he was doing recording things.

M: Yes. I'm glad you remembered. He still lives in Ojai.

April fifteenth. 'I posted my income tax return with the necessary checks, then marketed. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with teachers and parents, which I taped on the Nagra. Krishnaji watered and did things in the garden until 7 p.m., making for a late supper.'

The only thing of note the next day is that, 'at 5 p.m. Krishnaji talked for an hour with Dr. Hidley.'

The seventeenth. 'I worked at the desk most of the day. Krishnaji gardened with Alasdair. We had supper at 6:30 p.m.—a much better time, Krishnaji feels.' Well, I guess it was earlier than 7 or so, don't know what was better about it. [S chuckles.] 'I sent an Easter telegram to Filomena signed Ojai and Malibu,' meaning the Dunnes and me.

S: Right.

M: April eighteenth, 'At 11 a.m., Krishnaji had a discussion with teachers and parents. A Dr. Shah and wife from Ahmedabad came to lunch, and so did both Blaus'—that would be Evelyne and Lou. 'I talked briefly to Lou about moneys I owe KFA. Krishnaji slept most of the afternoon and we again had a 6:30 p.m. supper.'

April nineteenth, 'I spoke to my family at the Vineyard. Krishnaji had another discussion with the teachers and parents at 11 a.m. The Bohms left for Canada in the afternoon. There was rain all day. We rested in the afternoon, and had an early supper. "6:30 suits me," said Krishnaji.'

The twentieth of April. 'I again worked at my desk and did laundry. The rain is over. It was a beautiful day, and Krishnaji worked in the garden with Alasdair. Sidney Field brought Krishnaji the manuscript he has written about Krishnaji, a memoir.' Oh, then there's a lot about various children of my family members coming.

S: Right.

M: 'Krishnaji had said on returning for lunch, "I feel very young."'

The twenty-first, 'A letter came from Mary Lutyens saying that her sister Barbie had committed suicide. I spoke to our lawyer Cohen about Krishnaji's deposition, which is on for Thursday. Christensen wanted it postponed so that Rajagopal could "be available," but Cohen said that Krishnaji was available only this week. Rajagopal is said to be going to have an operation in May. Krishnaji raked the garden with Alasdair. He wore the Mexican straw hat that Alan Kishbaugh brought him.' [Chuckles.] It's in the closet in there. Is it known to you and everybody that Krishnaji once had sunstroke, before my time, in India, and that's why he always walked in the late afternoon, when the sun wasn't as strong? And he also would wear a hat because of the sun when he worked in the garden.

S: Right. And he frequently used a parasol when he went out for walks in India.

M: Yes.

S: How old was he when he had the sunstroke?

M: I don't know. I mean, it wasn't recent, in my knowing him.

S: No, no, no.

M: I suppose it was, you know, when he went back to India after the war in the forties.

S: Ah ha.

M: I imagine. He never said when he'd had it. But that sounds plausible, as he was there in India for a long time then.

S: Right. Yes.

M: The twenty-second. 'We drove up Maricopa Highway. Krishnaji's deposition was canceled by Rajagopal as Rajagopal will not be available tomorrow. We telephoned Mary about her sister's death. I did desk work. Krishnaji gardened. Krishnaji, about the Maricopa drive, said he wished we could have a cabin away from everything. And later he said, "I felt like disappearing."' That, also, I think we've discussed.

S: Yes.

M: 'I went with Frances to buy porch chairs.'

April twenty-third. 'Krishnaji and I went with Erna and Theo to Santa Barbara for Krishnaji's tax clearance so he could leave the country. We lunched at Crosby'—I don't know, must've been a restaurant, I don't remember it. 'Then, came back in time for Krishnaji and Booth Harris to wash and put a resin finish on the green Mercedes. Naudé came in time for supper. He's staying a few days. We all had supper on trays. Krishnaji said to me, "I'm glad you're here."'

The twenty-fourth, 'At 10 a.m., Krishnaji, Alain, Erna, Theo, and I talked about Alain's plan to publish a magazine and go around giving talks. What resulted was to wish him well, but to say that the Foundation would not be involved.' That was a sort of failed attempt to have Alain in the work.

S: Yes.

M: The next day. 'Alain had another talk with Krishnaji, after which he drove back to San Francisco. He goes to London and then to South Africa on May tenth. I, too, had a talk with him before he left, wishing him well with what he wants to do.' And, well, some money thing.[1] 'Max came and did adjustments to the house. Krishnaji decided to paint the front door.' The front door was natural but it got wet with the rain and made water spots. So, we decided to paint it. Krishnaji decided it, but I wanted it done, too. 'I went for paint, but the store was closed. The house once again is quiet and at peace after people's departures.'

April twenty-sixth. 'Daylight Savings Time begins. We had a quiet morning; gray and cold. In the morning, I did my usual desk work, then Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to the Ranch House to lunch with the Hookers'—that was the local good restaurant. It was owned by the Hookers, and they had invited us. 'Then I went back to my desk. I made Krishnaji supper, but I fasted after a large lunch.' [Chuckles.]

The twenty-seventh. 'At 8:30, I went for paint for the door, a Pompeian red; and posted papers to Mary Lutyens. At 10 a.m., there was a trustee meeting: school matters in the morning. Krishnaji attended. Mark and David Moody were there as well. In the afternoon, Krishnaji put the second resin polish on KMN1'—his car, the green one—'and Booth helped him. The other trustees went on with the meeting. Evelyne brought an NBC request for an interview with Krishnaji on their "Odyssey" program and for taping it on the eighteenth, and Krishnaji agreed. It is a tight schedule. I talked to Miranda in the evening, she returns from Malibu to San Francisco tomorrow.'

April twenty-eighth, 'I took the diesel car to be serviced at Dieter's, and in a rental car, stopped by the customs office at Oxnard to register my camera and the Omega watch.' That's so I wouldn't have to pay duty when I come back with them. 'I came back to the house in time for a delivery truck with the two granite nandis' [S laughs] 'sent from Madras by Jayalakshmi. It took Max, Alasdair, Ted Cartee, and three men to move, unload, and place each of them. One is on the low wall facing the courtyard and the front door, and the other is on the low wall under the new pittosporum tree off the living room. Krishnaji said, "I am already doing things to them."' And I put in parentheses: '(to make them sacred).'

S: Yes. [Said very softly.]

M: And he also told me that I must put a garland around them in the beginning to make them feel at home.

S: [chuckles]…which you still do!

M: Well, someone does. Alasdair did it yesterday.

S: Put flowers.

M: He put flowers. Alasdair likes things like that.

S: Yes.

M: So, they usually have flower offerings if we have flowers in bloom.

S: Yes. [Chuckles.]

M: The twenty-ninth. 'It was a hot day again, ninety-five degrees. We went out to look at the nandis, and gave them flowers, pink ones, this time, as a crown. "This is real worship," said Krishnaji gaily.' [Laughs.] 'I returned the rental car in Oxnard and brought back the diesel, and posted Mother's ruby ring to my brother. It is needed for Wooge's'—that's our stepfather—'estate appraisal. After lunch, the water was off. I fussed at getting a plumber. Air conditioning is a boon in the bedroom wing.' This wing had it.

S: Yes.

M: 'In the evening, we watched a film on Oppenheimer. Krishnaji was appalled by scenes of Hiroshima. "Mankind must be mad," he said. The obsession with pleasure may be because people know this is there, said Krishnaji.'

The thirtieth. 'It is very hot. I worked most of the day at my desk. I talked to a man who will videotape the talks. Krishnaji and Booth washed and resin-waxed the diesel.' Oh, that was nice. 'The van der Stratens telephoned from the Oxnard Hilton.' [Both chuckle.]

S: Just to say, about this resining business, I remember it. I'm sure that that resin is resin that I acquired…

M: Really?

S: Yes, but it's only worth mentioning because this is Krishnaji's wonderful tendency to always bring whatever he finds in one country to another country, [M. laughs] because it's somehow more valuable there. So, I had found this resin in England, and I had used it on the gray Mercedes at Brockwood. Anyway, Krishnaji was so thrilled with it, he wanted to bring some here.

M: My god, you mean all the way from England?

S: Of course. So, [chuckles] when I finally cleared out my cabinet storage from Brockwood, when I moved back to the US in the year 2000, I still had some resin left over, [laughing] cans that were brand-new. [M laughs.] Yes, because Krishnaji wanted us to get some, you know, so I'd gotten some for there and some for here.

M: As if resin was unknown in the USA.

S: Exactly, as though there wasn't lots of resin here that you could easily get. [Both laugh.]

M: Oh, goodness.

S: [laughs again] But, it was more important to bring it yourself from some other place, it was much more valuable because of that than anything you could get here.

Waiting to be interviewed on TV in the West Wing of Brockwood (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: Yes. Maybe we've got some left, for all I know, out in the garage! [Both laugh again.]

May first. 'Max painted the front door red. Suzanne and Hugues van der Straten came at 10:30 a.m., and we all lunched at Arya Vihara.'

The second. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his first Ojai talk in the Oak Grove. I sat by the video truck to advise.' I don't know why I would've done that, but anyway, I apparently did. At lunch at Arya Vihara was just Frances McCann, Michael, Krishnaji, and I. I cooked our early supper. Then, in a misty drizzle, we walked to the Lilliefelts' to tea with them and the van der Stratens. Early to bed.'

S: Mary, sorry for just stopping here for a minute, but you said you didn't know why you were sitting by the video truck to advise. I think I remember that there had been some unhappiness with how things had looked. So, you were advising on the filming to…

M: Could be. That's blank in my memory.

S: Yes.

M: The next day 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his second Ojai talk in the Oak Grove. I sat in the video truck, advising again.' We came back to a quiet lunch at Arya Vihara with Michael. I cooked our supper early.'

May fourth. 'A new sofa for the guest flat was delivered. Max finished painting the red door. There was telephoning people, and the sorting of questions for tomorrow's question-and-answer meeting. Vicky Orfali and her brother came by. I looked at video stills of Krishnamurti schools and his voice made by Mendizza. It was quite good. Mrs. Thomas from Rishi Valley is staying at Arya Vihara for a week and was at lunch. I worked on the questions in the afternoon and made supper.' Instead of at the end of the talks, as he had it in Saanen, Krishnaji would have the question-and-answer sessions between the talks in Ojai.

S: Yes.

M: The fifth. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji's first question-and-answer meeting was held in the Oak Grove. At 3 p.m., the trustees, plus Mark and David Moody, met here in the cottage. Krishnaji attended initially, and then worked in the garden with Alasdair. He had a stomachache at supper time.'

May sixth. 'I drove to Malibu and spent an hour and a half with Amanda and Phil. Then went on to Beverly Hills for a haircut and some errands. I drove back to Ojai by 5 p.m. Krishnaji said he awoke with an extraordinary feeling, unlike anything he'd ever had before. It was a feeling of tremendous power, not to do anything, just power.'

The seventh. 'I telephone Filomena in Rome as it is her birthday. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer meeting in the Oak Grove. I sat in the video van. We went to the cobbler for shoes in Meiners Oaks, where Krishnaji ordered a pair of sandals for India. Mrs. Thomas of Rishi Valley, who is staying at Arya Vihara, was at lunch, and came to the cottage afterward.'

There was nothing of note the next day.

On the ninth, my diary says, 'a warm day. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his third Ojai talk. Merali and Ugo Baldi came to lunch. At 2:30 p.m., I went back to the Oak Grove for a meeting of the Krishnaji Information Center people. It lasted till 5 p.m. I got back in time to cook supper. Pupul arrived at 8:15 p.m. Theo had met her at the Los Angeles Airport.'

May tenth. ‘Krishnaji gave his fourth Ojai talk. At the Arya Vihara lunch, there were Pupul, Merali, and Professor Khare. There was talk of Pupul’s book, The Earthen Drum, and what she felt in writing it.’ I remember the title but nothing else. Anyway. ‘Robert and Betsy Mitchell, sent by Blanche Mathias, came to tea and to meet Krishnaji. Krishnaji, Pupul, and I had supper by the television. Mitterand was elected French president over Giscard d’Estaing.’

The next day I just worked on questions for the question-and-answer meeting on the twelfth.

May twelfth. ‘It was Krishnaji’s eighty-sixth birthday, but nobody ever mentions that’ [S chuckles] ‘on pain of his displeasure.’ [M chuckles.] ‘So, at 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the third question-and-answer meeting in the Grove. There was a tea at the school in the afternoon, and Krishnaji came to it. Krishnaji, Pupul, and I had supper on trays. Then, she, the Lilliefelts, Hooker, Evelyne, and I, with Michael Mendizza, looked at two-and-a-half hours of Mendizza film of Krishnaji.’

The next day, ‘The pope is shot in St. Peter’s Square. There were television bulletins about it all day. At 4 p.m., I drove Pupul to Rajagopal’s. While she was there, I worked on questions for Krishnaji in the Grove, and then I picked her up, and came back to tea. Pupul dined out. Krishnaji and I had a quiet supper.’

The fourteenth. ‘At 6:45 a.m., after breakfast, Pupul left with Theo to visit Ray Eames. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the fourth question-and-answer meeting in the Grove. The weather was cold and later there was a drizzle. After the meeting, we went to fit his sandals. After lunch, there was a trustee meeting with Mark and David to discuss fundraising for a secondary school. Merali will provide matching funds to what we can raise. Krishnaji saw Bill Quinn and then Frances.’

May fifteenth. ‘Krishnaji slept long and well last night and again in the morning. I worked at the desk. Frances McCann came to lunch, and to see the nandis and the four chairs she has given for the terrace. I took her back to the village, then did some errands. The car was washed, and I came back in time to make supper. I had a talk on the telephone with Lou Blau about my continuing this year’s payments on the amount of purchase price.’ This is that complicated deal that I think I’ve explained…

S: Yes. You have.

M: …where I had to buy this place and then donate it back. And I did it in different increments.

S: Yes.

M: ‘There’s one more payment for the McAndrew Road property, and then I’ll turn it over to the KFA in another year.’

The sixteenth. 'It was a beautiful day. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his fifth Ojai talk. Bill Quinn and Narayan's brother, G. Krishnamurti'—that's as opposed to J. The G stands for Giddu, pronounced the same as Jiddu, but for some reason it spelled it with a G.

S: Hm.

M: Anyway, 'Narayan's brother, G. Krishnamurti, came to lunch.' Then a lot of my step-relatives came for tea.

May seventeenth. 'It was another perfect day. I spoke to Bud and Lisa in New York about Pupul.' I don't want to explain that. Never mind Pupul. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his sixth Ojai talk, a deeply moving one.[2] Eloquent. There was a huge crowd. We stopped to fit Krishnaji's sandals in Meiners Oaks. Sidney Field, and Ben Weininger'—he was a psychiatrist who lived in Santa Barbara—'and Fundación people were at Arya Vihara for lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji saw Jerry Dunn, who wrote an article on the Oak Grove School and is doing a book on nationalism. Then, Krishnaji and Booth Harris washed the green car, KMN1.'

S: Who was this Weininger?

M: He was a psychiatrist, and he lived in Santa Barbara.

S: And he was interested in the teachings?

M: Yes, and he'd known Krishnaji for a long time before I came around.

S: Ah, ha. I never met him.

M: Well, he was always at the Ojai talks. I mean, he never went anywhere else.

May eighteenth. 'In the green car, taking Evelyne with us, Krishnaji and I left at 11:30 a.m. for Malibu. Krishnaji drove from the poplar trees to Zuma Beach.' That's the part of the route he liked to drive, so at that big rock, we'd change places. 'We had a picnic lunch with us and ate it with Amanda and Phil on their terrace. It was a brief, precious visit for me. We then drove through Malibu Canyon to the NBC Studios in Burbank, where Alan Kishbaugh met us. Krishnaji was interviewed by Keith Berwick.' He had a regular Sunday program called "Odyssey." 'Afterward, Richard Chamberlain asked to meet Krishnaji.' He's that actor. At 4:40 p.m., Krishnaji, Alan, and I drove back to Ojai via Route 5, Fillmore, and Santa Paula.'

The next day is, 'Desk work and more desk work, packing, and paying bills.'

May twentieth, 'I finished packing, and doing laundry. Dieter's son put the cars up on blocks, and disconnected things for the summer. I spoke to Miranda, Winky, and Amanda. My brother telephoned just as I was leaving for lunch at Arya Vihara. I saw

Katie Marx. After lunch, for once, without hurry, Krishnaji and I said goodbye to everyone and went with Mark and David Moody to the Oak Grove School, where the children were clustered, then along the sea to Los Angeles Airport. Kishbaugh came to see Krishnaji off. We left on TWA at 5 o'clock for London.'

May twenty-first. 'I slept little on the flight. Heathrow was taking only eight landings an hour due to a strike, but we were lucky and came in around noon. Dorothy and Ingrid met us. Krishnaji exclaimed at the beauty of the greenness of the trees all the way back to Brockwood. The school was out to greet him. Frances arrived from Ojai yesterday. Dr. Parchure and his wife, Vatsala, and Rajesh are also here. Neither Krishnaji nor I could eat, so we rested a little and then Krishnaji wanted to walk. We went with Dorothy to look at where Krishnaji might start a rose garden. Walking around the grove, we saw the azaleas in bloom. I fixed our supper and fell asleep by 8:30 p.m., but not before talking to Mary Links.'

The twenty-second. 'I spent much of the day unpacking, but had a walk in the afternoon with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and the dogs across the fields. How beautiful it is. I have new bookshelves in my room, which are very nice. Pupul rang from Oxford. She and Radhika'—that's her daughter—'Hans, and Maya'—that's their daughter—'will come here tomorrow. Krishnaji again spoke of "you must outlive me." Hence, I must not go to India this year; it is too hard on me physically.' That's what he was saying.

May twenty-third. 'I went to West Meon to get coffee, and good butter for Krishnaji. Mary L. arrived early. She, Krishnaji, and I sat and talked at length in the kitchen. Joe joined us before lunch. Then, Pupul came with her family. She is in the West Wing spare room. After lunch, Krishnaji, Mary, Joe, Pupul, Radhika, Hans and I had coffee and talked for quite a while in the drawing room. Mary and Joe left; and after a rest, Krishnaji and I walked with Dorothy and the dogs.'

The next day, 'I typed the dates of 1976 for Mary.' That's for the second biography. 'After lunch, a nap, then again a walk with Dorothy and the dogs. I talked to Betsy.'

May twenty-fifth. 'A BBC television crew arrived in the morning to set up for the afternoon recording. At 3:30 p.m., Bernard Levin came, and he and Krishnaji did a discussion that was videotaped for Levin's series on eight conversations with interesting people for BBC2. It was done in the drawing room and went exceedingly well, a good interview.' I've thought since it was a terrible interview. It was too short.

S: It was too short.

M: 'Levin had done no homework, so he didn't know what questions to ask and he was a little bit baffled by Krishnaji, I think. I may be wrong. Anyway, 'it was a first-rate technical recording. Pupul and the school were able to see it on the school monitor as it was happening.'

Nothing of note the next day, but on the twenty-seventh, 'The Mercedes was put in commission.' That was the gray car that I kept over there for driving Krishnaji. 'I went to Alresford on errands. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held an audiotaped discussion on "What is god? Can one discuss it?" with Pupul, Scott, Harsh, Shakuntala, me, and Frode. "When there is a meditator, there is no meditation."' That was what Krishnaji said. 'In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Dorothy, the dogs, and I walked, and in the evening, Krishnaji, Pupul, and I watched a tension-filled film on TV about a submarine disaster.'

May twenty-eighth, 'I went to meet Mary Cadogan at the Petersfield train station. Professor Ravi Ravindra and his friend, Professor Ulbricht, turned up for lunch. Pupul left at 3 p.m. for Oxford. Krishnaji talked to Sue Jay about a television interview around the time of the Brockwood Gathering.' She was a woman who reported for the BBC or ITV, I can't remember which. 'Krishnaji agreed to it. Then, he talked to Ravindra and Ulbricht. I saw the tape of the Levin interview; it is good.' I now don't really think it is good.

S: It was alright. Just alright.

M: I must've thought it was alright because I wouldn't have written it was good if I didn't. Anyway, subsequently, I was less impressed.

May twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji and I drove to Petersfield and took the train to London. Joe and Mary met us. Krishnaji had a Huntsman fitting, and we then lunched with Mary at Fortnum. We spoke of Alain, his plans and problems. Krishnaji and I went to Hatchards for books, and while he had his hair cut at Truefitt, I ordered spectacles at Meyrowitz. [Chuckles.] 'We found a taxi and got to Waterloo. Browsed for thrillers and came back by train.'

S: Why do you think Alain's proposals were not accepted? It just wasn't a good proposal, or people didn't like him? Or what?

M: His proposal was too vague.

S: Too vague?

M: Yes. After Alain left, his enthusiasm for the teachings blew hot and cold. Sometimes, he would come and stay, and it would be very congenial, but I don't know. It just didn't work out. Things weren't pursued, I don't think. He talked about things, but didn't act.

S: He didn't act on them?

M: No. I don't think he knew what he wanted to do.

S: Yes.

M: His leaving, whatever the impetus was that got him to leave, was definite to him, but then his life was sort of spotty after that, at least, from my perspective. But the friendship, friendliness, continued. In fact, he keeps calling me now all the time. The other day, he called and said, "I don't know how you are; you haven't called to let me know." And I replied, "Well, I didn't want to call up and tell you boring things about my foot." "No, no," he said, "You should. I want to know." When he left, there was partly an antagonism toward me. I don't know, how can I say things for him? But he had a history of enthusiasm for something and then pulling away and going somewhere else. I don't know. His leaving was a strain, unpleasant, really.

S: Yes, I remember your description.

Waiting to be interviewed on TV in the West Wing of Brockwood (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: But then after he was gone, whatever made him leave wore off. And so, I made it clear to him that he was always welcome to come and stay in Malibu if we were there and do whatever he wanted. And he did to some extent early on.

S: Yes. I'm trying to always think of the questions that posterity will ask. You know, just to make as complete a picture as we can.

M: Yes, yes. Well, he came with great enthusiasm; and he worked hard, and was very useful in bringing young people to talks and discussions. He liked the young and he…

S: …he was good at it.

M: He was good at it. Anyway, let's move on.

The thirtieth. 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed, including meals on trays. He talked to Scott in the morning and Rajesh at 4 p.m.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school at noon. And there was the usual walk in the afternoon.

June first. 'Krishnaji held a meeting in the morning with Scott, Dorothy, and me. In the afternoon, I took Frances to Alresford to get something she wanted to buy. I returned to attend the school meeting at 5 p.m. Krishnaji decided to visit Deventer in September and give two talks in Amsterdam.' Were you at the lunch table when that was decided?

S: I can't remember.

M: Well, Krishnaji always sat in his seat…

S: I remember.

M: …with Dorothy on his right.

S: Yes.

M: And I generally sat across the table so I could talk to both. At this particular lunch, Dorothy and I were talking about Anneke opening the Krishnamurti Library at Deventer; she was putting all her Krishnaji books there, which later on we all went to. Krishnaji wasn't part of the conversation, but Dorothy and I were talking, and I think I said something like, "You know, Dorothy, you and I ought to go to that. Anneke's gone to such trouble; we ought to go." And she said, "Yes, let's. Let's go in September." And Krishnaji, who wasn't part of the conversation, but he heard it, said, "Oh, I'll come, too, and I'll give a couple of talks in Amsterdam." [S chuckles.] Well, I knew that to book the RAI Hall in Amsterdam, which is what he would need because it was the only hall big enough to hold the people who would show up, you had to book it years before…

S: Yes.

M: Because they're always booked.

S: Of course.

M: And so, I thought, "Oh my lord, if Krishnaji just decides he'll give a talk, we may not get the hall.' So, I went upstairs and called Anneke and said, "Anneke, are you sitting down?" [S laughs.] And she said, "Yes, Mary! Yes, what is it?!" [mimicking Anneke with voice]. And I told her what Krishnaji had said at lunch, and she said, "Oh my goodness! Oh my goodness! I must try…" and then, "I'll call you back." And, unbelievably, or who knows what lies behind these things, [S chuckling] the RAI was booked for two solid years (as expected); but it had one weekend where it wasn't booked, and that's how he came to have the hall. It was just fate, or something.

S: Yes, yes. Extraordinary.

M: We'll get to that later.

S: Yes, we will.

M: June second, 'I worked at the desk. Krishnaji was awakened by thunder at 2 a.m. and stayed awake. So, he slept after breakfast, but talked to students only at noon. I telephoned to reserve our rooms for the night of July third at the Hotel des Bergues'—that's in Geneva. 'I took Frances to Alresford on errands. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked with the dogs; and we considered putting the roses that Krishnaji wants to plant in the old rose garden after all, but in a new pattern with the soil fixed.' I don't know what that was.

S: I believe that the soil in the old rose garden had what was called rose sickness.

M: Oh?

S: Yes. Roses had been growing there for over 200 years, and apparently after roses have been growing for…

M: 200 years!

S: …that amount of time [chuckles], it gets what's called "rose sick." I'm not really sure about this.

M: Never heard of that.

S: And you have to take the roses out for x amount of years before you can put them back in again, or you have to replace the soil.

M: Well, I must be careful. The roses here have only been here since 1970-something.

S: Then you have 170 years to go! [Both chuckle.]

M: I wonder if Alasdair knows that? I'll ask him.

S: I'm sure he does.

M: The next day it is just about Betsy coming to visit. And June fourth, my diary says, 'A Mr. and Mrs. Jackson brought two Buddhist monks to lunch, the venerable Ananda Maitreya, an eighty-five-year-old Sri Lankan, and the Venerable Ajahn Sumedho, a younger American abbot of the monastery near Midhurst.'

S: Ahh. Yes. I remember him.

M: 'Krishnaji, in answer to Mr. Jackson's question on meditation, spoke to them for almost an hour. In spite of wind and rain, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. Anneke telephoned that she had engaged the hall at the RAI in Amsterdam for two talks in September. She was triumphant.'

June fifth, 'I took Frances to Alresford Surgery, where she saw Dr. Reilly about the medicine she was taking. Dr. Reilly also looked at my right foot, which has been sore. When we came back to Brockwood, we saw the Marogers had just arrived. Diane now walks, although she needs two sticks. Krishnaji spoke after lunch to Mrs. Thomas and Rajesh about Rishi Valley. Then, he saw Diane. Then we went for a short walk. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji spoke to the staff on knowledge, and that it has never transformed man. Krishnaji spoke on the telephone to Anneke. He is very pleased at going to Holland. Then, he spoke to David Bohm, who isn't well enough to come tomorrow.'

The sixth. 'Pupul arrived from London for the weekend. After a short walk, Krishnaji spoke to the staff from 5 p.m. for two hours. I talked with Marie-Bertrande and Jean-Michel after supper.'

June seventh. 'We chased sheep off of the lawn.' They would sometimes escape from the pasture and come onto the lawn. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji talked to Genevieve, Gérard, and the Marogers about Gérard starting a school in Neuilly.' That's in Paris. 'At noon, there was a dialogue between Pupul and Krishnaji on death. It was videotaped. The school was listening intently. There was a special atmosphere. Radhika and Hans were there. Later, Krishnaji talked to them, Mrs. Thomas, and Rajesh about Rishi Valley, and the Herzbergers going there. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked in the rain. In the evening, Krishnaji, Pupul, and I watched an old film, Fanny, with Leslie Caron, Chevalier, and Boyer.'

June eighth. 'Pupul left for London, Paris, and Delhi. Mary Cadogan came down at 9:30 a.m., and all morning she and Jean-Michel Maroger, Gisèle Balleys, Dorothy, and I discussed French publications, and then Saanen matters after lunch. From 4:30 p.m. for an hour and a half, I was in a meeting on Rishi Valley with Krishnaji, Radhika and Hans Herzberger, Mrs. Thomas, and Rajesh.' A lot of meetings.

The next day Krishnaji spoke alone to the students, and on June tenth, 'Krishnaji and I took the 10:46 a.m. train to London, and were met by Joe and Mary at Waterloo. Mary went with Krishnaji to Huntsman while I went for a beauty treatment.' [S laughs.] 'I joined Krishnaji and Mary at Fortnum, where we had lunch. Then we bought jerseys for Vanda, and a lot of books, then caught the train home from Waterloo. Both of us were tired and glad to be out of the city and in the green countryside. On TV, we watched a documentary on foxes living in English cities.' I remember that. It was very interesting. [Chuckles.]

The eleventh. 'Dr. Joshua Bierce, a psychiatrist, and his daughter arrived early to talk to Krishnaji and me, and then see Frances. They stayed to lunch. I did a one-day grape fast.' People did grape fasts in those days.

S: Yes, I remember.

M: June twelfth. 'I talked to Saral and David Bohm on the telephone. He has been in the hospital for an angiogram and needs a triple heart bypass operation as soon as possible. Krishnaji spoke for two hours to the staff.'

The next day, 'I took an early train to London and went unsuccessfully to look for shoes. Betsy and I lunched in her flat, and then we went to a matinee of a play entitled Duet for One. She dropped me at Waterloo, and I came back, changing trains at Haslemere and getting back to Brockwood by a little after 7 p.m. Krishnaji had given an interview to one of the staff members, and had a long talk with Dorothy about going back to accepting younger students.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. The Bohms were to come in the afternoon, but David didn't feel up to it. Krishnaji had some hay fever.'

June fifteenth. 'I worked to try to finish the chronology for Mary Links. Sue Jay and the director of her television show came to lunch and talked afterward about filming they would do during the Brockwood gathering. I talked to Fleur on the phone and went to a school meeting.'

The next day, I spent most of it 'working at my desk and worked on chronology for Mary. Krishnaji spoke to students alone, while the staff had a meeting, which I attended, reviewing the entry age of students. Krishnaji, after lunch, talked to a Moroccan couple, Mr. and Mrs. Ketani. He is the one who is doing a thesis on Krishnaji.'

June seventeenth was a 'cold, gray day. After lunch, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I in the Mercedes drove to Wisley to look at the roses in the Royal Horticultural Garden, but few were in bloom.' Wisley is nice.

S: Yes.

M: The eighteenth, 'I went to London. I had my hair cut, shopped for some small things, then to the Queen's Gallery to see the Canaletto exhibition, and on to the National Gallery. I caught the 3:18 p.m. train back. Krishnaji had been talking to students.'

S: We ought to just say, here, that probably you went to the Canaletto…

M: …because of Joe Links.

S: Yes. Exactly.

M: Joe was the big world expert on Canaletto. He would've been advising on that exhibition.

S: Yes. And wasn't he something with the Queen's collection?

M: Yes. The Queen has a lot of Canalettos, apparently.

S: Yes, and he was the Queen's consultant on Canalettos.

M: Yes, he was.

June nineteenth. 'I am again working at my desk. My brother called from New York, and said that all is ready for Krishnaji and me in the Paris flat. Krishnaji spoke to the staff from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m.'

Waiting to be interviewed on TV in the West Wing of Brockwood (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The next day, and 'I am still working at my desk. I spoke to Mary and Alain, who is in London for two days on his way from South Africa to San Francisco. Krishnaji spoke to the staff, and described staying with something; for example: confusion and jealousy. How to stay with something. Total attention changes things. After supper, we watched a documentary on the British Raj, then the broadcast of Levin's interview of Krishnaji. Krishnaji glanced at it, and then went to brush his teeth and do the dishes.' [Both laugh.] You know, we laugh a great deal at these funny things that Krishnaji did, or things that are so specific to him…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …and unusual to anybody else who would've probably been in that spot, but I hope whoever hears this in posterity knows we're not laughing at Krishnaji.

S: No, no, I'm sure not.

M: We're laughing because it's so endearing.

S: Yes. And it was so typical of him.

M: And so typical of him, and it was something, a reason, just one more wonderful, special thing that he was and did.

S: Yes. Quite so, quite so.

M: The next day, 'I spoke to Filomena in Rome, and finally finished the chronology for Mary L. Krishnaji spoke to the school in the morning, and in the afternoon, it was open house at Brockwood. There was a puppet show to which Krishnaji went.' I don't remember that. 'There was a buffet supper on the lawn. Krishnaji ate upstairs, but came down to join in the chanting for the opening of the concert.' [Chuckles.]

June twenty-second. 'Krishnaji and I went to London. Mary and Joe met us at Waterloo. Krishnaji had a fitting at Huntsman, and then we lunched with Mary at Fortnum. Alain had left for San Francisco yesterday after a weekend in London on his way back from Pretoria. We spoke of him. I told Mary that after talking to him on the telephone Saturday, it has dawned on me that in trying to help him in practical things, I am putting him in a position which he resents.' That was a difficulty. I was worried about him. He didn't have any money.

S: Yes.

M: And I used to send him some. But I came to think it was a mistake psychologically.

S: It's extraordinary, isn't it? But I know that gratitude is one of the most difficult things for some people to bear. I don't know why, but it is. And it too often turns into contempt, or antagonism.

M: It turns into antagonism because I suppose it increases the sense of…

S: There's a feeling of debt, or indebtedness…or…

M: Yes, indebtedness, which creates resentment.

S: Yes. I find it extraordinary. I never would've imagined it, but I saw it several times. There was a former female student to whom I gave a place to come back to Brockwood because she had a brain tumor, and I gave her a full scholarship just because it seemed she had to get away from her situation. And after a couple of months, she came to me in a fury and said, "I don't want to be grateful!" And I said, "Well, no one's asking you to be. I'm not asking you for that…and certainly not to me. To the place, maybe, but not…'

M: So what happened?

S: She never really stopped being slightly antagonistic. It just was exactly as you're saying; helping someone can turn out to be bad psychologically. There's something about gratitude that some people eventually can't bear.

M: Or, they can't…I don't know.

S: Some people can, but most people can't. It's quite remarkable.

M: It's sort of…a sense of…interpreted as inferiority because…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …if I have to accept charity, I mean, that awful…

S: Yes, but it's…it's…it's something about being less…it's some kind of pressure on the ego for some people.

M: Yes. Well, let's go on. My diary goes on to say that my sending Alain some money 'became a minus instead of a plus. I had sent the rent to California for his flat while he was away. And he had felt I didn't approve of his plans for a magazine, etcetera, which he had discussed with me in Ojai, and so I shouldn't send him any money.'

S: Yes.

M: But, it had nothing to do with the magazine. 'Mary had unwisely told him that I felt he was once again turning from one enthusiasm to another,' which he did. He told me that. I mean, he didn't tell it to me in that way, but before he'd come to Krishnaji, he'd been involved…first of all, he was a very fine musician, but gave it up, dropped it. Then, he became obsessed by Vedanta, and then dropped it. Then, he heard of Krishnaji, and rushed to Saanen to hear Krishnaji and then ensued all this relationship. And, then, he wanted to get out.

S: Mm, hm. I understand.

M: Yes. [Pause.] Yes, 'I said that she unwisely had told him I felt he was once again turning from one enthusiasm to another. That is so, but not the whole of it. I feel he's verging on delusions of what can be done with this magazine. But even so, it is his decision to make. My concern is that of a friend who primarily worries that he will have a roof over his head. I said this to him on the telephone. But, at the end of it, I felt I was doing harm, and that the friendship was not sound anymore, if it ever was. Mary said that by Sunday he had wanted to telephone, but delayed until it was too late, so he asked her to give me warm messages and say that everything is as it was. I feel wearily that it isn't, that it is not good enough, so I will leave things as they are. After lunch, Krishnaji and I…'

I don't know whether I should put all that in.

S: Yes. You should, otherwise there are huge gaps in the history that surrounds Krishnaji, and one is left to just wonder. You know, we all have foibles and shortcomings and flaws, we all do. And to acknowledge that is not indiscreet. It's just…

M: But, you see, I'm acknowledging his shortcomings, not mine.

S: Yes, but when we study history, and we have a first person account, a witness, we have to know what that person's opinions and prejudices and biases and perspectives were. Otherwise, we don't know how to judge what it is they're reporting. For example, if it's reported by someone who witnessed the meeting between Christopher Columbus and Queen Isabella, that Christopher Columbus was brusque and didn't handle the meeting well, etcetera, we would think one thing. But if we know that that witness didn't like Christopher Columbus, then we read that account with a slightly different understanding. So, I think for you and me, it's terribly important that we do make our perspectives, our prejudices, our likes and dislikes, transparent.

M: Mm.

S: And it's not that we're saying that what we think is absolutely true. We're saying "this is what we think," so that when I then tell you that Christopher Columbus was halting and rude and boorish, you know how to listen to what I'm saying. So, this is why I say I think it is wonderful of you that you want to be discreet about everybody, but you're human, and you have prejudices and you have likes and dislikes, and you have opinions, and those have to be known in order for history to know how to listen to what you're saying. So, you mustn't try and cover up what your opinions and prejudices are. I just think that's part of making a full record. Of course, we don't want people to be hurt, so that's why no one's hearing these recordings in an unedited way for a long time. These will only be released in full after everybody's dead, if ever; that's up to you to decide. But to not put these things down is a terrible mistake; because the other thing is who are these people that Krishnaji had to contend with in his life. I look at myself, and I want to weep that there was no one better around him than me to do the things for him that I did, I really do. And so, to show the flaws that I have is to also show the greatness of Krishnaji in having to deal with a jerk like me.

M: No. Don't… [chuckles].

S: But it's true. And to see all the shortcomings—this is why, even the things with, you know, you didn't want to mention that thing with Pupul and your brother and his wife.

M: Well, that has nothing to do with Krishnaji.

S: Well, I know that incident doesn't, but it has to do with Pupul.

M: It has to do with Pupul.

S: And the fact is that if we see the kind of people that Krishnaji had to contend with, it shows more about him. And it shows how extraordinary he was…

M: That's true.

S: …that he could sail through his life and not become demented with the crazy people around him.

M: People around him, exactly.

S: So this is why you mustn't be too protective in trying to be discrete because you're actually robbing, I think, Krishnaji of some of the richness that he had. And you're also not giving historians a chance to judge what you say in the light of your opinions and perspectives.

M: Yes. Yes.

S: Anyway. End of lecture. [Both chuckle.]

M: Okay. Big footnote. We'll go on. 'After our lunch at Fortnum's with Mary, Krishnaji and I went to visit David Bohm at his office at Birkbeck College. Krishnaji then talked privately with Dave, while Saral and I waited outside in the garden. We have not seen them since Ojai. Dave has lost weight and looked pale and vulnerable. Dave goes into hospital tomorrow for open heart surgery and a triple bypass.' David was obviously frightened to have the operation. 'Saral is frightened but strong. I sat there and talked very factually about it on the lawn behind the college while Krishnaji was alone with David for almost an hour, trying to reassure him. Krishnaji put his hands on him in healing. He said later that Dave clung to him. We took a taxi to Waterloo.'

S: We ought to just say here a little bit about Dave's whole difficulty, psychological difficulty after this. This was such a huge psychological knock for him, this heart surgery.

M: Yes, it was.

S: I, at one point, talked with Dave about it because my dad had been through it.

M: Was this before or after?

S: My father had done it many years before.

M: No, but you talked to Dave about it before his operation?

S: No, after his operation, and all these psychological difficulties. I told him that I felt that I had seen in my father, who was always a very strong, very courageous man, a complete change because of the heart surgery. I said that I felt that because the heart is such a vital part of our life, our body, that when something is happening with the heart, it sends signals to the brain, saying "Danger, danger, danger, danger, danger," and so fear comes into all kinds of things. After my father's surgery, my father would worry when I was going out for a drive some place or travel. He would say, "Watch out for this and that," or "don't lose your luggage…" all these kind of things, and I had for years traveled around the world on my own, and my father would be worried about me taking a little flight to some place. And David said that's exactly what it was like for him, and he very much appreciated the fact that I'd seen this in my father. And David was also slightly a hypochondriac, in any case.

M: Yes, and he was, at least in my observation, dependent on Saral.

S: On Saral, yes. And he wasn't quite all…someone once described David as not being fully incarnated. [M chuckles] He was not quite fully there with a lot of things. To see him doing dishes at Brockwood was absolutely a wonder. [Chuckles.]

M: The day the truck from Malibu came up to this driveway here with my belongings, it was unloaded by friends, who rushed to help. Elfriede and the gardener came, but one of the helpers was Dave, and I thought, "My god, if he picks up a lamp…"

S: I know, you want to say: 'Dave, just sit there and direct people. Don't pick up anything." [Laughs.] So, of course what that meant was when he had something physiological that was really dangerous, he was absolutely at sea.

M: Yes.

S: I think it's just important to put this down because he was such a good, sweet, and obviously brilliant man.

M: Yes. It must've helped him a lot, your talk.

S: He said it did, and we talked about it several times subsequently. I think it just needs to be mentioned here that this really was the beginning of a psychological unraveling for David.

M: Yes, it was. I think it was.

S: And that takes nothing away from his goodness, or sweetness, or brilliance.

M: Yes, alright, for June twenty-third: 'A new timer was put in the Miele dishwasher. Krishnaji spoke to the students alone. There was a staff meeting for the rest of us. After lunch, I went to East Dean, where Christopher and Phyl'—her name is Phyllis but she hated the name Phyllis—'took me on a lovely round of their garden, and especially the roses, which Krishnaji would like for Brockwood. The scent was like apples, and some of them are like lemons and honey in others. We sat by the fire and had tea. Once again, I felt the warm quiet of life lived in one place in the turning seasons of a garden, in a small village with flowers, books, music, and the glow of stillness. We all look a little older, but being with them is unchanged and a quiet hour of friendship that I treasure. I got back after 6 p.m. in time for the last half hour of Krishnaji's discussion with the staff.' They were two wonderful people, and Kit's still alive. I talked to him last week. When I asked him how he felt, and he said, "Not too well," but I couldn't get him to tell me what it was. He said it's just growing old. His health is fragile. And Phyl was the perfect counterpart to him. They were like one person.

S: Mm, how nice.

M: Yes, and I was devoted to both of them as a unit almost, and when Phyl died, to this day, that friendship is the same between him and me.

June twenty-fourth, 'Mary and Amanda drove down for the day. We all four talked at length before lunch in the drawing room and afterward over coffee in our kitchen, where we always seemed huddled enjoyably, until they left after 4 p.m. Krishnaji didn't walk because of hay fever. We watched Wimbledon instead.'

The twenty-fifth. 'David Bohm was operated on for a triple bypass today. He was in surgery from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. They found arteries in worse shape than expected and there was some damage to his heart. The actual surgery went well, but afterward his blood pressure dropped critically. He was eventually able to be moved into intensive care and only late onto his own support system. On Saral's behalf, Maurice Wilkins telephoned and reported at length to us. The next forty-eight hours are critical. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I talked. It was a strong physical feeling of holding David with our combined strength—curious feeling of immovable strength, felt in the solar plexus, as if we were holding with total firmness something that could otherwise float out with the tide. It persisted all conscious hours. When we were alone, Krishnaji said that Dave is weak, is frightened. He described again how Dave clung to him. I found myself saying, but we are strong people and we will hold him. I went to sleep feeling this and must have slept deeply, for I heard none of the following: Around midnight, Krishnaji woke up and saw a man standing at the foot of his bed. "What are you doing here?" he asked. "I want to see you," the man said. Krishnaji took him out into the hall and sat with him a few minutes on the stairs. By this time, Dorothy was there. The man, with an Irish name, had written saying he wanted a job, but was put off when his letters became a bit unbalanced. He turned up at Brockwood during the day and was difficult, so he was asked to leave. He made a show of going, but apparently hid in the library, and turned up in the Cloisters around 10:30 p.m. Brian Nicholson spotted him, and rang Dorothy when he became insistent on seeing Krishnaji. Dorothy felt the police were needed, and told Brian to watch him, but the man ran off. Frank was sent to guard the West Wing, but the man must have already got in as he first went into the spare room where Jean-Michel was spending the night.' That's the guest room, the one on the left.

S: Mm, hm. Yes.

M: 'He then went into Krishnaji's room. Soon, four detectives appeared, perhaps because of the Irish name[3]. Krishnaji went back to bed but couldn't sleep for two hours. I felt uneasy at having known nothing of all this. There should be some way for me to hear if Krishnaji needs me. Krishnaji says we must lock the West Wing doors at night.' I'm at the end of hall; I could not hear a thing.

S: Yes, no, of course not. Okay, we're running out of tape here again.

Waiting to be interviewed on TV in the West Wing of Brockwood (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

FOOTNOTES:

[1] This is explained later.

[2] For a link to the video of the talk, click here.

[3] This was during the period when there was a lot of Irish terrorism in England, as many in northern Ireland wanted independence from England.

Issue 68: June 26, 1981 to July 31, 1981

In general, this issue follows Krishnaji's and Mary's lives uneventfully from Brockwood to Paris to Gstaad. But, there are some private conversations between the two of them that are quietly remarkable.

Mary: So, we begin today with my diary entry of June twenty-six, 1981: 'Krishnaji had insufficient sleep, as he couldn't get back to sleep after last night's intruder.' You'll remember that the night before was the night that a demented Irish man broke into Krishnaji's bedroom and the police had to be called. 'I telephoned to Saral. Dave is a little better. Krishnaji spoke to her twice during the conversation. Dorothy drove Krishnaji, Jean-Michel, and me to Heathrow, where we flew on British Air, a 2:30 p.m. flight to Paris. We had a picnic lunch on the way in the car. In Paris, Jean-Michel drove us to La Tour d'Argent. Bud has lent us his flat. Krishnaji and I shopped for a little food, and other things we thought we might need, then walked across the Seine to the back of Notre Dame. When we got back to the flat, we had soup sent down from La Tour. I telephoned Dorothy, who had just heard that Dave was holding his own. I slept fitfully. It is cold in Paris.'

The twenty-seventh. 'The Marogers came at 1:45 p.m. Then Prema Srinivasan came, bringing briefly her friends Monsieur and Madame Jean-Louis Dumas. They left and Krishnaji, Prema, Marie Bertrand, Jean-Michel, and I had a good lunch at La Tour. Daisy'—that's my niece—'came by. She is touring Europe with three friends. The Marogers came with Krishnaji and me to the film Shogun.' Remember that?

Scott: Ah, yes.

M: 'We walked back from the film, and the again the Tour sent down soup, and some other small things. I spoke to Dorothy, again. Dave was briefly taken off the heart machine but had to be put right back on it.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji slept better. It was cold and drizzly. We walked to the Marogers' small flat in Rue Seigner, and had lunch with the two of them. We came back in Jean-Michel's car. Krishnaji slept all afternoon. I gave tea to Daisy and her friends, whom I met for the first time. We talked for two hours. They left and I made potato soup for Krishnaji and me. We ate on trays. Dorothy rang. Dave is off the heart support machine as of this morning, and his heart is holding up. But Montague had to go to Winchester Hospital this morning with prostate trouble and will have to be operated on.' I don't remember that.

S: I don't either.

M: June twenty-ninth. 'It is again cold, fifty-five degrees and raining. Krishnaji is feeling tired. He says his stomach feels heavy. He stayed in bed. I got him a bouillotte.' Do you remember—did you have bouillottes in your French childhood? A bouillotte is a hot water bag. [Chuckles.] 'I got him a bouillotte and shopped for food. I made our lunch, which Krishnaji had in bed. At 4:30 p.m., Nadia Kossiakof, who is now well again after her operation in March, and Mar de Manziarly came to tea. Krishnaji came en robe de chambre.' That's a wrapper.

S: A housecoat/bathrobe kind of thing.

M: Yes. 'Krishnaji talked to Nadia about sharing editing with the French committee. My brother telephoned from New York.' [Laughs.] 'Lisa,'—that's his wife—'is to be made a Knight of Malta.' [Chuckles.] 'So they will come over.' She ran a museum and that, I don't know, had something to do with it. 'So, they will come over for two days at the end of July. Daisy came by to leave some things and cooked eggs for her and her friends to eat on their trip tomorrow. I made our supper, telephoned Frances's sister, Helen McCann, in Lausanne. Frances visits her tomorrow.'

June thirtieth. 'There is a little sun today, and Krishnaji felt better. We went to the Morgan Bank. Lunched at Le Meurice. Bought books at WHSmith and Roger and Gallet soap at Swans'—that's a pharmacy in Paris. 'Went to Charvet and ordered four shirts for Krishnaji and three for me, then came back to the flat. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview to a Madame Rena Dumas.' That was the friend of Prema's who had come the day before. 'La Tour sent down soup, etcetera for supper.' For whoever needs to know, La Tour d'Argent is the restaurant on the top floor of the building where my brother had his flat.

S: Yes, we know. But it interests me that you ate lunch at Le Meurice.

M: I know. It did me, too. It surprised me when I just saw it. I don't know why we went there. Perhaps it was near where we were, but…

S: It's near the WH Smith and all that, but…

M: It's not a place to go for lunch…not in our lives. Well, that is what it said. [S chuckles.]

July first, 1981. 'A most extraordinary event. At supper, Krishnaji told me I must write about him, and that I will do it very well. That neither Mary nor Pupul can do what I can, because I am with him, know what he says, what he feels, and what it is like to be with him day by day. He said I should write about being in Notre Dame today. 'You will start a book and it will be published. Start now. Start with more than notes. Start the book.' He got excited about it, and stopped only for a coal barge, as long as a football field, coming around on the Seine near Notre Dame.' [Both laugh.] 'We rushed to the windows. The tug skipper ruled the seas. Then Krishnaji came back to the table and urged me on, saying, "I am excited about it." I put up my strong inhibitions of the past about writing: the sense of the subject being too vast, and my being too close to him to be able to be the one to write it, and I said I had never intended to write about him. "You will," he said, "I want you to." An odd thing in this is that I woke up early this morning and decided to restart these writings, going back to begin with ten days ago, June twenty-second, and catching up. So here is today: I'd begun in my brother's flat in the Tour d'Argent, where Krishnaji did his breathing exercise for an hour while I went for the Herald Tribune and croissants at the bakery across the street. Later, I went marketing on the Île Saint Louis and puttered back, the shopping bag heavy with artichokes, haricots verts like wisps'—you know little delicate ones—'a lettuce head like a bride's bouquet, cresson'—that's watercress—'and…fraises des bois.' Wild strawberries. [Chuckles.] See, look at all this writing…

S: Oh, good.

M: I was inspired to write down everything…'And a melting brie and a demi-baguette. Then, I ran clothes' [laughs] 'through Bud and Lisa's washing washer and dryer, in the flat. Krishnaji and I walked through the side streets, and then we walked along the quay, to lunch at the Marogers', Krishnaji lagging behind because he looks at everything.'

S: Where did the Marogers live at that time?

M: Nearby, I've forgotten the address. They moved shortly afterward to a new address.

S: Ah, but they lived on the Left Bank?

M: Yes, on the Left Bank. Not too far away. 'So Krishnaji, lagging behind because he looks at everything, laughed at a white china toilet bowl left like a milk bottle at a door and at me for not seeing it. We cut over to the side streets where there is more to see. Krishnaji in his elegance,' he dressed beautifully as you know, 'was more eccentric than the students and tourists.' [Both chuckle.] 'A pleasant lunch again by Marie-Bertrand. Genevieve Gerard, the young woman who was starting her own school in Neuilly, came to talk about it to Krishnaji and made a good impression. Marie-Bertrand and I did the washing up. Then both Marogers drove us to see the new Krishnaji Information Center over beyond the Boulevard de Grenelle. Pascaline Mallet and Gisela Elmenhorst, who has retired from her job and will devote herself to the center and the French committee, showed us around. It is a nicely small, but not too small, shop. We left and headed for the Etoile, and where Krishnaji suggested going to Vuitton, as he had thought of a shoulder bag for traveling, and we found one. This gave me much satisfaction.' [Both chuckle.] 'We then drove down the Champs-Élysées, past Beauburg, which we hadn't seen and found ugly.' [Seems to explain:] 'The Marogers dropped us off by Notre Dame to walk home. "Let's go in," said Krishnaji. We walked around the left to look first at the western rose window, Krishnaji noticing the curve of the arches. He was disturbed by tourists turning away restlessly from a priest in satin vestments and dark glasses intoning a mass.' I'm full of details. 'We stopped at the blue east rose window, and Krishnaji was alive and eager at the fluted columns, massively holding up the huge cathedral. "They must've felt something to build all that," he said. "But it loses its sacredness in the stream of tourists." He noticed the crushed cigarettes at the door and was bothered by the empty faces. He would like to send them all away and let the cathedral be cleaned of them and be itself again. He talked impatiently, intently, and we walked along the little park; and he added that Indians, though it means nothing to them, would have lit candles with the rest.' You know, you light little candles and make a prayer. 'We came back through the Île Saint Louis, where I had shopped in the morning, and so to our supper and Krishnaji's pronouncement that it is fine.' I have had too many attitudes about writing. These are overboard now.

S: Right. [Both chuckle.]

M: That was a milestone day.

July second. 'Dorothy rang late last night to say that Montague's prostate operation is to be this morning. I rang her this evening. It is over and it went well. I asked if there had been a lab report, and she didn't know about that. He will be in the hospital two weeks. Dave is now in the normal ward and is up and walking. It has been a week of surgeries. Here in Paris, it was another gray day, turning to rain by lunchtime, and very quiet for us. Except for going to get croissants and the newspaper, I stayed in. I did our laundry in Bud's machine. Marie-Bertrand and Diane lunched with us in the Tour. Diane walked holding tightly to her mother's and my hand. She was delighted to come, and looked at everything sagely, as did Krishnaji. He was wearing, for the first time, a gray worsted suit he had made in 1973, and his gleaming shoes looked like antique lacquer. They were made, of course, by Lobbs, in the 1920s. As almost always, he pays me the compliment of asking me which tie to wear. He watched a table of Japanese tourists, knew how many there were, and observed the coarseness of some of the lunchers. These sorties out into the world impress him with their degeneration. He sees with impatience the ugliness. He talked a little about his early days in Paris and couldn't remember at all when I asked how he managed living alone on the Rue des Colonels-Renard.' That's up near the Etoile. 'Who saw to things? Who cooked, cleaned, did the laundry? He laughs and says he has no idea. His shyness seems to have protected him from advancing women.' [Both chuckle.] 'He thinks it's funny. We had again the splendid dessert of fraises des bois and raspberries surrounding pistachio ice cream, with strawberry sauce over the berries. Krishnaji "treated" Diane downstairs while I went to pay our Tour bill. Krishnaji had said, "Let's go back to Notre Dame," but by 4 p.m., when Marie-Bertrand and Diane left, it was raining and very bleak, so he went to bed instead. He spoke again of this book I am to write, saying I must say who I am, how I came into all this, the story of Hirschfeld.' That's the story of how I learned about Krishnaji. I know I've told all this early in our conversations, but…Hirschfeld was Sam Hirschfeld, my doctor, and everybody's doctor in California, and my friend. Hirschfeld had a friend, another doctor, from Chicago, who had found he had various serious heart trouble, and this Chicago doctor told his family and his friends, "I am going to California to learn how to die from a man named Krishnamurti." Well, this caused consternation here and there; and my friend, Sam Hirschfeld, who was his friend, went up to Ojai to find out what this was all about. I happen to go into his office for some medical thing, I don't know what, on the weekend after he'd been to Ojai. He called me into his office because we used to talk about all sorts of things; he was a surgeon and an overall doctor, but he was interested in everything psychological, and I had gone through years of psychoanalysis. So, we used to talk about psychiatry and people thinking and everything about that subject, just for fun, as friends.

S: This would have been in what year? In the forties?

M: Yes in the forties. Yes. Let's see, yes, I think it would have been an early 1944. Anyway, he told me the story about how he'd gone to see his friend, and he had met this Krishnamurti; and he said, "He knows more about the human mind than anyone living or dead." At that, my ears went up because that's what interested me.

S: Of course.

M: I've told this story to you and everybody else who asks, "How did you meet Krishnamurti?" And so, I heard sometime after that, that this Krishnamurti was going to be giving public talks in Ojai. So, out of curiosity, I went. And I listened. Krishnaji is so impressive you can't help but be impressed. While there, I bought a pamphlet, those things we used to sell as Verbatim Talks, and took it home and started reading it. Krishnaji, at that time, spoke only on weekends, so through the week, I read this thing and I found myself arguing all the way down the book, as my conditioning was psychoanalytic and it didn't quite mesh with this different point of view [chuckles]. And then, fortunately, I decided by the end of the week that it was stupid to argue with the thing. I thought, "If I want to know what he says and thinks, go and listen to him." So I went back the second weekend, and that was an epiphany: Suddenly, light dawned. And that started my whole interest, that second talk. So anyway, this is the Hirschfeld story referred to in this.

S: Right.

M: Now where was I?…Krishnaji spoke of the book I am to write, saying that I must say who I am, how I came into all this, the story of Hirschfeld, and how I went to hear a talk out of curiosity. Right. 'I told Krishnaji at supper of buying a booklet and being unable to finish a page because of arguing with it, then going to the next talk where it dawned on me not to argue, but simply to listen. "You must write that," he said. "It shows you're not a disciple, but understand something." I also described to him my vivid memory of first meeting him alone on the path heading into the Grove just before a talk. The vivid cross of looks and that that is what I think of when he has said to me, "We should have met many years before." He said we probably would have not been very passionate about the look, "but there would have been something continuing to this. We should have met." Then he stopped. "No, it is right as it has happened. It is exactly right as it is."'

Yes, I remember that first glance at each other…I had my dog with me, a big German shepherd dog, whom I had to leave in the car, obviously. And I went out to check that the window was open enough and it was still shady. I put the car in the shade, but I was uneasy, and I walked out just before the talk to check on the dog, and that's when I ran into Krishnaji coming down the hill through the Grove. That was the first direct glimpse of him person-to-person. So that was that.

July third, ‘I packed. Jean-Michel came and helped us get a taxi and get our five bags into it. We were off to Orly Airport, and the Swiss Air flight. While waiting in the departure lounge, Marie-Bertrand and Daphne came to say goodbye as the family was en route to their home at La Mahaudiére. Krishnaji and I reached Geneva and the Hotel des Bergues at 1:15 p.m., in time for a pleasant late lunch in the Amphitryon, soigneusement,[1] provided by familiar staff.’ That’s their restaurant. ‘Both admitted we were relieved to have left Paris, and to be in Switzerland. This old-fashioned, orderly, immaculately, Swiss-ly clean hotel, with its boring décor, is a comfort in which to find ourselves. Why was Paris all wrong for both of us? Krishnaji confessed the apartment upset him. He had done the mysterious exorcising, that thing that he does in strange rooms, to both the bedroom he used and the one I was in, but it failed to have its effect. The fact that the decoration of the flat is uncomfortable from our point of view (too ornate, fussy, excessive mirrors, gold faucets, and the oppressive black and heavy flowered fabric on the walls in Krishnaji’s room, etcetera) wasn’t the only reason. There was something wrong in the atmosphere. I tried to sort out what it could be with Krishnaji. Had the fact of my father’s illness and death left an imprint? Or Olive’s madness?’ Olive was my father’s second wife, and she got more neurotic as she got older. ‘Krishnaji couldn’t say, but something kept him from sleeping there and upset his stomach, too. “Have we become too sensitive?” he asked. I too was not comfortable, but that could have been concern over Krishnaji, seeing to the logistics of his meals, etcetera. I also had, and continue to have, the odd feeling that I have not been in Paris. And I was glad to leave and move onto Switzerland, where coping with daily life is easier, more familiar, and, therefore, one lives on a deeper level. Anyway, Paris remains a bit of a mystery to us both. At supper, Krishnaji wondered if the atmosphere of the flat reflects intensely self-centered people. He also said that he was very vacant there; and, therefore, did not dominate the surroundings. He said he had felt especially close to me, had I noticed it? I had, from the time we left Brockwood. He seemed to need my presence and a protection. After lunch, we walked to Patek, where both watches were left for oiling and servicing; then to Jacquet, where the younger man was absent, but an older man waited on Krishnaji. He was not as helpful as the younger man, and so the choice of ties to be made for Joe and Krishnaji went less easily, which tired Krishnaji, and he got vague. But choices were made.’ Usually, there was great pouring over the silks because these ties were all made to order, if you please.

