Introduction

Walking in Sanen, Switzerland

In the Presence of Krishnamurti: The Memoirs of Mary Zimbalist is the direct result of Krishnamurti asking Mary to write about what it was like to be with him. Mary struggled to write this account for more than two decades. I was concerned that, with her frail health and slow progress, she might not complete this task for which she cared so much. To try to help her, I suggested that she and I recount our memories of Krishnamurti to each other, and record them.

We began a series of conversations in 1994 that continued for fourteen years, until 2008, shortly before she died. Mary was happy that we both talk about our memories because I had traveled a bit with Krishnamurti, and worked with him for many years, but especially because I knew many of the places to which they traveled, so I could ask detailed questions; questions that helped stir her memory and bring to life, in her own words, what it was like to be in the presence of Krishnamurti. These discussions have produced exhaustive documentation (over 100 recordings of 1.5 hours to 2 hours each) through Mary's reminiscences and her reading of her detailed diaries.

This is very much the start of we knew not what. What Mary and I did know was that we both had a very profound affection for Krishnaji[1], and a great love of his "teachings," which was the name used to designate his work. We also knew that no one since Krishnaji's brother (who died in 1925) had known Krishnaji as well as Mary. I knew Krishnaji much less well, but still well enough to be asked by him to accompany him on some of his travels, and to be next to him when he died.

When this first discussion took place, I was the principal of The Brockwood Krishnamurti Educational Centre in England, the only school he had founded in Europe. After Krishnaji's death, Mary maintained the apartment she had always occupied while Krishnaji was alive, and she would spend about half of the year at Brockwood. The discussions, of which this is the first, initially took place in the kitchen of her apartment. Even after I left Brockwood to go to Oxford, I would return for weekends during those months she was there, and we would meet in her kitchen with my tape recorder to continue our discussions.

It is important for the reader of these transcripts to understand that this is a record of conversations between two people who had a love of each other (Mary was very much a second mother to me, and I was, she said, the son she never had) and a profound affection for, not just Krishnaji's work, but also for the man that Krishnaji was. For well over ten years after Krishnaji died, I found that I was still mentally collecting funny things to tell him; as getting Krishnaji to laugh was one of my delights. So it is important for the reader to understand that the nature of these discussions is not that of a serious exposition, but rather that of two dear friends enjoying discussing together something that was deeply meaningful and delightful for them both.

I considered nothing too trivial to ask Mary about, so I asked many questions that some readers may find trivial. I felt that Mary's perception of all of the characters in Krishnaji's life was worth knowing, so some readers may feel some of my questions are gossipy. I would ask endless questions about what she and Krishnaji did in various places, so I'm sure many readers may feel that some information I am pulling from Mary is of no importance to Krishnaji's teachings. This conclusion would be true, but these small daily things were part of what it was like for Mary to be in Krishnaji's presence. Also, my working assumption was always that it is easy to cut things out later, but impossible to fill things in when the source of information is gone as, indeed, it now is. So, if the reader wishes to skip over or dismiss the trivial, the personal, and the mundane for only what was extraordinary and special about Krishnamurti, then they are welcome to do so, and I will applaud them for it; such a reader is a better editor than I.

The editing of this material has been as light as possible, but still more than half of the material has been removed. There has been, and will continue to be, an attempt to avoid hurting the feelings of anyone who could be hurt by reading what Mary or Krishnaji said about them.

Mary had not consulted her diaries before we started this first discussion, and she didn't even keep diaries for the first years that are covered in this material. She did keep diaries from the 1960s onward, so that when she refers to needing to refresh her memory or look things up before we continue, she is saying that she will read her diaries prior to our subsequent session. Nevertheless, her memories are very sharp from the beginning of her contact with Krishnamurti, as this period had an enormous impact on her.

Scott: I'm going to ask you all about your meetings with Krishnaji, or your time with Krishnaji, and lots of details.

Mary: As you long as you ask the questions, I'll respond in some way. So where do you want to begin?

S: Well, start with the first contact that you had, which I know was in the '40s; even the first time you saw him, or anything.

M: Yes, it was in 1944, during the war. It's preceded by that anecdote, which, if you want me to retell it, is about how I heard about him?

S: Absolutely.

M: Alright, it goes like this: I had a friend who was a doctor, a regular medical doctor, but he was very interested in all kinds of psychiatric things, and so was I. So, whenever I went in for a flu shot, or whatever it was, we'd wind up discussing the brain or the mind and how it worked and such. Well, one day, in the spring of 1944 (I think it was, yes), I went into his office for some medical reason, and he said, "Oh, come in. Come in. I have something I want to tell you." He proceeded to tell me about a friend of his, a psychiatrist, who had learned that he had some fatal form of heart disease. On learning this, he had up and left his family, his friends, and everything in Chicago where he lived, and said, "I'm going to California to learn how to die from a man named Krishnamurti," which doubtless startled everybody. My doctor friend was very curious, so he went to see his friend, the dying doctor, and of course, he meets Krishnamurti.

That was on a weekend, and I happened to come in on the Monday afterward, and he said to me, "I've met this extraordinary man, who knows more about the human mind than anyone I've ever heard of." Well, of course, I was all ears at this description. And then there was a pause for about, I don't remember, but say a month or two or maybe three when I heard (and I forget how I heard, but I did) that this Krishnamurti was going to resume giving talks in Ojai[2]. As we all know by now, during the war he was in Ojai because he happened to be there when the war broke out, and he couldn't travel. So he simply led a quiet life in Ojai, and didn't talk publicly at all. However, now that the war was winding down, it was decided that he would speak again. Well, I thought I wanted to see what this was about, so I drove up to Ojai from LA (I'd never been there before), found the place where he was to talk, and heard the talk—the first talk.

The war hadn't yet ended, and I remember dimly that there were gas restrictions, and I had to figure out if I could get to Ojai on the gas I had. Anyway, I went. I remember quite vividly his coming into the Oak Grove[3]; his dignity and his quiet, and his doing what we later came to see so often: his looking around before he spoke. And then his speaking; being struck by his voice, which was partly English but not quite English-English. He had an English accent but with his own intonation. I found the talk and his manner of giving it very impressive, but it was all strange to me in a way. So, afterward, I went and bought some of the booklets, the things that we have come to call "The Verbatim Talks," those little pamphlets. I took them home, and started to read. I found that, because of my background in psychoanalysis, I argued with him down the page. I couldn't advance in these things. I kept thinking, why does he say that? This went on for a couple of days, but luckily it dawned on me, somehow, that I should just go and listen to what he said and not argue through these written things.

S: Now, let me go back to that talk at the Oak Grove. Was he talking in the same place in the Oak Grove as he did in subsequent years?

M: Yes.

S: Exactly the same place?

M: Exactly.

S: Was he on a platform, or in a chair on the ground?

M: No, he was speaking, in those days, standing up, I think on the ground and not on a platform.

S: Was the audience sitting on the ground or on chairs?

M: On the ground, I think. There may have been some chairs. I don't remember. I sat on the ground, and most people sat on the ground, as I remember it.

S: How many people were in the audience, do you think?

M: Oh, there were quite a few. I don't remember it as being different from what I remember much later. Probably a thousand, several hundred, at least. It wasn't as full as it could've been, but it was a goodly crowd.

S: Where did they park their cars?

M: In the fields, where they parked later. That was always there. The whole set-up was the same, except that they had the tables with the books, or the pamphlets for sale, and books, a few books. One of the people who was selling the books was a Mrs. Vigeveno. I bought the pamphlet from her. She and her husband had an art gallery in Westwood in Los Angeles, where I had gone to look at pictures at some point. I don't know whether she knew my name, but she recognized me from having come into the gallery, and, so, when I bought the little pamphlets, she asked, "Are you interested?" Anyway, I continued to go to the rest of those talks. That was my first sight of Krishnaji.

Now the relevance of Mrs. Vigeveno in the story is that sometime later that year I had a telephone call, I think from her, and I don't know whether I'd been into the gallery and seen her again, but I was invited to join a discussion group at their gallery (their gallery was part of their house) once a week with a small group of people. So, I went, and I think there were probably a dozen or fifteen people, maybe a few more. Some of the people there I already knew, two couples I knew, plus the Vigevenos, whom I knew but just very casually. Rajagopal[4] was at those discussions, and it was said that Krishnamurti might come, and indeed, he eventually did come. I attended all of that.

S: How many meetings were there like that?

M: I don't remember, but there were two sets of these meetings. I can't remember now whether Krishnamurti came to the first set or only the second set, but I was in both. I also remember that I got my husband Sam[5] invited and he went, but he didn't see what it was. He was curious in what interested me, and he only went out of that curiosity.

S: These sets, was there like a month between the sets, or a week?

M: I don't remember.

S: So when Krishnaji was present, you then had a chance to actually talk directly with him?

M: Yes, they were discussions. Two of the people, whom I knew quite well, were there and had attended the talks too, a couple.

S: What were their names?

M: Their names are Eisner. They lived down near where I lived, down the street, and Betty Eisner, the wife, and I had both worked in the hospitals together during the war, as nurses' aides, and we used to share the ride, so we became friends. Later on, at some point, they invited me and both Rajagopal and Krishnamurti to lunch. I only remember Krishnaji going once, but I sat next to him, and I remember that he was very shy. This comes a little bit later. I'm not telling this in proper sequence.

While the talks were going on, I heard somehow that you could request an interview with Krishnaji—he would meet people individually. So I wrote, and in due course I got a reply saying that, if I could come on such and such date at such and such a time to such and such a place, I would have an appointment with Mr. Krishnamurti. The address for the meeting was a house in Hollywood, not Ojai. So I went, rang the bell, and the door was opened by Mr. Krishnamurti. [S chuckles.] And I remember very vividly the way he sort of bowed. He had beautiful, very formal manners. "Good morning, Madame," he said.

S: Of course.

M: In I went and apparently there wasn't anyone else in the house. I don't know. It was very quiet. We went to a sort of sitting room.

S: Whose house was this?

M: I later found out that it was a house that belonged to Mrs. Zalk or something like that, the sister of Rosalind Rajagopal[6]; but the house functioned as a town house for all of them. This is where Krishnaji saw people in Los Angeles. It was on Beachwood Drive, I remember, an old part of Hollywood. Anyway, Krishnaji sat there and didn't say anything. So I felt it behooved me to say why I was there, and why I had come. I told him a little bit about myself, and was approaching the questions that I had intended to ask him when he asked me some questions. I don't remember the back and forth of it. I only remember that it was a different order of any discussion of anything psychological or indeed any other kind of discussion I had ever had. When I came out I felt as though my head had been opened up and everything inside had been operated on. It was terribly moving. I remember also that he took me (but I saw it happen many times to other people) so far into my own, what do you want to call it, mind or consciousness or level of understanding that it was…well…I wept copiously. I mean, it was so deep, it touched something so deep inside me that it made me cry. I've seen so many people go through that when they come out of talking to Krishnaji.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: In fact, it happened to me in other interviews later on. Anyway, I went to all the talks of that year, and after the first talk, I really just listened. I'd caught on that you shouldn't keep going on about what you think, but just go and listen. And, well, it became the thing that has interested me most centrally for the rest of my life.

S: Now, this interview you had was during those discussions in the gallery?

M: It was before the discussions. I've told this badly.

S: No, no, it doesn't matter the sequence. It doesn't have to be in sequence.

M: The sequence is that I hear him speak, I argue with the pamphlets, I go back to hear him speak. From then on, I just listened, and it sank in.

S: Right. And then you had the interview.

M: Yes, and then I was in the small group discussions.

S: So that by the time you got to the small group discussions, Krishnaji already had some contact with you.

M: Yes, but he never gave any sign that he'd ever seen me before. Many years later, in Saanen[7], he once said to me, "Did I ever know you in California, [chuckles] or meet you in California?" And of course, this meeting, which was such an overwhelming milestone in my life [S laughing now], he, of course, had no recollection of! I remember laughing because it seemed, well, it pleased me so much. It was right, was in character for him not to remember. It seemed like, of course, he shouldn't remember all these people who, like me, would come and pour out their probably tedious questions to him.

S: Yes. Do you remember what the questions were that you had for him then?

M: No. No, I don't. I don't remember.

S: So all this took place in 1944?

M: '44 and into '45. I couldn't tell you whether it lapsed into winter '45 or whether it was…I would imagine that the interview was in '45, but I'm not sure; it doesn't matter. Anyway, he then went off to India, as we now know, there were no more talks in Ojai for some time. He obviously spoke in India and probably Europe, but I didn't attend any of those.

S: Did you keep reading his books?

M: Yes, I kept reading. I got on the mailing list. Sam wasn't interested, so I just went on reading on my own. Then, there's a big gap in all this, because I didn't really hear him speak again until 1960.

S: Where could you get the books?

M: From Krishnamurti Writings[8]. They sent little postcards out when there was a new book. You got the postcard, you ordered what the card advertised, and you got it.

S: So you didn't hear Krishnaji again until 1960?

M: Yes, he came back in 1960, and began a series of talks in, I think, June.

S: Mary, I don't know if you want to include your personal life in this narrative, but I think it's relevant—the things that had happened to you in those intervening years. Sam had died in that time, and you had all of that.

M: Sam died at the end of 1958. I had just left him in Rome because the picture, Ben-Hur, wasn't finished, but I needed to come back and start rebuilding our house which had burned down. I was going back to join him in Rome for Christmas, but we needed to get the house going, make the contract with the builder, and do all of those things. Ten days after I got back to Malibu, and signed the contract, got the building started, Sam died suddenly of a massive heart attack. I don't want to go on about that, but it was as though, I don't know, my life had ended too, somehow. It was very strange…this is very personal, but I will say it…I had the feeling that as I was still alive, there was something that I had to do, and in some strange way, I felt I was doing it for him and for me—as though, there was something that I had to learn, and don't ask me how, but I could somehow do it for him too. I…it isn't a logical thing.

S: No, I understand.

M: It was a very profound feeling. I remember feeling that very night I learned of his death, that there's something I've got to do. I felt that I had to find out what all this was about. That was the only important thing to me: what lay beyond life and death, and what are we all doing with our lives, and why do we go so wrong? All the questions that …probably we all have about our lives when we come into contact with something that is as serious as Krishnaji's teachings, or as serious as someone dying in your life that is really a crisis. The answer to that was that I had to go back and listen to what Krishnamurti had to say. It wasn't running to Krishnamurti for some kind of a refuge or enlightenment or solace. It was that I had to understand what he was talking about because I felt instinctively and profoundly that what he was talking about had to do with reality and truth, and that that was the whole point of my still being alive. It was the only thing that I wanted to do, was interested in. It was the only reason for anything to me at that point.

But I also had a very strong feeling in the weeks and months that followed that I mustn't run away from something; that I mustn't go to anyone to solve a problem, or to somehow make me feel better in some way. I mustn't run away from what's happened, but rather come to terms with what happened in my own life. In other words, don't go to anything with self-motive.

S: Yes, I understand.

M: I felt that intensely, strongly. So I didn't make any attempt or even think of going to see him, and then suddenly he came back in 1960. This was about 18 months after Sam was gone. I went to the talks. I also wrote and asked for an interview. He was to give eight talks, but he only gave four. At the end of the fourth he announced that he regretted that that would be the last talk. For reasons of health, he had to stop. In the meantime, he had given or okayed to whoever handled it, a certain number of interviews, and mine was among them, fortunately.

So, I was called to go on a certain, again, time and date and place, but it was in Ojai this time, at the Vigevenos' house. He again greeted me very formally. There was no reference to my ever having seen him before. We talked for a very long time, and it was all about death. And again, it's not repeatable, but the thing at the end of it…well, I was able to tell him that I had seen for myself that when people are in a state of grief, it's very often self-pity. They're feeling, why did this happen to me? Why have I lost something? And I thought that was false and repellent, and I didn't feel that way. I felt I had seen that very clearly, and I was able to tell him this. I remember his nodding, and I could tell, or his manner showed that he saw that I saw that, and that he didn't have to go through that with me so he could go on from there. The sort of conclusion of this, to put it very simply, was his statement, which I understood at the time and have since; "You must die every day to everything. Only then are you really living." I understood that it doesn't mean that you brush your life under the rug and forget everything. It doesn't alter what you feel, or the feeling of loss, if you've lost someone you loved, it doesn't alter that, that sense of loving them, or indeed, remembering them. But it's the factor of dependence, it's the factor of egotism, it's the factor of me and the whole thing. You have to die to that and only then, otherwise, well, as we now know from his teaching, that you mustn't carry the whole shadow of the past and react to that. It was the most profound experience of listening to Krishnaji that I've ever had. It meant a great deal. After that, he left Ojai, I guess. I didn't know what was happening. But, I determined then that I would hear him again and follow what he was saying seriously. Now, what I didn't know was that he wouldn't come back to Ojai. I assumed that he would return because he'd resumed talking in Ojai, but he didn't. In those days I didn't want to go back to Europe because that's where I'd been with Sam. I just wanted to be quiet and to think about all these things.

So it wasn't until 1961 that I realized he wasn't going to come back to speak in Ojai.

S: Why wasn't he speaking in America?

M: Well, it turns out later that it was the Rajagopal problem. He didn't come back because of that.

S: He came back to Ojai.

M: He came back to Ojai only that once.

S: And he didn't give any more public talks?

M: No, no. He gave the public talks in 1963 and he didn't give any more public talks. He spoke in Europe.

S: He didn't even speak in New York or Chicago or any place?

M: No, not in this country, not for several years. Finally, I thought, well, if I want to hear the man speak, go where he's speaking. I was going to go in the winter of '63, but Filomena[9] was ill, and I couldn't leave her. So, the first time I went to where he was speaking, which was Saanen, Switzerland, was in the summer of '64. I determined that summer that I would follow the whole tour; do this really thoroughly that next year. I would start wherever he spoke in Europe, which turned out to be London, and that I would go on to Saanen and to India—do the whole year, which is what I did.

S: So, in '64 you heard him in Saanen?

M: '64 I heard him in Saanen, and that summer I had another interview.

S: Was that the first year that he spoke in Saanen?

M: No, he spoke, I think, in ’63.

S: Was that when he spoke in the Landhaus[10]?

M: Maybe. Probably.

S: But ’64 was the first year there was a tent like a geodesic dome?

M: The geodesic dome. Yes. It was nice, that tent.

S: Where did you stay?

M: I didn’t know where to stay, so I consulted Fodor’s Travel Guide and found there was a place called L’Ermitage Hotel, and I thought I liked the sound of that. So I booked rooms at the Ermitage.[11]

S: Mmmm [laughing]. Not very much like a hermitage.

M: No! [Laughs.] I remember landing in Geneva, renting a little tiny car, a Hertz car or Avis, Hertz I think it was, and driving along the lake with a map, figuring how to get up to this place called Saanen. It was strange to be back in Europe. I hadn’t been in Switzerland before, but to be suddenly driving along in the middle of Europe by myself. I’d come to London before that. I remember seeing the Frys[12] in London, and then, there I was driving along the lake and up to Saanen to the L’Ermitage Hotel [chuckle]. Then the talks started. I remember that he took questions at the end of each talk, and I wanted to ask a question but somehow it didn’t work out, and the talks ended. At the end of each talk, Krishnaji used to stand over where Vanda[13], who was driving him in those days, used to park her car under some trees, back toward where the Boy Scout place was. He would stand under the tree and talk to a few people who would come up and shake his hands, as they always did after the talks. So, I went up to him and said, “Mr. Krishnamurti, I’m Mary Zimbalist, and you won’t remember me, but I’ve talked to you before in Ojai, and I wanted to ask you about…so and so.” He replied, “Yes, yes, ask that tomorrow.” So, I thanked him and walked away. [S chuckles.] Of course, the next day, the talk went off in a totally different direction, [S laughs] and my question had no relevance to what he was saying! So I didn’t ask it. Again, I hoped to have an interview, but I was shy about asking and I didn’t know how to go about it there. However, there was a friend, in those days, of his and Vanda’s and Frances’[14], a lovely man who I don’t think you knew: Pietro Cragnolini. Did you ever meet Cragnolini?

S: No.

M: Well, Cragnolini was a funny man; very, very Italian, and he’d known Krishnaji from the Ommen[15] days. He used to tell me tall tales of what really went on [S laughs] at Ommen, people going in and out of the wrong tents in the middle of the night [S laughs], sleeping in the woods, all these stories. I used to walk with him, or lunch with him sometimes, and he caught on what I wanted: he asked, "Do you want an interview?" and I said, "Oh yes, but I'm hesitant to ask." He said, "Don't worry about it," and [laughs] the next day, this was on a Sunday or a Monday, I had an appointment on Wednesday at 3 o'clock at Chalet Tannegg[16]. So, I went to Chalet Tannegg. And again, Krishnaji opened the door and took me into the living room.

In those days, instead of that dreadful big brown couch that you will remember, there was a black leather one, and he sat at one end and I sat at the other end, and we talked.

S: Describe where the couch was.

M: Well, it was facing the window, in front of that side-board. It was black leather and sort of shiny. It was an improvement on the one that replaced it. [S laughs.] I also remember Krishnaji's eyes, and I thought it looked like a cataract was developing in his eyes, and I remember thinking—horrible! He's going to lose his vision, which, of course, he never did. But his eyes were sort of cloudy.

I was seated about the distance between you and me at the moment, which is what, about four feet, and I was bothered by his eye. But, my diagnosis was luckily very poor.

I remember what I was asking him then. I was telling him that I was really tormented by the disturbances in the world that were going on (I've forgotten what they were then, but as usual, there were dreadful things happening) and to the degree that I was not a free, enlightened, psychologically clear person, I was responsible for all that human evil, really. I felt that I had to do something about it, the whole thing. I felt a terrible burden of this. He sort of brushed that aside. He didn't feel that was really the root of it. He said, "You take all these things very seriously," and I said, "Yes, I do." He went on from there, but I remember that question was what I'd come to ask him.

S: Do you remember in what way he went on to talk, or what he went on to talk about?

M: Not too well. No. Not to report, except that it somehow unhooked me from this thing.

What I think he was saying was that I was displacing onto the state of the world, that my responsibility was myself, and I shouldn't feel all this other burden of everybody's insanities.

Another nice thing in those days was that Cragnolini sometimes used to walk with Krishnaji. One day, Cragnolini asked, "Would you like to come on a walk? I'm walking with Krishnaji this afternoon. You come too." And I said, "Well, if it's alright, yes, of course, I'd like to." I remember that we walked towards Lauenen, on the road to Lauenen.

S: Did you walk through the woods to the Lauenen Road?

M: Yes. And I remember we walked way up. We didn't walk as far as Lauenen, but quite a ways, and I was looking for chamois. Did you ever a see a chamois[17]? I was looking for one, hoping to see one. We all talked very easily, I don't remember about what, but it wasn't strange at all. As the talks were ending, he said to me on one of these walks…

S: Oh, so you went on several of the walks?

M: Yes, I went on several. He asked, "Are you going to stay after the talks? Will you be here, or are you leaving after the talks?" I said that I had intended to leave. He replied, "Well, we're holding a small discussion after the talks, and if you'd like to be part of it, you are welcome." So I naturally changed my plans, and stayed on. He had about 30 people, roughly, in that meeting, and again it was at Tannegg. By this time, I'd met Vanda, and I've forgotten now, but I can look it up, whether she had invited me for lunch. I'd also met Alain Naudé, who had just come to the talks, but he was going to go to India. He was very serious about it all, and he sort of was acting as a kind of assistant. For instance, he was the one who called me up and told me when to come to Tannegg for the meeting, and things like that. He already had started to do things to assist Vanda, for Krishnaji.

S: Who else do you remember from that summer?

M: Well, I remember various people. Iris Tree was there. You never knew Iris. Iris had known Krishnaji for years. She and her husband Ledebur, when the war started ending, they went and lived in Ojai. She was an actress then, and she started a theater in Ojai. They used to see Krishnaji quite a lot. I also knew her from New York. It was she who took me up to Tannegg for the first time to call on Vanda—that's how I met Vanda.

S: Tell me other people.

M: Vimala Thakar was in the discussion, and I remember—because I had the car—that I was asked to go pick her up, which I did, as she was in Saanen, too. After Iris left, because Iris was not in the discussion, she had rented rooms from two little old old-maid sisters who had nursed Madame Curie. They were Swiss, and they were both trained nurses, you know, infirmiéres, and the big thing in their lives was that they had nursed Madame Curie. They were both in their 90s, I think. They owned Chalet Charmeuse, which was later taken over by the Palace Hotel. Now it's flats, but it was an old-fashioned chalet, and Iris had a room. I was getting pretty fed up being up in Schonried, where I had become the oldest living inhabitant. Hotel guests came and went and I was still in the dining room. [S laughs heartily.] That was where the waiter who had given me food all summer, and to whom I talked in French because I didn't know German, and at the end of the summer, I said to him in French, "What nationality are you?" because I knew he wasn't French-speaking naturally. He said, "I'm Irish" [hearty laughter]. He had a summer job! He hadn't told me. Anyway, I hated being in a hotel that long. I've always disliked hotels. So, I took the room that Iris gave up. It was just a very old-fashioned chalet, very nice. I bought yogurt, and put it out on the window-sill to keep it cold all night. It also had the advantage of being just down the hill from Tannegg.

S: Tell me about Vimala Thakar. What was she like in those days?

M: Well, she was already obnoxious. She was already saying, "Where do you live?" When I told her where I lived, she made it up in her mind that she'd come to visit me, and that I would put her up during her coming tour of the west coast. I was not going to have that at all. She was already Vimala Thakar! [S chuckles.]

So, who else? People like the Suarès were there. I think Marcelle Bondoneau[18] was there.

S: You can't remember anyone else?

M: No.

S: Okay. How many meetings were there that these 30 people came to?

M: I think there were, hmmm…I could look it up. I have a record of all this. By this time, I kept a little engagement book, and I wrote down all this.

S: Where did Krishnaji sit in the Tannegg living room? On that L-bench on the end, that corner bench?

M: No. He sat on a chair but he sat at the other end of the room, the dining room end.

S: The dining room end?

M: Yes. And we sat in rows in chairs.

After these discussions, I flew home.

S: But, wait a minute. Sorry. I keep interrupting here.

M: That's fine.

S: Did you go to lunch at Tannegg?

M: I think I did, a couple of times. I'm not too clear about that.

S: Who did you get to know most during that summer in Saanen? Cragnolini?

M: Cragnolini and Frances, and, of course, Iris, whom I already knew. That's about all. I didn't, you know, seek people out. I didn't sit around and talk after the talks. I didn't want to speak to anybody!

S: Yes, I've always had that feeling, too. I wanted silence after a talk.

M: I didn't want to discuss any of this with anybody there. So, I went off by myself, walked a lot, climbed the mountains, and I played the recorder in those days. I went and sat on the airfield in my car, played my recorder till the police would come over and stop me. [Both chuckle.] Then I went back to California.

S: Did you fly right from Geneva? Or did you come back to London?

M: No, I didn't go back to London. I flew to New York from Geneva, as far as I recall.

S: Where did you stay in London when you came over?

M: There was a woman called Mrs. Martinez, who had a house in Eaton Place, where she took bed and breakfast guests. It was the beginning of the days of bed and breakfast, but she only took people that were friends of friends. A person just didn't ring the bell and get in. My mother had stayed there because an English friend of hers told her about it. She'd stayed there, and so I went. It was ideal because you had your own door key to come into the house at night, and there was a butler who brought you breakfast on a big heavy tray.

S: Marvelous.

M: Yes, that was very nice, a room and bath. Wasn't expensive. It was perfect. I stayed there several times.

So, the next bit in this story, is that Rajagopal comes into the picture now, because while these meetings were going on in Chalet Tannegg, some of the people, including myself, wanted to hear the recordings of the meetings. So, I said to Alain, "So many of us would like to hear the tapes of our discussions, or read a transcript that I would be delighted to pay some secretary to transcribe it for some of us, if that's allowed." Word came back from Krishnamurti via Alain that, "Mr. Krishnamurti does not have the right to give that permission, only Mr. Rajagopal does," which rather took me aback.

S: I'll bet!

M: It did. [Both laugh.] So, when I got back to California and…

S: Sorry, but who was making the recordings?

M: Alain. It was the following summer that Alain found out about Nagras19].

S: So anyway, you got back to California?

M: I called up Rajagopal and said, "Look here, I was in this discussion group, and I know you have the tape…" Oh, by the way, the tape had to be sent the same day it was made, it had to go right from the recorder into the mail to Rajagopal. So, I knew he had the tapes, and I said, "I'd like to hear them." Well, such a to-do went on. "Well, you see everyone wants to hear them, and I can't possibly let everybody hear them, so no, well…" he went on shilly-shallying back and forth about this. Finally, he said, "Well, if you can come up to Ojai,…did you make notes?'

"Yes, I made notes."

"Well, you bring your notes, and you can hear one tape, and you can choose the tape, but you must bring your notes." And [chuckles], it had to be a day when the Vigevenos, who lived next door, would not be in Ojai, because he didn't want them to know that I was allowed to hear a tape. And, not only did I have to come when they were away, but I had to park my car so that it would not be visible to them next door.

S: So, you already figured out that you're dealing with someone very strange here!

M: Very, but then I knew this from before, because he'd been at the Eisner's at other times than that one luncheon. He'd been there for dinner when I was there for dinner a couple times, and I caught on quickly that he was…well, frankly, I thought he had a drinking problem.

S: That's what I've heard.

M: Yes. And the reason I thought so was that he made such a to-do about whether to have a drink or not before dinner, which they very naturally offered him. He would say, "Well, I don't know. Do you think I should? Probably I shouldn't. Well, I suppose I could." He went on and on, and I thought, you know, "Just say yes or no, but what's all this fuss about?" I thought something was going on there.

S: This is interesting. [Both chuckle.] So this was back at the Eisner's, in Malibu?

M: Not in Malibu. This was back in the '44 days, when I was living in Los Angeles. They lived down the street from me in Los Angeles.

S: Did he go on like this with Krishnaji present?

M: No, Krishnaji wasn't there for dinner, only for lunch. This was, I think, at night. Also, he knew other friends I knew, so I saw the trail of this man around town, leading his own life.

S: Well, tell me. [Laughter.]

M: Well, I could tell that he had a sort of teasing, flirtatious way, not towards me, but toward another woman who was all excited by him. He sort of made himself the center of attention, not by coy behavior, but in a way that drew attention to his every reaction. So, I knew he was a bit neurotic, but this nonsense over the tape was something. Oh, I was asked for lunch too. So, we had lunch, and then I could listen to the tape.

S: What was that lunch like?

M: Fruit juice and salad or something.

S: But what was the conversation and the atmosphere?

M: Sort of fidgety. So, Rajagopal, his wife, and I sat solemnly in the living room. It was in sort of an alcove. We ate on a table in a corner of the living room, and then we moved to another area where he had a tape recorder. I had to hand over my marvelous notes. I could make notes of listening to the tape, but I had to give him copies of those notes too.

S: So you had to give your notes over that you'd made in Saanen?

M: Yes. And also the notes I was going to make then—what for, I can't imagine. So, I listened to the tape. They both sat there and listened with me. I suddenly figured out why he was letting me near the tape: he had recognized some of the voices of people he knew on the tape, but he didn't recognize others, and he wanted me to identify them. That's why all this performance went on.

S: You're still talking about the fall of '64 when this happened, because this took place when you got back to California, almost immediately.

M: Yes. By this time I was living in Malibu, and naturally I wanted to know when and where future talks were going to be held. So I called him up and he said casually that he didn't know. I thought that was very odd. He said, "You must write to Mrs. Mary Cadogan in London." So I wrote to Mrs. Mary Cadogan, and I got back a letter that said that since I was coming from so far away, that she would tell me where the talks were and when, but I must please not tell anyone else where they were, including my family, or why I was going to London. I thought this is [S chuckles] crazy—these are public talks. But, I wasn't going to argue as I wanted to hear them.

When the spring came, I returned to London, went back to Mrs. Martinez and went out to Wimbledon where the talks were being held. The talks were in the Boy Scouts' Hall in Wimbledon, which was a very small hall. I've asked Mary about this since, and she agrees that the hall was very small. I didn't understand why such a small hall was rented, but, you see, Rajagopal was really trying to damp down all this; printing these little booklets which were only sent out to those on the mailing list, and nobody knew anything, It was all kept as a big, dark secret. He made mysteries out of everything, and of course, he was like the Svengali[20] behind the whole thing.

S: Of course.

M: He was pulling the wires on this whole thing. Anyway, I went and afterward when Krishnaji stood outside, I went up to him this time. Alain was there and Krishnaji seemed to recognize me and he was charming. We chatted a bit.

I think Alain eventually called me up and said that they'd like me to come for lunch at the house in Wimbledon. That was one of those dreadful rented houses in Wimbledon…

S: That Anneke[21]and Doris[22] had found [chuckling] and were cooking and doing everything?

M: Yes. [Chuckles.] It was really awful to put Krishnaji up in those dreadful houses, but they did. So I went. I had again rented a little tiny car to get out there. So, we had lunch. I was the only guest with the two women, Alain, and Krishnaji. He was full of the questions about "What is the American mind?" as he used to say. "What's happening in America?" Well, as it happened, I had gone on the March to Selma, from Selma to Montgomery[23] with Martin Luther King. I thought that would interest him, because that was big news in America at that point. He was very interested, and I described the whole thing in quite some detail: how it came about, and what happened, and all of it. He listened with great interest to that. He walked me out to the car afterward with Alain, and he said, "Perhaps we could go to a cinema."

I, of course, replied, "Yes!" Then he said, "Well, you decide." So I went off, thinking, "What in the world!" [S chuckles heartily.] "What do I take this man to? A cinema? What would he like?"

S: Of course.

M: So I stared at the newspaper and pondered and finally decided that My Fair Lady was playing and that that would be a good movie and suitable [S chuckling]. Anyway, that's what I decided. So, either I called Alain or he called me, I don't know what, but I told him my choice, and Alain said, "Oh, Krishnaji has changed his mind by now. He doesn't want to go to the cinema. He wants to go for a drive in the country. So could you choose a place and drive us to the country." So, I was back to [laughter] my problem. I didn't know where to go. I wasn't that familiar—I'd spent two winters in London, but I hadn't gone driving in the country [S laughing], especially with the aim of something that would please a man named Krishnamurti. So I did some research.

I heard about Wisley, the royal horticultural gardens at Wisley, and I thought maybe that would be a place. So, I did a dry run. I went out and cased Wisley [laughs] and decided, yes, that it was really beautiful and perhaps he'd like that. I remember that I got a better car than the one I was driving, and I went to the house [laughs] in Wimbledon. Doris came out in that very Doris-way, and she said "Now, be sure you have him back here" [S chuckles]…"by 6 o'clock. He has an appointment at 6 o'clock. It is very important that he be here in time for that."

"Yes, yes, Ms. Pratt. I will." [S chuckles, then M does too.]

So, in we get, in the car. Krishnaji looked happy, pleased.

"Where are we going?", he asks.

I said, “Well, I thought perhaps a place called Wisley, the garden.”

“Oh, Wisley!” said he. He knew it. [Both chuckle.] But he hadn’t been there in a long time. “Oh, yes!”

So, off we went to Wisley, and it was a success. We walked around, and I had the feeling that he saw every flower and every tree and every bird and every everything. It was my first experience of that…of his extraordinary…

S: …I know…

M: …seeming perception that he had of…of everything. When we got back in the car, he said, “Oh, let’s drive a little further.” Where to take him now?! [S chuckles.] Luckily, I had been to Box Hill. Have you been past there?

S: No. What’s that?

M: Well, it’s further down the road that, I guess, leads to Petersfield, or…I haven’t seen it lately! Anyway, I knew where it was, which was not too far away. It’s the highest point of Sussex, and you look out at all of southern England. It’s beautiful!

So we went up Box Hill. We got out and looked at the view and it was beautiful, very pleasing. So now it was time to get back for 6 o’clock. We got back on, I guess, the A3, and it was heavy afternoon traffic. Now, I wasn’t used to driving on the left [S laughs], and I certainly was not used to driving the World Teacher. [S laughs more.] And the responsibility was weighing heavily on me, especially in the terrible traffic, and getting there at 6 o’clock. I drove [S chuckles] with absolute concentration, and just I got him back at 6 o’clock.

When he got out, he thanked me. “Thank you, Madame, so much. It was so kind of you.”

I replied, “It was a pleasure, Krishnamurti”—or Krishnaji, he asked me to call him Krishnaji in the Saanen discussions. Before that I’d called him Krishnamurti, and at some point he rather sharply had said to me, “Call me Krishnaji.” I thought I’d made a mistake to use the other word.

Anyway, it was Krishnaji. So I thanked him. And I went back to Mrs. Martinez in Eaton Place. I was due to go out to dinner with friends, and suddenly the enormity of the responsibility [both chuckling] of having the life of this man in my hands as a chauffeur hit me. I started to shake, and I shook so much that I couldn’t go out for dinner. I had to call it off. [S laughs.] A delayed reaction.

S: There is a story that you left out.

M: What?

S: This is the Huntsman[24]story, which I think took place in Saanen when you first met Krishnaji there.

M: Which year was that? That's right…it was one of the luncheons I was asked to.

S: That must've been in '64 because you didn't know Krishnaji that well…'64 or '65?

M: I'll have to look that one up for you.

S: Well, tell the story anyway.

M: Well, the story is as follows: I was asked to lunch, and the table only holds eight, so I guess we were about eight. I was seated on Krishnaji's left, and on my other side was Harry.

S: Moorhead?

M: Moorhead.

M: And apparently on Krishnaji's advice, Harry had gone to Huntsman and bought one suit, and he was wearing it. So, there was conversation about it.

S: Who else was at the luncheon?

M: Well, Vanda, obviously, the hostess, and Alain was there and…

S: Hilda Moorhead?

M: Hilda must've been there, that makes two, four, six…that's about it…I don't remember, to tell you the truth. But I remember Harry was seated to my left and Krishnaji was at the end of the table, on my right. So when they talked, they were talking across me. At some point, I said to Krishnaji, "I imagine you're talking about Huntsman, aren't you"? It was a talk about some wonderful day there. Krishnaji turned quickly to me and said, "Huntsman? What do you know about Huntsman?" [S chuckles.] So I said, "Well, it was my husband's tailor." He looked at me studiously [laughing]. Later on, as he again escorted me out to my car politely, opened the door, and I thanked him and so forth. I started the car, and as I backed it around, he stood there and he made a wonderful gesture: he put his finger up to his head, like a little salute, and he said, "Huntsman!" [Both laugh.] I felt that I had swum into this man's ken via Huntsman. I had an identity. I was a woman who knew about Huntsman—this very important thing. [S chuckles.] And I think that's what probably established some a sort of…something. [Chuckles.]

S: Yes. That's important.

M: Yes.

S: Now, Sam had known Huntsman from making the costumes for Beau Brummell or something like that?

M: Oh my god, you have a better memory than I have. Yes. Sam made Beau Brummell in London at the MGM Studio, and the costumes for Beau Brummel were made at Huntsman. Sam, from then on, got his suits at Huntsman. So, this was my identity—the knowledgeable woman: she knows about Huntsman. [Both laugh.]

S: All of these little stories are actually what makes this account come alive, at least to me.

M: Yes. [Both chuckle.] Actually, Huntsman became quite a bond because he came to think that I understood these things, and that I had taste he benefited from.

S: Well, you do!

M: So, he wanted to consult me about these things, as it turned out, the following years. I was forever ferrying him back and forth to Huntsman.

S: Now, this was the following year?

M: Yeah, following year.

S: Ah, but we're still in '65, and you've just come back shaking from Box Hill.

M: I've come back shaking from Box Hill.

S: So, was it that year that you began taking Krishnaji back and forth to Huntsman?

M: I think, yes, because I had a car, you see. They didn't have any car, and there was no way to get into town from Wimbledon, so I did a lot of taxiing them back and forth. Sometimes just Alain, I'd take him for, I don't know, a dentist or something, and sometimes Krishnaji. Or, they'd somehow get into town, I don't know how, and I'd pick them up and take them home.

S: Now, at this time also, your friendship with Alain began to develop, and you began to have a real contact with him.

M: Yes. By this time, 1965, Alain had been hired as Krishnaji's secretary. Alain became his secretary that winter in India. He'd gone to India in the winter of '64—'65. In January, Alain wrote me a couple of letters, and then he wrote me that Krishnaji had asked him to be like a secretary, assistant, you know, do things for him. So, that's what he was doing.

S: Anyway, you've come back shaking from your drive. And you think that that summer also you began ferrying Krishnaji back and forth…

M: Yes, in the rented car.

S: Then, it must've been '64 that you would have had this Huntsman story because…

M: Yes, it has to be.

S: …because in '65, in England, that was before Saanen.

M: That's right. Yes, that's right.

S: So it must've been your first contact with Krishnaji in Saanen.

M: Yes. Vanda must've asked me for lunch when the Moorheads were there, and the whole Huntsman episode. [Chuckles, then S chuckles too.] Also, the following summer, yoga came into the picture, but I'll come to that. Anyway, after London came Paris.

S: Were the only talks in London at the Boy Scout place?

M: That year, yes, and with only a small number of people.

S: Who else was there that you remember?

M: I remember sitting behind Dorothy Simmons and Montague[25], and getting quite annoyed at Dorothy. Something about…I've forgotten what it was…I thought she looked disagreeable. [Chuckles.] They sat right in front of me, and something about her being was rather brusque about the seat, or I've forgotten what. But she was there, and Iris again. I don't think I knew any of the others.

S: You didn't know any of the others. Okay.

S: You must've met Mary Cadogan?

M: No. I didn't meet her then. I'll tell you when I met her. It's very funny. Again, it's out of chronological order. There was a woman showing people up and down in the tent in Saanen to seats, dressed in sort of chiffon, and I remember thinking, "That woman thinks she's Ophelia!" [Laughter.] I was looking for a Mrs. Cadogan—Ragaopal must have given me Mrs. Cadogan's name, and I decided that Madame De Vidas must be Mrs. Cadogan. She too was showing people around. So I went up to her and said, "Are you Mrs. Cadogan?" And she said, "Oh, non, non!" [Laughter.] She didn't speak English much. The Ophelia character was Mrs. Cadogan. [S laughs heartily, M chuckles.] But I didn't see Mrs. Cadogan at the Wimbledon talks, nor at lunch with Anneke and Doris.

S: Do you remember being at Huntsman with Krishnaji in those days?

M: Oh, yes, when I took or picked them up or something. Probably I'd consult. In subsequent years, Alain got suits too. There was much conferring. [S chuckles.] Oh, and then there were shirts, and then there were ties, and then when we got to Paris…

S: Shoes. Of course.

M: We went to Lobb's in Paris. The shopping was [S chuckles] the daily program when he wasn't talking. He enjoyed it.

S: Alright. [M laughs.] Is this discussion fun?

M: Yes!

S: Then we'll continue, and pick up the story where we left off.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Ji is added to the end of names in India to denote respect and affection. Krishnamurti was called "Krishnaji" by those who knew him.

[2] Ojai is a small town about 80 miles north of Los Angeles that was first visited by Krishnamurti and his brother, Nityananda in 1922. Krishnaji lived there, off and on, until his death in 1986. The Krishnamurti Foundation of America is now located there.

[3] Land in Ojai purchased for Krishnaji's work in the 1920s, and where he spoke as late as 1985. Krishnamurti's only school in America is on that land.

[4] Rajagopal was made into the manager of activities surrounding Krishnaji by Krishnaji's elders when Krishnaji's brother, who had that role, died in 1925.

[5] Sam Zimbalist was a very successful film producer, and the only person to ever posthumously receive an Oscar for Best Picture. Mary received it for him.

[8] Krishnamurti Writings, Inc. was formed around 1945, and eventually became a point of legal contention.

[9] Filomena had been Mary's housekeeper for many years, and had worked for Mary's aunt since she was young. So, she was like a member of the family to Mary.

[10] A hotel in Saanen.

[11] This is a point of humor because far from being a place for a hermit, it is a luxury hotel.

[12] Friends of Mary and Sam. Christopher Fry was one of the writers Sam had hired for Ben-Hur.

[13] Marchese Vanda Scaravelli became a great friend and hostess of Krishnaji's. She first heard him in 1930, but didn't meet him until 1937. She was his hostess in Switzerland and in Italy.

[14] Frances McCann was a great enthusiast of Krishnaji's work, and she traveled around the world attending his talks, and frequently contributed to the work of the foundations set up to support the schools he founded.

[15] Ommen is a place in Holland where Krishnamurti spoke in the 1920s.

[16] Chalet Tannegg was a chalet in Gstaad, Switzerland (next to Saanen, where Krishnaji spoke) which Vanda Scaravelli rented for his accommodation during the talks. Tannegg was also the venue for group discussions that Krishnaji held.

[18] A friend and supporter of Krishnaji's since the 1920s.

[19] Nagra made professional portable tape recorders, which for many years were the best way to record Krishnamurti's talks.

[20] A fictional character from the 1800s who controls other persons or situations for self-serving intent.

[21] Anneke Korndorffer was a supporter of Krishnaji's work since the 1930s, and an organizer of his activities in Holland.

[22] Doris Pratt had worked for Krishnaji's activities since the 1920s, and was the representative of Krishnamurti Writings, Inc. in England.

[23] The three marches from Selma in Alabama to Montgomery in Alabama marked a peak and a turning point in the American Civil Rights Movement. Mary told me she marched in a Chanel suit because she wanted people to see that it wasn't only poor people and students who were supporters of civil rights.

[24] Huntsman is a tailor on Savile Row in London.

Issue 2: April 1965 to December 1965

In this issue, we see clearly that Mary had read over her diaries for the period she thought we were going to cover before we started this second discussion. She was more precise about dates, numbers, etc. Even so, at one point she has me stop the recorder so she can check in her diary, which must have been on the table in front of her, and she corrects what she was saying.

The period covered in Issue 2 is still before Mary became Krishnaji's assistant, so the picture, here, of Krishnaji is still somewhat from a distance—she is not seeing him for much of the day, every day, as she did later on. But, we do see the closeness between them begin to develop, and, with it, Mary's life and world changing as her involvement with Krishnaji grows.

Here also is Mary's first trip to India, and how that appeared in her eyes. There, and elsewhere, Mary meets for the first time several people who readers will recognize from the many biographies of Krishnaji.

Scott: So we pick up your memoirs in May 1965 when you went from London to hear Krishnaji speak in Paris.

Mary: Yes, I took the boat train to Paris[1]. I forget how Krishnaji and Alain went, but Krishnaji was scheduled to give his Paris talks in the Salle Adyar.

S: Where's that?

M: It's a theosophical place near the Tour Eiffel, in that quartier. It's a fair-sized auditorium.

S: Wasn't it unusual for Krishnaji to talk in a theosophical place?

M: Well, there weren't so many venues to pick from, and it was only a few blocks from where he was staying with the Suarèses'.

S: Where did they live?

M: They lived on the Avenue de la Bourdonnais[2], up on the top floor. It was like a penthouse. He spoke twice in the Salle Adyar, and then he had some days off. Apparently my driving abilities were satisfactory, because he suggested going to Versailles.

S: Where were you staying?

M: I was staying at the Hotel Pont Royal. It's a nice hotel on the Left Bank, down off Boulevard St. Germain. Rue de Bac is near there.

S: Rue de Bac, yes, yes, I know it, then. And Alain Naudé?

M: He was staying at the Suarèses' too. It was rather crowded, but somehow it somewhat worked.

Anyway, Krishnaji wanted to go to Versailles, and at some point I had caught on that he liked Mercedes cars. So I went to Hertz and I got a Mercedes car [soft chuckle from S], and we went to Versailles. He wasn't then and never has been very interested in palaces and looking at them. He was not a sight-seer. But he loved gardens, and a walk in the gardens was something he enjoyed. We walked all over: a big walk. After that we went on to St. Germain. I think we had a cup of tea, and then we walked some more in St. Germain, which was also pleasant.

S: When you would drive, would Krishnaji be in the front next to you?

M: Yes.

S: And Alain Naudé would be in the back.

M: In the back, that's right. There was another talk, and after that there was another expedition, again in the Mercedes, and this time we went to Chartres, which was wonderful. We walked all around and looked at everything very carefully. Krishnaji was taken with the stained glass windows, found that particularly beautiful, and we all agreed that this was the loveliest of all the gothic cathedrals that we had seen. We lunched nearby. I've forgotten the name of the restaurant, but it was about a block away from the cathedral. I could go there if I were there, but I can't remember the name. And then we went to Romboulliet and had another walk in the forest. That, also, was very pleasant.

Paris was busy for him, but not so much for me. All the French friends wanted to see him.

S: Of course. What would Krishnaji wear during these outings?

M: He was always very elegant. For an outing like these he would wear a sort of sports shirt. You know, long sleeve, knitted—those shirts.

S: Ah yes, I remember those shirts.

M: He would also wear a tweed jacket and gray flannel trousers and beautifully polished shoes.

S: Yes, of course.

M: And a scarf at his neck.

S: And when he spoke he wore a tie and more formal wear.

M: Oh yes, he spoke in his usual formal clothing—a suit. So that was Paris.

S: How many people came to the talks there?

M: Well the Salle wasn't huge, but it was a good size, and it was full.

S: A thousand people?

M: Oh, no no, I'd say about five hundred, probably. That's a guess.

S: How many talks did he give, do you remember?

M: He gave five, I think.

After the talks I left for Switzerland by train. I became a vegetarian on the train [chuckling] no, not on the train, on the first of June [laughs]. Knowing I was going to be a vegetarian, I started, not in Paris because of my father, who lived in Paris in those days—his pleasure was to take me to all the best restaurants in Paris, and I didn't have the gall, or courage, or whatever you want to call it, to say, "Father you should know that I am now a vegetarian." So I postponed making the change until I got on the train leaving Paris [laughing].

S: Did you see a lot of your father during that time?

M: Yes. I somehow fitted everything in. I'd go and lunch or dine with him and scuttle back to go to a talk or drive or whatever.

S: And you didn't do any shopping with Krishnaji in Paris that year?

M: Well, I must have, yes. It was always heavy shopping in Paris. There was Lobb shoes. Very important.

S: Of course [laughing].

M: Lobb in London was not good enough, according to Krishnaji. So Lobb, Paris, it was. There was an enormous man with an English name but who was French-born. Apparently shoe places and racing places have a lot of emigrated English who've become French, married French women, and they're really French…oh dear, I can't remember his name…a big fellow, and he wore a leather apron.

S: Yes, yes, I remember him.

M: That's the way you dressed if you're a shoe-maker. And he'd bring out these jewel-like shoes. It would be very pleasing to everybody. We'd choose the leather; there would be quite a lot of discussion, and naturally the shoe-maker had already made the wooden form of the foot. Sometimes that had to be adjusted a little bit. And then the order was placed. And, of course, it had to be that Alain had such shoes too, which he'd never had before in his life [chuckling]. Alain shared Krishnaji's passion for clothing.

S: Yes, it was very contagious!

M: And, I seemed to be the proper accompaniment to this because I would give approval and my advice was appreciated.

S: Absolutely! As it still is! [Laughing.]

M: Since that first time I uttered the word "Huntsman," I acquired a whole [S chuckling] set of characteristics in Krishnaji's mind. I knew about these things. If I didn't like something, that was the end of it.

S: Krishnaji told me that Lobb in Paris was better that Lobb in London because [M chuckles] after the war Lobb of London didn't take in any new apprentices, so they couldn't get new, really good shoemakers. Whereas Lobb's in Paris got all the Polish shoemakers that fled Poland when the communists took over. This was Krishnaji's version of why Lobb in Paris was better [chuckling].

M: [chuckling] I didn't know that; you're better informed. I should interview YOU! [More laughing.] Well, anyway, it was very satisfying. Then, of course, there's the matter of shirts, which were looked at at Sulka, but there wasn't an order placed, as I recall.

S: Is Sulka in Paris?

M: Yes, but Rome was better for shirts, supposedly.

S: So, you didn't go to Charvet?

M: Oh yes, we went to Charvet, that's true. In fact, I got some shirts in Charvet, too. Yes, quite right, but he also got Italian ones later. Also, I think some scarves were bought at Charvet. Of course, they were Indian Scarves, but Charvet had imported them.

And I remember that Krishnaji gave me one. I remember also that it [laughs] it had a lovely scent to it. Krishnaji never used any cologne or scent or anything like that. I remember [laughing] reading somewhere, something about "the odor of sanctity," and I decided that's why this scarf smelled so nice. The scarf had been his.

S: Yes.

M: It held the scent for quite a while.

S: Was that the first thing Krishnaji gave you?

M: Yes. A cotton scarf, Indian, but from Charvet. So, now we get to…

S: Wait, can I ask another question? Sorry I keep asking all these questions. This is very informal.

M: Please.

S: Did you go out to eat with Krishnaji at all?

M: I was invited, I think, once to the Suarèses', but not otherwise.

S: Were there any private discussions in Paris?

M: Mmm…I'm having trouble remembering which year those began. Alain was particularly good at rounding up young people. That was really his function in those days because he was of the opinion, and Krishnaji shared it, and I shared it, that the old situation of white-haired ladies filling the auditorium should change. It was time to mix that up a bit. So, Alain collected young people. I can't remember if it was this year—I should have done my homework better—but I remember these started either this year or the next year. I rented a room, for the discussions, in the hotel where I was staying, and about sixty or seventy young people came. Krishnaji discussed with them and answered questions.

S: In French or in English?

M: In English. Some of them would ask questions in French, but he'd reply in English. These meetings with young people was something new and something good, and it continued from then on for as long as Alain was with us.

Anyway, so now I'm on the train from Paris to Geneva, and I go into the dining car for a meal, being now a vegetarian [chuckling], and there's nothing on the menu that's vegetarian. There isn't a vegetable in sight [more chuckling], except for pommes frites, which came with steak.

S: Of course.

M: So, I thought, well, one last time, and I ate. When I got to Geneva, I rented a little car again, and toured up to Gstaad. This time I went to the hotel Rossli, which you will remember.

S: Remind me of where that is.

M: It's right on the corner, where you turn left to go to Lausanne in the middle of Gstaad. Opposite the Olden Hotel. Remember?

S: Oh, yes.

M: I had a room there, and I remember [laughs] the nicest thing that happened when I was there, which wasn't very long. My room overlooked the main street, and one morning I heard cowbells. I looked out the window and there was a procession of cows going up to the high pastures in the mountains. They were led by the dowager cow, the queen cow [chuckling]. She had the biggest bell and she wore a lovely straw hat with wreaths of flowers on it. She walked with majesty.

S: Yes, I've seen it.

M: That was lovely! All the cows each had their bell ringing as they went past. That was nice.

So a few days after I got there, the telephone rang, and it was Alain to tell me that they had arrived; they flew from Paris to Geneva. He asked, "Do you have a car?"

"Yes, I have a car."

"Well, Krishnaji would like to drive up to Gstaad instead of coming on the train, can you come and pick us up?"

So, I drove down. I think I got a slightly bigger car. I was forever switching from the smallest, cheapest [chuckling] to something worthy of the event! [Laughter.] I drove down to Geneva and met them. They had spent the night at the Hotel du Rhône, which, if you remember, is right on the river.

S: I do remember it.

M: We went into the dining room. I remember scrutinizing the menu thinking, "You know, I'm a vegetarian now, what do I order?" Krishnaji, who picked up everything, looked at me and said, "What have you been eating lately?" [S laughs heartily.] Well, what I had been eating [more chuckling] was cheese omelet, and cheese omelet, and again cheese omelet, and I had the feeling, "Am I going to live on cheese omelet for the rest of my life?!" [M and S laugh.] I explained about cheese omelet.

He said, "We will teach you how to eat." And he said it quite…firmly. [S laughs.] And then they ordered a lovely meal of vegetables and salads and fruits and all the things that we've all been living on ever since!

S: Yes, yes.

M: I was having trouble after that first week on my own in the Hotel Rossli. [More laughing.] Anyway, we drove up to Chalet Tannegg. Vanda had rented, as always, one floor of Chalet Tannegg. But she wasn't there and didn't come until July. This was in June still. I left Paris on the first of June, so it was right after that.

S: Sorry, but before you go on, didn't Krishnaji always stay in the same room in the Hotel du Rhône?

M: No, all rooms were identical. They were small rooms with a bath. There was nothing special about any of them. It was a slightly commercial hotel, unlike the Hotel des Bergues, where we stayed later, which was nice. That's what you're thinking of.

S: Yes, that's what I'm thinking of, yes. Can I ask you, do you remember which route you took up the mountain?

M: Yes, along the Lac, always. He liked to go along the lake route.

S: You didn't go through Bulle?

M: Later on it was usually Bulle, but I don't think the first time I knew the way to Bulle. I don't remember.

Vanda had sent ahead a cook, a chef really, to look after Krishnaji and provide the food and all that. It was lovely in Gstaad. There was nobody there. Usually I was asked for lunch, not supper because he had that in his room, but usually for lunch. And I would, with my car, drive to wherever he wanted to walk in the afternoon, if it wasn't up the hill and into the woods. It was very pleasant.

S: Do you remember some of these walks, where they were?

M: Well, sometimes we went up towards Gsteig and walked. I remember there was a way—I never did it later on, but there was a way of going off the road onto some higher fields and walking up there. Also, we often walked down along the river, the Saanen River toward the airport, that way. There was also the Lauenen walk. It was nice.

Then, not too long after arriving in Gstaad, we had to go back to Geneva. Again, we lunched at the Hotel du Rhône. Then we went to pick up shirts. Krishnaji got shirts in Geneva. I don't know why he got shirts in Geneva, but he did. There was a place on the Rue du Rhône where he got some sort of shirts.

S: Were they those warmish ones almost like, but not quite flannel?

M: Actually, they were made by Allen Solly in England, but you could get them there. They had a very good store.

Can you turn off the recorder for a moment while I check my diaries? [Tape is turned off, then back on.]

I was wrong about the drive. We drove down from Gstaad via the Col du Pillon through Aigle, and then around the French side of the lake.

S: Ahh, Deauville.

M: Yes. And going in and out of France, you went through customs at both ends. We looked for a restaurant in Yvoire but we didn't find one, so we wound up at the Hotel du Rhône. Krishnaji had his fitting, and then came the first of many immemorial visits to Patek Philippe. [Both chuckle.]

S: Yes.

M: This was always immensely pleasing to him. He would come in, and they would bow because they knew him. Out would come his steel watch, and he would go into a very grave conference with, not the man who bows to you, but the man who really makes the watches and adjusts them.

S: Yes.

M: They would confer with heads down, you know, looking at the watch, heads slightly bowed. And then [Scott chuckles] the man would take it away and do something mysterious. Meanwhile, we'd look at all the other watches. Eventually, Krishnaji's watch would be brought back just "au point"—it was perfect. You may remember because you've been there with him, too.

S: I remember well!

M: This was a ritual visit.

S: Yes! Not unlike a visit to Mecca! [Chuckles.]

M: Yes, this is one of the important moments in the summer! [More chuckling.] It was never to be hurried or taken lightly, and it was very satisfying.

S: I know, I know!

M: Then we drove back, this time we went via Bulle. By this time I knew the way to go via Bulle, which was lovely. But before turning up into the mountains, he always wanted to go along the lake. He didn't want to go on the auto-route. Well, we did sometimes when we had to, and that's when I found out that Krishnaji liked to drive fast. But at this time I had a Hertz car. I learned he liked to drive fast when, in a later year, I had the Jaguar, but that's for another chapter. So, we went back via Bulle, and I had supper with him that night. That was the first expedition of that kind.

S: Did you stop in Bulle?

M: No. We always did later on to buy the famous Gateau Bulleoise, but that was years later.

Something else of great interest happened that year. Enrique Biascoechea, whom I don't know if you ever knew.

S: I've never met him, but I knew of him.

M: Well, he and his wife Isabel came to Saanen every year to hear Krishnaji speak, and they took an apartment down by the river. Isabel was a very good cook. She used to cook lunch. Enrique was an old theosophist. A very sweet man. He knew about Krishnaji's Mercedes feelings. So, he had the idea to buy a little Mercedes, a two-seater, and give it to the Saanen gathering committee [S chuckles] but only for the use of, guess who?

S: Yes.

M: So, one day I went up to Tannegg and there was this beautiful little silver jewel-like car, with Krishnaji looking so pleased. He showed me everything about it, and then he asked if I would like a drive. I said, "Yes, I'd love a ride." So, he drove me to Chateau d'Oex. I remember it was the first time I'd driven with him driving instead of me driving. He looked so elegant with his driving gloves, and he drove beautifully. Obviously an experienced driver!

S: [Chuckles] Yes.

M: [Chuckling] Then we drove back to Tannegg.

S: Did you do anything in Chateau d'Oex?

M: No, we just went to Chateau d'Oex, then turned around and came back. When we got back he dusted the car—it had been out! [S laughs.] I think the next day when I went up, I found him and Alain both washing it because it had been out. As I watched Alain working, I thought, "My god, he's a musician, he's going to ruin his hands." [Laughing.] But he was doing what had to be done, and Krishnaji was also washing. After it was washed, Krishnaji opened the hood and dusted all the machinery inside. Only then [S laughs] was it alright.

Again walks every day.

He, also at this point, received some tapes of chants from India, and we listened to those, which I enjoyed.

S: Who was it that was chanting, do you remember?

M: They were made at the Rishi Valley School with the children chanting.

Every day we walked, rain or shine. Also, there was a lot of talk about my going to India. I was planning to make the whole tour that year, so, we talked about that. Krishnaji said that he must see that I'm properly looked after in India, and he'd arrange my housing. He said that I shouldn't go to a hotel in Madras, but that Frances McCann and Alain and I should rent a house in Madras, because it would be healthier: we could control our food. I hadn't the remotest idea how to rent a house in Madras, as you can imagine. [S chuckles.] But Alain knew just what to do. He wrote to Mrs. Jayalakshmi saying that Krishnaji had suggested this and could she [chuckling] take care of it? When we get to that part I'll tell you how she took care of it!

S: Yes, yes, I'm sure!

M: Back to Saanen: We often went down to the Biascoechea's for lunch. Either I would also be asked to have lunch, or I would drive them, drop them, and later take them back up the hill. That was when Enrique pulled out a photograph of Krishnaji and his brother Nitya as little boys. The Biascoecheas brought them out to show us. Krishnaji looked at that and looked at that, and he kept going back and looking at it again. He said he didn't remember that time at all. Afterward, when I drove him up the hill, I said, "What was it that interested you so much in that photo?"

That's when he made the statement, "If we only could figure out why that boy wasn't conditioned and remained vacant, perhaps we could help children in the schools not to be so conditioned." He was trying, somehow, to get a sense of why that boy, meaning himself, remained that way. Why nothing really scarred him at all, mentally. I remember his looking at the photo for, oh, such a long time.

Vanda eventually arrived. I, in the meantime, not wanting to spend my life in the Hotel Rossli with cheese omelets, had rented a flat in an apartment house called Les Caprice.

S: Yes, I remember where that is.

M: When Vanda came there was no longer a room for Alain because she only rented one floor, the floor on the level where you came in, and that only had two bedrooms. The proprietor lived upstairs. He was a German, and he only came for a short time in summer, but he never rented out his floor. There was a downstairs floor with a flat, because the chalet was built on a hill, but Vanda only had the middle floor. When Vanda came Alain had nowhere to go. Fortunately, the flat I had taken had two bedrooms, so I invited Alain to stay with me, which he did.

Then the talks began. Again, usually I walked in the afternoon with Krishnaji and Alain. Vanda didn't want to walk; she was doing yoga all morning and wasn't much for walking. So, I usually walked.

At one point, Pupul Jayakar arrived, and that was my first meeting with her. She stayed only a short while. Again, we all went to the Biascoechea's for some meals, everybody.

S: Let me go back a moment. Who would drive Krishnaji to the talks?

M: Vanda.

S: What car did she have, do you remember?

M: Yes, she still has it but it no longer works, at least it didn't the last time I saw her. It was a Lancia, very old even then, and this is '65. It was an old and rather splendid Lancia, and she drove it with great dexterity and speed. She drove it up from Italy to Gstaad in those days. After bringing Krishnaji to the tent for the talks, she would park the car under the trees always by the Boy Scout camp.

S: When Pupul came, did she stay at Chalet Tannegg?

M: She stayed with the Biascoecheas. She was only there a short time.

Also, Pupul's daughter Radhika arrived, also staying with the Biascoecheas.

I remember going on a walk with everybody, Pupul, Radhika, Alain and, I forget who else; I was walking behind, and Krishnaji fell back in step with me. This is when he said to me quite shyly, "Did I ever know you in California?" [S laughs.] Of course, this refers to the interviews I'd had. which were earth-shaking events in my life.

S: And the whole reason that you were there in Saanen.

M: The whole…everything had changed. [More laughing.] He didn't, of course, remember anything. I remember laughing and being very pleased. It was the way he should have been.

S: Yes [chuckles].

How many people came to the talks, roughly?

M: The usual, a tent full.

S: But they grew over the years that I was attending.

M: The later tents held more. This was different. It was tiered seating. It was a nice-looking tent, but it was the same hard benches you sat on and all that.

S: Was it over towards the Boy Scout camp side of the field?

M: No, it was right where the tents always were, the same place. The entrance was from the river.

In those days a lot of people made their own tape recording. There weren't any rules about that. People sat down at a kind of table near the stage and taped.

Then George Vithoulkas showed up. George was a Greek who was becoming a homeopath. He and Alain knew each other and had shared an interest in homeopathy.

George became a professional at it, eventually becoming quite renowned, I'm told. However, this was early on, and George took on Krishnaji's case, as it were. You'll hear the rest about George later. Anyway, he was there in Saanen.

Krishnaji gave an awful lot of talks in those days. I think there were ten or something like that. And, at the end of each talk, he would ask for questions from the floor.

After the talks were over, he held young people's discussions again. Alain had rounded up young people. He used to go around the camping ground where a lot of the young people camped, and just collect young people like the Pied Piper. Sometimes these young people's discussions were at Tannegg, if they could all fit in, but there was one across the river in a field.

S: Across from where the tent was?

M: No, further down toward Gstaad. If you walk along the river you come to it.

S: Before you get to that hotel?

M: Yes. There were several young people's discussions.

Also, David Bohm came, and they had discussions. There were six of those, and they were at Tannegg.

S: They had met previously, and they had had discussions here in England, hadn't they?

M: Yes, they had met previously back in the beginning of the 60s.

Then there was another trip to Geneva. I don't quite remember when. But at that point [chuckling], Krishnaji asked me to be on the Rishi Valley School committee!

S: [laughs heartily]. Being the great Indian expert that you were!

M: [laughs] Imagine! I had no qualifications, but it didn't matter to him! I don't remember what I replied, but fortunately nothing came of it. [S and M laugh together.]

We went another time to Geneva, and this time we lunched at the Hotel des Bergues, which became more the normal place.

I was going to go to India, but before going to India I had to fly back to the U.S.

S: Before we fly back to the U.S., may I ask, did Alain always accompany you on these trips to Geneva with Krishnaji?

M: Yes, yes, always.

So, I flew back to Malibu, and whatever else I did, I went and saw my family. So, the story picks up when, in September, there was a fight between India and Pakistan, which put the whole Indian winter tour in jeopardy. Alain called me to tell me that Krishnaji was going to decide whether to go to India as scheduled, or postpone it until the end of the month. He then suggested that I come to Rome, and that if we didn't go to India, that we all spend the winter in Italy. But, as it happened, there was a cease-fire, and Alain, who had been refused a visa for India, now was able to get a visa for India. So, I flew back to meet them in Rome in October. Krishnaji and Alain were staying in a place that Vanda had rented, Villa del Casaletto, which was a house outside Rome, toward the airport, over behind the Villa Florie and all that.

S: Where did you stay in Rome?

M: I stayed in the Hotel Flora that time.

S: Where's that?

M: It's right by the Borghese Gardens, next to the Excelsior.

S: Was it hard for you to go back to Rome?[3]

M: Yes, it was actually.

S: I'm sure.

M: Yes. I had wanted never to go back to Rome, but I had to go back to do this. I wasn't there very long.