S: Yes, yes. Of course. [Both chuckle.]

M: ‘We did some small errands at Grand Passage, etcetera, and returned to the hotel for rest. We dined later in the Amphitryon and so to the immaculate cleanness of bed. I telephoned Vanda at Tannegg.’ Swiss hotels were really nice and comfortable.

S: Yes. I always think of crisp sheets, and a remarkable lack of fussiness, even in fancy ones. In the décor, in mean.

M: Yes. They were not pretentious in any way. [Both chuckle.] They were comfortable, clean, and efficient.

July fourth. ‘We both slept well, and woke up to sunshine. It is nice to be here, we kept saying. We had a quiet, lazy morning at the hotel, and then went to the Pharmacie Centrale to get a travel bathrobe for Krishnaji we saw yesterday.”

S: You would’ve bought the towel bathrobe at Grand Passage, no?

M: Yes. We bought all those towel bathrobes through the years at Grand Passage. I’ve still got some.

S: Yes. I have several. [Laughs.]

M: You have several and I have a couple very frayed ones in the closet. They go in the neck.

S: Yes, yes. I know. [Both chuckle.]

M: And I think Kathy has some, too.

S: Oh, good, good.

M: ‘We lunched in the Amphitryon. Krishnaji asked me what I would feel if he died suddenly. He said he felt rather as if he already had. He didn’t explain what he meant by this, but went on to describe what death usually means to most people, the average person, the state of shock that endures at being bereft, left, let down. He thought of all this last week when it was touch-and-go with David Bohm. I asked him what had gone through his mind then, and he said, “I said to myself, he mustn’t die because, first of all, he is a nice man, interested. There are very few of them like that. I said, if he lives, I am going to ask him to leave all that nonsense about the third dimension, the implicate order, wholeness, etcetera. You see, I think basically there must be a conflict in him of which he may be unaware. I would say to him, let’s gather a group of serious people. Come and settle at Brockwood, don’t travel. You can’t travel anymore. Let’s work together and create a nucleus of people who are intellectually tops and spiritually geniuses. I said I would tell him that.” After lunch, Hertz delivered a little yellow Ford Fiesta, into the back of which our five bags and hand luggage just fitted; and we set off for Gstaad, going gently along the Route du Lac, preferred by Krishnaji. It was a warm, sunny summer day at last. The lake was Monet blue and Krishnaji pointed to trees as we passed them. We had one of our “if we had to live in Europe” conversations—where would we choose?’ We used to talk about that, and ‘Krishnaji said somewhere near here but higher up, looking down at the lake. He said, “Switzerland is safe and stable.” It would be in French-speaking Switzerland. But then he laughed and said, “But I prefer California.”’ [S laughs.] ‘We went on all the familiar roads through Mézières, Oron, and Bulle, where we stopped to buy gâteau Bullois.’ Do you remember that?

S: Yes, of course. Very well.

M: 'We reached Gstaad just after 6 p.m. Vanda and Fosca had come earlier, and have everything in order. They are as always, and it was a smiling feeling to see them. A new wooden, of course ugly, door has been put at the entrance, but otherwise all is, again, as it was. The mountains are silent, familiar, inscrutable. I got everything unpacked before disappearing to sleep.' That really brings it all back.

The next day was 'a resting day for all. I spoke to Saral Bohm. Dave had his stitches out and goes to a convalescent place in four days.'

On July sixth, 'I did errands in the village. And then ferried Frances up to lunch with Vanda and me. Krishnaji ate in bed, but came in briefly to see her. He remained in bed until 4 p.m., when he walked down to beyond the Palace Hotel where I picked him up with the car, and took him to Mr. Nicolas for his haircut. As we drove, Krishnaji said, "Put in your journal that I woke up in the night with an extraordinary energy that seemed in the center of the brain. It was there again when I lay down after lunch." I asked how it affected the body. He said, "The body was absolutely quiet." I asked if it kept him awake, and he replied, "Oh, no. I fell into a deep sleep." He walked halfway back with Vanda, and then I picked them up. Dr. Parchure arrived from Brockwood just before supper, having flown from London to Geneva, and from there went by car with Gisèle Balleys. He reported a worrisome outlook for Montague, whose kidneys were slow to respond. But when I telephoned Dorothy, her voice was light with the news that this afternoon, she had found him sitting up in a chair, clear in his mind, and the doctors say he may perhaps be able to leave the hospital Saturday. She is tentatively planning to come to Saanen with Mary Cadogan. Krishnaji came to the telephone to speak to her. He sat in a hunched position, which he claims gave him a stomachache. He has had this ache on and off since we got to Paris. At supper, I discussed it with Dr. Parchure. It possibly could be the result of a hernia, below the esophagus, seen in an X-ray by Dr. Scheef last year.' That's the German doctor we consulted in Bonn. 'Headstands and similar postures are not good for it, according to Dr. Parchure, but Krishnaji brushes his advise aside. We must persuade him to give up that headstand stool.' He had headstand stools in the places he regularly stayed. In fact, I have one in the closet in there. It's a little stool with a hole for your head…

S: Yes, so that your body weight is not on your head and neck, but it's on your shoulders.

M: That's right.

The seventh. 'Dr. Parchure gave Krishnaji homeopathic remedies early, and when I brought Krishnaji his nettle tea, which is the first thing he normally consumes, he said the pain had quickly gone and that he would follow Dr. Parchure's advice. Discussing it all at breakfast with Dr. Parchure, Krishnaji came in and agreed to take suggested homeopathic remedies, and an enzyme suggested by Dr. Lichti for digestion. In the morning, Krishnaji resumed dictating his Letters to the Schools. The KFT has just brought out a booklet edited by Mary Links of the first thirty-seven letters. It made Krishnaji want to go on, so he dictated number thirty-nine. Scott arrived in Saanen with the video van, bringing our books and Waterpik from Brockwood, and stayed to lunch. He described mountain climbing near Zermatt. Krishnaji came to the lunch table with him, Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and me. In the afternoon, Vanda and I talked to the agent about renting Tannegg again next summer. The owner wants to sell it for $2 million, but present Swiss law precludes foreigners buying houses here. Vanda and I went to Saanen at 5 p.m., where I described to Joan Muspratt where to look in Geneva for another towel bathrobe for Krishnaji. We went by the tent, which the Brockwood team had put up completely since 7:30 a.m. this morning—one day. In the evening I went with Scott to the movie The Shining.' Do you remember that?

S: Oh, I do.

M: That was a scary movie.

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated a Letters to the Schools number forty. He came to the table with Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and me, but rested all afternoon. I worked at the desk and did village errands. Krishnaji found it too hot to go for a walk, but sent me on one.' [Both laugh.] 'I went up the hill and through the woods.'

July ninth, 'Krishnaji got up for lunch but otherwise stayed in bed. I did desk work, including letters that Krishnaji had dictated. In the afternoon, Vanda and I went to the village and got marooned in the post office during a cloud burst.'

The tenth, 'Again, the day for me was filled with desk work and errands. Krishnaji had lunch at the table. I went on a cherry fast, but felt so weak that when I started on the walk with Krishnaji, I came back.' Why did I go on a cherry fast? People went on fruit fasts. I ate a light but normal supper.'

The next day, 'I spent most of the day doing desk work. Vanda and I signed a lease for Tannegg for next summer. Krishnaji and I walked in a light rain to the edge of the wood and Krishnaji asked, "Why did Dr. Bohm care so much that I came to see him?"'

'Me: "Because your affection, your regard, probably in a human sense, means more than anything to him."'

'K: "You mean he depends on me?"'

'M: "I think there's too much emphasis on dependence. Affection, friendship doesn't have to be just dependence. You have known him a long time, and a few years ago I think he became quite depressed because you seemed to lose interest in talking to him. Then he cheered up when you renewed your talks. And two things have just happened: After knowing him for twenty years, when we were just in Ojai, for the first time you used his first name. And just now you went to see him. Something you would normally never do before his operation."'

'K: "When he is well I wonder if he can get some really serious people to talk about these things. More than always talking to the teachers."'

‘M: “You do that over and over at each school you go to.”’

‘K: “Yes, but it should be more.” Later on the walk, Krishnaji said, “Let me ask you something: You have heard me talk so many times. Do you think this person learned it or is it totally new?”’

‘M: “He couldn’t have learned it, because it has not been said. Buddhist teachings have certain similarities, but fundamentally what you say has not been said before. Why do you ask that?”’

‘K: “Oh, I just thought of it.”’ [S chuckles.]

‘A little bit later, Krishnaji said, “I’ve been thinking about consciousness for the talk.”’

‘M: “I’ve been reading in the book about computers”’—I put in parentheses, ‘(Through the Micro-Millennium by Christopher Evans)’—some book—‘“…and toward the end, he tries to define thinking and intelligence, answering all the criticisms people make of computers. He says that, in reply to most criticisms, humans and animals are equally programmed. Making a distinction between a program the baby is born with—breathing, moving, seeing, grasping, digesting, etcetera—and what is acquired.”’ This must be hell to try to transcribe.

S: Probably it is, but luckily, we have a good transcriber.

M: ‘K: “Of course. Does he say computers can do all that humans can?”’

‘M: “He is saying that they can do certain things laboriously, going through all the possibilities before choosing the answer, but man can see enough of the whole to choose without examining each option.”’

‘K: “But it is the same. Knowledge is operating and the computer does it very quickly.”’

‘M: “He seems to be saying (and I haven’t finished it yet) that machines will be able to outthink man.”’

‘K: “Then what is man? What can he do that machines cannot?”’

‘M: “It seems to me the machine must always function in the field of knowledge. Man can go beyond, to another dimension.”’

‘K: “That is right. That is what I have said.”’

‘M: “If the rat theory is correct…”’ Now, the rat theory, that is what’s-his-name—Sheldrake. Let’s see how I explain it, but if not, we must sum up what is meant by it. Well, anyway I will just read just what I have: ‘“If the rat theory is correct, it is as if a man can come along’—you, for instance—‘who can pierce limitations, see onto another plane, and that once it is seen, it is possible for others of the human species to see. In answer to your earlier question, you have perceived something not derived from knowledge. It is as if mankind sometimes, rarely, produces a human being with this ability to go beyond, and this becomes an opening in the total human consciousness. It really doesn't matter if those people in the tent tomorrow understand what you will say or not. You see something, and you utter it."'

'K: "CWL"'—that's Leadbeater—'"used to say it doesn't matter if anyone understands."'

'M: "The TS believed an entity manifested."'

'K: "The bodhisattva came when the world was in a terrible trouble, every 2000 years or so."'

'M: "What I am saying is a little different, not that existing beings incarnate, but that the human species casts up one of its kind with this power to see beyond its limitation of consciousness. The TS wouldn't have accepted it as intelligence manifesting, would they?"'

'K: "No, they wouldn't."'

'M: "They made it into personalities with names and lives outside of time. Even when I was very young, four or so, I had difficulty with the notion of God in the image of man. It seems somehow so petty. It had to be something much vaster than that."'

'K: "Yes, petty. Much vaster."'

'M: "Also, with you, I am not really interested in a bodhisattva who incarnates in the body of Krishnaji. You are bodhisattva. It comes from you, not from some other being." On the return to the chalet, Krishnaji said, "Are you writing these things down? Will you write this?"'

'M: "Yes."' That was an interesting conversation.

S: It is very interesting. It's very interesting also that he doesn't have any reply to your last comment to him.

M: What was my last comment?

S: That he is the bodhisattva.

M: No, he didn't. He didn't think about it, that I know of, anyway. [Both chuckle.] He didn't give any sign I recorded of having noticed.

S: He didn't appear to, yes.

M: 'I telephoned Dorothy at Brockwood. Montague was home and well, and I spoke to Mary L. and Joe in London. They go to Brockwood Tuesday.' Do you remember? They used to spend their summers at Brockwood—it was their summer home, as it were.

S: Yes.

M: July twelfth, 'In the morning, there was fog and light rain. At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji began his first Saanen talk on consciousness: how we are programmed, what is man. There was a large crowd. On his return to the chalet after the talk, he slept, but kept waking himself up by what he calls "shouting." He came to lunch at the table with Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and me; and then slept again until about 5 p.m. As we started on a walk, he said he didn't feel like walking, but that we should go a little ways. He felt no energy, but as he walked, and I told him more about the computer book, which I finished today, his interest and energy rose, and before we knew it we reached the Turbach Road. He is struck by the fact that as soon as Asit began to talk about computers, he'—meaning himself—'grasped the whole implication of it. Most people seemed to recoil, react with, "But…" Krishnaji instantly saw the whole meaning, and so did I. In the evening, Saral telephoned that Dave is doing very well in the convalescent place in Frimley, Surrey. As soon as he is home, he wants to talk to Krishnaji, and to come to Brockwood once Krishnaji is there. In the evening, Krishnaji watched an old Fernandel movie in the Don Camillo series, which highly amused him: the gestures, the talking to God, the very French and very humanness of the character actor.' [M chuckles.]

The next day was 'another very gray day with occasional rain. Dr. Parchure bought spices for Krishnaji's soup to stimulate his digestion. Topazia Alliata came to lunch, and hammered away at the lunch table.' She was one of those very talkative women. 'Krishnaji didn't feel like a walk in the rain. He had me ring Saral to tell Dave not to meditate until he is stronger.'

July fourteenth, 'The fog lifted by 10:30 a.m. when Krishnaji gave his second Saanen talk, which continued on consciousness: not individual, but human consciousness; the perilous world and how the divisions are dangerous. In the car returning, he said that his stomach again was not right in the night, and he felt so weak he wondered if he could give his talk today. But a tremendous energy came while he spoke, and there was no stomach pain. He was plainly tired, though, and slept deeply "without shouting" for an hour before lunch. I talked to Dr. Parchure. Each day we have tried to adjust Krishnaji's diet: reduced oil, and omitted whatever he says disagrees with him; but he tends to blame the food, the medicines, etcetera, at random. And those cannot be the causes, or the sole causes. Krishnaji wanted "something spicy" to stimulate his digestion yesterday, so Dr. Parchure made a soup of tomato, ginger, herbs, etcetera. Krishnaji drank it, but said later it disagreed with him. Parchure and I discussed the worrisome possibility of something organically wrong. Last year in Bonn, his upper tract was checked by Dr. Scheef, but I now think that the lower gastrointestinal should be X-rayed. It would upset Krishnaji too much during the talks, so Parchure thinks we must proceed day-to-day, get him through the talks, and then see what to do. Krishnaji came to the table and ate a normal lunch. At 4:30 p.m., he saw Nadia Kossiakof, and then we went for a walk to the Turbach Road.

More and more, life becomes edged with perils—a sort of perimeter. The world is becoming a city of rioting humans, more in one quarter than in another, but it is there, around the corner. And one lives one's daily life in degrees of the sound of it, steering if possible around the danger spots. But to be aware that at any moment, one may come upon the violent, the mugger, the bum, and now illness, the perils of age. At lunch, Krishnaji said to me with an amusement in his voice, "One wonders how long he can keep this up."' Meaning the talking. 'This edging of danger is there, and I feel intensely the rare and quiet wonder of so many small and once normal things: the silence of sunlight in summer, a clean and quiet space to read. As I write this early in the morning, there is the solid orderliness of the chalet, the sound of the coffee Fosca is making in the kitchen. The mountains are untouched, and Krishnaji is sleeping in his room.'

July fifteenth, 'I went to the village on errands. Coming back, I met S. Weeraperuma and Dr. Parchure on the hill and gave them a lift. Weeraperuma spoke of meeting U.G. Krishnamurti, who asked, "Are you here to listen to that clown in the tent?"' That horrid little man.

S: I know.

M: 'Krishnaji shrugged when told this, but then the subject came up at lunch with Krishnaji, Vanda, Topazia, Frances, Marjolaine van der Straten, and Dr. Parchure. I told the story. Topazia, followed immediately by Vanda, defended U.G. Krishnamurti. I said their doing that was indefensible.' That was really incomprehensible to me: two people professing undying friendship for Krishnaji, and yet they…anyway.

S: I know, I know. In many ways, Vanda has been called a "contrarian," someone who just likes to take the contrary position.

M: That's right. But not about Krishnaji, I mean, you shouldn't about Krishnaji.

S: Yes, yes, I know. [Chuckles.]

M: Anyway, 'Krishnaji said to Vanda, "You know nothing about it, so don't discuss it." After lunch, I ferried Frances and Topazia home, and Vanda to town. Marjolaine is starting work in a hospital in Brussels, having done four years toward her M.D. and is such a nice girl. I said so, as we drove away, and Frances said Marjolaine had such dignity. Vanda immediately said she doesn't have dignity and Topazia chimed in with her criticism.' [S laughs.] You see? Frances always has something nice to say about people.

S: Yes, Frances does.

M: Frances, in all the about forty years I've known her, has never said anything disagreeable about anything.

S: Or about anybody. I know. I know.

M: And those two… [Both chuckle.] 'I dropped off Vanda and Topazia, and Frances and I went to meet the trains in Saanen, which Dorothy and Mary Cadogan could be on. Waiting, we went over to see the Finnish pair, Elza and Miri's little apartment. It is old, nice, and, of course, spotless; and only 30 Swiss francs for both per day. Dorothy finally arrived just before 6 p.m., and I drove her up to see Krishnaji. Then, I took her to Doris's, where she is staying. On the return, Krishnaji said I shouldn't have reacted to Topazia and Vanda's defense of U.G. Krishnamurti. He said Vanda has her mind made up about people, like Rosalind and Rajagopal, and won't say anything against them. I asked what that had to do with U.G. Krishnamurti. Surely, U.G.K. is no old friend of hers like Rajagopal and Rosalind. Krishnaji used the word "insult" in describing U.G.K.'s remark, and I asked how can two women supposedly devoted to him for years instantly defend his insulter. Krishnaji replied, "Why do you react?"' I said, "Of course I react, it appalls me."

Krishnaji gave up.' [Both chuckle.] 'I feel something is intrinsically wrong in this, something false. Later, Krishnaji mentioned it again, and I asked what if it were reversed, and an insult to me had been given? What would he do?' [Both chuckle.] I clearly wasn't going to leave this alone. 'Krishnaji said, "I would say you are quite mistaken, you don't know the facts."'

'I said I could understand if the discussion made him uncomfortable, but Vanda and Topazia's attitude remains ugly, and to me very questionable. A circular is also being passed around Saanen by the German Rajneesh follower with a pseudonym Premmander, announcing, "Jokes by Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh on Krishnamurti, his followers, other 'saints' and himself."' More ugliness. 'Dorothy in the car, about all this, said that she has felt for some time, something she called "subversive" in Vanda's influence on the Brockwood young who have visited her in Florence.' That's interesting. 'Scott Ellard came back to Brockwood hostile, unfriendly, and others, too.' Scott Ellard, as you may recall, was one of our students.

S: I remember him well, yes. A New Yorker.

M: 'Dorothy now discourages students from going to visit Vanda. And also, lately, Yen Yang, who Vanda wanted to ask for lunch today.'

July sixteenth, 'Krishnaji said he woke up at 2 a.m., bothered by yesterday. At 10:30 a.m., he gave his third Saanen talk. Dorothy came to lunch with Vanda, Krishnaji, Parchure, and me. Krishnaji ate at the table. Afterward, Dr. Parchure and I went to Gisèle Balleys's chalet for the annual meeting of the Saanen Gathering committee. The present members, Mary Cadogan, Doris, and I, accepted the resignation, with regret, of Edgar Graf; and confirmed the new memberships of Dorothy and Gisèle and appointed Mary secretary and Gisèle treasurer. Krishnaji's stomach is still not right and he ate no supper. Dr. Parchure slept in the adjoining room to observe how he was in the night. Before that, Dr. Parchure and I had a long talk. He still feels it is dyspepsia, not something organically wrong. He wants to deal with it as that, and if that fails, we will have to look at it more seriously. We decided to change Krishnaji's Bircher-Benner sequence of food'—which is fruit, then salad and raw things, then cooked food—'and start with cooked food.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji slept quite well. He feels "empty," but has no pain. Dr. Parchure measured exact amounts of muesli, etcetera, but didn't give him toast. He is trying to balance the amount of food with the energy needed. Vanda left at 9 a.m. for Florence. At 11 a.m., there was the annual meeting of the foreign committees at Tannegg. Krishnaji, feeling all right, attended and talked of their responsibilities when he is gone: the spreading of the teachings without interpretation, and what constitutes interpretation. Mary Cadogan and Jane Hammond stayed to lunch. Jane had some pain in her back and Krishnaji put his hands, which eased it very much. Krishnaji had lunch in his room, and the new sequence was started–cooked food first, then salad, then fruit. At 3 p.m., Mary, Dr. Parchure, and I drove to Saanenmöser where, at the Sport Hotel, there was a further meeting of all the committees. It went well. Jean-Michel and van der Straten were there. Video and publications were discussed and each committee gave an account of its activities. On our return, Krishnaji had walked to the Turbach Road and has had no pain. The new food sequence continues. In the early evening, there was rain and wind, and a marvelous rainbow over the Wasserngrat, and there was peace in the house.'

S: The first international committees meeting, the one at which Krishnaji spoke, that was at Tannegg, not at Saanenmöser, is that right?

M: Yes, it was at Tannegg. Then we moved to Saanenmöser for the afternoon session, and Krishnaji didn't come. We always began at Tannegg.

July eighteenth, 'It rained at night. Krishnaji feels well, and slept well. I did the marketing. Jean-Michel is here in Gstaad for the committee meetings, and came to lunch and Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me. He brought a copy of All One, the first edition of the magazine that Alain Naudé is doing. Jean-Michel didn't know where it came from until I told him. Krishnaji picked it up and read parts of it, and said, "What has happened to Naudé? Oh no, he's become a guru." There are the bits about God that I looked at askance at Ojai in the sample he brought there, and the style is somewhat pontifical, but I will read it later. Krishnaji seemed saddened. "He was intelligent once. What happened to him?" It was too wet to go for a walk, so we each read detective novels.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji is feeling well. Parchure rations his food.'

The nineteenth, 'There is thick fog. It lifted slowly and slightly to reveal snow on the open spaces of the Wispille and Wasserngrat, and on the dark pines there was a sugar ring of white, two-thirds of the way down. Krishnaji saw flakes falling there, but I must have been in the shower then, and missed them. It was very cold. When I drove Dr. Parchure to the tent at 9:15, there were cars come down from the mountains with four inches of snow on their roofs. In spite of it all, the tent was crammed, and Krishnaji gave a marvelous and moving talk.[2] "I put a lot into that," he said. I gave a lift to La Damme en Chapeau.' [Both chuckle.]

S: Who was that?

M: Marcelle Bondoneau used to call her that. Her name was Mademoiselle Courtial, and she always came to the talks in the same toque, or little hat. On Thursday, she handed me a grubby plastic sack with shares of stocks, "for the Canadian school." She was a little bit eccentric. 'As there is no Canadian school this year, Krishnaji wants the donation to go to Brockwood. I drove up to Tannegg with Mr. Weeraperuma with Dr. Parchure for lunch. Krishnaji was at the table. Weeraperuma again recounted the animosity of U.G. Krishnamurti, and his saying of Krishnaji, "I am going to destroy him." In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw the Siddoo sisters. They have found an Indian woman they think could be the principal if they reopened the Wolf Lake School in a year. By the time they left, it was too late, cold, and wet for a walk. So we both sank into our respective detective novels.' [Both chuckle.]

July twentieth. 'I had a 10:30 a.m. bank appointment about the Alzina account with Mr. Hans Liechti'—that was the bank manager. 'At noon, a French public relations woman came. Then Brigitte Dantin came to talk to me about putting her eight-year-old daughter in the Oak Grove School. No one was at lunch but Krishnaji and me. At 4:30 p.m., an elderly Spaniard's wife and Magda from Barcelona came for a small greeting and a gift to Krishnaji.' She was a nice woman. 'Then I went to buy him a jersey and we walked to the end of the wood. Tungki came with us.' He was an Indonesian student at Brockwood. 'I dined with Suzanne and Hugues at their chalet.'

July twenty-first, 'The weather is beginning to thaw. For his fifth Saanen talk, Krishnaji wore a nice Navy-made pullover we bought yesterday at Loertscher-Graa. It was very becoming. The talk was very fine.[3] Afterward, he said that he said something new today, and "I had no idea what I would talk about when I began." He said earlier he wanted to get some Pringle jerseys after the talk, but I pointed out that the store closes at noon. "That's alright," he said. And so it was. He ended the talk at 11:35 a.m. and we sped again to Loertscher-Graa, where, in choosing, he felt a bit dissociated and shaky. "I shouldn't have come right after the talk," he said. But it was alright, and we got back to the chalet with some nice jerseys. There was no one extra for lunch, so he ate at the table. At 3 p.m., I took a little plant to Madame Banzet, who, at eighty-eight, was again at the talks, but is now in the Saanen hospital with a badly broken ankle. She was looking pinkly orange with health, sitting up in a wheelchair in a ward for old ladies, and taking the attitude that if it had to happen,' [M chuckles] 'Saanen doctors specialize in broken bones from all the ski people in winter…'

S: Yes. Exactly.

M: '…so, it was the best place to have broken her ankle.' [Both chuckle.] She was a lovely old lady.

S: I think I remember her.

M: I think you probably do. 'I came back for a meeting at 4:30 p.m. with Krishnaji, the Siddoos, Dorothy, and Parchure. Plans were discussed to have the possible Canadian headmistress visit Brockwood to learn about it all. Dorothy came on the walk with Krishnaji and me to the river. The weather is warm again. An Alsatian dog jumped at Krishnaji and bit his arm, but he did not puncture the skin through the jacket.'

The next day was ‘a beautiful, sunny day. I went with Dorothy and Mary Cadogan up the Videmanette téléphérique in the morning. We walked across snow and rough ground to a grassy spot and had a picnic. We came down to Rougemont and had coffee at a little café. I got back to Tannegg in time to walk with Krishnaji to the river.’

July twenty-third. ‘There was rain again. I took Dr. Parchure to the tent and marketed early. At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his sixth Saanen talk. It was very fine.[4] Pascaline Mallet and Gisela Elmenhorst came to lunch. Krishnaji was at the table. Nicole Philippeau, her daughter Christelle, and son Manuel came to tea. Scott came about Krishnaji’s clocks, and then he came on the walk with Krishnaji and me down around Alpina and back; all in a steady rain.’ [M chuckles.] As I recall you had done a study at Patek.

S: I did. I learned things about adjusting his watches and bought tools for doing that from Patek, yes.

M: The twenty-fourth. ‘It rained again but Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I went touring off in the little yellow car to lunch with Suzanne, and Hugues—the first time since the Biascoechea days…’ you know, Enrique and Isabel Biascoechea.

S: Yes.

M: ‘…that Krishnaji has gone to lunch in Gstaad at someone’s house. Jean-Michel, Daphne, and Ariane’—Jean-Michel’s eldest daughter—‘were there, plus a woman friend of the van der Stratens. They have a good cook, and the lunch was good and a bit of a change for Krishnaji. He ate carefully, but seemed to like it. I took him back to Tannegg afterward, and then, at 3 p.m., Dr. Parchure and I went to the second afternoon meeting with all the Krishnamurti international committees at the hotel in Saanenmöser, which lasted till 6 p.m. Hugues presided very well. Much was discussed. The only snag came at the end, when Mr. Schneider of the German committee announced proudly that he would have a Krishnaji booklet at a big vegetarian conference in Germany next summer. I questioned this as associating Krishnaji and his teaching with vegetarianism.’ And, of course, Krishnaji never wanted himself or his teachings associated with anything. ‘There were various opinions. Gisela Elmenhorst and the two Finns, Miri and Elza, said, “Ask Krishnaji.” So I did, and he said a definite “No.”’ I was hated by the German committee for a while.

S: Yes, I remember this.

M: Yes. Remember that? [Chuckles.]

July twenty-fifth. ‘There is more rain. Jane Hammond came by at 11 a.m. to discuss with me whether she should become a trustee of the KFT as is being suggested.’ Do you remember that?

S: Yes, I remember.

M: Jane was the perfect trustee, but because she was connected with the TS, mostly because she lived near their community in Southern England. 'She asked if she could be more help than she is at present if she was a trustee. I said we have thought of her for ages as a trustee, but hadn't because of her TS membership. She said she had not been to any meetings there in years, and the only reason she hadn't resigned lately is because the one person she admires in the TS is Radha Burnier. She will write to Radha explaining her reason for resigning. Jane leaves Monday. Mary Cadogan left today. A John Streather, who wrote an intelligent letter to Krishnaji last week, came to tea, and Krishnaji joined us when he woke up. He was a nice man, and is going off to teach Indians in Bolivia. Krishnaji and I walked to the river. I dined with Kathy and Scott at Chlösterli.' Do you remember that?

S: Yes, in Gsteig.

M: In Gsteig, yes.

July twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji gave his seventh and final talk for the year in Saanen. Dorothy and Frances came to lunch. Krishnaji was at the table. There was computer talk on maybe using Apple computers so as to greatly accelerate academic learning and leave more time for Krishnaji's teachings.' [M laughs.] 'Dorothy left and Frances talked to Krishnaji about her wish to make a donation.' Krishnaji had, for years, discouraged the Foundations and schools from accepting donations from Frances, as he didn't want there ever to be any hint of taking advantage of Frances. She was trying to persuade Krishnaji that it was sensible for her to make a donation, and her advisors agreed. 'At 4:30 p.m., a friend of Mr. Mirabet, a Mr. Ferdinand Burgues, came to bring letters and a gift from Mr. Mirabet, who couldn't come this year as his sister is very ill.' He always brought a donation for Krishnaji's work, and was very nice. 'It was raining only lightly, so Krishnaji and I walked down around Alpina and up behind the hill above Tannegg a new way, and it was quite a walk. Krishnaji is pleased with it. His energy is amazing. We took one wrong turn and were almost mountain climbing before retracing our steps. In the evening, my brother telephoned from Paris. He and Lisa are on their way to Malta where she is to be made a Knight of Malta.' Which I found humorous. It's something because she was head of a New York museum. 'I don't know anything about the Knights of Malta, except that it's left from the days of the Crusades, and they're still at it.' [Both laugh.] 'We had a nice long talk, though. They return to Vineyard Haven in a week.'

The twenty-seventh. 'It was a cold night. The copyright of Education and the Significance of Life is expiring in November, and if the author is living, it must be reassigned. Krishnaji has therefore removed it from Rajagopal, and today assigned it to KFA as part of the assets of KWINC, which, in the settlement agreement, came to KFA. As other copyrights expire in Krishnaji's lifetime, he can regain control of them. He, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched alone. Lola and Patty Shepherd from South Africa came at 4:30 p.m. to say goodbye to Krishnaji before returning to South Africa. Patty has an uncertain heart, and was ill here. Joan Wright brought toweling samples for Krishnaji's bathrobes she wants to make. He and I walked to the river.'

The next day, 'Dr. Parchure and I went to Saanen hospital to arrange a lower gastrointestinal X-ray for Krishnaji next week. Then I did errands such as getting an extra suitcase for Krishnaji. He, Parchure, and I lunched at the table. Some Buddhists with a monk' [M chuckles] 'dropped in before Krishnaji finished his nap.' [Both chuckle.] 'He saw them briefly. Then we went for a walk to the river. I worked on assembling questions for tomorrow's question-and-answer meeting.'

July twenty-ninth. 'It was a clear warm day. As usual, I took Dr. Parchure to the tent early. Then I took Krishnaji at 10:30 a.m. for his first of the question-and-answer meetings of this year in Saanen. Krishnaji had done most of the choosing of the questions, and I had typed ten for him, of which he answered five. It went very well.[5] On coming back to Tannegg, I put on the TV, which was broadcasting the wedding of Prince Charles and Diana in London. Krishnaji was scornful, "What nonsense." I fetched Kathy and Scott to Tannegg for lunch, we watched a bit of the royal wedding until Krishnaji came in and said, "Aren't you going to turn that thing off?" I left it on but with French sound so we could know when they all came out on the palace balcony. Kathy and I were fascinated by it, so she and I watched it after lunch, while Krishnaji remained in the dining room talking to Scott and Dr. Parchure. Royal doings always get a rise out of Krishnaji.' [Both chuckle.] 'At 4:30 p.m., at Vanda's and Topazia's behest, Krishnaji saw Helen Brew, who wanted to tell him about her movie on birth. She hinted that the BBC and CBS had talked to her about being interested in doing interviews with him, and Krishnaji told her that if they are interested they should approach him directly. She left, and we walked to the end of the wood.'

July thirtieth. 'It was a warm day. At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer session in the tent. It was superb.[6] Krishnaji, Parchure, and I had a quiet lunch, during which we discussed Frances's condition, and at Krishnaji's urging, Parchure went to see her and discussed her going to Ojai and resuming her therapy with Dr. Hidley. She agreed. Krishnaji and I talked to her afterward. I telephoned Hidley to verify that he is in Ojai and would see her. I telephoned Frances about Hidley, and also rang her sister in Lausanne with the same information.' Her sister was…sort of…Her sister hated, well, never mind…

S: No, this is relevant. Frances's sister was very antagonistic to Krishnaji, to the Foundations, and to Brockwood, but you and Krishnaji were looking after Frances in a way her sister never could or would.

M: Yes. And he had asked Dr. Hidley to look after her, and convinced her to go to Hidley.

S: Yes. And Krishnaji kept seeing Frances, and inviting her, and never excluded her because of her difficulties. I always thought it was a great credit to Krishnaji the way he dealt with Frances.

M: 'I agree. Dorothy came by and is taking Krishnaji's new suitcase back to Brockwood tomorrow. Krishnaji and I walked in the woods and then I worked on the questions for tomorrow.'

The thirty-first. 'It was a hot day. Krishnaji held his third question-and-answer meeting, which winds up Saanen for this summer. Before Krishnaji began, I made an appeal for donations. We need 4,700 more Swiss francs to reach the needed 45,000 Swiss francs. It was a larger meeting and Krishnaji was a fire of energy.[7] In the afternoon, I went to see Frances, who goes tomorrow to her sister's and then to Brockwood Tuesday and from there to Ojai on Thursday. I found her air tickets all mixed up. She had mixed up her medication, too. Although Parchure came and straightened them out, she is no longer competent to look after herself in many things. I straightened out the tickets. She is touching and it makes me sad. Krishnaji saw the Foures, very briefly.'

S: Alright. We're going to have to end it there because we have run out of tape.

M: Okay.

S: So we will begin on August first.

M: Alright.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Done with care.

[2] Here is a link to the video of the July 19, 1981 talk.

[3] The link to the video of the fifth Saanen talk.

[4] The video link for the sixth Saanen talk of July 23, 1981.

[5] The link to the video of the first question-and-answer meeting of Saanen 1981.

[6] The video of July 30, 1981.

[7] The video of July 31, 1981.

Issue 69: August 1, 1981 to November 4, 1981

For anyone who has been moved or inspired or touched by Krishnaji and/or his work, there is a major difficulty: How does one convey what is beyond words, beyond thought, beyond memory? At the same time, for many of us, there is a sense of obligation: We can't just remain silent about something so seminal in our lives. If those who came before us had not wanted to convey what Krishnaji was and remains, and had they not wanted to extend the reach of his teachings beyond his immediate surroundings, then most of us would not have known the blessings of his teachings and his presence. This conveyance of that extraordinary "something" is the intention of this project, and it is also the concern of the discussion that starts this issue, as well as a discussion about half way through this issue. In rereading these discussions, I feel I am pushing and insisting beyond the bounds of propriety or good manners; but Mary appreciated the wish to get as much explicated as was possible, to leave nothing of the inexplicable or the ineffable or the incomprehensible unexplored to the greatest possible extent. These two discussions, recorded for her memoirs, were two of a great many discussions Mary had with people close to her and Krishnaji, but which went unrecorded. In hindsight, one can't help but wish that many more of these discussions had been recorded.

Scott: We're supposed to pick up the story on August first, 1981, but before we do that, I was hoping we could discuss something that I've been wanting to talk about for the last several sessions; and listening to a tape of our discussions last night made me feel all the more that we should just talk about it briefly. And this has to do with "the face." Now, for anybody who's been following these conversations, Krishnaji first talked about seeing "the face" as something external to him. And then, somehow, it became internal, and no longer external to him. It was present, but it was internal. And in your and my contact with him…I know we've talked about this…we've seen the face many times. In fact, Krishnaji often, when I would walk with him after a talk at Brockwood or Saanen, because I used to feel that he needed some protection right after a talk, when he was kind of "coming in for a landing," were the words I would use to myself about it…

Mary: Yes, and the hordes were chasing him.

S: When the hordes were just, right, wanting to press in on him. After some talks, particularly profound ones, he would ask me if I'd seen "the face."

M: He did to me, too.

S: Yes, and I don't even know how he knew I could see it, and I don't remember how it all began. I don't remember it beginning; I just remember it was there. Now, in this tape that I was listening to the other night, which, for the record, is the fifteenth of March, 1985—a private discussion with Krishnaji, you, Erna, and Theo—Krishnaji says that, just very briefly, because Theo doesn't really get it…when Krishnaji starts talking about something very esoteric and people don't get it, he always backs away from it, in my experience. In this tape, he said that he hadn't seen "the face" for quite a while. He didn't say that it wasn't there within him, or on him, or whatever it was, or that it didn't appear to others when he was speaking, but that he hadn't seen it for quite a while. And then also, very curiously in that tape—and again, I don't know of any other place where Krishnaji talks about this, other than this tape—he talks about being found as a boy and the whole thing about the pundit, and what the pundit told him, etcetera, etcetera and how Annie Besant was looking for the vehicle for the reincarnation or the manifestation of the Maitreya, and how the TS had picked other boys before Krishnaji.

M: Mm, one of them.

S: He mentioned two.

M: Two?

S: Yes. We only—I only know of the American Dutch boy, van Hook or whatever it was…

M: Yes.

S: But he mentioned someone else and it seems to me there was, but I can't remember. Anyway. But someone, it was either Theo or Erna, asked him, well, why was Annie Besant so certain that you were the one?

M: Yes, then he must've brought in Upadhyaya.

S: Well, what he said was…and he said it in that voice that is speaking while looking at a great distance [both chuckle], that there was something about his face as a boy and that somehow that face had been…There was something, I can't remember exactly, but there was something very special about his face…something so special or recognizable or recognized by Annie Besant, or it would have taken millennia to shape this face, and she had recognized…There was something special, though; and her point of recognition, that Krishnaji was it, was the face. So there's just this…and it just seems to me that there was some…

M: There was also…I don't know whether this could be linked with it or not, the episode in Ootacamund with Pupul and Nandini, when he went "off," and then when he came to, he said, "Did you see the face?" …well, the implication was that it was the Buddha. And when they said they had, he said, "You are blessed." They had seen "his" face. I mean, I don't know how to… I can't define exactly what he meant or what was said, but there was again, did you see…

S: "The face"…

M: So this must have gone on throughout his life; I mean, that's way back in the forties.

S: But it was brand-new, when he talked about it in your diary, and he mentions it when it appeared, that was new to him, that he saw it. That Krishnaji saw this face; that was new to him.

M: He sometimes said, I forget a particular incident, but after a talk, he would sometimes ask, "Did the face change?"—meaning his face during a talk.

S: Yes. Exactly. Yes, that is what he would ask.

M: And that's something that you'd spoken of, and that you've also seen it on videotape.

S: I've even seen it on tape, yes; and when I told Krishnaji that, he was interested.

M: I've seen…well, it's hard to describe. I've also seen him change shape.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: I mean, I've seen him, though sitting, suddenly become a tall man. [S chuckles.] Anyway, these things are so nebulous that I don't like to take a position of what I know and don't know or noticed, I mean…

S: I know, I know. But that's just exactly why I am having you speak about it. [Both chuckle.]

M: I know, but there's a vast ocean of things I don't know about, categories of things with regard to Krishnaji, which I have wisps of them in my mind, and I'm aware of them, but I don't try and build a foundation of saying, "This is what was happening," because I don't know.

S: Exactly. I completely agree, and I do the same; but I do think that we have to not be overly cautious and not articulate our wisps. The little wisps that we have, I think, need to be put down because they are so extraordinary.

M: They are.

S: And, we can't just take them to our graves.

M: And the fact that both you and I, who have had close and prolonged observation of all this, have to be very careful not to decide what we saw.

S: Exactly. And I think we have both been…We've erred on the side of caution. And I think that that is correct, but I still feel that we ought to push the envelope, as they say these days, a little bit in trying to just say what we observed without saying what it means or drawing any conclusions from it; or what we remember him saying, without making anything of it, or drawing any conclusions from it. Just because this is part of the extraordinary…

So, if I could describe, a little bit, how the face appeared in my eyes. [Pause.] In one sense, it was almost like going from a two-dimensional photograph to a three-dimensional object. Without the form actually changing, it just had a greater depth. At the same time, I would say that the form did change slightly, in that it seemed absolutely ageless—"the face." It had no age. It had all the ages.

M: When he was in the hospital dying, and we took turns being with him…

S: I know, yes.

M: And one early, early—God knows, the light was just coming up over the hills and he turned his face and looked at the hills and it was the face of a young, not a boy, but a very, very young man.

S: Yes. Yes. Yes, that happened, too, but there was also this other face that wasn't young. This other face had all of the ages, somehow. It was young and old and in the middle and it was—this is just my eyes—but when "that face" appeared when he was speaking, it was…It also had, I don't like to use the word radiant, because that's been overused, I think, by some people, but it did somehow have light coming from it in a very different way, and not just reflecting it. It did…[pause]. And also, while it was Krishnaji's face, it was also not Krishnaji's face, which was also very strange; almost as in a dream, when someone has a different face but you know it's them. [Both chuckle.] But this…, no, it wasn't like that, because this was definitely Krishnaji's face, but it wasn't his face. I don't know…can you describe it as you remember it?

M: It's so hard to describe. His face was his face, but…

S: Now we are talking about "the face," when it changed, right?

M: Yes. Well, I will talk about his face in a moment but…It was different. I don't know what to say. It was transformed or, but…I don't know, it was like light changing on something. Again, it's in this extraordinary realm of things that you notice and must not try to project onto because you don't want to put your own stamp on something.

S: I know. And we're, of course, limited by the language that we have, but also our memories, which are such faulty devices. But still…

M: Yes. And also what we bring to a perception.

S: I know. I know. I know. But still, describe it as if you were describing it to someone from outer space. How did the face change when Krishnaji said, "Did the face change?" And you would say, "Yes." How did it change?

M: I feel I don't want to be…anything I say is too indefinite.

S: I know, and we know that it is wrong, but say it anyway.

M: I may be hallucinating here for all I know, speaking for myself.

S: Exactly. I know.

M: But, It's [long pause]…I can't describe it. I'm sorry. I mean, the minute I fish words out of my head, they're insufficient. They're too definite. They're too confining. They're too specific for something that was…The minute we translate something like this into words, we're in the realms of symbols. Words are symbols.

S: Yes, we agree. And we agree also that we're not going to get it right, but there has to be…see, I think that we ought to try and say something. Like, for instance, the face didn't change into a kind of Picasso, you know, with both eyes on one side and the nose upside down, so…so we can at least lay parameters down or something. I think we should say something.

M: Well, it was his face. But…[pause] I balk at words.

S: [laughing] I know you do.

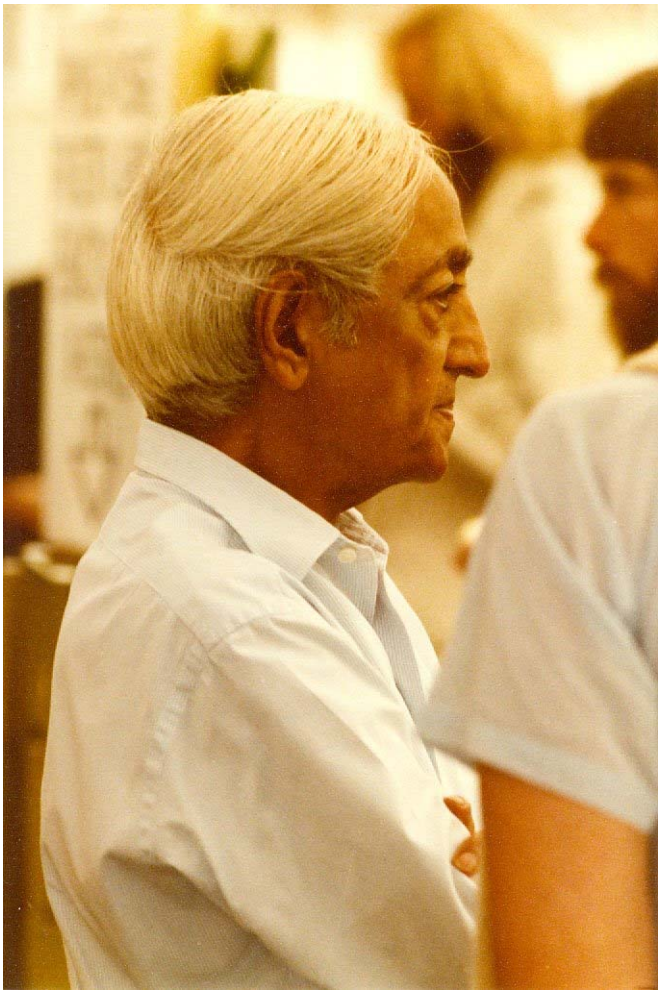
M: Well, I think we have described it as much as we can, or least that I can. I am wary. My description is that I feel that I don't have the words, let's put it that way in a very flat term…to convey this. [M chuckles.] But it was perceived with whatever one's own limitations were at that moment. Something was perceived that somebody can say, "Well, you're imagining the whole thing because blah, blah, blah." And that's just nonsense. They can dismiss it. But there was something that I saw…I speak only for myself—and you must speak for yourself…that I did not explain or…it never entered into a familiar term of pinpointing something, explaining what it was. It was just…And one could say it was imagined, but I don't and didn't feel that it was imagined. I'm not given to that kind of imagining. It's just a…a wonderful uncertainty that always, somehow, relations with Krishnaji never had boundaries. Never had statistics to what you could point to and say, "This is what he was like" or "This is how he behaved" or "This is what he was doing." It was all this wonderful…there was the unknown in a very simple way. I mean, an unknown that…that it didn't evoke in me, "Ah yes, I understand it." It all was beyond those dimensions. I don't know, but I'm just getting…

S: Yes. No, that's right. But not only unknown, but always new in some strange way. And Krishnaji would do the same things, often over and over again. The whole going to London, Huntsman, or…

M: Everything was absolutely…



S: …going for the walks, and yet it always felt new when you were with him.

M: Well, this to me—this I can say more definitely than what I've just said—is that I always felt that the extraordinary eloquence of the man, and the teaching genius that he had, was that it was new to him at that moment. He was…his voice, his mind, his perception was seeing something that wasn't associated with anything else, and yet he was talking about the same things, in a way—it was the same area. He was talking about dimensions of the human consciousness that most people don't have. But it was new to him. He was not repeating what he'd seen twenty years ago or even last week.

S: Yes. But even doing things like going into London or going on the same walk every day—that was also new, it felt.

M: Yes, it was.

Krishnaji at Brockwood talks (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: It felt like a whole new—and it seemed like it was new to him, too.

M: Yes. There was no—there was a great deal of routine to his life, and there was no routine to his life.

S: I know. [Both chuckle.]

M: It was always…and somehow this has, for me, has to do with his teachings. I mean, this was the way he lived and we should all live, in that things don't repeat themselves. They are—they exist, then. And they're true, then. They are not a reflection. Nothing is a reflection with Krishnaji. It's happening, it's there. He's seeing, he's talking about something that is there that moment—alive. And it isn't repetitious. Even…I don't know, in the talks, I used to feel sometimes I knew what he was going to say, but it wasn't old. It was—he was not repeating something. And I wasn't perceiving something I'd seen before. It's impossible to describe all these things.

S: I agree it is impossible. I also think…

M: And that's why I can reread his books over and over and over again as though I'd never read them before or wasn't there when he said those things that are printed.

S: I know. Yes. It's impossible to describe and yet it is important to try to.

M: Well, I think we have done that.

S: [chuckles] Anyway, alright—I won't pursue this anymore, but I think it was…

M: Well, it's important…since this seems to be…that we're trying to do.

S: It is important that we push this. I think we have to just, yes…because the whole thing of trying to evoke, or trying to recall what this phenomenal blessing was that was to be around Krishnaji, it's also reaching, as well as we can, for these things that are just ineffable; they are indescribable; they're un-capturable. And yet one has to try and grasp these things because…

M: And we had the blessing—that is the right word—of his giving us these things without deliberate…giving them just by being.

S: Yes. Yes. And I think it's so…it was so unique because, in my experience and understanding, these blessings were not…are not to be found elsewhere. So we were able to experience or be present at things that other people can't. They're not there, as far as I know. And so,…who knows…but it is, at least in my understanding of the world and my experience with the world, so rare that as flawed and faulty and inadequate as our descriptions are, we have to give it our best shot. [Both chuckle.]

M: Well, let's keep trying.

So, we begin these diaries with the first of August, 1981. 'It was quiet at last. I marketed, then Krishnaji, Parchure, and I lunched alone. Nadia Kossiakof saw Krishnaji at 4:30 p.m. Krishnaji and I walked in the woods where it is cooler. The appeal yesterday brought in Swiss francs 6,100 for a total in donations of 46,000. So we have enough for the talks for next year.'

The next day, ‘All is quiet. The tent is gone. The sun shines. Krishnaji, though on a restrictive diet for two days before having X-rays Tuesday, is starting the additions to his Journal that Mary has asked for to make it long enough for the next publication by Gollancz. He saw Gisèle Balleys for a short interview in the afternoon. Then we walked around the mountain in a light rain, which came up. I am on a two-day fruit fast.’ Walking around the mountain was when we went down around the Alpina Hotel and back up the other side.

S: Right. Right. Now, this writing that Krishnaji was doing was for…

M: What would become Krishnamurti’s Journal. Mary L. felt sheneeded more than she had to make it long enough. So he was adding to what he’d written before.

The next day, ‘Krishnaji continued to write. I did errands. We ate at noon with Krishnaji’s special restrictive diet for tomorrow’s X-rays. I did another day of fruit fast. I feel repulsion for fruit or anything to eat. Parchure thinks this fruit fast doesn’t agree with me. D’accord.[1]’ I write in French. ‘No walk.’ [Both chuckle.]

August fourth. ‘I feel so happy that writing about it pulls me down out of the sky. This morning at 8:30 a.m., Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I were at the Saanen hospital where, with Parchure watching over the radiologist, Krishnaji had X-rays of his lower gastrointestinal tract. Dr. Parchure and I felt this was necessary to rule out anything pathological in Krishnaji’s digestion system. It is a test I have long wanted him to have but hesitated to put him through it. This was the right time and place. The Saanen hospital is nice and efficient, with a good radiology department. Dr. Parchure was there to oversee the preliminaries and go in with Krishnaji to see the fluoroscope and talk to the radiologist, who luckily spoke English. The results are what made me soaringly happy. There is nothing wrong with his digestive tract. One finding was a slight sclerotic thickening of the aorta. Parchure says this is a common age symptom and, as other signs such as his low blood pressure, etcetera exist in Krishnaji, it is not a cause for disquiet. So, I have enormous peace of mind. His digestion has been all right since he shifted to not starting meals with fruit and then salad. The order is reversed: cooked food, then salad, then a moderate amount of fruit. No more fruit juices. He is at present drinking Soya Gen’—that is that Swiss drink made of soy—‘at breakfast and Sumbal…’—that’s another Swiss product.

S: Yes, I remember them.

M: ‘…after lunch. He eats as much as he wants for lunch, but less at supper. A thick vegetable soup or a cooked vegetable, one piece of toast or biscuit, and cheese. Tofu, too. Krishnaji stood the barium needed for the X-ray well, and in an hour we were on our way back to Tannegg. All felt very cheerful. Krishnaji said, “I told you there would be nothing wrong.”’ [Both chuckle.] ‘After his breakfast he continued writing the first of the two pieces Mary needs for the new book. He wants a new soft pen and a loose-leaf notebook, but there were none suitable in Gstaad.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘At 5 p.m., he had his hair cut, and afterwards said, “I feel extravagant. I want to buy something for you.”’ [Both chuckle.] 'We went to Loertscher'—that's the store with all the sweaters—'and we bought a nice brown Pringle jersey for Dr. Parchure. Then we walked in the shade of the woods. The stream was cool and its sound ran through me as part of the happiness I felt. Krishnaji laughed at me and took my hand, and I knew the extraordinary gift of being able to say, "Yes. Now, at this very moment, I am totally happy."' [Both chuckle.]

S: How nice.

M: He thought I was silly to be so happy that he was well. [S chuckles.]

August fifth. 'Another warm day. Krishnaji wrote and I typed it for Mary. I also did errands of getting supplies of Soya Gen and Buerlecithin, which Krishnaji suddenly fancies and wants for Brockwood and India. They could have gone with Scott in the van; but alas, we didn't want all this last week, before Scott left. I bought all there was in Gstaad and arranged for half of it to go with Harsh and half with Brian Jenkins, who each are still here with cars. In spite of the heat, we walked in the woods and my happiness continues, and Krishnaji is aware of it.' Which means he's laughing at it. [Both chuckle.]

The sixth. 'It is a hot day. I went to the hospital to fetch Krishnaji's X-rays and other records. Krishnaji wrote and I typed. Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure like bitter tastes. So I got a small bottle of Fernet-Branca'—you know, it's the digestive liqueur that's often used in alcoholic drinks. It's a bitters—'and a large bottle of Cynar'—that's a French bitter drink that's made of artichokes—'which Krishnaji tasted somewhere in the past and pronounces good whenever he sees an advertisement for it.' [Both chuckle.] 'Lunch is now embellished with either of these. Krishnaji relishes both.' [M chuckles.] 'Dr. Parchure'—this made me laugh—'keeps asking, "What is the dose, sir?" as if it were medicine. And both seem to have blotted out the fact that they are taking alcoholic drinks.' [Both laugh.] 'It tastes like cough medicine in my childhood, and I abstain. Krishnaji gave an interview to Donald Hoppen at 4:30 p.m., who was working with a Swiss architect on a huge building in the Jungfraujoch.' It's part of the mountain, the Jungfrau. 'We walked later in the woods as drops from a coming storm began. Krishnaji remembered our seeing deer on the field above the path. And minutes later, we saw one dash across two fields above Tannegg. I went to take a shower and missed Krishnaji's calling me to see what was probably the same deer below his window.'

S: I just want to add here that when Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure were drinking the Fernet-Branca and the Cynar, it was very, very small amounts that were then watered down. So tiny that no self-respecting Frenchman would acknowledge this as a proper drink. [Chuckles.]

M: No, I think they put it in a glass of water or something.

S: Yes. Yes. Tiny, microscopic, homeopathic amounts [laughs], but enough to just flavor the water and make it a little bit bitter. [Laughs again.]

M: Yes and it was supposed to be—I don't know what. 'There was a thunderstorm.'

Now, I'm going to tell you the bad news: There's nothing more for 1981 in the big book.

S: Ohhhh. Alright.

M: However, we will plow ahead.

S: We will race ahead. Nothing at all for 1981?

M: Nothing. The big diary starts again when '82 starts.

S: Oh, alright. So, it probably doesn't start again until Krishnaji returns, because you didn't go to India that year.

M: No. So, we'll have to bear with the little diary only.

August seventh. 'Krishnaji continued to write. I typed all morning, and in the afternoon sent the first piece that Krishnaji wrote to Mary. We walked in the cool of the woods. We also began a week's regime of whole rice at every lunch. I telephoned to Mary in the evening, and to Dorothy. Frances got off to Ojai yesterday.'

The eighth, 'Krishnaji didn't sleep too well and so didn't go for a walk. He wrote in the morning and rested in the afternoon. I did shopping and took Dr. Parchure to get frames for eyeglasses. Then worked long at the accumulated correspondence.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji continued to write in the morning, and I continued to work on accumulated letters. He saw Ortolani at 4:30. Then we walked down around Alpina and up the hill behind Tannegg.'

August tenth. 'I finished all letters and posted them. I am, for once, up-to-date. Krishnaji wrote in the morning and we walked to the river. Ortolani came in the evening. It seems Frances's sister, Helen McCann, is here in Gstaad and is weeping over Frances. I will ask her here tomorrow.'

August eleventh. 'Krishnaji does not want me to go to Rome. He has been saying this on and off for the last few days. Dr. Parchure pointed out the difficulty that not going puts me in, and at lunch Krishnaji told me today that it is alright.' I don't know why he didn't want me to go to Rome. 'I typed while he wrote in the morning, then did the marketing. At 3:30 p.m., I telephoned Erna to inquire if Frances arrived safely. Erna reported that Frances was there and is seeing Dr. Hidley. Frances's sister came here at 4 p.m. to talk about Frances with me for a while, then Krishnaji joined, and eventually Dr. Parchure added his share. It was a two-hour conversation. The sister was upset. We did as much as possible to reassure her. Then Krishnaji and I walked to the river. My brother rang from the Vineyard. They got back with difficulty. I dined with Jackie Siddoo.'

The twelfth. 'Krishnaji wrote and I typed what he had written. Frances's sister asked for a private interview with Krishnaji, and he saw her for an hour in the afternoon. Then we walked in the woods. The U.S. air controllers' strike has airports all over the world in turmoil. I got a letter from Amanda about Willy Wyler's death.' That was a friend of ours, William Wyler. 'Phil gave the eulogy at his service.'

The thirteenth. 'Krishnaji was again writing and I was typing. Instead of a walk, we went for a drive to Zweisimmen, and toward Lenk.' And the next day was much the same except that on the fourteenth, 'Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched at the Park Hotel. It wasn't too good.'

August fifteenth. 'It was a warm day. Krishnaji wrote while I typed, then I did marketing. Jackie Siddoo came to say goodbye to Krishnaji, then he and I walked in the woods. He said, "You must outlive me. You are responsible to that. I will send you angels but you mustn't call on them. Drive carefully."' [Both chuckle.] He was always…These angels could be summoned, but I mustn't exploit them. [Both laugh.]

S: Yes, and here is this statement again, that you are responsible not to him—but to that.

M: To that, yes. And the that is underlined when I write it.

S: In the diary, yes.

M: Yes. And he said that to you. You could no longer climb mountains for the same reason.

S: I know, I know. Exactly. My life is no longer mine.

M: No. And I wasn't to go…

S: …gallivanting around unnecessarily.

M: Yes. I could fly to see my mother if that was necessary.

S: Yes, alright. Let's just have another little discussion here because there is something relevant here too, [M laughs] and it's not something that we've called attention to before. When he says, "You are responsible to that," well, first of all, it's not clear what "that" is. [Chuckles.] But it's also…

M: One wouldn't ask him what "that" is.

S: No, of course not. Exactly. It wasn't done. I don't know why…I wish now I had, but anyway. But even when he talks about things like "the committee," you know, which is this other—some esoteric…

M: Yes, they're a little more embodied in my imagination.

S: Yes. They are a little bit more embodied, but, what is significant here is that it is a they.

M: A what?

S: A they. You see, it's plural.

M: Yes, it's plural.

S: And that in itself is just worth commenting on or saying what we can about it, because…

M: Well, there are possible explanations, but I don't want to feel…

S: No, we don't want to get into explanations; we want to just recall what else may have been said.

M: I am not competent to define it. I don't know. [Chuckles.]

S: No, no, not define it, but just recall what else of this plural nature could we talk about? Because it's significant that it is plural.

M: It is. I've had, at times, a sense of them. Without any notion of who they are or were or anything. But it wasn't just one entity. But…again…

S: I know, I know, but I'm going to keep pushing you on all this…

M: Someone in the next century may come across this thing and say, well, they were really…

S: Exactly. That we were completely demented. It doesn't make any difference—they're probably going to say we were demented in any case, so…

M: Well, that's alright. Brainwashed by this…

S: …that's their problem, but [laughs] is there anything else that we can say? You see, something like "the face" is very singular.

M: Yes, "the face" is singular.

S: And the references to some entity like the Buddha, that we see in his early writings, etcetera—that's all singular.

M: Yes.

S: And the Maitreya is singular, or who knows what it is. But anyway, there are notions of singularity and then there are notions of plurality.

M: Yes.

S: And when Krishnaji refers to some of these things, like the committee…

M: It's plural.

S: …it's plural.

M: It is. It is, and what I felt at a certain time was plural. But I couldn't…And then there's…you see all these wonderful words that are used: the sacredness, the otherness, the ineffable, the wordless, the…you know, all this is again, beautiful words to describe "the Other."

S: Yes.

M: So…

S: It's interesting too—some words like "the Other" and even "that"—you are responsible to "that"—it could be singular or plural. It's not definite.

M: No, it's not. It's not human. [Laughs.]

S: Right. It's not human, yes.

M: It's…wordless, ineffable, sacred. All those words. You can't define it or imagine it, and you can't describe it. It is. [Pause.]

S: Alright. Perhaps we should proceed.

M: August sixteenth. 'I left at 8:50 a.m. and drove to Geneva airport, gave the car back to Hertz, and flew Alitalia to Rome.' I went to see Filomena. 'Filomena and Mario'—that's her son—'met me and we drove back to Filomena's flat. Mistica'—that's her niece—'was away al mare'—which means at the beach. 'But Vincenza'—that was, I don't know, I think a niece—'and Alvina'—that was her sister—'and Vincenza's son, Primo, and his wife and a three-day-old baby, Viola, and a three-year-old son, Aldo, were all there. Filomena and I had supper alone and talked at length. I went to bed early. I telephoned Krishnaji from Geneva and also on my arrival in Rome to report that I was safe.' You see, he didn't want me to go…the angels would…he didn't want me to depend on the angels…[both chuckle].

The seventeenth. 'I sorted an accumulation of years of papers for Filomena, and urged her to make a new will according to Italian law. We had lunch and talked. Her broken arm in January has left her left hand with diminished function. She has had dizzy spells and her blood pressure is up. We talked of the uncertainty of my coming next year. She doubts she will live much longer and wants to go. We talked of everything. I took a nap and sat on her terrace, but didn't go out. Vanda had arrived at Tannegg this afternoon.'

August eighteenth. 'Filomena and Mario took me to Fiumicino'—that's the airport. 'My 10:30 a.m. Alitalia flight left at 12:10 p.m. When I arrived in Geneva, I telephoned Krishnaji that I was there. I took a Hertz Granada station wagon and drove via Aigle and Pillon to Gstaad. Krishnaji has written me each day. We walked in the woods. He said, "I've had enough of Gstaad." Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and I had supper. I'm glad to have seen Filomena and done what I could, but I am glad to be back; and like Krishnaji, glad to be moving on to Brockwood.'

The next day was a day of packing and doing errands in the village. 'Krishnaji was tired in the afternoon so we didn't walk. It was a warm day.'

August twentieth. 'Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I left Vanda, Fosca, and Tannegg; and drove via Aigle to Geneva, where we flew on a 1:55 p.m. Swiss Air flight to London. Dorothy met us. I am happily we are back at Brockwood. We went for a short walk. The country is soft with the fullness of late summer. I telephoned Mary.'

The twenty-first. 'I spent most of the day unpacking, opening mail, and doing small things around the house. Krishnaji had lunch and spent the day in bed. I took the car for a checkup in West Meon and to buy things to eat. Anneke arrived. I spoke to the Bohms. They will come for three days on Sunday. David is better.'

The next day. 'I finished unpacking and putting things in order. I talked to Anneke, and saw Donald Hoppen in the afternoon. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked with the dogs across the fields; this lovely country. I spoke to my friend Betsy in the evening.'

August twenty-third. 'In the morning, Krishnaji wrote while I typed. Saral and David arrived in the afternoon to stay in the West Wing until Wednesday'—this was on a Sunday. 'Krishnaji talked to David, then we all went for a short walk.'

The next day, 'I went to Alresford on errands while Krishnaji wrote. Then I spent the rest of the day doing desk work. Krishnaji treated Dave. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.'

The twenty-fifth. 'It was a warm day. Krishnaji wrote and I did desk work. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I cleaned brambles in the grove.' That was always fun. I liked that.

August twenty-sixth. 'It was a beautiful, very warm day. We took the 10:46 a.m. train to London. Joe met us at Waterloo, and drove us to their flat. I went around the corner and had my hair cut, then came back to lunch with Mary and Joe. Joe dropped us later at the Burlington Arcade, where Krishnaji carefully tried out and bought a Mont Blanc pen. Then he had his hair cut, and we took the train back to Petersfield.'

The next day was ‘another warm day. Krishnaji spent the morning writing and I typing. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went down to see our Brockwood dean cottage bought this spring and now fixed up nicely.’ What is that?

S: That was the one at the bottom of the hill.

M: I don’t remember it.

S: Yes, you do—it was down at the bottom of the hill, right next to where Edna lived.

M: Oh, I see, on the road, of course. Yes, yes, yes.

August twenty-eighth. ‘People are arriving for talks. As this was Krishnaji’s “day off,” he stayed in bed. In the afternoon, I drove with Dr. Parchure to Guilford for his Seiko watch, and to Habitat. We were back in time for supper.’

The twenty-ninth. ‘I cooked our lunch early. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his first Brockwood talk of the year. We had our lunch in our kitchen and then Krishnaji went down to the tent for half an hour. Suad al Radhi came back with him for coffee.’ She was an Iranian lady. ‘Then I went to the tent, and after that had a bit of rest. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.’

August thirtieth. ‘Krishnaji gave his second Brockwood talk. A very fine one.[2] Mary and Amanda were there and came up to lunch with Krishnaji and me in our kitchen. Krishnaji talked to a Mr. and Mrs. Feller of New Zealand at 4:30 p.m., then he, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields.’

The next day, ‘I had the usual Monday chores, and I also sorted questions handed in for tomorrow’s question-and-answer meeting. I also talked to the Polish lady, Magdalina.’ Do you remember her?

S: Yes. I do.

M: ‘At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview to a Mrs. Ann Toothe from Nassau in the Bahamas. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.’

September first. ‘I cooked our lunch, then typed questions for Krishnaji. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji answered three of the questions in the meeting. We lunched in our kitchen. I talked to Mary Cadogan about trusteeship enlargement, then went to Alresford on errands, including getting a Magimix for Dorothy’s new kitchen. She, Krishnaji, and I took a short walk.’

The second. ‘I did desk work most of the day. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields; pale gold with the cut straw. It was so beautiful. We also did some rhododendron cleaning. I sorted questions for tomorrow’s meeting.’

September third. ‘At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji answered written questions in the second question-and-answer meeting. We had lunch in our kitchen. At 4 p.m., he gave a private interview to the Polish Magdalina, and at 4:30, he talked with a Dutch lady, Mrs. deBooy.’ Mrs. deBooy was a friend, I think, of Dorothy’s. ‘He, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields. In the evening, I saw a part of the BBC interview of my friend, Peter Ustinov.’

The fourth, ‘Krishnaji dictated letters, but otherwise spent the whole day in bed resting. I typed in the morning and went marketing in West Meon and Petersfield in the afternoon. In the evening, we watched a Polish film on TV of the solidarity conference last year.’

Krishnaji with the Indian dancer Chitra Sundaram (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

September fifth. ‘I cooked our lunch early. Krishnaji, at 11:30 a.m., gave a deeply moving talk.[3] Mary and Joe lunched with us in our kitchen. The Indian dancer Chitra Sundaram danced in the tent for the benefit of the school’s scholarship fund. Krishnaji attended the beginning and the end of it, but in between we went for a short walk. I talked in the evening to the Israeli committee member Avrahan Jacoby.’

The next day. ‘I again cooked our lunch early, then went to Krishnaji’s fourth Brockwood talk. It was a warm day, and the crowd was immense. After eating lunch quietly upstairs, Krishnaji went back to the tent briefly. I talked again to Magdalina Jasciuska. Dorothy was stung by a wasp, and had a bad reaction. Dr. Parchure gave her a shot for it. People began to leave. In the evening, Dorothy, Doris, Anneke, and I counted scholarship donations.’

September seventh, ‘I spent the morning doing laundry and other household tasks while Krishnaji wrote a little. In the afternoon, he, Dorothy, and I walked around the empty tent and orchards, etcetera.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji said he slept poorly. He spent the day in bed, and lunched on a tray. It was a morning of desk work for me. In the afternoon, I took Dr. Parchure to Winchester for shopping. In the evening, Shakuntala talked with me about Narayan.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji wrote and I did letters. Anneke left and I cleaned and prepared the spare room for the Marogers. Krishnaji and I took a short walk.’ And the following day is much the same except that people are arriving for the seminar.

September eleventh. ‘Both Marogers arrive for the seminar. I put them in the West Wing. Diane fell and broke her arm last week. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the first seminar, mostly on education. Maurice Wilkins is here, and so is Stuart Holroyd, who wrote The Quest of a Quiet Mind. It is the first time he has ever seen Krishnaji.’ He wrote a whole book about Krishnaji, but he never met him before. ‘I slept in the afternoon, then walked with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Jean-Michel, and Marie-Bertrande.’

September twelfth. ‘The second seminar meeting. Rupert Sheldrake (the rat man) came.’ [S chuckles.] ‘Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went to Petersfield in the afternoon for walking shoes for Krishnaji, but found none. I telephoned Betsy in London as it’s her birthday. Maurice Wilkins gave a talk in the evening on nuclear disarmament.’

The thirteenth. ‘It was the third seminar meeting. Wilkins left after, as did Magdalina Jasciuska; she went back to Poland. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked around the fields. In the evening, Rupert Sheldrake gave a talk on his book.’

September fourteenth. ‘Krishnaji held the fourth seminar meeting. I took the car after lunch to the Mercedes place for service in Chichester. Marie-Bertrande came with me. Jean-Michel followed and I came back with them. We shopped in Petersfield at the Bran Tub. Marie-Bertrande is worried about the Russian threat. She told this to Krishnaji on the walk, but he, Dorothy, and I feel the threat won’t materialize. A computer expert, Averill’—I didn’t know his last name—‘gave a talk on computers in the evening. The Marogers left for France. I talked to Nicole Philipeau.’ She was a woman I met in Switzerland.

S: Now wait a minute—the fourteenth, when you say “the threat won’t materialize,” is the threatened invasion of Poland by Russia because of Solidarity?

M: Yes. Yes.

September fifteenth. ‘The fifth and last meeting of the seminar, after which most people left. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the field. Dr. Parchure gave me the last of the nightly back and leg massages. He leaves for India tomorrow.’

September sixteenth. ‘Dorothy drove Dr. Parchure to Heathrow at 5:30 a.m. Brian Jenkins drove me to Chichester, where I picked up the Mercedes, paid the annual vehicle tax at the Chichester post office, and came back to Brockwood in time for lunch cooked by Shakuntala for Krishnaji, Dorothy, herself, and me; and which we ate in the West Wing dining room. At 4:30 p.m., a Stephen Gaines and a Miss Bumpus of the BBC came to interview Krishnaji for a radio program on Edwin Lutyens[4]. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. I finished packing for our trip to Holland tomorrow.’

The seventeenth. ‘Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I, with Raman to drive the Cortina back, left for Heathrow, where at 9:30 a.m., we met Mary Links and Mary Cadogan, and we took a KLM flight to Amsterdam. Anneke and Dr. Hans Vincent met us at Schiphol airport, and I rented a Hertz Mitsubishi station wagon. With Hans Vincent to show the way, we drove to the Hotel Kastangehof in Lage Vuursche, near Hilversum. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Mary Links, Mary Cadogan, and I are staying there. It is a nice, small hotel in the woods. We dined in a special room to ourselves in a restaurant next door.’ That was nice. You came somewhere there.

S: Yes, I did, but I was with the video crew.

M: Yes.

S: Some very nice Dutch lady gave us her whole house. She turned over the entire house to us and just left us with it. So, yes, I had Jonas there as technical help, and two video cameramen. The RAI had its own video equipment, so we only had to bring the crew.

M: Aha. So the next day. ‘Krishnaji had breakfast in bed. The rest of us breakfasted downstairs while Krishnaji rested. Mary Cadogan and Dorothy came with me to reconnoiter the way to the RAI Congress Centrum where Krishnaji speaks, as he did previously ten years ago. We reached there in forty minutes, but had quite a time finding the entrance. We got back in time for lunch. Krishnaji lunched downstairs with all of us except Mary Links, who was out with a friend. After a nap, all of us, including Mary Links, went for a walk in the rain in the woods. We needed it after the large meals here. Krishnaji had supper in bed and slept nine hours.’

September nineteenth: ‘Krishnaji had breakfast in bed. With Mary L. and Mary C., Dorothy in the backseat, and Krishnaji and I in front, we left at 10:20 a.m. for the RAI.’ That’s the big hall in Amsterdam. ‘We just made it by 10:57 a.m. There was a huge crowd. Scott got Krishnaji in. He, Jonas, and students Julius and Jean-François are doing the video recording. The van der Stratens were there. The hall was overflowing. Krishnaji gave a very fine talk.[5] We came back to a 1:30 p.m. lunch, then had a nap. All walked in the woods, by which time it was 6:30 and another huge meal loomed.’ [S chuckles.] ‘Krishnaji ate in bed and sparingly.’ [Both chuckle.]

S: We might just want to talk about this crowd for a minute because it was extraordinary. It was—it’s a huge hall, and all told, there were about 5,000 people, or something like that.

M: Well, I think there were about 3,000 seats, but it spilled out into the outer hall, and they put up a TV in the outer hall.

S: Not one—there must have been at least ten because they were all around. The spill-over space was a large circular lobby area that goes all the way around the exterior of large seating space. And there were, I think, at least ten monitors, and all of those were running, and even then, there were so many people that some people couldn't get close enough to even see the monitors. So, it was huge. I was obviously talking to the people running the RAI, because of all the technical things I was doing with the video recording, and they were astonished at the size of the crowd.

M: Good. Yes. I remember that it was that way.

The only two photos of Krishnaji and Mary with Joe and Mary Links taken by Scott after lunch in Deventer (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

September twentieth. 'Krishnaji slept nine hours. We drove in the rain to the RAI for Krishnaji's second Amsterdam talk. Another huge crowd. Up to 5,000, and it was a very fine talk that covered everything.[6] Suzanne and Hugues came to lunch with us, and Joe arrived to join Mary. Krishnaji rested after lunch while Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, Hugues, and I discussed Krishnamurti Foundation matters. Scott arrived to talk to Mary Cadogan. Then he, Krishnaji, Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, and I walked. Krishnaji is worried about food, but he ate an adequate supper. However, he couldn't sleep until 1:30 a.m., as his feet were cold. Anneke arrived to stay in the hotel. She, the Linkses, Dorothy, Mary Cadogan, and I dined, and Scott joined us later.'

September twenty-first. 'Krishnaji and Anneke went with the Linkses; Mary C. and Dorothy with me; and Scott drove Jonas, Julius, and Jean-François to Deventer. We arrived at 11:30 a.m. and visited the Atheneum Bibliotek, where Anneke created the Krishnaji documentation center. It is a pleasant room and it will house a permanent museum of Krishnaji books, audio and videotapes, photographs, etcetera. It is very nice. The Dutch Stichting'—that means "committee"—'had us all to lunch afterward in a restaurant across the river. Then we drove on to Ommen, and Castle Eerde[7]; Krishnaji's first visit there in fifty years. He got out of the car and looked at it from the edge of the moat, but returned to the car when the students came out of the school.' It is an international school today. 'The Links's car and mine returned to Lage Vuursche, and the hotel.'

The only two photos of Krishnaji and Mary with Joe and Mary Links taken by Scott after lunch in Deventer (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The next day. 'Mary and Joe left to drive home. I took Dorothy and Mary Cadogan to the Schiphol airport. Krishnaji lunched with Anneke while I shopped for fruit and Verkade biscuits for Krishnaji.' Those were delicious cookies made by a place called Verkade in Hilversum. 'I came back and rested all afternoon. Krishnaji stayed in bed. Hugues and the van der Stratens dined with Anneke and me as he was in Holland on business. Krishnaji is feeling rested.'

The twenty-third. 'We had a quiet morning. Krishnaji, Anneke, and I lunched; and then went to buy a Philips electric razor, "the latest," in the little town of Den Dolder nearby. Krishnaji and I walked in the woods, and he had supper on a tray in bed, while Anneke and I dined downstairs.'

The twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji and I packed. Anneke's cousin, Professor van der Veen, came at 11:30 a.m. to greet Krishnaji. Then at noon, Krishnaji and I said goodbye to Anneke, and drove to Schiphol. Krishnaji felt weak in the car. "I'm not quite there," he said. We took the KLM 2 p.m. to Heathrow. Krishnaji had to walk slowly. He felt "washed out." He ate only some grapes we brought. Dorothy met us, and Krishnaji relaxed in the car on the drive back to Brockwood. I got him into his warm bed, but he shook as if with malaria. He took hot Ribena'—that's a fruit drink—'and three teaspoons of brandy, which worked a cure. He is just overtired. Twice he said, "You are a nice person."'

September twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji remained in bed. In the afternoon, he was feverish. I took his temperature and it was 103.6. I got Dr. Clarke from the Alresford Surgery, who examined him and found no other symptoms but fever. He said it was a virus, and to take fluid and Bufferin every four hours to bring down the fever. He took one at 6:50 p.m. after a little soup. He asked me to stay with him and so I was able to take his temperature at 1:30 a.m. when he awoke. It was 101. I gave him another Bufferin at 2 a.m. There was profuse sweating.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji awoke at 7 a.m. His temperature was 99.2. He took another Bufferin. Later he ran a hot tub in which he bathed, and I remade the bed. All is clean. He felt better but very weak. At 1 p.m., his temperature was 98.6. He ate lightly but fairly well. Dr. Clarke and Dr. Greene came in the morning, and prescribed breathing exercises sitting up, which Krishnaji did. He read most of the afternoon. His temperature at 6 p.m. was 101.6. At 9:15 p.m., he took another Bufferin. I stayed near him.' I would sit nearby in his bedroom chair.

The twenty-seventh. 'At 6 a.m., when Krishnaji woke, his temperature was 98. He is feeling very well. He took a bath while I changed the bed again, and then he had breakfast. His temperature was normal all day, and 99.4 at 5 p.m. He took no Bufferin. A very little sweating in the night. I stayed again near him. He was thirsty at 1:30 a.m., but after some restlessness, he slept well. We had watched the Healey versus Benn vote in the Labour Party conference on TV.' [S chuckles.]

September twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji's temperature was normal. Dr. Clarke came to see him, and said he can get up in the room today. My brother telephoned from New York. The market is in near panic. Krishnaji talked to me at length about his odd memory. He says he has two strong memories: 1) Standing alone by the river at Adyar, empty of all thought; and 2) Mrs. Besant taking him by the hand, sitting on a chowki and asking him if he accepted as disciples the group present. Then he said he has only one regret, which was not sending away Rosalind and Rajagopal. He spoke of remembrance. "No remembrance of Maria Z. I have fondness for you. It's not a remembrance. That is why it cannot change."' He used to say that he wrote me a lot of letters so that he wouldn't forget me. [Both chuckle.] 'His temperature was 99 in the evening.'

S: If I may, I'd like to make another little digression here. In this tape that I told you about of March fifteen, 1985, Krishnaji talks about these memories. He adds a third one, though, which is, well—first of all, let me elaborate on the first one he talks about, which is as a boy standing on the TS building, looking at the river. And he added there that he felt totally detached from all the things that were going on around him, and utterly alone—separated from all the worship…all of that.

M: Yes. This is why, to me, the effect of Theosophy on him was nil. He used to tell me it went in one ear and out the other. He didn't retain it. It didn't condition him.

S: Yes. He talks about that, too, in this tape. The other memory that he remembers—he says that as a vacant boy, he always used to stare vacantly at things with his mouth open.

M: And Leadbeater…

S: Yes, and Leadbeater came up behind him and slapped up his jaw.

M: Yes, and that was the end of the relation with Leadbeater.

S: Right. That was absolutely the end. Right. Exactly. He talks about that. And then, of course, this other memory of when Mrs. Annie Besant took him by the hand and asked him if he accepted those people as disciples. I don't know when that was—it's in Mary's biographies—but the point is that he has these three memories that, um…

M: And he had a curious memory for places.

S: I know. [Chuckles.]

M: When we drove from Gstaad to Paris, he would remember where we had stopped in previous years on the road for a picnic breakfast, which Fosca used to make. And he would say, "Now, we are coming to it, it's just down the road—it's here."

S: Yes. Yes.

M: It's very odd. He remembered places.

S: Yes, and he had an extraordinary memory for detail of anything that had been changed in places. Having been away for months, he would notice something that we had changed at Brockwood—a little thing on a gate post or something, whereas all the people who were living there—probably none of them had noticed it.

M: Yes.

The twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji's temperature was normal in the morning. He stayed in his room. I went to Alresford for some errands. In the evening, we watched a film on TV, The Birdman of Alcatraz.' Do you remember that movie? 'At 9 p.m., Krishnaji's fever returned to 101.4, so, I stayed near him again, and gave him Bufferin. At 4 a.m., the fever had dropped to 98.'

The next day. ‘On awakening, Krishnaji’s temperature was 98. I went to London for some errands, including getting my hair cut. I was back by 4 p.m. Krishnaji was listless and had a slight fever at 5 p.m., 99.4. I telephoned to Dr. Clarke. Krishnaji took a Bufferin at 5 p.m., and another at 9 p.m. He slept fairly well. Scott installed a Sony TV I have bought for my room.’ Oh, thank you. [S chuckles.]

October first. ‘Krishnaji has fever again, though only slight. I reported it to Dr. Clarke, who came at noon. He took a blood sample, but thinks it is just a second peaking of fever, and should subside for good tomorrow. Krishnaji felt weak. The school term opened. I did desk work, etcetera. Krishnaji’s fever in the evening was up to 100.8.’

October second. ‘Krishnaji slept well and his temperature was normal in the morning. Krishnaji did breathing exercises and a few light physical ones. I worked at the desk most of the day. There was a staff meeting at 4:45 p.m. His temperature in the evening was just over normal, but his voice was increasingly hoarse. He coughed before going to sleep.’

The next day. ‘Krishnaji’s fever in the morning was 97.8 Fahrenheit. His voice remains hoarse with some coughing. I worked at the desk all day, but kept checking his temperature. At 5 p.m. Krishnaji’s temp was 99.2.’

October fourth. ‘Krishnaji had a fair night, and his temperature at 7 a.m. was 98.2, but his voice was very hoarse. I tried to reach Dr. Clarke, but only a substitute was available as it is Sunday, so Krishnaji wants to wait until tomorrow. He sat in a chair, well covered most of the day. The school went on a ten-mile hike, but Dorothy and Ingrid cooked and seven people ate in the kitchen. Later, Dorothy and I took the dogs for a walk, picked apples in the old orchard, and I made apple compote for Krishnaji. His temperature at 6 p.m. was 99.3. I don’t feel too well.’ [Chuckles.] ‘I am very tired.’

The fifth. ‘Krishnaji had what he called a “fidgety” night. His temperature at 6 a.m. was 98.8. I called Dr. Clarke later in the morning, and he came at noon. He asked for a urine sample, which I took to his surgery in the afternoon. Krishnaji shaved off a beard he has grown since Holland.’ [M chuckles.] I don’t remember that. ‘He sat up in a chair most of the day, dozing and reading. His temperature at 6 p.m. was 98.6. Normal!’ Exclamation point.

October sixth. ‘Krishnaji slept well. His temperature is normal. He sat up in a chair in his room all morning. At 2:30, Dr. Clarke brought a doctor, Powell Jackson, to examine Krishnaji very thoroughly. Both agree he has had influenza, and both want him to stay in the West Wing, apart from the school, for a week, and start to build up his strength by walking in the house. I am to keep checking on his temperature. When they left, Krishnaji immediately walked up and down stairs.’ [Chuckles.] ‘His voice is almost clear. There is a definite change for the better today. I cooked soup for our supper. Dorothy came up at 5 p.m. to say that President Sadat has been assassinated in Egypt. We watched the news on TV. A better aerial had been put up for my TV this morning.’

Krishnaji at Brockwood talks (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The seventh. 'Krishnaji's temperature was normal. He sat up in his room most of the day and, though tired, walked up and down stairs in the afternoon. I spent most of the day doing desk work, but also went to West Meon for some errands. The country is so beautiful. I came back via Warnford.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji's temperature is normal. I worked at the desk most of day while Krishnaji read in his chair in his room, and walked in the West Wing. In the evening, we watched the film Jaws on TV.'

Friday the ninth. 'Dr. Clarke came to see Krishnaji. He said we could discontinue the temperature chart, and he will return to see Krishnaji next Thursday.' This was on a Wednesday, so it will be a week later. 'He can go out for a drive or small walk on Monday. I worked at my desk and attended a staff meeting. Krishnaji walked in the West Wing.'

October tenth. 'I spent much of the day doing desk work. Krishnaji saw the Dalal brothers, who arrived yesterday, for a few minutes after lunch. Then I drove them to Petersfield. They gave a generous donation. At 4 p.m., in the West Wing dining room, Krishnaji talked to both Siddoo sisters with Dorothy and me there, and then the prospective Wolf Lake principal, Reeta Sanatanai, was brought in. Krishnaji was tired in the evening, but had stood the extra effort well.'

The eleventh. 'At 9 a.m. I looked at video of Krishnaji's interview by Keith Berwick on the Odyssey program, taped at the NBC Burbank studios on May eighteenth. Krishnaji had a long, serious talk with me on what happened to him at 4 a.m. "The door opened and then shut." He could have "slipped away." What would I do if that happened in the future?' That means he would have died. 'He sees only Pupul and me to carry on the work. We talked for a long time, and he let me tape it.'

October twelfth. 'Krishnaji slept till 7 a.m., and felt what he called "lazy." He read in his chair most of the day. Mary Cadogan came, and we settled up the year's accounting of Krishnaji's travel expenses. I went to Alresford on errands. I attended the school meeting at 4:45 p.m. The Siddoos have left.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji remained in his room, reading. He didn't feel like the intended drive in the car, but he walked a bit in the West Wing. I have a slight cold. I worked at the desk. Krishnaji dictated letters.'

October fourteenth. 'Krishnaji, for the first time since the illness, dressed and came down to the dining room to lunch. He spoke afterward with a guest, Ms. Winifred Austin, which he said afterward did him good. He, Dorothy, I, and the dogs walked to the lodge and back—Krishnaji's first step out. It was a cold, gray day in the fifties, but there was no wind. Then Krishnaji went back to bed. We each had supper upstairs. Raman made some Indian dishes for Krishnaji. My cold is not too bad.'

The next day. 'After lunch, Krishnaji talked at length with Ronald Eyre, who was brought by Jane Hoare.' She was a painter and art teacher, both at Brockwood and one of the big art colleges in London. 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked to the lodge and back, then Krishnaji went to bed. Dorothy had bought Indian food in Petersfield to stimulate Krishnaji's appetite, and we had it for supper, Dorothy and I eating in the kitchen.'

The sixteenth. 'There was frost in the morning; a breath of crystal covering everything. It was clear and cold, but windless. Krishnaji and I took the 10:40 a.m. train to London, and were met at Waterloo by Joe. We went to their apartment and had lunch with both Mary and Joe. Krishnaji told him of the feeling he had last Sunday. Joe took Krishnaji to dentist Mr. Thompson at 2:30 p.m., then to Huntsman, where I met him. We walked to Truefitt, where Rita Zampese came with Krishnaji's Lufthansa ticket. While Krishnaji had his hair cut, Rita and I walked to Heaton to have some film developed, then back to Truefitt. Joe drove Krishnaji and me to Waterloo. Krishnaji stood the trip to London very well. We had Indian food for supper cooked by Reeta Sanatanai. A happy day in the familiar shape of so many days.'

The next day. 'I worked much of the morning at the desk, but Krishnaji wanted to talk to me about his U.S. program. I must see to it. The Digbys came to lunch. Krishnaji sat and talked with them, Dorothy, and me afterward.'

October eighteenth. 'I worked some at my desk, but the Bohms came down to lunch. In the afternoon, Krishnaji and Dave talked a bit together while I talked to Saral. Then we all had coffee. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked the dogs at 5 p.m. Erna telephoned to know how Krishnaji is.'

The nineteenth. ‘In the morning, Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number forty-one. I telephoned my brother in New York about arriving there on November second instead of earlier. Dr. Clarke came and gave Krishnaji a flu shot and gamma globulin. He gave me a flu shot, too. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I met Ingrid and Scott in the drawing room; and Krishnaji asked Ingrid and Scott to be the first of the “Brockwood counselors to the trustees.” It is to be a rotating arrangement by which two staff members are to be part of trustee meetings for one year, then two other staff members will take their places. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went for a walk.’ I don’t remember any of that.

S: Well, I had been attending the trustees’ meetings for several years, just to explain the video activities, which had become so expansive. Somehow, I always came into the meetings before the video topic was raised, and stayed on afterwards. And then Ingrid, who was the school’s bookkeeper, always came in to the annual general trustees’ meeting to help explain the finances. So this was an attempt to make two Brockwood people some kind of associate trustee members.

M: Yes. On a rotating basis.

S: On a rotating basis, but it never happened, there were no others who rotated in.

M: No. It didn’t. Eventually, you became a trustee.

S: I just became a trustee. I don’t think Ingrid did, but I can’t remember.

M: No, she stayed an associate.

The twentieth. ‘Krishnaji didn’t sleep well, so he rested in the morning, but got up for lunch. I went to Alresford and Winchester on errands. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went for a walk across the fields. Two students, Jean-François and Paul, washed the Mercedes so Scott can wax it tomorrow.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘We watched the TV program of Brideshead Revisited.’

October twenty-first. ‘Krishnaji dictated Letters to the Schools number forty-two. I typed what he had written for the Journal. I spoke to Ronald Eyre about the discussion he wants to record with Krishnaji in Ojai in April. Scott waxed the Mercedes. He came with me on a walk. Krishnaji didn’t feel like walking. His back hurts him. He says he pulled it doing exercise.’

October twenty-second. ‘Krishnaji rested in the morning. I tried to help with his back massage with liniment, and I continued my typing. I spoke on the phone to Mary Cadogan, who has found a suitable hall for Krishnaji to speak in in London, The Barbican Centre. Krishnaji says to get it for June fifth and sixth. He, Dorothy, and I walked with the dogs.’

The twenty-third. ‘Krishnaji’s back is painful, so he remained in bed all day. I began his packing. At a staff meeting, I announced for Krishnaji and the Krishnaji Foundation Trust the appointment of Brockwood counselors to the trustees to serve for a year, and that Ingrid and Scott are the first two. I gave Krishnaji massage before he went to sleep.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji's back is slightly better. He tried hanging from his bar, which helped.' He had that bar.

S: I know. Yes, I put it up for him. It was a chin-up bar in the doorway between his bedroom and his bathroom. He used to hang onto it and lift his feet off the ground, which he felt, sometimes, helped his back.

M: Yes. 'I did more packing for him while he remained in bed. I went to Harsh's first class on computers. Asit arrived from San Francisco and was brought down by friends Peter and Barbara Hale. He is spending the night here and will accompany Krishnaji to Delhi tomorrow.'

The twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji slept well. I gave him a massage after breakfast. Asit showed us his Minolta with an extra Leica 90mm lens. I traded him my Nikon for it. It is small, lighter, and quieter.' He was forever bringing the latest cameras and [S chuckles] Krishnaji always wanted me to have one.

S: Yes, but he didn't want you to take pictures of him with it.

M: No. [S chuckles.]

S: Which is the only reason you bought it.

M: Exactly. I wasn't interested in photographing anything else.

'I finished Krishnaji's packing. Krishnaji dressed and lunched with the school. I gave him one more back rub afterward. At 3:30 p.m., Krishnaji, Asit, Dorothy, and I left for Heathrow. Rita Zampese met us there and took Krishnaji and Asit onto the Lufthansa plane.' She worked for them, so she escorted them onto the plane. 'It left at 6 p.m. for Frankfurt, where they changed to a Lufthansa nonstop flight to Delhi. Krishnaji was still in pain but said it was better.' Well, then I remark on the beauty of his face in the car. 'Dorothy and I drove back to Brockwood.'

Now, from here on for several months, it is just about me and my life, and that's not so interesting.

S: Well, we're running out of tape, so it's a reasonable place to end this today.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] French for "I agree."

[2] For the video of the second Brockwood talk 1981.

[3] For the video of the third Brockwood Talk of 1981.

[4] Edwin Lutyens was Mary Lutyens's (Links's) father and probably the most celebrated architect of his day. As Krishnaji and his brother Nitya spent so many of their formative years in the Lutyens's household, Krishnaji knew Edwin Lutyens very well.

[5] For the video of the first Amsterdam talk of 1981.

[6] For the video of the second Amsterdam talk of 1981.

[7] A castle in the Dutch-classical style from 1715 with approximately 5,000 acres of land was given to the Order of the Star for Krishnaji's use in 1921. When Krishnaji dissolved the order in 1929, he gave the castle back to the van Pallandt family. The castle is now an international school.

Issue 70: February 9, 1982 to March 17, 1982

Readers will notice that the last issue ended on November fourth, 1981, and that this issue begins on February ninth, 1982. The missing three months are a period when Krishnaji was in India, and Mary was mostly in the U.S. Of course, her diaries describe her activities, but there are only occasional remarks about Krishnaji. We know, for instance, that on November fifth, Krishnaji held the second seminar meeting in New Delhi; and on the seventh and eighth, he held his third and fourth New Delhi talks. Mary also mentions when Krishnaji travels from one of his destinations in India to another, and when Krishnaji's letters to her arrive. Mary also writes about Krishnamurti Foundation of America activities, including the development of the second court case with Rajagopal. More ominously, Mary also records her discussions with their doctor about the possible need for Krishnaji to undergo another medical procedure, and that procedure occupies much of this issue. But all of these things, as important as they might be for history, do not shed much light on Mary's being in the presence of Krishnaji, so they have been omitted.

Mary: February ninth: 'I was in all day, working at my desk. Krishnaji left Bombay at 1:50 a.m. in what in India is February tenth, but in our calendar, is still the ninth. He flew on Singapore Airline to London using his new diplomatic passport.' [Chuckles.] 'I telephoned Brockwood at 6 a.m. my time, which is 2 p.m. there. Dorothy says Krishnaji looks wonderfully. Then I spoke to him and he sounds strong and well. It rained.'

Then there's really nothing of significance for the next couple of days. On the twelfth there is only, 'Mr. Schwartz brought the curtains, cushions, etcetera for the Arya Vihara living room. The painting of the walls and windows is finished. The living room entrance, hall, and dining room are now all white.'

The next day, 'I telephoned Filomena in Rome, and my brother telephoned me. Also, I rang Dorothy to remind Krishnaji to use his green card on entering the United States. The Indian consulate telephoned here to ask if I were meeting him. This was all Pupul's propping. The Georgian desk was repaired and delivered.'

Scott: Which Georgian desk?

M: It's that one in the living room. That was given to Sam and me by Jimmy Granger…Stewart Granger, the actor.

S: Ah, yes. Stewart Granger…or Jimmy Granger?

M: James Stewart Granger was his real full name, but he was called Jimmy always. 'I washed and put resin wax on the green Mercedes.' Did I? Well…good for me. That was my birthday, too. It doesn't mention it, but that was my birthday. [Both chuckle.] I waxed the car for my birthday.

S: As a special gift to yourself. [Both laugh.]

M: Of course, providing it's green!

Now, the big diary finally returns. February fourteenth. 'He is here. Light shines again and this spasmodic writing resumes; always, from my point of view, far inadequate to the subject. The breadth to record.'

'Krishnaji left Bombay on the tenth on Singapore Airlines, the only airline he says is good because it has couchettes where he stretches out and slept six hours before arriving at Heathrow at 8 a.m. He arrived on his new diplomatic passport. The Indian high commission sent a car to meet him, which was unnecessary because Dorothy was there. I spoke to him by telephone when he got to Brockwood, and Dorothy said he was looking very well. On the twelfth, he did an audio-recorded discussion with David Bohm and Maurice Wilkins for French radio. It was organized by Jean-Michel Maroger. All this activity and travel left not a mark on his face when he appeared, escorted by a TWA person, in Los Angeles. Evelyne joined me to wait for his arrival on TWA 761 from London. He had left at 11:20 a.m. London time and landed here at 2:11 p.m., looking very well. We walked to the parking lot, and then Krishnaji and I drove up the coast and so to Ojai. The Lilliefelts, Lees, Hookers, Frances, and Michael were waiting under the pepper tree. But first we stopped at the Ojai hospital so that Krishnaji could see Katie Marks. John Hidley had telephoned me yesterday, saying that he thought Katie was hanging on to life just to see Krishnaji. The cancer has spread throughout her body. She was in a coma a few days ago but mysteriously rallied and was sitting up today, talking to Vivian Moody when we arrived. Krishnaji spent about five minutes alone with her, holding her hand, touching her head, but not talking.'

'The greeters departed, and Krishnaji and I walked about the house, looking at everything. The house is shining and clean. The Georgian desk has been put in perfect shape. Krishnaji approved of the camellia bed on the north terrace, which he had wanted and which I had resisted. He was right. We had supper on trays. "Come talk to me," he said, and then he told me much of the news of India. He is here and life is blessed. There was trouble with the burglar alarm in the night.' [Chuckles.] The night he arrived, having traveled and being tired, the alarm outside his door had dust in it and went off about midnight. He never woke up.'

S: Oh, how wonderful.

M: And I couldn't stop it. At one point I tried to beat it to death. [Both laugh.] With the handle of a broom. It was ringing right outside his door but he never heard a sound. He didn't wake up.

S: Right, and he didn't wake up when you were trying to beat it to death with a broom? [Chuckles.]

M: No. He never knew. [Both laugh.] I couldn't stop it. In desperation, I took to violence.

Monday, the fifteenth: 'The alarm rang three more times in the night. When I finally awoke to get up, it was to the peace of Krishnaji's being here. I was unpacking when the man came to fix the alarm in the morning. Krishnaji got up for lunch. I brought Frances over, and with the Lilliefelts, the Hookers, Vivian, and Michael, we had lunch at Arya Vihara. The walls are now painted white, and the new curtains, rug, lamps, and cushions have made quite a change, and Krishnaji approved. There were afternoon naps for both of us, then supper on trays, and we didn't use TV. [Chuckles.]

S: What color were the walls of Arya Vihara before?

M: Wood color. Kind of crummy wood.

S: But it is wood. So, it wasn't painted before?

M: That's right, it was natural wood color. I painted it.

S: So, it must have been very dark.

M: It was dark and it was unattractive, so I painted it. I paint everything white all the time. [S laughs.]

S: It looks nice. I was just admiring it this morning, in fact.

M: Oh? Good.

February sixteenth. 'Krishnaji and I talked and talked and talked. We again lunched at Arya Vihara and again had naps. Krishnaji has a sore tip of his toe, so he wants to go to Dr. Hara.' That's the foot man in Santa Paula. 'He said at one point in India Dr. Parchure told him his body was deteriorating, so Krishnaji "challenged the body," and it responded with sudden strength and energy.' [Chuckles.] 'It is in him now.' The body was always his responsibility, he thought. 'We felt we have too much TV at supper, so we switched it off.'

February seventeenth: 'I was up early. I made our sandwich lunch and we drove to Malibu on a beautiful morning, where we ate our lunch with Amanda and Phil on their terrace. It was sunny, there was a sea wind, and the familiar everything of Malibu. Krishnaji was shy as he usually is with the Dunnes. We got to Lailee's office at 2 p.m., and she examined him. She says he may have a cataract in the left eye and should have it examined. She also says that the small hernia he has does indeed need repair. We discussed the operation and his stay at the UCLA hospital where her preferred surgeon for this works. We drove home along the coast where the wild yellow flowers are just coming out into bloom.' He always liked those flowers. They are right where that big rock is, if you go the coast road. And he always looked for the yellow flowers. 'We stopped at Trancas to market on the way back, then stopped again to see Katie Marks.'

S: When did Katie Marks come into Krishnaji's life?

M: Well, when we moved to Ojai, she had two children at the school, and she was one of the parents who came around, and was really interested in the teachings.

S: So, she didn't go way back to some other era.

M: I don't think so, though, I don't remember anything about her in the past—I mean, when Krishnaji lived in Ojai in the years way back. She was just a nice woman, and had two boys who went to the school.

The eighteenth. 'Krishnaji mostly rested in the morning, but talked to Erna and me about the possible meeting with Rajagopal and Annie Vigeveno.[1] We lunched at Arya Vihara. Tom Krause was asked to lunch so Krishnaji could meet him as a possible KFA trustee. Max was there, too. Of Krause, Krishnaji said, "He seems nice. Serious." We talked at lunch of the Sheldrake theory. The Chinese lamp came from Gump's for the Arya Vihara living room. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon. And we had a quiet supper without TV.'

February nineteenth. 'I telephoned my brother on his birthday. It is a hot day here. We lunched at Arya Vihara with Erna, Theo, Vivian, and Michael. The new Gump's lamp in the Arya Vihara living room looked very satisfactory. As Krishnaji thinks the dining room should have, "something bright," I have ordered chintz curtains for there, too. We drove to Santa Paula, where Dr. Hara looked at Krishnaji's toe, and solved the problem with a small pad. We drove home.'

The twentieth. 'I was up early again to get ready. We drove again to Malibu and had our sandwiches with Amanda and Phil on the terrace. Then Krishnaji and I went to Beverly Hills, where I left a beautiful cashmere and merino wool and other materials that Krishnaji brought from India at my dress maker, Gisèle's. Then we went to UCLA hospital at 2 p.m., and Krishnaji was admitted after a deposit of $6,210.' They don't trust you at UCLA. 'Lailee was there. The two-room suite I had engaged on the ninth floor for Krishnaji in December was only half available, but he has the largest room. Though they have offered me a cot, I preferred the sofa already in the room. The usual tests were made, including a chest X-ray. Krishnaji said, "I feel like crying. I don't know why." But he accepted it all cheerfully and said, "Why is there so much fuss over a small affair?" We both went to sleep rather early. The strange surroundings did not make him wakeful. Only once, after supper, when he had dozed off and I tried to pull up his blanket, he awoke too suddenly and shudderingly, not recognizing me right way.'

February twenty-first. 'Lailee came by in the morning. She said all of Krishnaji's tests were excellent, except that his weight is down 3 pounds from his normal 112 pounds. He is 48.9 kilograms now, or 109 pounds. We spent a quiet day, mostly reading. Krishnaji insisted on "doing" my foot. "You must be very healthy. You must outlive me. I've been thinking a lot about that. We will talk about it." Dr. Ronald Tompkins, the surgeon, came to see Krishnaji in the late afternoon. A tall, dignified, pleasant man. He made a good impression on Krishnaji. His surgery is to be early tomorrow at 7:30 a.m. He discussed how much exercise Krishnaji could do during the recuperation. Most of pranayama Krishnaji does involves too much contraction of the muscles near the incision. Simple walking and slow breathing is best. A little later, the anesthesiologist, Dr. Benjamin Ward, came. He is a young, careful, sensitive man; and he also made a good impression. He will have a spinal anesthesia of petrocaine to be used, minus other drugs, with intravenous saline and dextrose. We had a poor supper. It is a struggle here with food. Krishnaji watched an old Kojak on TV. We turned the lights out before 9:30 p.m.'

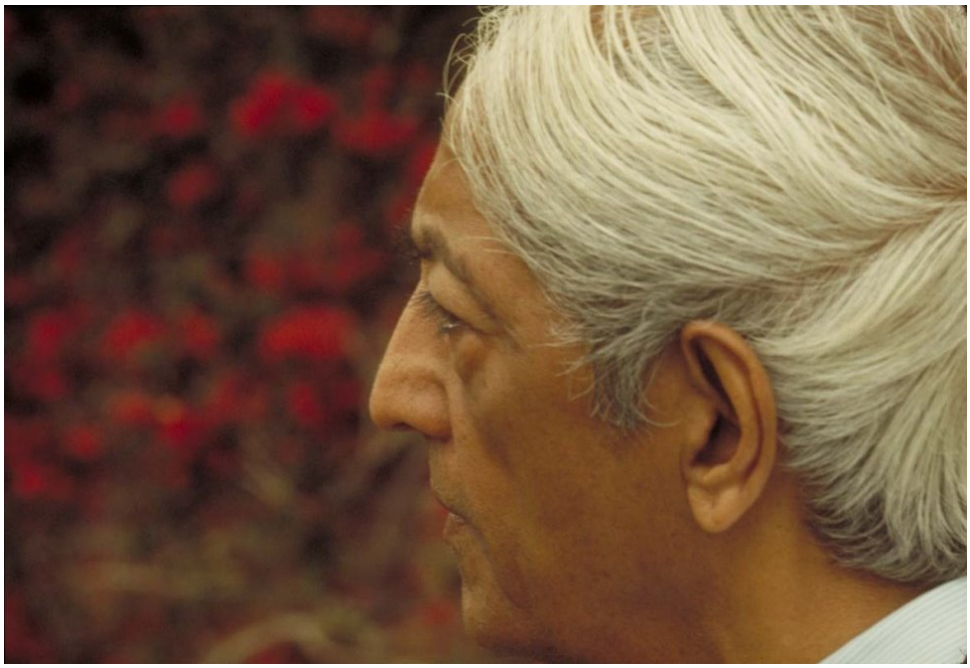
The twenty-second. 'I write this in the hospital room. Krishnaji went down to the operating room before 7 a.m. He had showered with special soap as instructed, shaved, and lay in bed looking gleaming, immaculate. "One should dress elegantly before dying," he said. And then he said, "Wasn't it Haydn who put on his best clothes to compose?" I replied, "No talk of dying, please." He responded, "Oh, I'm not going to die." He said it very firmly. He laughed when I told him the chaplain had come by while he was in the shower to say words of encouragement before surgery. The chaplain, a pale-faced man in rimless glasses, said to tell the patient, "I'll be rooting for him."' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji laughed at the solemnness of getting on the gurney and went off down the hall on it. I asked the anesthesiologist to talk to Krishnaji during the operation as was done when he was at Cedars-Sinai hospital. Now I must wait.'

It continues in a different ink. 'It is now 1:20 p.m. Dr. Tompkins telephoned me at 8:50 a.m. that Krishnaji was out of surgery and in the recovery room, and said it went well. Krishnaji had talked with Dr. Ward during the surgery. They had not been able to tell if there might be a weakness on the left side, which might give in to pressure now that the right hernia is repaired. At 9:50 a.m., word came that the patient was coming out of the recovery room. But it wasn't until 10:30 a.m. that Krishnaji came down the hall. He looked pale, a little yellowish, and hardly spoke. A private nurse, a stout African-American woman, with several rings and a whiff of perfume, was here for a while. An icepack on the wound. Krishnaji was in some pain and the spinal had not gone from his legs entirely. He asked me to hold his feet. Then he wanted to lie on his left side. Sometime after 11 a.m., he asked me, "Maria, talk to me. I could slip away. The door is open. Do you understand?" I spoke to him, saying that he was here; the operation was over; he must close that door. He must remain here. Tell the body. It must be strong and get well. I kept talking. Then the pain became more severe, seeming to come in waves. Did he want something to stop it? Yes. Demerol had been ordered but I was worried it might be the dose for a normal body and telephoned Lailee. He had a shot at 11:40 a.m., and was in considerable pain until it took effect. Groaning, saying this was much worse than the other operation. He asked me to keep my hand on his diaphragm. The nurse had a call for a family emergency and left. I am sitting by his bed and he is sleeping now without pain. I watch the rise and fall of the blanket as he breathes. They are drilling outside.'

'At 2:15 p.m., he woke and looked vacantly side to side. I asked him if he was clear in his mind. He had difficulty talking. I said he'd been asleep. Is he all right now? He said it had been very close. When I said he must shut the door, he hadn't been sure he was strong enough. I said he had been given extra strength in India and he had it to use. He said I mustn't order it, "If it wants to go, it will go." I said I was asking, but he could still tell it.' He was always talking about…the open door as death, yes.

‘Dr. Tompkins came in and spoke to him. In the hall, I spoke of the difficulty of Demerol for Krishnaji, and Tompkins said he would rather Krishnaji endured some pain and not have too much medication. When I came back, Krishnaji said he had been kept downstairs too long, forty-five minutes after they were ready to have him leave, and there was no attendant. The typical things in this hospital, and one reason that Cedars’—the other hospital—‘was better. “I think I’m coming to,” he said.’



‘Evening: Lailee has been here cheerily. She had him look at the incision with a mirror to see how small it was. Krishnaji has not needed further Demerol and is reading his detective novel, a Raymond Chandler. His voice is weak but normal. The unsuitable day nurse had to leave for a family emergency, and later a nice, quiet one came to be replaced at seven by an efficient night nurse with two-inch red nails and a Vuitton bag.’ [Both chuckle.] She did. She had long nails. Bright red. ‘She is quickly and quietly doing things to make everything go well, and Krishnaji’s normalcy has eased me. Lailee says he gets up tomorrow.’

February twenty-third. ‘Krishnaji slept well, on and off. He says there is no pain. The nurse and I got him sitting up, with his legs dangling. Then standing. Then walking once around the room. He was surprised at his weakness. The intravenous tube has been removed. He’s had no further Demerol since the 120 milligram shot before noon yesterday. Dr. Tompkins came by early, and approved of everything. Lailee came by a little later. She said she thought he would be able to go home tomorrow. Earlier, with a private nurse with him, I had gone out to get a plug for his razor, and some tasty food; good yogurt, buttermilk, Häagen-Dazs ice cream, cheeses, fruit. I also went to Bullock’s for two pillows so he can lie down in the car; and, at his insistence, I went to Gisèle to figure out how to use the lovely material he brought me from India. When I got back, he had walked with the nurse to the end of the hall and back. It tired him but was progress.’

‘The day nurse left at seven and the night nurse, Mary Forbin, came on. It will be good if we can leave tomorrow. Krishnaji senses here the mark of sickness and suffering in these rooms. He has slept well, is free of pain, and wants to leave.’

February twenty-fourth. ‘Dr. Tompkins came in early, and agreed that Krishnaji should go home. The night nurse had given him a bed bath before going off duty, and at 7 a.m., he wore his warm shirt under his dressing gown. I got everything into the car and Krishnaji came down in a wheelchair. He sat in the back with pillows, painfully getting into the car. “Avoid bumps,” he asked, and I drove with care. When we came to the yellow wildflowers along the beach, he said the beauty of that was worth the surgery.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘We reached the cottage a little after 12:30 p.m. Erna and Theo were there. It was very painful for him to lift his legs out of the car, walk slowly up the path, climb the porch steps, and, most of all, to lower himself onto the bed. He sobbed, “It is too much for the body. How did I get into this?” He had seemed to stand the drive fairly well, but this was too much. Erna and Theo kept away, but after a little, the pain was gone, and he asked to see them. Theo had gone at my asking to get Tylenol, suggested by Dr. Tompkins, but Krishnaji said he didn’t need it. He read all afternoon. It was very hard for him to move in the bed, and attempts to fix his condition—the position of his cushions—are unsuccessful. Michael brought a "tasty" lunch, and later at supper, he ate well. But again in the evening, it was painful for him to move. He took my hand, put it on the wound and placed his over it saying, "There, that helps."' I used to ask him if he couldn't…

Portrait of Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Yes, heal himself.

M: Yes. And he said he only could if my hand was on the thing, and then he did it through my hand. And that way it seemed to work. He did that later on, too, at the end.

S: Yes. He did that with me, too. But I didn't know what he was doing. I knew he was doing something, but I didn't know what he was doing.

M: No. So he couldn't heal himself but he could make someone else heal him. Well, I don't know what to say about that.

The twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji slept nine hours. He ate a good breakfast, but felt weak. He read all morning. I telephoned Mary Links in London to let her know how he is. Krishnaji gave himself a sponge bath standing in his bathroom, then he walked around the house and on the terrace. Water mustn't touch the incision until Monday.' This was written on a Thursday. 'He doesn't have much appetite, though Michael brought him tasty, spicy food. I spoke to Lailee in the afternoon. He eventually slept well. Being home with him safe is a blessing.'

The next day. 'He still has considerable pain whenever he moves. It is wearing for him, but he walked in and around the house and outside. His digestion is working as it should. I spoke to Dorothy at Brockwood.'

February twenty-seventh. ‘Krishnaji is feeling stronger, but the pain remains. He is learning to move less painfully. He went for a walk around the house in the morning. While I went to market in the afternoon, he walked to the gate and back.’

There is only the little diary for almost a week, I’m afraid.

S: We’ll bear up.

M: February twenty-eighth. ‘Krishnaji again walked to the gate. It was a quiet day. My brother telephoned from New York. I spoke to Blanche Mathias.’ That’s that lady in San Francisco.

March first. ‘Krishnaji is feeling much better. He wanted the Lilliefelts to come and talk, which they did at 11 a.m. Mar de Manziarly telephoned from Paris. It rained. Krishnaji slept well.’

March second. ‘Katie Marks died at noon. Max came here and saw Krishnaji for a short time. Erna came in the afternoon. Krishnaji talked to her and me about Rajagopal and our meeting him when Krishnaji is better.’

The third. ‘I went to Green Thumb Nursery in the afternoon for plants that Krishnaji wants and for a chaise lounge for the guest house. Krishnaji walked to the gate and back in the morning, and in the afternoon as well. I painted the western nandi with linseed oil.’ When it came, there were instruction for it to be painted in oil to make it stay black, but I stopped doing that because it looks better gray. I don’t know; it didn’t look right black.

March fourth. ‘Krishnaji took his first real shower. He walked a bit. Rajagopal telephoned me, but I was out. The curtains came for the Arya Vihara dining room, and it was decided to paint white the east bedroom that Katie Marks had had, and I ordered new curtains from Schwartz. I oiled the east nandi. They look splendid. Krishnaji is pleased. He had slight indigestion in the night.’

The fifth. ‘Krishnaji walked in the early morning. I worked at the desk and new plants were planted. Krishnaji read all afternoon. He still feels “weak” and likes staying in bed. We omitted cheese at supper, and that seems to have helped him sleep.’

March sixth: ‘At 11 a.m., there was a meeting of Hidley, Krause, Mendizza, the Lilliefelts, and me about the Krishnaji-Bohm-Sheldrake seminar in April. It was decided that Hidley should be the fourth participant and Krause would do the introduction and part of the epilogue. Later, Erna, on behalf of the Krishnaji Foundation, invited Tom Krause to become a trustee. He accepted. Krishnaji walked three times to the gate.’

The seventh. ‘I awoke around 4 a.m., and remained awake. At some point, I heard Krishnaji call me. I went in and sat with him. We had a light talk. His incision is much less painful. It hurts only when he gets up or down into bed or a chair. He astonishes me. Later, I went to make our nettle tea and brought it to him. He said that he had felt like "going off," and that it was close. He could have. He wondered what it means. It was not "the door opening," as in the hospital. He thought of calling me, but didn't want to be melodramatic. It would have been very easy, he said. Later, he spoke of it again. "What would you do if you came in and found me?"' Then another quote. '"It shouldn't happen now. I still have too much to do."'

'In the afternoon, he shaved off the beard he has grown since he was in the hospital.' I forgot about that. 'He showered and dressed for the first time since he came back. He put on jeans and a heavy cotton knit we ordered from L.L. Bean a year ago. He is pleased with it, and wants some more to take to India. He looked beautiful and elegant but very thin. He weighs 104.5 pounds. He wanted to walk, so we drove to the corner of Thacher and McNell. The Lilliefelts parked at Grand and McNell, so if he tired, the cars were close.' It's level on that part. 'But Krishnaji set off down McNell at his military clip. And when we reached Grand, he insisted on walking halfway back. Theo followed in the car and picked him up. He was tired after he got back to his room. "My legs are weak." But it was a good first outing. He fell asleep right after supper, and slept well. I slept on the qui vive. I must live this way.'

S: What is the qui vive?

M: That means alert. Alertly.

S: But it literally means "who lives." Where does that expression come from?

M: Oh, it's a well-known French expression. The qui vive, to be alert, alarm, paying attention.

S: I don't know it.

M: I've always known that one. It's to be watchful, alert, paying attention, quick, on edge. Yes. On edge. 'In the morning'…oh—'I slept on the qui vive.' That means I slept with the door open and was listening. 'In the morning, I had gone to the Oak Grove School, where five jacaranda trees were planted as a gesture to Katie Marks. David Moody read a page from Krishnaji's Notebook. Many people were there.'

The eighth. 'Asit telephoned from Northern California. He will come down next Saturday. At 2 p.m., there was a meeting here of Joe Zorskie, Erna, Theo, Hooker, Mark, and David Moody about the school building. Joe is our go-between with the architect, Zelma Wilson. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji and I walked to the Lilliefelts' and then down Grand Avenue to McNell. Theo drove us back to their house, where Krishnaji sat by the fire and told of Rukmini Arundale coming to lunch this winter in Madras, her stupidity, and her messy way of eating, etcetera. It was dark when we came home. Krishnaji had walked a mile.'