S: Was Krishnaji aware of how difficult it was for you to be back in Rome?

M: I didn't talk about it.

S: Yes.

M: So, two or three days after arriving, on the first of November, I think it was, we flew to Delhi, and were met at the airport by Kitty Shiva Rao and Pupul.

S: Did your plane stop anyplace?

M: Don't know, probably. All those flights in those days stopped somewhere, usually they came down to refuel in some Arab country.

I remember the fact that when Krishnaji arrived in Delhi, the car met him at the foot of the steps down from the plane…

S: [laughs] Yes.

M: Which is very nice.

S: Did you sit with Krishnaji on the airplane, or did Alain sit next to him?

M: Neither. In the beginning, Krishnaji would be in first class, and Alain and I would be in tourist. He would always try to persuade me to take his seat in first class, which I, obviously, didn't do.

Anyway, we arrived in Delhi and we were ushered into the VIP lounge, while other people saw to the luggage. I didn't have to do anything, which was wonderful. Our passports were taken away (Pama, I think, did that, as I recall). Eventually passports were returned after being processed, and we were taken into Delhi, stopping first at the Shiva Raos' for Krishnaji. Kitty Shiva Rao had very kindly arranged for me to stay in a place called the IndianInternational Center, not far from her house, where I had a very nice room. She lived not far from Lodhi Park. I remember that same day, Krishnaji, and, I think, Pupul, and Alain, we drove around to show me a bit of things, and we drove into Lodhi Park, but it was dark by that time.

S: If I may come back to something, did you go in a car from the airport separately from Krishnaji?

M: No, I went in the same car to the hotel, but the car stopped first at the Shiva Raos' house and the Shiva Raos and Krishnaji and Alain got out.

S: Where did Alain stay?

M: In the beginning, he stayed at Shiva Rao's, and then a few days later he also took a room in the International Center. I don't know what the domestic situation was, but I think it was crowded there. However, Kitty very kindly asked me to take all my meals at their house. You know, people are so hospitable in India, and I was treated as Krishnaji's guest in a sense. Maybe he made it appear that way.

S: But they often are very hospitable, yes.

M: Krishnaji was concerned that I shouldn't eat this and that.

S: How long did you spend there?

M: Well, we got there on the second of November, and he gave his first talk on the seventh in the garden of the Constitution Club. He was under a shamiana[4], on a little raised platform with a bright little canvas thing shielding him from the sun. There was a wonderful red and blue carpet put out for people to sit on. I sat with Alain, right in front of the stage with the Nagra tape recorder. That was the first time I saw Krishnaji with an Indian audience, and he startled me by being really blunt with the audience, saying, as nearly as I can recall, "You people have talked about non-violence for all these years, and yet this year not one of you spoke out against the war." They'd almost had a war with Pakistan. He really, put it as only he could, witheringly! I remember really feeling shocked, that he talked differently to Indian audiences at that time. He was tougher with them.

Then there was a side trip. Do you want to hear about this? It doesn't involve Krishnaji.

S: We want everything [both laugh].

M: Well, I forget what started it, but anyway, on around the fifteenth, Frances McCann, Alain, I, and George Vithoulkas, with a car and a driver, drove to Rishikesh. We were told that there would be no place to stay, and that we must prepare to put up with that. We thought that we'd go anyway and, if necessary, we would sleep in sleeping bags. We went off, I remember [chuckling], with a big bottle of boiled water and a bag of walnuts [S chuckles], which was sort of our rations. When we got to Rishikesh we discovered that there really weren't any hotel rooms; but Alain, who was very good at persuading people, went into the tourist bureau, and talked them into letting us stay in what I think were called Dak Bungalows. These are the places for government inspectors to stay when they came around. There happened to be one right on the Ganga. You entered past a little sentry at the gate. He had a spear! [Laughs, then S laughs.] He didn't have a gun [more laughing], and he was standing there all by himself in front of the gate with a spear. We drove in quite a ways, and found the bungalow, which was immaculately clean, and it had, I think, three bedrooms and four bathrooms, which was quite something. Frances and I shared a bathroom, and this was my first experience with Indian toilets! [Laughs].

S: Ah, yes [laughs].

M: But it was clean, it was nice. After settling in, we went back into town, looking for some place to eat. As you may know, there was a restaurant chain called Kwality Restaurant. I don't know whether they still have them in India.

S: I remember seeing them.

M: So, we went to a Kwality Restaurant, and we very carefully ordered cooked things that we thought wouldn't have ptomaine in them. I think we drank a lot of tea [chuckling]. I don't remember much else.

We had rather cold showers in the morning, then we went up to Shivananda Ashram in Hardvar, which was interesting because of the masses of sannyasis in yellow robes, and it was the first time I had seen leper beggars, which were part of the Ben-Hur story. We went to the Ashram and we waited to see the head of it, but he was busy. So, we left, and we went looking for a specific yoga guru, who was reputed to be wonderful, but he was out. So we returned to Rishikesh.

Then George went looking for something, I can't remember what, but he came back saying that next door there was an Ayurvedic doctor who told him that a great swami was about to arrive and did we want to meet the great swami? We replied that we did. So, at the appointed time, we went next door, and this weird looking [chuckling] man entered. He was very fattish, with a big round face. He looked at us from one to the other, seeming to question, "Who are these people and what do they do?" We sat down and he asked some questions and George got fascinated by this man. Later on, George decided that he wanted to become this man's disciple, if you please. Well, Alain was horrified and disgusted. The next day, Alain, Frances, and I went up to Dehradun.

S: Ah, yes.

M: Up, up, up, up, up, the Himalayas and on, as you know to the snow line and beyond, the most wonderful mountains. When we returned, Alain and George got into an argument, with Alain saying, "You came here to look after Krishnaji, what do you mean by going off with this guru?"

S: What was he treating Krishnaji for?

M: Just looking after his health. But George wanted to know magic; he wanted Sidis, powers, all these things.

So, we drove back to Delhi with a rather poor atmosphere in the car. George went to see Krishnaji that evening, and Krishnaji tried to help him see clearly what he was pursuing, but George wasn't going to have anything to do with contradicting his intentions. Alain was furious. He thought this was outrageous, inconsiderate, irresponsible, and so forth.

So, George goes off to his swami, and the rest of us went to Rajghat.

I remember [chuckling] in the airport in Delhi, waiting for the plane, there was a whole room of waiting passengers, but there was one who had a gray scarf around his head; he was fat and short, and he was covered with ashes on his forehead, and done up in a shawl. I said to Krishnaji in French, "Quel est son maquillage?" What is his makeup? [S laughs.] Krishnaji made a bewildered gesture, and then Krishnaji did what he always did in airports, he walked around with great dignity, taking in everything, but never staring at anything, if you know what I mean. He would obliquely see everything.

S: Yes, yes.

M: [laughing] When he came back, he made a funny remark like, "Now, I've seen everything."

When we got to Benares, Krishnaji went off with Madhavachari and some others in a kind of a bus.

I'll never forget my first glimpses of Benares, because it made me feel that I hadn't been in India till then. All the traffic with the lorries constantly honking at each other, and all the decorations on them, and the goats and cows wandering around, and the women putting dung patties on the walls to dry them, and other women with big brass pitchers of water on their head, and the smells of things drying and the people lying on those string beds, low beds by the sides of the roads. It was India, much more so than Delhi! [Laughing.]

S: Yes. [Laughing] Who flew? It was you, Alain, Krishnaji, …

M: And, I guess, Frances. I remember that I sat next to Krishnaji, and he pointed out to me, in the early morning, the pink snows of the Himalayas, and how beautiful it was.

S: So, you must have taken off before daybreak?

M: Yes. Somehow all flights in India were always in weird hours in those days.

When we got to Rajghat, there ensued this [laughing] business about the rooms that were prepared for us.

S: Sorry, let me stop you again to ask questions people in the future may have. When Krishnaji flew with you at this time, was he wearing Indian clothing?

M: Oh yes, he wore Indian clothing right through, all the time he was in India. This reminds me that when we were in Delhi, he wore churidars. You know what churidars are?

S: Yes.

M: You know they're longer than your legs, and they tighten on your calves as you push them up, but they have to fit. Krishnaji sent me over a pair of his to try. Unfortunately his legs are much thinner than mine [laughing], and I got stuck in them! I had a terrible time getting out without ripping them. [M and S laughing.] There was also a lot of shopping for clothing for me in Delhi, in the beginning.

S: Where did you go?

M: I went to the Cottage Industries. Kitty Shiva Rao was one of the directors of that, and I can't remember if she took me or sent me, but there was a lot of getting things to wear in India, like cotton things.

S: Did you bring them back to show Krishnaji, which I know he so enjoyed later?

M: No, I just turned up in them. [Laughs.]

Anyway, we're now at Rajghat. There was a big turnout at the school to greet him, little children with flowers and everything. Frances and I were given rooms. We had a big room and a little room and we shared a bathroom. It was in one of those buildings looking over the river called Krishna Ashram. We went upstairs to our rooms and opened the door, and were astonished. It must have been unused for several years [M and S chuckling] because, I'm not exaggerating, there was so much dust it was like being in the desert. When we entered, clouds of it went up. It looked like sand, but it was dust. There was nothing in the room except one bed with just the rope, no mattress, no sheets, no blankets, no mosquito netting, nothing! The small room was in a similar condition.

Frances and I debated about who got the big one and who got the small one. She won and got the small one [chuckles]. There were three pegs in the wall on which you could hang things, but that's all there was, nothing else! [S laughs.] The bathroom was not very big, and it was chiefly extraordinary because of the wash basin—it was small, and it was as black as your tape recorder. I don't know how one could get a wash basin, a white porcelain wash basin, that black unless you poured tar on it! [S laughs.] No ordinary dirt could do that, not even years of ordinary dirt [S laughs more] could get a white sink that black. And then there was just a hole in the floor as a toilet. Alain was in the same building but somewhere else, and after seeing our place, he went right to Krishnaji and told him. Then, apparently, Madhavachari, who ran all K activities in India, was told that all was not well. He'd been an Indian railway big shot of some kind but was now retired. Very tall, big man. Very severe Brahmin type, but he had no interest in people's comfort—at all! [Laughter.] He came and looked at it and mumbled something like, "Oh, it, ah yes, it's not ready. Well, I'll ah, send someone" but nobody ever came! Apparently Krishnaji was again informed, and now Krishnaji arrived. And the to-do [laughing] that followed from his coming and seeing this! This should be, you know, beneath his knowledge or notice.

S: Of course [laughing].

M: But he came in and [chuckling] started asserting his authority. In no time people came with buckets of water and brooms, etc. Eventually a mattress was found, and some sheets and a blanket and, I think, eventually mosquito nets. Some pathetic bearer, the one who staggered up the stairs with our buckets of boiling water in the morning, which he'd gotten up way before dawn to make (we could hear him cutting the firewood, making the fire, boiling the buckets of water); this poor man was set to cleaning the wash basin. He cleaned it for four hours the first day, and he was still scraping away with a razor the day we left three weeks later. Terrible! But the consternation at Krishnaji coming over and seeing what his guests were subjected to—everybody's face was ashen. [M and S both laugh.]

S: Of course. Where did you have your meals?

M: Where did we have our meals? I don't remember any meals [laughing]. Well, it can't have been bad or I would have remembered it! [Chuckles.]

Anyway Krishnaji gave lots of talks, and talks to the children.

S: Where did those take place?

M: In the school hall, you know, you go down along the river, and you come to the big hall for the school, which was initiated by Tagore. Anyway, there were talks to teachers, and to students, together and separately. And, one lovely day in December Frances and I were invited to Krishnaji's room where he chanted with Mr. Salman, who was the music teacher. We sat on the floor. I remember his room, it was very neat. There was a towel over this pillow. The mosquito netting was pulled back ever so neatly, and there was a metal wardrobe and something with drawers, and a chair. I can still see it vividly. There was a small rug on which we sat, and they chanted. It was wonderful.

S: Did you go for walks in the afternoon with Krishnaji?

M: Yes, often around the playing fields. There was a big walk that goes all around the property. Also, I went quite a lot by myself across the little river, the Varuna, to the villages—did you ever do that?

S: Yes, many times.

M: I remember the earth is sort of sand-colored, and the buildings were made of that same earth and so were the same color, but with white decorations on them. They weren't square, like ordinary houses; they were sort of rounded as if little children had made them, you know, like the houses children make on the beach. I used to walk over there quite a lot. Also, I used to walk to the agricultural school.

I also remember being asked to go with Alain into Benares to buy staves (I think you'd call them) because there was a student in the agricultural college who'd been bitten by a rabid jackal, and he didn't take the Pasteur treatment, so he died. We were asked to buy staves, big heavy things, to ward off rabid jackals. I never saw jackals, but that was the errand. I remember the extraordinary-ness of Benares, which again [S laughs] is like no place else in the world.

S: Yes, it seems like the essence of India.

M: Yes. Again, the taxis and trucks honking, with goats and cows wandering around. At one point, Frances and Alain and I were walking down toward the ghats[5] and, going around a corner, I almost collided with a bicycle with a dead body on the back! Wrapped up and being taken to the burning ghats[6]. Then walking along the river, on the ghats, and we were just walking through ashes. I remember saying to Alain, "Look if I fall in, just keep walking and forget you ever knew me, because [S laughs] I'll be dead!" [Both laugh.] Strange city!

S: Yes, yes. What kind of contact did you have with Krishnaji during this time? Did you go up to his room for discussions?

M: Yes, I was invited for some discussions.

S: Did you only see him during these discussions?

M: Well, I'd see him during the discussions, and I was asked, I think, to lunch. I believe Parameshwaran[7] was with him then, so there was lunch upstairs in his building—in that back room which was the dining room.

S: I remember. So, you'd have lunch with Krishnaji there?

M: Yes.

S: Would you participate in many discussions and see him for walks?

M: Yes, but not as much as some other places.

S: You must have gone to Sarnath[8].

M: Yes, I went to Sarnath either alone or with somebody, probably Alain. I walked there, and went to the museum. I remember the walk, and going by a little, tiny—it wasn't even a temple, but there was some guru who lived there, and people would come with offerings and things.

We also went down the Ganges in a boat.

I remember also that there was an old dog, I've forgotten his name, but, it was something like Rover. In the early morning, when I'd go for walks, I'd see the dog out in the river looking for protein! [Laughing.] And so were the vultures.

Then I'd go to tea in the afternoon and see, like Badger[9] lying here on the floor asleep, dear old Rover and I don't think the Western ladies who fussed over him knew where [laughing] he'd been in the early morning!

S: Yes, eating dead bodies.

M: Yes, eating dead bodies.

Eventually, when we were to travel on, I remember at the airport, there was a lady, she was a Jain, and she was disturbed and believed she was married to Krishnaji, so we had to protect him from her. She would lie in wait for him because she always wanted to touch him, and he didn't want her to, so we had to run interference like in football. We used to call her Mrs. Moonlight, because she got madder when the moon was fullest, as some people do. At one point, in the airport, she almost got to him, and I remember his saying severely to her, "Don't touch me." He later told a story about how once in Bombay, he was out alone, and she appeared, and he had had to say, "Go away," and eventually, "If you don't, I will call a policeman." She replied, "Go ahead, I'm your wife!" [Both S and M laugh.] Luckily, at that point, a streetcar came by, and he jumped on the streetcar and escaped. [Laughs.] She had a daughter, and she got the poor child to write, "darling daddy" letters to Krishnaji.

Anyway, we traveled on to Madras. It had been rather cool and dry in Rajghat; in fact, it was rather cold. We flew back to Delhi, because we had to go to Delhi to get to Madras.

Again, I spent the night at the International Center, and Krishnaji stayed at the Shiva Raos'. Then Krishnaji, Alain, and I flew to Madras. I remember stepping out of the plane in Madras, and it was suddenly the tropics. It was late afternoon, and it was totally different. There were crowds of people to greet Krishnaji, many of them with garlands, and one of them was Mrs. Jayalakshmi. Did you ever meet her?

S: Oh, yes, oh yes, I met her many times.

M: Well, for those who haven't, she was quite tall for an Indian woman, with great presence and dignity. She dressed in a South Indian style, which was always the cotton blouse with beautiful heavy, heavy, heavy silk saris, but she wore them differently: it was wrapped around her waist in a different way. It wasn't the over-the-shoulder way, and it had great elegance. Eventually I saw her collection of saris, which is something extraordinary. She was very silent, and rather shy; and slightly austere.

S: A marvelous lady.

M: Yes.

M: When Alain greeted her, she said, "I have found you a house." She proceeded to drive us to the house that she had rented for us. She also rented all the furniture from Spencer's in town, and she lent us her Brahmin cook to cook one meal a day! I couldn't believe the hospitality. She didn't know Frances and she didn't know me. She knew Alain, and because he'd written to her that Krishnaji wanted so and so, she'd gone to all this trouble! Really extraordinary. So we moved in; Frances and I had rooms upstairs with a bath. Alain was downstairs, and we had a kitchen, where I was to get breakfast and supper. And [laughing] I remember my first glimpse of the kitchen, a room about ten feet by twenty feet, a sizeable room, and at the narrow end were shelves with cooking pots, which looked like silver, but they don't have handles. At the other end of the room was a stone counter with a square hole cut out, above which was a cold water faucet. That was the sink. To the left of that was something familiar to you people who camp, which is a kerosene burner [S laughs]. A huge one.

S: [laughing] So, you had a luxury kitchen!

M: Yes [laughs]. That's all there was! There was nothing else.

S: But you're supposed to fill it with about a dozen servants and…

M: Well, the one servant arrived, the Brahmin cook. He was a very handsome young man, very polite and austere and dignified, but I saw him preparing lunch on the floor. Chop, chop, chop, chop, on the floor. Now, because he's Brahmin he's very clean, and I realized that I had to not go in there without taking off shoes and having clean feet! [Laughs.] But even so, on the floor!

S: Yes, I know! [Laughing.]

M: So, my first meal was breakfast, but before that the milk-man came with water buffalo milk. He carried it in a huge pitcher. The customers had their container, and he would pour it into your container. And I remember there was always the dirty thumb that was holding it like this and the milk cascaded down over the dirty thumb. The milk had to be boiled, so you don't fuss about these things. [S chuckles.] So I would boil the milk. There was also an earthenware closed pot for boiled water which was filled by the Brahmin cook. You could trust the water. I made toast on the camp-fire thing [laughing] with toast stuck on a fork.

S: [laughing] So it tasted of kerosene!

M: Yes, and there was fruit, carefully cut so you didn't get dysentery. That was breakfast [laughs].

That was interesting as a first experience. Frances didn't do anything about breakfast in those days. I got the breakfast alone [chuckles]. Anyway, I was invited over to Vasanta Vihar[10]. Krishnaji showed me all around and explained that when he was no longer welcome in the TS[11] that Rajagopal collected donations to buy the six acres of Vasanta Vihar. They had intended to build two small buildings, but somehow all this great big thing was built, which wasn't what Krishnaji would have chosen, but there it was. He showed me everything, including the big hall, which you will remember so well, and his rooms upstairs, etc., the whole thing.

After that we went for a walk. Mrs. Jayalakshmi drove us to the deer park, and the three of us walked around the deer park. That was nice.

Then, the public talks began, at which point I got the flu. I was really sick and had to stay in bed. I remember thinking that I was going to get pneumonia because I got sicker and sicker and sicker. Finally, one night I went down to Alain's room and said, "Look, what am I going to do?" He responded, "I promise you, as your friend, that if you really get seriously ill, I will get you to the American hospital in Paris if I have to drag you there myself." That reassured me. I had a terrible feeling that I'd be put in an Indian hospital. I kept having visions, I suppose from movies, where there's a caravan crossing the desert and someone falls off a camel, and the rest just continue on.

S: [laughing] Yes.

M: And that was going to be me! Left in India! [Laughing.] So, my spirits picked up and I guess I conquered my bug. The moment my fever dropped, Alain told Krishnaji, who said, "Bring her here." Alain came back and told me, "Krishnaji wants to see you NOW!" So I staggered up and put clothes on. He wanted to do, what we have come to call,

"healing." That was the first time he ever did that with me. He sat me down in a chair, put his hands on my shoulders so lightly it was like a bird's wing touching me. He then asked me where I felt the illness, and I had, of course, terrible sinus congestion. He put his hand on, above, and beneath my eyes as though smoothing it away with the tips of his fingers. Then he put one of his hands over one eye and the other hand on one shoulder. The pain stopped instantly. He said, "Now, you come every day and I'll do it."

S: What did you feel besides the pain stopping?

M: I wanted to weep at his kindness. I was so touched. It was terribly moving. Years later, he once helped my housekeeper, Filomena, who had terrible arthritis. She said to me afterward, "A les mani de un santo." He has the hands of a saint. That's what it was like. [Pause.]

S: Did you feel anything else or think anything else at the time?

M: No, just very quiet, very quiet. Not some deliberate intended quiet, but one felt it when he did this. I could have sat there after he finished for I don't know how long.

He would always go away afterwards and shake his hands like he was shaking it all away.

S: Yes, like trying to shake water off one's hands.

M: Yes, but he seemed to me to be doing something like shaking the illness off. And then he'd go and wash his hands.

Ask me questions.

S: Who was running the Indian activities in those days?

M: Madhavachari.

S: What was the atmosphere like in the place? Did you feel welcome?

M: Yes, I did, in spite of some ridiculous things. They were all very nice.

In Madras I don't remember too many walks. It was before the walking-on-the-beach routine started. Instead, he walked in the deer park.

S: Didn't Krishnaji walk to Jayalakshmi's house and back?

M: Maybe. She was just down the road.

S: I know. I thought he used to…I walked there with him.

M: I didn't go on walks with him in Madras, really. Except to the deer park.

S: Were there discussions at lunch and things like that that you would join?

M: Yes, occasionally. The first lunch I was invited to was held in that big room where all the meetings are held. There was a table at the end of it. Madhavachari was there and Krishnaji, and I don't remember who else.

S: I also wanted to ask you about Tapas. Do you remember Tapas?

M: Yes.

S: She was such a sweet lady and so devoted to Krishnaji. I assume she must have been there in Delhi and in Rajghat and in Madras.

M: Probably. A little tiny woman! She had a running war with Sunanda, Pupul, and Nandini[12], all the people who were supposedly looking after Krishnaji because she kept his Indian clothes. She saw to them, and she would never [laughing] tell them where she kept them. [S laughs.] She was very possessive of them. So, they had a crisis every year when he was about to arrive, trying to round up his Indian wardrobe. The clothes would suddenly materialize, but [laugh] only after they were thoroughly frustrated! [S and M both laugh.] It was her territorial assertion.

S: Yes, yes. Didn't she also do the cleaning in his room?

M: Yes, she did. And his bathroom. I'll jump ahead, since Tapas has come up; but this takes place later, when she was here at Brockwood. The Siddoos[13] paid for her trip. She also came to Switzerland that summer. By this time I was doing all these things, so she grilled me, "What happens to his shirts?"

I said, "They are washed at home."

"Who washes them?"

"I do."

"Oh. Who irons them?"

"I do."

"Oh," she said. [Both M and S laugh.] Things were satisfactory. I didn't send them out with other people's dirty linen!

S: Heaven forbid! [More laughing]. And someone unworthy didn't iron them! [Both laugh again.] Yes.

M: She was very sweet, very sweet. [Laughing.]

So, from Madras we drove to Rishi Valley.

Krishnaji drove with Pama[14] and I forget who else. Alain, Frances, and I were in a separate car that I had hired with a driver. We all set off at four in the morning, as you will remember, the usual time to set off for Rishi Valley.

Krishnaji's car was ahead, and he had told me to look for the Southern Cross, which I'd never seen. I remember driving through that morning before sunrise and the bullock carts coming in from the country bringing vegetables to the city; those white bullocks prodding slowly along, not to be hurried, and the lorries honking—the whole thing. Going through villages where people were huddled around small, smoky fires and all wrapped up, especially their heads and necks wrapped up to keep them warm in the predawn of India.

You must remember it too.

S: Yes, it always seemed extraordinary.

M: We were to all meet up and have a picnic breakfast somewhere along the road. But when we got to a certain road block, a check point as it were, it turned out that our car didn't have the proper papers.

S: Oh yes, I remember at one point they were only licensed to drive in certain areas.

M: Exactly, so the car had to go back to a place called Nallore. After much gesticulating, talking, and so forth, we hired another taxi, which had the proper papers. So, we got to Rishi Valley rather late. The other car had stopped for the picnic breakfast, but we never turned up. Krishnaji was out in front of the old guest house when we arrived.

I immediately felt better in Rishi Valley, because it was a different climate: dry. It was like Arizona for me. All my troubles with that flu-like illness ended with the good climate.

Krishnaji was in that little room of his upstairs in the old guest house.

S: Let's stop here because we only have about five minutes of tape left, and it will be easy to pick up our conversation from here. You've just arrived at Rishi Valley.

S: Is there anything else you can think of before your arrival in Rishi Valley?

M: I just remember the strange look of the valley, with those extraordinary rocks that have always looked to me like children's toys that must have been put there by a giant baby and balanced just so. Nature couldn't create them somehow.

S: Yes.

M: Nature wouldn't have done it that way.

S: [chuckles] Yes.

M: There is one thing I've forgotten to mention that happened in Madras before we went to Rishi Valley that year. George Vithoulkas suddenly turned up. He'd gotten, I guess, scared of the swami. He thought some sort of black magic was going on. Anyway, he turned up, and Alain was really angry at him for the way he'd behaved, because Alain felt responsible for having introduced him to Krishnaji. It got to be rather unpleasant between the two of them.

So, George left, and he left rather rudely, as I recall. It was all quite unpleasant.

Most of the Indians were very disapproving of all this, but they rather blamed Alain for it.

S: Why did they blame Alain? I know that opinions about Alain were pretty low in India.

M: Yes, they were. Part of it was over this: they blamed him for George, but I think they were willing to blame him because Alain was suddenly an intruder for them. They had to go through Alain, to some degree, to see Krishnaji or arrange things for him. They felt he was an intruder, and they didn't like him for that.

S: Ah ha, Alain must have been the first assistant, or I don't know what you'd call him, to Krishnaji who wasn't Indian since Annie Besant or Leadbeater, because it was Rajagopal after Nitya, and Rajagopal was…

M: Yes, he was one of them.

S: Yes, it was an Indian show. Yes, one of them, and then suddenly it was not one of them.

M: Yes.

S: That never occurred to me, but that must have been…,of course.

M: I think there was great resentment. And Alain wasn't deferential…

S: …as one should be to these…

M: Yes, yes.

S: I know. [Laughs.]

M: Madhavachari particularly disliked him.

S: Alright. We'll pick up in Rishi Valley.

Issue 3: December 1965 to May 1966

Mary quotes extensively in this issue, and they are quotes that are obviously being read from her diaries, not just remembered.

Going on "the full tour" (of Krishnaji's travels to India, Europe, and the US) comes to an end in this issue, but there is no question in Mary's mind that she will just continue. She realizes in India, that she has become a principal character surrounding Krishnaji, and has some role to play, although exactly what that role is remains vague to her. However, the net effect is that she sees more of Krishnaji, and as a consequence, we see more of what it was like to be in his presence.

Scott: Let's pick up where we left off, which is all of you at Rishi Valley, and Krishnaji staying in the old guest house.

Mary: At Rishi Valley there is what's known as the old guest house. Krishnaji had two small rooms upstairs, and there was also a dining room and a kitchen and a big open place where meetings were held. Downstairs there were some guest rooms. Frances McCann and I had each a room downstairs and we shared a rather large bath. Alain was on the other side of the building in his quarters. We settled in, and eventually went to lunch. There was a special dining room for the visitors, and the food was less spicily prepared than for the school.

S: Was it that same dining room that's up next to the student's dining room?

M: Yes. Some of the staff ate there with us, just to be companionable, or maybe they preferred it. I was immediately struck with the beauty of Rishi Valley, which was entirely different from Madras. It was dry, and it has a wonderful feeling of being away from the whole world somehow, which I like. To the west there was the mountain which Krishnaji cared so much about called Rishi Conda. In the afternoon the students used to go to watch the sun go down behind Rishi Conda, which was a nice sight because they'd all had their bath after playing sports, and changed into little white pajama suits.

S: I remember.

M: All the boys with their black hair, their big eyes, and the white, clean and neat outfits, and very young. It was very, very nice to see. Krishnaji felt that there was something sacred about Rishi Conda. The legend was that once some hermit had lived up at the summit, a holy man, a Rishi. And he'd left some kind of something in the air, which Krishnaji felt, I think. He didn't say he felt it, but he cared very much about Rishi Conda.

The way of our life usually there was as follows: In the mornings sometimes Krishnaji would talk to the staff, in which case we (meaning Alain, Frances, myself and any other guests) would sit in on the discussions.

S: And those discussions would take place in the room upstairs?

M: Yes.

On certain days there'd be a chanting in assembly when the students chanted, and Krishnaji would go. He usually sat among the students on the floor, cross-legged, and chanted with them. It was very beautiful, very moving. Some days I would go up the mountain by myself and lie in the sun and take a sunbath and feel a wonderful sense of being away from the whole rest of the world, in this ancient valley, sort of suspended in time and place. I loved it.

Usually, in the afternoon, I would walk, and very often I would be invited to accompany Krishnaji on his walk with maybe some other people. I met Narayan[1] then and walked with him and with Krishnaji. Other days I'd be walking on my own and sometimes meet him coming back from his walk and walk back with him and talk.

Somewhere in those weeks we were there, I asked Krishnaji for another interview. This time I felt much more relaxed in the interview with him. I remember the question that I had on my mind which, was one of relationship. I asked him if there is indeed any reality to relationship between people if they really don't see each other a great deal. He asked me what I had in mind, what I meant. Well, what I was talking about was a niece of mine who was quite a young child then, and I was concerned about her but I hardly ever saw her. I was questioning whether there was any relationship just because you're a member of a family. He asked me a little bit about it, the circumstances of the child's life, where she was, etc. In effect he replied that probably there wasn't any relationship, but there would be if there's an exchange of some kind, either a conversation or by letter, or something. If I was to establish a contact verbally, then relationship can be real and can endure, but otherwise not.

Then he asked me what all this (by which he meant the really listening to him, the contact, etc.) was meaning to me.

I think I repeated what I'd said to him in an earlier conversation, which is that I was leery, as it were, of trying to measure where I was all the time because of the inclination to and danger of trying to achieve some aim. I saw that that wasn't an intelligent way to go about it. He then asked me if I was fearful of anything. I replied, "Well, actually no, not at the moment, but I distrust that. It's like a fear of not being afraid."

He laughed a little bit, smiled at that, and said, "Don't do that. Don't make problems for yourself."

I told him that once earlier I had said to him, "I'm very hesitant about asking for an interview with you because I don't want to take up your time unnecessarily, and there are so many people who want to talk to you. So, I haven't asked to speak to you in quite a long time. Also, it didn't seem right, unless I have a crisis of some kind, I shouldn't ask.

I remember his replying, "Now that we've talked a little bit and we know each other better, it will be easier for you to speak…" Also, he didn't want to have to tell me to come for my so-called treatment. You know, I had been sick in Madras, and I should just come when I thought it was necessary.

I said, again, that I was hesitant to bother him with anything like that.

He replied, "Well, now we know each other better, it will be easier." [Laughing.] So, that was the end of that.

S: Was he still calling you Mrs. Zimbalist at this point?

M: Oh, he called me Mrs. Zimbalist for years! I've forgotten now when he changed, but I think that for about seven years he kept calling me Mrs. Zimbalist! [Both laugh.] He'd been my house guest for years, [S laughs] and he still was calling me Mrs. Zimbalist! [Laughs.] This is jumping ahead but, he switched from Mrs. Zimbalist to Maria. Well, there are so many Marys around—Mary Lutyens, Mary Cadogan—so he called me Maria.

S: I wondered always if it was because sometimes you spoke in Italian together.

M: We spoke French more, but sometimes in Italian. Yes, I think it may have had something to do with that. [S laughs.] Anyway, it was still Mrs. Zimbalist for quite some years.

S: Where did this interview take place? Up in one of his rooms?

M: Yes, he sat on the floor on a kind of a rug.

S: Was he sleeping in the little room in those days?

M: Yes. He slept in the little room. I think I was somewhat instrumental in changing that. Anyway, we met in his big room.

I remember that before that interview he wanted to cure me of something, and he said, "Do you want it before we talk or after?"

I said, "I think after."

You could often tell with Krishnaji if you made the right answer. You felt it. [Laughs.] And also one always knew when an interview was over. His attention was turned off like a light. It was curious; not his total attention—he would still speak to you and all that, but that other quality went out. You just knew, that was that, you felt it was over. When I got up from the interview, he pulled out a chair for me to sit on. He washed his hands and came back and stood behind me very quietly for a while, and then, ever so lightly, he put his fingers on my eyelids. The touch of his fingers was extraordinary. It was as delicate as a leaf touching a pool of water. It was so unlike most human touch.

S: Yes, it was.

What were you wearing in those days? Were you wearing Indian clothes?

M: I wore Indian clothes. I didn't wear saris. I had one time. I forget if I've described when Shakuntala dressed me in a in a white cotton sari, have I told that?

S: No, not yet.

M: It's in this period. Shakuntala and Narayan had a little house down behind the guest house, and I was asked for tea with them. There was to be a puppet show in the school later that evening. The children of the lower school had made puppets of the story of Ulysses and the Cyclops; quite marvelous, great big puppets out of papier maché, and in those days Mark Lee was head of the lower school, and he had organized all this. At tea, Shakuntala asked. "Why don't you wear a sari? I'll lend you one." But, of course, I didn't know how to put one on, and I'm still not any good at it. So, she literally dressed me in the sari. I stood there like a dummy! [Laughing.] We then walked over to where the puppet show was to be, and we were seated in the front row. Everyone was ready and then Krishnaji came in from the side, and he walked in, at right angles to where I was. He noticed me immediately [giggles], and he did something that was utterly un-Indian and very Western—he raised his eyebrows [S laughing] but didn't say a word! However, when it was all over, when he'd said good night to everybody, he bowed to me and said, "I see you have a new dress." [Chuckles and S laughs, too.] But most of the time I wore things that I had gotten in Delhi—cotton kurtas and trousers and sandals. Of course, the tailor in the school, who was so heavily [laughing] patronized when the visitors came, made some kurtas and trousers for me.