March ninth. 'Erna telephoned after hearing from Cohen's office that Rajagopal has a doctor's letter saying he is too ill to have her and me come on the fifteenth to examine the archive material he claims is his property, or to make a deposition as the court has ordered. Erna and Theo came over to tell Krishnaji and me what Cohen proposes to do next. Cohen said he cannot allow Rajagopal to run this case. Either he asks the court for an outside doctor to determine if Rajagopal is really too ill, or for an order to have Erna and me examine the archive material in his house. We chose the latter, which, though unlikely to happen, puts Rajagopal's refusal on record. Meanwhile, Krishnaji says he will be well enough next Monday to accept Mrs. Vigeveno's invitation for us to meet Rajagopal and her to talk matters over. I rang Mrs. Vigeveno and said we would come Monday to the K and R office. She had offered her house as "neutral territory," which Krishnaji takes exception to. "How can those people be so stupid, so insensitive as to call her house 'neutral,'" he said.' [M chuckles.] 'Annie Vigeveno said she would talk to Rajagopal and let me know.'

'It rained a little, so we didn't walk. Krishnaji said in the evening he was glad not to have walked. It has been on his mind to telephone Radha Sloss, who came to Pupul's to lunch in Delhi.' Radha Sloss tried to get him to talk to her father (Rajagopal), and he said he would try, and that he would let her know if he did. So, Krishnaji was fulfilling that. 'She had telephoned me to learn if Krishnaji had arrived. He telephoned her this evening and told her we had offered to meet Rajagopal. She said that if it didn't work, she suggested he meets with just Rajagopal and her, i.e., without someone to protect him.'

March tenth. 'In the late afternoon, Krishnaji got up for a walk to the Lilliefelts', then on to the dip, and back to the Lilliefelts'. We talked to them for a while. He had slight indigestion and ate only soup and crackers and felt alright. He watched a polar bear film on television.'

March eleventh. 'It rained. We left at 10:45 a.m., and drove to Beverly Hills. We had a picnic lunch in the car, then went to the UCLA hospital, where Dr. Tompkins checked Krishnaji's incision. All is alright. We went back to Beverly Hills, and chose a chain at Van Cleef.' That's this.[2] 'We left the rudraksha to be mounted that Krishnaji had gotten for me in India. Krishnaji bought two Vuitton suitcases, then we bought Great Earth vitamins and some detective stories. We stopped at Trancas for lunch and got home by 7 p.m. Krishnaji stood all this very well. It had rained in Ojai all day.'

S: Oh, I'd forgotten about The Great Earth vitamins. They were ones that I had found for him. Krishnaji had asked me what were the best vitamins? So, I went around comparing vitamin labels. [Both laugh.]

M: Which are hard to see!

S: Microscopic. I had looked that summer at all of the vitamins that are available in Switzerland, where he had asked me to do this, and I had looked in England; and then, when visiting my parents in Texas…

M: [laughs] Oh, I didn't know this.

S: Yes, I went around to different vitamin places and I found these Great Earth vitamins, which were really better than anything else. Also important was that the calcium was not from bone meal, and the E was not from fish liver oils. And so, they were completely vegetarian and they were also the best in their balance of vitamins and minerals. I can remember coming back with bottles of them to England.

M: [chuckles] Yes, you couldn't get them in England.

S: No, that's right. [Laughs.] I had completely forgotten about this until you mentioned it.

M: I didn't know all this, what you went through, and I had forgotten the name brand of vitamin. I wonder if they still exist. I haven't seen any lately.

S: I don't know, but, yes, I remember them.

M: March twelfth. 'Krishnaji didn't sleep well in the night, but did in the morning. He took a hot bath suggested by Dr. Tompkins, and stayed in bed until the five o'clock walk to the Lilliefelts', on to the dip, and back to the Lilliefelts'. He spoke to Radha Sloss in the morning. She says Rajagopal wants to meet him alone.' Now that was not news. 'Krishnaji somehow hurt his left-foot toe walking in the early morning.'

The thirteenth. 'Jacob Needleman came at 11:30 a.m. to talk to Krishnaji. He tried to persuade Krishnaji to speak in San Francisco under the auspices of the Far West Foundation, a Gurdjieff front.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji, he, and some of us lunched at Arya Vihara, Krishnaji's first lunch there since his operation. He slept two hours in the afternoon. Asit arrived from San Francisco, talked, and walked with us to the Lilliefelts' and to the dip. Krishnaji, Asit, and I had supper on trays. Krishnaji's left-foot big toe is still painful.' We had more foot troubles in our circles than seems normal.

S: [laughs] Yes, but you cornered the market on them.

M: Yes, I outstripped everybody else, [S laughs] in duration at any rate, if not seriousness.

March fourteenth. 'At 11 a.m., there was a KFA board meeting. Tom Krause became a trustee. Krishnaji attended part of the meeting. We all lunched at Arya Vihara, including Asit, then we resumed the meeting in the afternoon. We were joined later in the afternoon by Mark, David Moody, and Joe Zorskie. It was all about the school. My brother telephoned about meeting us in New York. Asit dined out, and Krishnaji and I went early to bed.'

March fifteenth. 'Asit has been staying with us since Saturday. Krishnaji enjoys talking to him about news of the computer world. Asit says the Japanese are going to spend ten years making a computer that can duplicate the abilities of the human brain. Instead of silicon chips, human cells may be used.' [S chuckles.] 'Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, and I arrived at Annie Vigeveno's at 11 a.m. for the meeting with Rajagopal and some of them.

Mima Porter and Austin Bee were already there. The seats were in a U-shape with one in front of the fireplace, presumably for Krishnaji. Krishnaji asked where Rajagopal was. Vigeveno said she would explain in a minute; would we be seated and did we object to taping the meeting? Austin Bee had a large tape recorder. Erna was somewhat taken aback by this abrupt question. I merely thought they are doing it overtly instead of under the sofa.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji then asked again where Rajagopal was, and Vigeveno said he was not coming. No excuse. No reason. Krishnaji was shocked. Why hadn't she telephoned? She hadn't known, she said. But this was a palpable lie, as Krishnaji noticed that the way the chairs were arranged, he was clearly not expected'—very observant of Krishnaji. 'Vigeveno began to ask us what we wanted, and Krishnaji interrupted, and said without Rajagopal there was no point in talking. We immediately left, but not until I said that Krishnaji was out of his sick bed and three weeks from surgery, etcetera. We drove to Oak Grove School and talked in the car. It was a shock to Krishnaji because, once again, he had hoped and thought that Rajagopal would, at last, do something decent; and once again, Rajagopal had insulted him. "I will never go to see him again. If he wishes to see me, he will have to come, and he will have to restore the archives," he said. Mark was showing Asit around the school. They joined us, and after telling them what had happened, we walked around in the sun and looked at the building sites. At lunch at Arya Vihara, Krishnaji spoke of goodness as an absolute, unrelated to any other thing; unrelated to evil; without an opposite. But evil projects an opposite: a pseudo-good, not the real. Thinking gets caught in these two, and so is untouched by the real good.'

S: Very interesting.

M: That makes sense. He talked about that more than just then. 'Krishnaji has had since Friday a sore left big toe. At first very sore, now better. I put ice packs on it. We went out to Dr. Hara, the Japanese podiatrist in Santa Paula, taking Asit with us. Hara said it might be gout. While waiting, I began a letter to Vigeveno about this morning's deceptions.'

The sixteenth. 'Asit had breakfast and left shortly after eight. I finished a letter to Vigeveno. Krishnaji, and the Lilliefelts, wanted it toned down, which I did only somewhat.' [Both chuckle.] 'I sent it off with a copy to Rajagopal. Lailee wants Krishnaji to have a blood test fasting tomorrow. It rained all day. Amanda and Phil are back from their weekend in San Francisco. We lunched at Arya Vihara.'

The seventeenth. 'The Lilliefelts took Krishnaji at 8 a.m. to the Ojai hospital for a fasting blood test and later for one after eating. I set up his tray, etcetera and drove in the pouring rain to Beverly Hills, taking two-and-a-half hours. I had a haircut, fetched two French suitcases for Krishnaji, then saw the Van Cleef design for the rudraksha mounting. I had a fitting at Gisèle on the Indian fabric Krishnaji brought me and then left quickly at 3:15 p.m. to get ahead of the traffic on the Ventura freeway. I was home by 5:10 p.m. Krishnaji had had his tests. In the evening, Erna called to say that Rajagopal had telephoned her with a message for me and that I should telephone him. He must have had a copy of my letter to Vigeveno. I didn't telephone him and don't intend to, but Krishnaji telephoned Radha Sloss, told her what had happened on Monday, and said he would never go there again. If Rajagopal wanted to see him, he would have to come here and give up the archives, putting them where the settlement agreement says they should be kept. Erna said Rajagopal made no apology and no reference to Monday.'

S: Okay. All right. We're going to have to end it there because we are running out of tape.

M: Alright.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] This is one of the things initiated when Krishnaji was in India as a way to settle the court case out of court.

[2] She was showing me the chain which she always wore from the time the rudraksha was set.

Issue 71: March 18 to June 23, 1982

Krishnaji's health is increasingly precarious, yet his speaking schedule increased. In this issue we see him filling Carnegie Hall in New York, and the Barbican Center in London, as well as his normal schedule of public talks and holding seminars, and the seemingly constant flow of people who come to see him.

We also continue to see regrettable behavior around the archives material that was supposed to have been returned to Krishnaji, but which never was.

Mary: Alright. We're beginning today's discussion with March eighteenth, 1982. 'Krishnaji was awake in the night. I made him Horlicks, which wasn't helpful.' [Both chuckle.]

Scott: Is Horlicks American?

M: Horlicks? Where are we at this point?

S: You're in Ojai. It's English, isn't it? Not American, is it?

M: No. It isn't. But apparently, we had some. I don't remember anything about it. [Both chuckle.] 'Dr. Lailee says the results of Krishnaji's tests yesterday show Krishnaji doesn't have gout, but he has elevated blood sugar. Krishnaji could take a pill, but she suggests I talk to a dietitian about a diabetic diet, and after he tries it, to retest his blood before he goes to New York. I was unable to reach the Ojai hospital dietitian. Krishnaji is not eating enough and needs to put on weight; and diet restrictions will make this even more difficult. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji saw Frances [McCann] and John Hidley about her mental health. She is having anxiety over not being "perfect" and slipping back in her mental state, and is emotional. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon. It was cold and there was intermittent rain, but we walked to the dip and back.'

Now the nineteenth. 'Krishnaji slept nine hours. In view of Krishnaji's need to gain weight, Lailee gave a prescription to lower his blood sugar. I went to the Santa Barbara airport and met Malini at 2:25 p.m. It was a beautiful sight of Ojai returning, with snow on the mountaintops and a blue sky. Krishnaji, Malini, Erna, Theo, and I walked two miles. Malini dined with the Moodys and some others at Arya Vihara. She is staying in the guest house.'

S: This is Malini, the daughter of Prema. A nice person.

M: Yes.

March twentieth. 'It was a beautiful, clear day. Krishnaji, Malini, and I had breakfast in the kitchen by the fire. Malini and I talked most of the morning. We all lunched at Arya

Vihara, then Malini went to see the Oak Grove School. Krishnaji had done exercises in the morning and didn't feel like a walk. We had supper alone.'

The next day. 'We breakfasted in the kitchen, and I talked to Malini most of the morning. We all lunched at Arya Vihara. Then Krishnaji and I drove Malini to the Santa Barbara airport, from where she flew back to Stanford. We had a pleasant drive back. The snow is still on the mountains.'

March twenty-second: 'It was another beautiful day. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Mr. Schwartz installed new flowered curtains in the newly painted white east bedroom. I went in the afternoon to an American diabetic association in Ventura to get diet information, then walked with Krishnaji and the Lilliefelts down McAndrew. Philippa telephoned from Connecticut.'

March twenty-third: 'We packed, and I did house things, lunched at Arya Vihara, and then I prepared the guest rooms for the Bohms. Krishnaji and I walked to the dip. I finished packing before going to bed. Frances and John Hidley decided against her going to New York.'

The twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji awakened me at 4 a.m. His inner clock, as always, had awakened him at 3:30 a.m. He has no stomach for breakfast at odd hours, but did eat something, and we were ready when Mark and the Lilliefelts arrived at 6 a.m. with the school van. Ojai was quiet and beautiful, and so it was down the coast. We passed the Dunnes, but then the traffic to work flowed into the coast road. Nevertheless, we kept moving and reached the torn-up airport on time. Krishnaji is using his two new, dark gray and brown suitcases. I found no baggage stubs on our tickets when we got inside United, but there was nothing to do at that point except board the 9 a.m. United flight to New York. Krishnaji and I had the forward two seats in first class, and Erna and Theo were in another section. We were one hour late taking off due to air controllers in New York. When we landed, Bud with Laurie were there to meet us, and drove Krishnaji and me into the city. We had engaged rooms at the new French-run hotel, Le Parker Meridien. It is half a block from the Carnegie Hall stage door on West 56th Street.' Oh, that was the reason for going to New York—because he was going to speak at Carnegie Hall.

S: Aha. Right.

M: 'There was rather a wait to check in, but the rooms on the eleventh floor are good. The larger one, which was Krishnaji's, has a sitting room arrangement with a bed in an alcove, and set off from it and adjoining is a normal-sized bedroom. The staff is French-speaking. The lobby is rather overly marbled. Krishnaji has started the trip well, and we finished the day well by having supper in rooms. Jackie Kornfeld has sent a fine platter of cheeses and fruits and tofu. I had trouble sleeping due to street noises—something was being drilled somewhere, but Krishnaji slept ten hours, waking up only once. My mind seems to work on the logistics of getting things done smoothly for him. From this to that to the next thing.'

The twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji looked well from his ten hours of sleep. There was no sign of fatigue from the trip. My brother sent his car with a driver to take us to the radio station WBAI for a one-hour live interview by a Gary Null starting at noon. He once sent a list of questions to Krishnaji at Brockwood, and I taped Krishnaji's answers and sent it back for broadcast. Today's interview was live, in a scruffy studio on Eighth Avenue. The dirt and ugliness of that part of the city is jarring. My brother met us back at the hotel afterwards, and we walked to Orsini, a block east, and lunched together. Bud flies to Paris tonight. Lisa has museum doings there. Bud said he is going to sell his house on William Street on Martha's Vineyard.' He inherited a little house across the street from the family house.

S: Elmholm, yes. Who did he inherited it from?

M: Great-aunt Eleanor—a crazy great aunt, who [chuckles], who liked him because he was a male in the family. [S laughs.] And she thought he was perfect. She embarrassed him, and me too, by taking us to the movies and then, if she thought it wasn't suitable for us, she would get us out of the movie in the middle while we were watching it. [S laughs.] And she further antagonized me by calling me "the Queen of Hearts." I used to shudder at that. [Both chuckle.] She was quite crazy, but she adored my brother and left him the house. She was the youngest of several sisters who all owned the house, but she was the survivor. Aunt Eleanor [chuckles]. Anyway, 'he's going to sell his house on William Street and also sublet the flat in Paris. Walking back to the hotel, I felt he was a little worn. Life has grayed, and I felt that sadness and the flood of affection that wants to protect someone dear. Krishnaji sensed it, too. We said goodbye, and Krishnaji and I walked on in order to time how long it takes to walk to the stage door of Carnegie Hall from the hotel (two minutes), and then we went around the block for a walk. There was a large photo of Krishnaji in the front of Carnegie Hall with "Sold Out" in big letters across it. Krishnaji barely glanced at it. I bought some Pears soaps and found a Burt Lancaster film that was being played at the little Carnegie theater. We came back to the hotel, rested a little, and then Krishnaji said, "Let's go." So we went to the four o'clock showing of the film. His expectation of the Lancaster film was a bit bewildered by this one. "What is happening?" he kept asking. He didn't like it, but stayed. It is the first film we have seen in years, he said.' That can't be true.

S: It's not, no. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'Then we walked east on 57th Street, and he recognized where he was. We went into Doubleday's and bought some paperbacks. Erna, Theo, and Evelyne had listened to the WBAI broadcast in the morning, and thought it went very well. Krishnaji said the interviewer was full of himself. Krishnaji is surprised that people recognize and speak to him on the streets, in lifts, and in the bookstore.' [Chuckles.]

March twenty-sixth. 'Narasimhan came to see Krishnaji at 9 a.m. Then Erna and Theo, and then David Shainberg, came. The latter stayed quite a while and answered Krishnaji's questions about Rishi Valley, etcetera, which he had recently visited. Krishnaji asked him to think about "joining us" in some way. Not on the board, "that is nothing," but in some other way. David said he had been thinking of that. Krishnaji and I lunched at Orsini again, rather late to avoid the noise. The food suits Krishnaji, so at least he is getting enough. Just before lunch, he got the shakes, his hands trembling, and I made a blind guess that the pills to lower his blood sugar have overdone it. I put some sugar on a piece of bread as we were waiting for lunch to be served, and in a few minutes the trembling stopped. He ate well. Tomorrow he will omit the pill. We went for a walk over to the park and back. It was rather windy. At 4 p.m., a New York Times man, Paul Montgomery, came to interview Krishnaji. A nice man. Krishnaji noticed how clean his hands were.' [Chuckles.]

The twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji said he had awakened several times, but said he had had meditation. It was a cold morning. We had breakfast without haste and, for once, there was no hurrying about before a talk. Krishnaji was in the lobby when I came down, and we walked the short way to the Carnegie Hall stage door. Theo stayed with Krishnaji and I ducked into the side door to my end-of-row seat. Evelyne and Eloise were there, as were Jackie Kornfeld, Toodie, Philippa, and David. Krishnaji came out to considerable applause. The house was full to the ceiling, many standing. People had been scalping tickets outside at 9 a.m.' [S laughs.] That was nice.

S: Yes, that is nice.

M: 'Krishnaji began to speak at 10 a.m. There was some microphone trouble at first, but the audience was very sympathetic. Then his voice came on vibrant, strong as a trumpet, and the Krishnaji magic was there, filling the hushed hall. He wore a brown suit, handsome in front of a golden curtain. He held them for one hour and thirty-five minutes. It was a good, intense talk. We came back to the hotel. Philippa and David also came and, while Krishnaji rested for a while, they and I talked. Then, the four of us walked to Orsini's, and again had a good Italian lunch. We walked back to the hotel, and Krishnaji rested again, while Philippa and David came with me in search of tofu and apricots. The streets were cold and windy. The noise of the city is a bit much. Philippa and David returned to Connecticut. Erna and Theo came by after a good meeting of information centers at the Gotham Bookstore.' Gotham Bookstore is a good bookstore, an old bookstore, and they've always specialized in Krishnaji's books.

The fact that it was the way it was at Carnegie Hall, for me, as a New Yorker, because Carnegie Hall, well…in my childhood, I used to go and hear Toscanini there, and I felt that the good sounds in that hall were in the wood, in the fabric, in the walls somehow; and to have Krishnaji's voice added to that, in my imagination, gave me great pleasure.

S: Yes, how nice. Well, it is an enormous accomplishment to fill Carnegie Hall like that.

M: It was a right place for him. Although it's not a good hall for voice—it's good for music.

S: Yes. That's often the case: If a stage is good for voice, it's not good for music, and vice versa. But it speaks well of New York that there would be so much interest in Krishnaji there.

M: Yes. "Sold Out" was a lovely sign to see [both chuckle] across his large photograph.

March twenty-eighth. 'Tickets for Krishnaji's second New York talk were being scalped at eighty-five dollars outside Carnegie Hall this morning.'

S: Wow. That's a lot.

M: That is a lot. 'The New York Times man, Paul Montgomery, had a quite nice article on Krishnaji. He gave a very fine talk. Earlier, he had said to me in a not too serious way, "How long can I keep this up?" After the talk, Krishnaji and I lunched with David Shainberg at his flat. About ten of us were there, and Krishnaji told some of his stories: the ones about heaven and hell, St. Peter's, and the man in the red Ferrari. Erna and Theo left for Connecticut. After the lunch, we came back to the hotel and rested.'

The twenty-ninth. 'We were slightly late getting to an 11 a.m. conference put together by David Shainberg and held in the United Nations Plaza building. There were about thirty participants.' These were supposed to be all psychotherapists, but there were others. 'Renée Weber, Patricia Hunt-Perry, Jackie Kornfeld, Montague Olman, Evelyne Blau, and Eloise were ones I knew. A Hopi Indian, some musicians, painters, and psychotherapists, too. It didn't really get off the ground in my view, but seemed valuable to Shainberg. Afterwards, he came with Krishnaji and me to lunch with Narasimhan around the corner from the UN at the Madras Woodlands Restaurant.' The Woodlands is a restaurant in Madras and the New York one is run by the Madras restaurant, and is very popular with UN people, apparently. We had iddlies, etcetera.' Do you know what iddlies are?

S: Yes, I know iddlies very well.

M: You can explain what iddlies are then.

S: They're usually made with fermented black lentils and rice flour.

M: Yes. Like little cakes.

S: Yes. Like cakes, but they are savory, and they are often served for breakfast, which is marvelous.

M: Very good. Very good. [Both chuckle.] 'Narasimhan and David Shainberg hadn't met before. Narasimhan told his stories.' He was the source of all those stories that Krishnaji used to tell about God and St. Peter and all that.

S: Oh, Narasimhan was the…

M: Yes. When I was a child, funny stories usually came from the New York Stock Exchange, which my father and brother would bring home. But in this era, apparently funny stories emanated from the UN. [Both laugh.] And Narasimhan would bring them to Krishnaji.

S: I've forgotten what Narasimhan was in the UN.

M: He was chef de cabinet to U Thant. Remember U Thant?

S: Yes, of course. Now I remember.

M: 'Krishnaji ate what Narasimhan ordered, but when we reached the hotel, he was still hungry. I got him a cheese sandwich. I then went out for Belgian and Ferragamo shoes and shoe cream for Krishnaji. Erna telephoned that Willa reported that Ruth Tettemer had died of Alzheimer's disease.' Yes, she did have Alzheimer's. I remember when she didn't seem to know who anybody was. That's a shame. 'Also, a belligerent telegram had arrived for Krishnaji from Rajagopal. I talked to Mitchell Booth." That's the family lawyer. 'I am worried about my brother. Mitch was close-mouthed and said little, and was not reassuring.'

March thirtieth. 'We were on time to the second Shainberg conference. I felt again that Krishnaji had to pull everyone uphill. David Shainberg lunched with us at Orsini, and it was late, and therefore quiet. Krishnaji ate well and likes it. There was a movie called Death Trap playing at the Sutton Theater, and we went, thinking it would be a thriller. It was a noisy, idiotic lemon. We walked back across 57th Street. New York is beautiful when you look up. The new IBM building has gone up on the corner of Madison. Only such soaring substances give me the old sense of the city I grew up in, and cared about once. Jackie Kornfeld had located Karsh, the photographer. He is in New York and will photograph Krishnaji tomorrow.' Jackie underwrote that. 'She has also seen Felt Forum for next year and gave a good report.' We couldn't get Carnegie Hall the next year for some reason.

S: So you had Felt Forum? Where's Felt Forum?

M: I don't know. It's downtown. How can I describe it? It's a newer place. I'd never been there before. It wasn't there when I lived in New York.'

The thirty-first. 'It was the third Shainberg conference. Yousuf Karsh, the photographer, was there, studying Krishnaji's appearance. Shainberg lunched with us at Orsini. Krishnaji and I then went to Karsh's studio where, from 3:15 p.m. to 5 p.m., he photographed Krishnaji, mostly in black and white, but a few in color. He made Krishnaji have his hands in each pose, which is not characteristic of Krishnaji. I asked him toward the end for some without the hands. We walked back.' That one I've got in the other room is something Jackie Kornfeld gave me in her will. It was sent to me after she died. It has the hands, which Krishnaji didn't…

S: Yes. Krishnaji never did that. Yes.

M: No, he never did that. It was Karsh's fault. After the photo-shoot, we walked back to the hotel, where Krishnaji was interviewed for WBAI again, this time by Lex Hixon. Krishnaji didn't sleep well. My impatience at not getting a taxi back disturbed him. We packed.'

The first of April. 'Narasimhan came at 9 a.m. to say goodbye to Krishnaji. Bud's car, with Les Lewis driving, came for us, and took Krishnaji and me to the airport and a noon flight on United to Los Angeles. We arrived at 3:30 p.m. Mark met us and we drove home along the coast. It is lovely to be back. Krishnaji had fainted briefly sitting on the plane, but was full of energy and enthusiasm on the drive and on arrival. The Bohms, who have been here for a week, greeted us. Michael brought supper. I telephoned to Amanda. The rudraksha and chain had arrived from Van Cleef. Krishnaji wore it overnight.' He would do that with jewelry things. He would "magnetize" them, I think some people call it.

The second of April. 'It is a lovely Ojai morning: clear and shining. We lunched at Arya Vihara with the Bohms, etcetera. Two hours after eating, Krishnaji had a blood sugar test at the Ojai hospital lab. It was 170, which is still too high. Lailee increased the pill dosage to one and a half. Krishnaji will be tested again on Monday. We walked to the dip and back. The air was quite cold.'

The next three days are fairly uneventful. On the sixth of April. 'We took a picnic lunch to the Dunnes' and ate with them on the terrace. Then Krishnaji and I went to UCLA hospital, where Dr. Tompkins pronounced Krishnaji fit and fine, and then we bought Great Earth vitamins to take to Europe. At 3:30 p.m., Krishnaji's eyes were examined by Dr. Laura Fox. He has the beginnings of cataracts in both eyes, but the left one is more advanced. There is a possible need for surgery later. Krishnaji said, "The body accepted it." We got home by 8 p.m., had what Krishnaji called "a good meal," and went to sleep.'

The next day, 'My brother telephoned that he and Lisa got from London to New York yesterday in a blizzard. Mar de Manziarly telephoned from Paris to tell us that Nadia's husband, Nicolas Kossiakof, died. Krishnaji dictated letters. Sidney Field brought his grandson to lunch at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji and I walked with Erna and Theo down Grand Avenue. The results of Krishnaji's Monday glucose test is 122. The pill Talinase is working. Lailee says he is to continue taking them.'

The eighth. 'I went to get a passport photo and plants for the house, then I continued on south, and stopped for a sandwich with the Dunnes. Then I went to Gisèle's for fittings.' That was with those Indian materials Krishnaji had brought me from his last trip.' I had the car washed, and drove back, meeting Krishnaji and the Lilliefelts walking on Grand Avenue. Krishnaji had been to the local dentist, Dr. Meinig, with Theo.'

April ninth I only have that 'at four, Krishnaji talked to teachers here.' That means here at the house.

The next day, ‘It rained. I was up early, did my exercises, and attempted getting things done early. I worked at my desk all morning. Spoke to my brother and to my cousin, and telephoned Filomena in Rome for Easter.’ It was Easter that day. ‘At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held another discussion here with Oak Grove School teachers. It came to something infinite—seeing the incompleteness of knowledge can free the mind to different perception.’

April eleventh. ‘It rained all day. At 10 a.m., there was a trustees meeting. Krishnaji was tired and rested all morning. After lunch, at Arya Vihara, he joined the meeting. We had Mark and David Moody come, and we proposed a committee to help in running the school. We walked down Grand Avenue and we watched My Fair Lady on television.’

The next day. ‘After lunch at Arya Vihara, I went to the Santa Barbara airport to meet Rupert Sheldrake and bring him back to Arya Vihara, where he will stay for a week. Meanwhile, Krishnaji held discussions at the house with teachers. Patricia Hunt-Perry came to stay a few days at Arya Vihara.’

April thirteenth. ‘At 10:30 a.m., Erna and I went to the K and R office, where Stuart Comus met us’—that’s our lawyer—‘and also Rajagopal’s lawyer, Terry Avsham, and Austin Bee. We were to examine “archives.” There was nothing that was different from the inventory we made in 1980. It was a complete futility. We were there one hour and came back. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Rupert Sheldrake and Patricia Hunt-Perry came. Both came back here for coffee. Later Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Max, and I walked. Supper was at 6:30. Early to bed.’

The fourteenth. ‘Krishnaji slept poorly. Too much cheese for supper, he thinks. I worked at my desk and paid income tax. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji saw Mrs. Frumkin for an interview.’ She was a woman who lived in Santa Monica and had people come and see videos. Renee Frumkin. ‘Then we walked down to the Lilliefelts’ for tea with the Bohms, Sheldrake, and Patricia Hunt-Perry. We all walked down to the dip and back.’

There isn’t much the next day, and then on April sixteenth, ‘It was a beautiful day, which I began with much laundry.’ [Chuckles.] ‘Mendizza came with a crew to set up video equipment with three-color cameras for the discussion. Narasimhan came to lunch and was shown around the school. Patricia Hunt-Perry left. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji, Bohm, Sheldrake, and John Hidley did a one-hour videotaped discussion on what causes mental disorder. After, there was a short walk with Krishnaji, Bohm, and Sheldrake.’

The seventeenth. ‘At 11 a.m. there was the second videotaped discussion with Krishnaji, Bohm, Sheldrake, and Hidley; and a third discussion was done in the afternoon at 4 p.m.’

The next day. ‘It was a warm, clear day. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji, Bohm, Sheldrake, and Hidley did the fourth videotaped dialogue. In the afternoon, Bohm, Hidley, and Krause did an epilogue to it without Krishnaji. Krause did the introduction. The house is finally empty and quiet by 8:30 in the evening. Krishnaji stopped taking the anti-sugar pills.’

The nineteenth. ‘It has been a hot day. Shainberg arrived last night and is staying at Arya Vihara. We all lunched there. Sheldrake left in the afternoon. Krishnaji, Shainberg, and I walked at 5:30 p.m. down McAndrew.’

April twentieth. ‘Evelyne and Mendizza came to film Krishnaji answering questions for their documentary. Radha Burnier arrived in Ojai for two days and came to lunch. In the afternoon, all filming equipment was removed, and Dennis cleaned the house. In the evening, Krishnaji did some special thing to “clean” the atmosphere in the living room.’ [Chuckles.] ‘The afternoon walk was with Krishnaji, David Shainberg, and the Lilliefelts.’

The next two days are mostly small things, and on April twenty-third, ‘Krishnaji’s blood sugar after five days off the medicine was 115!’ Exclamation point. ‘Lailee said to check again in a month, but meanwhile, all is normal. The Bohms brought Professor Feynman of Caltech to lunch at Arya Vihara. I went to the Oak Grove School horse show. Ulrich Bruger and Magda Sichitiu were also at lunch. She brought her mother and child to Ojai hoping to stay and put the child in the Oak Grove School. Krishnaji met here at Pine cottage with the Lilliefelts, Hooker, Krause, Mark, and David Moody; and a committee to run Oak Grove School was established. Members of the committee are Krause, Mark, Moody, Leslie Hidley, and one teacher.’

Editor’s Note: Mary doesn’t mention it in her diaries at this time, but she spoke with me about it a great deal, and it was certainly an important factor in her being in Krishnaji’s presence in California—the Oak Grove School was still not functioning well. This is the third governance structure for the school in as many years.

The twenty-fourth. ‘Krishnaji dictated letters. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji met here with the trustees and Leslie Hidley, Mark, and David Moody about the new school committee. Then Krishnaji spoke to teachers and parents. We took a short walk.’

The next day, Krishnaji again spoke to the teachers and parents.

On the twenty-sixth. ‘We drove to Beverly Hills for Krishnaji’s 11 a.m. appointment with Dr. Fox. He had a field of vision test and got drops for the pressure in the left eye. I picked up something from Gisèle. We stopped in Westwood for Krishnaji to go to the shaver shop,’ [both chuckle] ‘and then we went to Zuma Beach for a picnic lunch, and eventually the Green Thumb Nursery for a ficus tree to replace the one on the patio. “That one was waiting for us,” Krishnaji said. We got home after 4 p.m. and went for a walk with the Lilliefelts.’

S: You used to walk at Zuma Beach with Krishnaji when you lived in Malibu, didn’t you?

M: Yes, I think maybe we did, because Zuma Beach is up the coast highway from Malibu, when you get past the big rock. Zuma Beach is the beach immediately north of that. It’s a big wide beach, a beautiful beach to walk on. It’s a public beach, but when we lived in Malibu, there would be nobody there during the week. It was only on weekends that people came from the city. It was a very lovely, very wide, beach.

There's nothing for the twenty-seventh except that the Bohms left. And the following day, 'We went to the Oak Grove School for a tree planting and a lunch prepared by a parent who runs a restaurant in Santa Monica. Krishnaji sat at a table with the children. Then he and I went to the IRS office in Oxnard for his tax clearance so he could leave the country. We came back, and Krishnaji worked a little bit with Alasdair planting azaleas that we bought.'

Then, for the next couple of days, there isn't much of significance until May first. 'It is a cool, but somewhat sunny day. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his first Ojai talk in the Oak Grove. He and I had lunch at Arya Vihara with only Michael present. I looked at video of that day's talk—well done by Mendizza using two cameras and the equipment of the seminar recordings. Krishnaji and I walked to the Lilliefelts' and back.'

The second of May. 'It is a nice sunny day. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his second Ojai talk. Afterward, he said, "Where does the energy come from? It can't be the porridge."' [Both laugh.] Oh, dear.

S: If it were, I'd want some.

M: 'Lunch at Arya Vihara was with Kishbaugh and Narayan's brother, who's also named Krishnamurti. At 4 p.m., Alfonso Colón and Armando Riesco came to talk about the Fundación. Afterward, we walked to the Lilliefelts', then down McAndrew with them.'

There's nothing much the next day, then on May fourth, 'Krishnaji held the first question-and-answer session in the Grove. The lunch afterwards at Arya Vihara was with Kishbaugh and Narayan's brother again. Later, there was a tea here in Pine Cottage with Mr. Vaid and his son, Magda Sichitiu and her mother and child, Ulrich Bruger, Narayan's brother, Erna, Theo, Alfonso Colón, and his nephew Jose, after which Krishnaji and I went for a walk.'

The fifth. 'Dorothy telephoned from Brockwood about buying one of the Woodland Cottages. Colón and Riesco came to lunch at Arya Vihara. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, and I went to Oak Grove School to look at the sites for new school buildings. Zelma Wilson is the designer.'

May sixth. 'Krishnaji's second question-and-answer meeting in the Oak Grove. The Meralis arrived at lunchtime and will stay in the guest flat. Krishnaji put his hand on Colón, who has heart trouble, and also talked to Max. He walked with the Meralis, and I went to do marketing. My face caused criticism.' He used to claim that I made, I don't know…

S: Yes, you made faces. [Both laugh.] By which, I always thought he meant that your face expressed what you were feeling.

M: Well, yes, I guess I did.

Again, nothing much the next day, but on May eighth, 'There was drizzle, but still, at 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his third Ojai talk. Hugues van der Straten is here for one day, and he came with his son Gauthier for lunch at Arya Vihara. At 4 p.m., there was a meeting of Information Center people at the Lilliefelts'. Krishnaji walked down to their house, but didn't come in to the meeting, then we walked back. He had seen Bill Quinn at 4:30 p.m., and Dr. Shah at 5 p.m.'

May ninth. 'It was a cold day. Krishnaji gave his fourth Ojai talk. Beforehand, he had said in the car, "What will I talk about?" And it turned out to be a very fine one.[1] Brij Khare and wife and daughter were at lunch at Arya Vihara, as was Lou Blau. At 4 p.m., Peter Hewitt gave a piano recital in Libbey Park to benefit the matching fund drive. Krishnaji and I attended the first half. When we came back, he went to bed, where he had supper. Krishnaji said he "did something" to protect the house as we leave it at night.' What does that mean?

S: Maybe it was for that concert at Libbey Park.

M: It was in May. Well, anyway, that's what he said.

The tenth 'was a cold day. Various people to lunch at Arya Vihara. There was a meeting after lunch of a few trustees, plus Mark and David about the school buildings. Krishnaji spoke to Max. We walked to the Lilliefelts'.'

May eleventh. 'It is still cold. Krishnaji held the third question-and-answer session in the Oak Grove, after which we went to the cobbler.' Oh, yes. There was a good cobbler in Meiners Oaks, where I got some shoes.' We lunched at Arya Vihara, where there was Reeta Sanatani who had been principal of the Canadian school, but the school is now canceled. Krishnaji has resigned from the Educational Center of Canada.' He did resign, but the Siddoo sisters never said he resigned. 'Krishnaji and Booth Harris washed and waxed the green car. We walked with the Meralis to the Lilliefelts' and back.'

May twelfth. 'Today is Krishnaji's eighty-seventh birthday. We went to Beverly Hills, with Krishnaji driving the green Mercedes along the coast road. He said, "Every night meditation wakes me." We reached Dr. Fox's office at 11 a.m. Krishnaji had a glaucoma test. It's now fourteen after taking Timoptic for two weeks. My pressure was the same and I had a general eye exam. We fetched the rest of the things from the dressmaker Gisèle's, then had a picnic lunch on a shady street in Beverly Hills. We went to Bullock's for eight-hour cream.' Do you know about eight-hour cream? [chuckles] It's by Elizabeth Arden.

S: Oh, that. Yes, I do. It's orange, but it's in a pink jar.

M: Yes, it's orange, and it's in a typical pink Elizabeth Arden jar which was pink. And I still have the jar in the table by my bed. [laughs]

S: Krishnaji's jar?

M: It's his jar. Yes.

S: And I have his Brockwood jar of that. [Both laugh.]

M: Well, you know what I mean, in that case.

S: Yes. But it hasn't lasted eight hours; it's lasted more than twenty years. [Laughs.]

M: It's lasted several decades for me, too. This is 1982 and we are now in 2005 and it's still in my drawer. Occasionally I take a little bit. It doesn't seem to go funny.

S: Yes, I have Krishnaji's jar from Brockwood, and I don't know what I'm carrying it around the world for. [Both laugh.]

M: Because it's Krishnaji's jar from Brockwood.

S: Exactly. Exactly. [Both laugh.]

M: Oh, dear. Now wait a minute, where was I? Yes. Yes. 'We went to Bullock's for eight-hour cream, and came back to Ojai, Krishnaji again driving along the coast. Patrick Lashley had put new shelves in the garden storage.' He was a nice carpenter. 'Krishnaji was tired, but marvelously well on this birthday.'

The thirteenth. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held his fourth question-and-answer meeting in the Oak Grove. We, again, went to the cobbler, and then the chemist on the way back. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Bill Quinn was a guest. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji and I went to a tea at Oak Grove School for the helpers and guests.'

May fourteenth. 'Erna called me to say Rajagopal is trying to reach me. I telephoned him. He wants to send five boxes'—oh, this is the five-box day—'of material to Krishnaji to be delivered personally in my presence. At around 10 a.m., Austin Bee came with five file boxes. Krishnaji came to the front door and received them. Krishnaji had Erna and Theo come over and the contents of all five boxes were examined. There were manuscripts of Krishnaji's; letters from Nitya, Annie Besant, and Emily Lutyens; original accounts of the pepper tree event; and much else. Erna, Theo, and I made an inventory. Later, Krishnaji had me call Rajagopal and thank him deeply, and say that Krishnaji hoped that more material will come, and we can avoid going to court. We lunched at Arya Vihara, after which I went to the bank about travelers' checks, etcetera and to get tea roses for Krishnaji to plant near the nandis. Krishnaji walked with the Meralis and the Lilliefelts while I did this.'

May fifteenth. 'Krishnaji had leg cramps in the night. At 11:30 a.m., he gave the fifth Ojai talk, which moved me to tears.[2] We again stopped at the cobblers in Meiners Oaks and came back to Arya Vihara for lunch. It's a warm day, too hot to walk, and Krishnaji was tired. Appraisers came at 4 p.m., and I showed them all three houses. I bicycled eight miles.' How could I do that?

S: On your stationary bicycle.

M: Oh, yes. [Chuckles.] 'Alasdair and Eloise got married.' Eloise is the daughter of Evelyne.

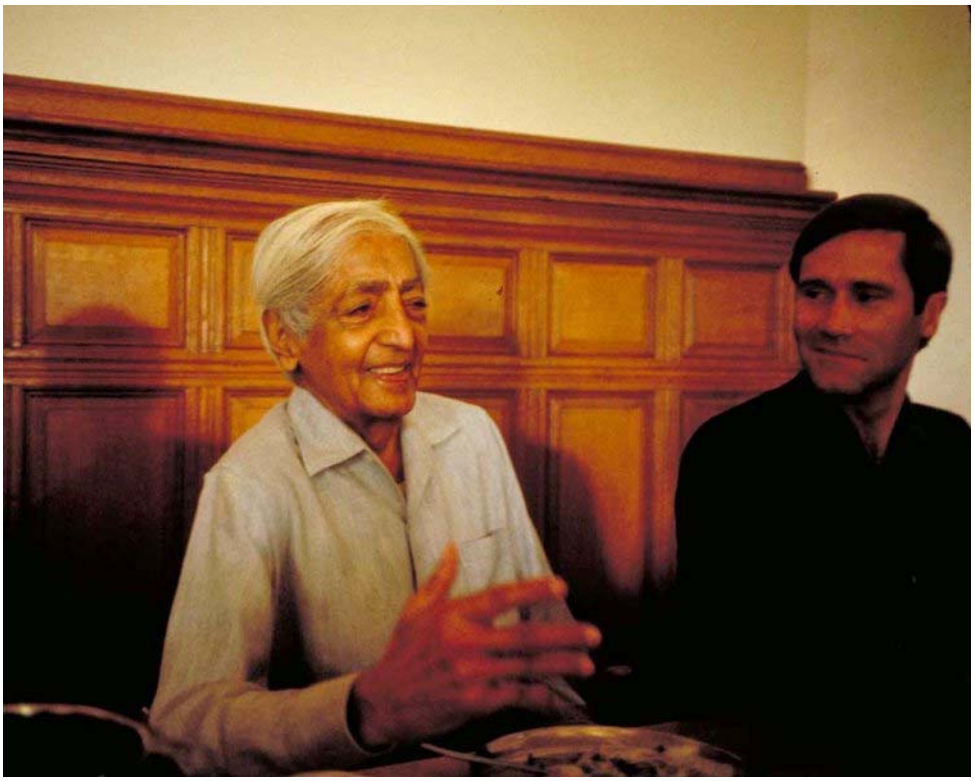
The sixteenth. 'It is a warm day. The crowd for the sixth talk was huge. Austin Bee handed Krishnaji a note from Rajagopal as he arrived. Krishnaji read it only after the talk on his return home. Rajagopal wanted Krishnaji to announce at the talk that they were friends. Later Krishnaji had me telephone and read a message Krishnaji wrote to Rajagopal, thanking him, and asking him if it meant he was turning over the rest of the things. Rajagopal said it has nothing to do with turning anything over or with the lawsuit. The Blaus were both at lunch. It was again too hot to walk. Erna had announced at the talk that the goal of the matching fund had been reached.'

May the seventeenth. 'It was a hot day. The Meralis left after lunch. Krishnaji was tired and worried about who carries on after he, I, and the Lilliefelts are gone. He talked all morning to us about it, and at 5 p.m., he had a meeting of the Lilliefelts, Evelyne, Hooker, Moody, Mark, Krause, and Booth Harris and talked about it. Are they committed to all this? Alasdair planted four tea roses near the West nandi.'

The eighteenth. 'It was a day of desk work and packing for me. Krishnaji's new will arrived from Cohen, and he signed it after lunch with Evelyne and Willa as witnesses. At 4 p.m., he talked to Aliana Scurlock, and then to Bill Quinn. Balasundaram came to say goodbye. There was a walk with the Lilliefelts.'

May nineteenth. 'I went to Beverly Hills, had my hair cut, and fetched protein powder for Krishnaji. On my way home, I stopped at the Dunnes' at 2 p.m. Amanda had friends of both of us to lunch: Tally Wyler, Joyce Buch, Ruth Carter, Hilda Marton, and Evelyne Keyes. They left, and then Phil came home. After our goodbyes, I returned to Ojai, where at 5:30, Person AX and her mother came.' Oh, that's that awful woman. At least, I think she's awful because of what she did. She's now a columnist. Her name is now AY. She married a man called Y. But, at this time, she was not married. Anyway, 'she and her mother with a Mrs. Peter Bevan, the wife of a producer, came to ask Krishnaji to do a TV interview for the BBC in August, which Krishnaji agreed to. Krishnaji had planted a yellow tea rose with Alasdair.'

S: Tell me about AY.



M: Well. The reason I don't like her is because at that meeting, she asked if he would appear for an interview with her on the air in August. Well, in August, we were apt to be in Saanen. But she was so definite about it that we left Saanen early in order to do this, but we never heard from her again. And I took offense.

S: But she was interested in Krishnaji's work?

M: She was interested in famous people. The mother was sort of vaguely interested. The mother was nicer. But AY—she was…she's my idea of what used to be known as "an adventuress." She came over to the US at this period, and then she married a very rich man called Y, she produced some children to cement the whole thing, and then divorced him with a large settlement, apparently. She is now independently wealthy, but she's now a columnist. [chuckles] Anyway, I didn't like her, as you can tell. I didn't dislike her spontaneously, not until she invited Krishnaji formally, and he said he would be there, and then, nothing. Anyway.

Just more packing and getting things in order the next day. And then May twenty-first:

'I finished packing by 12:30 p.m. We lunched at Arya Vihara, and at 2:30 p.m. left in the school van with Mark and David Moody for the Los Angeles airport, where Krishnaji and I took the 5:55 p.m. TWA to London. We had our usual two forward seats in the nose of the plane. Krishnaji slept fairly well.'

Krishnaji with Scott Forbes in Brockwood dining room (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The twenty-second: 'We arrived at Heathrow at noon. One of Krishnaji's two new bags was missing, but was eventually found. The waiting and crowds and uncertainty shocked his body. Dorothy, Doris, and Ingrid met us. We reached Brockwood before 3 p.m. Everyone was out to meet Krishnaji, including Dr. Parchure and Narayan. We had lunch upstairs in the kitchen, and walked in the grove at 5 p.m. Everything is in lovely full bloom. Brockwood is beautiful. I spoke to Mary Links.'

May twenty-third. ‘Krishnaji slept poorly and spent the day in bed. He had a massage by Dr. Parchure, which relaxed him. All unpacking was accomplished. I slept well in the afternoon.’

The twenty-fourth. ‘The Links, the Digbys, Jane Hammond, David Bohm, and Mary Cadogan all came to a trustee meeting at noon. It was decided to buy the Woodland cottage. The meeting continued after lunch. Krishnaji was concerned to hold the three Foundations together. He and I took Whisper for a walk.’

May twenty-fifth: ‘Krishnaji again slept poorly, so, again, he stayed in bed all day. I felt sleepy most of the day as well. I spoke to Fleur, and put all Krishnaji’s sweaters and shirts in order, read, and took a nap. The school is on half-term holiday, so I made supper upstairs. I spoke to Vanda.’

The next day. ‘It was a quiet day. Krishnaji got up for a fitting by a Winchester tailor, Mr. Thornton.’

S: Oh, Mr. Thornton, yes. That was a tailor I found and initially went to. He made some things for my dad, as well.

M: Oh, good. ‘He told Krishnaji that Mr. Lintott just died.’ Oh, Mr. Lintott was the nice man at Huntsman who always looked after Krishnaji, and he sort of ran things at Huntsman. Anyway, ‘Krishnaji lunched downstairs, and after naps, we walked. Krishnaji, Dorothy, the dogs, and I crossed the fields.’

The next day. ‘We both slept better. After lunch, I went with Scott and some of his students to visit Petworth.’ Remember that? ‘Krishnaji walked with Dorothy.’

May twenty-eighth. ‘Krishnaji spent the morning mostly sleeping. He got up for lunch. I went to a staff meeting at 4:45 p.m. We had planned to go to London that day, but Mary and Joe telephoned to tell us that the bridges across the Thames were closed because of the visit of the Pope.’

The twenty-ninth. ‘It was a warm and lovely day. Marie-Bertrande and Jean-Michel Maroger arrived with Diane for the weekend. Diane wants to be a Brockwood student next September. I talked all morning with them, and they came on the walk with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me. Kip bit Marie-Bertrande.’ That wasn’t nice of him.

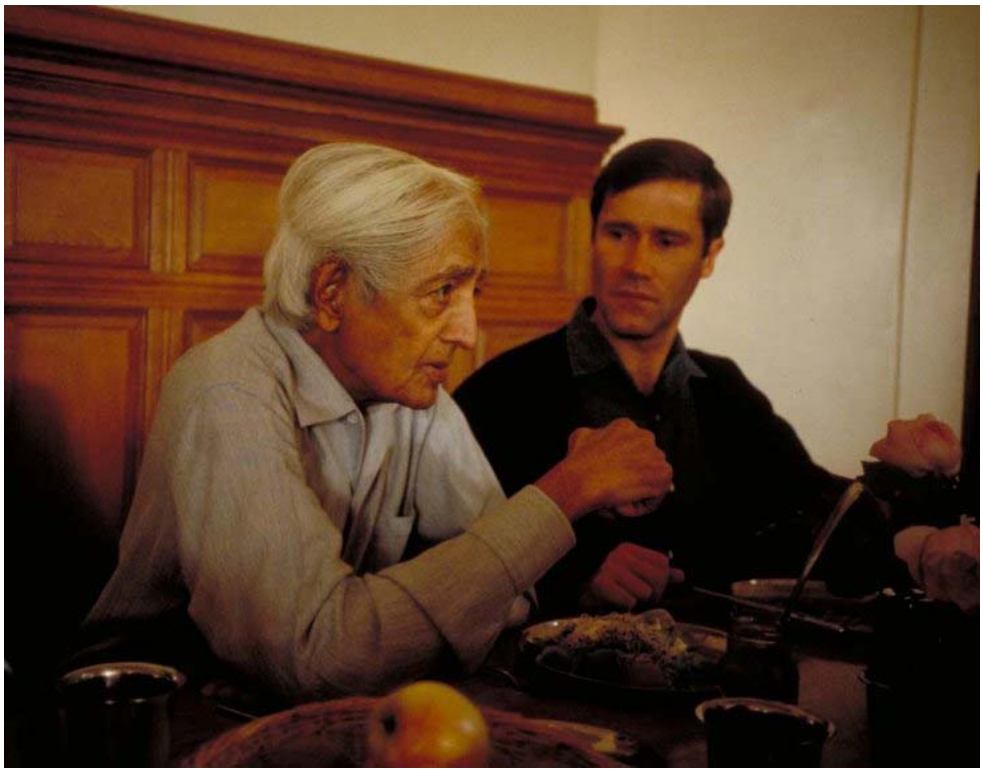
S: Kip wasn’t a nice dog.

M: May thirtieth: ‘Krishnaji spoke to the school. Peter Brook and his wife were there, and stayed to lunch. The Bohms came. I talked at length to Marie-Bertrande, and then Krishnaji spoke to her for over an hour. At 4 p.m., we took a short walk. It was Natasha’s birthday, and I gave her coral earrings.’

The thirty-first of May: ‘It was another warm day. Krishnaji walked with Jean-Michel while I went to a school meeting. At lunch, Krishnaji talked of what a school could do to bring about a religious person, to help one to see the false from the real. The Marogers left for France after supper.’

June first. ‘I went to Alresford on errands while Krishnaji spoke to the students alone. After lunch, I went to fetch two monks from Chithurst Buddhist monastery. One was Sumedho, who’d written asking to see Krishnaji. I brought them here to see Krishnaji at 4:30 p.m., and drove them back afterward.’

The second of June: ‘It is a hot day. I was packing for our stay in London, then I went to pay for our air tickets to Geneva. Krishnaji decided against going to Paris this summer. Erna telephoned that Rajagopal’s lawyer wants the five boxes back that Rajagopal sent to Krishnaji.’ They claimed—it isn’t written here—but, when Austin Bee brought the five boxes, and Krishnaji received them which I was to witness and all that, I think that was on a Friday or Saturday. By Monday, Rajagopal’s lawyer called to say that we had stolen them, and that we must return them immediately, because it was stolen property. Can you imagine? [Chuckles.] Anyway, the end of June second is ‘we walked in the shade of the grove.’



The third. ‘Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went by train to London. Mary and Joe met us and took Krishnaji and me to the Savoy Hotel, where we left our two bags. Then Joe dropped us at Huntsman. It was sad there because of Mr. Lintott’s death. Krishnaji ordered a dark blue suit with a bit of white in it. We lunched with Mary at Fortnum. At 3:30 p.m., Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt. It was a very hot day. We bought books at Hatchards and went back to the Savoy, where we had two suites for the price of two rooms. We had our supper in the rooms.’

June fourth. ‘Krishnaji slept well. He rested in the morning while I went to the Indian exhibit at the Hayward Gallery; partly organized by Pupul for Britain’s Festival of India. I came back to the Savoy and Joe came for Krishnaji and me. We went to join Mary at their flat, and then we walked to a nearby Italian restaurant for lunch. Joe took Krishnaji back to the Savoy while I got Krishnaji’s Swiss visa. It was a hot, very hot day. We rested and didn’t walk. Scott came by with Krishnaji’s pink pills.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘Hay fever is bothering him a bit. We had supper again in the rooms.’

The fifth. ‘It was another hot day. Joe drove Krishnaji and me to the Barbican Center where, at 10:45 a.m., Krishnaji gave his first London talk. The hall was full and overflowed into an adjacent cinema where a large screen showed the talk Krishnaji was giving. Joe brought us back to the Savoy, where at 1:30 p.m., he, Mary, and Mary’s granddaughter, Anna Pallant, had a leisurely lunch with us. Mary and Anna had sold books at the Barbican. It was too hot to walk, so we rested and had supper in the rooms.’

The next day. ‘It is still very hot. Joe again drove us to the Barbican for Krishnaji’s second London talk there. A very fine one. Mary, Joe, and Nicky Pallant, Mary’s grandson, lunched with Krishnaji and me at the Savoy; and then Joe drove us to Waterloo, where we returned by train to Petersfield. Dorothy met us. We had supper in the West Wing kitchen. It was good to be back.'

Krishnaji with Scott Forbes in Brockwood dining room (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

June seventh. 'I received from Cohen's office an affidavit about Krishnaji receiving the files May fourteenth from Rajagopal, and my telephone conversation with Rajagopal. I went to London by train and to the U.S. embassy to have my signature notarized, and posted the now-signed affidavit back to Oxnard. I did some shopping, then took the tube back to Waterloo and the train to Petersfield. On the way home, I picked up the Hoover, which was serviced in Alresford, and was back at Brockwood by 5 p.m. Krishnaji had walked with Dorothy, though it was another hot day. I telephoned Willa to say I had sent the affidavit.'

S: Wait. Before we go on to the eighth, wasn't this—just to continue this silly story of the material from Rajagopal—didn't Erna photocopy for twenty-four hours, or something like that, the content of all five boxes? Because there was no way of knowing whether you'd ever see any of those things again.

M: Yes. Rajagopal was really crazy; but not crazy enough to be innocent.

S: Crazy like a fox.

M: Yes, it was in a deliberate way. Anything he thought up, he would do. And his mood was usually hostile, although he sometimes called up to say how much he loved Krishnaji, and loved me, but he was not nutty enough to be excused of anything. He engaged in a lifetime of abuse of Krishnaji.

There was nothing of much significance until June tenth, when Krishnaji spoke to the students alone, and the next day, when he talked with the staff at 5 p.m.

June twelfth. 'The Bohms came for the night. Krishnaji took a small walk with Dorothy and me. In the evening, the Bohms and Scott came to watch on TV Bernard Levin interviewing Dr. Salk.' I think that was because we were judging the Levin interview technique.

On the thirteenth. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school at 11:45 a.m., after which the Bohms left. I spoke to Ginny Travers, who opened in a play called A Personal Affair in London last week. She says the reviews were not good.'

There is nothing much the next day.

June fifteenth: 'The Falkland war ends. We were going to London but canceled because of Krishnaji's hay fever and his feeling tired. I went in the afternoon to Petersfield, taking Frances, and got Phenargan antihistamine pills for Krishnaji. Also plants for the house. In the evening, I watched TV programs about the Argentine surrender to Britain. I talked to Phyllis Fry. Krishnaji took the Phenargan 25 mg pills for hay fever, and it made him sleep deeply.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji didn't awaken until after 8 a.m., and spent the whole day in bed resting. I went to London for an appointment with Mary's dermatologist, then walked to Selfridges for miscellaneous things, then to Claridge's and lunch with Fleur, then to a matinee of Ginny Travers's play, A Personal Affair, at the Globe Theatre. I went back to see her afterward. I went by underground to Waterloo, and was back at Brockwood by 7:30 p.m.'

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji spoke with the students, and the next day talked to staff.'

June nineteenth. 'Pupul arrived to stay until the twenty-fourth. And on the twentieth, 'Krishnaji had a walk with Dr. Parchure at 7 a.m. instead of his normal exercises. He had breakfast with Pupul and me in the kitchen. Later, he talked to the whole school at noon. In the afternoon, there was a mime play in the old rose garden, to which we all went.'

The next day. 'I spent most of the day doing desk work. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji and Pupul had a videotaped discussion with the school as the audience. Krishnaji spoke on reading the origin of things, and the path of diligence. And then Krishnaji said diligence remains part of action of the self and time, and going directly upon seeing was possible, possible for everyone.'

June twenty-second. ‘Pupul gave a talk to the school at noon on Indian craft, which Krishnaji attended. At 4:30 p.m., there was a meeting of Krishnaji, Pupul, Scott, Kathy, Harsh, and Ray McCoy about video and audiotapes in India.’

The next day. ‘I took the 9:03 a.m. train to London. The underground was on strike, so I waited in a queue for a taxi, which took me to my haircut. I walked in the rain to Bruton Street and my appointment with Judith.’ Who was Judith? ‘Then to the French tourist office on Piccadilly for pamphlets on French inns. Then I went to the Victoria and Albert Museum, where Betsy and I saw an exhibition, “This Indian Heritage.” I was lucky to catch a taxi back to Waterloo, and so back to Brockwood. Krishnaji was just going out in the rain with Dorothy and the dogs for a walk. There was a letter from Erna saying that Booth Harris has resigned from the Oak Grove School. Aditi, Nandini’s granddaughter, arrived.’

S: We’re going to have to call it quits there, as we’re running out of tape.

M: Okay.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] For the video of the Fourth Ojai Talk of 1982.

[2] For the video of the Fifth Ojai talk of 1982.

Issue 72: June 24, 1982 to September 19, 1982

Krishnaji's health continues to seem precarious, and his reserves of energy, limited. With this as a background, Krishnaji questions whether it is worth the time and energy to continue the legal conflict especially as it keeps all of Mary and him in touch with people he feels are dirty and evil.

Krishnaji gives superb talks in Saanen and Brockwood, and has a rest in France before the rigors of India.

Mary: We start today with June twenty-fourth, 1982, and we are at Brockwood. 'Pupul left for London. Asit and his wife Minakshi and daughters Clea and Sunali came to lunch. Krishnaji talked to Asit afterward about computer research on thinking and intelligence, and I taped it on a cassette. Erna telephoned. The judge in California is unable to decide between Rajagopal's and my affidavit about the five boxes of archives that Rajagopal had sent to Krishnaji and then claimed that they were stolen, so he ruled that they should be returned pending the case. Erna is to discuss what to do with Cohen on Tuesday. She suggested I call Rajagopal. Krishnaji talked to Harsh and Claire and another couple about a school for Anand and other small children. Krishnaji came to the school meeting.'

The twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji and I went to London in the rain, where Joe and Mary met us. Krishnaji had his first fitting on a new Huntsman suit. Mary had Pupul, Krishnaji, and me to lunch at Fortnum's. Krishnaji and I went to Hatchards, then to Floris for a shaving brush and soap. Krishnaji is changing from an electric razor.' [Chuckles.] 'Then we went to Paxton for cheese and butter.'

S: Floris is a nice place on Jermyn Street, but I never knew Krishnaji to wet-shave.

M: Well, he did for a while. Paxton is just two doors down from Floris, so that was pleasant shopping. 'We then met Mary and Joe at London library'—which is also right near there—'and they drove us to Waterloo. The Underground strike makes taxis few. Krishnaji was laughing in the train at The Spectator review of a book about Leadbeater.' [Both chuckle.]

S: I wonder what book that was.

M: I can't remember.

S: Before we go on, isn't there also that little tidbit that came up in our conversation last night? Since there is nothing too trivial for us. [Laughs.]

M: Don't push me too hard. [Both chuckle.]

S: Well, it appeared in our conversation last night that the eight-hour cream you mentioned before is not something that you introduced Krishnaji to.

M: No.

S: Which I always thought was the case.

M: Oh, no, no, no. I never used it. I don't like Elizabeth Arden.

S: Right, and so you said last night that you thought it was Vanda who introduced him to that.

M: Well, it must've been. I mean, I'm deducing that—nobody told me.

S: I'm just trying to get all the details. [Both laugh.] Alright, we can continue now.

M: You brought the eight-hour cream into the conversation.

S: I know, I know. I plead guilty.

M: So the twenty-sixth of June 'was a quiet day for Krishnaji. No exercises. He spoke very briefly to a Greek girl called Erieta Kokido.'

S: Oh, yes, I remember her.

M: Yes. We know her, but this is her first appearance in these diaries. 'He spoke briefly to Erieta after lunch and to Shakuntala later, then walked with Dorothy and me. In the evening, I telephoned Rajagopal with Krishnaji beside me. I asked why he was claiming the files he sent should be returned. He said he never gave them, and that he couldn't discuss it. He was "doing what I think is right"'—that's Rajagopal. 'Krishnaji had me say that he and Rajagopal could settle it. Rajagopal said to have Krishnaji write that in a letter. Krishnaji questioned me about whether it is worth it going on with all this.' Krishnaji got fed up with it.

June twenty-seven. 'Krishnaji spoke to school, and he talked to Kathy Forbes at 4:15 p.m. There was a small walk and some rhododendron work in the grove with him, Dorothy, and me.' We used to deadhead the rhododendrons. I liked doing that. 'I telephoned Erna about the conversation yesterday with Rajagopal. Krishnaji dictated letters during supper. The school had a dance in the evening.'

The twenty-eighth of June. 'It rained. I took bedspreads to be laundered.' I'm sure posterity wants to know that.

S: [laughs] We do, we do.

M: [Chuckles.] 'Lady Dufferin came to lunch. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I cleaned rhododendrons and took a small walk.'

S: Who is Lady Dufferin?

M: Lady Dufferin is a Lady called Eva Dufferin. I don't know how she came to know of Brockwood. I knew her through other people.

S: So, she was a friend or an acquaintance of yours?

M: Well, not really. She was a friend of friends of mine. And I knew her. I mean, I'd met her. She wouldn't have come for me, and I wouldn't have asked her, so. I guess she must have had an interest in Krishnaji. 'We cleaned rhododendrons, and took a small walk. A British rail strike tied up everything, but was called off in the evening.'

The twenty-ninth. 'I went to Alresford on errands and then to lunch with Jane and Ian Hammond at their home in Camberley, where I saw Ian's clocks.' Have you ever seen Ian's clocks?

S: I haven't.

M: Well, they are quite something.

S: I know that he's a clockmaker as a hobby.

M: Yes, and he makes copies of ancient clocks, and makes them the way they were made in past centuries. The house is filled with clocks. They're beautiful and exquisitely made. 'I came back and stopped at Cheriton to see the Jane Austen house. I picked up the now-cleaned bedspreads in Petersfield, and came back to walk with Krishnaji and Dorothy.'

The next day, 'the school term ends today. I worked at my desk. In the afternoon, Erna telephoned about Rajagopal's lawyer, Avsham, who rang our lawyer, Cohen, on Monday. He apologized for a rude letter, and said he was seeing Rajagopal Thursday and would advise him to settle the case. He will ring Cohen Friday. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I deadheaded rhododendrons in the grove and walked back across the fields. There were few at dinner. Krishnaji has hay fever symptoms, or is it a possible cold? I talked to Mary L. She and Joe come here on the fifteenth.'

July first. 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed sleeping on and off. Dorothy and Montague left in the Land Rover for Saanen, and I packed all day while watching Wimbledon on television. Krishnaji is much better from resting indoors.'

The second of July. 'We finished packing and had an early lunch at twelve. Ingrid drove us to Heathrow, where Rita Zampese met us and escorted Krishnaji and me onboard our Swiss Air flight, on which we left at 3:20 p.m. for Geneva. We arrived at the Hotel des Bergues just as Mar de Manziarly was also arriving there from Paris. She has come to lunch with Krishnaji tomorrow. It is hot in Geneva. Krishnaji and I dined in the Amphitryon Restaurant, and took a stroll across the river, and so back to bed.'

The third. 'We went to Jacquet to order ties for Joe and Krishnaji, and to the Pharmacie Principal for two more towel bathrobes for Krishnaji. Then to Grand Passage, and back to the hotel, where Mar lunched with us. She rested in my room until she left for the airport and returned to Paris. We spoke on the phone to Vanda, who had arrived this morning in Gstaad with Fosca. Krishnaji and I took a stroll, and at 7 p.m., had dinner, as at lunch time, in the Pavillon because the Amphitryon is closed today. We went early to bed for a good night's sleep.'

July fourth. 'I slept ten hours, and then had a lovely, lazy morning in bed. Krishnaji and I had lunch in the Amphitryon. I went to fetch a Ford Fiesta from Hertz, and then we drove slowly along the Route du Lac and up through Bulle to Gstaad, reaching Tannegg at 6:15 p.m. We haven't got the downstairs apartment this year, so Parchure has to use the small one that Vanda usually takes for the few days she is here, and Vanda has taken a room nearby.' We had the ground floor, and sometimes we had the lower floor, but not this year.

The next day. 'I put things in order, and Krishnaji stayed in bed. In the afternoon, I went to the village on errands. Dr. Parchure arrived from Brockwood, having flown to Geneva, and been picked up and driven here by Gisèle Balleys.'

The sixth of July. 'I did errands, and brought Frances and Nikki and David Mustart up for lunch. Vanda brought a letter to Krishnaji she had received from Rosalind and Rajagopal.' I don't go on about that, but he wouldn't touch it, as if it was diseased.' I had to tell him what was in it—when I tried to read it to him, he didn't want to hear the words; he wanted to be told what was in it. He had a revulsion from everything about it. 'I took Krishnaji to the barber for his haircut, and then we took a little drive to Gsteig.'

The seventh of July, and I finally am writing in the big diary again, so we'll have longer entries. 'Krishnaji and I came back here once again'—I sort of reprise what had happened—'Krishnaji and I came back here once again to Chalet Tannegg last Sunday after flying on Friday afternoon to Geneva. It had seemed time to leave England. The Falklands War, which seemed to shock Krishnaji at every news bulletin, was replaced by the horror of fighting in Lebanon, and close by was the continuation of the railway and underground strikes in England. The fuss over the birth of a first baby son to the Prince and Princess of Wales only made Krishnaji spurn all the news as mad.' [Both laugh.] 'Our own contentions, the unending Rajagopal saga, reignited the week after we left Ojai with the demand by Rajagopal's lawyer that the five cartons of papers and other material Rajagopal had sent via Austin Bee to Krishnaji on May fourteenth be returned immediately. Otherwise he would start proceedings "for the recovery of stolen property."' [Both chuckle.] 'I had left in Ojai a memorandum of my telephone conversation with Rajagopal, and based on this, Cohen's office composed an affidavit, which I signed at the U.S. consulate in London and posted back. It arrived in time for a hearing in Ventura courts in which it was opposed by a statement of Rajagopal's that he never gave the material but merely sent it for Krishnaji's eyes as "production" of material called for by the court. The judge decided he could not decide between the two.' [Chuckles.] He was a very fed-up judge, I think. 'The judge was giving, this once, the benefit of the doubt to Rajagopal that he had sent the cartons as part of "producing" and, therefore, until a definitive court hearing and ruling, we should return them to Rajagopal.

Cohen asked for thirty days to decide whether to appeal this to a higher court. Meanwhile, Rajagopal is to continue to "produce" further material for us to see at stated intervals. What he is supposed to "produce" is everything he claims is his property and we claim are Krishnaji's archives. It is quite a list. Cohen told Erna that appealing to a higher court is usually as a result of a trial and a judgment, not a minor ruling like this one. He was to think it over and meet Erna a week ago. Erna asked me if I thought it would do any good to speak to Rajagopal. I was pessimistic, but said I would.' We were still at Brockwood at this point. 'I telephoned him in the evening, English time, on June twenty-sixth; as I have had to make sworn affidavits about my conversations with him, I asked Scott Forbes if there was some way to record the conversation. Scott rigged a small mic to the telephone earpiece and a cassette recording resulted.' Do you remember any of that?

S: No. I don't remember it at all.

M: 'Rajagopal, as usual, began by saying he must go to another phone, which means to us, that he is recording it. For once he was not the only one.' [Both laugh.] 'I said how surprised…'

S: What date was this?

M: Well, I'm writing this on July seventh.

S: So you're just recounting this.

M: Yes, I'm recounting as I'm trying to make up for the fact that I haven't written in my big diary all this time. So, it's a review of recent news. 'I said how surprised Krishnaji and I were that after he had made what seemed like a friendly gesture and sent over the cartons, and when he sent them, there was never any mention of our returning them to him—and his lawyer now talks about stolen property? I said one wondered if he hadn't intended to do something right and friendly, and now his lawyer was trying to undo it.' [Both chuckle.] I was blaming the lawyer. 'He said I could interpret it as I liked. I asked why he hadn't mentioned sending it all back at the beginning. I went on to say that the thanks that Krishnaji had expressed via me twice on the telephone were obviously made for something sent to him to keep, and that I had asked him then if they were for Krishnaji, and he had said yes. I reminded him that Krishnaji had, in thanking him, said that if he would continue to send material there would be no need for a court action. Krishnaji was sitting beside me through all this, and wrote on a piece of paper for me to say that he and Rajagopal could settle the whole thing if all the archives material was turned over. Rajagopal said, "have him write that in a letter." Rajagopal went on to say that he couldn't do anything. I said his lawyers obviously had to follow his decisions, and it was sad if he could do nothing. He said that was my interpretation, and to tell Krishnaji that he had always done "what I think is the right thing." He repeated this in a vociferous voice. I later telephoned Erna about this and she was not surprised. She is photocopying as much of the material as she can. She was still to see Cohen on the twenty-ninth to discuss where we are. Krishnaji wondered if all this was worth it, "for a lot of papers." I reminded him that part of the agreement Rajagopal has broken has to do with republishing Krishnaji's books incorrectly, as he tried to do with the first collected edition volume of the poems. "We mustn't let him do that," said Krishnaji. Erna then telephoned us on the thirtieth about what was then a new development. On Monday, the twenty-eighth, Avsham, Rajagopal's lawyer who had written the insulting letter to Cohen about the stolen property after which Cohen informed Rajagopal's Ventura lawyer'—he had two lawyers, one in Los Angeles and one in Ventura—'that he would henceforth deal only with him.' I'm reading this badly because Avsham rang Cohen and apologized, and was very polite, and asked Cohen if he would discuss with him a basis for a settlement of the case. 'He said he was seeing Rajagopal on Thursday, July the first, and though Rajagopal didn't know it, he was going to recommend settlement. Avsham said he would telephone Cohen Friday. Erna is to telephone Krishnaji and me as soon as she hears what happened. That is where we are right now.'

'In allied matters, Vanda yesterday gave Krishnaji a letter from Rosalind and Rajagopal, which was to be read by Krishnaji in front of Vanda and then destroyed. Krishnaji refused to touch it. He had me open and tell him what it was. It was a six-page handwritten account entitled "A Sad, Sad Story" of Rosalind's life in relation to Krishnaji, Nitya, and Rajagopal. The point of it—if there was one—was the justification of anything Rajagopal may be "driven in his desperation to do in court."' Those are her words. 'It was defamatory of Krishnaji and utterly self-serving. The clear implication is of her aiding Rajagopal. Krishnaji felt a revulsion at listening to any part of it.'

'We drove to Gsteig in the rain and spoke of it. Rosalind had called Krishnaji a congenital liar. And he asked, "Do you consider me that?" He said, "I have lied when they attacked me, brutalized me. I'm not a violent man, and they were. I tried to avoid that." He appeared shocked by the letter, but more concerned that I might be upset by it. I said I wasn't. But one thing was firm: That when all this is over, the case or whatever happens, I will never have anything to do with either of those two people. Krishnaji said he felt the same. But I pointed out that he was forgiving, capable of forgetting. My feelings would not alter. This morning, he again asked if the letter had upset me. I didn't tell him that it sickened me, for him, that he should have fallen into the hands of such people. But that is an old feeling of mine, an old question. He said that he had awakened thinking of the meaning of humility, to examine what one is or has done without a center.'

S: That's extraordinary, Krishnaji's response. My response to this would have been homicidal, and his response was humility.

M: Yes. Well, mine was iron…I would never, never have countenanced…because it was done to him. He was defenseless.

S: I know. I know. I know.

M: These awful, exploiting, vulgar people. 'The Siddoo sisters came at 4 p.m. to see Krishnaji and recount what happened with Reeta Sanatani and the events that led up to the decision not to have a school at Wolf Lake.'

The eighth of July. 'We have heard nothing yet from Erna. The weather is beautiful. The mountains sleep in their shawls of snow with a summer languor that fills me as well. Krishnaji does breathing exercises with Dr. Parchure in the early mornings, and has a massage before lunch. Dr. Parchure has given both Krishnaji and me some good exercises to strengthen the back muscles, good especially for perennial lower back aches. Krishnaji gave a half hour interview at 4 p.m. to Al Blackburn, who left the text of a book he has written. Krishnaji will not read it and neither, I think, will I. Blackburn is here with his wife, Gaby, but she didn't come. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji also gave a few minutes to a Brockwood student, Jean-Marie Baud. It was too hot to walk up the hill, so Krishnaji and I did twenty laps in the shade on the driveway.' [Both chuckle.]

July ninth, 'It is another hot day. Krishnaji dictated letters. I went to the village in the afternoon and met Krishnaji at the station. He had walked down with Dr. Parchure. The heat had affected him. Erna finally telephoned in the evening. Cohen has written her a letter so that she can send it on to us. His conversation with Avsham has been cool and unproductive. No answers on what happens to the archives material after Rajagopal's death. Avsham said he believes a settlement is possible if an apology is made. Erna asked what I thought. I said that if a proper settlement is arrived at, it should be possible to make some sort of statement of regret that litigation had been necessary, but what is meant by an apology? I suspect Rajagopal wants some sort of groveling admission that he was right all along. A lot of lies. The "production of documents" and miscellaneous that took place at Rajagopal's Ventura lawyer's office was meaningless; it was only a carton of miscellaneous, meaningless letters to Krishnaji and to Rajagopal, i.e., nothing from our list of documents. When Rajagopal was asked for the date of his next operation—his excuse for stalling—there was no response. Cohen is considering taking Mrs. Vigeveno's deposition. Erna feels we should continue to demand further production of documents. The present pressure on Rajagopal is positive and she says that he will, at all costs, avoid going personally to court.' Erna felt that he couldn't stand up in court and behave in this ridiculous way; and that he would, if forced to go to court, cave in. I sort of agreed with her. 'The return of the five cartons is due on the twenty-first. We have until then to decide. I reported all this to Krishnaji, who listened normally, and we didn't discuss it further.'

July tenth. 'Krishnaji slept poorly. He said that the walk in the heat affected him, and he must not go out in the sun anymore. This morning, Krishnaji asked me what actually are we fighting Rajagopal for. I replied, the access to the archives and the prevention of their being given away, and the protection against Rajagopal's publishing anything hitherto unpublished, and the republication of anything already published only in its original form. Krishnaji asked, "Are we to go on fighting for years?" He says Rajagopal will never give in. "Are we to spend all this energy, time, and money on this? It keeps us in constant contact with these dirty people. They are dirty. That's why I didn't want to read or touch that letter from Rosalind. I never want to see or speak to those people ever. They are evil, dirty." I asked if we then let them do what they want. Krishnaji replied, "No. Rajagopal won't publish anything. He's too far gone." I said we had no protection if he did, unless it is in an agreement. That, to me, the first responsibility is to protect the teachings, their record. Krishnaji asked, "Is it worth all this? Think of it afresh." He puts aside my pointing to the possible consequences of giving up the legal rein. "Don't keep looking ahead," he said. But isn't that essential? If this thing is a burden to Krishnaji, then it can be said that it should be abandoned. His saying that this keeps us in contact with evil is so; but then it has been so through all of this. Why did we do it? Krishnaji dismissed that as the past. Am I too stuck in revulsion at wrongdoing to Krishnaji, in a deep indignation that says no such behavior should happen? And would it really wipe these dirty people out of our lives? Rajagopal wants contact with Krishnaji, by foul means, if necessary. What next? Or would it fade away to be obscured by, "Oh, poor Rajagopal, he is getting old and is unwell," and he will regain his status as a decent human being in the fog of a cover-up. Villainy successful?' That's me talking to myself.

S: Yes.

M: 'Late in midmorning, Krishnaji came in to talk to me and to make me see, and therefore feel, as he does, that our going on further in this is to touch dirt. He is revolted by them and wants to have nothing further or ever to do with them. What are we fighting for? Are we to go on and on until Rajagopal dies with this? He said, "I am disgusted. Like that tennis court yesterday." The Gstaad tennis tournament is on in the village, and was crowded with "meat-eating, vulgar people."' [Both chuckle.] '"I would do anything to get away from them"'—the two Rajagopals. '"I cannot be with having anything to do with them, and we are connected through this case. We were right in the beginning. I felt responsible to those who had given money, and it was right that we get the land and all that. But now it goes on and on. Don't you want to be free of it?" I said I had one motive from the very beginning: to protect him and his teachings. To see that what he wants is done, that it occurs. He said that wasn't enough. "You are part of me. You must see and feel this in the same way. You must feel it is right." He was making it clear that he wants to end the dispute, and that in itself counts totally for me, but I said I hope that he was also looking at the implications of the next actions. What if Rajagopal publishes without permission? Krishnaji said he couldn't do that under the old agreement. I reminded him of Cohen's statement that began the present litigation: that unless we defend our rights under an agreement, they go by default. I said it was far less important, perhaps, but would apply also for the events required in the agreement at Rajagopal's death. Krishnaji assumes they were all binding, which they may not be. Cohen must be asked what protection those rights have. Krishnaji agreed to ask Cohen and also have him settle the case on the best terms, and wants to protect the latter rights. I suggested Rajagopal might demand a whitewash. "He won't do that," said Krishnaji. I pointed out that he already had, in the note that Austin Bee handed Krishnaji before the last Ojai talk, and in a message this week via Cohen that Rajagopal wanted an apology. At one point, Krishnaji said, "I would grovel to end this." I said I could not. It would be a falsehood, and he agreed that he would not say something false. I said something of which I wrote earlier this morning—my revulsion at evil getting its ends; that one day, Krishnaji would forget what had happened and obscure what those people are. He said he wanted never to have anything to do with either of them again.'

'Later in the afternoon, I telephoned Erna. It was early morning in Ojai. I tried to put in words Krishnaji's feelings and wish to settle the case quickly. Erna sounded disturbed. She warned that if we dropped the case, Rajagopal can countersue for false accusations and for his expenses. I did find out that Cohen says our rights over publications and eventual succession to the K and R Foundation remain in effect under the old agreement. Krishnaji is intent on saying that it was not the effect of the ugly Rosalind and Rajagopal letters that impels him now, but simply wanting to be free of any contact, or "anything to do with them." Erna pointed out that Rajagopal will find new ways of harassment. She is to see Cohen at 9 a.m. on Monday, and will explore the possibilities of a settlement. Afterward, Krishnaji felt I had not put it vividly. He sat beside me as I talked, and finally was willing to speak directly to her.'

July eleventh. 'Krishnaji again asked me if I'd been upset by Rosalind's letter. He said he felt I was, and that I had not put things clearly enough to Erna. I told him nothing about the letter surprised me, but it was uglier than he realized. The hate, both large and petty, filled it. He said, "That is why I didn't want to touch it."…"I wish I had never met those two people." I said again that all I care about is what is my responsibility, as it is Erna's, too, to protect and care for him; and that one has to look at what can happen as a result of decisions made now. He seemed worried that it was all a shock to me. But nothing shocks me about those wretched people. I said that, for the moment, the only important thing was that he was speaking this morning, and so it was. I had gone up the mountain and walked to the end of the wood before the sun touched it. It was cool and beautiful. The earth smelled of grasses and flowers, and the brook was still rushing down in the woods. I came back feeling full of cleanness and the morning mountain.'

'We arrived a little early at the tent, which was full, for the first Saanen talk of the year, which was to start at 10:30 a.m. It was very hot in the tent. Old faces. New faces. Krishnaji spoke strongly. Something new. "Living without a cause." Toward the end, a tall, drugged-looking young man came into the tent, climbed over people until, grimacing, he reached the edge of the platform. Various people came quietly to prevent his climbing up, but Krishnaji said, "Don't touch him." The man echoed those words in a loud voice, and began an incoherent speech in German. A few in the audience yelled, "Be quiet!" but Krishnaji sat quietly. Then he said, "Shall we end the meeting?" But when the man ran out of words, he wandered out, and Krishnaji picked up exactly where he left off and spoke another eight to ten minutes. The heat in the tent had been considerable. Both Krishnaji and I slept all afternoon. A bottomless sleep for me. Krishnaji walked in the shadow of the chalet, and went without supper. At 7:30 p.m., I took Dr. Parchure to the tent to see the first video of The Nature of the Mind, the Krishnaji-Bohm-Sheldrake-Hidley series. It looked good.'

There's little the next day. And on the thirteenth, 'I had another early walk. I took Dr. Parchure to the tent, then came back for Krishnaji, who gave the second Saanen talk. He slept afterward, but came to the lunch table with Vanda and me. At 3 p.m., Mary Cadogan and Dorothy came to discuss various things. Krishnaji joined us later, and looked at the biography of Leadbeater, The Elder Brother, which we had.'

S: That must've been the book that he had read the review of.

M: Yes [chuckles]. 'In the evening, I took Vanda and Dr. Parchure to the video showing in the tent.'

July fourteenth. 'Again, I had an early walk. I purchased and put food and supplies in the Saanen apartment for Pupul, Radhika, and her children. They arrived by car around five. They came first to see Krishnaji, then I guided them to their place.' It was a rented apartment in the village of Saanen somewhere. 'I came back to bring them up to supper. Dr. Parchure learned that his eldest son, Vikram, had a baby girl; Parchure's first grandchild. Erna telephoned to report the meeting with Cohen. She will continue to press, but listened to settlement suggestions from the other side.'

The fifteenth. 'I took an early walk again, and it was another hot day. Krishnaji gave his third Saanen talk; a very deep one.[1] Lunch was with Krishnaji, Vanda, Pupul, Radhika, and her children, and David and Nikki Mustart. I took Parchure back to Saanen and went looking for a place to buy towels for Pupul. Vanda and I signed the lease for Tannegg for next year. Krishnaji in the talk said, "Movement from cause to effect is time and thought."

Krishnaji at the Marogers' (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

July sixteenth. 'Eleven international Krishnaji committees met here with Krishnaji in the morning. Then all but he, Vanda, and Pupul went down to Chalet Firo for lunch, and a further meeting all afternoon. A letter from Erna came about the meeting with Cohen. I had supper with Jean-Michel, Marie-Bertrande, and Diane Maroger at the Hotel Saanerhof. A rain came and it cooled the air.'

The seventeenth of July. 'The weather is slightly cooler. I fetched Pupul to Tannegg at 11 a.m. She and Vanda talked about Pupul's book. Simonetta di Cesaro, Frances, and a friend of Vanda's, Tom Carini, here from Rome to hear Krishnaji for the first time, were at lunch. I took Pupul home later, and did errands. Vanda was to have left, but is staying on until Monday. The rain came again in the late afternoon. Marie-Bertrande and Diane came to see Krishnaji at 6 p.m. They leave tomorrow.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji gave the fourth Saanen talk. At lunch with Krishnaji were Vanda, Topazia, Carini, and me. Pupul and Radhika came to tea. Asit and his family arrived at the Palace Hotel.'

July nineteenth. 'Vanda left for Florence. Krishnaji and I lunched with Pupul, Radhika, and her children. Then he and I went for a short drive to Saanenmöser and arrived back in Gstaad for a 4 o'clock appointment with Dr. Steiger, who did a blood sugar test. I telephoned Filomena in Rome.'

July twentieth. 'Krishnaji's fifth Saanen talk. Dr. Lichti came after the talk to Tannegg and discussed Krishnaji's blood sugar with Dr. Parchure and me. She suggested herbal teas to lower it and diet. She lunched here and said she will come to Brockwood for the gathering. Asit and Pupul came to tea after which Asit walked with Krishnaji. I dined with Suzanne and Hugues van der Straten.'

July twenty-first. 'Jean-Michel Maroger came to lunch with Krishnaji and me. We discussed where Krishnaji might go in September for a holiday in the Dordogne. I had a haircut. Pupul and Asit came to tea, and I taped a discussion they had with Krishnaji. Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, Kathy, and Scott came to fetch me at 7 p.m. and we went up the Hornberg for a dinner of raclette.' I remember that.

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave the sixth talk in Saanen. Afterwards, we had a quiet lunch with just Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji saw Mr. Mirabet and at 4:30 p.m., Marie-Bertrande had an interview with Krishnaji.'

July twenty-third. 'There was the second meeting of the foreign committees here at Tannegg. Krishnaji spoke most eloquently to them. Krishnaji and I lunched with Asit, Minakshi and Pupul at the Palace Hotel. Scott and Kathy came to supper and then the three of us went to the film The French Lieutenant's Woman.' Do you remember that movie?

S: I don't, but it sounds like the kind of movie I probably wouldn't remember.

M: Kathy and I liked it.

S: I'm sure you both did. [Both chuckle.]

M: Anyway, it was a very good movie, according to Kathy and me. You have an overly male point of view. [Chuckles.]

The twenty-fourth of July. 'I fetched Pupul at 10 a.m. to talk about her book to Krishnaji. She stayed to lunch. Asit came in to say goodbye before driving to Lugano with his family. At 4 p.m., I fetched the Fouérés. Do you remember the Fouérés, the Frenchman and his wife? They came every year and lived down in the village. He was tiresome.

S: Yes, I think I can remember Fouérés.

M: He was always writing pompous things about Krishnaji and the teachings.

S: Oh yes, now I remember. [Both laugh.] That describes him.

M: Anyway, they 'came to see Krishnaji briefly, and at 4:30 p.m., an elderly Spanish couple brought a donation. I worked on preparing questions for tomorrow's question-and-answer meeting.'

Sunday, the twenty-fifth. 'I have been walking early every morning, but today's walk was in the rain. Krishnaji held this year's first question-and-answer session in the tent. I gave him five written questions, of which he answered only two, but marvelously.'[2] I have that underlined. 'He and I lunched alone. I drove Radhika and children up to Tannegg for tea. Scott came by. I walked with Krishnaji and the children and then drove all of them back to Saanen.'

The next day was the second question-and-answer meeting, then on July twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji held his third question-and-answer meeting for the year, and the last event for this summer in Saanen. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched alone. Krishnaji gave an interview to a former Rajneesh follower, Mrs. Morris. I fetched Pupul, Radhika, and children to tea. They leave tomorrow. I spoke to Filomena. Dorothy came by.'

July twenty-eighth. 'Pupul, Radhika, and children came to say goodbye. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched quietly. Krishnaji saw a German woman at 4 p.m. I had Nicole Philippeau and children to tea. Krishnaji was tired and slept poorly. Dorothy came by after seeing an eye doctor in Thun.'

July twenty-ninth. 'I had a long talk with Dr. Parchure about Krishnaji's health. It worries both of us. I fetched Dorothy and Montague to lunch, and I suggested to them that we cancel the Brockwood seminar this year. They agreed and so did Krishnaji. For his sake, we need to space Krishnaji's activities better. They leave for Brockwood tomorrow. In the evening, I went to the movie with Scott, Evil Under the Sun.' You don't remember that?

S: I don't remember that one, either.

M: It wasn't a woman's picture, I don't think. [S laughs.] Peter Ustinov was in it.

S: Oh, that's right. It was an Agatha Christie thing. He was Poirot.

M: Poirot. Yes. Oh, well, then I put, 'Not very good.' [Both chuckle.]

There is nothing of significance for the next two days, but on August first, 'Krishnaji began a new series of Letters to the Schools in the morning. I typed it by lunchtime. We both read all afternoon. Asit rang from New York. He is arriving in Geneva tomorrow en route to Singapore, and may drive here to lunch. Lou and Evelyne Blau telephoned from California. Lou is not very clear about my donating the McAndrew Road property to the Foundation. I said we will go into it on my return.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji dictated another Letters to the Schools. Asit rang from Geneva. His flight was late, so he's not coming here. Jackie Siddoo came with mangoes and to say goodbye to Krishnaji. Krishnaji and I walked to the river.'

August third. 'For the first time in weeks, I didn't go for an early walk. Krishnaji dictated another Letters to the Schools. Frances came to lunch with Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me. Bruno Ortolani came at 4 p.m. to tell me about a book he has put together reporting Krishnaji's talks. Krishnaji saw him afterward and declined to write a brief foreword. The Marogers rang.'

The fourth of August. 'Krishnaji dictated another Letters to the Schools. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I gave Fosca a Tissot wristwatch. She went with Ortolani in the afternoon for a ride.' Fosca was indomitable. She cooked away and did the laundry, ironed. She liked it—she always said, "I'm not a cook, I'm a laundress." She cooked beautifully, but she took pride in her skill as a laundress, and she ironed to perfection. She liked to iron Krishnaji's shirts and they were beautiful. 'Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched at the Hotel Bel Air. Not bad.' [Chuckles.] 'After naps, Krishnaji and I walked to the river. He said he had felt something threatening in the wood when he walked there alone, but didn't feel it with me there.' He had a very strange thing about…

S: Yes. Sensing the woods at night.

M: Yes. He said that he would never walk in a wood at night because of something threatening.

S: Yes. I remember that.

M: And he also said how he wouldn't go out at night alone. And I said, well, if I were with him, "Would you go?" Yes, he would. It was his being alone that…I don't know. Don't ask me to explain.

S: Yes, I understand. We don't have to understand, we just have to record.

M: That's right. Thank god. [S chuckles.]

On the next three days, Krishnaji dictated three more Letters to the Schools. Also on August seventh, 'at lunch, Krishnaji began to speak of places where adults could come and study the teachings—maybe one at Rajghat and one at Ojai. There was an implication that I should bring about the Ojai one. At 4:30, he had his hair cut and then we walked to the river.'

The eighth of August. 'Krishnaji dictated the eighth Letters to the Schools, and I typed it before lunch. Krishnaji and I walked to the river and up a bit, talking more of what he was calling "an ashram" in Ojai. I spoke to Dorothy at Brockwood by telephone. She and Montague reached there yesterday.'

August ninth. 'It was foggy in the early morning, so I didn't have an early walk. Krishnaji dictated the ninth Letters to the Schools. I marketed. Nadia Kossiakof came to tea. Krishnaji and I walked to the river. I telephoned the Marogers about the dates of a stay in France.'

The tenth of August. 'Krishnaji and I went at 8:15 a.m. to Dr. Steiger, where Krishnaji had a fasting blood sugar test. It was 100. We came back to breakfast, and then Krishnaji dictated the tenth Letters to the Schools. At 4 p.m., we went back for a post-prandial blood sugar count, which was 140. In consulting with the doctor, we decided that, though readings were within the normal range, Krishnaji will stay on a low-sugar diet. We walked to the river. Vanda telephoned. She will arrive late in two days' time.'

The eleventh. 'Krishnaji dictated the eleventh Letters to the Schools. It was a warm day. At 4 p.m., I went to Bank Cantonal for the annual review of the Alzina account with Mr. Liechti, the bank manager. I came back and walked to the river with Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure.'

August twelfth. 'Krishnaji dictated the twelfth Letters to the Schools. I marketed, sent a wedding present to Ariane Maroger, the Marogers' eldest daughter, and then brought Nadia Kossiakof up to lunch. It was a hot day. Krishnaji and I walked in the woods, and he talked more of a study center. Coming back, we met Vanda, who has arrived from Florence with a young Canadian, Susan Howard.'

There isn't anything very notable for the next two days, but on August fifteenth, 'We said goodbye to Vanda and Fosca, and Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I drove via the Col de Pillon to Aigle, the autoroute, then getting off at Morges, went along the Route du Lac to the Geneva airport. Krishnaji and I took Swiss Air at 13:55 p.m. to Heathrow. Dr. Parchure was on a later flight. Dorothy brought us back to Brockwood. John King waited for Dr. Parchure. Brockwood is beautiful. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked with the dogs in the grove. I spoke to Mary Links.'

The sixteenth. 'I spent much of the day unpacking, and settling us back into Brockwood. Jean-Michel telephoned about a likely place for Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I to stay near Blois. We will go there on September twentieth. We had a good walk in the afternoon around the fields. We both slept well, and I feel very well here.'

The next few days are quiet—the Bohms come to lunch, on one of our walks we inspected the flourishing vegetable garden and on another, the marquee that was put up for the upcoming Brockwood talks. I'm also. As usual, doing errands and Krishnaji is resting.

The twentieth of August. 'Another day of rest for Krishnaji, but a day of desk work for me. Krishnaji is reading The Elder Brother, the biography of Leadbeater, and is appalled at what went on.' [Chuckles.] 'Anneke, Frances arrived in the afternoon.'

Again, it is quiet for several days, but on the twenty-fourth, 'Krishnaji and I took the 9:46 a.m. train to London. Joe met us and drove us to the eye doctor, Mr. P.D. Trevor Roper, where Krishnaji had a glaucoma and field of vision test. There is no glaucoma, but there is the beginning of cataracts. Joe had fetched Mary, and then they came for us and Mary lunched with Krishnaji and me at Fortnum's. We talked about the Leadbeater book. After lunch, Krishnaji and I went to Hatchards, then to Huntsman, where Krishnaji had a fitting and ordered material for Dorothy. We caught a taxi and got to Waterloo and back to Brockwood by 6:30 p.m.'

The next day, 'I took the 9:03 a.m. back to London, went to Harrods for a duvet, and then to Hermès, and to the hairdresser for a haircut. I took the 3:18 p.m. back.'

The next day, I seem to mostly be getting the guest rooms ready, then, on the twenty-seventh, 'I went to meet the Herzbergers at the Petersfield bus stop. Hans is here for a day before going to Canada. Radhika, and their two daughters, Sunanda and Maya, are to stay here till September ninth. They are all four in the West Wing dining room. People are arriving for the talks, including Dr. Lichti, who came in the evening and is in the West Wing guest room.'

August twenty-eighth. 'It was a clear, lovely day. Krishnaji gave his first Brockwood talk at 11:30 a.m. in the tent. It was a very fine one.[3] We had fruit and salad in our kitchen, and then finished lunch in the food tent. I sat with Pascaline, and Madrisa Samuel, and Magdalina, the Polish woman who arrived in the night from Poland after getting a permit to come.'

S: She was an academic, wasn't she?

M: Yes.

S: Which is how she could get permits to leave the country. She would say there was a conference, she needed to attend, yes.

M: Yes. That's right. 'After a nap. Krishnaji, Dorothy and I walked.'

August twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji slept well, nine hours. He gave his second Brockwood talk. Mary and Joe were there and came up afterward for food and salad in the West Wing kitchen. Then we all went to the tent to eat the next course. While Krishnaji took a nap, Mary, Joe, Scott, and I ran a videotape of old films that were found in the Pine Cottage go-down cellar.'

S: Oh, yes, I remember those.

M: 'They were from the 1924 and 1926 Ommen and Adyar meetings. Mary's mother was in them and Mary herself as a young girl. We had tea back in the kitchen. Then the Linkses left and Krishnaji, Dorothy, Radhika, and I went for a walk.'

S: Before you go on, it's worth mentioning these if you don't remember them. In the go-down, under here where we're now sitting, when the Foundation got possession of Pine Cottage, someone discovered these old canisters of film, and it was that terribly combustible film. What was that film called?

M: Yes. You're not allowed to keep them anymore.

S: Exactly!

M: Nitrate film.

S: Nitrate film. It's highly combustible; I mean, it spontaneously combusts.

M: It used to be the old way—all movies were made of that. And they are so dangerous that the Academy of Motion Picture Arts can't keep any of the early films they have in their Beverly Hills offices because Beverly Hills has an ordinance against keeping any nitrate films in Beverly Hills. It's that dangerous.

S: Yes, they're really explosive, and all these early films are now kept in some munitions place. So these fire bombs, really, had spent all those decades in the hot cellar underneath this wooden building. Why they didn't go up is a miracle. And when they were found, they were immediately transferred onto modern film stock and also onto video. But it's just a miracle that they didn't burst into flame. Included in that footage, there's the 1925 Jubilee of the Theosophical Society, and there is also Krishnaji reading the "Dissolution of the Order of the Star" in 1929.

M: Yes. And there are lots of pictures of people coming out of castle Eerde, crossing the moat.

S: Yes. Yes. And Mary Links was thrilled to see it again because she had been there. [Both chuckle.]

M: The next day. 'I typed questions for Krishnaji's question-and-answer meeting tomorrow. There were heavy showers, but Krishnaji, Dr. Lichti, Dorothy, and I walked anyway, pausing under trees when it was at its worst. Krishnaji put his hands on Felix Greene.' Felix Greene, has he appeared before?

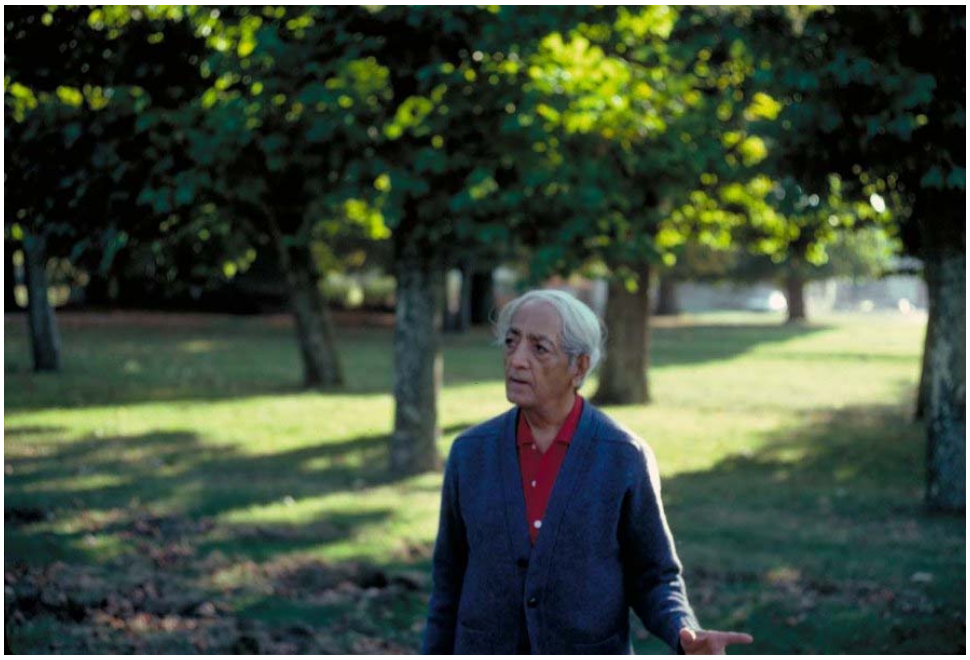
S: Yes. He was the filmmaker who specialized in China.

M: Yes. He lived in China. And…

S: He was a great apologist for Mao. We have talked about him.

M: Yes. And his wife, Elena Greene, was at Brockwood for quite a while, do you remember? She worked in the garden and did things. But he had something awfully wrong with him, I've forgotten what.

August thirty-first. 'Krishnaji held the first question-and-answer session, and answered four questions. As usual, we had fruit and salad upstairs, and then went back to the tent for the hot food. We walked in the afternoon with Dorothy.'



There wasn't much the next day, but on September second, 'Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer meeting, answering six of the questions handed to him. As usual, we had fruit and salad upstairs, then returned to the tent for the hot food. After lunch, Krishnaji told David Bohm about the study center plan, and I telephoned Erna in Ojai about it. She thinks we could start it at Arya Vihara. It was a lovely day. I spoke to Betsy in the evening. She is sad about Ingrid Bergman, who died last night.' They were friends, and she lived next door to Betsy.

Krishnaji rested on the third, but on the fourth, 'Krishnaji gave the third Brockwood talk; a deeply moving one.[4] At 4 p.m., I talked to Mr. and Mrs. Minke from Australia, who want to show Krishnaji tapes, but are not connected with the Australian committee. Krishnaji, as he has each day, put his hands on Felix Greene. We went with Dorothy for a short walk as Krishnaji was tired. I talked to Sofia Sanguinetti after supper, and went briefly to the campers' meeting in the food tent at which Felix Greene spoke on "What's to prevent war?" Krishnaji watched the Jaws film on television.'

The fifth of September. 'The weather stayed good. Krishnaji gave his fourth talk. He spoke in deep, quiet, remote, and immensely moving [5]way. It again gave me the feeling of "listening to the voice of God." When I told him that afterward in our kitchen where we have fruit and salad before returning to the tent, in answering why I was half in tears, he patted my shoulder and dismissed it.' [Both chuckle.] Oh goodness. 'Varajum brought Krishnaji's passport with the French visa.' He was an Indian who worked in the Indian embassy. And he nicely offered to get the French visa for me. 'Krishnaji put his hands on Felix Greene. He gave interviews to an Italian psychiatrist, Dr. Manfredini. I talked to Nicole Philippeau after supper. The gathering went well. Krishnaji's health was good throughout the talks, but he became hoarse afterward. Dr. Parchure thought it was fatigue and gave him Ayurvedic pills against throat symptoms. Dr. Lichti had been our guest in the West Wing and she and Parchure conferred medically and at length.'

The next day. 'People are leaving. Krishnaji is tired, slightly hoarse, but was up for lunch and talked briefly to an Egyptian couple. He didn't go for a walk. I cleaned the spare room so Radhika could move in there until she and the children leave on Thursday. In the evening, I talked to Magdalina Jasciuska.'

Krishnaji in France (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The seventh. 'Krishnaji is a bit hoarse, but wanted to go to London anyway. Mary and Joe met us and took us to Huntsman, where Krishnaji had a fitting on the new suit and ordered a pair of beige corduroy trousers. I walked to fetch an Hermès skirt, then we walked to Fortnum, where we lunched with Mary. At 3 p.m., Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt and I bought two pair of shoes at Ferragamo and picked up a package from Rita Zampese at the Lufthansa office. Joe and Mary met us at Truefitt and drove us to Waterloo. Joe gave Krishnaji a copy of his book on Canaletto.' He was a big expert on Canaletto. 'We caught the 3:50 p.m. train, changed at Haslemere, and were back at Brockwood by 5:30 p.m. Krishnaji was none the worse from the trip.'

The next two days for me are errands, desk work, and packing; and for Krishnaji they are seeing people.

The tenth of September. 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, Anneke, and I went to Heathrow. Anneke waited for her flight to Holland. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I were flying to France for a holiday. Krishnaji, in the crowded waiting room, stood apart as much as he could, looking elegant, superb, everything rare and aristocratic. He sat between Dorothy and me, and we ate careful sandwiches from Brockwood. Then, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I flew on British Air to Paris, arriving at 2:30 p.m. Jean-Michel met us at Charles de Gaulle in his Citroën and drove us to where we were staying near Blois and not far from his home, La Mahaudière. He kindly found and negotiated this place for us after discovering that the Dordogne, our original objective, was booked in all the suggested places.' He chose this place for us. 'The proprietor here, a Monsieur Chevignè, normally gives only breakfast with the rooms, but agreed to give us all meals. Tina, who formerly worked for the Marogers, and is used to vegetarians, has come to cook until the fifteenth. Krishnaji and I have rooms on the ground floor done in le style Ancien, and we share a rather dank bathroom. Dorothy is above us in a redone room with a better bath. After initial squeamishness, we decided to keep these rooms. The Marogers have gone to endless effort to arrange everything. Marie-Bertrande and Daphne came over while we were having supper. Marie-Bertrande looks under pressure from the wedding of Ariane, a week from today. Daphne is working in a hospital in Blois and looks blooming. Jean-Michel has kindly lent us his Citroën while we are here. The chateau looks not unlike a French version of Brockwood. A cedar stands on the lawn. But the parkland is straw-colored from a drought.'

So for September eleventh we have the big diary again. 'We slept well, and Krishnaji rested in bed until lunchtime. It is totally quiet, and the prospect that nothing has to be done is blissful. I hold to the hope that Krishnaji will like it, though it is not the Dordogne, his choice; and that this will give him a deep store of rest from this summer's talks and before the rigors of India.' Marie-Bertrande and Jean-Michel came over and we walked in the Forêt de Russy, which adjoins this property. It was hot and dry as there has been a long drought this summer. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I dined in the dining room. And so to bed after watching news on television.'

The twelfth of September. 'We have struck a dry year here, which has meant, so far, that the forest seems unalive. There is no blossoming smells of leaves, of forest earth, no moving from the coolness of shade to a mellow sun. It is all one day—hot and motionless. It was too hot in the sun for Krishnaji to reach the woods, and the shade was only a small improvement. Krishnaji walked ahead and took up a branch to clear spider webs, which were everywhere, but the walking was rather a chore instead of a pleasure. The Marogers are proud of the weather, "so warm and clear" and "good weather for guests and also for Ariane's wedding next weekend." Our more northern blood remembers the cool, damp aliveness of Brockwood walking. I seem to have lost all tolerance for heat. It exhausts me and makes me very uncomfortable. But Krishnaji is sleeping well here, and relaxes in a way he finds difficult at Brockwood. This place is almost very nice—our shared bathroom is rather dank and needs redoing, but the rooms are comfortable, and, so far, Tina has cooked excellent meals. The proprietors, Monsieur Chevignè and Madame Duflot, have taken on quite a task of running a large place without help. It must be a struggle, but so far, all is well for us. I can clean and launder, and get Krishnaji's breakfast tray, etcetera—i.e., function, which is my first concern. He said this morning, "What would I do without you? I couldn't," which made a warm glow in the middle of my chest, though I know it has small significance. Dorothy must be getting some much-needed rest. Krishnaji had slept well, and Dorothy and I had a leisurely breakfast in the dining room. There is one other table for guests, a young couple who murmur to each other so low that one cannot tell if it is in German or English. We didn't see the Marogers today as they are in wedding preparation, and it was too warm for more than a walk twice around the drive.'

September thirteenth. 'We had a quiet, lazy morning. Krishnaji spoke briefly to the paraplegic daughter of Madame Duflot, Valerie Lammouy. Jean-Michel came by in their

Opel and I asked him to exchange it for their fine and more complicated Citroën. We drove it to a part of the Forêt de Russy for a walk in a shady allèe. It is still very hot, but it cools at night and we sleep well.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji slept well. Me too. It is another warm day. After lunch, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I in the Marogers' Opel went to Blois for Dorothy's train ticket to Paris and Krishnaji's and my air reservations to London on October first. Dorothy telephoned Brockwood to see if all was well. I cashed travel checks. We did small errands in the heat, then came back, hot and tired. We didn't walk. Early to bed.'

The fifteenth. 'Krishnaji slept very well. Dorothy says she slept ten hours. I sleep and wake and sleep. I seem to have long hours of sleep, but I am not totally relaxed because there is a lurking "on guard" feeling, a sense of responsibility for the way things work out. In the late afternoon, Jean-Michel came and drove us to their home, La Mahaudière, where, with Marie-Bertrande, Daphne, Diane, and Saturday's bride, Ariane, we had sorbet made from homegrown strawberries, and then went for a walk in the shade of their woods. Dorothy and I saw Ariane's wedding dress, which is very pretty. Krishnaji had sat on the floor with his sorbet, quietly observing, aware of the characters of the family. Jean-Michel drove us back and we found Patrice Ferrand, Suzanne van der Straten's nephew and a former Brockwood Park student, with his young wife. They had just arrived to spend the night.'

September sixteenth. 'Krishnaji had indigestion in the night. Also, he had cramps in his feet around 6 a.m., got up, fainted, and somehow hit his left forehead, left shoulder and hip. There is a bump the size of a nickel an inch above his left eyebrow. At first he said he was quite alright and we should go ahead with the plan we had to take Dorothy to see châteaux, and that I mustn't tell her what had happened. I gave him arnica, but he eventually canceled our plans, and is staying in bed. He later admitted it was a good idea to rest. He is all right now, but what worries me is his fainting when all alone. Why? And the fact that he didn't call me. "Of course not," he said—his inevitable comment, which makes me uneasy. I was only about three yards away, but the door was closed and he made no sound. Now the door stays open and I must figure out a way at Brockwood to not be cut off. Anyway, he stayed in bed, reading, and it was just as well that we were not on the road to châteaux anyway, as it was very hot. I drove in to Blois to get him the Herald Tribune, Time, and Newsweek, and to locate the train station so I could get Dorothy there on Sunday morning. When I got back, she and I went over to the farmhouse to talk to Madame Duflot's paraplegic daughter, Valerie Lammouy. She has read Krishnaji books and would like to come to visit Brockwood. Krishnaji is better and looks all right.'

S: Do you remember how anxious you felt when Krishnaji would faint and not bother to tell you about it and not feel he had to…?

M: Yes. "Don't make a fuss about it," was his attitude.

S: Yes, and what did you feel about that?

M: It worried me.

S: I want you to remember this for when…

M: When what?

S: When you sometimes fall and don't bother telling anybody to call me and don't feel you need to tell me, until the next time we speak. I don't hear about it, sometimes for days.

M: Well, the only time I fell recently was on that—over there and you were in…I thought what can you do about it, and…

S: I know. But I can phone somebody, I can make sure things happen, that's what I do. Or when you faint out in front of the school and I don't hear about it till days afterwards.

M: Well, I fainted not near the school—well, yes, in front of the school. There were only, uh…it was a weekend of…

S: I know, but I didn't hear about it for days. [Both chuckle.] I'm just making a point.

M: I came to with about eight people around me who had sent for the, what do you call them?

S: …paramedics. Yes.

M: The paramedics, who came and took my blood pressure right away.

S: I know. I'm just making a point about how terrible it feels not to be contacted. [Gently laughs.]

M: I was there and in charge and it was my responsibility. You are in Portland, and though you are dear and a concerned friend…

S: I know, I know. But that doesn't make me feel any less badly—I'm just making a point. [Both chuckle.] Alright, we can go on with the seventeenth.

M: Alright. Now, the seventeenth of September. 'Krishnaji slept well, and was feeling well. He wanted to go on with our châteaux tour, and as it was a little cooler, we set off in the Maroger's Opel for Chaumont, which regrettably closed its gates at 11:30 a.m.,' [both laugh] 'so we had only a glance at its battlements from the road and went on to Amboise. An old Michelin guide suggested that the Auberge du Mail which has one star, and, though it was nothing remarkable, we lunched pleasantly and at leisure with a bottle of Pouilly-Fumè of which Krishnaji had a little in his Perrier.'

S: [laughs] I know.

M: 'I felt very relaxed and in France. There was the ease, too, of shepherding Krishnaji and Dorothy on a pleasant outing. We went up to Amboise and looked at the outside of the château. We had read the guidebook of the who and when of life in these houses, and we drove on to Chenonceau—which is the loveliest one. In spite of the warmth of the day and a fair number of tourists, Krishnaji not only wanted to walk to the Château but to go inside the ground floor. When we were here years ago, he had no interest in going in.' Oh, that's right. We had been there before. 'But whether to give Dorothy a look at it or because of all the reading out loud we have done getting here, he said, "Let's look," and we did. There were too many people to stay very long, so we drove back via Montrichard, Pont Levoy, etcetera and got back by 5 p.m, tired but relaxed. We were all glad we went, and Krishnaji is none the worse for it.'

September eighteen. 'It was a quiet day for us. The marriage of Ariane Maroger was today, but we didn't go. We had a quiet day of rest, and in late afternoon, walked in a shady allèe in the woods beside the house.'

The next day. 'I took Dorothy to the Blois train station, and persuaded a porter to carry her suitcase to the second quay. I stayed with her until her 12:45 p.m. train came, and she went off to Paris, where Gisela Elmenhorst was to meet her and get her to Roissy and her flight to Heathrow. I think these nine days of holiday and rest have done her good. Krishnaji wants her to trade in her Cortina and, with another car she got from her brother, and with our adding something, have Dorothy get a good new car. We said we would have further discussion of this when we get back to Brockwood. In the afternoon clouds formed. Thunder growled. There was lightning and then rain came at last. A heavy showering. After a while, it eased and we went for a walk around the large lawn and driveway. The air is clear and alive again.'

S: Alright. We've run out of tape, so this is a good time for us to end. But it's interesting to note that in 1982, Krishnaji was seriously thinking about an adult center, and that he didn't think of Brockwood as the first place for it. He thought of Ojai and Rajghat as the first places for it; but, in fact, it was Brockwood that first did it.

M: Yes. It was Brockwood.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] For a link to the video of the third Saanen talk of 1982.

[2] For the video of the first question and answer meeting of Saanen 1982.

[3] For the video of the first Brockwood talk of 1982.

[4] For the video of the third Brockwood talk of 1982.

[5] For the video of the fourth Brockwood talk of 1982.

Issue 73: September 20, 1982 to December 31, 1982

This issue is short. Krishnaji and Mary are together for only about a month of the time covered by this issue, and since this memoir is meant to be about what it was like for Mary to be with Krishnaji, more than two months of this period have been edited out. Nevertheless, Mary continues to write in her diary every day, so we do know about her life when Krishnaji was in India.

Editing out the months when Mary was not with Krishnaji is not necessarily correct, because even when they were on different continents, it isn't completely true that "Mary was not with Krishnaji." She carefully tracks his movements, so we know when he traveled from one part of India to another. We know when he gives his talks and seminars in different venues. We get Krishnaji's news, which he writes to her in his daily letters to her and she relays in her diaries, or someone coming from India to America or Europe who has seen him, calls her at Krishnaji's request with his news.

Krishnaji and Mary send telegrams to each other about urgent matters, and Krishnaji even calls her once from Madras to resolve a matter in Australia. And, of course, whether she is in Europe or America, she is constantly working on behalf of the Foundations or on his behalf. She flies to New York to make arrangements for Krishnaji's talks there the following spring. She attends endless meetings of the schools and Foundations in England and America. She organizes videotaped dialogues to take place between Krishnaji and well-known intellectuals. She arranges to have things brought to Krishnaji that he requests by people visiting India. And every two weeks, Mary sends off to the schools one of the Letters to the Schools that Krishnaji had dictated earlier. Mary is also actively supporting Krishnaji's wish to create adult study centers with discussions at Brockwood and Ojai, but at Ojai, she is also looking for ways to transform Arya Vihara and to get donations. And, of course, there is the never-ending nonsense of the court case. It seems right to edit out all this, but it also seems right to mention it.

Mary: We begin today on September twentieth, 1982, and we're still in France on our vacation. 'It is a little cooler. Krishnaji had foot cramp in the night and was awake quite a time. I went to Blois for newspapers. Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrande came at 5 p.m., and we walked in the woods. The wedding apparently went beautifully, and they seem happy. After they left, Krishnaji and I talked over our leaving before the first of October. Our earlier discussions about making an annual holiday in France with a group of six or eight faded when Krishnaji realized the costs of travel and hotels yesterday as I paid the bill for our first nine days here. It was not excessive by today's standards, but he now thinks we can do what he wanted at Brockwood instead. Nevertheless, as to here and now, we've had a good rest and both feel like leaving soon. The crummy bathroom adds to the impetus. I looked upstairs, but aside from the room that Dorothy had, none has a private bath. It is silly how such a small thing counts.' [S chuckles.]

September twenty-first. 'We made the decision to advance our departure from October first to next Monday, the twenty-seventh. So, I went to Blois to change the tickets to the twenty-seventh. I telephoned Brockwood with a message about the change for Dorothy, and then rang the Marogers about the same. It also simplifies things as we can all go to Paris together on Monday. The Marogers will go from Paris to the ferry for England, as they are taking Diane to Brockwood to become a student, and we will go to the airport. I bought books in French for Krishnaji as he has decided he wants to do some reading in French, and some running shoes for him, which he likes, size thirty-nine.' [Both chuckle.] 'I also got some Porthault spray'—Porthault is a really wonderful linen shop, but they make a nice spray to spray in closets—'and some Roger et Gallet oeillet soap.' Oeillet is the French word for carnations. 'I bought it to subdue our smelly bath here.' [Both chuckle.] 'I made it back for lunch, and we rested all the afternoon and walked in a light rain in the Forêt de Russy.' That was the one next door. 'The forest is awakening in the rain. We had a light supper and went to bed early.'

September the twenty-second. 'I gave Krishnaji a flu vaccine.' Did I, now? Well. 'We have had vitamin B shots with us, but he has put off taking them and I am relieved as I don't like doing it.' I was trained in a hospital how to do this during the war, so it isn't quite as awful as it sounds for anyone reading this. It's very easy to give shots to a stranger, but [chuckles] I never liked stabbing people who are close. I used to do the blood bank and I had to test people's hemoglobin, which meant sticking a thing into their finger. I did it all day long, but when a friend came by, I got squeamish. [Chuckles.]

Scott: I completely understand.

M: Well, you would, as you have a thing about it.

S: Yes, I have a thing about needles in any case, but [laughs] I'd much rather get a shot than see someone I care for get one.

M: Anyway, you understand.

S: I'm very sympathetic.

M: 'We had a quiet day and walked a long way down the dirt road in the forest. There was an odd atmosphere there, which both of us felt. The trees seem aloof, unfriendly. It is silent, without birds or the sounds of moving leaves. We are intruders. Krishnaji said, "I would be nervous to walk here alone." But the forest affected both of us differently from other landscapes. It is beautiful, but the mood can darken and something of a menace is somewhere there.'

The twenty-third. 'The weather is cooler. We drove to La Mahaudière and lunched with the Marogers, Mr. and Mrs. Salzman, Marie-Bertrande's stepmother, Madame Embericos, and Diane.' The Salzmans were an American couple who were friends of the Marogers; they had a house nearby, at least temporarily, but lived mostly in California.