I remember some nuns who were always asked for lunch up in Krishnaji's dining room. I also remember Balasundaram's[2] wife, Vishalakshi, I think, being a traditional Indian wife; she didn't eat with everybody. She sat on a stool and saw that everything was properly done, but she didn't eat. Very old-fashioned Indian style.

And Parameshwaran was the cook.

There was also a sort of house-man who took care of things if you needed something.

It was still the bucket system. You got a bucket of hot water in the morning.

S: When did Parameshwaran join the tour? He wasn't in Delhi, I assume?

M: No. He was not in Delhi. In later years, he would go wherever Krishnaji was, and not this year. I can't remember when he joined Krishnaji this year, but he was certainly in Rishi Valley because that's where he was cook the rest of the year. He would come to cook for Krishnaji in the little kitchen upstairs.

Pongal occurred then while we were then in Rishi Valley. All the bullocks were dressed up with flowers and ornaments on their horns. Villagers came and played on flute-like things and drums, and the children had a lovely time dancing. Krishnaji came with his big umbrella to watch.

S: Krishnaji used that parasol because he had had sunstroke when he was younger, didn't he?

M: That's right. He called it not a parasol, but a sun umbrella. At some point in his early years, I don't know when exactly, he'd had sunstroke in India, so he was sensitive to sun, which is why he used to walk always in the afternoon, when the sun wasn't high.

S: What were Narayan and Shakuntala doing there? Were they just teaching there?

M: They were teaching, and Shakuntala had just become pregnant with Natasha. She was born the following May after this. This was in January.

It was a wonderfully peaceful time. I remember the combination of Krishnaji, his talks, the beautiful valley, the remoteness, the silence, children all around, and those funny hills. A great atmosphere there. I imagined suddenly leaving everything and becoming a kind of hermit there. Then, of course, there were the dance performances under the banyan tree. I think that the same Mrs. Moonlight lady—the demented lady—had come, too. So, again, we had to run interference for Krishnaji to keep her away from Krishnaji.

But overall, Rishi Valley was just lovely.

The next move was to Bombay but via Bangalore. Again, Alain, Frances, and I had a car, a school car this time, which took us to Bangalore. We had lunch, did a little shopping, and then we met Krishnaji at the airport and flew to Bombay. In Bombay he was staying with Pupul Jayakar…

S: At Malabar Hills?

M: Yes, in her house. Alain was staying with one of her sisters. Oh dear, what is her name? That I should remember, but I don't at the moment.

S: Not Nandini?

M: No, not Nandini; the other sister, who was a more worldly person. She used to play bridge a lot, and would turn up now and again, but she wasn't as close as Pupul and Nandini.

Frances and I stayed at the Taj hotel, and I think Alain eventually joined us. I was invited over to Pupul's for lunch about the second day, and Krishnaji said, "Bring me the things that you want kept safely." In other words, money, passports, and things like that. So, I brought them, and he took me through the bathroom into his bed-room, and [chuckles] he took my things and put them away, saying they were perfectly safe as no one would come in his room. He then said, going out through the bathroom, "When I got here they had all sorts of pictures on the wall of Indian statuary." They were those [laughs, S laughs] ones, and they'd taken them down quickly after he'd got there. And he added, "But not before I'd had a good look!" All those erotic statuary. I remember Alain saying, "They were pornographic, weren't they, sir?' And Krishnaji replied, "Oh, no, they were religious!" [Both laugh!]

S: In his mock voice?

M: Yes. [Laughs again.]

I said that I didn't feel that they could be pornographic because they all looked so happy! Well, it turned out as the conversation went on, that I hadn't seen the ones that were on the bathroom wall; I'd only seen ones that are reproduced books—strange positions and so forth. Anyway, I had lunch there. Then Krishnaji began giving his talks. They were held in the usual place, in that college of art. He also held public discussions in the something like Khareghat Hall, which lots of people came to. You had to [chuckles] leave your sandals outside, and I remember one day I came out and all the sandals had been stolen! [Laughs.]

S: Really?!

M: Hundreds of pairs of sandals were gone! [Both laugh.] Great consternation. [More laughter.]

S: Someone was selling slightly used sandals down the street someplace.

M: Yes [more laughing]. Then there were walks around the hanging gardens in Malabar Hills with a required number of laps around. Krishnaji one day (there were people milling around), and pointed to a couple on a bench with their arms around each other, sprawling, and he said, "What is this country coming to? You never would have seen that a few years ago." [Both laugh.] He sounded quite shocked.

There was shopping obviously; one shops in all these places.

Krishnaji talked several times about Elephanta and the great statue of the Mahesh Murti. I rather vaguely said I'd like to see that again. To which Krishnaji replied, "No, no, it's too tiring."

I said, "Well maybe the boat ride would be tiring but, what if I hired a helicopter? Would you go by helicopter?"

"Oh no, no," he said, "don't bother, don't bother." So, of course, I went hunting for a helicopter. [S laughs.] And that wasn't very easy, but finally I had one vaguely located which might be possible.

So, I went back and said, "I think I can get the helicopter. Will you go if I do?"

He replied, "No, no, even that's too tiring." So, I went with Alain.

S: By boat.

M: By boat. Yes, and I could see why that wouldn't do for Krishnaji at all.

S: Yes.

M: You've seen it, haven't you?

S: Yes, I have.

M: Well, we climbed up to the cave where it is, and in spite of the fact there were children running around playing music on radios, that extraordinary statue is something unforgettable.

S: Absolutely.

M: Much later, Krishnaji got a photograph of it, which I have in Ojai, and he said (and I felt the same way), "We're not going to put it up because one mustn't get used to looking at it, then one doesn't see it." To this day it sits on a shelf in the closet, and occasionally I take it out and look at it.

S: How nice, yes.

M: Really wonderful. What else?

S: Were there any private discussions in Pupul's house?

M: Oh yes, there were. I was invited to several at Pupul's, and I remember in particular the first one I went to. There were about fifteen people. Krishnaji asked the question, "What can the individual do in the face of the disintegration of society?" He made it something very interesting. He said that an individual cannot be changed by another individual. He made a distinction between individual consciousness and human consciousness: the individual consciousness is one's own, but an individual can affect the totality of human consciousness, which of course he had said previously.

S: Yes

M: He said that if only two or three people ever could do what he talked so often about, it would make a change in the world. He was pointing that out in this discussion. The individual who has changed has a vast resonance, like a wave going out from the individual; if there's really change in the individual it would spread out like a wave through the totality of human beings. He didn't use those exact words, but that was the implication of what he was saying. He said one has to see this, but people don't, aren't willing to. It was one of those discussions which were frustrating because he would say something like that and then inevitably, as in all discussions, there'd be someone who would say, "But we don't see that, Krishnaji!"

S: Oh, yes!

M: And then the discussion would go back as so many of his discussions did. So you'd go through a whole catalogue of what's wrong, and it wouldn't go forward. It was frustrating, somehow. If the discussion had flowed onward, people had gone with it, they would have seen something. Oh yes! [chuckling], there was one day, another private discussion, and he was a little bit late, which he usually never was; he came in laughing, and said, "I've just been scolded," he said, "by a guru." Apparently some guru took him to task for saying that gurus were no good! [S laughs.] Were a hindrance! [Laughs.] He was laughing at that so much! [More laughter.] I think he said that in a talk at which I felt that one occasionally gets a sort of insight, and then thought perceives that insight as a danger to itself because we perceive that as almost like death; because if we really went ahead…

S: The self disappears.

M: Exactly, the self would disappear, and that is perceived by the thought process as death, and it's so scary that you pull back, and don't go ahead.

Anyway, he talked, and whatever I said, I said, and he said things back. But I had the feeling—many people have these feelings in talks with Krishnaji—that he was talking to me directly, not only words, but subconsciously. I could feel it coming at me, even when he was talking to somebody else or addressing some particular question. It was very strange. Afterward he came over to me for some reason and said, "You didn't mind me pounding you in that talk, did you?" I replied, "No, of course not." It was one of those times when there were different levels of communication going on.

S: In a way he was acknowledging your recognition of that different level by asking you that question, wasn't he?

M: Probably.

I think it was in that talk that he said, as he so often did, "When you see that the road you're on is the wrong road—you're going north and someone comes and says that doesn't lead anywhere; go south or east or west—why don't you do it? Why don't you see that where you're going leads no place and stop?"

I remember saying, “But I can’t stop walking. My mind won’t stop. Even though I see it’s futile. It won’t go on.”

He replied, “Why do you say that? You think you can’t, but you can.” I remember that strongly. It was like, he didn’t say it then, but it’s like, “Stop thinking.” I had no—I’d never done that. I mean, I could stop thinking about a particular thing, but the mind would run on in some other way.

S: Were these discussions being recorded?

M: I don’t remember.

S: Alain would have done the recording, wouldn’t he?

M: Yes, he would. I don’t remember; they might have been, should have been, must have been. If they were, well now, anything that Alain recorded went to the Rajagopal. Whether they made an Indian copy and kept it, I have no recollection at all. Alain might remember, I’ll ask him, make a note; the next time I speak to him I’ll ask him.

S: Would you, in going for the walks, around the hanging gardens at Malabar Hills, would you meet him at Pupul’s house, and then go from there?

M: Yes, go from there, in a car. Car would drive him, and I’d go with him. At the end of the walk, I’d go back, I guess, to the house, and then go back to the hotel.

S: Who would be on the walks?

M: Well, Madhavachari would always be there, and sometimes Narayan. I don’t remember Nandini walking. Alain, always.

About this time, Krishnaji would call me to come and discuss whether this house in the south of France, that had been offered by Frances McCann, was a good thing to accept or not. And at that point it was still a possibility, so he called me to discuss it.

S: Why don’t you explain that a little bit?

M: Well, Frances had lived in Rome, where she had one of the very beautiful old apartments in the old palaces, Palazzo down in the old part of Rome, Piazza Navona—that part of Rome. She’d lived there, and she had an art gallery, too, that she supported. She sold all this, and had a certain amount of money as a result. She wanted to buy what they call in the south of France, mas—a large farm house that could be a place where Krishnaji could retire, or use in whatever way he wanted, as he didn’t have a home really.

So that was still being discussed. In Bombay, he had said that he wanted to involve me in it. He wanted to make a committee of people who would be responsible for it. The idea was that Frances would look after it, but there had to be a group that would have jurisdiction.

He said that Alain should go and look for such a house when they got back to Europe after Bombay. Gérard Blitz[3] was involved in this too because he lived near there. He knew that part of France. He lived in, oh, what was it called? A community of rather luxurious houses. So, Blitz was going to help find it too. But there was to be a group of people—I think myself, Alain, possibly Vanda, I've forgotten who else, would be involved in it. We were still talking about all this. Krishnaji wasn't sure that he wanted to do this. He was a little afraid that Frances might regret it, or he felt Frances wasn't perhaps too stable, and that it would be a mistake to have a place like that which she had really provided. But at this point it was still on. As I recall, when we did get back, Alain did go and look for things. But it didn't go any further. And, of course, it was after that, that the idea of a school came up. But we're still in Bombay in 1966, two years before seriously looking for a school.

I remember another discussion. This was the final discussion. It was again on the subject of thought and the difficulty of letting go of thought. I found that impossible. Krishnaji said something quite extraordinary which made the whole thing clear to me. He used the metaphor of the drum that is silent—the silence was necessary.

S: He used to say that the drum had to be empty to make a noise.

M: Empty, that's right. "Thought is the un-tuning of the drum," he said. And he also said, "What happens when you put thought aside? Turn your back on it?" I again replied that I couldn't do it and said, "How does one turn away even when the futility of that is seen?"

He said, "You mean you're in thought and you can't get out? Why do you insist on that?"

All I could do was just be stuck. And then he did something quite remarkable. All of a sudden he said to me, "Mrs. Zimbalist, is beauty thought?" And that broke it for me. I saw that. That isn't thought. It was like a blinding light all of a sudden.

S: How many people would be at these discussions?

M: Not too many, about fifteen, sixteen, eighteen, something like that.

S: Who that we would remember would be there?

M: Well, there'd be Pupul, Nandini, Alain, I guess Frances must have been there, though I don't remember her. There'd be, I guess, Sunanda, Pama, Madhavachari, some of the Bombay Indians. There was a group in Bombay that didn't usually come elsewhere. I can sort of see the room and vaguely how many people, but I can't see individuals.

I remember also that at the end of that discussion, he said, "If you could see the beauty of the empty drum tuned and that out of that action comes."

I said, "Yes, I see."

And then when he said goodbye, he said, "Hold onto that drum!" [Laughs.]

There was also a dinner party at Mrs. Mehta's house, the mother of Nandini and Pupul. It was in their old family house, it was quite beautiful. Really marvelous food, extraordinary food, and everyone was wonderfully dressed in saris and things. There was a great sense of the affection that the family had for Krishnaji. In one of the discussions, suddenly a door burst open and Nandini's little grandchild, who later became a dancer…

S: Oh, yes, yes.

M: You remember her?

S: I remember her, yes.

M: Well, she was a little girl of about six or something then, she rushed into the room to Krishnaji, and he jumped up and kissed her on both cheeks and threw her up in the air to her delight. [S laughs.] There was such excitement in the child's face, and his joy in seeing this little child. It was lovely.

So, then, the time for India was over.

S: What was it like for you to be there? What did you feel, Mary—can you remember? Did you feel like an outsider? Did you feel like someone on the fringe of something or…?

M: No. I must say everyone was absolutely charming to me, all the Indians. They were friendly, and went out of their way to help me with shopping or any of those things. I was invited to their houses. So I felt I was nicely treated as a guest, in a way.

But there was a kind of private relation that was between Krishnaji, Alain, and myself. I mean, he would talk with us about other non-Indian things—wanted to discuss for instance the house and whether he should accept the invitation to talk at Harvard and at The New School and all those things. It was as though that was his private life apart from Indian things.

And I seemed to have become more and more a key person. In fact, I remember that when we were still in Rishi Valley, at the end of that discussion that I mentioned earlier, I went back to just mentioning the other interviews that he'd given me, which of course he didn't remember, and I said, "Sir, I feel that, as I seem to be increasingly a fixture around you that you should look into what I'm like. You should ask me anything you want. You should know who the people are around you." That was part of the thing when he said he was shy, but now that we knew each other better, etc. [Chuckles.] I said, "I'm shy too, but I think it's only right that if there's anything that you want to know about me, you would ask me, please."

I didn't feel strange in India. I mean, it was totally strange, but I didn't feel alienated. I thought it was wonderful being there, and I felt I liked everything that happened to me there.

On the last day in India, I went over to Krishnaji's, to Pupul's house to collect my passport or whatever it was that I left with him. When I came in people were seated on the floor in a little sitting room just to the left as you come in. There was a dark bearded minstrel who held a stringed instrument, one string, and a little clicking castanet sort of thing. The minute Krishnaji came into the room, he started to play and sing. It was lovely, haunting songs. Apparently Krishnaji had heard him singing in the street and had him brought in to play.

We sat and listened to it. Krishnaji said that he'd heard the singing in the street and he knew that rich people who lived around there don't hear it, only the servants would hear it. [S chuckles.] He also said that the man was from the south and spoke Telugu. When it was over, Krishnaji went and thanked him and put a gift of clothing on the floor next to him. I remember so clearly the grace with which he did something like that. It is rare for a person to be able to convey such human grace in everything he did.

So, that evening, everybody went to the airport, and there were a whole mass of devotees who came to see him off. They were seated in a big circle in a room, and Krishnaji was seated on a chair, and there was dead silence. [Chuckles]. I remember that when I came in, he got up as he would if a woman came into the room, and you could feel a shock wave go around through the [S chuckles] whole of the Indian devotees that Krishnaji would get up for a woman.

S: Yes.

M: [Chuckles.] And finally, he got up and went out in the hallway, and the Parsee lady, she was a Parsee, that's what she was, the mad lady, Mrs. Moonlight, she was after him. So, again, we had to protect him.

I should clarify, we had been in a sort of a sitting room that had been put aside for him as a waiting room, and then there was the open airport outside. So, I went along too, to protect him, until Madhavachari came, and then he kept her away. Krishnaji said to me, "I can't stand sitting there and being stared at." [Chuckles.]

S: Yes.

M: So, off we went. Alain and I were in tourist class, and Krishnaji was in first class, but he kept coming back to see us, and said, "I'm visiting the poor." [Both laugh heartily.]

So that was the end of India that time.

We landed in Rome. Krishnaji went to stay with Vanda Scaravelli, at the house she'd rented in Rome, Via Casaletto, and I was in a hotel.

S: Was it a regular house that Vanda had in Rome?

M: She rented various ones, but at that point she'd rented that one several times. She later rented another one. This house was outside Rome and had a garden. Quite nice. Alain stayed there too. I stayed in Hotel Rafael, off Piazza Navona, which is a very nice little hotel, but I didn't stay there long as I went back to the United States. This was the end of March 1966, and I didn't see Krishnaji again until April, in London. Krishnaji stayed in Rome for a while. That may be the year where he went to Bircher Benner Clinic, in Switzerland, but I'm not sure.

S: I thought he was going to speak at Harvard.

M: That's the next autumn. I saw him again in London, in April.

S: Okay. Well, let's start there.

M: Alright. This is the end of April and, again, he was in a crummy little rented house in Wimbledon; not right in Wimbledon, but near there, in Kingston something, near the Kingston Bypass.

Alain telephoned me and said, "Will you meet us at Huntsman?" And of course, this entertained me vastly because it was the follow-on of the last time we were in London.

S: Of course. Where were you staying? Back at the guest house?

M: Anyway, there was much pouring over samples, and they ordered suits. Everybody was very happy. I was consulted on the choices, as my advice was really a Ph.D. advice! [S laughing, M with humor in voice.] Or so I was considered.

S: When I was talking with, or really interviewing, Mary Lutyens, she talked about how Krishnaji would go into Liberty's and feel all the silks, and it's just what I've seen him do at Huntsman's, and in India and other places:he would tuck in his chin [M laughs], and he would feel and touch everything and look at everything with such extraordinary attention. It was a wonder just to watch him.

M: That's right. And there was just the whole experience of going into Huntsman. They greet you with such ceremony; bow with, "Good morning, sir," and he was always so pleased to be there.

S: Yes.

M: He used to say that Huntsman was "his club," as he put it. [Both laugh.] Mr. Lintott…did you ever know Mr. Lintott?

S: Yes, of course, I did.

M: Well, Mr. Lintott, of course, was just as pleased to see Mr. Krishnamurti as Mr. Krishnamurti was to be there. So, all the "patterns," as they called samples of materials, were brought out, and there was great discussion about what was needed. Then, of course, he had the added fun of deciding what Naudé "needed," as he said. Krishnaji called him Naudé always; never called him Alain.

"Naudé should have a blue suit."

So what kind of a blue suit, what weight of a blue suit? Where and what climates would he being wearing it, and what occasions? This was all a very serious matter. [Laughs.] And it entertained me greatly. I sat on that old leather thing by the window.

S: Yes, [laughs] with hundred-year-old magazines!

M: Yes, well, they had Country Life, of course. And so I would read the advertisements of the things for sale. "Oh, maybe, I'll take that one," I would pretend. [Chuckles.] It was fun.

S: I know something you left out.

M: What?

S: The shirt shopping in Italy.

M: I don't think that on this trip…I might have my trips mixed up. I knew quite a bit about where to buy shirt material because of Sam. There was a place called Castel in an old part of Rome, and on one of the trips coming back from India, I went there with Alain. Krishnaji was then fascinated and wanted to go himself. I didn't remember the address, but I knew where it was. I have a good sense of location so I could find it. We purchased yardage, and then it was made up by the good shirt-maker.

S: Where was it? Was it like in Morita, or…?

M: Oh goodness, you are digging into my brain. Oh…

S: Something beginning with "m"?

M: Marchetti. That's it, but eventually, Mr. Marchetti retired and his business closed. That was the problem. But yes, it was Marchetti in those days.

M: So, we would buy the material, and then take it to Marchetti and he would make it up. That too was very serious business. [Both laugh.] And great fun!

S: Anyway, how did Krishnaji greet you? Because that was the first time you'd seen him for a couple of months, at Huntsman's.

M: Yes, yes. By then I had ordered a car because I don't think I had a car before that. Anyway, I'd ordered a Jaguar, not a Mercedes.

S: Shame on you.

M: Shame on me. [S laughs.] But I'd ordered it for delivery in London. Ordered it in California for delivery in London. I drove it out to the little horrid house by the Kingston Bypass. I remember Krishnaji looking out the window and rushing out to see the car. [S chuckles.] He looked it all over, but as it wasn't a Mercedes, he didn't say very much. [Both laugh.] I think it was that day that he gave his first talk at the Friends Hall on Euston Road, and we went to that in the Jaguar. It was a bigger and better hall than Wimbledon, but it's still not such a great hall.

The next day, in the car, I took them on their round of appointments, mostly shopping. [Chuckles.] I can still see driving them in and out from Kingston Bypass place, which was the point of the car.

S: Now what other shopping did they do?

M: Well, they looked at things, up and down Bond Street. Edward Butler, a shirt and socks, etc. place, and Sulka: we'd go there.

S: I remember Sulka.

M: Yes, but it used to be up Bond Street a bit toward upper Bond Street.

S: Was Krishnaji getting his hair cut at Truefitt in those days?

M: Of course. Yes. Always.

S: I've been there with Krishnaji a couple times.

M: Krishnaji had a wonderful way in the car. We'd be chatting about anything, and he would suddenly say, "Do you mind if we talk seriously?" Naturally one agreed. And he would say something like, "Meditation can be extraordinary if you know how to do it." And then he'd say, "What is humility?" And then he'd say, "It is without content, without any movement toward anything." There were these extraordinary unrecorded little things, which luckily, I made some notes of these.

And then he would ask me, "Does it interfere with your driving if we talk seriously?" He wanted to discuss, "What is seriousness? What is it to you?" he would ask. And then I would say whatever I thought it was.

He replied, “There is decision in it.”

After he had talked to David Bohm[4], he said that David had said that he, himself, was not decisive. That word struck Krishnaji, that decision was a part of all this.

At that point, Naudé quoted something Krishnaji had said some time before about seriousness, but Krishnaji brushed it aside. He didn’t want to go back to something he had said, and he was looking at it anew at that moment.

At one point he asked me about someone we both knew, whether that person was serious. I apparently paused quite a while and then said, “No.”

He then asked, “What do you mean by that?”

I said that to me a person isn’t serious if they’re unwilling to go wherever the inquiry takes them; and that was why I answered “No” about this person.

He countered by asking, “Why do people do that?”

I felt that a serious person doesn’t choose or decide out of self-interest.

Krishnaji then asked me why they always act out of self-interest; to which I responded that I thought it is an impulse in people and they were “afraid of putting all their eggs in one basket,” as I put it.

He replied with something like, “But actually people would have much more, but they don’t see it.”

Then he asked me [chuckles] out of the blue, “Would you be serious if you married (god forbid), and had a family?” [M and S both chuckle.] I said it depended on the marriage and the relationship.

He said that people say they are serious about work and about the people they marry. “I am serious about the suit I’m going to fit.” [Both laugh.]

I said, “Well, is that because there’s no extraneous questions about that?”

He replied, “Have you self-interest in your car?” We were driving.

I said, “Yes, but were these things a measure of seriousness, or was it what the car meant to me? I am serious about the car to a point,” but I said, “not dependent on it.” That was the kind of conversation that would go on. All the time, he’s directing me through traffic. He was the greatest backseat driver…

S: [laughs] I know!

M: …that I've ever encountered, or heard of. He would, he would do hand signals.

S: Yes, yes.

M: There'd be a red light coming up, and with his hand, while still talking, he would slow me down. Occasionally, when we weren't talking (so-called) seriously, he would say, "There's a red light ahead." [Both laugh]. Oh dear.

S: Sometimes when I was driving him and he was in the back, there'd be a finger that would come and …

M: Yes, touch, yes.

S: …touch my shoulder if I was driving too fast. [Loud laugh.]

M: He did that to me when he sat in the back. Yes. He was slowing you down. [Both laugh.]

S: It's like pushing the slow button.

M: Yes. [S laughs.] He did that to me, too. [M laughs.]

S: Now, Alain Naudé complained to some people, like the Digbys, for instance, apparently there's some others, that Krishnaji never talked seriously to him. And George Digby used to ask me if Krishnaji ever talked seriously with me, which he did. And Krishnaji certainly talked seriously with you. Why didn't he talk seriously with Alain?

M: I can't believe that.

S: Alain could never get an appointment to talk with him, or to have serious discussions, or—this is according to…

M: Ah, there's something fishy in that because they had many serious discussions, in which I was present. Also, Krishnaji dictated to Alain a lot, and he didn't just take it down. They'd talk about it.

S: Well, maybe it was not about personal things or something.

M: I don't know.

S: I remember both George and Nelly talking to me about this. But this doesn't make sense to you?

M: It doesn't make sense to me. I know they had very serious discussions.

Then one day we got on to the subject at the table with Anneke. I was there for a meal. Anneke brought up LSD, and Krishnamurti expressed surprise that I knew anything about it. He told us again about soma in ancient India and how he had discussed this with Huxley[5], and Huxley told him LSD wasn't quite the real thing.

Krishnaji said, "It can't be like the real thing."

S: Was Krishnaji interested at all that you knew about LSD?

M: Not too interested. I had told him all about my being part of a scientific experiment with it. He rather dismissed it. Huxley had taken all these things at the time he knew Krishnaji.

S: When did Huxley die?

M: Huxley died the same day that Kennedy was killed.

I sat next to him at dinner shortly after there'd been a big fire. Huxley's house was destroyed and he lost all his papers. It was terrible, and we talked about that because…

S: You must've known him outside of Krishnaji's context?

M: I never knew him through Krishnaji at all. In fact, I didn't really know him at all. I sat next to him at that dinner party, and during that dinner, I asked him whether Krishnaji's knowledge of LSD and all that had come from him and whether that was why Krishnaji felt so much against it? Huxley gave an odd reply, which I don't think is correct. He said, "Oh, well, it's part of his vegetarianism."

S: That's strange.

M: Yeah, you know, sort of abstaining from meat and LSD apparently. [S laughs.] Well, that was all earlier.

Anyway, on this day, I ought to report that he wanted to go for a ride. So in the non-Mercedes Jaguar, we were going to go to Wisley again, but as we got toward Wisley, he said he didn't want to go there. So, we went on to the Linkses'[6]. He had told me all about how he'd known her since she was a baby, and that she and her husband Joe had a house near Haslemere. So, we headed for Haslemere. We didn't know where to go, but Alain inquired and we finally found the house, but there wasn't anybody there. A farmer who was in a field said that he knew who we were talking about, and he thought that they would've been out for a walk. So we parked the car at the house, and we walked along the road, and met them coming back.

Krishnaji was delighted, and they were thrilled to see him, of course. I had the pleasure of meeting them for the first time.

We went in and we had tea, and immediately everybody was very congenial. Mary writes about it in her book: how she was pleased to see that Krishnaji had some fun in his life with two people who laughed and enjoyed things with him. On those drives, Krishnaji would remember places that he'd stayed in the old days. Apparently, he'd stayed all over England with various people.

S: I think so. That's the impression I got. He'd just been everywhere.

M: Yes. He would explain it by saying that he was never allowed to go out by himself when he was young. He always had to have two initiates with him at all times. The reason being that Dr. Besant thought he'd be safer, but also because he would give all his money away. If he was alone, he'd just give it to someone who needed it. [Both laugh.] So, Dr. Besant said, as he said, "For god's sake, don't let him go out alone!" [Both laugh again.] And then he said, "My brother never left me," which was nice.

S: Well, it's true, if you think of Mary's comment, when you and Alain were traveling with him, it was the first time he'd been with people for years who had some sense of fun.

M: Yes.

S: I mean, traveling with Rajagopal over the years must've just been ghastly! From everything I've heard, he seemed to just resent everything he was doing.

M: Yes, that was horrible. Constant complaining and criticizing. And Alain, actually, is very funny; has a great sense of humor. In fact, my friendship with Alain was based on the fact that we made each other laugh.

S: So I hear.

M: He's very funny, has a great sense of humor. So, in fact, my friendship with Alain was based on the fact that we made each other laugh. During the time in Saanen, when he stayed at Caprice with me, at the breakfast table, I would tease him by enacting the part of a Viennese psychiatrist, psychoanalyst. [S laughs.] In a heavy accent, which I can no longer do, I would comment on his comments and his reactions and [S laughing more] while he was doing things. [Both laugh.] It was such fun. He was very companionable. [Chuckles.] So, for Krishnaji, it was a breath of fresh air. And of course, Krishnaji joined right in. It was not that we were so funny, but it was a shared amusement of things.

And also it seemed that anything was possible, you know. We sometimes used to talk and apparently it became an accepted thing in Krishnaji's mind that we would all be together forever and ever, and there would be discussion about whether we should live in this country or that country, or a house here or a house there. These discussions went on. And whatever he would've suggested, I would've said, "Oh yes, let's do that," or, "How can it be done?", whatever it was.

There were no problems about it all; to have something nice happen. It was such a pleasure to provide something pleasing to him.

S: Yes.

M: Some tiny thing, or some major thing, if he wanted, if one could. [Long pause.]

S: Hm.

M: Well now, where are we? Oh, yes, we're still with the Linkses. That was a lovely day, just a lovely day. We drove back.

There was another drive, which is almost historic in a way because we decided to drive to the Cotswolds. I went with maps and an itinerary and everything, but when I got to the house, and it was decided that maybe that was too far. So we set out towards Winchester. And as I look back on it, we must've driven right past the road up to Brockwood, because from Kingston we went out the A3 and must've turned onto the A272 and drove right by. Nobody had any paranormal [S laughs] intimations of the future, and we got to Winchester. We looked at the Royal Hotel for lunch, but there wasn't anything vegetarian. Alain went in and looked at the menu and found that it wouldn't do. So we wound up at the Wessex's.

S: Oh yes.

M: After lunch we went to the cathedral and looked around it. Then we drove on roads, I remember the names of Grateley, the Wallops! Do you know where the Wallops are?

S: Yes [laughing], Nether Wallop and Middle Wallop.

M: That's right. And in the middle of Middle Wallop probably, we decided to take a nap. I had a big steamer rug in the back of the car, which we took into a field, and spread it out on the grass. Each person had a portion of the rug, and we lay down and snoozed a little.

S: How nice.

M: It was lovely. And then, refreshed, we drove on to Stonehenge, which in those days was so wonderful because it wasn't surrounded by fence. There was nobody around. You could just go up to the stones. It was wonderful! We drove back by another route, I forget which way we went. Didn't come back the way we'd gone.

In the car, Krishnaji said that a question by some young people he'd seen the day before had come back to him in the morning. He'd thought of it, and he said that, "Time is a like a river flowing, but we divide it into the past, the present, and the future. But one must see the whole of it, and then when you see it, then time has a stop."

S: Had you been in that discussion with young people?

M: I don't think so. Suddenly he said, "Yes, I see, but I mustn't talk about it now." Which meant that he'd seen something that he didn't want to talk about because he'd talk about it in a public talk. Then quite suddenly he said, "When my brother died, this person" meaning himself "fainted, went into a coma for several days, so Shiva Rao told me," he said. He didn't remember. And when he came to they all assured him he was alright—the Masters and all that. But though he cried out and it was a great shock, he never tried to move from that fact, to question what it all meant. He just suddenly came out with this thing about his brother. And then he was very intense and very elated by the idea of time, and said, "I wish I could give a talk right now!"

That night, I had supper with them. Anneke had it ready when we got there. He kept saying at the table, "I'm ready to talk now!" We were concerned that he wouldn't sleep—it would be hard for him to sleep in such a mood, so he wouldn't get enough sleep the night before a talk. So, we watched television as a soporific [both chuckle] to calm him down. Then I went back to Eaton Place.

S: Would you pick him up and take him to the talks at the Friends Meeting House?

M: Yes, yes. I think so. Must have, but I wouldn't be able to testify under oath. However, as I had the car and they had no car, I must have. By this time, I was the chauffeur, so it would make sense. He was talking to David Bohm during these times. They were having discussions. Saral and David would come on the tube to Sloane Square or somewhere near there, and I would pick them up there and drive them out. In one of the discussions, Krishnaji made the statement that, "there is, in effect, nothing to do but listen, listen with affection." That's the way he put it. He said that if a statement is made that is true, it has its own action if you listen. He illustrated this with that story of the robbers—he's told it many times—of the band of robbers is made by their leader to close their eyes and ears as they go past a teacher who is teaching. The youngest robber steps on a thorn, and drops his hands, and hears the words, "stealing is evil," which he truly hears, and he could no longer steal. [Chuckles.] So, he told that story. After these discussion we would walk in Richmond Park quite a lot, David, Saral and Krishnaji and myself.

S: It must've been inconvenient for you to be all the way in from Eaton Square when Krishnaji was out in Kingston on Thames or whatever.

M: Well, the funny thing is that what would seem to be inconvenient to me today, seemed nothing to me in those days [laughing]. Sometimes when I've gone over the notes of past events, I think, "Oh my god, how did I do all that in one day?" That also characterizes a lot of the time of living in Malibu. I'd run into town with some list of things to do and come back, cook lunch, and have it ready. I don't know how I managed all that, but I did. Youth! Or comparative youth. I wasn't so young during all this! [S laughs.] It sounds as though I was twenty years old. I was…let's not say how old at the moment. [S laughs.]

And then, of course, fittings went on.

Also, Krishnaji started asking questions about "that boy"—meaning himself—why, despite everything, he wasn't conditioned. He was talking about that an awful lot in the car.

S: You must have also have had many more discussions about the mas in the south of France.

M: Mmm. It sort of…I'll have to think back, I can't tell you at the moment, when he made the decision not to do that. I'm sure I have it in my notes. Another time when we make a recording, I'll look it up. Because they hadn't found a house, the whole idea calmed down.