S: Yes, I remember. He had something to do with television or something.

M: He was vaguely with movies, but retired. 'Mrs. Salzman had cooked what she called a "Jain Indian meal," which she learned how to do in New York.' [Chuckles.] 'We saw the videotape of Ariane's wedding, done by Mr. Salzman. Krishnaji's view that weddings are a lot of fuss over nothing was kept low-key.' [Both laugh.] 'He told Brahmin stories at lunch. We left at 4 p.m., both tired from lack of a rest after lunch, and as neither of us wanted to go into the dark woods, we walked around the front of the château. Both are glad to be returning to Brockwood.'

September twenty-fourth. 'I went to Blois to cash travel checks. Fetched The Herald Tribune and Time magazine, and some Roger et Gallet toilet soap for Krishnaji, and put petrol in the Marogers' Opel. It's a rather cold day. I couldn't sleep until two last night. Too much coffee at every breakfast here, perhaps. I slept after lunch. I have finished a book by Mary McCarthy called Cannibals and Missionaries, and am skimming through an autobiography of Jimmy Granger that I picked up at Heathrow.' That's Stewart Granger, but Jimmy to friends. 'We walked on the forest road. Krishnaji said, "We mustn't be afraid of it," and Krishnaji addressed the trees, saying, "We are friendly people. We mean you no harm. You mustn't mind our coming." The trees have an odd air of watching, like the cows and sheep at Brockwood, who stare at us intently.' [Both laugh.] Oh, goodness.

S: Now, again, with the view that no detail being too small—I remember Krishnaji had the Roger et Gallet soap. He would usually have sandalwood.

M: Yes, that soap was often from India. People gave…

S: But I remember he also had Roger et Gallet sandalwood soap.

M: Yes, well, he liked sandalwood.

S: Yes, and what else did he like? He liked another one.

M: Well, I always bought Carnation Roger et Gallet because I liked it, and it's not too feminine or too anything. It just smells of carnations, which is not a cloying smell.

S: Yes, yes.

M: It's a kind of clean smell, yes. Clean.

S: Geranium, did he have geranium?

M: Geranium would be acceptable. I wouldn't ever buy for anyone, except a woman, rose or something like lilac or lily of the valley. Those are more feminine soaps.

S: Yes, yes. Krishnaji also had powder that he would use that was geranium.

M: Powder? What for?

S: Just a body powder, an English make, in a white tin with green lettering.

M: That would be from me, um, oh, that herbal store on the corner of…

S: Culpeper's.

M: That's it.

September twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji says he now thinks he knows how he fell a week ago, that the rug slipped. But, when I asked him at the time if it were the rug, he had said no. At lunch, he reported that he had had threatening dreams every night here. "What kind?" I asked. He said that in the dreams, he has to speak and is late; he is walking and there is a body of water suddenly that gets wider. He wonders what it is. Are the two Rajagopals threatening him? "Those two would be the only ones," he said. He says he can close it off and not allow the dreams, but doesn't want to close it off. We spoke of the case and that it is probably a ploy by Rajagopal to speak now, via his lawyers, of a settlement in order to drag things out some more. Mrs. Vigeveno's deposition has been put off because of this, which has enabled him once more to avoid our motions. Krishnaji said, "Rajagopal is playing a dirty game"…"He thinks I've done something to him. What have I done to him? I've done nothing." At lunch, I said that Rajagopal responds only to being pushed. Krishnaji said, "We must push him." I asked what should guide us this winter when he is in India and communication is difficult, and Krishnaji replied, "Whatever you think should be done." We read most of the day and walked to the road and back.' And that finishes the big diary for the year.

S: Alright, so it's all the little diary now.

M: Yes. The twenty-sixth of September. 'There was rain in the morning, so we stayed in and read. It cleared in the afternoon and Jean-Michel took us to the other side of the Loire, where we had a nice walk. There were rainbows.'

September twenty-seven. 'We were packed and ready when the Marogers arrived at 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji and I drove with Jean-Michel, Diane, and Daphne to Paris. Marie-Bertrande went later on a train. We had picnic sandwiches in the Bois de Vincennes. Then they took us to Charles de Gaulle Airport, where Krishnaji and I took the Air France 3:30 p.m. flight to London. Dorothy met us in a car she has acquired from her brother and we came back to beautiful Brockwood a little after 6 p.m. It is good to be back.'

The next day, 'The Marogers arrive with Diane. Marie-Bertrande and Jean-Michel are in the West Wing, and Diane is in the student room she will have. I did much laundry and house things. It was a windy day. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Jean-Michel, and I went for a walk around the fields.'

September twenty-nine. 'In the morning, I telephoned Krishnaji's dentist, Mr. Thompson, about Krishnaji's bridge, and he suggested an appointment today, so we took the 11:45 a.m. train.' [Chuckles.] And then the standard: 'Mary and Joe met us at Waterloo. Krishnaji and I lunched with Mary at Fortnum's. Then Joe took us to Mr. Thompson, and then to Huntsman briefly, and then back to Waterloo.' [Both chuckle.]

S: I can't remember whether we've mentioned it or not, we probably have. But the same thing was always ordered for lunch at Fortnum's, and you always had the same table.

M: Yes, it was. Yes, the corner table.

S: I know we described that, but I can't remember if we mentioned that the same thing was always ordered for lunch, which was the flan.

M: Yes. The flan. A cheese flan.

S: Yes, cheese and onion, wasn't it?

M: Well, there would be onion in a good cheese flan.

S: Yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: And salad and…

S: Potatoes.

M: Yes.

S: Boiled potatoes, usually.

M: Yes, I guess. I don't remember the potatoes, but there would be. [Both chuckle.] You have a memory for detail.

S: For food.

M: Oh, that's right, that too.

September thirtieth. 'I took the 9:46 a.m. train back to London, then went by underground for a haircut, then had salad and cheese with Mary and Joe at their flat. After lunch, I went to Marks & Spencer's for a cardigan for Krishnaji, then walked on to the new Louis Vuitton store on Bond Street for an all-purpose shoulder bag.' It's in the other room.

S: Aha, that's the one that you always use.

M: 'I bought cheese at Paxton and returned to Waterloo by tube, catching the 4:20 p.m. back to Petersfield.'

October first. ‘The school term began. Krishnaji dictated letters. I went to Alresford with Marie-Bertrande on errands. After a nap, Krishnaji, Marie-Bertrande, Dorothy, and I walked with the dogs.’

The second of October: ‘It rained. I typed the first of Krishnaji’s new series of Letters to the Schools, which is to go out twice a month to all of Krishnaji’s schools on the first and fifteenth of every month. I attended the 3 p.m. staff meeting. Krishnaji and I walked in the rain. Jackie Kornfeld telephoned me from New York. Merali arrived.’

October third. ‘Krishnaji spoke to the school the first time this school year. It was a lovely, still afternoon with no wind but some sun. We walked.’

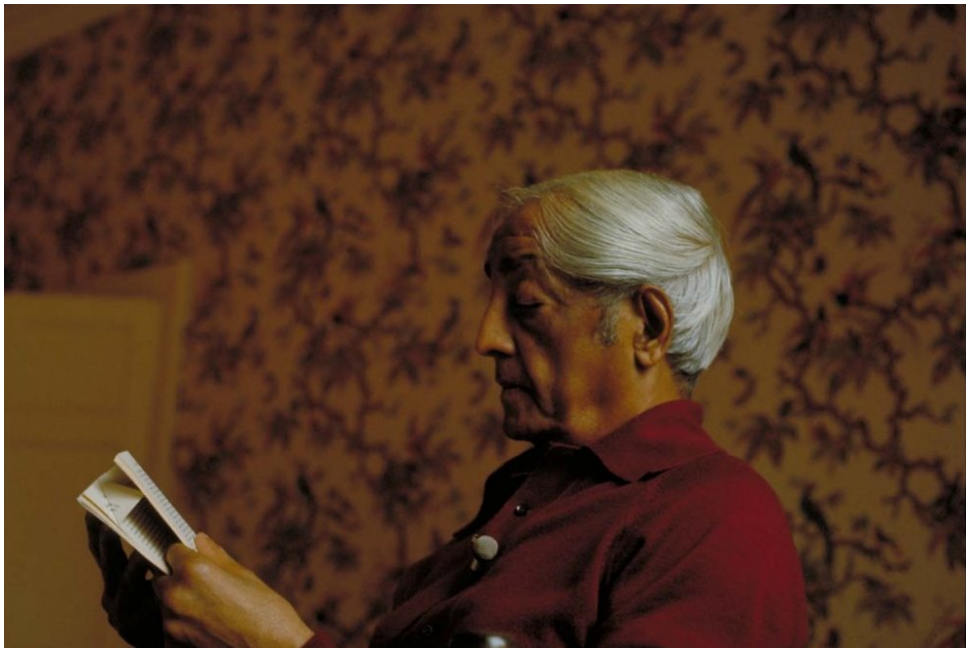
There is nothing of significance the next day, but on the fifth of October, ‘Krishnaji spoke to the students again. David Shainberg arrived. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, David, Dorothy, Marie-Bertrande, Jean-Michel, and I walked, then looked at a Volvo car demonstrated to Dorothy.’ Oh, yes, Krishnaji wanted to help Dorothy get a new car. ‘After supper, at the table, I discussed with Shainberg, Merali, and others the idea for a Krishnamurti study center.’

The sixth of October. ‘Krishnaji and I went to London. Joe and Mary met us. While Krishnaji had a Huntsman fitting, Joe took me to his shop, where I tried on a silk raincoat. He dropped me at Fortnum’s, where Mary, who had met Krishnaji at Huntsman, lunched with Krishnaji and me. Krishnaji and I went to Hatchards for detective novels and I got Fleur Cowles’s new book. We walked to Burberry, where Krishnaji got a windbreaker. I looked at raincoats but decided on the one from Joe’s store.’

S: Which store is that?

M: Well, he had a furrier store, but he sold also a raincoat you could put over a fur.

S: Where was this store?



M: It was over near Harrods in Knightsbridge. ‘Joe and Mary met us there and drove us to Waterloo. Krishnaji suggested a three-to-five-minute deliberate quieting of my body each morning, to perhaps quiet my fidgety hands.’ I don’t remember that.

The seventh of October: ‘I went with Marie-Bertrande and Daphne to Winchester on shopping errands, where I found an antique dressing table mirror as a present for the Marogers to thank them for all they did to make our France vacation so pleasant. They all left for France in the afternoon. Diane now is on her own as a student here. Sarjit Siddoo and her husband were here for a brief visit. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Shainberg, and I walked around the fields.’

October eighth. ‘At noon, Krishnaji spoke to the staff. If one goes all the way in seeing one branch of conditioning, then one can see and be free of all the others.’ You see, this is what he said, and this is what none of these people in these discussions I attend can understand. They think you have to do it and do it and do it and do it, and there's no wiping something free.

S: Yes, and if there's no end, then that's the perfect excuse for doing nothing.

Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: Well, it also means that what Krishnaji said is just understood on the top of your mind, you know. You're not seeing in the sense that Krishnaji was talking about. I try to say that in the discussions here. 'At 4 p.m., a Saab car was demonstrated to Dorothy and everybody. Dorothy likes it. David Shainberg is doing the bargaining with the car salesman for Dorothy.' [S laughs.] He said you don't know how to talk to salesmen, you have to bargain with them. [Both chuckle.] 'At 5:15 p.m., I went to a staff meeting.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji slept well but decided to spend the day in bed. David Shainberg finally succeeded in making a deal for the Saab for Dorothy. In the afternoon, the Bohms and Maurice Wilkins arrived to stay till tomorrow. The Bohms are in the West Wing.'

The tenth of October. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school at noon, after which the Bohms and Wilkins left. I telephoned Amanda after hearing a BBC report of a fire in the Santa Monica mountains. Phil is in Chicago till Tuesday, but George'—that's her brother—'and the gardener are there. The fire is in back of Pepperdine University'—that's across the street from their place—'but she thinks it is controlled. Krishnaji talked to a man from Oxford and later to Shainberg. We had a short walk. I discussed video matters with Merali, Shainberg, Scott, and Dorothy.'

October eleventh: 'Before he and Merali left, Shainberg gave Krishnaji a gamma globulin injection, two vials, to last six months.' Shainberg was a doctor, after all. You have to be a doctor before you get to be a psychiatrist, but he was so squeamish about giving the shot. [Both chuckle.] He hadn't done it since medical school or something, I guess. I said, "You're a doctor, you've got to do it." [Both laugh.] 'We watched the raising of the Tudor warship Mary Rose from the Solent on television. Scott came up to talk to Krishnaji and me about his work on video and teaching. Dorothy joined the discussion. In the afternoon, Krishnaji talked to Harsh and Claire with Dorothy. At 5 p.m. there was a school meeting.' You can perhaps enlarge on this? Do you remember?

S: I don't remember it at all. [Both chuckle.] But one of the things I do remember was that the talks Krishnaji had, that you mentioned, with Harsh and Claire often were about their domestic squabbles, which somehow they kept expecting Krishnaji to resolve.

M: That's right. And I can't remember if they'd already had the child or not.

S: Oh yes, oh yes. They'd already had the child and that was partly why there was also occasional discussion of a school for small children.

M: And that was preceded by many discussions over whether staff should continue to be staff members if they had a child. The French couple—what was their name?—he taught yoga? Anyway, they had a child and went off to France, where he taught yoga.

S: Yes. Dorothy was dead set against staff having children, so when Joe and Carol had a child, they left. But Harsh and Claire stayed at Brockwood.

M: Yes, at least for a while.

October twelfth. 'Krishnaji talked to the students alone again, while I went to a staff meeting. After lunch, I went to Winchester on errands, but got back in time for a walk in the rain with Krishnaji and Dorothy.' I assume that whoever hears or reads these discussions realizes that if it rains, that didn't get you out of a walk.

S: [chuckles] Of course not.

M: Krishnaji would say, "Walk." [Both chuckle.] I would have stayed in, but that wasn't a choice.

October thirteenth: 'It was another rainy day. Krishnaji spent it in bed reading and sleeping. He had a good night's sleep, too. So, he was well rested. I worked at the desk all day and ate with him on trays.' That was the usual thing. We ate most of our meals on trays. Breakfast was always on trays.

S: Yes, in his room.

M: In his room.

S: He would sit in bed and you would sit in the red chair.

M: Yes, I would sit in the big red chair, yes. And we had the television convenient to both.

S: Yes, yes. Except in the morning, he would listen to the stereo.

M: Yes, well, I didn't eat breakfast with him in the morning, usually.

S: No, but the last couple of years, I did. Yes, yes. It was always music in the morning and the news in the evening on television.

M: News in the evening, that's right. Yes, he liked to listen to music in the morning. And always I'd ask him, "What would you like to hear?" "You choose," he would say. [Both chuckle.] Occasionally, he would specify: singing. He liked Joan Sutherland. He also liked Neapolitan songs sung by Pavarotti. [Chuckles.] They were exuberant.

October fourteenth. 'Jean-Michel arrived at 8 a.m. for an 11:30 a.m. trustee meeting. Mary and Joe came and brought the raincoat that I bought from Joe's store. Harsh and Stephen Smith attended as new temporary trustees.' Ah, so you and Ingrid were replaced as the temporary trustees. We were mistaken in saying before that you weren't. 'The meeting continued in the afternoon. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I took a short walk on the driveway and lane. The weather is cold.'

The fifteenth of October, 'was a cold, beautiful day. We took the 10:46 a.m. to London and got a taxi without waiting. Krishnaji had a fitting on a very handsome Huntsman suit. Rita Zampese met us at Huntsman and brought his Lufthansa ticket. Krishnaji and I lunched at Fortnum's and went to Hatchards. I dropped him at Mr. Thompson's at 3 p.m., then I went to the U.S. embassy to try to get an absentee ballot, but failed. I came back to the dentist. Krishnaji is getting a new bridge.' He had endless dentist appointments. 'We found a taxi quite easily and got the 4:20 p.m. back to Petersfield. We had also been to Asprey's for a new wallet for me.' I'm still using it. 'There was a plague of flies in Krishnaji's room in the evening. I had to spray poison, then vacuum and clean.' I think he had to sleep in the guest room. The ceiling was black with flies.

S: Yes, there was one very odd year with flies.

M: It doesn't happen anymore. Anyway, that was the fifteenth.

The sixteenth. 'Another rainy day. I drove Krishnaji and Dorothy to Winchester for Dorothy's fitting for two outfits. Krishnaji was overseeing the fitting. I parked the car with difficulty in the heavy traffic. I just briefly saw the outfits, then fetched the car, and came back for them. We got back to Brockwood in time for lunch. Mr. and Mrs. Salzman, who came from Pont Levoy with Jean-Michel, sat at Krishnaji's table. Krishnaji and I walked in the rain on the roads.'

October seventeenth. 'Krishnaji spoke to the whole school, and it was very good. Jean-Michel and the Salzmans left after lunch. There was a meeting without Krishnaji in the drawing room between the trustees and a group who will start a Krishnamurti Information Center in London. There was a short walk with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me. It rained on and off all day.'

The eighteenth of October. 'I did housekeeping and typing of Letters to the Schools. Krishnaji spoke to Harsh. He and Claire are separating. After the walk with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me, there was a school meeting followed by a viola recital by a guest.'

The next day. 'I went to Alresford on errands while Krishnaji spoke to students at noon. He also spoke to Harsh and Claire at 4:30 p.m. We had only a short walk before supper.'

October twentieth. 'Krishnaji and I took Scott with us to London. It was a rainy day, so I could wear my new raincoat. Joe met us and drove us all to Huntsman, which Scott wanted to see with Krishnaji.' [Both chuckle.] 'Then Krishnaji and I took a taxi to Mary and Joe's, where we lunched pleasantly with them. Krishnaji went with Joe to Mr. Thompson, where he got his new upper bridge, and Joe brought him back to the flat, where Mary and I had stayed and talked. Then Joe drove Krishnaji and me to Truefitt, where Krishnaji had his hair cut. I went to Fortnum's for chocolate presents for Krishnaji to take to India. Scott met Krishnaji at Truefitt, and then Joe met the three of us and drove us to Waterloo, where we caught the 4:50 p.m.'

The twenty-first of October: 'The Bohms came to spend the night. Krishnaji packed his clothes and I packed his vitamins and food additives. The afternoon was consumed in the Harsh and Claire problems: Krishnaji talked to her alone, then both of them, plus Dorothy and me. Then Krishnaji saw a Dutchman, Fritz someone, and Brian Jenkins, and it was made clear by Dorothy and me that Brockwood will not have any connection with any school he may start.' This was some Dutchman who wanted to start a school, and he was somehow connected to Brian Jenkins. 'Then there was a meeting with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Scott, Steven, Harsh, Ingrid, the Bohms, and Shakuntala about a study center at Brockwood. There was a staff meeting after supper.'

October twenty-second. 'In the Mercedes, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I drove through Romsey and the New Forest to a Saab garage, where Dorothy received her new car. Krishnaji drove back with her and I came on ahead, stopping at Alresford for brandy' [chuckles] 'for him to take to India.' That was for the medicinal use of brandy.

S: Oh, yes, Dr. Parchure insisted on it. I can't remember exactly what it was supposed to do, but Krishnaji was supposed to have a teaspoon of brandy in an incredibly weak tea in the afternoons before his walk. Afterwards, Krishnaji, on his walk, would say things like, "By Jove, this tea is really something." [Both laugh.]

M: 'We had a late lunch at Brockwood and we took a short walk with the dogs along the lane and driveway. I went to a staff meeting at 5 p.m. In the evening, we telephoned Vanda in Florence.'

October twenty-third. ‘Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I had a sandwich lunch in the West Wing kitchen at noon. Then we left at 12:30 p.m. in the Mercedes for Heathrow. On Lufthansa at 3 p.m., Krishnaji flew to Frankfurt to connect with a direct flight to Delhi, leaving at 5:30 p.m., and due at Delhi tomorrow morning at 6:10 a.m. Rita Zampese accompanied him to Frankfurt to see him safely onto the connecting flight in her capacity as a Lufthansa official. Dorothy and I drove back to Brockwood. In the evening, I went from Brockwood to a Glyndebourne performance of Don Giovanni in Southampton. There was a message on my return to telephone Erna. Rajagopal wants an immediate trial.’ [Both chuckle.] And now, I don’t see Krishnaji until he returns from India in the new year, but you see him in India, because I see a note about your taking his old passport to him, which he wanted to use instead of the diplomatic one that Pupul got for him.

S: Yes, but I wasn’t wise enough to make notes on that trip, so it is lost to history.

Issue 74: February 9, 1983 to April 29, 1983

The same introduction used for Issue 73 could be used for this issue—Krishnaji doesn't rejoin Mary until February, but even then, Mary is so caught up in the events of starting Krishnaji's stay in America, and of her being responsible for him again, that she only has time for her little diary until April seventeenth. So, much of this issue is the staccato, rapid-fire presentation of the main facts in Krishnaji's life as Mary sees them; and there is nothing of her poetic, rich description until she restarts her big diary. Still, it feels like being spoiled to complain. We are lucky we can see what we can of Krishnaji's unique daily life.

Mary: Wednesday, the ninth of February. 'At 9:30 a.m., I drove along the coast to the Los Angeles airport, stopping for a car wash. I waited at TWA for Krishnaji's arrival on flight 761 from London. He left there at 11 a.m. English time, and landed here at 2:15 p.m. when I saw him disembark through the glass door, and he had a porter to help them with the luggage. Forty-five minutes later, he came out and we drove back to Ojai along the sea. He looks well. The Lilliefelts, the Hookers, the Moodys, Mark, Michael, Frances, and Lee Nichols were waiting to greet him. We had supper on trays, and he slept early.'

February tenth. 'Erna and Theo came at 11 a.m., and Krishnaji recounted the events of the winter.' [Chuckles.] 'We all lunched at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon after looking at the redecorated west bedroom at Arya Vihara and approving. It is the site for the library of the proposed Study Center building. He also went to see the new bath in the guest house.' This is that funny square bath I put in the guest house because Mary Links said she could only bathe in a tub and not a shower. So in hopes of getting them both here, I had installed the only tub that would fit in the space. 'In the morning, he had approved the settlement offer, so Cohen sent it today to Rajagopal's lawyers.'

The eleventh. 'Krishnaji slept only four hours. I unpacked all of his things while he rested. We lunched at Arya Vihara, and he slept all afternoon.'

The next day, there isn't anything, but on the thirteenth, my diary says, 'Today I am sixty-eight and feeling well.' That's because it was my birthday. [S laughs.] 'Krishnaji tried not taking naps to help him sleep more at night. Max came and put resin on the gray car. He and others lunched with us at Arya Vihara. We walked with Erna and Theo down McAndrew Road.'

Again, there is nothing of note on the fourteenth, but the day after, 'We left the house at 7 a.m. and drove by the sea to Krishnaji's appointment with Dr. Lailee Bakhtiar at 9 a.m. for his fasting blood test. His veins wouldn't give much. We had breakfast at Lindberg's, the health food store, then Krishnaji had a checkup by Lailee at 10:30 a.m. We went to Westwood for a Norelco shaver' [S chuckles] 'and a French dictionary. Again, we to Lailee's for a cardiogram, and this time his veins were alright, and he had his post-prandial blood test. Krishnaji is in good health. The results for his blood sugar count will come next week. His blood pressure was 130 over 70. We drove slowly home, stopping for a picnic lunch in the car at Zuma Beach. Rajagopal's deposition for tomorrow is off, as he accepts discussing our settlement offer.' That was really only to avoid giving a deposition, and for no other reason.

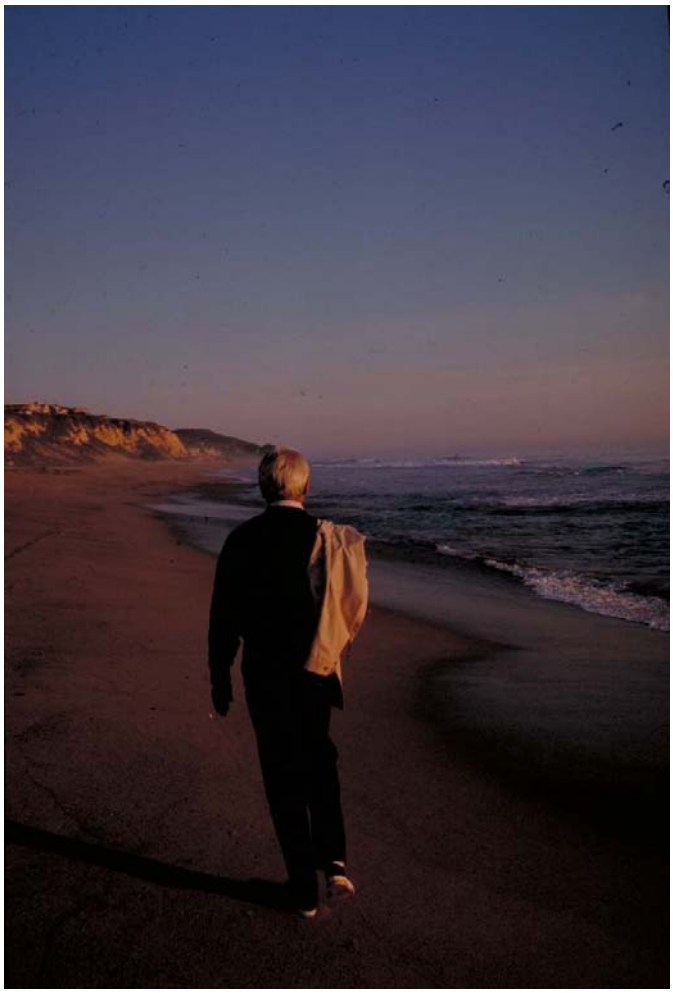
Again, there isn't much on the sixteenth, but on the seventeenth, our lawyer, Mr. Cohen, and Rajagopal's lawyer, T. Avsham, conferred all afternoon on our settlement offer. Both of the lawyers agreed, and it's now up to Rajagopal to commit himself. I spoke in the morning with my New York lawyer, Mitchell Booth, about my transferring this place, Pine Cottage, to the KFA.'

February eighteen. 'Erna came in the morning to discuss with Krishnaji my donation of this property. Mitchell Booth had telephoned me earlier about a small change in the wording of the agreement, which Mr. Sczudlo is incorporating in the papers. We lunched at Arya Vihara, then I went to the village on errands. We took a small walk to the dip.'

The nineteenth. 'Krishnaji came on the early walk that Erna and I have been doing all winter. I telephoned my brother at his Vineyard property, as it is his birthday. The final papers for my donation of the McAndrew Road property arrived from Paul Sczudlo of Loeb and Loeb.'

February twentieth. 'There was a KFA board of trustees meeting at 10 a.m. Krishnaji attended and Lou Blau came to speak about my donation of this place to the KFA. The papers are drawn up by his law firm, Loeb and Loeb. I was absent during this meeting.' You know, I withdrew so they could talk uninhibitedly if they didn't like something about this. Part of the agreement was that Krishnaji and I can live here in Pine Cottage for life.' Apparently, legally, Krishnaji had to have that permission. 'The board accepted it, Lou left, and I rejoined. We met all day on various matters. We all lunched at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji and I took a short walk to the dip.'

Then there isn't anything of significance until February twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji started recording on a Sony Walkman instead of writing. The result was beautiful. Mary Links had suggested this, and he now wants to get a good cassette recorder so he can do it anywhere. He dictated some letters to me. Lunch at Arya Vihara was with Eve Siegel'—she was the daughter of Ruth Tettemer—'Maris Lindley, Lily Koffman, and Catherine Kiernan. Laurie Greenwood has left the organization. Krishnaji and I walked with Erna and Theo.'



The twenty-sixth of February. 'Two inches of rain fell in the night. At 11 a.m., the school committee had a meeting with Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, and me, then we all lunched at Arya Vihara.'

The twenty-seventh. 'There was more rain. At 10 a.m., there was another meeting of the Oak Grove School committee and available trustees with Krishnaji. Lunch at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji and I walked down to the dip, which is now a torrent of muddy water and the road is closed. It was astonishing. The water was up to the level of the banks around it, and huge boulders had crashed down. 'Four inches of rain fell last night.' That in one night is a lot of water. This was the year of the big rain. I remember it now. 'The next day, after lunch, Krishnaji and I went with Erna and Theo to Stanley Cohen's office in Oxnard to discuss the case. Rain, again, came heavily.'

The first of March. 'Four inches of rain, again, in the night. I spent most of the day working at my desk. Krishnaji was disturbed after yesterday's meeting at Cohen's office with the realization of how people can abuse foundations. He questions how we can protect things in the future. We walked down and talked to Erna and Theo about it. Then went to see the raging river in the dip.'

March second. 'Three more inches of rain fell last night. We put off our trip to Los Angeles. I worked at my desk most of the day, and in the afternoon, we walked down to look at the astonishing water in the dip again. Four bulldozers were there, trying to move earth to prevent the road from washing out. I spoke to my brother and Lisa about her wanting Krishnaji to speak on change for a museum publication.'

Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The third. 'It rained on and off but tapered off. Frances McCann came to lunch at Arya Vihara, and Krishnaji talked about schools at the table until 3 o'clock. At 4 p.m.,

Krishnaji gave an interview to Renée Weber for ReVision journal. We walked again to the dip.'

March fourth. 'It was a clear morning. Erna and I walked early, then I did desk work and marketed. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji talked to David Moody, after which we walked to the dip. Krishnaji burned his right hand on steam from the kettle. I spoke to Lailee about it, who said to use a Telfa dressing. The burn was a shock to his body, so there was no afternoon walk.'

The next day. I'm not mentioning that every morning, early, Erna and I did our walk around the block, which was just over two and a half miles. 'At 11 a.m., Krishnaji talked to the teachers here. Krishnaji went to bed in the afternoon. He slept and read, and slept well last night.'

March sixth. 'At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held another meeting with the teachers here. At 4 p.m., he held a meeting with the Lilliefelts, Tom Krause, Mark, and David about the school committee. It went on till 7 p.m. Krishnaji's voice was hoarse.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed. Alasdair planted two cypresses at the end of the hedge by the garage.' That was Krishnaji's idea. I wasn't sure about it because I think a cypress is rather formal. You know, in Europe, they're formal.

Scott: Yes, yes.

M: I thought it didn't go with the little cottage. I was dead wrong.

S: [chuckles] They're lovely.

M: Yes, they're lovely.

March eight. 'It was a warm, clear day. Krishnaji spent the day in bed again, but is better. Vivian brought, from a Los Angeles store, a new Sony cassette recorder for Krishnaji's use.'

The ninth of March. 'It was a warm day, and Krishnaji was well enough to do his morning exercises. After lunch at Arya Vihara, Erna, Theo, Mark, and I discussed a school committee mix-up. Earlier, Erna had talked to Krishnaji about it. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a teacher discussion.'

March tenth. 'Krishnaji talked into his new Sony cassette recorder. Dictation number three. A draft of a settlement came from Rajagopal's lawyer, Terry Avsham. He claims everything.' That was his idea of a settlement. [Both chuckle.] 'At Arya Vihara lunch, Krishnaji heard about the movie E.T. and that it was playing in Ventura, so he and I went with Erna and Theo for the 5:30 p.m. showing. Krishnaji liked it very much. "I like when there is something moral," he said.' [S chuckles.] Well, he also liked the little E.T. 'We got back by 8 p.m., and had supper by 8:30 p.m.' [Both chuckle.]

The next day. Erna and I went over the Avsham settlement draft, which was totally unacceptable. Krishnaji discussed it with us. There was a meeting of Erna, Theo, Mark, and David Moody about the school board.' I don't think I attended that. 'Krishnaji and I walked to the Lilliefelts' and to the dip and back.'

March twelve. 'There was fog during the early morning walk. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with teachers here. Lunch at Arya Vihara. We walked to the Lilliefelts' and back at 5 p.m. Krishnaji's hand is painful where the skin has come off the burn blister. I dressed it twice and he wears a cotton glove over the dressing.'

The thirteenth. 'There was a trustee meeting here, during which there was a school report by Tom Krause and John Hidley. We all lunched at Arya Vihara, then resumed the meeting. There was a decision to enlarge the Oak Grove School board to include Erna, the Hookers, Krause, John Hidley, and Monica Ross. We will keep, for another year, the present school committee.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated into his cassette recorder, and in the afternoon, he held a teacher discussion here until 6 p.m.'

Fifteenth March. There is just the usual, but after the walk, 'Krishnaji saw a video cassette made from the Movietown News of a film of himself in 1928 in New York and 1930 in Ojai. He said, "I felt no relationship between that chap and this chap."' [Both chuckle.]

Nothing important the next day except, 'Krishnaji had another discussion with teachers at 4 p.m.'

Seventeenth March. 'Krishnaji dictated on his Sony again, and at 4 p.m., Krishnaji was interviewed on audiotape for KPFK Radio by Roy Tuckman. "Superficial questions,"' said either Krishnaji or me. It isn't clear.

March eighteenth. 'There is more rain, so there was no walk. Krishnaji dictated into his Sony again. From 4 p.m. to 6 p.m., Krishnaji held another discussion with teachers.'

There's nothing the next day except that Krishnaji keeps dictating into his recorder, and then on the twentieth, 'At 11 a.m., we went to the Oak Grove School Pavilion, where Krishnaji spoke to parents and teachers till 1 p.m.'

Then there's nothing of significance until the twenty-second, when, 'at 10:30 a.m., there was a meeting about video with Mendizza, Evelyne, Erna, Theo, and Mark. We lunched at Arya Vihara after Krishnaji had dictated to his Sony. From 4 p.m. to 6:15 p.m., Krishnaji held another discussion with teachers. It rained again.'

The twenty-third of March. 'We drove by the sea to Beverly Hills, where Krishnaji had his eyes examined by Dr. Fox. His eyes are the same as last year. Then we went to Helen Saginaw, who cut Krishnaji's hair beautifully for the first time.' She's the woman who cut my hair and I took him there. 'We had a picnic lunch in the car and drove home via route 405 in Santa Paula. It rained and it was much too long. Erna had been to our lawyer, Cohen. Rajagopal's lawyer served papers for Krishnaji to give a deposition next Monday. Cohen expects they will settle first. Krishnaji is prepared to go ahead.'

The next day. 'The earth slid in Malibu, blocking the road, so I went on the Ventura freeway to Los Angeles. I got a pair of New Balance shoes for Krishnaji and vitamins, had my hair cut, did miscellaneous errands, and came home. Krishnaji was having a discussion with the teachers when I arrived. Erna came and said that a settlement discussion between Cohen and Avsham went on, and we will have a draft tomorrow. I received photos of Krishnaji left to me by Blanche Mathias.' I got several—well, you've seen them. They were taken years ago by Edward Weston, and she left them to me in her will.

S: Yes, I know them.

M: The twenty-fifth of March. 'Krishnaji dictated into his Sony. I marketed and put the guest room in order for the arrival of Dr. Jonas Salk. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Afterward, Erna brought the settlement draft just received and we went over it. I couldn't agree to a sentence about the material that went to the Huntington Library, saying it "belonged" to Rajagopal. Erna conferred with Stuart Comis, and the sentence is rewritten acceptably to us. We should hear Rajagopal's reactions on this draft tomorrow. Krishnaji and I had to hurry off to the foot doctor, Hara, in Santa Paula.'

The next day. 'Rajagopal and his board will not look at the settlement unless we first agree never to sue them again for any reason,' [both chuckle] 'so we go ahead with the case, which means Krishnaji's deposition on Monday. I drove to the Santa Barbara airport and met Dr. Jonas Salk at 2 p.m. Krishnaji greeted him when we got back to Ojai, and then they had tea and talked at some length. The three of us walked way down Thacher Road. At 7 p.m., we dined at Arya Vihara with Erna, Theo, Evelyne, the Moodys, and Michael. Earlier, the Mendizzas had set up lights for tomorrow's videotaping.'

March twenty-seven. 'Krishnaji and Dr. Salk talked for one hour and five minutes and it was videotaped on three-color cameras by Mendizza and crew. We lunched at Arya Vihara, then Dr. Salk went for a tour of the school before he returned to San Diego. Krishnaji did a silent close-up for the biography film, then rested. We walked in the rain with the Lilliefelts, had an early supper, and early to bed.'

March twenty-eight. 'We had an early breakfast at 7 a.m., then Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to Mr. Cohen's office at 10 a.m. He talked with Krishnaji. At 10:30, Rajagopal's lawyer, Terry Avsham, took Krishnaji's deposition. Present were Annie Vigeveno and Austin Bee.' They just came. Because they were involved in the case, they had a right to come, but it was just irritating to all of us. 'It stopped at 12:48 p.m. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I had a picnic lunch in the car. The deposition resumed from 1 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. It was exhausting. We came back and went for a walk. Krishnaji's energy will revive.

Radha Burnier just arrived from Australia, and came at 6:30 p.m. We dined with her, the Lilliefelts, and Michael at Arya Vihara.'

The next day, 'At 10 a.m., Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to Cohen's office and Krishnaji continued the deposition of yesterday. We again had a picnic lunch in the car, then resumed the deposition, which became wicked. We talked to Cohen afterward. We had our supper at Arya Vihara.' Cohen had intervened in the deposition.

S: Because Rajagopal's lawyer was being so terrible?

M: Yes, aggressive.

March thirtieth. 'Krishnaji joined in the early walk with Erna and me. It was a hot day. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to Cohen's office to discuss matters. We returned for lunch at Arya Vihara, and slept in the afternoon. Saral and David Bohm arrived from London.'

March thirty-one. 'Early walk with Erna. Krishnaji dictated into Sony. We lunched at Arya Vihara with the Bohms, etcetera. It was a hot day. Stuart Comis asked us to see Cohen tomorrow about the settlement offer from Avsham.'

April first. 'Erna, Theo, and I went to see Cohen at 9 a.m. We read Rajagopal's settlement draft, which was unacceptable. We talked at length, and decided to reject the offer but withdraw the lawsuit. Came back and reported to Krishnaji, who had approved, in advance, our withdrawing the lawsuit, and felt this was the thing to do.'

S: Sorry—you're going to have to explain this.

M: Well, it's hard to explain, but what happened was that we wanted to get rid of the lawsuit, obviously, but with a settlement. But Rajagopal would only agree to settlements that were impossible to accept. And, as we were suing him at that point, because he had broken the original settlement agreement by trying to change the books and…

S: Right. And not handing over the material he was supposed to hand over.

M: And not handing over the material—all these things; we had to resume a suit against him for violation of the previous agreement. So this was during the period where we were suing him again, and he kept—well, you heard what he did. And so, as we couldn't accept what he was suggesting, we just decided to withdraw the lawsuit.

S: Right. Right. Just to drop the lawsuit.

M: Whereupon you'll see what he does next, but that is what we did. 'Afterward, at Arya Vihara, Erna, the Bohms, the Hookers, Theo, and I ran the video of Krishnaji's discussion with Jonas Salk. I went to the village for our air tickets. When it was cool, Krishnaji and I walked with Erna and Theo down McAndrew.'

Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

April second. ‘At 11 a.m., Krishnaji talked to parents and teachers at the Oak Grove School Pavilion. We returned for lunch at Arya Vihara. Merali arrived and is staying there. Krishnaji rested in the afternoon.’

April third. ‘At 11 a.m., Krishnaji spoke to parents and teachers again at the Oak Grove School. We lunched there. In the afternoon, I worked at the desk until it was time for our walk, which we did with Erna and Theo. It was cold and windy.’

The next two days have nothing significant, but on the sixth of April, ‘I was up at 4 a.m. At 6:30 a.m., Mark came with the van and drove Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, and me to the Los Angeles airport. Krishnaji and I went on TWA to New York. The Lilliefelts went on another airline.’ It was thought we shouldn’t all four be on one plane. [Both chuckle.] ‘My brother sent Les Lewis with the car to meet us, and my brother was waiting at the Hotel Dorset on 54th Street. We had a nice suite—a sitting room and two bedrooms.’ That hotel doesn’t exist anymore. ‘We had our supper in the rooms.’

April seventh. ‘David Shainberg came by in the morning. My brother came at 1 p.m. and he, Krishnaji, and I lunched at Orsini. Then Krishnaji rested. I went with Erna and Theo to the Felt Forum.’ That’s where he was going to speak in Madison Square Garden. ‘Krishnaji and I had supper in the rooms.’

April eighth. ‘We went out to the health food store, and to the Belgian shoe store.’ That’s where both Krishnaji and I get these funny shoes—actually these are his shoes I’ve got on now. [Both chuckle.] ‘Then we went to Doubleday’s for books. David Shainberg came at 1 p.m., and we all three walked to the Italian restaurant on 53rd Street, Il Nido.’ It was good food. ‘It rained, so we came back in a taxi to the hotel, but then Krishnaji and I walked around a little. We had supper again in our rooms.’

The ninth of April. 'We went by limousine to Felt Forum, where at 10 a.m., Krishnaji gave his first New York talk of this year. The audience was late coming in and Krishnaji sat watching them and then gave a fine talk to an attentive audience. The hall was only two-thirds full, but there were over 3,000 people. We lunched at the hotel, walked, and bought some apples. Krishnaji looked at the new IBM building.' Which is quite beautiful, I think. 'Pupul arrived from Europe, and came to supper in our rooms with us.'

The tenth. 'There was heavy rain. We went to Krishnaji's second New York talk at 10 a.m., at Felt Forum. There was a large, serious, attentive audience. The end of talk was very moving. Krishnaji was almost in tears. Monsoon-like rains began as we came back to the hotel where Erna and Theo joined us. Pupul came, and in her car, we all went to lunch at the Shainbergs'. We had supper again in the rooms. Krishnaji spoke of turning Vasanta Vihar over to the schools.'

April eleventh. 'We walked to thirty Rockefeller Plaza where, in the Carnegie Endowment conference room, on the fifty-fourth floor, at 11 a.m., Krishnaji held a seminar arranged by Shainberg. It was on seeing that there is only thinking, not a separate thinker, and it was slow going. Shainberg lunched with us at Il Nido restaurant. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview to Barbara Seaman about Dr. Besant until 6 p.m., when Pupul came to see him. She left at 7 p.m. Krishnaji talked of Vasanta Vihar becoming part of the schools after his death. Perhaps the same for Pine Cottage? We had supper and I watched the Academy Awards. Phil Dunne presented the writing awards.'

S: What was Barbara Seaman doing this interview for?

M: I don't know, I think she was writing a book about Dr. Besant, but I don't remember.

Twelfth April. 'We went to the second session of the Shainberg seminar. Then Shainberg, Merali, Krishnaji, and I took a taxi. As Krishnaji got in, his right hand was caught in the door. His wool-padded glove saved his finger from severe injury. At Il Nido, we got ice for it, and he said it was alright. All four had lunch and Merali was the host. Krishnaji and I stopped to buy Mary's second biography for Bud and Lisa. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave a half-hour interview for East-West Journal to Catherine Ingram and publisher Leonard Jacobs. Many photos were taken. We went for a walk and had supper and early to bed.'

S: East-West Journal and many photographs were taken?

M: Yes, I wonder what happened to them. They were supposed to send them. But I don't know if they did.

The next day. 'There was the third seminar meeting. Krishnaji and I lunched with Bud, Lisa, and Toodie at Bud's apartment. Lisa interviewed Krishnaji on change for the museum publication. We walked a bit. Pupul came at 6 p.m. for an early supper in the hotel rooms. In conversation about how Krishnaji came to be what he is, a strange something was felt in the room. Krishnaji said it always comes when this subject is discussed seriously. And it always comes from the left.'

S: Mm, hm. Yes, he mentioned that many times.

M: Yes. The fourteenth of April. 'Shainberg came and we went to where Krishnaji and he did a video-recorded discussion. There were two cameras that recorded this fifty-eight-minute conversation. Then Shainberg, Philippa, and David lunched with Krishnaji and me at Il Nido. Philippa and David talked with me at the hotel while Krishnaji rested. At 5 p.m., Mr. and Mrs. James George and their daughter, who are friends of Mrs. Siegel, came to tea. Mr. George is a former Canadian high commissioner to India.'

April fifteenth. 'Pupul came at 9 a.m. to see Krishnaji. At 10 a.m. my brother came in the Rolls to drive us to JFK airport, where Krishnaji and I took the American Airlines noon flight to Los Angeles. Vivian and David Moody met us and drove us via the coast to Ojai.'

The sixteenth. 'I had much laundry. Krishnaji spent the day in bed dozing and reading and resting. The Lilliefelts returned to Ojai in the evening.'

April seventeenth. We finally have the big diary restarting, so it begins with a little reprise. 'Krishnaji was up and full of energy. He exercised, and talked in the morning with the Lilliefelts about Vasanta Vihar becoming part of the Indian schools and what should Pine Cottage be. This year begins late in my big diary because after various events, which seemed to pass like a flash flood, today, moments ago, after coming back to the cottage from lunch at Arya Vihara, Krishnaji sat down beside me, and scolded me for being upset because, after ten days of concentrated work in New York and being too tired to get up yesterday, this, our first day at home, he said he would hold a discussion meeting with the Oak Grove staff tomorrow afternoon. Then he jumped to Mary's book, the second volume of the biography, The Years of Fulfilment, which has just come out, and which the Indian Foundation members have criticized severely. He said, Mary does not deeply enough know about "all this," as she had not been around with him in years. He has been thinking about it, and he wants me to write every day so that at some point, and it may be years from now, I will write a biography, which will be right. He said it must start with something about myself, that I am not some devotee. Then he jumped to the subject of memory; of how it had come up in discussions in New York this past week, and how he asked me the question, "Is there something in the brain that is not touched by memory?" He examined it Thursday night, and Friday morning when Bud drove us to the airport, and on the plane to LA; and last night, he saw it—there is such a thing. Then he examined it—is it imaginary? Is it a projection, etcetera—rigorously, until he was sure. "From doubt to certainty, there is such a thing, and from that there is energy. When I got up this morning and did my exercises, I could have walked for miles. That is why I want to talk tomorrow. Now do you understand?"'

S: [chuckles] So he was scolding you because you were upset that he'd offered to talk when he was so tired after this New York trip, and he's explaining to you that, no—he was energized from this insight that he had. Right.

M: Yes. That's right. [Both chuckle.]

The eighteenth. 'Krishnaji said last night he had felt something evil in the front hall that he had never felt in this house before. He stayed behind when I went to my room and "dealt" with it. It is gone, but he is doing whatever it is he does, again. "I understand what it is," he said, but he does not tell me. He dictated into his Sony this morning, a description of dawn in the valley, then on the mind's adherence to continuity. He was full of energy at lunch, discussing with David Bohm the psyche as being memory, accumulated thought, and therefore limited, and unable to go beyond. And after lunch, some of us, not Krishnaji, looked at the video done last Thursday in New York of Krishnaji and David Shainberg discussing. It is only fair, the image is in color, but they are slow in getting into things. David Shainberg's questions are not clear to Krishnaji, and do not arouse a response at first. It is not good enough for TV. From 4 p.m. to 6 p.m., Krishnaji held an Oak Grove teacher discussion.'

April nineteenth. 'Krishnaji dictated again into the Sony. At 10:30 a.m., he wanted to discuss a study center with Erna and me. He wanted, and we agreed, that it is to be for study and not a place of programs, events, etcetera, and it must be kept separate from the school. He asked if Erna and I feel it is something important. We do. "Who is responsible for the study center?" He asked me, but obviously I am away six months of the year. Will Erna share it? Erna is overburdened. How do we find new responsible people?' This is me—just what we talked about. 'The eternal query. He asked if it would be a good thing if he were to spend most of his time here, holding seminars, and not traveling, but he felt the audience in New York had been very good. He wants to give four talks there next year. I stressed the need for each talk to be complete, not the exposition of problems one day and the resolution of it in the next talk. At lunch, he wore his new Navy fatigue shirt from L.L.Bean.' [Both chuckle.] 'Very becoming. He looks very smart and very young. We lunched at Arya Vihara. "David Bohm is picking my brains," he said. Krishnaji slept deeply in the afternoon, and when he woke up it was raining, but at 5 p.m., we walked all the same down to the Lilliefelts'. We saw there a just-installed enamel stovetop. He said of the Lilliefelts, "They are very fine people."'

S: [chuckles] Good.

M: The twentieth of April. 'I went for an early walk with Erna before the rain began again, at times in deluges. In the morning, Zelma Wilson and her partner, Richard Conrad, brought for Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and me to see the first schematic for the study center buildings and small cottages to be built south of Arya Vihara in the orange grove.' Oh, interesting. 'All liked it immediately. It will have to have its own entrance, driveway off McAndrew, and parking lot.' We never did that.

S: I've never seen those drawings.

M: We never used them. There were cottages to be built, but we never built any cottages.

S: Yes, but I've never even seen the drawings. Do you know where those drawings are?

M: I don't think we have them. They weren't acted on, you see, so they wouldn't have given us a copy of the drawings.

S: Right. Right.

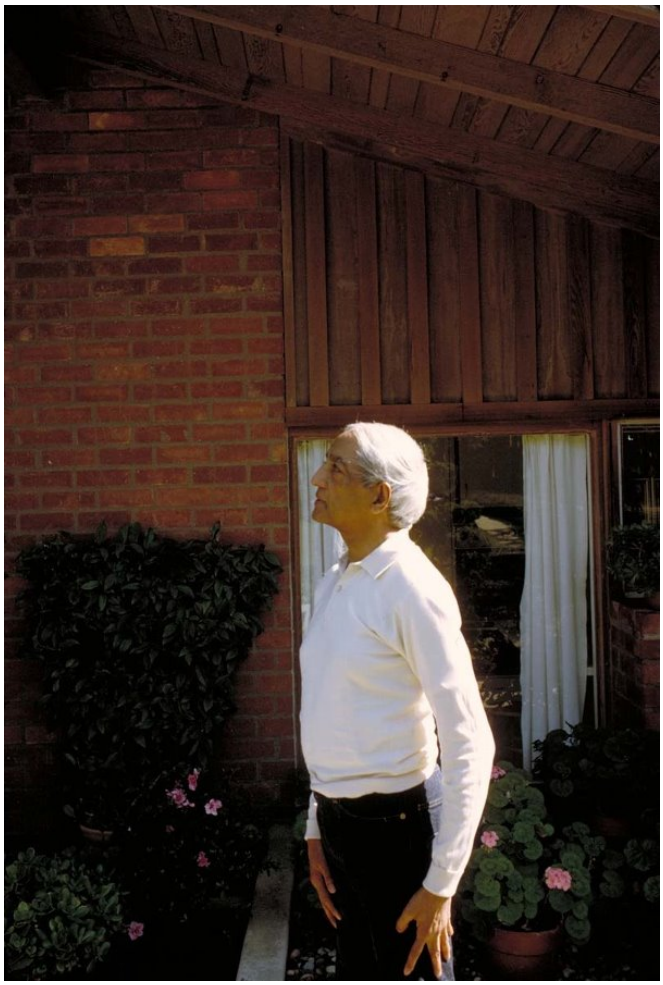
M: It says, 'I liked it very much and there's not a thing I would change. She said it would take about six months to get county permission, and until we know we can go ahead, I cannot try to raise funds.' We never would've gotten county permission for that, because it meant more density, which they don't like. We were able to get the archives because nobody lives there. There isn't a real kitchen in the place, there isn't a bathtub; things like that. There are two toilets, but there isn't—

S: Yes, it's a day facility.

M: You couldn't live there, obviously. 'Until we know we can go ahead, I cannot try to raise funds. That will be a mountain to climb. Probably $700,000 is the estimated cost. All this may mean I won't go to India this year, but will need to return in the autumn to start work on funds. But these drawings should be an incentive. Krishnaji has trouble visualizing from blueprints, but they will build a simple maquette for him. He listened with apparent approval. We asked only that they proceed making it a little smaller. Krishnaji had done a Sony dictation after breakfast. We lunched at Arya Vihara. He and David Bohm discussed at the table. Krishnaji held a teacher discussion at 4 p.m. I stayed with my desk.'

April twenty-first. 'I went to Los Angeles on errands and for a haircut. Coming back, I stopped for tea with Amanda. Krishnaji had done a Sony dictation in the morning. I met him and Theo on the road as I drove home. The Bohms went to Berkeley for a week.'

The twenty-second. 'Krishnaji did a Sony dictation. A letter came from Mary Links saying that her sister Betty had died suddenly of a heart attack. Krishnaji said, "Thank god."' [Both chuckle.] '"Poor Betty. She had an unhappy life."'



S: Meaning, "Thank god" it's over because she'd had an unhappy life.

M: Yes. 'Krishnaji spoke to teachers between 4 p.m. and 6 p.m. Bud telephoned with news about his health.'

Then there's nothing the next day. Krishnaji keeps dictating into his Sony, but he is doing that every day at this time. Then on the twenty-fourth, 'Krishnaji talked to the teachers here from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m.'

Again, there's nothing of significance on the next day (except that I confirmed Felt Forum for next year), but on the twenty-sixth, 'I telephoned Patricia Hunt-Perry that Krishnaji accepts speaking to the United Nations Pacem in Terris meeting next April, as suggested by Undersecretary Robert Muller. I also telephoned twice to Mary Cadogan in London about the Australian difficulties. Alan Kishbaugh just returned from there, and was at lunch. He had talked to Mavis Bennett and to Donald Ingram Smith and reported on this. Krishnaji read the report in the evening and said he wanted to invite Mavis and Ingram Smith to the Brockwood Foundations' meeting in September. He said, "I made a mistake with that letter I sent from India. It was the Indians' fault, but I take the responsibility." He dictated a letter to Mavis and to Ingram Smith, inviting them to Brockwood. He had me read the letters to the Lilliefelts, who concurred.'

S: Mavis and Reg Bennett, of course, had always run the Foundation there, but Donald Ingram Smith tried to take over.

Krishnaji (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: …tried to take over. Yes, that's right.

S: And I think, eventually, he did because Mavis and Reg—

M: Well, they died.

S: Yes. Reg died first and then Mavis died. But it wasn't pretty.

M: No, it wasn't nice. Mavis and Reg were very nice.

S: Yes, they were very nice.

M: 'Earlier, while walking to lunch through the Grove, he said suddenly about Rajagopal, "If we have to speak of ugly things, we must do it outside. That is what was wrong in the house the other day."' Do you remember this?

S: Aha, aha. Yes, yes.

M: 'And later, as we left the kitchen, he had me stop in the hall and look into the living room northeast corner. "You asked what you can do when you are alone here. You must look quietly at that, not hastily.' It is where the jewels are. 'It has been neglected. It is a shrine and one must pay attention to it or it will fade."' Hm.

April twenty-seventh. 'I did the usual early walk with Erna, and then packed when I got back. I typed Krishnaji's letters to Mavis Bennett and Ingram Smith, but was unable to reach Mary Cadogan by telephone to let her know about the letters and Krishnaji's invitation, so I took letters with me. Krishnaji and I, after an early lunch and drive with the Moodys to the Santa Barbara airport where Krishnaji commented on the nice, un-harried airport. We took a plane to San Francisco, where we landed in less than an hour, and took a taxi to the Huntington Hotel, where we have a nice suite—the same, or similar to the one we had in 1974. This one is numbers 514 and 512. Krishnaji remembered snatches of it. We unpacked and then walked six times around the little park opposite the hotel, and came back to supper in the sitting room. Our TV with supper habits continue. Krishnaji began to get lost in a movie called Muggable Mary.' [Chuckles.] 'Dorothy rang earlier about the Inwoods cottage being for sale for 60,000 pounds sterling and Donald Dennis providing the funds.' That was a lot of money.

S: It was a lot of money.

M: Yes. Oh, a continuation about the movie Muggable Mary. 'When it got to be 9:30, this Mary interfered.' [Both chuckle.]

April twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji slept "fairly well." A new place, as always, took getting used to. He didn't do any exercises. At 11 a.m., Mrs. Justine Toms and her son Robert came and drove us to their place, where her husband interviewed Krishnaji for an hour for their New Dimension radio program, which they send out to fifty similar radio stations across the country. It went very well. Krishnaji was asked about meditation and spoke eloquently, wonderfully.' They were nice people, and this was, I thought, awfully good.' They had a little audio studio in their house and it was set up like a recording place. 'We came back and lunched in The Big Four'—that's the name of the restaurant in the hotel—

‘where the waiter asked if he were Krishnamurti, and said what an honor it was to meet him. He had heard Krishnaji speak in Bombay and Madras and was one of ten of today’s waiters who have PhDs. As I write this, it is after 3 p.m., and Krishnaji is being interviewed by a Donald Latten, religious editor of San Francisco’s The Examiner. Latten began with rapid-fire superficial questions. Now he is listening and Krishnaji is giving him an education and fielding questions with humor and charm. The reporter had files and Examiner interviews from fifty-five years ago with Krishnaji and Dr. Besant. He quoted Krishnaji as saying that he was Christ. “Did you mean that then?” he asked Krishnaji. “God knows,” said Krishnaji with amusement.’ [Both chuckle.] And then, ‘At 4 p.m., a serious young woman with a direct manner, Patricia Holt, book editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, interviewed Krishnaji. It was quieter and she is more thoughtful. Krishnaji said she was a nice, intelligent woman and we have asked her to lunch with us after the Saturday talk. We went out for a walk and groceries, going down California Street to a large market. Krishnaji pushed the cart with a determined look, and we got the yogurt, fruit, etcetera we need and climbed back up the hill. People recognized him. We stopped at the Masonic Hall, where he will speak, and went in. Krishnaji was shy about looking at it. It is a graceful, handsome hall. The best for his talks of any I’ve seen so far.’ It’s a very, very nice hall, a big hall, with a kind of long, raised platform and the audience is U-shaped around. The acoustics are very good. It is dignified, and has a nice big lobby. Very, very good. It’s the best hall he’s talked in that I’ve seen. Carnegie Hall was the most meaningful one to me, but only because I revere Carnegie Hall.

S: Yes, yes.

M: ‘He looked around. He remembered little about it.’ He’d talked there before. ‘There were some nice leather and other chairs and he tried one out, climbing up on the stage, and said it would do very well. We returned to the hotel in time to see Miranda on KPIX six o’clock news. We had supper in our rooms. The Lilliefelts and others have arrived and are staying on Sutter Street at the Hotel Cartwright.’

April twenty-ninth. ‘During breakfast, a telephone call came from Dorothy almost in tears. At two p.m. English time, sparks from a blowtorch used on the outside of the West Wing somehow got under the floorboards above Krishnaji’s bedroom and destroyed most of his bedroom, but not the closets where his suits hung. The guest room, next to his, and Shakuntala’s nice new room above, and the students’ room next to hers up there were also burned. She said Shakuntala discovered the fire, rang the alarm. Everyone got out. No one was hurt. The fire engines were slow to get there, but ten came. Police helicopters were circling.’ Do you remember all this?

S: Oh, I can’t even begin to tell you how well I remember it.

M: Yes. ‘There were still no lights on or water yet, but the telephone is working. She was afraid it might reach the U.S. news. She wanted me to know, therefore, but not tell Krishnaji until after his talks. I told her he was sitting right there. She doubts she will come to Ojai on the eleventh as planned. I urged her to wait and think it over. I said I would telephone her after we got back to Ojai. Krishnaji says he had a premonition a couple of days ago that something was going to happen at Brockwood. "I see it was a definite premonition, now." He thought at first, when Dorothy rang, that it might be about Montague. He said, "I have no reaction." We will know more what the situation is after speaking to Dorothy again, and we will see if Krishnaji wants to go there as planned on the twenty-seventh. He says he will sleep on the floor. I pointed out that that would not be necessary, and we argued at once over his using my room, which seems to be undamaged'—in other words, it wasn't burned—'and he fiercely refused.' [Chuckles.] He could've been in the room across the hall, also.

S: Yes.

M: A photographer came from the San Francisco Chronicle. Then we went to a restaurant called Greens at Fort Mason, a vegetarian restaurant run by Tassajara Zen monastery. We had a nice simple lunch, which Krishnaji liked. He was recognized—given books and a cassette. It was raining when we were ready to leave, and there were no taxis. But a man gave us a lift to the hotel. Krishnaji rested and later we took a small walk around the little park. We came back to see Miranda on the television news. We had supper in our sitting room, and talked of Brockwood. Krishnaji wants to call Dorothy tomorrow and urge her to come to Ojai as planned. He rejects our staying on at Ojai later than our plans to leave on the twenty-seventh.'

S: I'll tell what happened with this fire, just for the record, because otherwise there probably isn't a record. There was a man scraping paint off from the outside of Shakuntala's window and the…

M: That's right. With a blowtorch.

S: Yes, and using a blowtorch, and a spark got underneath the windowsill and it started in her… in her—

M: Ceiling.

S: —room. Right, which is just above Krishnaji's. I can't remember how I got there. Maybe she set off the alarm, but in my memory, Shakuntala smelt the smoke, ran down to tell Dorothy, ran into me halfway, and I ran up, saw the fire, and set off the alarm. Anyway, I tried everything to put that fire out, but couldn't get at it because it was inside the wall.

M: That's right.

S: And, eventually, the fire trucks did show up, but they were very slow in coming. In the meantime, we had formed a bucket brigade of students and staff, and I was up on the parapet at the fire end, throwing water on the fire.

M: Yes. I remember hearing that.

S: The bucket brigade was coming up from the ground, you know, and that is the only reason we didn't lose a lot more of the house. It was dangerous, because people were up on the roof of a burning building, but that was the only way. The firemen said that the bucket brigade kept that fire down.

M: Yes, yes.

S: But it was very strange, because the fire came down and…

M: And the drawing room underneath Krishnaji's bedroom was affected, too, but that was from the water.

S: Yes, the drawing room was affected from the water. The fire had slightly burned Krishnaji's desk in his bedroom, but his clothes and shoes were not touched. And the desk and clothes and shoe cupboard are on that same southern side of the room.

M: Yes, yes. But the desk was on the southwest side of the room and his clothes and shoes are on the southeast side of the room.

S: Yes, they were, but they weren't that far away.

M: Yes, I remember Dorothy saying that she opened the cupboard and his shoes were all gleaming still.

S: Yes, that's right.

M: So, even the smoke hadn't gotten in there. Although it did take a lot of other things. I think there was smoke in the cupboard. I think at Huntsman—we took them to Huntsman.

S: You took all of Krishnaji's suits to Huntsman to be dry-cleaned? Really. I don't remember that. I suppose we'll get to that.

M: It was something about Huntsman can dry clean better than cleaners, supposedly.

S: We'll get to that, probably. But for today, we've run out of tape. So that's it.

M: Alright. We stop here.

Issue 75: April 30, 1983 to June 10, 1983

In the last issue, we saw that Krishnaji and the other trustees of the Krishnamurti Foundation of America wanted to end the "ugliness" of being involved in legal actions, though justified, against the K & R Foundation. In this issue, we see that no sooner had the suit been dropped, than the K & R Foundation sued Krishnaji and the Krishnamurti Foundation of America. So, the ugliness does not end.

While we have always seen Mary's "guardianship" or protection of Krishnaji, in this issue, it feels more moving, more encompassing.

In this issue, we also see the end of an era at Brockwood. Dorothy has a heart attack, and must make room for others to be in charge of the school. This is a two year process, but it begins in this issue.

Mary: We begin our discussion today with April thirtieth, 1983.

Scott: Yes, but before we do I think there is something we need to discuss a little, because I think in our last discussion, I was hurrying and so I didn't stop and discuss something that I feel is important to put on the record. Also, I know what happened, because you discussed it with me at the time—I didn't know everything but I knew a lot at that time. We have already recorded that it was very, very important, although it was unpleasant and it was expensive, to have this lawsuit against Rajagopal because he was violating the terms of the previous agreement by not handing over archive material, and by reprinting Krishnaji's material but distorting it—changing it. And we've recorded that it was terribly important to have this lawsuit just to protect the integrity of the teachings.

M: I may have said it before, I don't remember; but an important point was made by our lawyer that if you have a settlement agreement—which we had with the first lawsuit—and if the other party doesn't abide by the settlement—which Rajagopal wasn't—if you don't enforce it, you lose it. You have to protect your own rights under a settlement or it is nullified.

S: Right. So this is why it was terribly important to have this second suit. And then in our last discussion we mentioned—but I think just too briefly, and it needs to be spelled out a little bit—Krishnaji gave his deposition. Rajagopal continued to refuse to give a deposition on the basis of ill health or one shenanigan or another, but Krishnaji gave his deposition and Rajagopal's lawyer was so aggressive and so wrong that your lawyer had to intervene to protect Krishnaji. And the whole lawsuit was so unpleasant that it was decided by Krishnaji and the trustees of the KFA to stop the lawsuit. Now, here we have something that needs, I think, a bit more explanation. And I feel at least one of the things that needs to be said is that here was Rajagopal, abusing Krishnaji through his lawyer to get his way, yet again. And this abuse of Krishnaji, which Krishnaji had always accepted or tolerated not knowing what else could he do. In a way, this was the character of the relationship. This may just be my interpretation, but I think more from you needs to be said just to give the history, the details of just what happened, and why it was decided to stop this really terribly important lawsuit.

M: Well, the impulse was to stop it because Krishnaji was…He wasn't affected in one sense, but it was insulting to him and it was an assault. Rajagopal's lawyer was aggressive and a really kind of—I don't know how to characterize it—indecent in the sense of antagonism, in a sort of sneering way. It was unpleasant that he should have to be talked to this way.

S: Alright—but it was…

M: We were protective of Krishnaji—the whole lawsuit was that. The first lawsuit was to free Krishnaji from this evil domination by this dreadful man. And to protect him.

S: Yes. Yes. Alright, so Rajagopal's lawyer might have been sneering at Krishnaji, but what was the deciding…?

M: Well, the implication that Krishnaji was lying with asking the same question again and again and again.

S: So, was there the feeling that this would be made public and somehow become a public ridicule of Krishnaji?

M: Well, no. I mean, you don't think that far ahead. It was just—it seemed outrageous at the time, the way he did it. And it was badgering Krishnaji.

S: Yes, I understand. So, it was decided that enough was enough, and you were going to stop the lawsuit.

M: Yes, I think you're right. It was just putting Krishnaji through demeaning and badgering…

S: So it was putting Krishnaji through demeaning, badgering behavior, and that there would probably be more of that? Was that the feeling, that there would be more of that if the suit continued? Because, in a way, it had already been done; Krishnaji had been put through that.

M: Well, that would be supposition. Obviously, it had been unpleasant and we just felt he shouldn't be subjected to this.

S: Okay. But that's not what Krishnaji himself felt?

M: No. He was willing to go through with it, but he didn't insist. It was more or less…we discussed it with him, obviously, he was in on every discussion we ever had. He was aware of all that.

Krishnaji by the sea (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Of course, right. But it was more of your feeling bad on his behalf than his saying, "Look, I can't do this anymore"?

M: Oh no, he never said that. Never.

S: Exactly. See, I think this is important, and he didn't feel he needed to defend himself, because all kinds of accusations were made against him in this deposition of being a charlatan or being…I don't know immoral or being…

M: Don't characterize it too much—I don't remember.

S: Alright. As I remember, from what you told me, Krishnaji was accused by this lawyer of all kinds of really monstrous and dishonest things.

M: Well, don't use too exaggerated language. It was a very unpleasant badgering cross-examination and asking the same question again and again and again kind of thing.

S: Alright. So, if Krishnaji had been through that, and if there wasn't a fear of more of this happening or this being increased somehow, in a way, the penalty had been paid. Krishnaji had already been badgered.

M: Yes, but I mean, he would have gone on with it. I mean, to go on with the suit would mean…

S: Right, going on with this treatment of Krishnaji.

M: Yes, subjecting Krishnaji to this kind of treatment, and as we wanted to protect him, we thought, well, maybe it's not worth it. All the original suit was to free Krishnaji from the appalling treatment that he had been subjected to for years.

S: Okay. Alright. Alright.

M: Also, we had a responsibility. Rajagopal had just stolen—people gave money to a charity they thought was for Krishnaji's work, and he stole it. And we had the proof of it.

So, we felt Rajagopal should be called to account for what he did, and he could have gone, as his daughter said at one point, that he could go to jail. And he could have gone to jail if we had gone ahead on and on and on. He'd taken funds that he'd stolen.

S: Yes. Yes. For his own purposes.

M: And, true to the way he behaved, when we stopped the second suit, Rajagopal immediately countersued. Which brought us back into the thing. And that's when—we haven't come to that…

S: We haven't come to that yet, so we can wait on that. It's just that I didn't want to just brush over something which I thought most historians would feel was really strange. Here was this terribly important suit, and they decided just to stop it.

M: Well, the whole spirit of it—I don't know what the word is—but what we were trying to do…I was so appalled when I found out what had happened—I told you all that ages ago—to Krishnaji and abuse of Krishnaji by both of them.

S: Yes, yes. Both meaning Rosalind and Rajagopal. Yes.

M: Yes, both of them. They were in cahoots. They made their position in the world and they made money, made everything by manipulating it. And Krishnaji, you know, he didn't fight back. He would put up with it. And so, it was to stop all that, and also this man had stolen money that was given for Krishnaji's work and to him personally. And he'd stolen it. And so, it was to call him to account for what he'd done and we brought a suit. Also, we had to get back to Krishnaji his copyright, and Rajagopal could have gone on flouting that. So, I mean all kinds of things were at stake, but it was all to protect Krishnaji. Yes, and to make justice prevail.

S: Yes. Alright. Alright, so, April thirtieth, 1983.

M: April thirtieth, 1983. There had been a fire at Brockwood, as you may recall.

S: Yes, I do. [Chuckles.]

M: Krishnaji was in San Francisco for talks and we learned of it when we were there, so on the thirtieth, 'I rang Dorothy to learn more about Brockwood's fire. Krishnaji spoke to her and insisted she come to Ojai on the eleventh as planned. His desk in his bedroom is burned and so was the bed, and the hi-fi, etc., but his clothes are safe. At 11 a.m., we walked across the street to the Masonic Hall where Krishnaji gave his first San Francisco talk. The hall was almost full. It was a good talk. After the talk, we came back to the hotel, where Patricia Holt joined us, and we took her to lunch at Green's. She is nice and bright. We sat in a small room off the main ones, so there was some privacy, and Krishnaji was less on view.' I remember that when we went there, we stood in line for a table, and the mâitre d'hôtel was turning people away, and I asked him for a table for three and he started to say no, but he looked up, saw Krishnaji behind me, and instantly ushered us in and gave us [both chuckle] the best table in the place.

S: Of course, of course.

M: 'She drove us'—that's Patricia Holt—'in her car across the Golden Gate Bridge at Krishnaji's request and back. We invited her to Brockwood. We rested and had supper in the sitting room.' We were staying at the Huntington Hotel—a nice hotel with nice suites with a kitchen and a sitting room and a bedroom, and then I had one bedroom down the hall. It was very nice. I could cook and things.

The first of May. 'Mary Links rang from London. She and Joe had gone down to Brockwood, and said the fire damage is not as bad as expected. Krishnaji gave a second very fine talk in the Masonic Hall. Miranda and John were at the talk and came to the hotel afterward, and we all went to lunch at a place called Maggie's. We had a little room to ourselves, but piped-in music made it noisy. Miranda and John dropped Krishnaji and me back at the Huntington. Then came a moment of decision. Alain Naudé has not telephoned us as Krishnaji thinks he should. He knows we are here, but was not seen at the talks. If we do not make a gesture, it escalates the estrangement.' I don't like talking about all such stuff.

S: Mary, it doesn't make any difference. It's all history, and it's just…

M: It's nobody's business. And, you know, it was a temporary estrangement.

S: Yes, that's right. It was just temporary—and it's the kind of thing that happened in Krishnaji's life. And people…

M: Well, not everything in Krishnaji's life has to be discussed.

S: No. No, not everything, but it's just the kind of people that he was surrounded with, and, as I've often said, Krishnaji didn't have the quality of people around him that he should have had, including myself.

M: Well, that doesn't have anything to do with my recording things about other people. For instance, the next sentence says, 'if we do not make the gesture, it escalates the estrangement. I do not feel anything one way or the other. But was equally willing to call or not call. Krishnaji said it was "Naudé's part" to telephone us but I should decide. So I rang him. He had an amiable voice. He had hoped we would ring. He had given up something to be home in case we did. I said we expected him to call. We went on talking chatter and when the conversation wound down, I asked him if he'd like to come over. He said he did. When he came, he hadn't changed any visibly. Krishnaji came in in a friendly, charming way. We talked till it got near to 7 p.m., and I ordered supper for three. It was brought up. There was far less tension in Alain than when we last saw him. Perhaps my stopping helping him financially removed the aggravation. Everything went lightly. Krishnaji and I packed after he left.'

S: Now, I just want to stop here and emphasize my point. This is important in the sense that we see Krishnaji telling you—you're indifferent whether Alain has called or not—Krishnaji feels that Alain should have called, but he gives all of the freedom to you, to do as you think is right. You, out of the goodness of your heart, do call him; and everything is kind of healed and made better. So, this is terribly important to see. This is not something that should be left out, because we see Krishnaji, and we see you working with Krishnaji, and it's terribly important. I know I'm a fanatic about all of these things, but there we are.

M: Alright. Alright.

May second. 'We left the Huntington at 8:30 a.m. by taxi for the airport, and flew to Santa Barbara, which Krishnaji feels is a nice, unhurried, tiny airport with a bookshop that carries Zen and Copernicus,' [both chuckle] 'and where David Moody and Max Falk met us. It was shining Southern California weather. The house was beautiful and peaceful. It has "the right atmosphere," said Krishnaji with a smile. We lunched at Arya Vihara. The Bohms are here again. In the late afternoon, while I was marketing in the village, there was an earthquake centered in Coalinga near Fresno. I didn't feel it and neither did Krishnaji, who was walking down Thacher Road at that point. I met him with the car. In the morning, at the Huntington, he had come to my room, I thought to wake me up as we were leaving early. But he had stayed with me a little, and later he said he had awakened "with something different" in his head, pointing to his forehead, "which frightened the body, so I came to you." The feeling has continued, to a lesser degree, all day, but the fright is gone.' The body, in Krishnaji's terminology, is almost as though it's another entity sometimes.

S: Yes, yes. I was thinking that. And I was thinking also how meticulously he looked after the body, but it was not him, the body.

M: No, but it was his responsibility.

S: It was his responsibility. But when things would happen to the body, he would notice them as you would notice something which happened to your car.

M: That's right.

S: And even when he went to the dentist—you've told me many times—you could see the dentist doing things, but Krishnaji's hands would just be relaxed. It's almost as if he would watch the pain of the body or something.

M: Well, I think I've mentioned it somewhere, but if not, I'll say it now. With this endless dentist going in London, in the taxi once he said to me—we'd been there two hours and I was sitting outside in the waiting room and I knew, because I could hear, it was drilling, drilling, drilling—and he said, "You know, I didn't have a single thought in all that time." It's an odd dissociation between what happens to the body and where his consciousness was.

S: Yes, and so here's something that Krishnaji noticed. Something that happened in his head.

M: Yes, and it frightened the body.

S: It frightened the body. But also, I think what's worth noting here is that he thought the right thing to do was to come and be with you. Because you were protecting him.

M: Yes, I was protecting him. I had a protective symbolism or something.

S: Yes. I think you protected him. It wasn't a symbol.

M: Well, I was. That was my…

S: That was your role, that's what you did.

M: That's what I got involved in all this—doing that, somehow.

S: But somehow, it ran beyond just material protection against the whims of Rajagopal and company—it went into a very profound kind of protection.

M: Mm, hm. And when he used to say to me, "You must outlive me." And I would say, "Why should I outlive you?" He would reply, "To look after me."

S: Yes. Yes.

M: And it wasn't said sentimentally at all.

S: Oh no, no. Or selfishly, I'm sure.

M: No. No.

S: No, it was just that this is an important function. Yes.

M: It was like when Mary said he looked after his body the way a cavalryman would look after his horse [both chuckle]. I've always liked that description. And I was sort of a chain of that.

So, we go on to May third. 'Laundry, etcetera. Krishnaji slept in the morning. He is tired but feeling well. The "different" feeling is still in his head. We had lunch at Arya Vihara. The Lilliefelts got back from San Francisco in the afternoon and walked with us down McAndrew Road. I received, from David Shainberg, a donation of stock for a study center worth about $9,000.'

The next day is just 'I went on an early walk with Erna. Krishnaji did a Sony dictation, Kannan from Madras was at lunch.' Do you remember him?

S: Ah, yes. I remember him well.

M: 'Also at lunch was Frances McCann. I spent most of the day working at my desk. Krishnaji walked with Theo. I telephoned Dorothy. She says the repairs at Brockwood after the fire will take six to nine months. She is coming with Mary Cadogan on the eleventh.' Krishnaji told her she must come.

May fifth. 'Krishnaji and I left the house at 10:30 a.m., and drove along the coast road to Beverly Hills. Krishnaji drove from the poplar trees.' The poplar trees is where he would take the car. It's after you've gone past Oxnard—there are poplar trees and then it's all along the coast and down. 'So he drove from the poplar trees until we had to stop for earth-moving trucks by the sea. We reached Beverly Hills, parked, and walked to Magnin's, where he wanted a belt like one I found for him weeks ago. Then we went to have his hair cut, where it was mercifully quiet, and she gave Krishnaji his second haircut, teaching me how to do it as she went along.' She was my hairdresser. 'Krishnaji sat with an amused quizzical look' [both chuckle]. 'He thanked her and bowed and walked out onto Rodeo Drive looking handsome and elegant in his navy blazer and gray trousers and superb haircut.' [Both chuckle.] 'It was bright sunshine and the increasing opulence of Beverly Hills made Krishnaji say, "Don't lose me…What would I do if I were alone? I am lost," he laughed, and walked with the energy and shyness that he wears in public places. We bought an eight months' supply of vitamins and protein powder to take to Brockwood, and he wanted croissants as we passed a croissant shop. Then he wanted to go to the cutlery shop for a showerhead that would control the temperature but, of course, they didn't have that. So he bought a special nail file. We went back to the car, drove to a shady side street, and ate our sandwich lunch, then drove back to Ojai along the coast road. It is one of those happy days, wrapped in sunlight and the fun of doing errands with him. Ordinary things, which are somehow an adventure because he is there, sitting beside me in the car, walking the streets, seeing his face noticing things, lighting up. And always that astonishing beauty.' [Both chuckle.]

S: Yes, yes. May I ask…I know this is probably a new depth of trivia to which I'm about to sink. [Laughs.]

M: What are you going to say?

S: I can't remember Krishnaji's blazer. What kind of buttons did it have?

M: Oh yes. It had, um—that's a good question.

S: It didn't have gold buttons, did it?

M: No, it didn't have gold buttons.

S: It didn't even have silver buttons, right?

M: No. It had simple buttons.

S: Did it have just blue buttons and not brass blazer buttons?

M: Black comes to my mind, but maybe that's not correct.

S: But they were just normal buttons, they weren't blazer buttons.

M: No, don't think so. Well, you inherited all his clothes. Is there a blazer that you can—it made no impression on you, the blazer.

S: It made no impression on me.

M: Or it doesn't fit you anymore.

S: None of Krishnaji's clothes fit me anymore, that's certain. [Both chuckle.] Okay, well, I just—somehow the picture I have is more like a blue sports coat then a blazer. But I think it was cut like a blazer.

M: It was a blazer.

S: It was a blazer, but it didn't have blazer buttons?

M: Hmm. I don't remember.

S: Well, as I said, I'm plumbing new depths of trivia. [Laughs.]

M: I don't see him with gold buttons. It's not in character.

S: No, I don't see that either—no, no, it's not his character. [Both chuckle.]

M: Well, we've settled that. We dealt with it. We faced it. [Both chuckle.] Anyway…

May sixth. ‘Krishnaji dictated more into his Sony. Rupert Sheldrake came to lunch. Sheldrake gave a seminar yesterday and gives another one tomorrow at the Ojai Foundation on the Happy Valley land.’ That’s up the hill, you know. ‘He had written, saying he was coming to Ojai, and I replied asking him to lunch. The Bohms are still here, which made for general conversation. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with Oak Grove teachers.’

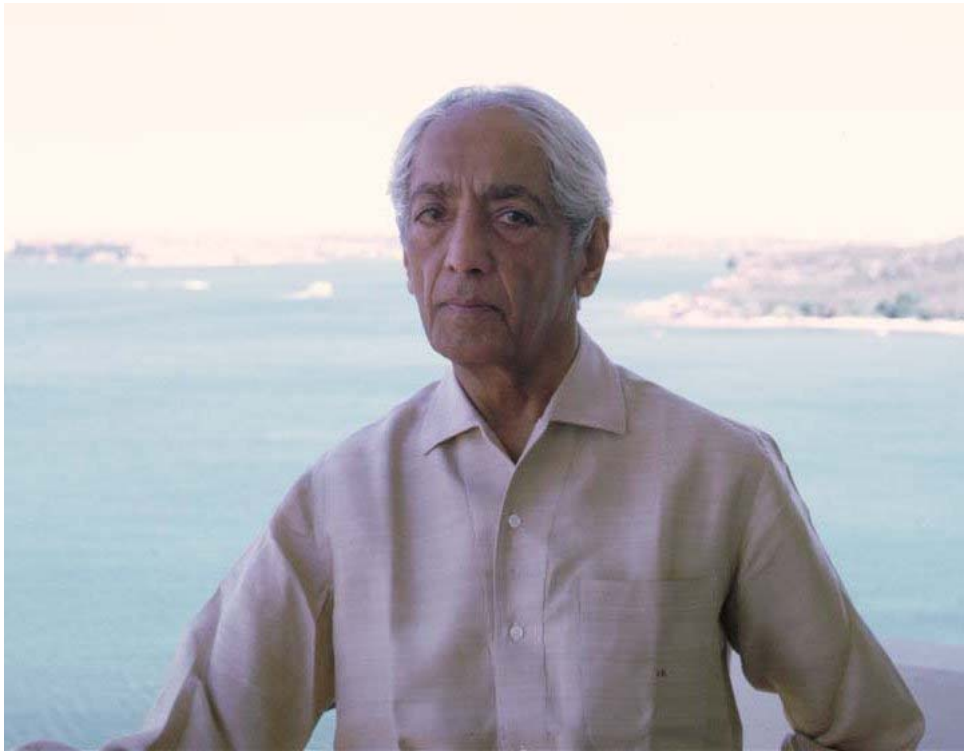
The next day, ‘I telephoned Filomena on her birthday. It was a clear day, and Krishnaji slept a little in the morning. With Erna and Theo, I went to Oak Grove to see if the ground is drying out for the coming talks. It looks hopeful.’ It must have rained a lot before this. ‘Then we went to look at a guest house that Max is building in Krotona. Krishnaji didn’t come as he said going there tired him. It’s a dead place. We came back to lunch at Arya Vihara.’

The eighth: ‘It was a warm day. The Bohms left for Ottawa. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held a teacher meeting here at the cottage. Alfonso Colón came to lunch at Arya Vihara.’

May ninth. ‘Amanda telephoned to say that Miranda and John Perry are planning to marry this summer.’ They did. ‘Krishnaji made another Sony dictation. I did laundry and worked at my desk all day. Dennis cleaned the flat after the Bohms left, and before Dorothy arrives. Erna and I spoke to Jackie Wilde about working on the study center. I walked with Krishnaji down McAndrew.’

There was nothing of significance the next day, but on May eleventh, ‘I left at 7:30 a.m. for Malibu. Spent an hour with Amanda and Phil before going on to Beverly Hills for a haircut. Then, I went to the airport, where I met Mary Cadogan and Dorothy Simmons arriving on TWA from London. It was a beautiful warm day. We drove back to Ojai along the sea. Krishnaji and the Lilliefelts were waiting to greet them. Dorothy is in the guest flat here and Mary is at the Lilliefelts’. Dorothy, Krishnaji, and I had supper in our dining room, and we heard about the Brockwood fire. Dorothy’s looks show the strain it has been on her. I reached Miranda and John after several tries on the telephone to wish them well. Earlier, Krishnaji had done a Sony dictation.’

May twelfth. ‘It is Krishnaji’s eighty-eighth birthday, which he again ignored and brushed away with impatience. Everybody looks smilingly, but doesn’t say a word. He is, if possible, more beautiful, more endearing, and has that spring of energy that seems to keep his body going. I went for the usual 6:45 a.m. walk with Erna.’ I don’t always report that, but I was doing that every day at this period. ‘The weather seems to have turned from the restless rains of this winter, and come back to sunlight. Krishnaji dictated on his Sony. We all lunched at Arya Vihara, then Dorothy and Mary came back here for coffee. We talked most of the afternoon.’



There isn’t much the next day, but on May fourteenth, ‘It was a beautiful day. Krishnaji and I left the house at 11:10 a.m. for the Oak Grove and found there an enormous crowd. It took twenty minutes for Krishnaji to get in and then give his first Ojai talk. Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, Alan Kishbaugh, and Stella Resnick were at lunch afterwards at Arya

Vihara. In the afternoon, I went to reconnoiter another way to get Krishnaji into the Grove from the west side. In the late afternoon, Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and I walked.'

May fifteenth, 'It was another beautiful day. I drove Krishnaji to the west gate of the Grove, then brought the car around to the usual parking place on Besant Road. There was a big crowd, and Krishnaji gave a very fine second talk.[1] At the Arya Vihara lunch were Narayan's brother, G. Krishnamurti, Dorothy, Mary, Alan Kishbaugh, and Stella Resnick. We talked at the table about who would be good to interview Krishnaji on TV. Jonathan Miller, Alasdair Cook, Robert MacNeil, etcetera, were discussed until I jokingly said Dave Allen' [both laugh] 'and Krishnaji's face lit up. "Oh yes," he said.' [Both laugh.] You'd better explain who Dave Allen is.

S: He was a very funny Irish comedian who had a television program in England, and he used to sit on the stage smoking and drinking whiskey and telling lots of anti-religion jokes [both laugh]. Which Krishnaji loved.

M: Yes, I'd forgotten about Dave Allen. [Both chuckle.] 'We both rested till 6 p.m., and then walked down McAndrew Road, Theo joining us. I spoke to Bud this morning about his health.'

Krishnaji by the sea (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

The sixteenth. 'At 10 a.m., I went for a massage. Had early walk, too. Krishnaji was tired and didn't exercise, but rested. His head is paining him; the regular bad of the head pain.' He got head pain a lot of the time. 'It was too hot to walk. We were told that the Chronicle article by Patricia Holt came out yesterday and is good.' Her name is familiar, and I can vaguely see what she looked like. 'I posted the protein powder to Brockwood so we wouldn't have to carry it. We lunched at Arya Vihara.'

May seventeenth. 'Krishnaji held the first question-and-answer meeting of the year in the Grove. Krishnaji came out accompanied by Kishbaugh, and as Krishnaji reached the car, Avsham, Rajagopal's lawyer, appeared and handed him a large envelope. We both guessed what it must be. I asked Alan to find Erna and tell her to come to the cottage. We drove off. I stopped along the road to open the envelope. Rajagopal, the Vigevenos, Porter, and Bee are bringing suit against Krishnaji and the rest of us for breach of settlement, slander, interference with their business, etcetera, and they want $9 million. Krishnaji sought to keep me from being nervous. I wasn't nervous, only angry, but unsurprised. I read it through thoroughly when we reached the house. Erna and Theo arrived. Together we telephoned Cohen, who said, "I didn't think they'd be that stupid." We went to lunch and said no more about it except to Alan Kishbaugh, who had seen Avsham hand Krishnaji the envelope as he was taking Krishnaji to the car. We all came back here after lunch, and all, except Krishnaji, went through it. I said privately to Erna that I feel we must tell the other trustees of the details of our last suit, as they are all now defendants.

S: Of course.

M: Mm. So that was the seventeenth.

S: Now, why hadn't you told them the details before of the last suit?

M: Because it involved—it was personal to Krishnaji. They didn't have to know.

S: Alright. So, they knew the details of the suit legally, but they didn't know the kinds of personal accusations that were made.

M: No, I don't think they did.

S: Erna and Theo did, but not the others.

M: Not the others, I don't think. But at some point—and I forget when it was—Krishnaji told them himself all about it.

S: Mm, hm. Do you want to say what we are referring to here?

M: We're referring to the Rosalind story[2].

S: Right. Okay.

M: Krishnaji told the American trustees himself. I don't remember exactly when it was. It may surface somewhere.

S: Yes. It will probably say here. Yes.

M: May eighteenth. 'Erna and I discussed on our early walk, and we both agreed that we have an obligation to fill in the other defendants on the background to the suits. I came back to the cottage and talked to Krishnaji, who agreed. At 10 a.m., there was a trustee meeting, which had already been called. We were Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Evelyne, Alan Kishbaugh, Alan Hooker, Tom Krause, plus Mary Cadogan, and Dorothy. Erna and I reviewed the past suits and Krishnaji gave the background to the Rajagopal situation. Mary Cadogan's reaction was most forthcoming—sympathy and admiration for all we had to contend with. Krishnaji stayed for all discussions of the day, which moved on to complicated publication difficulties with India. After lunch, at Arya Vihara, we continued discussing the agenda for the September international trustees' meetings of all the Foundations. Krishnaji's head hurt him all day. He walked with Dorothy and Theo while I fixed supper. The pain, which is in the back of the head, let up when he walked, but returned. At 6:30 p.m., a man came to the door and served me with a summons in the Rajagopal case.'

May nineteenth. 'Krishnaji said he slept surprisingly well. But the pain resumed in his head. Usually, these pains are not there when the talks are on. "I haven't had it this bad in a long time…Well, there it is. Grin and bear it," he said. I sorted, chose, and typed questions for Krishnaji to use in the question-and-answer meeting. He dictated three of the questions at breakfast. It was a hot day. He answered all six and spoke for one-and-three-quarter hours. Theo, on the way in, had told him that Vigeveno, Austin Bee, and Annalisa[3] Rajagopal were in the audience, so he made several references to blackmail, and people who wish to harm him.' [Both chuckle.] 'It was a bit edgy, and some may have wondered what he was talking about. "What makes these people follow Rajagopal?" he asked me later. And in the car coming back, he said, "Even now, if Rajagopal had been there, I would have said to him, "Let's wipe the slate clean." Part of the problem is that Krishnaji holds no rancor, and, therefore, he never stood up to Rajagopal and Rosalind. But they never let go of the least crumb of rancor. Krishnaji's head, of course, was all right as soon as he reached the platform. It began again on his return, but less. We lunched at Arya Vihara with Bill Quinn, Max, Mary Cadogan, and Dorothy. It was a hot day. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon. I took Dorothy to a tea for foreign visitors at the Oak Grove School, and we marketed on the way home. We met Krishnaji and Theo walking on McAndrew. I felt exhausted at supper, but revived. Krishnaji got the yellow dishwashing gloves'—they were yellow here and they were blue at Brockwood—'and said, "The Mahatma is doing the washing up."' [Both chuckle.] The article by Patricia Holt in the San Francisco Chronicle came. It was on Krishnaji and a review of Mary's Years of Fulfilment book. It was a nice article.'

There is nothing of significance the next day, but on the twenty-first, 'I was up early to bring cold air via fans into the house. I watered the houseplants and flowers, and Max came to wash the gray car. I drove Krishnaji to the west gate of the Grove, then went around and parked on Besant Road in the usual place. Krishnaji gave a talk that had me in tears[4] at the end. I wanted to kneel, to make that gesture of deepest gratitude for him. An eighty-one-year-old Dutch woman, who came here for the talks, fell, and broke her hip, and is in hospital; so Krishnaji wanted to stop to see her briefly. It is so easy and so un-hospital-like here, that he didn't mind going.' He didn't like going in hospitals.

S: Yes, I remember that.

M: 'The old lady was asleep. I went in first, spoke her name, and said mine, which she recognized. I told her that Krishnaji had come to see her, and her face lit up with surprise. He shook her hand and stayed a few minutes. At lunch were Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, Michael, and Bill Quinn. At 3:30 p.m., I went to the Lilliefelts' for a meeting of the Krishnamurti Information Center people. I met Krishnaji walking down; so he, the Lilliefelts, Kishbaugh, and I walked down McAndrew. I am so sleepy now that the pen is wandering.' [Chuckles.]

May twenty-second: 'Krishnaji was up before me. I warned him the red alarm light was on, but he forgot, and within seconds opened the garden door and the burglar alarm shot me out of bed' [chuckles] 'to turn it off. We went to the west gate of the Grove again to let Krishnaji out, and I drove around to park on Besant Road. There was a larger crowd than ever. His talk was one of those that reached into the deepest core of the mind and, like yesterday, there was in him an embodiment of something sacred.[5] The day was warm and beautiful. The brilliance of the yellow bloom flower along the road seemed to be there to honor him. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Merali, who arrived last night, was there, as was Lou Blau, Dorothy, Mary C., The Moodys, Alan Kishbaugh, Stella Resnick, and Narayan's nephew G. Krishnamurti. At 3 p.m., Krishnaji and I drove with Merali to the Arts Center on Montgomery Street, where, for the first time, Krishnaji and the other trustees saw Krishnamurti: The Challenge of Change, the film that Evelyne Blau and Michael Mendizza have worked on these last five years. I had rather dreaded seeing it, but liked it very much. It runs one-and-a-half hours. It could be tightened, but I wouldn't want to change much. Only the readings by Richard Chamberlain, who reads Krishnaji's statements from the early days, were poor. He emphasizes adjectives and adverbs, an amateur sentimental reading of Krishnaji's austere eloquence. The first half hour of the film is the background biography of his childhood and years up to the 1929 "Truth Is a Pathless Land" speech and "The Dissolution of the Order" speech. Then it is all Krishnaji himself today in India, Brockwood, Saanen, and Ojai. Everyone except Theo seemed to like it. Lou came back to the house and talked with Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and me about the Rajagopal suit against us. He advises us to go after him on all scores. It has been quite a day. I am writing now in the evening and I can see Krishnaji this morning in the Grove, in the pink shirt, sitting with his extraordinary grace and dignity, and in a quiet version of that "Other" voice, being the towering teacher, being everything. Then this afternoon, as the film unrolled, he watched with interest the early days, and was very moved, he said, by the film of Nitya. So was I. Somehow I am moved to tears by Nitya.' It's true. I've always…It seems so tragic that he died.

S: It is. Yes, yes.

M: 'Yesterday, Krishnaji went into the west bedroom at Arya Vihara and said, "This is where I last saw my brother. This is where he died." I felt that tug of something touching me from those days. Krishnaji said he felt no connection with the photos of his young self. It was like watching someone else. And he closed his eyes to the images of himself talking today and listening to the voice.' But Nitya was…

S: I know. And there was such an extraordinarily close relationship with Krishnaji and Nitya. And really—

M: Yes. And Krishnaji always felt it in Arya Vihara.

S: Yes, and Nitya really gave his life to Krishnaji, in a sense.

M: Yes.

S: Can you describe for the eventual listener to this: Which one is the west bedroom? If you come in the front door.

M: You walk in the front door, and you turn right, and you go through the living room. It's the one on the right. It isn't the one in the back. It's in the front of the house.

S: So it's the one on the right in the front of the house.

M: Yes, on the McAndrew Road side of the house. That's the west room. They called that sometimes Mrs. Besant's Room. Some people call it that. Well, both east and west each have a room with a little enclosed porch and a bath. And it's the one on the street side, that's west. Sunsets in the last.

S: Yes [chuckles], okay. But it's not what is now the little porch bedroom.

M: It's looked on as one room because there's no division. I mean, there's a bed in each one because they're single beds but they're not two rooms.

S: Right, but in Nitya's day, the porch would have just been a porch, presumably.

M: I don't know, I wasn't there. But, you may have hit on something, because I think the upstairs thing was built later as Rosalind lived up in the upstairs flat. I don't think the upstairs existed when Nitya was there, so maybe, maybe it was a porch, I don't know. I never thought about it.

May twenty-third: 'I went for a last massage. It gives such a depth of relaxation that I fell asleep. At lunch at Arya Vihara, there were twenty people. Evelyne and Michael Mendizza were there, and details of the film were discussed. Krishnaji, Erna, and I talked afterward back at the cottage. She had talked to Cohen, who will proceed to answer the charges against Krishnaji and me, primarily, and so far none of the others have been served. Krishnaji and I, in the green Mercedes, went to Santa Paula and had our feet seen to by Dr. Hara. The car curved skillfully along the winding road and Krishnaji was pleased and said, "You are driving like a professional."' [Both chuckle.] Tell that to the DMV.[6] [S laughs.] 'The movement of the car seemed a physical pleasure to him. For me, there was the beauty of the day and of driving with him, as we have so many miles through the years. Being alone with him, moving through sunlight, on a country road, is a simple happiness and a world still intact. Passing through upper Ojai, he said, "Those two crooks," of the two Rs, but he was relaxed and the brightness of the broom…' That's the flower, you know.

S: Yes, the yellow.

M: '…and sight of the yucca in bloom seemed of greater moment than anything else.'

The twenty-fourth of May. 'On May ninth'—that was two weeks before this—'I spoke into a cassette I planned to use for verbal memoranda to write up in this journal. I didn't transfer the material to writing on that date, so here is what it was: That morning'—May ninth—'Krishnaji told me that he had been awake that night on and off, and that Rajagopal had been in communication with him, when he was in Ojai, after the case. It didn't reach to New York or San Francisco. Here in Ojai, there was some kind of communication. And when I asked what was its form, he said, "Oh, you know, when you feel that someone is thinking about you." He said that two days ago it abruptly stopped. "This could mean," said he, "that either Rajagopal has done something like sent the rest of the archives to the Huntington Library, or some other thing. Or it means that Rajagopal is dying." But Krishnaji thinks it's more likely the former. I asked if this had anything to do with the strange sensation in his head, and he said it had nothing to do with that. As I am writing this today, the twenty-fourth, he just has come in and said that his head began hurting this morning in the kitchen. It has not hurt since Sunday's talk. It's another hot day. I had an early walk and then worked all day clearing my desk. Krishnaji made this easier by telling me to throw away most of the unanswered letters.' [Both laugh.] Oh, dear. 'Krishnaji started packing. After lunch at Arya Vihara, Krishnaji, Dorothy, Mary C., Mark Lee, David Moody, and I met over the idea for an interschool journal. It seems a side issue to me. Getting on with the actual business of the schools is more important. Krishnaji saw Bill Quinn at 4:30 p.m., and walked later with Theo.'

The twenty-fifth. 'We said goodbye to Dorothy, who flew this afternoon early with Mary Cadogan to London. I telephoned my brother in New York and Philippa in Connecticut. Krishnaji and I left at 8:25 a.m., and drove via Malibu to Los Angeles. We stopped at Renee Frumkin's to give her back her ring, which Krishnaji has kept for her since Sunday. She has felt somewhat endangered, and asked me to ask Krishnaji what she could do to protect herself.' This is a woman who used to live in Santa Monica and showed Krishnaji videotapes. I didn't know her very well, but she was a nice woman. 'Krishnaji gave the message for her, "Don't think about it—you invite it then." But also said that if that was not enough, to send him something of hers for him to have with him for a bit.' He would do this with jewelry or something. 'Krishnaji didn't get out of the car, and we hurried on to Lailee's'—that's our doctor—'where she was able to get enough blood out of his narrow vein to do a blood sugar test. I had sent her The Years of Fulfilment and she asked him to write in it, which he never does, but he did. We then went to Dr. Laura Fox for Krishnaji's glaucoma test, and Fox said the pressure in Krishnaji's eyes is the same, 14. His cataract shows no change from last year, and then when I telephoned Lailee for the results of his test, his blood sugar was 114! It was 150 after eating in February. I felt I was flying, and we came home along the beach in a sort of mist of happiness for me. We stopped in Malibu and bought croissants, including spinach and cheese ones, which we ate with the rest of our picnic in the car at Zuma Beach. How marvelously precious and to be cherished is good news. I asked Krishnaji about the pain in his head. "It is there," he said. Yesterday morning, while he was packing, it was bad. I asked him if he understood it, really knows what causes it. He never mentions it to doctors. He implied it was because he doesn't go to doctors of his own accord.' [Both chuckle.] 'He wouldn't have gone today if I hadn't arranged it. He has forgotten that he said last week that he should have his eyes tested again. But the head business began here in Ojai with the events of the pepper tree.'[7]

The twenty-sixth of May. 'It is a warm day. There are endless house things to do before leaving. I began to pack, but after lunch, Krishnaji began to talk about the past and the ordeal he was subjected to by the two Rs. "Why did I put up with it?" he asked over and over. He has a way of asking others these unanswerable questions, the questions we would put to him. It is an ordeal to listen to what he went through. It was time to make supper when he finished, so I packed my bags in the evening, finishing at midnight. Krishnaji went to sleep early. The house was quiet and beautiful. This week has made a luxuriance of flowers. I am glad to be going to Brockwood, but this house is a blessed place.'

The next day. 'As usual, I went on an early walk with Erna, which is good for me as there are many hours of sitting ahead. I had one last morning talk to Amanda, then finished the house things and packing. Erna brought papers from Cohen's office for me to sign in reply to the Rajagopal suit. We lunched at Arya Vihara at 12:30 p.m. It was a hot day, ninety-one degrees. Krishnaji and I left at 2 p.m. with Mark and David, stopping briefly at the school for the children to wave goodbye to Krishnaji, then drove via the valley to the LA airport because of heavy Memorial Day traffic along the coast. Alan Kishbaugh came to the airport to see Krishnaji off. The TWA flight due to leave at 6 p.m. was delayed. We sat in the lounge, and eventually boarded the plane, but it didn't take off till 8:30. "At last," said Krishnaji and then, "Rajagopal can't get us now."' [Both chuckle.] Oh, dear.

May twenty-eighth. 'We had our preferred two forward seats on either side of the aisle. I slept fitfully, contorted in my seat. Krishnaji sat upright like a statue. His sleeping face in the dim light was austere, majestic; an extraordinary carving. Then he awakened and his face became eager, alive as a child. He said he'd had a good meditation. We landed at 2:30 p.m., went through immigration quickly, found a porter, and our bags were soon out to where Dorothy and Ingrid were waiting with two cars. Krishnaji and I went with Dorothy in her Saab to Brockwood, where everyone was waiting on the driveway. We went into the West Wing hall, which is a charming sitting room now with all the drawing room furniture nicely arranged in it. Upstairs, the dining room is transformed into a bedroom for Krishnaji. My file cabinet, typewriter, etc. is moved from my office so my bedroom becomes my office with a single bed. The damage to Krishnaji's room and guest room is ugly, but I'm surprised that it is not worse. It can all be made better than ever. There was only a faint smell of scorch, mostly in the hall outside my room. They have done enormous work to tidy it up and make things acceptable for Krishnaji's arrival. Krishnaji had supper in bed. I slept in what was my office, now my bedroom, to be nearby if Krishnaji was disturbed by the changes in the place.'

May twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji slept well, and rested most of the day, except for going to lunch downstairs. I still feel woolly from the flight, but began straightening things. I went to a staff meeting, but could scarcely keep awake. I told Parchure, who is here, the results of Krishnaji's medical exams.'

The next day. 'Mary and Joe came in the morning, lunched here, and the four of us sat most of the afternoon in the West Wing kitchen talking at length. Krishnaji recounted his deposition, etc. I felt physically beaten going over all of that again, but Krishnaji, with limitless energy, after that even did a cassette dictation in the evening. It was good to see Mary and Joe. Mary is a little pale. At 5 p.m., I went to a school meeting.' There was a staff meeting.

S: I should just say for…

M: History.

S: Well, for history and for people who won't know what the West Wing was like when you and Krishnaji lived there. When Kathy and I moved up to the West Wing, which we did after Krishnaji, at his or your request—I can't remember which—we converted half of what your kitchen was into a bathroom for the bird room (which had been the dining room), which then became the guest room, and the other half of your previous kitchen became a laundry room. So what is today the bathroom for the guest room and the laundry room is the kitchen that is being referred to here. [Both laugh.]

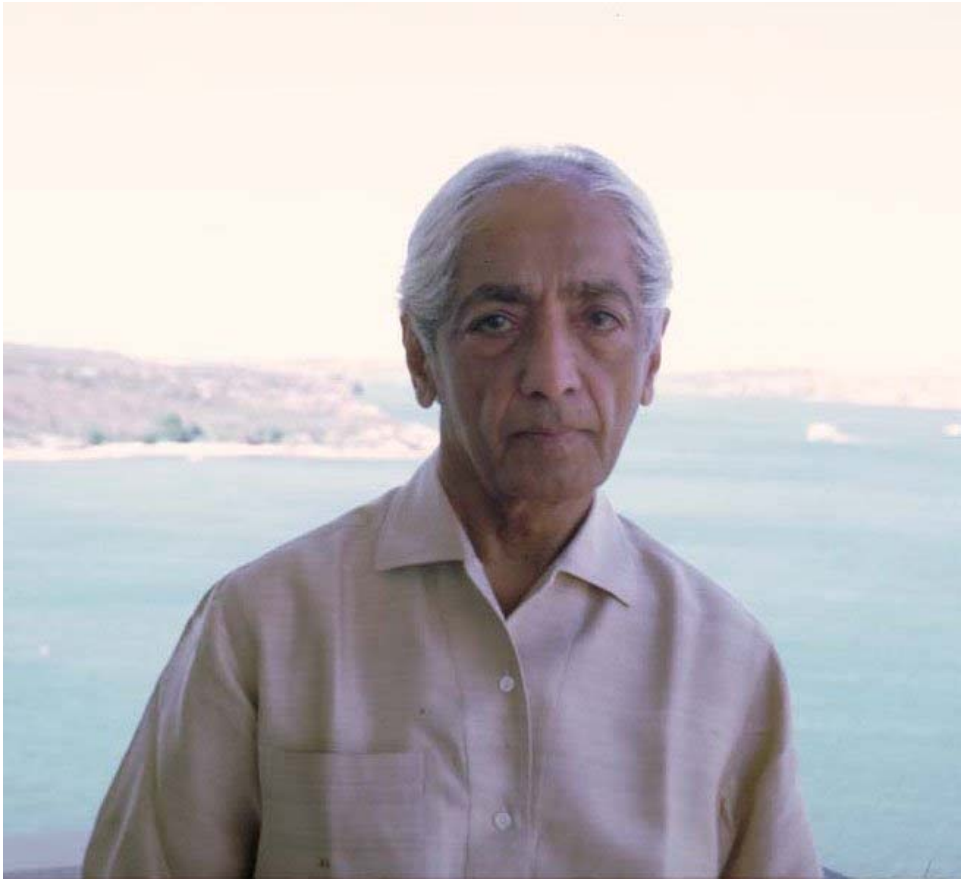
M: That's true. I forgot that, but I see it in my mind's eye.

S: And the little office that you were referring to, and which became your bedroom during the fire damage restoration, was made into a dining room.

M: Yes, for you and Kathy.

S: Right, and we cut that hole in the wall…

M: Between that and the old bathroom…



S: Right, the old bathroom on the landing, which became Kathy's and my kitchen.

M: In the house originally, when we got it—the room that became the guest room—the guests had to walk across the landing to an isolated bathroom, which became your kitchen.

S: Yes, exactly. Right.

M: If anyone can figure all this out from our descriptions, they're very smart. [S laughs.]

S: It was just, otherwise people will walk through Brockwood and say, "What are they talking about?" [Both chuckle.] So, there we are.

Krishnaji by the sea (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: Well, if they care enough they can figure it out from this description, and if not, tant pis.

May thirty-first. 'The sun came out. In Doris's car—mine is being fitted with a new exhaust—I went to Petersfield to get Apex flights for Krishnaji and me to Geneva on first of July. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked; the grove is in full flower. The pink azaleas are blinding, and the handkerchief tree, late this year, is unfurling. I spoke to Betsy in London. There was heavy lightning and thunder and rain in the night, but I was too deep in sleep to be more than faintly aware of it.'

There isn't much for the next three days. I'm unpacking, straightening things out, doing errands, etcetera, except that Krishnaji spoke to the school on June third.

June fourth. ‘The Bohms came to lunch. There was a discussion between Krishnaji and David about doing two videotaped dialogues to be played in August, in Davos at the International Transpersonal Association Conference.’

S: Oh, I remember that. I remember that.

M: I can’t say I do, but speak up.

S: Krishnaji had been invited to go to this Transpersonal Psychology Conference and Krishnaji wasn’t going to go as he didn’t attend such things. But I had suggested to Krishnaji that he make a videotape for the conference instead. He wasn’t sure about that, and then I suggested he do the videotape with David.

M: Oh. Very good idea. And they did it?

S: And they did it.

M: And what happened?

S: I think David might have gone to the conference, and they showed the tapes as a substitute for Krishnaji going. We have the tapes.

M: Well, I must have been there during the recording, because I sat in on those things, but I don’t remember it. Anyway, they did that, ‘and then Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields and back through the lane. Dorothy is disturbed by the apathy and antagonism of some of the students and staff.’ Any comment from you?

S: We’ll get to it, no doubt. It was just more of the rot that had set in and that continued for the next couple of years.

M: Well, in that case, will go to the fifth. ‘At 1:30 p.m., Krishnaji spoke to the school. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I, and Kip set off around the lanes for a walk. We were caught in the thunder and rain and came back very wet. Dorothy went upstairs and Kip didn’t appear at supper. A staff meeting set for 7 p.m. was canceled. At 8 p.m., Scott rang me and said that Dorothy was ill. Dr. Clark was with her, and an ambulance was coming to take her to the Winchester Hospital.’ Heavens, I don’t remember that. ‘Krishnaji and I went up to her room. She had had a shot from Dr. Clark who had just left, and she looked a little disoriented. Montague was fumbling confusedly with some clothing. Krishnaji sat on the edge of her bed, and put his hand over her heart. I packed a bag for her. The ambulance came and two men lifted her into a chair and carried her down the fire exit. Montague and Gisèle Balleys went with her in the ambulance. Guy, her son, who had been there, had ill chosen this time to go for a walk.’ Was this the heart attack?

S: Yes.

M: Yes. Yes. It hadn't done her any good to walk in the rain. But I guess…

S: It hadn't happened then.

M: No. June sixth. 'Beyond her having tests in the hospital, nothing is known yet about Dorothy except that she "rested comfortably" last night. Krishnaji talked to the students in the morning. I went to the staff meeting. I find these meetings wearyingly dull. In the afternoon, Krishnaji and I walked around the lanes. It was a warm and sunny day. We met Montague and Guy on their way to the hospital. Around 8 p.m., Ingrid rang and said that Montague had been told that Dorothy had had a heart attack. She will need to stay in the hospital for ten days, then rest at home for six weeks, and then be quiet and without effort for three months. I relayed this to Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure. We talked about it for a while in Krishnaji's room. Then Scott came by, and we discussed what should be done about running the school while Dorothy is recovering. Krishnaji suggested a committee of Scott, Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen Smith to be in charge. Then he asked Scott how he would feel if Ingrid were put in nominal charge with the three others working with her. Scott agreed readily. Krishnaji had him bring Ingrid up and Krishnaji told her what had been said. She was startled, but agreed if the other three thought it was right. Krishnaji then sent for Harsh and Stephen, and told them. All of us were sitting on the floor of Krishnaji's bedroom. Harsh was in immediate agreement, but Stephen looked corked with other feelings. Krishnaji urged him to speak it out. He demurred for a bit, but finally said he would have proposed Scott. He said it would be better to have an educator in the job. It appeared he thought this was a decision on what a permanent setup would be, but once he was shown that this was only to be a temporary arrangement, pending Dorothy's recovery and return to full function, he accepted it.'

June seventh. 'Krishnaji slept insufficiently. He held a meeting with Montague and his and Dorothy's daughter, Marsha. She had arrived to visit her mother. In their talk with the doctors, it was learned that Dorothy also had a small brain clot, which was dissolved with an anticoagulant. Krishnaji spoke to the staff and announced Ingrid as coordinator, but forgot to mention the committee of Scott, Harsh, and Stephen.' [S chuckles.] That wasn't very good. 'We walked around the lanes. Bud telephoned from New York.'

June eighth. 'We went to London on the 10:46 a.m. train. Krishnaji, who buys the tickets while I park the car, bought second-class tickets when he was told that first-class now costs 16 pounds sterling for a round trip.' [Both laugh.]

S: [laughing] He was economizing before going to Huntsman and Fortnum's.

M: Yes, behind my back, while I parked the car. [Laughs.] 'It wasn't crowded going in, so he saw nothing wrong. Mary and Joe met us at Waterloo. I had my usual sense of pleasure at being in London and the charm of the familiar. It seems there is a feeling of affection in re-encountering accustomed things: the haze of past enjoyment surrounds them. So we went, of course, to Huntsman, and Krishnaji thanked them for cleaning his entire collection of suits after the fire.' [Laughs.] 'We went down to the basement where Maxwell is, and Krishnaji wore down my misgivings, and I ordered a pair of shoes made to order.' I never could wear them—they were terrible. I tell you now. 'I ordered a pair of shoes made to order at a dreadful price. The first fitting will be in September.' This was in June. 'Mary, of course, lunched with us at Fortnum's, where we had our same table, same menu, and, as always, a very pleasant time together. We went to Hatchards, but Krishnaji is off detective stories, is not inclined to novels or biographies, and has enough poetry. So what to get? We looked in vain for stories about animals, and then caught the 4:50 p.m. back to Petersfield.' [Both chuckle.] 'I spoke to Paul Anstee about what to do to get new curtains for the rooms damaged in the fire.'

The next day, 'I went to Winchester for an armoire to put some of Krishnaji's suits in.' That's all it says.

June tenth. 'Years ago, Krishnaji had a letter from Svetlana Peters and she was to have come to Malibu to meet him but called it off at the last minute. She now lives in Cambridge with her twelve-year-old daughter, Olga Peters. She read The Years of Fulfilment, wrote to Mary Links and subsequently to Dorothy about coming to Brockwood. She has also just written me a long, curiously personal letter about herself, to which I replied; and today I met her at the bus stop in Petersfield. A short, smiling, rather round woman with reddish hair and light blue eyes got off. We both smiled in recognition, as if we had met before, and talked easily on the way back. On seeing the Mercedes, she said, "Oh, I haven't been in a good car in some time."' Should we explain?

S: Yes, we should say Svetlana Peters is Stalin's daughter.

M: Stalin's daughter, yes. She married a Mr. Peters, who was an American architect. That's how she came to be called Svetlana Peters. I wonder what—I have a feeling that I am remiss about that woman. Anyway, 'She is staying in a cloisters guest room, and after half an hour of her settling in, I came back to bring her to meet Krishnaji in the West Wing. He came toward her in his warm, eager, welcoming way, and we immediately went off for a walk through the grove where the azaleas are still blazingly beautiful and the handkerchief tree flutters. We went the long way around the fields and came back by the lanes. She seemed in awe and also very happy to meet Krishnaji, to talk and walk with him. I invited her to tea afterward, but she seemed to need to return to her room. I talked to Dr. Reilly, who said Dorothy had a "severe coronary" and will have to remain in the hospital for some more days.' Gosh.

S: Okay, I think we should end it there as we don't have enough tape for another day.

M: Okay.

S: But, we have a little bit of time, so just to say a little bit about this dissent into difficulty at Brockwood. Krishnaji had been talking to Dorothy for more than a year about the fact that she was not handling all this well, was not dealing with it.

M: She thought that brought on her heart attack.

S: Yes, and she subsequently, after I had become principal, and really she had wanted to remain principal, she blamed that coronary on Krishnaji and his saying, "You can't keep doing this—you're not handling the situation well, etcetera, etcetera."

M: She turned against Krishnaji, unfortunately.

S: Yes, she did, which is remarkable.

M: Yes, it's really shocking.

S: Yes, it's absolutely shocking, but she clearly couldn't handle the situation. Anyway, okay—that's all we have time for today.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] For a video of the talk of May 15, 1983.

[2] Rosalind claimed she had had sexual relationship with Krishnaji, but the exact nature and duration of this purported relationship are unknown as so many of the claims she made about it have subsequently been disproved.

[3] Rajagopal's second wife.

[4] For the video tape of the Ojai talk of May 21, 1983.

[5] For the video tape of the Ojai talk of May 22, 1983.

[6] At the time of this discussion in 2005, Mary's driving license had been revoked as she was felt to be too old to drive. She was ninety.

[7] That was the start of "the process," which began in late August 1922.

Issue 76: June 11, 1983 to August 5, 1983

Krishnaji's health is increasingly frail, but there is no let-up in the demands placed on him: he continues with his usual speaking schedule and interviews, he must make an extra round trip from Europe to California for the court case, he must respond to people playing politics at Brockwood, and he must resolve a conflict in India. All this brings Krishnaji to feel that this is an extra-dangerous period; when something antagonistic to "good" is trying to penetrate his world, and people close to him must take extra precautions.

M: Today we begin our recounting on June tenth, 1983. 'The Bohms came to lunch. Svetlana Peters sat next to Krishnaji and Dave was opposite.' A few people are aware of who she is, though not many, but they give no sign of it, which is as it should be, as one of the burdens of her life is the Stalin's daughter image. Krishnaji and Dave talked a bit about international relations at lunch, and she kept silent on that subject. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji and Dave did a dialogue recorded on the three new color video cameras Scott has just acquired. This dialogue is to be sent as a substitute for Krishnaji at an August Conference of Transpersonal Psychology to be held in Davos, Switzerland. The Dalai Lama is one of the participants, and there's a long, varied list of others. Dr. Lichti is on the committee, and so Krishnaji agreed to tape a dialogue with Bohm instead of appearing there. I put Svetlana Peters in the assembly hall, where she watched the recording, but Saral and I watched with the school on the monitor in the dining room. I have a rather heavy cough, as has much of the school, so it was better for me not to be in the room where the recording is made. The video looks superb. The color makes a huge difference and Krishnaji was glowingly beautiful.' [Both chuckle.] 'After lunch, Krishnaji and I took Svetlana on a short walk around the lanes. She asked me to use her first name, which seems to be variously Svetlana or Lana. She leans toward the latter, as sounding less Russian. It sounds, of course, Lana Turner-ish to me' [both chuckle] 'and Svetlana is a nice name, but it's for her to decide.' [Both chuckle.]