Anyway, we again went to Mary and Joe's in the country one day. It was pouring rain, and we took a picnic to eat on the way down, but we ate it in the car because of the rain. I remember that I made a ratatouille—I don't know—must have made it in the house in Kingston. [Chuckles.] Things you remember. Anyway, we went and had tea with Mary and Joe and had another lovely walk because the rain had gone away.

So, we come now to May, I think the tenth.We were to drive the car to Paris, so we drove to Lydd, which is where they had a way of flying cars over.

S: Oh, yes.

M: From Lydd to Le Touquet.

S: Oh, yes. You would put your car on the airplane. An extraordinary thing. What part of the airplane came down to take in the car?

M: Like a big mouth, it opened, and you drove the car in. Then you went around and you sat in the cabin.

S: Before we go to France, because we're going to run out of tape in a few minutes. How did you perceive Krishnaji's relationships with Mary and Joe, and his relationships with Doris and Anneke, and Mary Cadogan?

M: How do you mean how did I perceive? Mary and Joe were old friends. I took an immediate liking to both of them, and they seemed to like me, too.

S: But, Joe didn't have an interest in the teaching.

M: No, but he liked Krishnaji and enjoyed his company, and they laughed together.

S: And on the other hand, there was someone like Doris who was almost the opposite, but had a tremendous devotion to the teaching.

M: Yes. Doris was a character, and you immediately saw her as a character, and the things that were both good and bad, were part of her character, and these made her Doris. You just appreciated all of that.

S: But for the historical record, this should be explained somehow because things are interesting; like, for instance, Mary who grew up with a personal affection for Krishnaji, and yet she had no relation to the teachings or anything religious for a long time.

M: That's right.

S: Then became interested in the teachings, then dropped it all and just kept an affection for Krishnaji. Joe had no interest in the teachings at all, but had a personal friendship with Krishnaji.

M: Yes.

S: And Doris who was as unlovable [laughs] as you can get, in a way, but that was part of her charm.

M: Part of her charm was her crankiness and her funny qualities.

S: Yes, and being devoted to the teachings. Anneke was some place in between.

M: Well, Anneke was also fun. Anneke loved to laugh. She and Alain and I, when Krishnaji had gone to bed in Holland, used to sit up and laugh—I forget now what about, but some funny thing that had happened. Anneke was a jolly person, and she, obviously, loved looking after Krishnaji. Everything was heaven for her, and she liked Alain because he was funny and there was much laughter. She liked me for the same reason.

S: What did Doris and Anneke do?

M: Well, they cooked and they cleaned, and Doris structured the day, recording appointments, and all those things. Krishnaji had to see people, and she handled all of that. Anneke probably did most of the cooking and housework. There was also, oh, the lady from South Africa.

S: Joan Wright.

M: Yes, Joan Wright. Joan Wright was somewhere in all this. Before I was the chauffeur, Joan Wright would take Krishnaji into appointments, or drive him to a talk, I think.

Are we running out of tape?

S: Yes. It's just important to talk about these characters because otherwise, they're just names and a hundred years from now, people will have no idea who they are.

M: Joan Wright's chief sterling quality was her ability to sew.

S: Yes, made Krishnaji's bathrobes.

M: Yes, and also he'd bring beautiful silk back from India, that sort of heavy, cream-colored silk, and she'd make his nightshirts, because he wore nightshirts. And, you can't buy nightshirts that easily, especially made of heavy Indian silk. She made all those things for him.

S: We've… I think we've run out of tape now. Alright, so we'll continue on the way to Paris in '66.

M: May, yes.

Issue 4: May 1966 to June 1966

It is clear from some of Mary's comments (e.g., "let's see what happened after that?") and from the exact dates and times that Mary gives in this discussion, that she had her diaries open in front of her for the discussion.

A significant development in the period covered by this discussion is that Mary began to be Krishnaji's host. Their relationship also seems to be shifting; it moves from "Mary, the driver and doer of errands" toward Mary as a friend and companion, and beginning to supersede Alain's friendship with Krishnaji.

Most significantly, in the period discussed in this issue, Mary has her first experience of the more "esoteric" aspects of Krishnaji's life, and he talks with her about this.

Scott: Where we left off was that you were just putting [chuckling] your car, your Jaguar, your not-a-Mercedes onto an airplane to fly it across the channel.

Mary: Well, wasn't as odd as it sounds today. [Both chuckle.] It was a rather small plane, that could land on the water but it also had wheels. It would emerge from the water on a ramp, and then the wheels would take it up onto the landing strip.

S: Oh, really?

M: I think so. That's the way I remember it.

S: Now how many people would there be? A small cabin with, say, a dozen people?

M: No, probably about eight. I can't remember how many cars could go, more than one obviously, probably two, maybe four. I don't know. There was mouth-like opening in the front of the plane, and the cars drove into the stomach, as it were, [S laughs] and then the passengers went and sat in the cabin.

S: I'm sorry I missed that one. [Both laugh.] OK, so, Krishnaji went with you?

M: Krishnaji, Alain, and I. It took a very short time, just flew over to Le Touquet.

S: And from there you drove to Paris.

M: Well, no, we didn't go to Paris. We went to something much nicer. From my research in the Michelin guide, I'd found a nice place to have lunch somewhere in Le Touquet, but then we drove on to a place called Vironvay, which is south of Louvier, if your French geography is good.

S: Not that good.

M: There was an inn, a sort of country inn called Les Saisons. It was very nice because it was sort of cottages around an old building. I had a big room with a fireplace. Krishnaji and Alain were somewhere else, I don't know where they were, not in the same cottage, but we had dinner in my cottage. We ordered room service and we had a fire. It was lovely.

S: Oh, how nice.

When was this again? Was this April?

M: This was May twelfth.

So, we spent the night there. Everybody'd slept well, and it was a beautiful day the next day. Around noon we drove on towards Paris, and I had ordered a table at the Coq Hardi. Have you ever been to the Coq Hardi?

S: No.

M: Well, it's a ravishing restaurant.

S: Where? In Paris?

M: It's out near Malmaison, west of Paris.

In summer, you sit outside on a terrace, and behind there's a hill, and it's all banked in hydrangeas.

S: How nice!

M: It's beautiful!

And the food is superb. I obviously was taken there by my father many times.

S: [chuckles] Yes, of course.

M: So, I knew about it, but of course they hadn't been there, and we had a sumptuous lunch.

S: Hm.

M: Just one beautiful dish of vegetables after another, and fruit. Krishnaji was pleased.

S: By this time you were well recovered from omelets and chips. [Laughs.]

M: Oh, omelets and chips were long gone. [Laughs.] So we went on into Paris in the afternoon. I dropped Krishnaji and Alain at the Suarèses' at about four o'clock. Then I went on to the Hotel Pont Royale, where I'd stayed before. I didn't see them for a couple of days, but I spent time with my father.

M: On May fifteenth, Krishnaji gave his first talk in the Salle Adyar, which I think we discussed before.

S: Yes.

M: Apart from the talks, there was shopping. [S chuckles.] We went to Sulka for something, and Lobb, naturally, for shoes. These beautiful things were brought out, tried on, and were very pleasing. Then we went to the Bois[1] and to Bagatelle[2], which is lovely. We walked around, and I think we had tea or something to drink, and then I drove them back. And, then…

S: What would happen for the talks? Who would drive Krishnaji to the Salle Adyar?

M: [long pause] I don't remember.

S: Was Alain making recordings of those talks?

M: Yes, he was. He was.

S: Would you see Krishnaji before the talks?

M: No, no. I wouldn't see him.

S: Would you see him that day?

M: That day, I guess. I have no recollection of it, and no note about it. Krishnaji and Alain would go for walks, and one day I took Marcelle Bondoneau to the Suarèses', dropped her there, and met them coming back from a walk. So, as I had the car, we went back to the Bois, and had another walk there.

On the twentieth, we drove to St. Germain for a walk, a long walk.

The following day I drove Krishnaji, Alain, and Pupul Jayakar to Chartres. We obviously went through the cathedral again, and had lunch.

S: Did you have lunch in the same place?

M: Yes, in the same place. Vieille Maison, it was called La Vieille Maison. Then we came back to Paris, dropped Pupul at her hotel, and went back to the Bois for another walk. [Chuckles.]

So, let's see what happened after that?

S: Were there any private discussions?

M: Well, I'm just coming to one. There was going to be another young people's discussion.

S: Arranged by Alain.

M: Arranged by Alain, and I was able to hire a nice room for that discussion in the Hotel Pont Royale. I took them to it, and sat in on it. Afterward, I dropped them back, and I went to tea with Marianne Borel. Do you remember Marianne Borel? Little bird-like lady with white hair, very French.

S: No.

M: Oh yes, you would. I can see her in my mind's eye. She always used to put up money for the camping people in the tent to have food. Like a little…

S: It's beginning to say something to me now.

M: Yes.

S: Huh, I'd probably recognize her if I saw her.

M: You would recognize her.

Well anyway, she gave a tea, and that was for all the French people, and so I met them all.

S: Where was it?

M: At her house. She gave the tea.

On another day, I lunched with Marcelle and Mar de Manziarly[3] there.

I guess I met her at the tea, but then I met her again at lunch, and then again on the afternoon walk with Krishnaji and Alain at Bagatelle.

On another day we went to Saint-Cloud for a walk. So it was talking, and walking, and shopping, that is what really went on.

S: Where the old castle used to be in Saint-Cloud, with that wonderful view over Paris?

M: Yes, yes. That's where we walked.

S: How very nice.

M: Yes.

M: Let's see, what happened next?

S: I just realized that at this time you didn't have the advantage of Mary's biographies because they hadn't been written.

M: No.

S: So you didn't know about people like Mar de Manziarly, her history with Krishnaji, or some of these other people?

M: Well, I'd probably been told, at least a little bit. These were, you know, old friends and part of that early time.

S: Yes.

M: I must've known something, I mean just from general talk.

There were [chuckles] two other characters of note: General and Madame Bouvards. [Chuckles.] He was a retired general and she was a rather worldly woman. They were around in Saanen every year, and Madame Bouvards would give luncheons and things. So, we went and had a luncheon with them and somebody called Nagaswaran. Nagaswaran played the veena[4] in India, for Krishnaji, and also he played it at the house that Alain and Frances and I shared. He was rather nice, and he moved to France, I think, and believe he started a school. Anyway, he played at Madame Bouvards.

Again, it was walking, and talks, and Bagatelle.

I went to concerts in the evening, and did shopping with Alain, and what else?

Oh, yes, we went to a movie one day, a movie called Ten Little Indians. [S laughs.] It's a detective thriller, somebody gets murdered. So that was very pleasing.

S: Ah. Yes, that would be. We all know Krishnaji's penchant for thrillers. [S and M chuckle.]

You don't mention going out to meals with Krishnaji.

M: No, he didn't eat at restaurants at all, except that one time at Bougival, Picardie.

S: And you weren't invited to the Suarèses' for meals?

M: I think I was, once or twice, but not regularly.

S: What were they like?

M: Well, he was a little gnomish-like man, and he was very busy, really absorbed, in doing some translations and writing a book about the Kabbalah. He was very involved in that.

Nadine was a grey-haired, middle-aged, very French-looking lady, but in fact they were both Egyptian. They came from Egypt.

S: Oh yes, I remember that now.

M: There was another young people's discussion, and I took K[5] there. And then coming back [laughs], this is a saga. I drove that small distance between from the Hotel Pont Royal and the Suarèses', and as I got to the corner, where their building is, the Jaguar stopped. Luckily, there was a parking place right on the corner, and I was able to roll it in [both laugh]. I don't know how, but I did. And so I said to Alain and Krishnaji, "Go away, and leave me to deal with this."

After some protests, they did. This [laughs] was on the twenty-ninth of May, and there ensued an absolutely frantic and comic day [chuckles], trying to get the Jaguar moving, have life again. I eventually got someone [laughs] through the auto club, I don't know what. "Ma voiture est en panne," said I.

"Oui, oui, Madame," came the reply. He would come and deal with it. [S chuckles.] So, how he dealt with it is that he towed it away. And I couldn't find it. [S laughs.] It was Pentecôte, you know, Pentecost.

S: Ohh.

M: [laughs] I was due to drive K, in the Jaguar, to Switzerland. [S laughs.] And it was Pentecôte, and nobody was anywhere.

S: Your car was taken away, and you didn't know where.

M: Exactly, and couldn't find anyone to ask. [Both laugh.] I was up a tree, as you can imagine!

I finally [laughs] located the man who towed it away, and I learned where it was supposed to be. He said that he would meet me there. He hadn't been able to fix it, but we were going to try to get it out anyway. So I went in a taxi way into the eastern part of Paris, to some terrible [laughs] place, where all the dead cars go when they die.

S: Yes [laughs].

M: A dead car yard [both laugh], and mine was behind a big wall with a big gate and an enormous padlock on it. So, the man [laughs], climbed the fence, and was to stand guard outside in case the police came by. [Both laugh.] I had a picture…

S: …of getting arrested stealing your own car! [Laughs.]

M: Yes, exactly! And the exasperation of the police at, you know, these damned foreigners…

S: Yes [laughs].

M: …coming to our country and doing these stupid things. [S and M laugh.] But anyway, he broke the lock or something because somehow he got the gate open, and he got the car out. He also had to go in and steal the key, which was hidden in the office. He did all that while I stood guard. Finally he got it out, but it would only go in very low gear in fits and starts.

S: Oiee.

M: Awful! And driving it that way with this awful jerky motion, I thought it's ruining the whole car so it'll never recover from this. He got it to the Jaguar agency up near the Étoile. I don't know how we managed but it got there, and it was left there. By this time, I was [laughs] rather a nervous wreck.

The next morning, I called the Jaguar people, but they were rather vague about the whole thing. So, I got Alain on the phone and I said, "You've got to come with me, or we'll never get it" –we were supposed to leave that morning for [S chuckles] Switzerland! [M laughs.]

We went over, and Alain was marvelous. He found out who was head of the whole place and where his office was, and we went upstairs to it, and he walked in with me in tow. There was the boss behind a big desk, important man in a conference with other important men. Alain walked up and said in immaculate French, "Monsieur, I am bringing you a great problem. Madame is due to leave this morning in her car to take a very distinguished gentleman on a tour of France and to Switzerland. It is the highest importance that the car be able to run. Will you see to it?" [Laughs.] With that, the chef de Jaguar [S chuckles] pointed to an underling and told him to take care of this. [S chuckles.]

We went out and followed him down, and there was the poor car. So we got in and, again, a harrowing ride into the Bois with the car going in lower than low gear, I don't know what, and jerking, jerking all the way. The technician, who was driving, forced the car to go. Apparently the car was not broken. There was something stuck, and by forcing it, and forcing it, and forcing it…suddenly it went! [Laughs.]

When we went back to the Jaguar dealership, I said, "We can postpone our departure until after lunch, but I will need the car looked at in detail between now and 3 o'clock," or whatever it was.

They said they would.

Alain and I then took a taxi, fetched Krishnaji, and went to Chez Conti, which is an Italian restaurant in Paris, very good. Mr. Conti, the founder and owner, was very attached to my father because, not only was my father a great customer (all restaurant owners adored my father, because [S chuckles] he was the perfect [laughs] customer), but Mr. Conti was also a racing fan, and Father had horses, and went to the races every day.

So, Mr. Conti was all too pleased to give us a wonderful lunch. Krishnaji was delighted to have Italian food, and said, "Why haven't we come here every day?!" [Both laugh.]

After lunch I fetched the Jaguar, got my luggage from the hotel, and I met them both at the Suarèses'. The car was driving perfectly, so off we went to Touraine.

S: Now, I know that eventually the Suarèses said to somebody it was too difficult for them to have Krishnaji. Was that, that year?

M: Yes, it was.

S: How did you come to know about it?

M: I didn't know about it then. I knew about it later in Switzerland.

S: Well, tell me about it now because we're talking about it.

M: Well, they were getting old, and Krishnaji's being with them was becoming more of a burden than a privilege. They made remarks about, "Oh, it's so much trouble, so much work, when you're here." And Krishnaji felt uncomfortable.

S: Of course.

M: He felt he was exploiting them.

S: Yes.

M: Krishnaji didn't say anything, but Marcelle Bondaneau came to know of this. She was an old, old friend of the Suarèses', and an old, old friend of Krishnaji; been in Ommen in the early days. She was a nice, jolly lady. As a result of what the Suarèses were feeling, that summer in Switzerland she said to me, "It doesn't seem right that Krishnaji is always a guest. He should have his own place when he comes to Paris. You should rent something and run it for him, so that it's his place but you're doing the needed."

I replied, "I would feel that I'm butting in, you know; this is an established thing, with the Suarèses. It will cause very bad feelings."

She said, "No, no, that doesn't matter. What's important is that Krishnaji should have things right for him."

So, she proposed it to him and he okay'ed it.

When she came back to me and told me, I said, "I'll need your help to find a place, because I have to go back to the United States."

She said, "We'll find something, and you, you rent it and run it" you know, the whole thing. So that was what was agreed.

S: I see.

M: But I must go back to this exit from Paris, because this was when Krishnaji told both Alain and me that, at times, he faints; and that, if it happened, we weren't to be frightened, but "don't touch the body," as he put it. So, we're going out of Paris on the thirty-first of May. Heavy traffic on the, um…

S: Autoroute du Soleil.

M: Yes, going south on the Autoroute de Soleil. We're driving along, and something made me glance at Krishnaji, and he s-l-o-w-l-y fainted to the left into, more or less, my lap. I put out my hand instinctively. I was afraid his head would hit the steering wheel. I couldn't stop the car. Cars, you know pouring all around us. Alain was in the back seat.

S: This Jaguar obviously has left-hand steering?

M: Yes. I'd ordered it for America.

It was extraordinary the way this happened. It was like slow motion. He didn't go plop. He v-e-r-y slowly, like a flower leaning over and…

S: Mm, hm.

M: So I was able to continue to drive. Luckily, I was in the right-hand lane. As soon as possible, when there was an exit, we got off the auto-route.

S: Alain was aware of what had happened?

M: Alain was in the back seat, but he couldn't do anything.

S: But he was aware of what happened?

M: Oh yes! He was aware of it. After a few minutes, with a cry, Krishnaji came to.

S: For how long was he out? A few minutes, five minutes?

M: Probably five minutes.

S: Did you have a sense of anything?

M: No, but it was curious. I didn't have a sense of anything, but every time it ever happened in a car, something warned me. Not that I was conscious, but something made me turn and look at him just before it happened. Every time. It was very odd.

S: Hm.

M: Because it happened a number of times later on. But that was the first time.

S: Did he say anything?

M: Yes, he did. He made some half-joking apology for falling into my lap or something. I've forgotten exactly what he said. So we drove on.

S: But there was no explanation?

M: Well, he said it would sometimes happen after a series of talks. He didn't explain it then, but he explained it later on; that it was something about leaving the body temporarily, after it'd been through strain of some kind. The effort of the Paris talks and all that, would have made that a moment for it. He also said it will never happen in public, and it will never happen unless he's with people he knows well, not casually.

S: Yes.

M: So, we drove on. I booked rooms in a hotel in Montbazon, which we turned out to dislike very much. It was the former house of somebody like Monsieur Coty, you know, some big industrialist. It was turned into a hotel, and it was overly ornate and pretentious. We didn't like it at all. But we spent the night, we had to. We decided to drive on the next day.

S: Can I come back to this fainting, Mary?

M: Of course.

S: Did you notice a change in Krishnaji from before he would faint to after he would faint? Like would he be refreshed afterwards? Or would he be…mm, in a different mood afterwards? Or anything?

M: No.

S: No change at all?

M: No, he wasn't any special way before.

S: He wasn't more tired afterwards or less tired afterwards?

M: I can't answer that. If it did something, or if it relieved some strain, it was not a physical strain.

S: So, it had no visible effect?

M: No. I didn't know why it happened, and I didn't ask. I mean I just—he told us that it might happen, and it did.

S: Had this happened with Alain before?

M: No, not that I know of. I don't think so, because I remember his explaining it to both of us.

S: Mm, hm. When did he explain it to both of you?

M: [sighs] I don't remember it precisely. He may have said it that day, but before the trip. I certainly didn't expect it then and there. I wasn't, you know, waiting to see if he'd faint or something.

S: But it wasn't like weeks and weeks before.

M: No, it was fairly recent.

S: Did Krishnaji ever say that he would know when this would come? Even approximately?

M: No.

S: Well, it came after a strain that he would know.

M: Well, he would, yes. And it later came one day after he'd had a dentist thing; that was "a shock to the body," as he put it.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Also, he had, once in California, a cyst inside his lower lip, and the doctor said it had to come out. So, we drove into the doctor's office, and they gave him Novocain, I think, and it was cut out. It wasn't serious in any way. But about halfway home, he fainted, again, in the same way.

S: Hm.

M: He also did it once in New York when we arrived, and we went to a flat I rented from my ex-sister-in-law. A little flat on 61st Street. I took him into his room, showed him where it was, and, I guess, just from fatigue of the journey, he fainted.

S: Hm.

M: So it was after some, as he put it, "shock to the body" or exertion, strain of some kind. And the cry, when he comes to, of course, is always…makes you…

S: Yes, I've heard that cry.

M: Yes. But the cry meant nothing painful. He wasn't aware of the cry. I mean it…he'd hear it…

S: Yes. He'd hear it, yes.

M: It woke him up, but it wasn't a sign of pain or something.

S: No, no. But, he obviously anticipated his fainting, to a certain extent, because he told you just before it happened that it would happen. In other words, he must have known that the body had gone through a strain with these talks.

M: That it might. Yes.

S: That it might happen. Yes.

M: But he didn't, as I recall, he didn't indicate something like, "Watch out."

S: No, no, no.

M: Just to tell us that it could happen, and not to be alarmed, and not to touch the body.

Of course, as it happened, I did touch him. I couldn't help it because I tried to prevent his hitting his head on the steering wheel, and he fell in my lap, but we didn't touch him otherwise. I just held him as well as I could with my right arm, and drove with my left. But, I didn't do anything about him or try and lift him up or anything. I just waited for it to go away.

S: Yes, yes.

Alright, you left the unpleasant industrialist's house.

M: Yes. [Laughs.] And it was awful noisy, too, and they didn't appreciate vegetarians.

S: [laughs] Sorry!

M: So, the next day we drove on to Amboise. We lunched in Amboise. Krishnaji isn't a great chateau visitor, as I've said, so we didn't go into the Château, but we went on to Chenonceau.

S: Oh, that's beautiful.

M: When we got there, we did do a walk around, but again, we didn't go into the Château. We went in on another trip when we went there. But it's lovely to look at it from the outside, and we walked around the gardens.

Then we went on—again the Michelin Guide had done its duty for me—to a place I'd found called Pougues-les-Eaux [S laughs]. At Pougues-les-Eaux, there was a Château de Mimont, which had been turned into a hotel. It was Château with parkland around. Lovely! And the owner was the host. One of those Château hotels, you know.

S: Yes, I do.

M: That was lovely. It was in the country, and there were fields, and trees, and beautiful rolling country. We had nice rooms and I remember in the salle à manger that supper was very good. They rose to the vegetarian challenge very nicely, and it was good.

S: Oh, good.

M: I remember that was one of the first times when I was aware of something… strange…some presence when Krishnaji was talking about his early life. I can see the dining room in my memory, and feeling something, something that's not identifiable. A sort of presence, is the way I can explain it; they're the only words I can think of.

S: Yes.

M: It was like a kind of, well…I've described it as a vibrance in the air. Something electric, something, some sort of unheard hum or something…

S: Yes, yes.

Did you say anything to Alain about it or to Krishnaji about it?

M: I don't remember, but when later we did talk about it, that memory of the Château de Mimont evening came back to me. I don't think I did talk about it that evening.

S: Mm, hm.

M: But that's, again, lost in memory.

So, we spent the next day going for walks. It was very nice.

S: Now, would you have your main meal at lunch, or at dinner?

M: Lunch.

Well, the first evening at Château de Mimont, we had our main meal for dinner, because we only got there about suppertime.

S: Yes.

S: So Krishnaji, even in those days, had his main meal at midday?

M: Yes, yes. We'd have supper, but lunch was the larger meal.

S: I wonder why?

M: Well, he'd been to the Bircher Benner Clinic.

S: Ahhh. Is that what they always recommend?

M: That's part of the regimen: that you eat your main meal at lunch, and there's that business about fruit first, and then raw things, and then cooked things.

S: Yes.

M: Which we've all followed ever since.

S: I know.

M: He picked it up there. It's the way they feed you, and diet is very much part of the therapy there. There are books, medical books supporting this program of food. And, he liked it, so that was the way it was.

S: Yes, of course.

M: So, then we drove on to Geneva.

S: Sorry, would it always be Alain in the back seat and Krishnaji…?

M: Yes, in the front.

S: So Alain didn't drive?

M: Not my car, no. He drove later his own car. He wasn't a very experienced driver.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And…I didn't like the way he drove. I thought he was hard on the car.

S: Ah, huh.

M: So I did all the driving.

S: I see.

M: He may have spelled me once or twice but, not with Krishnaji in the car, I don't think. I was supposed to be a great driver. Krishnaji approved.

S: Mm, hm. [Laughs].

M: Anyway, we arrived in the—back to the good ole Hotel du Rhône!

S: Which way did you come in, do you remember?

M: Yes, I do, but I won't be able to give you the names. Through…well it—looking at the map it would be the west, slightly southwest part, through…is there a place called Voltaire there?

S: Voltaire? There's something Chalon-sur-Saône?

M: No, we weren't that far south; I've been through Chalon.

S: Chalon-sur-Saône. Did you come in through the Lyons way?

M: No, no, no. Um, Mimont—we—we, oh dear, I can see the places, but I can't name them. Maybe my other book would have that. Do you want to turn it off, and I'll look it up? Or don't you care?

S: No, it's all right. Let's just make a note, and we'll get it later.

M: Alright. It's going to be a very confusing tape if we make footnotes, pages later![6]

S: [laughs] It doesn't make any difference.

M: Anyway, we got to the Hotel du Rhône, and then of course the next day we did our Geneva errands. Patek. And also I think neckties at that place…

S: Jacquet.

M: Yes, Jacquet. Thank you. So, we then went to Gstaad, and Les Caprices. This year we all stayed at Caprices for a while, because Tannegg wasn't open yet. Krishnaji had a sort of studio, next to my flat, as I recall. But we all used my sitting room. And I did the cooking.

S: And where did Alain stay?

M: Alain stayed with me. There was an extra room that year.

S: Like the year before.

M: That's right, but we spent most of our time in my sitting room and had our meals there.

S: Would you go out to eat in restaurants?

M: No, we went to a restaurant on Thun Lake when we went to Thun for the car. If you go round the lake from Thun on the little boat they have, there is a town called Merlingen, and there they have the Hotel Beatus and we'd go there for lunch. But we didn't lunch in Gstaad, as I recall. We'd lunch at home.

And, of course, we had walks.

At one point, Krishnaji got bronchitis and stayed in bed. The Biascoecheas, who were in Gstaad already, came to lunch.

There's a note here about lunching, taking the lake ferry to Beatus from Thun. Apparently we were looking for a Volkswagen for Alain, because he needed a car. So, there was much car shopping and…

S: Mm, hm. In Thun?

M: In Thun, yes, that's where we'd gotten Krishnaji's car, from Monsieur Moser.

S: Yes, yes, I remember, yes. [Both laugh.]

M: We gave Mr. Moser a lot of business!

S: I know.

M: And Krishnaji got his Mercedes out of storage at Mr. Moser's, and drove it back to Gstaad.

S: What color was it?

M: Silver.

M: Silver, the first, this is the first one.

S: Yes, this is the first one.

M: Again, we went for lunch with the Biascoecheas, we walked everywhere, and Alain went to Bern for something or other, I've forgotten what, probably a visa. I made lunch for K and we walked.

S: How long were your walks?

M: Oh, a goodly walk.

S: An hour?

M: An hour at least, yes.

We went to Geneva again, going through France, going around the south side of the lake. And we took a picnic and had it on route. And then we went to the Hotel du Rhône [both laugh]. We went to a Hitchcock movie that evening, Dial M for Murder.

S: Ah, yes, I remember that one.

M: Grace Kelly. The next day Alain and Krishnaji went to Dr. Pierre Schmidt, who was a noted homeopath. An ancient gentleman. Alain of course has always been mad about homeopathy, and he got hold of Dr. Pierre Schmidt, who was a very distinguished homeopath. [Chuckles.] I went along, I took them. They both had liver treatments. God knows what that was. They became patients of Dr. Schmidt. Then K and I drove back to Gstaad, and Alain remained to meet Desikachar, who was arriving from India.

S: Ah, ha.

M: The next day K and I lunched with the Biascoecheas, took a long walk in the afternoon along the river.

S: Oh, let me go back here, because Desikachar was coming to give Krishnaji yoga lessons.

M: Yes.

S: But before then it had been Iyengar, and Krishnaji always told me that Iyengar had hurt his neck.

M: That's true.

S: Were you there when it happened, or were you aware of that at that time?

M: Yes.

S: Well, you didn't talk about that.

M: Well uh, I wasn't aware of it when Desikachar…,

When Iyengar was teaching him, I took lessons from Iyengar too, and I must say he was almost brutal.

S: Yes, I've heard that.

M: I mean, he tried to make you do things that just pushed you to your limit.

S: Yes.

M: In fact [laughs] I used to deliberately get angry to get enough adrenalin to do what he was making me do. And he'd been too rough with Krishnaji. He's very rough.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Desikachar is the opposite, very gentle. So, Desikachar was invited to come.

S: So, you don't remember Krishnaji's being hurt at that time? It would've been the year before.

M: Well, he had a permanently stiff neck from it.

S: Yes, I know.

M: It wasn't that he was hurt then and there, but from Iyengar, he couldn't turn his head well. It got terribly stiff, and took him a long time to get over that.

S: I see.

Mary, it's good to have details like that…

M: Yes.

S: Like for instance, even your, you know, making yourself get angry so you would have the adrenaline to do that. Those are the kinds of things that make these interviews come alive.

M: Yes. [Pause.] He was, I've forgotten what pose it was he was making me do, but with my bad leg, it was forcing me very hard. I was shaking with the effort.

S: Why don't you read your notes?

M: Alright.

Well, here's a typical day. June eighteenth. I marketed and made lunch while K went riding in his Mercedes.

S: Now would he go out on his own?

M: Oh, yes! The Biascoecheas came for lunch with us. And later, I walked in the rain with Krishnaji.

S: Where did you buy your vegetables?

M: Oh, you know, what was his name?

S: Mr. Mullener.

M: Yes. He later had that restaurant in Gsteig.

And also the, oh dear, the one in the middle.

S: Yes, yes, yes. Across from the chocolate shop.

M: Yes. But back then it belonged to the original owner, whose name is on it.

S: Yes.

M: And then later his assistant bought it. Isn't it awful, the memory. I forget all those names.

S: Well, it's just a vegetable shop, but anyway [chuckles] I remember it as well.

M: Marketing was a big business. One went here for this, and there for that.

S: Oh yes! And Oehrli for the bread and cakes.

M: Yes, Oehrli is wonderful, those lovely cakes. And where eventually the, um…

S: White chocolate.

M: White chocolate! [Both laugh.]

S: I remember introducing those to you!

M: You did! You brought it. I hadn't had any chocolate, all these years, these twenty-some years in Switzerland, I never ate any chocolate because I knew if I did [S chuckles], I was lost! So the object was never to start and I never did…

S: Quite right.

M: …until you got me onto one.

S: Until I ruined it all.

M: Yes, yes.

S: So Krishnaji would go off every day, and drive on his own?

M: I don't know about every day but he would go often.

S: Oh, how nice.

M: Yes, yes. He liked that. Desikachar arrived, and we start yoga lessons. I have my first lesson with him.

Here's a day when Krishnaji took me for a ride in the Mercedes.

On another, I drove Alain to Thun where he picked up his Volkswagen, so we're now three cars!

S: With three cars, yes. [Chuckles.]

M: Mine, of course is an inferior Jaguar, but anyway, I mended that later. [Both chuckle.]

One day we drove one day to Evian for lunch on the terrace of the Hotel Royal, which is lovely. I think it was then that ha! [giggles] Alain…it was the time when cherries, those wonderful, big, black, huge cherries.

S: Ah, yes, yes.

M: We ordered cherries, and Alain insisted on opening every cherry in case there was a worm in it. [S laughs.] He had a thing about worms. I said it ruins the cherries, being full of anxiety about a worm! [S laughs.] I said that I've never had a worm in a cherry.

He said, "I have!" [S laughs.]

But it was this really a lovely lunch because the terrace looks out over the whole lake. And it's a very old-fashioned hotel. In fact, we thought of taking rooms there once, but we never did.

So, on we went to Geneva and the Hotel du Rhône [laughs]. Alain and Krishnaji had homeopathic treatments, which I didn't have. They also had steam baths. But I didn't do that.

S: Where did they have those?

M: I don't know, wherever—it was a homeopathic thing. I don't know where they went. The next day, we drove back to Gstaad via Evian, and another lovely lunch at the Hotel Royal [both laugh].

This could be rather monotonous for posterity! [Both laugh.] I don't think posterity's going to want to hear all this stuff!

S: Well, this is a chance to get all the details [M laughs], like what did you do when they were going to this homeopath? And later on Krishnaji said that he didn't think home—homeopathy had done him any good. He stopped taking things.

M: That's right, but that didn't prevent him from getting an awful lot of it. [Both laugh.] And Alain was so interested, and still is so passionately involved with homeopathy.

S: Yes.

M: It never did anything for me.

S: Yes, Krishnaji said also, I can remember him saying, he didn't think it worked.

M: Well, he'd still do it. [Both laugh]. I guess he would be hot and cold about that.

S: So when you went down to Geneva, you drove in your car again then?

M: The Jaguar, yes, yes. And I, I don't know, I walked around and I shopped probably.

S: Describe what it was like driving with Krishnaji in the car.

M: Well, of course it was lovely.

S: He noticed everything.

M: Yes. And, again, I've described his back-seat driving.

S: Yes.

M: He would be like Toscanini or von Karajan conducting the driving with hand signals.

S: Yes.

M: But, he would also like to look at the country. He enjoyed that. At other times, when I drove alone with him, later on when Alain wasn't with us, he used to chant.