June twelfth. 'Krishnaji spoke to everyone in the morning. In the afternoon, I commenced a chill, and I lay on my bedroom floor by the radiator. Fever ensued and rose to 104 degrees. Dr. Parchure gave me Septrim, an antibacterial drug. I have a heavy cough and congestion in the lungs.'

The next day. 'I feel rotten. The fever persists, though it is less. Dr. Parchure says I have viral pneumonitis. Svetlana Peters came to say goodbye as she returns to Cambridge by bus. The side effect of Septrim is nausea.' I remember Svetlana came in and I was huddled on the floor by the radiator from my chill, and I felt she got some image of me as a very unhealthy person. Or so she somehow evinced later—I forget how.

S: [chuckles] As you were ill, I was the one who was asked to drive her to Petersfield, I remember. And contrary to not wanting to talk about her father—she just talked a blue streak about Stalin.

M: [laughs] That's interesting. But did she bring it up?

S: I can't remember, but she just talked a blue streak, and she told me the very funny story about her father's death.

M: What was that, please? We'll record it for history.

S: Oh—I'm sure it must be written someplace. Anyway, as she told it, it seemed humorous and also like justice unfolding. So, he had what might have been a heart attack or something; anyway, it left him helpless on the floor. The servants found him, but they didn't dare touch him, because getting something wrong with Stalin would have been death, or worse. So they called the head of the house. The head of the house came, but would not touch him. The head of the house called the KGB. KGB agents assigned to Stalin's protection came, but the agents would not do anything. They called the head of the KGB. Meanwhile, Stalin is in urgent need of medical attention. The head of the KGB came and he called Stalin's doctor. The doctor came, but the doctor would do nothing decisive, but insisted instead on calling the head of the hospital or the medical university, or whatever; so all this time, all these people were called and came but nobody dared do anything, so, meanwhile, he died.

M: [both chuckle] They probably did the right thing.

S: I think they did do the right thing; but it was just, you know, listening to her tell the story of all these people who were called, who rushed over and who wouldn't do anything, but deciding that there was someone above them that they had to call. [Laughs.] And as I remember the story, it was comic, and it was tragic, and it seemed just. Here was this man lying for hours, dying, needing medical attention, and nobody dared give it to him [laughs] for fear of getting into trouble; the fear he generated.

M: Yes, that's very interesting.

S: And she told all kinds of other stories that made me think, "My god, what a strange reality to grow up in."

M: Between Brockwood, eight miles to Petersfield? She must've talked a blue streak.

S: She did talk a blue streak, but then I didn't just drop her off. We sat in the car and waited for the bus to show up, which was probably late, given it was an English bus. And so we talked for quite a while.

M: Oh well, that's fascinating. [Both laugh.] You never told me all this. Well, it's now part of the record.

I don't record anything for the next day except that I'm still ill, and I was still ill on June fifteenth, so 'Scott accompanied Krishnaji to London. Mary and Joe met Krishnaji, took him to his dentist, Mr. Thompson, after which Krishnaji lunched at their flat. Then Joe took Krishnaji to Truefitt for a haircut, where Scott rejoined him, and they came home. Scott went to the Swiss consulate for Krishnaji's visa. I stayed in bed all day.'

The sixteenth. 'My fever has subsided. I feel weak but better. Krishnaji spoke to the whole school. I got up in the afternoon for the return of Dorothy from the hospital. She looked tired and ravaged, but was able to climb very slowly, with Krishnaji's help, up the fire escape stairwell to her room. The room next to the one she shared with Montague has been arranged for her as a bedroom. Montague was against it. He doesn't seem to realize that he has saturated their bedroom with his pipe smoking. The lack of sensitivity is amazing. He was puffing on the pipe while Dorothy was having a heart attack, and son Guy is even worse. While she was having the attack and waiting for the doctor to come, he went for a walk. Today, knowing his mother was arriving from the hospital, he also went for a walk, and wasn't there to help.'

S: Yes, that was typical of him. Really extraordinary.

M: Well, that's what happened.

The next day, I don't record anything of significance, and on June eighteenth, it only says, 'I coughed most of the night, paroxysms of coughing, and felt as if my ribs would break. Krishnaji dictated letters in the morning. I saw Dorothy briefly. She looks much better. I took a nap, and had supper upstairs.'

For the nineteenth, it only says: 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. Mr. Santhanam came by car from London, attended the meeting, and lunched with us.'

The twentieth of June. 'I discovered Frances has slipped back into her delusions. She was lying rigidly in bed unable, she said, to get up. She had locked herself in. It took me twenty minutes to persuade her to get up and let me in. She hasn't taken her medicine since before leaving Ojai. Hidley consented to her coming, but she lacks the insight to take her medication when her symptoms begin. I found the pills and Hidley's instructions and gave her some. Dave and Saral came to lunch and in afternoon, Krishnaji and Dave did a continuation of the video dialogue on The Future of Man for the Davos Conference.'

S: Which, I've been told, to be more politically correct, is now called The Future of Humanity.

M: Oh. You mean, the tape series. [Chuckles.]

S: Yes, both those tapes.

M: June twenty-first. 'Frances is again in bed. More delusionary talk. Dr. Parchure and I persuaded her to take her pills and a little liquid. What should we do? She is supposed to go visit her sister on Friday and then go to Gstaad. Krishnaji spoke to the students and I went to the staff meeting. In afternoon, Krishnaji talked to the four—Ingrid, Scott, Harsh, and Stephen—and gave them full authority from the Foundation to act. I had previously spoken with the other trustees to get their agreement to it.'

The twenty-second. 'Frances got up. The pills are working. I spoke to Hidley, who says she must have supervision. Krishnaji, in the afternoon, asked her what she would prefer, to return to Ojai and Hidley's care, or find a psychiatrist in Switzerland. She chose Ojai. Dr. Clark saw Dorothy and is satisfied with her condition.'

June twenty-third. 'Frances's sister, Helen, rang from Switzerland in indignant alarm at Frances not going there. She demanded to talk to Krishnaji. I explained the situation as well as I could.' Her sister blamed Krishnamurti for everything.

S: Yes.

M: 'Krishnaji talked to the school in the morning and to the staff at 4 p.m. I went on errands to Alresford. Pupul arrived at 5:30 p.m. to stay for two days. Krishnaji had me recount briefly the outline of the legal troubles with Rajagopal. I didn't go into details. She listened with a very long upper lip and said little. She is staying two nights in what was my office and now is a single guest room.' She, of course, thought Rajagopal Indian, and he was business-like, and so…

S: Yes, so Rajagopal had to be fine because he was Indian.

M: That's right.

June twenty-fourth. 'There was another angry call from Frances's sister demanding that Krishnaji call "a conference of the leading psychiatrists in London for next Monday." I said it was not possible. Krishnaji cannot do that. He knows no psychiatrist in this country, and cannot take that responsibility. If she wishes to do that, it is up to her. She spluttered something about Krishnaji had taken responsibility when Frances gave a lot of money. I said it is unfortunate she should think in such terms, that Krishnaji had brought Hidley into the picture as someone he had confidence in and could recommend when Frances is in Ojai and needed help, but could not be expected to take full care of Frances. I said, in any case, she's now up and better and has changed her plans and is to go to Ojai. I had already changed Frances's ticket to the thirtieth, so she will be on the same flight as Katie Hidley.' That was John Hidley's daughter, who is a student at Brockwood. 'Hidley rang me later and said the McCann cousin in New York had rung him, and sounded reasonable, though under pressure from the sister.' That was the cousin who looked after Frances's finances. 'I rang Erna about Frances's arrival. Krishnaji and Pupul, in the afternoon, did a videotaped dialogue. Krishnaji and I walked around the block after supper. I'm still coughing.'

The twenty-fifth of June. 'Krishnaji and Pupul did a second videotaped dialogue in the morning. She left after lunch and returns to Delhi tomorrow. There was a staff meeting at 4:45 p.m., and Krishnaji came to it unannounced. Brian Nicholson read a statement on why he had decided to leave. It was unclear, and Krishnaji went into it. Also, a similar decision was made by Matthew. It was an intense meeting.' Who was Matthew?

S: Matthew was an American who taught, I think, math, and he was one of Nicholson's cohorts in the grab for power that didn't work. [M chuckles.] He had been a student at Brockwood. Matthew—what was his name? Anyway, this was all part of the mess that had gotten out of hand at Brockwood. They were all vying for power and influence—they saw themselves as the inheritors of the mantle of Brockwood—and when things didn't go to them (they clearly weren't in this committee running Brockwood in Dorothy's convalescence), they were very unhappy. So, those two decided to leave, thankfully.

M: Well, that was good.

S: There must have been some preview that this "statement" was going to happen, because Krishnaji didn't normally come to staff meetings. In fact, I can't remember him ever coming to staff meetings.

M: No, he didn't. No—I can't even remember this staff meeting. [Both chuckle.]

The twenty-sixth of June. 'At 11:30 a.m., instead of speaking to the whole school and visitors, as he would normally do on a Sunday, Krishnaji spoke only to the staff. Most intensely, most irresistibly, and probingly. It seemed to have a shaking effect.'

S: Good. This was Krishnaji undoing any "shaking up" those two thought they would do with their leaving and statements.

M: Good. [Chuckles.]

June twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji and I took the 9:45 a.m. train to London. Joe met us and dropped me, and I took slacks to Hilliard's to be copied. I then got a present for Vanda, had a haircut, etc. and joined Krishnaji at Mary and Joe's, where we lunched very pleasantly indeed. Joe took us back to Waterloo. Meanwhile, Frances's sister had come from Switzerland. Frances met her in Petersfield, took her to lunch at the little Donkey Cart restaurant, and put her back on the train.'

S: Extraordinary. She came all that way and didn't even see Brockwood.

M: Well, she didn't want to. I mean, you know—enemy territory. [Both chuckle.]

The twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji spoke to students. I went to Dr. Reilly about my continuing heavy cough. He gave me a prescription and sent me for a chest X-ray to the Winchester Hospital. On, my return, I talked before lunch with Marie-Bertrande and Jean-Michel Maroger, who are here to take Diane home tomorrow at the end of term. In the afternoon, I spoke for an hour with the Hans Vincents from the Holland Stichting about starting a school there.' They were thinking that they should have a school. 'At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held another staff meeting and is lighting fires under them.' [Both chuckle.]

June twenty-ninth. ‘It is the end of the term. I spent most of the day at the typewriter, but saw Dorothy briefly. She wasn’t feeling well. Doctor Reilly says there is an “old fibrosis” in the lung left-middle zone.’ That must have been a description of what was ailing her. ‘Jean-Michel was at lunch and then he took Diane back to France.’

The thirtieth. ‘Frances left for Ojai with Katie Hidley. It was packing and putting things in order all day for me. I had a good visit with Dorothy, who seemed well. Krishnaji and I spoke to Erna in Ojai. Krishnaji wants “to end it.” How can we? Erna says we have to defend the suit.’

The first of July. ‘I was packed and ready to go by 7:30 a.m. Krishnaji and I left Brockwood at 8:30 a.m. in a school car driven by Kathy Forbes. At Heathrow, Rita Zampese was there to smooth Krishnaji’s departure, and her pull as the head Lufthansa public relations persuaded Swiss Air not to charge us for our excess baggage weight.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘We took the 10:30 a.m. Swiss Air to Geneva, and reached Geneva a bit after 1 p.m., where we took a taxi to the Hotel des Bergues. Lunched. In the afternoon, we walked across to do our usual errands: ties chez Jacquet for Joe Links and Krishnaji—the choice was less good this year. Then to Patek pour régler les montres’—the annual adjustment to his pocket watches. ‘Then to the Pharmacie Principal and Grand Passage, where we got long toweling bathrobes for Krishnaji and chose an alarm clock for Dr. Parchure. That seemed enough walking for us both, so we returned to rest before dinner. We dined very pleasantly at the Amphitryon. Krishnaji ate very well and seemed to enjoy it.’

The next day, ‘We spent the morning in beds, the luxury of time and breakfast in bed.’ It is lovely to have breakfast in bed.

S: I know. [Chuckles.]

M: ‘I coughed my current earthquakes in the night, but the quiet morning was a rest. These pauses in Geneva each year are small luxuries to me. Krishnaji has come safely from wherever we were, and we are again in the tidy order of Switzerland. Today, we lunched in the Pavillon, as the Amphitryon was closed. And at 2:30 p.m., Hertz delivered a nice little white Ford Fiesta. The enjoyment of the familiar was there again. We drove doucement au bord du lac until Morges and then the autoroute to the turn-off to Oron, then via Bulle, etcetera, and came to Tannegg by 5:40 p.m. Vanda and Fosca arrived yesterday. Fosca took some persuading to come, says Vanda. She doesn’t like to leave her ailing sister, and Fosca will be ninety next December, though she looks no different. We unpacked before supper. Krishnaji came to the table. Though he is beginning to cough, he says he still feels full of energy.’

July third. ‘Krishnaji stayed in bed. He had a 99.2 fever in the afternoon. I rang Dr. Parchure at Brockwood for advice. He said that Dorothy had come downstairs at Brockwood for lunch and a walk outside with Whisper. I slept all afternoon. Krishnaji said at lunch that he would live to be 100, “To see what it is like.” He later told me, “Rajagopal is getting it. I have sent two angels to tell him.”’ [Both chuckle.]

S: Those angels didn't do a good job.

M: No, they were not persuasive. They, being angels, aren't the best thing to be to deal with Rajagopal. [S laughs.] He should've sent something from downstairs with a pitchfork.

S: [Both laugh.] Yes, exactly.

M: Oh, dear.

The fourth of July. 'I went down into Gstaad on errands. Krishnaji stayed in bed. I slept in the afternoon. Yen Yang, Raman, Scott, and Harsh all came by with things from Dr. Parchure.' Thank you. That was quick.

S: No, I think we would have left before you call to Parchure.

M: Yes. I see.

The fifth. 'Krishnaji remained in bed. His temperature was 99.4 in the afternoon. Vanda and I did shopping errands in the morning. Dr. Parchure arrived just before supper, having flown to Geneva and found his way by train to Gstaad. I am very cheered to have him at the medical helm. Krishnaji is glad of his presence, too.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji remained in bed. His temperature was ninety-eight in the afternoon. Dr. Parchure and I went shopping for all kinds of remedies, a steamer, etcetera. I worked at the desk, but also took a nap. Vanda signed the lease for Tannegg for next year.'

July seventh. 'Krishnaji remained in bed all day, but has no fever today. I did desk work and ran errands. I dined with Henry and Margot Bamberger'—that's my accountant from Los Angeles—'and the Lazar Bernhardts, who are traveling with them.' That's a Los Angeles lawyer who handled things for me and Sam.

There's really nothing the next day, but on the ninth of July, 'I got a letter from Mary L. suggesting novelist, philosopher, and don at Oxford Iris Murdoch as someone for a videotaped dialogue with Krishnaji. He agreed, so I wrote to Mary to pursue it. As Vanda and I were leaving Tannegg to do our errands, a taxi disgorged a woman with four bags. It was this year's crazy lady. A Ruth Jacov of Zürich, who thinks she is married to Krishnaji, and writes amorous letters about their life on the astral plane.' [Both chuckle.] 'She had arrived to join him at Tannegg. I took the firm line of reality, having learned from all past summers that endless understanding conversations only let the fantasies bloom. We offered to drive her to a hotel, but she refused that, so we took her back to the train station from which she had just come, and somehow got our errands done before everything closed for the noon hour.' [Both chuckle.] This is a representative Gstaad summer day event. [Both laugh.] 'After lunch, we telephoned Dorothy at Brockwood. Her voice sounded well. Dr. Reilly prescribed a two-mile walk each day. She says she feels feeble. We also telephoned Erna. Rajagopal refused to come to Oxnard for a deposition, insisting it be done in Ojai. Stuart Comis'—that's our lawyer—'goes to court on Monday about this.' He wanted it done in his house. In other words, he didn't want to do it, but anyway.

The tenth of July. 'Krishnaji, who got up yesterday with his voice was heavy and was still coughing—his voice was clear this morning, in spite of a bad night and not enough sleep.' He had this—usually, something was wrong with him, he would have some illness before the talks. And on the morning of the talk, it would be gone. It was remarkable, and it happened over and over. Anyway, 'Dr. Parchure had me give him, just before leaving for the tent, a spoon of warmed onion juice and honey.' [Chuckles.] 'He gave the talk almost without coughing. The summoning of energy that his body is able to do when needed, that is, for his work, is extraordinary. And it happened again this morning. He spoke one hour and five minutes to an overflowing tent. He slept when he got back to the chalet, and lunched in bed. After some coughing, he slept all afternoon. So did I. Though he is tired, he is reading a Graham Greene. He has nothing else. All the shelves of thrillers are out of favor, and there are no nature books at Cadoneau's store.' Do you remember Madame Cadoneau?

S: I do, indeed.

M: [chuckles] 'He doesn't want novels, least of all, what I have, which is Proust.' [Both laugh.] 'I will go back to hunt again tomorrow.'

July eleventh. 'Krishnaji is still coughing. He dictated four letters to India. There is trouble there, as usual, with Bangalore Valley School. The principal, Dr. Shankar, and Krishnakutti have started advertising for religious people and are starting religious centers here and there without consulting KFI. The Patwardhans are very upset. Dictating letters and expending his energy did no good for his cough. Dr. Parchure feared he was heading for fever and, with the talk tomorrow, it was worrisome. Dr. Lichti was due to arrive in Saanen tonight for the talks. I rang her at lunchtime in Zürich and explained the situation. She telephoned the Gstaad pharmacy with a prescription, which I fetched: an antibiotic, Fibromyacin. Dr. Parchure delayed giving it until Dagmar Lichti arrived. But, meanwhile, he did Krishnaji's fasting blood sugar test, and another one, one-and-a-half hours after lunch, and it went to the top of the color chart. Parchure estimated it at 280. Dagmar arrived at 7 p.m. She brought various medical things with her. She examined Krishnaji, and decided he did not need Fibromyacin as the fever has not developed. Krishnaji's blood sugar is the problem. Dagmar telephoned one of Gstaad's pharmacies for Rastinon, an anti-diabetic pill Krishnaji took in India, which agreed with him. The pharmacist opened his place at 7:30 p.m., and I fetched the tablets. Dagmar also gave Krishnaji a Vitamin B shot very skillfully in the vein in his left forearm. She stayed to supper with Vanda, Dr. Parchure, and me. She also prescribed for my cough.' She was a wonderful woman.

S: Yes, she was.

M: July twelfth. 'Krishnaji didn't sleep well. There were too many things done with his body last evening. But he coughed less. He looked tired when he got on the platform, but that extraordinary flow of strength came; his face changing, and a remarkable talk[1] ensued for just over an hour. He spoke of zero containing all the numbers, and then said the present contains all of time. Peace cannot come about through thought. If you see division in relationship, what do you do? To not try to answer with thought is the beginning of intelligence. When we got back to the chalet, Al Blackburn rang. He called earlier about something very important that he must see Krishnaji about right away. So Krishnaji said, "Get it over, have him come now." He took time to get there when Krishnaji could have been sleeping. Then it turned out, the thing of importance was a book Blackburn wrote that is being published. For this, he took over half an hour of Krishnaji's energy. Wretched idiot,' I write. [Both chuckle.] I was irritable because, you know, he said he had to see Krishnaji about something important, and it was only about a book he'd written. 'During that time, Parchure gave me a Vitamin B shot. Dagmar came to lunch. Krishnaji ate in bed. Dr. Parchure and Dagmar made lists of foods Krishnaji can and cannot eat. Dr. Parchure took his blood sugar fasting this morning and it was 180. He has a strict diet now. Scott came by at 5:30 p.m. The videos are now on sale in English at the very end of the talk, minutes after Krishnaji stopped speaking, and they are on sale at the next meeting in five languages—French, German, Italian, Spanish and Dutch.' That was really extraordinary, wonderful.

S: It was extraordinary. Audience members could get up from their seats and buy a videotape of the talk they had just heard. And the next talk day, they could get the talk dubbed in all these languages.

M: It reminds me of a woman later that year, I think it was that year, during the talks at Brockwood: She bought a videotape of a previous talk before the talk of that day began, and said 'But, can I buy the one for today?'—Krishnaji hadn't given the talk yet. [Both laugh.]

S: No, we weren't that good! [Both laugh.]

M: I luckily was at the videotape sales table when this happened. [Chuckles.] Anyway…

The thirteenth of July. 'Dr. Lichti gave Krishnaji an intravenous shot in the early morning. Dr. Parchure and I discussed Krishnaji's expenditure of energy, and Dr. Parchure talked to Krishnaji, telling him how unhappy he is at having to give Krishnaji shots and remedies to pick him up when the overall care of his health is neglected, that is, giving the body a chance to rebuild its own energies. He suggested, and Krishnaji agreed, that he henceforth deal only with questions of the teachings; not personal relations, the workings of schools, the organizations, etcetera. So, based on this, he only greeted those who came to attend the trustee meeting of the English Foundation here at 11 a.m.: Cadogan, Maroger, Van der Straten, Hammond, Porter, Forbes, Harsh, and Stephen Smith. Krishnaji remained in bed all day. In the afternoon, Marie-Bertrande, Daphne, and Diane came to tea. About 8:30 p.m., the telephone rang. It was Stanley Cohen, Erna, and Theo, who had met for four hours at his office and were calling from there. Rajagopal's lawyers demand Krishnaji give a deposition before October first. I said it was impossible to expect a man of eighty-eight, in fragile health, with a heavy schedule, to fly halfway around the world in a week's time, etcetera. Cohen said the consequences could be Krishnaji being found in default in the suit, his testimony no longer usable, and a possible loss to the Foundation and the rest of us. We talked at length. Finally, I said I would report it all to Krishnaji and telephone tomorrow. I did this, and Krishnaji said we must go. As he speaks tomorrow, he went to bed and slept well. I didn't.'

The fourteenth of July: 'I talked to Krishnaji early about the legal situation. He suggested canceling the international trustee meetings to have been held at Brockwood from September seven to fourteen, and that he and I fly to California on the seventh. I agreed, providing we take Parchure along to care for his health. He agreed. I telephoned Mary Cadogan and Jane Hammond here about this plan, and then rang Pupul in Delhi, who immediately said Krishnaji mustn't go; then, that we must get another lawyer; then that Krishnaji must go on a diplomatic passport. I dealt with all that and asked her to let Sunanda know that the international trustee meetings were off. Krishnaji and I talked it over and decided we'd go on the seventh as above, and remain in Ojai until just before he has to go to India, then all three of us would return to Brockwood. Krishnaji would go to Delhi, accompanied by Parchure, and I would remain at Brockwood to complete my chores about the fire damage insurance, choosing fabrics, etcetera, then I would return to the U.S. Krishnaji gave his third Saanen talk with vigor.[2] Dagmar Lichti came to lunch. I rang Erna and told her what we were doing. She sounded very relieved. Krishnaji and I went for the first walk we have taken this year, up the hill and through the woods.[3] Scott joined us.'

July fifteenth. 'I seem to have a cold, though I'm still coughing convulsively from the infection at Brockwood. I stayed in and did letters all day. Krishnaji remained in bed. Vanda went to Lausanne. Dagmar Lichti brought special butter, breads, and things from Zürich for Krishnaji.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji got up and went for a walk with Dr. Parchure after supper, really too late. It was after 9 p.m. when they returned.' Goodness.

The sixteenth. 'Mary Links rang from London. She saw Dorothy at Brockwood yesterday, and said she looked fairly well. She also had a telephone call from Rajagopal about two letters he had sent her. He asked if she had she received them, and why hadn't she acknowledged them? Because there was no note from him, she replied. He asked, had she shown them to anyone? She replied, "To Joe." Who? he asked. "My husband," she said. "Oh, that's alright," he said. Then he asked, "To anyone else? To Mary Zimbalist?" Then Mary changed the subject and the conversation ended.' [Both chuckle.] 'I told her we were going to Ojai in September. Dagmar Lichti gave Krishnaji a second intravenous shot in the delicate vein in his arm.' He was very hard to give intravenous shots to, as his veins were small. 'I fetched Mr. and Mrs. Rex Henry at the Saanerhof and brought them to lunch at Tannegg. He wrote that they had come to hear Krishnaji one last time as they are eighty-six and getting infirm. They live now in southern Spain. I drove them back. I took a nap. Scott came by and walked with Krishnaji. David Shainberg rang. He has just arrived in Gstaad. He has a friend with him. I invited them to lunch tomorrow.'

The seventeenth of July. ‘It is another clear, warm day, and it was very hot in the tent, which was crammed with people. Krishnaji gave his fourth Saanen talk on what is intelligence. After resting, he came to the lunch table. We were eight: Vanda, Dagmar, Rita Zampese, Shainberg and his friend Catherine Segonzac, Parchure, and me. The friend is a French psychologist who lives in New York and does waking dream therapy—?’ I have a dash and a question mark. [S chuckles.] ‘I took a nap after they all left. Mary C. and Jane Hammond came by at 6 p.m., and I went with them up the Hornberg for dinner. The air was cooler, and had a lovely mountain feeling: cowbells, buttercups, and the silent snow-topped peaks. We had fondue and talked, and my raspy throat was soothed with the cold descent of ice cream. This summer has been one perfect sunny day after another, but almost too hot. Mary Links said it was ninety-four degrees in London. To be hot is increasingly unpleasant for me. It seems to unbalance the body.’

July eighteenth. ‘Vanda left at 9:30 a.m. for Florence. She will return August ninth, so I can go to Rome to see Filomena on the tenth. The telephone rang, and it was Asit at the Palace Hotel, having arrived from Greece last midnight. He came to see Krishnaji midmorning and the three of us talked till lunchtime. Computer talk at first—the enormous developments. His company specializes in a computer larger than any made by IBM. The Japanese have set national goals to cure cancer, to duplicate the human brain.’

‘Krishnaji: “Where will all this lead?”’

‘Asit: “Perhaps to a wider gap between the technical elite and the masses who will have almost no opportunities in the world as it will be.”’

‘I asked what is happening along these lines in Russia, and Asit said they are concentrating on biochemistry, research into parapsychology, especially mind reading and control. Asit asked Krishnaji if this is possible. Krishnaji said, “Of course, mind reading is obviously possible.” Asit asked if Krishnaji could do it, and Krishnaji replied that he could, but that he refuses to. Then as Asit is an Indian trustee, he was told of the Rajagopal suit. Krishnaji went on to say a person can block someone else reading one’s mind, reaching it. Rajagopal’s aggression is directed at him, but Krishnaji forms a wall it cannot penetrate. On Krishnaji’s side, there is emptiness, which forms the wall, and within this, Krishnaji can function.’ This emptiness business is something fascinating and deeply part of Krishnaji.

S: Yes, it is extraordinary.

M: ‘Krishnaji went on to say that because Rajagopal’s sendings cannot penetrate, “It is like coming up against a rock,” and it returns to Rajagopal. “I do not want to hurt him. I am not doing anything to him,” but something may change, that stillness may reach him, or perhaps he is too full of hatred, it may not. “It will be interesting to see. That is one reason I want to go to California.” Krishnaji spoke in that way that may be serious or not, of those being high in Masonry, and to whom two angels are given.’ [Chuckles.] I didn’t know angels had anything to do with Masonry, did you?

S: The Masonic order? I have no idea what they had to do with…[chuckles].

M: Why don't we know these things? Why weren't we told? [Said jokingly.]

S: Yes, and why don't we have our own angels?

M: Well, if we were clever and sensitive, we would have known. They watch—oh, wait a minute…'Krishnaji spoke in that way that may be serious or may not of those very high in Masonry to whom two angels are given. They watch over the welfare of a person or persons, though he may not ask for himself and may rarely ask an action from them. Krishnaji has never asked his until now. But he has "sent two angels to talk to Rajagopal" to make him turn from this ugliness.' [Chuckles.] 'Asit translated this into a force of goodness and Krishnaji smiled. He spoke of sensing an atmosphere when serious things are being discussed, which is different from the atmosphere when discussing computers.' There was that. 'Though interest generates its own atmosphere. Asit asked if Krishnaji could convey to a friendly person instead of Rajagopal in ways that would change them. Krishnaji said that is what is happening in the tent, but the other person must be willing to listen. I understand this to be listening with emptiness, without the filter and chatter of thought. Krishnaji's turning away Rajagopal's aggressive projections seem to be empty and that emptiness creates the wall of privacy, which is impenetrable. His mind cannot be read if this happens. Krishnaji said he thinks the ancient Hindus knew about this. This is part of meditation.'

'Dr. Parchure joined us at lunch. Asit left at 3 p.m. to go to Geneva, then onto Paris, New York, etcetera. Dr. Parchure took Krishnaji's blood sugar this morning before eating, and it was 120, and postprandial this afternoon was 200. I walked with Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure. Krishnaji was tired, but he wants to be well, and it is said that exercise reduces blood sugar, and so off we went. He approved my setting a good pace and when we came to the river, he wanted to go on. His soldier walk.' You know that walk. 'He is so very much the good child at such moments that it wrenches my heart. His spirit is so eager. We came back to find Asit still here, postponing his future trips because he has never heard Krishnaji speak in Saanen. Krishnaji wants to give Fosca a rest tomorrow, so we will lunch with Asit at the Palace Hotel.'

The nineteenth of July. 'Krishnaji gave talk number five. Krishnaji, Dagmar, Rita Zampese, and I lunched with Asit and Minakshi, Asit's wife, at the Palace Hotel. Asit had ordered the meal, which was very splendid. Alone in the large dining room, served by two waiters and a mâitre d'hôtel: huge cheese soufflés and other goodies. We took naps later. Krishnaji and I walked to the river, joined by Scott. Dorothy telephoned. Her checkup and cardiogram went well and she sounded cheerful.'

The twentieth. 'Krishnaji slept well. In the morning, Asit came and there was a taped discussion with Krishnaji. Scott, Dr. Parchure, and I participating slightly. Asit left Gstaad. Scott lunched with us. Mr. Sendra saw Krishnaji at 5 p.m., David Shainberg came by and walked with Krishnaji. I picked up Mary Cadogan and we went to supper with Harsh and the audio crew at their chalet. Shainberg had said previously to Dagmar and Rita that Krishnaji should stop talking as there is nothing new; he was repeating himself. They were indignant and told me.' Shainberg was a really…I won't use the word… Eventually, when I heard of some slanderous lies about Krishnaji that he was circulating, I told him what I thought of him.

S: Yes. Just for the record, many of these things you mention, like when you just mentioned this, and when you mentioned Pupul a little while ago, I wish we could record your facial expressions, because you don't say anything. So people in the future will hear this, and all they will know is that you say, "Shainberg was a really…I won't use the word…" and they might think, "So, what was the word, 'prince'? Was it 'genius'? Was it 'friend'?" It's only from seeing your facial expression. [Laughs.]

M: They'll have to make their own conclusions.

S: Alright, alright, but you are too nice of a person.

M: 'I told Krishnaji that Shainberg said he should stop talking and Krishnaji brought it up with him on the walk. Shainberg replied that he had said that just to see what they would say.' Oh, weasel! [S laughs.] 'A not-quite-believable excuse, as he had said this before, and earned the Lilliefelts' distrust.' I'm glad Krishnaji brought it out, I'd forgotten that. [Chuckles.]

The twenty-first of July. 'Krishnaji gave his sixth Saanen talk in the very hot tent. At 3 p.m., Mary C., Gisèle Balleys, and I held a Saanen Gathering committee meeting. At 4 p.m., Dagmar Lichti came and had a conference with Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure on his program of activity, diet, exercise, medicines, etcetera. She will send Krishnaji a summary. Then she said goodbye and left for Zürich.' What a nice person. 'Krishnaji and I telephoned Erna not to cancel the New York and San Francisco talks for next year. She had written asking about them as announcements have to go in the next Bulletin.'

July twenty-second. 'We are starting a new program: We walk early and briskly at 6:45 a.m., Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I stride to the river and back. Then we do our exercises, have breakfast, etcetera. The early morning is clean, new, full of forest smells and mown hay. At 11 a.m., there was the annual International Committees meeting of all the foreign Krishnamurti committees, with Krishnaji attending. He spoke rather indiscreetly about the points of contention between KF India and the English Foundation and the American Foundation, saying no difficulties ever arose between England and the U.S., but India is difficult.' [S laughs.] 'It all went on the tape, and it was felt later that the tape should be edited to avoid Indian hurt feelings or indignation.' [S chuckles.] I don't know whether that happened.

S: I don't know, either.

M: Krishnaji also started a discussion on brain cells at 12:50 p.m., when he knew everyone was going to lunch at the Saanerhof, which we did, not Krishnaji, rather late, and there was further talk about various things. I left at 4 p.m. and took Krishnaji to buy track shoes. It was too hot for the scheduled second late afternoon walk.'

July twenty-third. 'Early walk to the river, then I did errands. I sorted the handed-in questions for the question-and-answer meeting tomorrow, then fetched to lunch Magdalina Jasciuska, our Polish friend, who is here with her professor husband, George. She was able to come from Poland to escort him home after his double bypass operation in Germany.' So they couldn't otherwise have left Poland at that point in 1983. 'Their eldest son Henry was imprisoned in Poland for circulating Solidarity leaflets. They expect him to be released under the amnesty announced yesterday. We had not met her husband before. A nice, very fluent man. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji saw a blind Sri Lankan man who came here for the talks. Shainberg came by to say goodbye. Krishnaji, he, Scott, and I discussed some of the questions for tomorrow. Then the three of them went for a walk.'

The twenty-fourth of July. 'There was another early walk with Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure. Krishnaji held the first question-and-answer meeting at 10:30 a.m. in the tent. He spent one hour on the first question, and answered only two. At 4:30 p.m., I took things to Jane Hammond for her to bring them back to England as she leaves by car and had room to carry things. Then I fetched Magdalina to Tannegg for Krishnaji's touch, as she has trouble with her foot. Harsh came up to talk to me about Brockwood. He was nervous about how Dorothy will take the position of the four. Probably Dorothy worries about it, too.'

July twenty-fifth. 'Early walk with Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me. Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer meeting, and he answered three questions. Magdalina and her husband came to lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji saw a swami Yogamudrananda Saraswati, who turned out to be a youngish, rather brash woman who rather called Krishnaji to account for not following traditional guru lines.' [S chuckles.] 'She knew nothing about his teachings, and wasted his time. He then saw the Siddoo sisters and meanwhile I brought Nadia Kossiakof up to tea with me, and she saw Krishnaji too when he finished with the others. Mar de Manziarly can no longer live alone in Paris and is going to California to live with her sister, Yo. It was a very hot day.'

The twenty-sixth of July. 'Early walk. Krishnaji held the third question-and-answer meeting, thereby ending this summer's series. He covered six questions. It was a very hot day. We lunched quietly. He saw Magdalina at 5 p.m. for touch. It was too hot for the late walk.'

The twenty-seventh. 'We both slept late, and didn't walk. "Whole body is tired," he said. I took Dr. Parchure to see the ailing Donald Dennis and did errands. We lunched quietly. Krishnaji slept most of the morning and afternoon. It was very, very hot. Nicole Philippeau and her children came to tea with me, bringing a little bird carving. She was a French woman who had two children, a little boy and a little girl, and she eventually married, though it was much after this time…

S: Alain Maroger, Jean-Michel's brother.

M: Alain Maroger, yes. Her name at this time, however, was Philippeau. 'It was too hot for the afternoon walk. I telephoned to Dorothy and Filomena.'

July twenty-eighth. 'Harsh came to lunch. In the afternoon, Krishnaji gave an interview to a Swiss German radio network, and a Jeanne Chevalier took photographs. I went to tea with Rita Zampese at the chalet where she stays.'

July twenty-ninth. 'Dr. Parchure, having treated everyone else, is finally down with the virus, but got up to come with Krishnaji for a fasting blood sugar test by Dr. Rolf Steiger's at 8:15 a.m. which read 110, and again after lunch, when it suddenly, surprisingly, was 86. Based on this, he reduced Krishnaji's dose of Rastinon to half a tablet.'

The thirtieth. 'Krishnaji and I went for the 6:45 a.m. walk. It was a radiant morning. It is a sense of blessing to walk with him on our familiar path. We walked quite fast, his asking me to set the pace, and it is outwardly a march, but then it is the marvelous continuing joy of summer mornings with him. Dr. Parchure has fever and the standard cough, so he remained in bed. I marketed and then met Scott in Saanen to bring him up to stay for a few days in Tannegg in the little room. Kathy left for England yesterday. Krishnaji, Scott, and I lunched. Gisèle Balleys came for coffee and talked about a possible Swiss school. A Mr. Grohe wants to back it. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji saw Bobby de Pomereaux who has become disabled.' I don't remember much about him. 'It was too hot to walk in the afternoon. Europe is baking in a heat wave everywhere. It is stifling.'

July thirty-first. 'Krishnaji, Scott, and I went for the early walk at 6:45 a.m. It is cool then, but the heat in the afternoon is stifling, and dominates everything. We had a quiet day. Dr. Parchure is better. He got up.'

August first. 'We had walked in the morning again, and also did so in the late afternoon in the beginning of a light, welcome rain. The weather is breaking at last. In spite of it being a national holiday, the shops were open, and Scott helped me market. Dr. Parchure is better. In the morning, Krishnaji saw Mr. Grohe, the man who is interested in starting a Swiss school. Nice man,' [chuckles] 'says Krishnaji, who invited him to visit Brockwood. Krishnaji, Parchure, Scott, and I lunched.'

S: There were very funny little things here that should be recorded. Of course, I wanted money for Brockwood, and I was always looking for money for the video, and for all different things. And Gisèle wanted to start another school, but Krishnaji wasn't keen on starting other schools.

M: No, he wasn't. No.

S: Not at all. And I can remember there was a little bathroom that looked out onto the driveway, wasn't there?

M: At Tannegg? Yes, that was Krishnaji's bathroom.

S: That's right, that was Krishnaji's bathroom. So, I can remember Krishnaji looking out of that window at Grohe as Grohe had just come up to have this first meeting with Krishnaji. And there was very much the sense that yes, Krishnaji was going to talk to this potential donor, but that he wasn't going to encourage the donor to give money to a Swiss school.

M: Krishnaji siphoned the whole thing to Brockwood.

S: I know, [laughing] and it was very funny, because I remember that Krishnaji was pleased with this first meeting they had. And, of course, there was no mention of not giving the money to the Swiss school, so there was just a very nice meeting, and I think there was looking at plans for a building that Gisèle and he had found, etcetera. But you could just tell that Krishnaji had already planted the seeds for this Swiss school project not going ahead. And Krishnaji never said anything about it, but you could tell afterward that Krishnaji was pleased. [Both laugh.]

M: And Krishnaji invited him to visit Brockwood.

S: Yes. But I can remember, for some reason I was standing in Krishnaji's bathroom with him, because I could see he was looking out the window at Grohe and sizing him up. [Laughs.]

M: That bathroom was…one of the mad ladies who was after him tried to grab him through that window. [Both laugh.]

August second. 'Krishnaji, Scott, and I walked at 6:45 a.m. in rain!' I put an exclamation point after that. 'The weather has broken at last. We are deliciously cool.'

August third. 'I woke up to snow on all the high mountains and the Wasserngrat, too. It was too wet for an early morning walk. Krishnaji dictated letters to Sunanda and Pama. He is uneasy about them, and has lost confidence in them. I did errands in the village with Scott. I made risotto milanese for lunch. Krishnaji treated Robert de Pomereaux. Then he, Scott, and I drove to Lauenensee. It was wonderfully cool—cold, really. We walked the short distance to the lake, but it was too cold for Krishnaji. His body does not generate warmth enough. We came back into rain, but I felt I had touched the mountains. Pupul telephoned from Madras. They are to have a KFI meeting Saturday about the Shankar and Krishnakutti mess at Bangalore. Krishnaji gave them authority to fire both of them and later had me call Pupul back to say that Krishnakutti should be asked to resign from the Krishnamurti Foundation. Krishnaji is disturbed that the Foundation has let this situation grow. They should have stopped it in the very beginning.'

August fourth. 'It is clear and cold. Krishnaji, Scott, and I walked at 6:45 a.m. Krishnaji refused my gloves as his hands were chilled. I did errands afterwards, and got him long wool underpants and wool gloves. Krishnaji is against Scott's plan to go mountain climbing tomorrow. He should not for pleasure do dangerous things.'

S: I know.

M: You didn't go, I assume.

S: [laughs] Well, Krishnaji kept me there. [Both laugh.] I wasn't supposed to come to stay at Tannegg at all. As soon as the talks were over, Kathy was supposed to go back to Brockwood, and I was supposed to go off climbing. But I was invited by you two to stay at Chalet Tannegg, [chuckles] and so, of course, how would anything prevent me from doing that?

M: But you were thinking of coming to Tannegg for just one day.

S: Yes, I was just going to come to Tannegg for a day or two. And then it just dragged on, and it dragged on, and eventually I said to Krishnaji—because he didn't say anything to me about not climbing.

M: Oh? Did he know you were mountain climbing-inclined?

S: Oh, yes, and he knew that was my plan. Yes, and he knew I climbed every summer. So, it was after he kept extending my stay, inviting me to say longer, I said to him, "Krishnaji, you're just keeping me from climbing, aren't you?" And he said, "Yes." [Both chuckle.] And that's when he told me that I mustn't do something that's dangerous, and especially not just for fun. "Your life no longer belongs to you," he said.

M: …belongs to you. Yes, yes. We both got those instructions. Mine were less dramatic. I wasn't supposed to fly around unnecessarily. Not that I did much flying around unnecessarily, but even so.

S: Yes, and I can remember that that summer also was the first time he was reluctant for you to fly to…

M: Rome.

S: To Rome. And I can remember exactly, we were on the usual walk, and that was the first time Krishnaji talked to me about how when there is something very good, that that which isn't good tries to attack it; and when it can't get to that which is very good, it gets to those who are close to that which is good. Which put you and me in danger.

M: That's right.

S: Krishnaji had never talked about that with me before. And, at some point, and I can't remember if it was at this time or some other time, but Krishnaji felt it was an especially dangerous period.

M: Yes. The bad can't reach him, so we mustn't give the bad an opportunity to do harm to him through you or me. And, therefore, we mustn't do anything dangerous. And I wasn't supposed to fly, and years earlier, I said, 'But, Krishnaji, I should go to see my mother in Martha's Vineyard. I have to fly to get there.' He said, oh, no, that's alright. But if it was unnecessary flying I had to avoid it. For instance, if I were to fly up for lunch in San Francisco for no reason, which I wasn't doing anyway, but that kind of thing was unnecessary flying. If you have to go…

S: Yes. And, unfortunately, Krishnaji saw mountain climbing as unnecessary. [Both chuckle.]

M: That was your bad karma. [S laughs.] Yes.

S: You see, I never had much time in between the end of the Saanen talks and having to get back to set up for the Brockwood talks. So it was…[both chuckle].

M: Of course. You sound a little wistful.

S: Yes, and if I remember correctly, and it might be in your diaries, but once it was getting late and I didn't have much time left and also bad weather had set in, Krishnaji said that I could go now if I wanted.

M: [chuckles] He did?

S: [laughs] Yes. It's not like he was kicking me out, but it was, you know, he wasn't pressing me to stay anymore. [Both laugh.]

M: Anyway, to continue. Yes. 'Krishnaji is against Scott's plan to go mountain climbing tomorrow. He should not for pleasure do dangerous things. It is irresponsible. Then in afternoon, he said, "And you"'—underlined—'"you are going to Rome." He feels this is outside the line of what I need to do, and this gives an opportunity of something antagonistic to him at strike. "As long as you are with me, I feel you are safe. And you are safe at Ojai, going there, etcetera. But anything unnecessary is taking a chance." He feels that something has always been there, but lately there has been more of things antagonistic. The fire. Rajagopal's attack. Dorothy's illness. He said, "I am very watchful. When we went on that ride to Lauenensee, Scott is a good driver, but I was watchful. When we go in an airplane, I do something to protect. When we walk in the wood, I say, 'May we come in?' I am careful." I listened and felt what the visit means to Filomena, my not going last year, my promise to see her this year, the hurting of a dear sick person who may not live much longer. He is asking me to hurt her, not asking it, but it comes to that. But beyond anything, I must put his protection first. Krishnaji treated Robert de Pomereaux at 4:30 p.m., and then we walked again through the woods. I slept little.'

August fifth. 'I awoke knowing I could not go to Rome. Krishnaji, Scott, and I walked at 6:45 a.m. Krishnaji wore a beret, his new long underpants, and wool gloves, but the latter were not enough to keep his hands warm. After breakfast, I told him I was not going to Rome next week, but need to know what I can tell Filomena. Am I never to go? What is the degree of danger? By air is a greater danger, next by car, and train is less. He had thought of sending Parchure with me as far as Geneva. He said for the remainder of this year, I shouldn't go to Rome. If something happened to me now, "What would I do?" "I care for you. That is the basis of all this. Nothing must happen to you." Whatever the danger is, it is aimed at him, not me. But if I'm too far from his orbit, it could strike at him through me. Rajagopal is part of the menace, but it does not emanate from him. He is filled with it, but not the source. At present, there is a rise in it. The case. The present trouble in Bangalore and the Indian Foundation, etcetera. So, for this time, extra precaution. I telephoned Filomena, who seemed to understand. I put it that it was a time of difficulty, and she took it with her own dear and rare generosity, saying I must do what is best for Mr. Krishnamurti. I said I would ring her tomorrow after talking to Miranda on her wedding day. I went to undo my air ticket, change Hertz arrangements, etcetera. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, Scott, and I lunched at Chlösterli. It was the first time Krishnaji had ever been there. The very fresh vegetables from their garden pleased him, and he said, "Let's come again tomorrow." What began as giving Fosca a day's rest turned into a nice outing. On the way back, we went to a ski shop and got him mittens to wear on a glacier.' [Chuckles.] Very warm mittens. 'Krishnaji was tired, so no second walk. Only nice naps. I typed his letter to Pupul about Bangalore, and Krishnakutti and Shankar troubles.'

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Hyperlink for a video of July 12, 1983.

[2] Hyperlink for talk of July 14, 1983.

[3] Hyperlink for a video of Krishnaji and Mary on this, their typical walk, in Gstaad, made by students.

Issue 77: August 6, 1983 to November 17, 1983

This issue starts with Krishnaji and Mary in Gstaad from where they make the traditional move to Brockwood; but they then have to fly to California for a just over a month to deal with the court case, then back to Brockwood and Krishnaji goes on to India. This added travel worries Mary and Dr. Parchure because of its impact on Krishnaji's increasingly frail health. There seems to be some acknowledgement by Krishnaji of his precarious health in his wanting Mary to start living as though he were gone (although he says he'll live another ten years) and his wanting her to have a more prominent voice in the KFA and the KFT, which never came to pass. Krishnaji also wants Dr. Parchure to have a greater role in the Far East, which also never came to pass. Perhaps most striking is the increased appreciation Mary expresses for the time she has with Krishnaji, as though she unconsciously knows it is disappearing—Krishnaji lives for just over two more years. In the editing process of these memoirs, I have Mary's diaries open in front of me as I proof the raw transcript; and it is true that, in the early years of our discussions, Mary sometimes didn't read out some of the more "flowery" (as she puts it) descriptions of her thoughts and feelings. But at this point in her diaries, there are simply more of them—she is taking the time to savor the extraordinary preciousness of being in Krishnaji's presence, and with remarkable poetry and delicacy, she shares those with us.

M: We begin today's discussion with the sixth of August, 1983, and we're still in Gstaad. My diary says, 'The early walk was with Krishnaji, Scott, me. It was cloudy on the mountains so that Scott, who would have been climbing today had Krishnaji not intervened, saw that the weather would not allow it now.' [Both chuckle.] 'Erna telephoned about a decision on where Rajagopal's deposition will be taken. These matters will be brought before the judge in Ventura on Monday. Cohen'—that's our lawyer—'wanted Rajagopal to come to the Oxnard office for psychological reasons, to get him out of his lair. But it seems more important to me to ensure that Krishnaji has his taken at a place that is convenient for him—not Los Angeles, for instance. So, quid pro quo. Rajagopal can have it at the K&R office providing we choose the lieu for all of ours. Both Erna and Cohen are disturbed by a copy of the Litchi letter, which I sent concerning Krishnaji's health. We again lunched at Chlösterli. The Mulleners have a big Bernese Mountain Dog, which Krishnaji liked very much. A similar one for Brockwood, perhaps?' [S chuckles.] 'Krishnaji gave a "treatment" to Robert de Pomereaux, who gave me a donation for Brockwood. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon, and so did I. He looked fragile today, which twists my heart. But he went on the early walk in his new mittens, and called out to me to "Keep up the pace."' [Both chuckle]. 'We had raclette at lunch, which Krishnaji had never had, and a fine ratatouille, and fruit tart. So we went for the afternoon walk to walk off the feast. On our return, I telephoned Malibu. Amanda answered. It is Miranda's wedding day. At 2 p.m., the ceremony will take place on the lawn, but it was raining when I called—on August sixth?' I have a big question mark. 'She said that Miranda's sisters had her running on the beach earlier. She and John will go to Hawaii for a week. It is a happy day in Puerco Canyon.' Puerco Canyon is the little canyon between the Dunnes' house and my former house, and that's what we called out joint property. 'I gave Filomena's message for Miranda, and rang Filomena right afterward with messages from the Dunnes.' That was because I wasn't going to Rome, and I wanted to…

S: Of course. Of course. Alright, if I may, there's two things that need to be filled in here. One is just a story that you and I were telling each other after we turned off the recorder yesterday, about the Bernese Mountain Dog. But before that, the Mulleners, who you just mentioned, were the people who owned the nice fruit and vegetable store in Gstaad, and then they started this restaurant called Chlösterli in Gsteig. They had a big Bernese Mountain Dog, and it came and sat underneath Krishnaji's chair, and the owner was amazed because the dog had never done that before, and Krishnaji reached down and petted him during the meal. I also remember that, as Krishnaji was doing that, he said, "he's letting me touch his eyes." So Krishnaji stroked his head, and then touched his eyes. It was a whole…

M: Yes, it's just as I can see it still: I was seated to Krishnaji's left. Krishnaji was on a sort of bench against the wall, so it was big enough for this huge dog to get underneath. They can be very big, for those who don't know these dogs.

S: Yes, yes [chuckles].

M: And I could see his head come out from under the bench, because I was just to Krishnaji's left, but at a right angle, and I could see the head of the dog down there, and Krishnaji put his hand down and petted him.

S: Yes. And indeed we, at Brockwood, did get a big Bernese Mountain Dog of our own…

M: With the name of Badger. [Laughs.]

S: Yes. And the other thing that is worth mentioning, if we haven't talked about this before, has to do with Krishnaji calling out to you to keep up the pace on the walk.

M: Yes, I was supposed to set the pace.

S: Yes, and Krishnaji never liked walking in front or rarely liked walking in front. He did that a little bit in India, but in other places, he liked other people to walk in front, and I often, out of courtesy or something, would hang back, but no—he didn't want that. He wanted everybody to walk ahead. I remember thinking that perhaps he could feel people looking at him or something, I don't know what.

M: Yes. I don't know what it was. Well, but there was also, for instance, when we would all eat at Arya Vihara, which was buffet-style, he would always insist on being the last to serve himself, and you know, there could be more than twenty people for lunch sometimes, and everybody wanted him to go first, but no, he wouldn't. He would wait way back in the room until everybody had gone, and then he'd get his plate. That was typical of him.

S: Yes. I don't think we've mentioned that, so I just thought it would be worth bringing up.

M: Yes.

S: But, also, just because he was walking in the back didn't mean he couldn't shout orders to the front…[Both chuckle.]

M: No. He was still in charge.

S: …to keep up the pace. [Laughs.]

M: And, well, he had also that feeling of "ladies first," you know. It was, whether that was the unconscious thing but…I suppose I always walked ahead. I mean, I didn't pay attention.

S: Yes. But I did pay attention because, by all rights, he should have walked ahead of me.

M: Yes.

S: But he wouldn't allow it, and he wouldn't allow it with anyone else either, like with Shainberg when we went for a walk, you know—it didn't have anything to do with me, it had to do with Krishnaji.

M: Yes. I think it's part of the innate courtesy he had. "No, you go ahead." We all have unconscious things when we both get to a door at the same moment, and you react instinctively, and he was of a generation where, and you are, too, ladies were first.

S: Yes, yes, but Krishnaji should have gone ahead of me. But he wouldn't.

M: Well yes, but that would have offended that courtesy in him. He wouldn't put himself first.

S: Yes, yes. Well, he didn't put himself first in anything.

M: Anything.

S: Unfortunately. And then also on the walk—and I don't know if we've mentioned this before, we might have—but on the going-through-the-woods part of that walk, where there's a steep ravine, and there's water running down through the bottom of it, a little stream, he would often pick up a rock, not a big one—do you remember?

M: And throw it in.

S: Yes, and throw it down, to see if it got…

M: All the way to the water.

S: Yes, and if it rolled all the way down into the stream, he'd say with jubilation, "Ah! Got it!" or something like that. [Laughs.]

M: Yes, I do remember that.

S: It was charming because it was so childlike, innocent. It's what a young boy—

M: It's what a young boy would do.

S: Exactly, and he took delight in it every time. [Both chuckle.]

M: Yes. I can see all those places, and when we went through the woods to the Turbach Road, and then we walked up along the river a ways, and well, depending on the snow melting up in the mountains, sometimes it would be quite turbulent, and the rocks would—there would be a great noise, rocks being…

S: Yes, yes. Knocked against one another.

M: …knocked against each other—because it's full of big boulders, and that was always interesting.

S: Yes, the noise that they could make, and the color of the water.

M: Yes. And the Saanen River, which it flows into, was always gray because of the sediment coming down.

August seventh. 'Again, the three of us went on the early walk. Krishnaji saw de Pomereaux, who is leaving Gstaad. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave Scott an interview. Pupul telephoned from Madras, rather inaudibly, but it seems that the KFI met yesterday and fired Shankar from the principalship of the Bangalore School. Details are to follow in a letter; and Krishnakutti, who had gone to Punjab, is to get a letter asking for his resignation from the Foundation.' I don't remember what they were fighting over, but anyway.

S: They'd been starting Krishnamurti study centers on their own without involvement of the KFI.

M: Something like that. 'We went for the late walk.'

August eighth. 'We again did the early walk, and then I took Scott to the train station. He takes the train to Paris, where he'll stay a little bit and then he'll go on to Brockwood. I did errands. It was a warm beautiful day. I walked with Krishnaji to the river in the late afternoon. Krishnaji has a new plan. He is disturbed by the failure of the KFI to deal with the Shankar and Krishnakutti situation. He feels it should have never have come about, and that there's no one there to talk to younger people. He is thinking of Dr. Parchure for this, to have him accompany him to India, and come in May and June to Brockwood and possibly Ojai. But the rest of the time he would be at Vasanta Vihar, partly organizing studies of the teachings there, and meeting people, but also traveling all over the Far East, finding people, spreading interest in Krishnaji's teachings. Dr. Parchure is fired up by this and eager. My first thought is for Krishnaji's health. Parchure would still be in charge in India and Brockwood in the spring. I think I could count on Dagmar Lichti here, and Ojai has always been without Parchure. Krishnaji is continuing to discuss it, and will put it to Pupul when she comes to Ojai in September.'

August ninth. 'The early walk was with Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure, who has observed my puffing going uphill. He thinks I need strengthening, and has come up with a plan to both strengthen me and continue Krishnaji's massage, which Parchure now does. He will teach me to do it. He has persuaded Krishnaji, who says, laughing, "We will start at Brockwood, but no one must know about it!"' (exclamation point, unquote). [Chuckles.]

S: No one must know about what?

M: About my giving Krishnaji massage. [Both chuckle.] It never happened, really, as I can recall. 'I went to the bank for a conference with Mr. Hans Liechti—no relation to Dagmar—about the Alzina account, which is doing satisfactorily. When I got back, I telephoned John Hidley in Ojai about Frances's condition. Krishnaji feels she should stay there and not come to Brockwood. Hidley says she will need supervision. Vanda arrived at 4:30 p.m. from Florence. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I walked to the river. I lay in bed at night, conscious of the preciousness of a quiet bed, and room, and house with Krishnaji in it, alive, and full of his plans. Life glows, and I know how rare, how extraordinary this is; this being near him, the simple joy of walking with him, being able to look at that face, and see it light up at some small thing, a bird, or a kitten on the road. It is the enormous luxury of small things, the quiet to feel them in a world that seems in a flood with cataclysms. How fragile, how infinitely precious are these times.' So they were.

The tenth. 'The early walk was with Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, me. Krishnaji did some exercises but felt "low." After breakfast he dictated four letters to India and to Dr. Adikaram about the Sri Lanka situation, which is in upheaval with conflict between the Sinhalese and the Tamils.' Adikaram was head of the Krishnamurti things in Sri Lanka. 'Krishnaji's face was drawn, and he leaned against the pillow with closed eyes during part of the dictating, which worried me. I told Parchure. Krishnaji stayed in bed, and there was no afternoon walk. I did errands in the afternoon, and brought Vanda up the hill.' She would walk down, and then I'd bring her back. 'Erna hadn't telephoned about the Monday court hearing on times and places of deposition, so in the afternoon I rang her. She hadn't heard from Cohen, but called me back after speaking to him, and I learned that in return for letting Rajagopal have his deposition at the K&R office on November first, we can have ours in Ojai or at Cohen's office, whichever we choose. Also, we got to see papers he will use in the case prior to his deposition. I told Krishnaji all of this, and he said we must go all the way in this so that Rajagopal cannot start it all again. "What I am doing may not be working," he said.' I think that he was referring to…

S: His angels to Rajagopal?

M: I think so, which we talked about yesterday.

S: Right.

M: '"Can you tell?" I asked. He replied, "Oh yes, I can feel it. I will continue. I do it each day, but he may not give in." And then, "We will see when we get there." He again said that he wants to go to Ojai. "Why?" I asked. Krishnaji replied, "To solve this Rajagopal thing. He has nothing to do, and has done nothing these past years but plot." I went to bed trying to deal sensibly with worries.' [Laughs gently.]

The eleventh. 'Krishnaji still feels "low" and stayed in bed all day. I walked in the early morning, which does seem to make me stronger, then worked at my desk all morning. I am almost at the end of the pile of letters. I went with Vanda and Dr. Parchure on errands in the afternoon. Krishnaji felt better in the evening, looked better, and said he might walk in the morning.'

August twelfth. 'Krishnaji didn't feel up to walking, and remained in bed all morning. I walked with Dr. Parchure, and later in the morning did errands. Krishnaji got up for lunch as Vanda's friend, Mr. Carini, had come to Gstaad to see him. They talked before and after lunch, and Krishnaji was his normal self, telling some of his astronaut-Brezhnev-Pope stories.' [S chuckles.] 'For instance, the one about "the boss's son" in heaven.' [Both chuckle.] 'I took a nap to which I seem to be becoming addicted.'