S: Hmm.

M: And that was wonderful. We would drive through France on lovely little tiny roads, with the beautiful country unwinding around us, and he would chant. It was like…well, I've always felt most people have a hum—when they're alone, they hum something. Krishnaji's hum was Sanskrit chants.

S: How lovely.

M: And, it was beautiful.

S: Hm. [M chuckles.] How nice!

M: Yes. Those were really wonderfully magic moments, being in the middle of France, away from everything, no telephone, no people, nobody knew where we were, just rolling through lovely country, relaxed and–just loveliness. We wouldn't talk too much. But there was a kind of something unspoken that we both were enjoying.

S: A kind of communication.

M: Yes.

S: How very nice.

Mary, would he or you bring like a thermos to have something to drink along the way if you wanted?

M: We usually took, I think, a bottle of Evian, or something like that.

S: And some cups or glasses?

M: Cups usually, you know, paper or plastic.

And later on we used to stop and buy croissants! This would be on the return from Switzerland, driving back to Paris.

S: You'd get croissants?

M: Well, we would leave always at 4 a.m., why I don't know, but we did. [S laughs.] Fosca would see us off and give me a good Italian coffee before we left. And then we'd cross the frontier just as it was coming light, up above Divonne, up there. And after coming into France, driving a bit down, there was…oh, I should know the name of the town. If I had a map in front of me I'd tell you. Where there's a bakery, and they were just baking them. Bread was coming out of the oven. And we would stop and buy hot-from-the-oven croissants.

S: Mm, hm, how wonderful.

M: Fosca would have given us a whole pannier of fruit and something to drink. So, we'd stop and have a picnic breakfast, which was lovely. Krishnaji would always remember the place! He, with his trick memory, not remembering so many things. He had a memory for places.

S: An extraordinary memory for places!

M: Yes, and he would say, "We're coming to it" when we'd be, say, a half a mile away. And when we'd get there, and he'd say, "Here it is, here it is." There was a place we could park off the road just a little bit, behind some trees and bushes.

S: Was Fosca cooking for you all the time in Gstaad?

M: Fosca cooked every year but the last year.

S: I only ask because you only said before, when you were talking that in the first year that Vanda had sent a cook…

M: Well, yes, a male cook. But, he didn't last. He was crooked, he was cheating [laughs]. People would send Krishnaji mangos, and I'd go fetch them in the car, a big box of mangos would come up the hill. We'd have mangos for maybe two meals, and then no more mangos. He was selling them to the Palace Hotel.

S: Oh, you left that out of the story!

M: Well, I didn't [both laugh] think of it till now!

S: Oh really!

M: Yes!

S: Ah ha!

M: He was fired.

S: So, he hadn't worked for Vanda for very long, or had he?

M: Um, I don't think he'd worked for her very long before. I'm not very clear on Vanda's arrangement. Fosca was actually a laundress, had been since early life.

S: Yeah, I thought she'd worked for Vanda forever.

M: Yes, she'd been the laundress for Vanda. She liked to iron very much. She kept saying, "I'm not a cook. Senora has turned me into a cook, and I'm not a cook, I don't know how to cook!" [S laughs.] She cooked wonderfully.

S: Yes, she was a wonderful cook.

M: Wonderful cook! But that was a bit later.

M: So, now we're…where are we?

S: We're going back to Gstaad through Evian.

M: Yes.

S: By this time you'd obviously moved back into Chalet Tannegg?

M: No, this is still June, you see, this is June twenty-fifth, actually.

S: So you spent like a month in Switzerland before Tannegg was even opened.

M: Yes, this particular year we came right after the Paris talks.

M: So the next day, June twenty-sixth, K started to cough, so he stayed in for a couple of days.

My activities were that I took the Jaguar down to be serviced in Lausanne, returning by train.

The next day Krishnaji was up again, and I left after cooking Alain and Krishnaji lunch. The train I took to go back to Lausanne to pick up my car went by Caprices, and Krishnaji, Alain, and Desikachar were waving to me on the balcony. [Both laugh.]

S: Waving you off to…

M: Yes! [Both laugh more.]

And then K drove the Jaguar. He condescended to drive a Jaguar! [Both chuckle.] Again we went to Evian and the Hotel du Royal, and to Geneva and the Hotel du Rhône, and again they had steam baths. This is very repetitious!

S: It has a rhythm. I like it.

Now, let me ask about Desikachar. When would you have, or when would Krishnaji have lessons?

M: In the morning.

S: Morning. And would you have lessons together?

M: No. We'd have separate lessons at different times.

S: What time would Krishnaji start his lessons?

M: Well, he'd have it in the morning when he did his normal exercises. I would have it later sometime. I don't know when. I don't remember.

S: And Desikachar really came there for Krishnaji?

M: Yes, yes. [Laughs.] I remember also…Do you really want the little details?

S: Absolutely.

M: Desikachar was always, of course, a very strict Brahmin, and, of course, very vegetarian. I'd brought a cake at Oehrli, and he tasted it and had loved it, and I didn't have the heart to tell him there were eggs in it.

S: Mm.

M: [laughs] So, I never told him! [Both laugh.]

S: Oh, because he didn't eat eggs either?

M: No! And I, I couldn't bring myself to tell him [more laughs] about the eggs.

So, I must have polluted him in some way, but that's what happened. [Both chuckle again.] After this last steam bath, Krishnaji decided that he didn't like it, it didn't suit him. We came back this time via Ouchy, and had lunch in Ouchy. Ouchy has the Château d'If, the…not Château d'If, the Château…what is the château on the lake?

S: Oh, that's the Château de Chillon.

M: Well, that's Ouchy. [Tape cuts out.]

S: Okay, we're back on.

M: I've remembered suddenly these things when Krishnaji talked about his life. He made a rather detailed attempt to explain to Alain and me about the theosophic order of things: the seven Masters, and a sort of super Master, and the Lord Maitreya, and the Buddha, and the Lord of the Universe. He explained that the Lord Maitreya is a living ancient being in Tibet who periodically leaves his own body and enters that of a person. He hasn't gone on to be a Buddha because humanity is suffering. It is said that he took Jesus' body.

I asked Krishnaji if he could see auras.

He replied that he used to.

Then I asked him if his extraordinary perception in interviews that made such an impact was, or came from such powers.

He said probably.

He told us a story about a man who came to him, and K was able to tell him all about himself. [Chuckles.] And the man was annoyed! Have you ever heard him tell that story? [S laughs.] The man was indignant! [Laughs.]

S: No, but I could well understand it!

M: It's as though this man felt Krishnaji had intruded into his life.

S: Yes, yes, yes.

M: As he was talking about these things, he always seemed to know how they occurred, but he never said. [Chuckles.]

S: What do you mean, how what occurred?

M: Well, all these odd things, I mean how he could see auras, and how he could, for instance, know all about this man when he walked in the room.

S: Yes.

M: One felt that he understood what was going on.

S: But he never explained it.

M: But he never explained it.

S: Yes. When did this conversation take place?

M: I think it was the same year.

S: Ah, ha.

M: It may have been in Château de Mimont.

S: How did Krishnaji—can you see him describing all this theosophical order of things?

M: Yes.

S: So, how did he talk about it?

M: Very factually.

S: Just very factually. As if there was something in it? Or, as though there was not something in it?

M: You couldn't make either statement.

S: I know.

M: You've had it, too.

S: I tried to draw him on it a dozen times!

M: Yes. He would talk about it, but he wouldn't vouch for it, as it were.

S: Or say it wasn't true.

M: No, he wouldn't. He wouldn't.

S: Yes.

M: And, of course, I was always felt it was not right to pry. If he wanted to tell me something, wonderful. But if he didn't want to go beyond what he told me, I never asked [pause] questions.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Or, I sometimes asked questions prefaced by the statement, "If you don't want to tell me, please don't, but I'll ask it, and then forget it if you don't want to tell me about it." So, I never pushed. Perhaps I should have, but I felt that wasn't right to do it that way.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And [pause] he said that, also in one of these talks, he talked about what was actually "the process," but he didn't call it that then. He talked about how he would cry out.

S: What did he say about "the process?"

M: He said that he'd suddenly had fits of unconsciousness or coma that would come upon him, and he would cry out. And his brother was there, and Rosalind, and a Mr. Warrington, who was a theosophist [7]. And he said that they never touched the body. There was something…he was so vulnerable in these states, in the fainting too, that anything that impinged upon him physically…If you remember, later on, when he talked about it, and Mary wrote about it [8], the times in the Tyrol when they were there and the church bells would ring, and it—he said something like, "It nearly was the end of me" because of the shock of the bells ringing while he was in this state was so great.

S: Yes.

M: So there was an extreme vulnerability at a time like this. There mustn't be anything to shock the body physically or it could be fatal. He said they never touched the body. When he was telling us about this, I wondered if there was some reason that he was telling us. And, he said that his brother wrote it all down. That the boy had spoken marvelous poetry, and strange things happened. This was during "the process."

We asked what strange things happened. He said rather hesitantly, "A star appeared."

I asked where.

He said above his head.

The boy had no memory of all this, then or now, he said.

I asked if he was aware of what was happening then and he said, probably, he must have. But he couldn't remember.

S: Hm.

M: So that was one of the times when he talked about this. [Pause.]

S: Was that the occasion when you felt this strange presence?

M: No, that was in the Château de Mimont.

S: I know.

M: This was earlier. I didn't, I didn't get it then. I didn't, at least I don't remember getting it. My first noticing it all by myself was in the Château de Mimont.

S: So, it wasn't this conversation that brought it about.

M: No, no. This was an earlier conversation, which I'm remembering now.

But, probably if I'd been more sensitive, I would have felt it.

S: Yes.

M: It would have come then. It's, in a way, the sort of things that Mary [Lutyens] felt and wrote about, and about which Krishnaji used to say, "Do you feel it?"

S: Yes, yes.

M: And, I had always felt it before he said it, later.

S: Yes.

M: So, let's see, where we are now?

S: We're still in Les Caprices. You were just coming back from picking up your car at Lausanne, I think, or Krishnaji had stopped his steam baths.

M: That's right.

I think I ought to recount one evening when he spoke of a game of noticing and naming objects from just one glance. He said he used to play this game with his brother, and a similar game, where you, say, have just a second to look at this table, and then not look at it, and remember.

S: Really?

M: I asked him if his state of noticing everything is constant.

He replied, "It always has been, except when I'm empty, and I hardly look out the window of my room. I'm empty."

Then he turned to Alain and said, "That's why, sir, sometimes when you come into the room I jump out of my skin."

That was interesting: how he could look at everything, see everything, and then he'd go into these states of being empty, at which times anything would startle him.

He also asked, in the car going to Amboise, if we'd never heard a definition of meditation, what would it mean to us?

We replied, "A concern for life."

He then asked, "How does one look at oneself, not each individual, but in a way in which all things are included?" He continued, pointing to a mountain, "It's like being up there. When you look down from there you see everything in its proper place. So, how do you see from there?…Not how, but what is seeing from there? That is the question."

Then he asked, "Do you remember silence?" There'd been a silence. And, "Where was it?" he asked.

Alain said, "The Château de Mimont."

Krishnaji replied, "Yes, there was silence, and all the sounds in it."

S: Hm.

M: It seemed a wonderful thing.

S: Yes.

M: I said it had happened since, and he nodded, and said, "Yes, several times, in this room."

He continued, "Where do you start to look from? Not up there, but where you are. You must be very sensitive and do everything you can for that. Right food, enough sleep. Hip baths…" He was big on hip baths! [Laughs.] I'd forgotten about hip baths!

S: Oh, yes.

M: I think, Mary talks about having to have hip baths in mountain streams from melted snow when they were in the Tyrol.[9] He [laughs] used to take hip baths in the tub, ice cold water. I tried it once, ice cold water, it was unbearable! [Both laugh.] I never did it again! [M laughs more.] And it says here in my diaries, "hip baths," and that he laughed at me as he said it because I had complained.

"Be aware of everything you do. Have you ever tried that awareness?" he asked us.

Alain said that he had.

Krishnaji continued, "You are not aware if there is a center watching to correct. As long as there is this, you are not watching. There must be no center. Then things are corrected of themselves. That is the lesson for this evening." [Both chuckle.]

And then he changed the subject, and said he wanted us to speak only French all through supper! [Both laugh again.]

S: So this is still at Les Caprices?

M: Yes, this is.

S: Now, would you have serious talks like that often or not so often?

M: Yes, yes, often.

S: How nice.

M: Yes.

In the middle of a lunch, at some point, he said suddenly, "There is no discovery in thinking, only in observation."

See, these things seem to be floating through his mind. We'd be chattering, or laughing, or something, and suddenly he'd say something like that, as though it was always humming inside him.

S: Yes.

M: We were also playing records in those days in Caprices.

S: Did the place have a record player?

M: No, I had bought a machine in Geneva, I think, when they were having steam baths, and I bought [chuckles] some music.

S: How nice.

M: He liked Segovia's guitar music very much.

S: Yes, and Segovia played for Krishnaji once.

M: Yes he had. Krishnaji liked the sound of a guitar.

S: Yes. And, I think, Julian Bream also played for Krishnaji.

M: I don't think so. Not that I can remember. We played Julian Bream records. What made you think that?

S: Because, Amancio[10] told me this story: that he had offered to play guitar for Krishnaji, and Krishnaji said yes, fine. So, Amancio returned with his guitar, some days later, a week, I don't know what. And as he was tuning up Amancio asked Krishnaji, "Has anyone ever played guitar for you before?"

Krishnaji said, "Oh yes, Segovia and Julian Bream." [Both laugh heartily.] Amancio was just shattered! [More laughing.] And he said it was really difficult to play knowing who he was following. It must have been a nightmare for [both laugh more] a young guitarist!

M: Yes!

I know that Alain thought highly of Julian Bream, and I think he met him somewhere. He went and asked to talk to him about music. But, I don't recall that he played for Krishnaji, but maybe I wasn't there. Who knows? [Both laugh.]

Also, one evening, Krishnaji was very pleased [laughs] because, one evening, Alain locked me out of the kitchen and did the dishes.

S: Ah good, yes.

M: There was always a continuing battle over the dishes.

S: Even in those days?

M: Yes, but in those days I had the upper hand. I wasn't [S laughs] challenged except this one evening.

S: I see, unlike later.

M: Yes. Krishnaji was quite pleased with that. [Laughs.]

Krishnaji also asked me what I thought neurosis was.

I said that I thought, in part, that it was a very defective perception of reality. "The persistent pursuit of impossible aims," said I.

He asked me if I thought psychoanalysis did any good.

I replied that I did. Of course, he doesn't remember all that I have told him about my doing psychoanalysis.

I said, "Yes, but not on the level" of which he was talking. "It seeks to adjust people to the environment."

He then said, "But the society is neurotic. Thinking creates neurosis," he said. And laughed at what he thought most people would think [S laughs] if he said that.

[Chuckles.] Then he asked, "So, how does one act without thought? You must see that thought creates conflict, which is neurosis."

He was full of energy through all this, delighted that the rain had stopped his hay fever.

We watched the turbulent gray river pouring down the mountains. That's what it says here in my diary.

S: So Krishnaji was suffering from hay fever in those days?

M: Yes! All that hay! You know the machines that toss the hay?

S: Yes, yes, of course.

M: I remember one trip, somehow Krishnaji and Alain were both in the back-seat, I don't know why, and they were both perishing with hay fever, streaming noses. And I was sitting in the front, driving, just entranced with the lovely smell of new mown hay! [Both laugh.]

S: So, Krishnaji didn't have his little pink pills in those days?

M: No, that comes much later.

S: Oh boy.

M: Mm. Ohhh. [Pause.] Here is…[pause]. I must skip along in this because again we're getting so out of sync.

S: It doesn't make any difference.

M: He used to tell us his stories, but you know his stories about the student of a guru who went off and studied for fifteen years with another guru, and then came back to the first guru and said he'd learned marvelous things, so the first guru said, "Show me a little." The student said he could walk on the water.

S: Oh yes. [chuckles]

M: Yes [chuckles]. So the student showed the first guru, who said, "You took fifteen years to do that? If you'd told me, I could have showed you there was a ferry!"

S: Yes, yes! [Laughs.]

M: [laughs] Then there was the Lord Vishnu one I won't repeat all those stories because they're well documented.

S: Yes.

M: Anyway, back to the period we're discussing: Desikachar gave yoga lessons every morning to Krishnamurti.

S: Where was Desikachar staying?

M: Hm, where was he staying? I guess in another room in Les Caprices.

S: And Vanda wasn't there?

M: She doesn't come until July. We're still in June.

S: Ah, yes.

M: [laughs] In return for yoga lessons, Krishnaji was giving Desikachar meticulous lessons in western table manners! [S laughs.] Alain and I learned a thing or two about western table manners as it went along! [Both laugh.] Oh, goodness!

Now here's a question that appeared on the way to Geneva; Krishnaji asked, "What would make a man change, a man like Iyengar, who is angry and bitter at Desikachar's giving lessons here." [She seems to be reading now.] "As long as he is taking a stand, there is no change."

At this point, Alain and I ask if he hadn't taken a stand on things like not killing or eating meat?

He replied, "It isn't a stand. I don't kill anyone. I've never eaten meat, but it's a position. I just don't." [S chuckles.]

It seemed a subtle and important difference between just not doing something, and having a plan, ideal pattern of action. It was not a principle.

"As long as he takes a stand," this refers to Iyengar, "he will never change. There is no small, gradual change. That is no change at all. Only the awareness that a total revolution is necessary, in an instant, will change a man."

Another day, in the car, he asked, "What is love? Not all the exchange between most people. For love there must be meditation, there must be no memory."

And then he said, "Love is innocence, just don't answer it."

At one point he asked me if I would like to be twenty-five again. [C*huckles.*] Not to go back to when I was twenty-five but be that now, having had all the rest of my life.

I replied, "In that case, yes!" [Both laugh.]

"I thought so," he said! [More laughs.] Oh dear.

Later he admonished us about food and the good or bad of taking vitamins. He was in a wheel of energy and kept coming back from his room to tell us more. He told me that I must make the body very sensitive by learning what foods were best for me. [Chuckles.]

S: Was Krishnaji taking vitamins in those days also?

M: No, no. He wasn't. [Chuckles.] He was against them then.

On another drive he was talking about relationship, and he said, "I've always done what I wanted. One reason Rajagopal used to get upset was that, if I wanted to give something away, I gave it."

He spoke of seeing things instantly.

And he asked why I hadn't seen, in the past, both death and pleasure and stepped out of it?

I said that I had.

He replied, "No, no Madame, why didn't you see it then?" [Long pause.]

S: Was he beginning to say a lot of negative things about Rajagopal?

M: Oh, yes.

S: Why don't you talk about that?

M: Oh, that's such a big subject. I think I did talk in the last discussion about the discussion group, and how Krishnaji didn't have the right to let us hear the tape, and all that.

S: Yes, yes, you did.

M: I was beginning to gather more and more that things were not well between them. He didn't talk too much then, but he did later on, when he went to the United States, and went to Ojai. Then everything came out.

S: But, at this point, he wasn't talking a lot about Rajagopal?

M: Not much, but I mean he'd make occasional remarks like the one I just mentioned.

S: Obviously, Alain must have had some contact with Rajagopal.

M: Well, Alain had contact with Rajagopal when we went to Ojai with Krishnaji, which is this year, '66.

S: So, not before?

M: No, he never met him.

S: Oh, I see.

M: So, for the moment, we're still in Switzerland. When people started coming for the talks and we used to go on walks, he said, "I don't dare look to left or right" because people would be looking at him and want to catch his eye.

He said, "Do you mind if we walk fast?" [S chuckles.]

Oh, I had a dream at that point. [Chuckles.] It was the most vivid dream I've ever had in my life, and it's pertinent to this time in my life. I knew immediately what it meant. So, the dream…I must have told you this.

S: Yes, you have, but tell it anyway for the tape.

M: Well, the dream was that I'm standing on the bank of a river. The river is very fast, and turbulent; a fast moving river. If I jump in, I may drown, but I feel I must jump in. In the middle of the river was a tall, majestic Sequoia; a redwood tree; a splendid towering tree. I knew that if I jumped in the river that I had to be willing to drown. Perhaps I wouldn't, perhaps I'd be washed against the tree and that would save me. So, I jumped, and that's what happened. The moment I woke up, I knew exactly what it was because the Saanen River is gray, and can be turbulent…

S: Yes.

M: …and though the Saanen River is a little river, the river in my dream was vast. The grey river represents change to me. What the dream was saying to me was: You've got to be willing to let go and die to yourself, as it were, and change. Of course, the tree is obviously Krishnaji.

[Tape stops, then starts again.]

S: Did you ever describe this dream to Krishnaji?

M: Well I did, sometime later. We were on a walk along the river, and he smiled and said it was a symbolic dream.

I said, "Yes, it could be interpreted in various ways, either being saved or perhaps destroyed."

"Oh no," he said, and asked how a psychiatrist would look at those things. I described the process. "Oh, that takes forever," he said. [Both chuckle.]

Also we had a conversation about masks; that we all wear masks, and would it be possible to live with no masks, no defenses, directly in contact, and have no objectives?

Well, now we come to Vanda arriving from Rome.

S: Is your contact with Krishnaji different from Alain's? Do you seem to have more discussion with Krishnaji than Alain?

M: Yes. Well, Alain was in a lot of these discussions, but I think I've always mentioned when he was there. I said, "we said" or "he said to us."

S: Yes, yes.

M: So, a lot of these discussions were with both of us.

S: Yes.

M: But, the same sort of discussion went on when I was walking with him alone, or driving with him alone.

S: Yes, I see. But does there seem to be a difference emerging; that perhaps you're closer to Krishnaji, or you're talking more deeply with him, or you seem to have a different rapport with him?

M: Well, of course, I don't know how…

S: Did you begin to feel that he had more of a rapport with you than he had with Alain?

M: I don't know. I don't know how Krishnaji was when he was alone with Alain, how he talked. I think he probably talked the same way.

S: Yes, but we can sometimes feel when we're in relationship with someone…we know our relationship with that person is different from that person's relationship with someone else.

M: Well, I think yes, I think probably yes.

S: Was it a little hurtful to Alain?

M: I think later on it was. I don't think it was at this point. Yes. I think that it was eventually.

S: Okay, we're near the end of the tape. When we begin the next discussion we'll begin with the time that Vanda arrives, and Tannegg is opened.

Is there anything else to put in before that?

M: [laughs] Yes! Just before Vanda arrives, at lunch, there was a teasing battle on the subject of marriage with Desikachar as the audience. Krishnaji and Alain were attacking it and I was taking the defense.

I said that Alain put it along-side leprosy [both laugh] and that K's tone when speaking of marriage to the children at Rishi Valley was enough to put a terror into them. [More laughing.] He would make a remark and then look sideways to see how much of a rise he'd got out of me! [S laughs.] We finally agreed that the whole system needed revising, and I suggested that he re-invent its meaning. [Both laugh.]

That afternoon Vanda arrived from Rome at Chalet Tannegg, and came down for supper with us. It was lovely to see her. She met Desikachar for the first time. Then the next day Krishnaji and Alain both moved up to Tannegg. Krishnaji thanked me for everything and said if he and Signora, as he called her, quarreled could he come back and stay with me? [Both chuckle.] I moved most of their things up to the Chalet, and as I left Vanda said, "You must come for all lunches and suppers," very sweetly.

Krishnaji walked me to my car, kissed my hand very lightly and thanked me again.

S: How nice.

M: Yes.

S: Okay, we should probably end there.

M: I'll try and do my homework before next time. Give me more warning.

S: [laughs] Okay.

M: We seem to never get very far. At this rate we won't live long enough to…

[Tape cuts out.]

Issue 5: July 7, 1966 to October 20, 1966

Only three and a half months are covered in the twenty-eight pages of this issue, because Mary is reading her diaries as she speaks—sometimes reading out loud, and sometimes paraphrasing. So we see much more of the minutia of her daily life with Krishnaji.

However, these few months are critical, and changes occur that alter the rest of Krishnaji's life. For the first time, Krishnaji's speaking schedule is not being arranged by Rajagopal or people appointed by Rajagopal. Krishnaji returns to America for the first time since 1960. And Krishnaji stays with Mary in California for the first time, as he would continue to stay with Mary when he was in the U.S. for the rest of his life.

This period also sees the first moves toward having a Krishnamurti School someplace in Europe, and so we see the very beginnings of what would become the Brockwood Park Krishnamurti Educational Centre.

In this period, also, the break with Rajagopal begins. This break, which had been so long in the making, evolves for the next several years, and positively affects every aspect of Krishnaji's life; and we see in this issue how easily it could have been avoided. In this period, Mary and Alain first come to realize just how terrible things have been for Krishnaji with the Rajagopals, and as we see it become clear in Mary's eyes, it becomes clear in ours.

Scott: We pick up our story in July of 1966.

Mary: Alright. Krishnaji had been staying at Les Caprices, in a little studio flat next to the one that I always had. He took his meals, et cetera, with me and Alain in the sitting room of my flat. This continued until Vanda arrived in Gstaad from Italy, and, of course, she had the ground floor in Chalet Tannegg again. Krishnaji moved up there on July seventh. Thereafter, I was very kindly invited to many meals by Vanda, so I was frequently up and down the hill between the two places. The day after Krishnaji went up there, I lunched with all of them and also present was Radha Rajagopal Sloss[1] with her husband and two youngish children, quite attractive children. I'd seen her before in Ojai.

S: How did she strike you?

M: Well, she didn't make any special impression. She had a kind of proprietary air toward Krishnaji as though he sort of belonged to her as a child, a sort of hangover from that.

S: That's really what I was asking about.

M: Yes. She both played up to him and treated him a little as though he was old and bumbling. There was much chatter at the table. The children were very nicely behaved, nice children.

S: How old would they have been? You said they were youngish.

M: I would imagine the girl was older. Tinka, she was called in those days. She was probably twelve or thirteen, something like that. I think the boy was a year or two younger, but I couldn't swear to it. I'm afraid I have a rather dim memory of them.

On the tenth, Krishnaji began his talks and, as usual, the tent was full.

S: Can I just come back to something for a minute?

M: Yes.

S: How did Krishnaji treat her?

M: He was very sweet with her and the children. You know, just normal. Nothing special. I really don't remember too much. I remember that there was quite a lot of talk at the table, and he said something about, "How these Americans do get on," which was an ironic remark [chuckles] considering the two Americans in question, Radha and me. We both sort of made chatter at the lunch table.

Let me read what happened next.

Ah, yes. Right after the second talk, Alain and I went to Divonne to hear Richter[2]. I remember it especially because Richter had appeared, at least in my awareness, the previous winter when he came to Los Angeles. I'd read a review of his playing in, I guess, the New York Times, which said this extraordinary Soviet pianist has come to the west, and gave such a review as I'd never read. By coincidence, when I was reading the review, I thought I recognized the name from material I used to get of people who were playing in Los Angeles. So, I went to hear him, and it just blew me through the ceiling. It was so wonderful.

So, I thought that Alain being a musician and a pianist to boot would be interested. I told him about this and, well, he wasn't patronizing, but it was obvious that he was thinking that I was an amateur and he was a pro.

S: Yes, yes.

M: But I insisted, saying that he had to hear this man. So, when I heard he was going to play in Divonne, which is, as you know, right outside Geneva, I got tickets through the concierge at the Hotel du Rhône, where we always stayed.

Well, it was a big success. We had seats quite close to the stage, and Richter no sooner started playing, then I glanced at Alain, who rolled his eyes [laughs]. He saw immediately what it was.

S: How nice.

M: I think we spent the night in Divonne. I remember that Alain ran into Richter in the hotel hall and spoke to him in French. I don't know whether Richter spoke French, but he understood it. Alain said, "Monsieur, vous etes le seul pianiste," and Richter sort of acknowledged that. [S laughs.] Anyway, it was a very successful outing.

Then we came back the next morning, in time to hear Krishnaji give his third talk. After the talk, Krishnaji brought his car down to Caprices because he wanted to keep it in the garage. With my rent, I had garage rights.

S: Ah ha.

M: And so we put it in Caprices.

S: And he didn't have garage rights at Tannegg?

M: Well, there was some confusion over the garage rights.

S: Did Vanda drive him down to the talks?

M: Yes.

S: And what car did she have?

M: She had a Lancia that she'd had for years, and the last time I saw it, which was in 1986, it had died, but it was sitting on her lawn [both laugh] in Italy. She kept it like a monument! For all I know it's still there!

But it was a very splendid Lancia, and she drove very fast and enjoyed driving.

S: Where would she park at Tannegg?

M: Well, there was a two-car garage.

S: Alright. I'd like to ask a little about some of what occurred just before the talks and then just after the talks, because it changed over the years. So, people would come up and shake his hand or say hello?

M: Well, a few, yes.

S: Before the talk?

M: No, after the talk. Never before. No.

He would, as you may remember, come to the tent at the very last moment…

S: Yes.

M: …and walk right in…

S: Yes, I remember it well.

M: …and start talking.

S: Or just want to be quiet.

M: Yes, be quiet, but he didn't want to talk to anybody.

S: Yes.

M: He liked to get there, at least when I was taking him, in time to walk right in. He didn't want to hang around. He would stand around afterward, and people would come up and greet him.

Also, Alain, again, arranged young people's meetings. They were usually held at Tannegg. Filled the living room with young people, and I suppose they were taped. He was taping everything because he was responsible for the Nagra.

Where are those tapes?

S: I'm not sure we know that.

M: They should be in Ojai because they would have gone to Rajagopal.

S: Rajagopal. Yes, but that could mean they're in the Huntington[3].

M: Yes, they could be. I've seen a lot of tapes of Krishnaji there with Alain's handwriting on them.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, there was also yoga going on with Desikachar, for both Krishnaji and me.

And also, Krishnaji used to ask me to come driving with him in his Mercedes.

At one point, early on, in the middle of July, Krishnaji said that he was uneasy about staying with Mrs. Pinter in New York. He was going to speak there at The New School. Krishnaji knew that she was now old and not too well, and he felt that his staying there would be an imposition and difficult for her. Mr. Pinter had died since the last time he was there. As I had said I would find a place for Alain and me to stay in New York, Krishnaji wondered if he could stay wherever Alain was staying. So, I immediately got in touch with my brother, and asked if I could rent his flat. He was between [chuckles] marriages at that point, and alone in his flat. I asked him if I could I rent it for the time we'd be in New York. My brother could stay in our father's flat in The Ritz Tower. My father had a little flat which Krishnaji and I later used in another year. But, with three of us, I needed a bigger flat than was my father's.

S: Mm, hm.

M: My brother[4] immediately cabled me and said, "Yes, of course." So, that was arranged.

At about this time I remember Mrs. Lindbergh came to lunch.

S: Ah, yes.

M: She was a friend of Vanda's and had met Krishnaji before. Of course, she had written something for one of Krishnaji's books. Was it an introduction?

S: This is Charles Lindbergh[5]'s wife?

M: Yes, Anne Lindbergh.

S: Mm. Did she write an introduction to one of Krishnaji's books?

M: Yes. I think so, or something about it. She admired him very much.

S: How long had she known Krishnaji?

M: I don't really know. I think she met him through Vanda. The Lindberghs had a summer house in Les Avants, I think.

S: In Switzerland?

M: Yes. So, she drove up for lunch. She was a very nice person.

On the twenty-second, there was another ninety young people for a discussion.

S: Ninety in that house?!

M: Ninety, yes. It was kind of crowded! [Both laugh.]

S: That's an understatement!

Where did Alain find them all?

M: Oh, he went sort of trolling through the audience.

He had a great rapport with young people. He loved young people, and he would talk to them, and laugh with them, and they liked him. He was very good with young people. It was Alain's doing that brought all the young people to Krishnaji.

S: Yes, I know.

M: That was a really good thing that he did.

Instead of us old ladies doddering in the front rows, tides of young people came. Of course, it was also the era when young people were wandering around Europe, with packs on their backs, and this was a place to go at that point, a hippie stop. [Chuckles.]

What else did we do? We went down to Evian to pick up Lobb shoes for Krishnaji and Alain. This was so we wouldn't have to pay the customs duty in Switzerland on them! [Both laugh.] So we would drive to Evian and go to the post office where they had been sent, they would be sent…

S:…post restant!

M: …post restant, yes.

And there would be the shoes! Beautiful, gleaming Lobb shoes. [S laughs.] From there we went on to Dr. Pierre Schmidt in Geneva. Dr Pierre Schmidt was the dean of homeopaths, according to Alain.

He was the homeopath that had Krishnaji taking steam baths. I fiddled around while they did that [chuckles]. Then we came back the other way, through Lausanne, so we made a circle of the lake.

S: How nice.

M: We often used to have lunch at a place called La Grappe D'Or, which had very good food.

S: La Grappe D'Or, where is that?

M: Well I could drive you there, but I don't know how to tell you. You know how part of Lausanne is on a hill?

S: Yes.

M: And it kind of goes down the hill a little bit. It's there, about a block off the road that goes through town. Then we'd go back to Tannegg for supper.

On the twenty-eighth, there was the ninth Saanen talk. Lots of talks in those days.

And the next day there was the third young people's discussion at Tannegg. I was invited to attend and stay for lunch afterward.

S: So the young people's talks were in the morning?

M: Yes, this was a non-talk day.

S: So that meant that Krishnaji was talking every other day.

M: Yes. It was busy days. He had a bit of bronchitis but, as usual, he surmounted the bronchitis.

On the thirty-first was the tenth and last Saanen talk of that year.

Oh, yes, it says here I did some typing up at Tannegg.

S: How did you get a typewriter?

M: I always traveled with a little Hermes typewriter.

On August third, the public discussions began. Oh, that was also the day I got the cable from my brother saying that the flat in New York was ours. I went up that evening and told Krishnaji it was all set.

S: That must have pleased him.

M: Yes, he was pleased.

On the fourth there was the second public discussion—there was one every day at that time. But of more significance was the meeting at Tannegg with all the people who wanted to start a Krishnamurti school. The room was full. There must have been fifty people, at least, with many rather emotional ladies who were thrilled with the thought of starting a Krishnaji school. Krishnaji just listened, and then asked a couple of questions.

S: So he didn't call that meeting?

M: No, they had been talking about wanting to do it, and he heard of it.

S: Who were the chief instigators?

M: I don't know.

We also discussed that day about having a permanent hall at Tannegg instead of a tent. We went rather far with that, but in the end nothing came of it. It was too expensive. You see, by this time we owned the land. So, instead of paying an awful lot of money for a tent every year, we thought of putting up a permanent building, but it turned out to be far too expensive! [Chuckles.]

On the next day, after the third public discussion, Krishnaji sent for me. We went outside to a private place where we could sit and talk, and he discussed his and Alain's staying with me in New York and in Paris the following spring. He wanted to talk to me because he was worried that I might be spending too much money. He talked to me very seriously about all that, as he was a bit worried. "Are you going into capital, Madame?" he would ask, and I would assure him it was alright. [Both laugh.] He kept coming back to that subject. When we came back to Tannegg, the Bohms were there, and there followed a long talk with Krishnaji, the Bohms, Vanda, and me.

On the seventh of August, Krishnaji called a meeting at the Biascoecheas'. Krishnaji picked out about fifteen people who'd been at the first meeting about starting a school. He decided the rest were not serious. He said I was to be part of it. I don't know why, having nothing to do with education. But, he wanted to involve me in it, apparently. Anyway, he said to everyone, "Are you all serious?" This was the time when he really inquired into it.

There was the question of what country the school should be in. He wanted it to be an international school, and he wanted, at that point, the teaching to be in both English and French. The possible countries were France, Switzerland, England, and Holland. There was much talk back and forth. There were people from all those places. That was when he said, at the end of it, "Well, go and find out"—someone from each country was to go and find out "everything to do with what it takes to establish a school in your country, and come back here next summer, and we'll talk about it some more." So, he acted rather quickly on all that.

S: Who was going to find out about Holland? Who was going to find out about France?

M: Anneke was finding about Holland.

S: So she must have been in that meeting?

M: She was at that meeting. Nadia Kossiakof was finding out about France. I don't know who was doing Switzerland. And Dorothy was finding out about England.

Anyway, that was a decisive meeting. I remember driving him and Alain up the hill after it, and that was when Krishnaji gave me a definite "yes" that he would stay with me in New York, and for Paris the next year. We could go ahead with a plan for that. So that was settled.

S: Was Alain making the arrangements for the talks in New York?

M: Oh yes, yes.

S: Was he also arranging the talks in Paris?

M: No, the French committee did all that, but Alain was instrumental. I think, later this year, Alain went to Paris to look at what Marcelle and Gisela Elmenhorst, the two Paris people, had arranged.

The next day, things seemed to be moving fast. In the morning was the sixth discussion, and in the afternoon, there was a third meeting about the European school. I was up at Tannegg for a yoga lesson, and Krishnaji called me in to ask me to discuss where we'd stay in Holland the next year. So, my role in housing was growing daily [laughs]. He said to talk to Anneke, so I asked her for supper that night. I explained to her what Krishnaji had been doing up till then, and the difference in the Paris plans. She offered to find a place for all of us for the next spring—Anneke, Alain, me, and, of course, Krishnaji.

S: Can I come back to your yoga lessons with Desikachar? Now, you must have talked with Krishnaji quite a bit about the difference between Desikachar and Iyengar.

M: Oh yes, yes. Well, Krishnaji had already wanted Desikachar. The break with Iyengar had been made.

S: I know.

M: At one point, there was a bit of a situation because Iyengar came to Gstaad to do yoga with Menuhin[6] even though he wasn't doing it with Krishnaji. Heretofore, Iyengar had taught Krishnaji, and he used to be put up by a lady in the lower flat in Tannegg. He used to give his lessons there. The first yoga lessons I took were in that downstairs flat.

S: Uh, ha. You see, all this is information we didn't winkle out of you before.

M: Well, it's not exactly deathless historical lore! But anyway. [Laughs.]

S: No, but I see, I see. So then, this year that we're now discussing, Desikachar was teaching yoga to you and Krishnaji upstairs, and Iyengar was teaching others downstairs! [Laughs.]

M: Yes, except for Menuhin, to whom Iyengar would go. So, there was rather a coolness, shall we say, between the lower floor and the middle floor. Except for Vanda, who always was very loyal to Iyengar because she really got her knowledge of yoga from Iyengar. She got on with him and liked him.

S: Did you meet Menuhin at that time?

M: I met Menuhin the year before when I was taken by Iris Tree to call on Mrs. Menuhin. Did I talk about that in our last discussion?

S: No, you didn't.

M: Well, Iris was a friend of theirs and mine, and Iris took me there to call on Mrs. Menuhin, and I remember [laughs] it was quite fascinating. First of all, they were all practicing for concerts in the rest of the house, so we sat in, I think, the dining room. Mrs. Menuhin carried on a flowing conversation mostly with Iris, and wrote letters at the same time! [Laughs.] I found the logistics of it interesting, because she had very large handwriting, and she was writing on little, bright, pretty blue note paper. This enabled letters to go off to friends all over that didn't take long to write because the writing was so big and the page was so small. [S laughs.] I thought that was very clever of her! [M chuckles.]

S: Did it seem impolite to have a conversation and write letters at the same time?

M: No, not a bit! She just went on talking and large letters grew on the paper. [Laughs.]

S: Extraordinary.

M: So, I met him at the same time. We just shook hands.

S: So he hadn't come over to see Krishnaji at that point?

M: Oh no, he didn't, there was again a frost there.

Krishnaji had made probably one of those statements that genius and talent aren't really creative.

S: Yes.

M: They got it second-hand [laughs], but the Menuhins all took offense. I don't know because I wasn't there, but I think it was the sister Hepsibar and her husband who used to go the talks, and they must have heard him say this and reported it.

S: Didn't Menuhin go to the talks?

M: Not in my time. He had gone before.

S: Right. I remember, but, of course, my memory can be wrong on this, but I seem to remember Krishnaji telling me that it was actually in a conversation Krishnaji had with Menuhin that this occurred.

M: Well, maybe it was.

S: The conversation was about creativity and art and talent, and Krishnaji was saying things that Menuhin just could not stomach.

M: That may be true.

I didn't hear this from Krishnaji, so whoever told me may have told me wrongly.

S: I had that from Krishnaji.

I'm sure that's where I got it from. And as Krishnaji told it to me, he had that kind of chuckle he had when he was recounting saying something that was unpopular.

If I can try to recreate some history here: if Huxley died in '63, and Menuhin knew him well enough to be interviewed for that television program, then it must have been before 1963 that Menuhin first had contact with Krishnaji.

M: Well, remember that Krishnaji didn't start talking in Saanen till what? '61 was it?

S: I think so. But Menuhin could have met him in California before that.

M: No, I don't think so.

S: Well where, where did he know Huxley from? England?

M: No, he knew Huxley from California through Gerald Heard[7].

S: Could he have known Krishnaji then, too?

M: I don't know, but remember Vanda was very musical. Her father started the Maggio Musicale in Florence. She knew all the leading musicians of her time.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Casals and…

S: Stravinsky.

M: Toscanini, and all these people. And she would have known Menuhin, so I imagine that Krishnaji met him through Vanda, but I don't know.

So anyway, we're on the ninth, when Krishnaji had the seventh and final public discussion. In the afternoon Krishnaji, sent for me to tell me that he'd told Bonito de Vidas of the Paris plans, and his asking me to rent a place. I don't know what de Vidas said, but de Vidas liked to control everything, so, apparently he didn't like the idea much, but I don't know. [Both laugh.] At the same time Krishnaji was telling me this, he again asked me if I was I spending capital. Again I said, "No" and not to worry about it. [Laughs.]

The next day there was a meeting with Alain, and Krishnaji, and Anneke about the Amsterdam plans. Again he called me back for a talk, and had Alain present. He wanted me to be sure that I wouldn't regret what I was doing [chuckles]. He was concerned, and I gave complete assurance. He wanted once more to ask me, and I guess what I said satisfied him.

Then what? Alain wanted to stay at Caprices the next year, instead of at Tannegg. So, that was arranged.

Now that the talks were over, Alain and I went to Paris to look at different parts of the city to see where would be a good place to rent next year. While there, we met with Marcelle and Gisela.

S: May I just stop you here and go back for a minute to ask about something?

I know how concerned Krishnaji was with people not spending their capital on him. Often, when people made a donation, he questioned them on this.

M: Yes. He had some notion of what capital was as opposed to income. I don't know where he got that! [Both laugh.] He was always worried about people's capital.

S: Well, now did you ever have any sense that he'd had bad experiences with, you know, people having donated some of their capital and then regretting it later on?

M: Possibly, but I don't know that.

S: He didn't mention any of that to you.

M: No, no.

S: I just thought I'd ask, because I know that that was always a concern of his.

M: Yes.

Anyway, Alain and I went to Paris, and looked at different localities, but we wanted to be near the Bois[8]. In fact, from the house we eventually got, we could walk right into the Bois, the south end of the Bois. It was near Longchamp, and then the bottom of the Bois was about two or three blocks from the house we had.

S: How nice.

M: Onze[9] Rue de Verdun. It was a nice house, sort of.

And then we flew to London. The amount of traveling we did in those days that felt like nothing; it was like going from here to the post office, [S laughs]—we flew to London because Alain wanted to get British citizenship, so we [laughs] flew to London. And, what did we do there? [Pauses to read her diaries.] We went to a Hitchcock movie, I remember. [Both chuckle.] And we had lunch with Fleur Cowles[10] at Claridge's.

We were in England for only a few days, but we found time to drive down to Oxford to look around. And we saw the Digbys.

S: Mm. In London?

M: Yes, in London at their town house.

S: I remember their town house.

M: We also saw the Frys at their town house. And then we flew back to Paris and picked up my Jaguar, which had been in the Jaguar agency being, I don't know, serviced in some way. And we drove to…

S: Hold on here, just to be clear. Krishnaji stayed at Tannegg, and you and Alain drove to Paris.

M: To look over the possible rental areas. Then we flew to London for a few days, and during that time the Jaguar stayed in Paris to be serviced, then we flew back, picked it up, and drove down to Switzerland through Chalon-sur-Soâne.

S: Yes, I know it well.

M: And what was the name of that person…there's a sign there that this is the home of Nicéphore Niépce, that's it. He supposedly invented the camera. [S laughs.] Funny name stuck in my head! I don't know why. We spent the night at Chalon-sur-Soâne.

The next day we drove on all those little tiny roads that we like, through lovely country. We got back to Lausanne in time for lunch at the [chuckles] Grappe D'Or, and were back at Tannegg by four o'clock.

By now we're at the end of August, and Krishnaji talked to Alain and me about his possibly speaking at Harvard after the New York talks, or around then. So we talked about that.

S: Who had arranged that?

M: Alain had arranged that. It seemed a good idea.

I took my car to Thun to leave it there for the winter, and came back by train and said goodbye to all of them, Vanda, Krishnaji, Alain.

The next day I went by train to Geneva and flew to New York, and then I flew to California and my house in Malibu. While I was there, Rajagopal telephoned me and asked me if I would drive Krishnaji when he came to Ojai for the talks, because he'd heard that I had been driving him around.

I said, "Well, yes, of course if you want." I really had intended to stay out of things. I thought Krishnaji would be back in his own home territory and I would stay out of things. I would, of course, go to the talks, but I wouldn't be involved in all the personal things as I had been in Europe. But Rajagopal wanted me to be the driver, and he said that if I would do that, would I like to stay in his old flat, which is the upstairs flat of the house next to Pine Cottage. The one you have stayed in.

S: Many times.

M: So I said, "Well, yes, thank you very much." So, that was arranged.

S: And Krishnaji would stay in Pine Cottage?

M: Yes, he would stay in Pine Cottage. And Alain would stay in the apartment next to Pine Cottage, the one that we eventually destroyed. Hideous place! I'll get to that when we get there.

Let's see, what happened next. Well anyway, I went to see my mother but that doesn't matter. And then on the fourteenth of September I flew to New York and…

S: Where was your mother?

M: Martha's Vineyard.

S: Oh, so, you'd gone to Martha's Vineyard and then back to California?

M: No, no. I went to California for a couple of weeks. And then I went back east to the Vineyard to see my mother, and then flew down to New York and moved into Bud's apartment. He had moved out and went to Father's apartment. I was getting the apartment ready, and then on the twentieth, my brother and I went and met Krishnaji and Alain at the airport.

All their luggage had been lost!

S: Oh dear!

M: [laughs] But we came back to the apartment, and Bud lent them pajamas and whatever else was needed.

Luckily, the next morning, September twenty-first, TWA deposited the bags in the front hall [S laughs] to everyone's great relief! [Laughs.]

S: Of course.

Now, just for the sake of history, what was Bud's address?

M: 1115 Fifth Avenue. That's on the corner of 93rd Street and 5th.

S: Oh, way up on 93rd.

M: Yes. Which is convenient because we could easily walk in the park around the reservoir every day.

M: So, as I said, they arrived on the twentieth. Then there was, as usual, a dentist appointment. They always were having their teeth fixed. So I arranged all that in New York.

S: But this must have been a new dentist for them?

M: Yes, he was recommended by the California one.

And then there was the usual round of people being asked for lunch. We also went to the movies. Krishnaji was interviewed by the New Yorker to do a profile of him, but it was never printed for some reason.

S: Hm.

M: It's a pity.

S: You said you had people over for lunch. Would you do the cooking for lunch? Or would you have lunch brought in?

M: No, my brother's Vietnamese chef did the cooking! He was trained in Paris. Jaap was his name. He was a good cook! So it was lovely to have meals in, and he didn't mind vegetarianism.

S: Great. Do you remember who came for lunch?

M: Some, yes! I remember Yo de Manziarly suddenly surfaced. She also went to the movies with us a number of times.

And who else? Oh, Mrs. Margot Wilkie [chuckles]. She lives at the Vineyard, and is a great friend of Rosalind Rajagopal's. I asked her for lunch because I knew her from the Vineyard, or rather she knew Mother more than me. And she brought a Nancy Wilson Ross. Nancy Wilson Ross was a woman of that slightly society type, but she also wrote a book on Eastern religions.

And Blitz came for lunch. Gérard Blitz was there.

S: Tell me why you made those noises? The "mm, hm.'

M: Well, because after Margot Wilkie came to lunch, she told Rosalind something nasty about me, which, of course, got back to me. [Laughs.]

Also, my mother and stepfather came down, and came for lunch once.

S: Mmm. How did they respond to Krishnaji?

M: He was charming with them and they were, you know, very polite and rather bewildered back. They also went to one talk, at the New School and [laughs] I don't know what they got out of it! Nothing, probably.

But they'd seen him. You know, it was the seeing of what he's like that mattered to them. I didn't have much doings with them, so I don't know.

S: Yes.

M: At this time Alain went up to Boston to arrange the Harvard business, and returned. Then Krishnaji began speaking at the New School. Now, The New School is way downtown. I don't if you know it, it's down near Washington Square.

S: Oh, near NYU!

M: It's near there, very near NYU, but it's separate.

M: We went to see Mrs. Pinter, and sure enough, she couldn't have coped with Krishnaji.

And she had an awful, dreadful apartment! I don't mean disrespect, but it was gloomy. She was, by then, a very old lady and very lame and it would have been much too difficult for her, and depressing for Krishnaji to stay there. But she very nicely sent a car for him each day to take him to the talks. So, I didn't have to arrange that.

Now, comes the funny meeting [chuckles]…At one of the talks we got a message that Allen Ginsberg[11] had been there and would like to talk to him. So that was arranged, and, lo and behold, on the twenty-ninth Allen Ginsberg appeared, with Timothy Leary[12] in tow! [S laughs hard, M chuckles.] And also, a friend of his, and I suppose this is going to be indiscreet, but I'll go ahead and tell you for the purposes of humor.

S: Of course.

M: I guess I was sort of naïve in those days. Names, you know, you don't hear names, so I didn't know who his friend was. But I thought, "How could any woman allow herself to be that unattractive?" Dirty jeans and long ponytail down the back. Just plain unattractive. Eventually it dawned on me it was not a woman at all; it was a man! [Both laugh heartily.] But I was, um…

S: [laughs] Yes, well, you weren't a hippie, so you couldn't know, not in '66.

M: No, no. I was new to that. It wasn't commonplace for a sort of scrawny young man to have long hair down the back, tied back. It was unusual, if you can remember that far back in history.

S: Yes, yes. I can, unfortunately.

M: But anyway, the young man never spoke. Ginsberg began all the talk, and I think he was against Krishnaji saying that drugs were not a [chuckles] good thing. And he went on about LSD, I think it was, and a religious experience or something. At one point Krishnaji said to Ginsberg, "You know what the symbol of the cross is." And with that he made the gesture, with his hand of like crossing yourself with vertical stroke, and then horizontal stroke. Then he said that it stood for the negation of the ego.

And with that Leary sprang to his feet, [chuckles], silenced Ginsberg who was going to reply, threw his hands out, and said, "Yes, every night!"

It turned out that Leary was giving some sort of performances down in Greenwich Village on the stage. And he said, "I stand on the stage, and I throw out my hands, and I pluck the nails out of them and throw them onto the ground!" with a big dramatic gesture, in a loud voice, an enactment of Christ removing the nails from his hands. [Laughs.]

Krishnaji talked very quietly, and said something about Christianity, whereupon Leary sat down and agreed with Krishnaji, absolutely refuting what he'd been saying before.

I mean, he just turned around and agreed with Krishnaji absolutely. There was no discussion. [Both laugh] Really! They finally left.

S: I spent a few hours with Ginsberg in 1970, and I can't even imagine a conversation between Ginsberg and Krishnaji. [Laughs hard.]

M: Well, you can't imagine the one they had! [More laughs.]

S: Yes.

M: So, that was that. Anyway, the talks went on at the New School, and we went to the movies and the dentist. We walked in the park, around the reservoir. Nobody mugged us; they didn't do that in those days. It was quite safe. People were jogging, but there were no muggers.

S: [chuckles] Was it the same kind of routine where Krishnaji would walk in the afternoon?

M: Yes. The same.

The last talk of Krishnaji's at The New School was on October seventh. The next day, Alain brought a lot of young people up to the flat to have a discussion with Krishnaji.

Krishnaji also met Ralph Ingersoll. He used to publish a newspaper called PM, which was way before your time, but it was a very good newspaper, very, very liberal. He had a son, young Ralph, who I think we met in Switzerland before this. I believe he came up to Tannegg. Alain must have met him with the other young people. He came to see us in New York, and then his father and the father's wife. I don't know if she was his mother or step-mother, but they came for lunch. Hughes van der Straten[13] also came for lunch when we were there.

Bud lent me his car, so we went out to the country for lunch one day.

S: What kind of car did he have?

M: He has a very old Rolls-Royce [chuckles].

S: Oh, how wonderful. How old?

M: Ohh, I don't know. Very old.

On the fourteenth Alain and I visited the Stock Exchange with Bud, my brother, because Alain wanted to see it. And Radhika Herzberger came for lunch with her new-born baby. I remember we put it down in the room I stayed in while we had lunch, and Krishnaji was struck by the fact that I paid attention to this little baby. He didn't know that most women behave the same way [S laughs], when a little baby is present. He seemed to think my attention was significant. [Both chuckle.]

It says in my notes that Allen Ginsberg came back to see Krishnaji, but I don't remember the second time.

On the sixteenth of October, we flew to Boston and stayed in a hotel in Cambridge that was close to Harvard. We could walk there.

Krishnaji met Harvard students at something called Lowell House.

S: How did that discussion go?

M: Well, they asked questions, but those kind of dull questions. They hadn't done their homework. It was alright, but nothing special. Then we flew back to New York.

S: You weren't tempted to take Krishnaji to the Vineyard?

M: No! [Laughs.] Heavens no! What a dreadful thought!

S: Oh yes, [laughs] I'd forgotten about the family; I was just thinking of the lovely island!

M: Oh yes. Well, if it'd been Bud[14] that would have been different, but it would have been Mother in those days.

Actually, Krishnaji had already been to the island with Margo Wilkie's mother, many years before. What was her name…Mrs. Loyns, who was an early friend, and I think she lived up island at Seven Gates Farm.

S: Oh, yes, I know where that is.

M: Then on October eighteenth, we flew to Malibu. It was their first time there, and I had the pleasure of driving in the gate with both of them, and cooking supper for them in my own kitchen.

S: How nice.

M: And Filomena was there. It was just lovely.

S: So that was the first time Krishnaji had been to your house in Malibu?

M: Yes. It was the first time he'd been back in California since 1960.

S: Oh that's right, he hadn't been back!

M: He started to give those talks in 1960, but they had to be curtailed because he wasn't well. And I had an interview with him that year.

S: Yes, I remember that.

M: And the reason he hadn't gone back all those years was that it was so disagreeable with Rajagopal. There was awful trouble going on, and this visit in '66 was supposed to reconcile things, or at least be peaceful.

S: Yes. Had Krishnaji talked to you about these problems?

M: Somewhat. I'd caught on the previous summer when I found out that Krishnaji couldn't give permission to listen to an audio-tape, and that only Rajagopal could do that. I thought that was rather odd, but I didn't say anything about it.

S: But you must have found it odd that Krishnaji hadn't gone back to California in all those years. You must have spoken with someone about it, no?

M: Well. No. But I do remember that when Krishnaji arrived in New York, on the very first day, Rajagopal telephoned him. Alain and I were with Krishnaji in his bedroom, which was my brother's, the main bedroom in the place. Alain and I were in the room when the call came, and inside of two minutes Rajagopal was yelling at him on the phone and then hung up on him.

That was my first sense of how things were with Rajagopal, and the welcome back to United States from Rajagopal. So I was aware that it wasn't good between them.

S: Right. So Rajagopal actually didn't do anything for any of those talks on the East Coast?

M: No, he didn't. In fact he was cross because the invitation came directly to Krishnaji, how it came I don't know.

S: From The New School?

M: Yes, from The New School. It came directly to him. And he called me in, it had to be the previous summer, and he asked me if I thought he should accept.

S: You did talk about that?

M: Yes, I know I did because I said that, yes, I thought he should. When he said, "Why?" I said, "Well, all I know about it is that it's a serious and good place, and that um…" oh, what's-his-name oh, "had agreed to be on the board." Uh… religious writer, very serious man. And he died right after he'd agreed to go. Oh dear, this is awful name trouble. It's on the other tape. I know I talked about it.

So Alain then got in communication with them on Krishnaji's behalf, and this was why we came to New York.

S: So this really was then the start of the liberation of Krishnaji from Rajagopal, because suddenly talks were being arranged without Rajagopal.

M: It was really the first time. I mean, the talks in Europe were all arranged by de Vitas and Miss Pratt and Anneke. Rajagopal didn't have anything to do with them. But in the United States, this was the first. And The New School was the first and then, of course, subsequently, at Harvard. Krishnaji went later on this trip, I think, to Brandeis; he spoke at Brandeis. Again arranged directly with Krishnaji via Alain. Alain handled it.

So Rajagopal didn't like it. He wasn't controlling things. So he was rude, hung up on Krishnaji on the telephone.

S: Mm, hm.

Anyway, you had Krishnaji and Alain for dinner for the first time in Malibu.

M: Yes, I cooked them dinner. [Chuckles.] I did all the cooking in those days.

S: And they spent the night there?

M: Oh yes. They were in Malibu all the time, except when they were in Ojai for a talk.

S: I see. I see. So then they were, they were your guests for…

M: They were my house-guests for all that time.

S: So how long was that?

M: Well, until they went back to India that winter.

S: Hm. Oh, I see.

So then that was a real liberation because then Krishnaji didn't have to stay at Pine Cottage under Rajagopal's control.

M: Exactly. He only stayed there when we went up to Ojai for the talks. Well, we'll get to that because…

S: Okay, okay. So what day was it that you all arrived in Malibu?

M: We arrived there on the eighteenth of October.

There were some dental matters, and on the twentieth we drove up to Ojai. I had, in those days, a Ford or something, I don't know what. Rajagopal arranged that Rosalind[15], who was living somewhere else, come to Arya Vihara[16] and supply meals to us. So we went up and drove right to Arya Vihara for lunch. Krishnaji had to show me where it was.

He guided me there through Ojai. And then after lunch we drove around to the other entrance and into Pine Cottage, where Rajagopal was waiting.

S: So Rajagopal wasn't at lunch?

M: No, no, just Rosalind.

S: How was the relationship between Krishnaji and Rosalind?

M: Well, she just said "hello," kind of thing; but it became a nightmare, so much so that I had to stop taking my meals there. I have never heard such nagging in my life. I finally just gave up. I couldn't go to the meals because I was getting an ulcer listening to it all. Krishnaji sat at one end of the table, and she sat at the other, and Alain and I sat in between. She would say things like, "Why aren't you finishing your food? What's the matter? Don't you like it? That's good for you, you should eat that. That's good for you. Finish that." That's the way she talked to him. Like to an errant child.

S: Hmm.

M: And when she would bring the food in, or when we'd sit down she'd say, "Well I suppose you all won't like this but here it is." Chipping, chipping, chipping through the whole meal.

S: Jesus. [Deep sigh.]

M: One night things were so bad with Rajagopal that Krishnaji couldn't sleep. He had about three hours' sleep, and then he had to give a talk in the morning. When we got back after the talk for the lunch, Krishnaji mildly said that he hadn't slept much the night before, and she said, "Oh?! Why?! Why not?!" in a tone of voice as though he was a child and had to be reproved for having done something awful.

She was unbearable! I thought, how could he put up with this dreadful woman?!

S: Hm.

M: That was before I knew how dreadful she'd been all through the years.

S: Yes. Now, let me just go back here. So the dining room in Arya Vihara was where? In the front, where people now eat?

M: Yes, the same. The same as it is now.

S: Okay. Alright. So, Rajagopal was waiting there at Pine Cottage when you arrived.

M: Yes, and I remember vividly the two men. Krishnaji got out of the car and went over to him, and they both sort of embraced and put their arms around each other. Rajagopal was facing me, and I remember that he averted his face from Krishnaji as though he was both moved and repulsed. It was unfriendly, horrid. I also remember that he insisted, before he took Krishnaji and opened up Pine Cottage, that I be shown where I was to stay. So he alone took me up the steps to the little flat above, and when we got there…

S: Leaving Krishnaji standing in the driveway?

M: Yes, with Alain. When we got to the door there was a garter snake by the door, and he said, "I hope you don't think I put it there on purpose." [Chuckles.]

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, he opened it, and I went in. He showed me where things were. That was before we enlarged it. It was just a tiny bedroom with sort of half the sitting room, which you may remember. Anyway, then he went over and unlocked Krishnaji's flat, and then he went and unlocked the other one where Alain was staying. The two places had no interconnecting door; they were separate.

S: Where was the other flat located?

M: Well, Krishnaji's apartment was the way it is now, except that it was slightly enlarged when we redid it. The other one had a separate entrance, but shared a wall. It was what they call here semi-detached.

S: Mm, hm. So, looking at the front of Pine Cottage, at the balcony, what side was it on?

M: It was on the left. And it effectively ruined Pine Cottage and had been done when Krishnaji was off in India, and he was never told about it until he came back. Instead of his little cottage, which he had great feeling for, there was this hideous thing with cork floors and high windows like in a prison that you couldn't see out of. And it had a small kitchenette and a bathroom and a small bedroom and a big office when you went down a step.

It was unbelievably ugly. But Alain was in there. After Rajagopal went away, Krishnaji then showed us around a little, showed us the pepper tree. Krishnaji came with Alain up to where I was, and I remember his coming in the door and just looking around. He said that he hadn't been there in many years since once when he went up there, Rajagopal had chided him for having brought dirt in on his shoes. [S sighs.] So Krishnaji never went back! Rajagopal was one of those neatness obsessives.

S: Mm, hm.

M: You know, everything had to be lined up just so. Clearly an obsessive and he had every symptom of paranoia that I've ever read of in any book. [Both laugh.]

Anyway, Krishnaji looked around the flat. There were some paintings that Rajagopal had done on the wall, little tight sort of paintings. Krishnaji looked at them and sort of nodded and said, "He's very deteriorated." Not about the pictures but from having talked to him.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Then he showed us more of his cottage, including…that was when he showed us the cupboard off the back porch where he said…

S: Tell the whole story, as Krishnaji told it to you then. I've heard it, but it should be on tape.

M: Yes. This story took place many years before, when Krishnaji used to live in that cottage, and Rosalind and Rajagopal stayed in Arya Vihara. One night Krishnaji lost his key to his apartment, so he couldn't get in. It was cold, I guess it was winter. California houses of that era and kind usually have the water heater outside in a kind of closet, so that if it leaks it'll leak not into the house but where it won't do any harm, in this case under the porch and onto the ground. So Krishnaji spent the night standing up next to the water heater, which was just a few inches, just barely room to cram in. I was horrified when he told me this!

I said but why didn't you go and ask him for another key, and he said, "Oh, I couldn't have done that. They would have been too angry."

S: Mm, hm.

M: This was a horrendous revelation to me. It showed just how terribly wrong things were.

S: Mm, hm. So this situation is now all sinking in for you.

M: That really was like a blinding flash.

S: Yes.

M: And the next day, Rajagopal came over and talked to Krishnaji. Alain and I sat in Alain's flat, which, mind you, had no doors leading from one flat to the other. And in no time at all we heard Rajagopal's voice, angry voice coming right through the wall. We couldn't make out what he said, but we heard this angry, raging voice. Pretty soon he left.

S: You and Alain must have been talking about this?

M: Of course. We were appalled, really appalled.

S: And Alain didn't really know about this beforehand?

M: He knew, sort of. He knew there'd been difficulty, but nothing like what it was when we got there.

Alain had also arranged for the talks in Ojai to be filmed through KQED, the public broadcasting station in San Francisco. They'd written to ask if they could record the talks on film. We have those now. Again, it was without Rajagopal's permission, so he didn't like that.

One day I drove Alain to the Oak Grove to look at the sound system. Rajagopal met him there and explained how it all worked. Afterward, Rajagopal wanted to talk to Alain. So they sat in my car and I went and sat in the grove. They talked for two hours. I finally got so cold that I had to go break it up. Later on, Alain told me that Rajagopal had wanted him to report to him about who Krishnaji saw, and when Krishnaji gave interviews to arrange to tape them. It would have been like bugging a confessional, because people often wanted to talk to Krishnaji about very personal things.

S: Of course.

M: But that's what he wanted Alain to do. I was appalled. Can you imagine?

S: Hm. From what I know about the man, yes, I can imagine it very easily.

M: Yes. So, as things got worse and worse, Alain and I came to feel that Pine Cottage was probably [chuckles] bugged. Whenever we talked about anything we wanted to keep private, the three of us went outside so it couldn't be picked up.

S: Mm, hm. That you felt you had to go and talk outside about anything serious is terrible.

M: Yes, yes. I mean it was our suspicion; we never found a bug or looked for one actually, but it was that bad. And we knew that he used to surreptitiously tape things.

S: Wow.

M: Then there was another meeting in the old office, where the vault now is[17]. Krishnaji had sent Rajagoal a letter when we first got to Ojai saying that he, Krishnaji, wanted to be reinstated on the board of KWINC[18]. He also wanted the board enlarged. He wanted me on it, and he wanted accounting of what happens to money coming in. Krishnaji had also stated that KWINC shouldn't be run just by Rajagopal; there should be some other arrangement. So, in this meeting taking place in the old office, Krishnaji said, "You haven't replied to my letter."

Rajagopal replied, "No, why should I? I don't take orders from you."

Krishnaji then said, "You don't understand, Rajagopal. This is a very serious matter, and if you don't reply and we don't come to some arrangement, I shall have to take measures."

At this Rajagopal flew into a rage and said, "What is this? Is this a Brahmin curse? You're cursing me. Well, I'm a Brahmin too, and I curse you more than you could ever curse me." And then he went on and apparently said things that Krishnaji wouldn't tell us about, but he said things against, as Krishnaji put it, "the Other[19]." The minute Rajagopal talked about "the Other," Krishnaji left and went back into his own cottage.

We heard the door slam when Rajagopal left. The lights in the office, which we could see, went out, the door slammed, and then the car drove off. And then we went in to Krishnaji, and he told us what had happened.

S: Had anyone suggested to Krishnaji that he might put these things in a letter?

M: No, he made a list of what he wanted.

S: So this was entirely from Krishnaji?

M: Oh yes. He made the list. And it was all utterly proper.

S: Of course, yes.

M: These are things he should have had.

S: But they are also powerful things.

M: Yes.

S: You see, it shows that Krishnaji really knew all the right things to be asking.

M: Yes. And I think it was the day after that that he called Vigeveno, because Vigeveno was the Vice President of KWINC. Vigeveno came over, and Krishnaji showed him a copy of the letter that he'd given to Rajagopal, and which Rajagopal wouldn't show to Vigeveno. Vigeveno knew there was a letter but hadn't been allowed to see it. So Krishnaji showed it to him. He was trying to get him to act as the Vice President. "You're responsible" Krishnaji told him. But Vigeveno, of course, did nothing.

S: Well, you say, "Of course, did nothing," and I understand the "of course," but I'm thinking of other people who in the future will listen to this. It has to be explained that Vigeveno was really in Rajagopal's pocket.

M: Rajagopal only allowed people around him who were in his pocket.

S: Now, wait a minute. Isn't there some story about Vigeveno…Rajagopal pulled Vigeveno and his family out of Germany just before Hitler, or something like that. They were Jewish.

M: Yes, that was the story, why they were loyal to him. Rajagopal had told them it wasn't safe for them to stay in Holland. He was Dutch, not German. Annie was, I think, German. But they lived in Holland, and they had an art gallery there. Rajagopal said, "You've got to get out," and persuaded them to leave.

They were able to get their money out and so forth.

S: And so they were eternally grateful.

M: They felt their lives were saved by Rajagopal.

S: Right.

M: Are we running out of tape? Perhaps we better stop.

S: Yes.

Issue 6: October 1966 to May 1967

In this issue we see Krishnaji finally break away from the old management structure that had been put in place in 1925 and that had served him so badly. The local organizers in London, Paris, India, and Rome still organized events in their parts of the world, but it feels now like they answer to Krishnaji, Mary and Alain, and not to Rajagopal and KWINC. This, then, is the start of a new era in Krishnaji's work.

There is also in this issue the first detailed description of what it looked like to see Krishnaji go into a talk, and then come out of one. This, along with the peculiar physical phenomenon of Krishnaji's speaking when he was ill, are discussed.

Mary: Well, not remembering exactly where we left off, I suppose I'd better go back to autumn '66, when Krishnaji was to give talks at the Oak Grove in Ojai for the first time in six years.

At this point he and Alain Naudé were staying with me in Malibu.

Scott: Yes, yes. We covered that; I know we covered that, Mary. You described the arrival. I don't have a clear picture of the talks, but I remember that you found it unbearable the nagging that Rosalind did at Krishnaji over the meals. In fact you didn't want to go to meals any more.

M: Yes, yes, yes. I didn't. And I think I described how increasingly unpleasant it became; the nasty tone of voice; it was nerve wracking. It was just having at him all the time. And so I soon began making excuses why I couldn't come to meals and I ate by myself. Occasionally, when she wasn't there, they both came and I cooked in the little flat for all three of us.

So all these things I was witnessing and that Krishnaji told me about were giving me a really shocking view into what Krishnaji had to put up with, with these people. And it was increased by another talk between Rajagopal and Krishnaji, which took place in the office under the flat where I'm living in the house next to Pine Cottage.

Alain and I were sitting in his flat, in the sitting room there, and we heard Krishnaji's footsteps return to Pine Cottage and go in and close the door. Then after a bit, not right away, but after a bit we heard Rajagopal leaving the office, and when he'd gone Krishnaji came in to tell us what had happened.

I'm going to pause in the horrid descriptions of what was happening in Ojai, because before we went to Ojai the dentist told Krishnaji that he had a small cyst in his lower lip, and that it had to be taken out by a doctor.

So, on October twenty-fourth, I took Krishnaji into Beverly Hills where the doctor was, and he removed the small cyst using Novocain and put some stitches in. Coming home in the car Krishnaji suddenly fainted as he had in the past. And again I kept driving because you can't stop suddenly. It would shock him and be bad for traffic, but I slowed down, and he came to quite quickly. But he fainted twice more on the way back. When we got back to Malibu, he spent the rest of the day in bed, but insisted on getting up for supper.

S: Did you take Krishnaji to your doctor or was this some other doctor?

M: The dentist was my dentist, and the dentist recommended Dr. Rubin, who was a nose and throat specialist, whom I've been to in the past.

On the twenty-seventh of October we went back to Ojai, and I took Alain to the Oak Grove for a microphone rehearsal, and that's when Rajagopal wanted to talk to Alain, which I described before.

On the twenty-ninth was Krishnaji's first Ojai talk in the Oak Grove. It was a very hot day, but there were a lot of people. And again the next day he talked, he talked both days of weekends. I skipped the lunch and went and did housekeeping in the flats, and after lunch we went back to Malibu where it was blessedly cool, and we took beach walks, mostly in the dark, which was lovely.

S: Mm, how nice. How would you get down to the beach?

M: My car. Although the house is above the beach, we never could get a satisfactory road down there, and if you did climb down, the climbing up was horrible because it was very steep.

S: I remember the place that you and the Dunnes had attempted to make a road.

M: Well, the Dunnes had a road.

S: Oh, the Dunnes had a road down it?

M: Yes, so I probably used the Dunnes's road. I think so, or you could drive around, it doesn't make much difference.

It was a hundred degrees on November first, but in spite of that we went up to Ojai in time for supper with Rosalind. Krishnaji had a dentist he'd been to for some years when he used to live in Ojai, a Dr. Meineg. So he decided to go back to his own dentist, and he had a tooth pulled out on the second of November.

On the third, we went up to the Thacher School, where Krishnaji talked to the students, after which Krishnaji and Alain came back and lunched with me on the terrace. I don't remember where Rosalind was then.

S: I mentioned earlier that you and Krishnaji and Alain must have talked a lot about the Rajagopal situation because it was so appalling.

M: It was going through our conversation whenever we were alone, more or less.

S: Yes. I would imagine that. Did Krishnaji say anything like, "I've got to get out of this, this has to…"

M: Well, it was clear that something had to happen to change the situation. But I think Krishnaji never quite gave up hope that Rajagopal would come to his senses. Krishnaji always…he didn't like to believe the worst about people.

S: I know.

M: He kept feeling that there must be some goodness that could be touched, and that Rajagopal could be reasonable. This was all utterly crazy, the whole thing. And so he would go to great lengths, and had always gone to great lengths, to try to mend the situation in some way.

S: Yes. In fact, that is one of the hallmarks of Krishnaji, actually.

M: It is; it is.

S: I mean no matter how appallingly people acted around him he would forgive them; he would look for some goodness to come out of them.

M: Yes, that's right.

S: To a fault, actually.

M: Well, to a fault situationally, because this man, as a result, was able to get away with larceny! All those years, and not only larceny but abuse of Krishnaji. The attitude: abusive, critical, picking on him, complaining, real, real nastiness. And that was still going on.

S: Yes.

M: Then we come to the time when the television crew came, first time ever filming of his talks.

S: These were the NET films[1]?

M: Yes. It was a station in San Francisco called KQED. They came down, and set up very nicely, I forget, two or more cameras. There was just one light near him, and then there was a reflector. He had a little canopy over him, because the sun would come at him. And they put a reflector up in it, so it reflected light down on his face, which was quite unobtrusive from his point of view, and it was effective.

Somehow or other the public broadcasting system learned that Krishnaji was going to give public talks, and I don't remember how they got in touch, but Alain was the go-between. There was a man called Dick somebody, I have it written down, who was the director who came with a crew. They did everything quite nicely. It was unobtrusive and didn't bother anybody. They missed the first one, but they filmed the November fifth talk. I think that was his third talk. I think they missed the first two.

Afterward, we all dined at Arya Vihara with Rosalind and her daughter Radha Sloss and her husband Jim Sloss and their three children. And also a friend of hers called Margo Wilkie who was staying there with Rosalind, who was the woman I think I mentioned who lived on Martha's Vineyard.

S: You did.

M: On the sixth, Krishnaji gave his fourth talk.

On November seventh, there was a most unexpected heavy rain, so the talk that was scheduled had to be cancelled. Instead Krishnaji went up to the Happy Valley School[2] and talked to the students, but I wasn't there so I don't know what happened.

S: The Happy Valley School was being run by…

M: Rosalind. It was begun by Krishnaji, Aldous Huxley, and Dr. Ferrando. Rosalind was just supposed to work there, do things but not be part of running it. But she quickly took over and got hold of it, and of course Krishnaji wasn't there, and Huxley didn't live in Ojai anymore. I don't know what happened to Dr. Ferrando. Doubtless he had some interesting life I'm not aware of.

S: But then Rosalind gradually came to own the school or something, right?

M: Well, it's owned by the Happy Valley Foundation, which was founded by Mrs. Besant, but it was supposed to be for Krishnaji's use. Rosalind got control of it by appointing the board.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And Krishnaji wasn't on it, only Rosalind's friends and toadies, if I may be malicious.

S: So, she really did the same thing that Rajagopal did with KWINC.

M: She did. Exactly. One stole one foundation, the other one stole the other foundation. So between them they [S laughs] they were very successful! [M laughs.]

Anyway, after the talk at the school, we drove back to Malibu, arriving in time for supper.

The next day we went to town and again saw doctors. Then after a late lunch we drove back to Ojai.

S: Can I just stop and ask did Krishnaji make any comments about the Happy Valley School?

M: No, I don't remember any. It was, I suppose, Alain who went with him, I don't remember. I didn't go, and it wasn't a notable event.

S: Okay, go ahead. I interrupted. You went back to Ojai.

M: Yes, and then we had lunch. It was Krishnaji and I, I don't think Alain was there, with Mima Porter. Do you know Mima Porter?

S: I met her.

M: Mima Porter was born de Manziarly.

S: Ah, she was a de Manziarly.

M: Yes. Her given name, which she would hate to have anybody know [chuckling], was Germaine, but she hated that and became known as Mima, always, from childhood up.

M: She was part of the de Manziarly life, with the Lutyens children[3], of course.

S: Ah ha.

M: She married a man called George Porter from Chicago. Very wealthy man. And shortly after the wedding, he committed suicide.

S: Oh, no.

M: How or why, I have no idea. She bought quite a big place in Ojai, and lived there for the rest of her life. Of course, she inherited a lot of money from the husband. I think she really supported the other two sisters after that, more or less. Anyway, we were invited for lunch by her and went. She was just someone I met. I mean, I didn't have any particular impression of her. But, in the Ojai situation, she was absolutely on Rajagopal's side. During the years after this, when Krishnaji was trying to come to some agreement, he kept appealing to Mima to talk sense to Rajagopal. Eventually in the spring of '68, she was going to Paris anyway, she came when Krishnaji was there with a message from Rajagopal that everything would be alright. I'm jumping ahead now, but since I started on it…What she actually said was, "Rajagopal says that when you come to Ojai next year, we'll settle everything," which was his usual ploy, and nothing ever happened. But anyway, we lunched with Mima.

S: Now this is an interesting thing to talk about, though, because like Vigeveno and Mima Porter, they had to have, along with Rajagopal and Rosalind, and Radha Sloss, they had to have an image of Krishnaji that is very different from the view that all of us have held. And perhaps that should be talked about a little bit because someone like Vigeveno or Mima Porter who had been admirers of Krishnaji's or of the teachings…

M: Yes.

S: …but they saw a difference between the teachings and Krishnaji.

M: Well, you see that was the story. That was encouraged.

S: Yes. Can we go into this a little?

M: As far as I understand it, and my understanding comes from what Krishnaji said. There were these people who were so-called devotees, but Rajagopal foisted on them the notion that there is a split personality—there's the World Teacher, who was on the platform and is wonderful, says all these marvelous things; and then there is the man Krishnamurti, who's a rather ordinary, fallible man. This is very convenient because, whatever they didn't like was from the fallible man, whereas all the wonderful things could be attributed to the World Teacher.

S: I don't think this is something that originates with Rajagopal. Because, to me, this is part and parcel of the Theosophical concept; that the World Teacher uses someone as a vehicle…

M: Yes.

S: …that the World Teacher, the Maitreya manifests…

M: Yes,

S: …and speaks through, but when he's not there…

M: It's the original ordinary human being.

S: Yes, there is just a rather, you know, ordinary, empty-headed human.

M: I think that's where it came from. Because you remember that back in the '20's and '30's that Leadbeater and Arundale[4] would say that a black magician was talking through K at one point, and Mrs. Besant was upset about it and Krishnaji said to her, "If you think that's so, I'll never speak again." So, whenever Krishnaji was saying something that didn't suit them, they would claim it was the non-World Teacher who was talking.

S: Yes. You see I think this has to be understood, because otherwise, there is too much of the situation that just doesn't make sense.

M: Yes. Yes.

S: Because here are people who, I don't know, but I presume that they're not bad people, Mima Porter or Vigeveno. I suppose they're not bad people, but…and then we see the same thing again from some people at the end of Krishnaji's life, right? Prominent people in the Indian Foundation that one wouldn't have expected this from, like Pupul.

M: That's true. It's true.

Also, and I'm thinking of Mima now, she may have had some idea that by moving to Ojai she'd become a great and intimate friend of Krishnamurti and play a much bigger role than she ever did. And when nothing like that happened, there may have been disappointment growing into resentment and siding against him.

S: Yes, but they probably did play a role with Rajagopal, right?

M: Oh yes. Mima became the Vice President and, in fact, she was that at this time. They had two vice presidents, I guess. Krishnaji always said that she had edited some of the Verbatim Talks, but I don't think we've ever found any evidence of that. But I'm not sure.

S: What I'm saying is that part of this ambivalence with Krishnaji was that they didn't have, with Krishnaji, the spiritual prominence they thought was their due.

M: Yes.

S: But they could have that kind of spiritual prominence with Rajagopal.

M: I don't know whether it was spiritual prominence, but they were…

S: Well, they were prominent in a spiritual organization.

M: Well, yes, yes.

S: Which is what I mean.

M: They were running the store is what it amounted to.

S: Yes. And a lot of people settle for that.

M: Yes. Now it's interesting that in the de Manziarly family that two of them, Sasha and Mar—Marcelle, remained devoted to Krishnaji their whole life.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And Mima in particular and later Yo, because I think I described, or did I? Is it next year that we used to go to the movies in Paris and Yo would come along?

S: I can't remember.

M: That was the previous year, and one assumed that she was just like Mar and Sasha, as devoted to Krishnaji. But it turned out not so. Now Mima had the purse strings and supported Yo, but then she also supported Mar, as far as I could tell, and Mar didn't change. So, there it is. Anyway, it's funny. It's very strange.

S: Yes. There has to be some very peculiar thinking to allow…well first of all to allow a person to treat anyone the way Krishnaji was treated by these people. But then secondly, to, on one hand, to have a reverence for him, and on another hand to have a contempt for him. You know, if you look at it, it's really pretty weird!

M: It's true! That's right.

S: I don't know, maybe it's just my playing amateur psychiatrist here, but the contempt allowed them to be comfortable with the reverence.

M: Yes. And don't forget that at least Rajagopal and Rosalind had been anointed, or at least they thought they had, by Mrs. Besant, as the caretakers of Krishnaji. He was to be seen to by them. Which, in a way, made them feel that they could do what they liked [chuckling]. He'd been like a parcel handed to them.

S: Yes.

M: And they behaved just like that. Vigeveno, on the other hand, was a, well, I hate to speak this way of people [chuckling]…he had a sort of toady manner.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And always an awareness of money.

S: Mm, hm.

M: I think he and his wife both encouraged me in the beginning of my being interested, they invited me to that discussion group because I'd gone into their gallery with a women called Barbara Hutton, if that means anything to you.

S: No, it doesn't.

M: Well, she was a famous heiress of the richest woman in the world or something. I went to school with her, which is how I happened to know her, and she was interested in paintings, and the Vigevenos had an exhibition I thought was good, and so I took her there. So that really started the cash register in Vigeveno's mind.

S: Yes, I see.

M: Now I'm really accusing him of being entirely venal, and maybe they wanted to be nice to me, too, apart from any business things. But, he had that manner.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And at the same time he was not a very bright man. And completely under the domination of Rajagopal. And so was his wife, even more so, as will be seen later on [sighs] in this story.

S: Okay.

M: Anyway, let's return to where we left off, after the awful scene between Rajagopal and Krishnaji, and Vigeveno came, and Krishnaji also showed him this letter that he'd written Rajagopal, which Rajagopal wouldn't show Vigeveno. Although he was his vice president, he wasn't allowed to see anything like that. [S laughs.] And there was a long talk between Krishnaji and Rajagopal that night, and it was a dreadful day, all along.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Then on the thirteenth, Krishnaji gave his sixth Ojai talk, and it was, as it says here, a wonderful one. And then dentist again for Krishnaji. Throughout all this, he's always going to the dentist.

There was a public discussion on the fourteenth in the Oak Grove, after which we went straight to Malibu, as quickly as we could. We got there at sunset, and went immediately for a walk on the beach in the dark.

S: How nice.

M: We returned home to supper and talked endlessly. A couple of days later we went back to Ojai, again to the dentist.

S: This is the dentist in Ojai?

M: Yes, this is Krishnaji's dentist, Meineg.

And that day Krishnaji had said to Rajagopal that he wanted the tapes of the current talks, and so he sent Alain and me to his house. Also, we were to ask for the Notebook manuscript. But Rajagopal wouldn't see us, wouldn't let us in.

S: So, what happened? You knocked on the door?

M: Yes, we knocked on the door, and while we were waiting for a reply his wife drove up in her car—Annalisa[5]. She looked rather flustered and said, "Well, what is it you want?"

We told her what we wanted, and she said, "Just a minute, I don't think he'll agree, but I'll go in," and she went in, came back, and told us that no to both. So we went back to Krishnaji.

S: What day is this?

M: This is the seventeenth of November. Rosalind wanted Krishnaji to come to Santa Barbara where she was really living. There was some sort of a Happy Valley meeting of trustees or I don't know what. So, Alain and I were on our own, and we drove up to the Santa Inez Valley, which is quite beautiful, and drove around, and then came back to Santa Barbara and went to a movie. Then we came back to Ojai and had a lovely dinner at the Ranch House.

S: So Rosalind wasn't living, Rosalind wasn't living…

M: She was living in Santa Barbara then. She later built a house on the Happy Valley land in Ojai. That's where she lives today.

S: Mm, hm.

M: She had houses all over the place, but at that point she was living mostly at Santa Barbara. Krishnaji, when his work was getting back possession of Arya Vihara, he thought that we were putting her out of her home, but it turns out she had a house in Santa Barbara, a house in Hollywood, and a house, by that time, built on the Happy Valley land! [Chuckles, S laughs.] So she wasn't exactly homeless! [S laughs more.] But anyway, I mentioned what we did that day because Rosalind later made an accusation against Alain, that he had met some evil man when Krishnaji was in Santa Barbara, but he was with me the whole day, and we drove around and went to a movie.

So we packed the next day, the eighteenth, and left Ojai. In the car going back to Malibu, Krishnaji…dumbfounded, is the only word I can use, both Alain and me by saying he had decided what to do. He would just walk out, and have nothing to do with Rajagopal, ever again, or KWINC. Rajagopal could keep the whole to-do, the money, everything, he wouldn't touch it, he was through, which meant that he capitulated totally to Rajagopal.

S: Yes, of course.

M: I remember thinking at the time, although I was staggered by this, that I wasn't surprised. He said, "I can't be mixed up in this. I can't. I can't fight this thing." Alain was really…not speechless; on the contrary, he blew up in the car, which was so awful, so unjust.

At that point we arrived in Malibu, and found that the TV people were going to film an interview with Krishnaji on the lawn. So, that occurred. We had to stop talking about all this. So, in the evening, when Krishnaji and I again went for a walk, I talked alone with him at some length. When we returned to the house I got Alain to come in and the three of us talked. At that point, um… how did it go? Krishnaji called Rajagopal, but he wasn't in. Annalisa answered the phone. Annalisa said Rajagopal was out, and she took the opportunity—it was her only opportunity to speak to Krishnaji alone, and she poured out her own emotion over these terrible fights, and said she knew how difficult Rajagopal was, and that he had wanted to agree to the things in K's letter, but that K's conversation had made him blow up. Obviously Rajagopal had told her a doctored story, never went on about this cursing business, and thought it was all Krishnaji's fault that he'd upset Rajagopal. Krishnaji just talked to her sort of soothingly and didn't go into anything. So then I went into the other room and had a long talk with Alain, and while we were talking Krishnaji rang Rajagopal's number again and got hold of him. Krishnaji told him this thing that he'd told us in the car. Rajagopal's reply was, "This is a blessed day." So there we were, all this to-do and Rajagopal had won on all scores.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, again there was a long, long talk. And…

S: When you had your long talk alone with Krishnaji, what were you talking about?

M: I was talking about what he'd said, pointing out all the consequences to him. He listened to me, but he didn't…I wasn't trying to persuade him, I was just trying to give him a picture of it, and I was explaining that Alain felt somewhat betrayed by all this. Earlier, Krishnaji had said to Rajagopal that he, Krishnaji, would no longer accept any money from KWINC for his support. So Alain had then said he too would not take a salary. Because one of the things Krishnaji had put in that letter was that Alain should be paid a salary, and that on Krishnaji's death Alain should be paid a pension. But with the current situation Alain refused any money. Everybody was pulling out of anything to do with Rajagopal, which was, of course, just fine with Rajagopal.

S: Mm, hm.

M: He didn't have to pay for anything, and could keep all the money for himself.

S: Yes, and the copyright.

M: Copyright, all the land, everything!

S: He had everything that produced any money.

M: Yes! [S laughs.]

S: And he was getting rid of all the expenses! [More laughing.]

M: Exactly! And he had the power, which was what he most liked.

S: Of course. Which is what so much of this stupidity was about.

How did Krishnaji expect to live?

M: That was not discussed. [S laughs.] He was doing what was right, he really felt at that point.

S: Yes.

M: Then the next day, the nineteenth, I helped them pack, and made food for them to take on the plane, and took them to the airport, and said goodbye, and at 11 a.m. they took off for Rome. But before they left, Krishnaji said to Alain, "If ever you are disillusioned with me, sir, you have only to say so." And Alain made an echoing statement to Krishnaji. Then it was discussed whether Alain didn't need a holiday. At first he said that he couldn't take a holiday, that yes he did need a holiday, but that he couldn't take one when things were in this upset state.

So they went off to Rome, and a few days later I got, I guess, a letter, or maybe I telephoned, I've forgotten, that Alain was going to go to Pretoria to take a holiday, and not go to India. And he would rejoin Krishnaji when he came back from India.

So then, that was the end of '66. They both wrote to me. Krishnaji wrote to me from New Delhi while he was in India through the end of that year. I stayed in Malibu, obviously, and now we come to '67. Do you want to go on, or…?

S: Oh, yes.

M: We're now in 1967. I'm in Malibu, Krishnaji's in India, Alain had gone to South Africa to see his family and have a rest. I had a letter on January fourth from Krishnaji written in Rajghat, and another one toward the end of the month from Madras, telling me he'd received the package of brewer's yeast he had wanted, and which I'd sent. [Both chuckle.]

In early February, Alain rang me from Paris and said that he would take charge of the hunt for an apartment for us, for Krishnaji's talks in the spring. I was quite relieved because I knew he'd do it well. In February, Krishnaji went from Rishi Valley to Bombay.

On the fifteenth, I got a cable from Alain saying that we had a house in Paris, and that he had to go to the hospital for some minor operation. And on the same day, I had a letter from Krishnaji in Bombay.

So on March first, I flew to New York and then to London, and on the fifth Krishnaji arrived in Rome from Bombay. Alain met me and we rang Anneke in Holland and we learned that we had a house for Krishnaji near Amsterdam for May.

S: You were in London; Krishnaji was in Rome staying with Vanda Scaravelli?

M: Yes. Alain came to London after settling up the house in Paris. He came over for an operation that he was supposed to have. He was in the hospital a while.

On the seventeenth, I went over to Paris to see the house, which was in Boulogne-Billancourt, just south of the Bois, near Longchamp, just within perfect walking distance to the Bois for the afternoon walks. It was a nice house. It was on a little tiny street called the Rue de Verdun, onze[6] Rue de Verdun.

S: When exactly is this?

M: On the sixteenth, Alain was released from the hospital, and we both flew to Paris and stayed at the Hotel Pont Royale. The following day we went to see the house in Boulogne-Billancourt that I had rented, and I went over everything with the proprietor, very formal goings-on. [S chuckles.]

On the eighteenth, Alain flew to Rome to join Krishnaji at Vanda's. I remained in Paris for the next four days, but on the twenty-second, I also flew to Rome. I checked into the Hotel Rafael and went to Vanda's. I remember Krishnaji was standing by the gate to meet me, and we all four had a lovely lunch together. Later, Krishnaji and I went for a walk, and we discussed all the events in California.

S: Where did Vanda live in Rome at that time?

M: Villa del Casaletto. It is just outside Rome, in the direction of the airport, but not that far out. It had a garden and was very nice.

I took them both [chuckles] around. There's always shopping in these places. The shirting material place and shirt maker were in the old part of Rome, up cobblestone streets. That was a fun sort of shopping! [Chuckles.] So they chose the material they wanted. Then, of course, it takes a lot of study to make the decisions about the details of the shirt you want made. [Chuckles.]

S: Of course, of course.

M: They both enjoyed it very much, and I was enjoying it because it was fun. I'd been able to provide them with something that they liked. [Chuckles again.]

S: Yes.

M: Unfortunately, I caught a cold and stayed in bed, but when I got better, I was summoned to be treated by Krishnaji for a couple of days.

On the thirtieth, Krishnaji gave his first public talk in Rome at the Istituto di Pedagogia.

The next day I lunched at Vanda's. Saral and David Bohm were there.

S: Oh! Did they come over just to hear the talks?

M: I'd presume so.

On the first of April, Krishnaji gave his second Rome talk at the same place, and we discussed a meeting of young people that Alain had rounded up the day before.

On the fifth, I flew to Geneva and took the train to Bern, where I spent the night. The next day I went by train to Thun to get my Jaguar that had wintered there.

I remember driving from Thun to Gstaad through a snowstorm, a spring snowstorm. I'd left things in the attic in Les Caprices. You could store things there while you're away over the winter. So I got out whatever it was I wanted, and then I went to Pernet, which wasn't Pernet in those days, it was Grossman's. Mr. Grossman owned what became Pernet's. I picked up some health food things, and then drove on into France and spent the night in Avalon at the Hotel de la Poste.

The next day I got to Paris by noon, and moved into the house, and went over the inventory with the proprietor. The whole of the next day was spent putting everything in order. Alain called from Rome to say that Krishnaji would be coming soon. The following day I went with Marcelle to see the Salle de la Chimie, which is where Krishnaji was to speak, and which was a much better hall than the Adyar one of the year before. It was bigger and better and more dignified. It's right on, um…oh, right near that part just off the Seine on the left bank, not Rue de Grenelle, but it's near there.

That same day, the eleventh, I met Mr. de Vidas, and we went to Orly and met Krishnaji flying in from Rome by himself and I took him back to the house at Rue de Verdun. We were having supper when Alain arrived in his Volkswagen. He'd driven up. So we were all in our nice little house. There was a part-time maid who came with the house, so I didn't have to do all the work. The next day I cooked lunch, and then of course [chuckles] in the afternoon we went to Lobb for shoes and Charvet for more shirts.

On the thirteenth, Yo came for lunch, and we went to a cinema. The Professionals, if you remember that.

S: Ah, yes, I do.

M: We walked in the Bois every day we could.

Various people came for lunch almost every day. One day the Suarèses came.

On the sixteenth, Krishnaji gave his first Paris talk in La Salle de la Chimie. He spoke about violence and sorrow.

From then on, we started to go to Bagatelle, which was lovely for me because in my childhood, I'd gone there. You've been to Bagatelle, haven't you? It's a little park within the Bois, but unto itself.

S: Yes.

M: And there's a little house, which, as a child, I was fascinated by. Above the door, it said Parva sed apta, small but apt. I thought that was so nice, to have a little house [S laughs] in a beautiful place like that [M laughs].

S: Yes.

M: It's lovely. So then we took to walking there every afternoon.

S: Did you walk right from the house?

M: No, we drove there. The Bagatelle is a bit further up in the Bois. It was nice having been there as a child and coming back and walking with Krishnaji. That seemed very nice, very nice.

S: Of course.

M: We had two or perhaps three young people discussions. There was a quiet Quaker center in the Rue Vaugirard where those occurred.

Then, Krishnaji did a Paris radio interview, but I can't tell you who interviewed him. I don't remember.

S: Did Krishnaji speak in French?

M: I think so.

S: There's a couple where he spoke in French.

M: Yes. Again, people for lunch, movies, including a French movie, La Grande Vadrouille. I remember that.

Oh, I see that Sacha[7] came for lunch.

S: What did Sacha do for a living?

M: He was in the diplomatic service. He was French counsel in Shanghai or Hong Kong. I think it was Shanghai for years, and other countries, too. He lost one leg in the war, and that sort of pained him. Krishnaji used to try to help him.

S: Mm.

M: Sacha was always fun because he liked to tell funny stories, and he wasn't at all serious. He used to make jokes about the astral plane, [both laugh] but he was very nice, a very cheery fellow, and he made Krishnaji laugh.

S: Mm. How nice.

M: He and his sister Mar, they shared an apartment on the rue Jacob. We went there, I think, during this time for lunch with the two of them.

S: Was he retired by now?

M: I think so, yes, must've been. But he still knew all kinds of people, and all sorts of places. He had funny stories to tell about all them, which was nice. So, this brings us through April, I think.

Krishnaji also, at this time, was giving personal interviews.

S: Who arranged them? Alain?

M: I suppose he did it. I don't think I did it then. Alain must've.

S: What time of day would Krishnaji give his interviews?

M: All morning sometimes.

On the twenty-eighth, for instance, Alain flew to London to see his doctor again and Krishnaji held interviews all morning and another one later in the day. Krishnaji and I walked in the Bois, and Alain got back for supper. We were leaping between countries all the time as though taking a taxi somewhere. [Both chuckle.]

The fifth and last talk was on April thirtieth, and it was quite an extraordinary one.

Then, on the third of May, we flew to London, all three of us, and stayed at Claridge's. Krishnaji and Alain went to Huntsman. We tried to go to the cinema, but it was the wrong time. K had dinner in his room, I remember [chuckles].

S: Was that the first time you'd stayed at Claridge's again since…

M: Since I was there with Sam, yes. I think so. Yes.

Alain again saw his doctor, and Krishnaji [chuckles] again went to Huntsman, and we went to a James Bond movie.

The next day, again, to Huntsman, and then we took the afternoon plane back to Paris. [Chuckles.]

And the following day we went to another cinema, A Man for All Seasons, and walked in the Bois.

S: I remember that one. That was a marvelous movie.

M: On the seventh of May, eighteen mostly young people came to see Krishnaji in the morning and then afterward, he and Alain and I lunched at the Suarèses', and then K and I walked in the Bois. This is probably immensely dull for posterity.

S: Well, I don't know. I think it's good to have it down. [M chuckles.] But it's especially good if we add other little things that maybe aren't in your notes. Why did you all fly off to London just for a couple days?

M: Because Alain had doctor's appointments, and both of them were due for Huntsman fittings. [S chuckles.] You must realize the importance of these matters. [M chuckles.]

S: I do realize, I do realize the importance of these matters. [M laughs.]

M: One simply flew to another country for these really vital things. [Both chuckle.] I see here that I had both of them and my father and step-mother to lunch at Chez Conti. I don't remember much about it!

S: Now, tell me, all this time are you continuing to talk about the Rajagopal situation?

M: No.

S: It just dropped?

M: No, it's not that we forgot anything about it, but it was sort of in abeyance. It was left that way.

S: It was still just resolved that Krishnaji was going to walk away from the whole thing, and then that was it?

M: Yes.

S: No other, nothing else was being contemplated?

M: No.

S: Alright.

M: I can't say that it was never thought of, or discussed again, because clearly, it couldn't be left like that.

S: Now, I presume Alain had stopped sending the audio-tapes of the talks back to Rajagopal?

M: Yes, yes…no! No!

S: He kept sending them back?

M: Mm, hm. I think so.

S: That's incredible in itself.

M: I'm pretty sure, but only pretty sure. There comes a moment when he breaks off sending the tapes.

S: But this isn't it.

M: Rajagopal still had the copyrights through '67, but that ends in '68. So they were still going back to him then.

S: Incredible.

M: On the tenth of May, we loaded both cars, my car and Alain's car, and Alain set off at 11am in his Volkswagen, and Krishnaji and I in my car. We left Paris and drove northeast to Arras where we met Alain at a restaurant we'd found in the Michelin!

S: Michelin, of course.

M: A restaurant called Chanzy, and then we drove on into Belgium and spent the night in Ghent at the Hotel St George. We left the next morning at 11 am, and went through Antwerp into Holland, and then I got a bit lost in Utrecht. Of course, we never could keep the cars together. It just doesn't work.

S: No, of course not.

M: Anyway, somehow I got out of Utrecht and [S laughs] found my way to Huizen, which is where we had a house.

S: Ah, ha! You were staying at Huizen?

M: Yes. This was wonderful, a wonderful house. We somehow met Alain in Huizen before either one of us had found the house. We had instructions from Anneke, so we conferred, and we found it. And it was lovely. A real farm-house with a thatched roof, and it had a nice cow smell. There was a big room with a fire-place as you came in, stone floors, and a kitchen. In the back, on the ground floor, Krishnaji had the main bedroom with his own bathroom. Upstairs were three further bedrooms for Anneke, Alain, and me, and we shared a bathroom. It was very nice. There was a lovely wood next door, beautiful wood, which is somehow like a park, a private park, and this played a great part in our stay in Holland. We got permission to walk there; there was never anybody there, and it was winding walks with streams running through, or maybe they were canals—I don't remember—little ones, with ducks. We walked there every afternoon. It was lovely! Really lovely. So we settled into our house, and then K and I went for a walk in the woods. Eventually, Anneke and I cooked dinner.

The next day, a neighbor, Mrs. Warren-Brecher, took me into shop in Bussum! Bussum is the little town where you shop, and she showed me the different stores because I had to do all the marketing, obviously. I remember the places where you bought the cheeses, and others the vegetables, and others the fruits, and another, lovely biscuits. Anneke stayed through lunch, and then Alain drove her to her house in Oosterbeek, which is down near the border. Krishnaji and I walked in the woods, and then the three of us had supper by the fire in the big room that night. It was lovely.

The next day, the three of us drove to Oosterbeek and lunched with Anneke. We came back and walked in the woods and had supper again by the fire.

S: Now, how far is this from Amsterdam, because this is for the Amsterdam talks, right?

M: Yes, it's not too far. I think I allowed 45 minutes, all told. It's not very far.

One thing that we did in those days was talk about where we wanted to live in Europe. There'd been talk before about where we would have a house, which would be our headquarters in Europe. And there was much discussion of where it should be. Alain had the idea that he could acquire a South African servant who would do all the chores; he would use the car, would take the luggage in and out, he would cook, and valet, and everything! He would be a sort of elegant slave, as far as I can see. And we wouldn't have to do any dishes [S laughs] or anything like that anymore. [Both laugh.] Alain was sure he could find just the person. This is very pre-Nelson Mandela. [S laughs.] Mind you, this is 1967.

S: In my view, there weren't so many people like that in South Africa in that day, either.

M: Apparently, there was a wholly different view of life in South Africa. But that's what seemed a very good idea to Alain. [Laughs.]

Then, lo and behold, Rukmini Arundale[8] came for tea, on the seventeenth. She was staying in that place near Bussum, where they have the Liberal Catholic Church?

S: It's near Huizen.

M: Yes. Anyway, she was staying there, and she came for tea! I'd never seen her before, of course. She had a very gimlet eye, appraising, who are these strange new people in Krishnaji's life? [Chuckles.]

S: But she had nothing to do with Krishnaji in those days, did she?

M: No. Nothing. But because he was in Holland and she was nearby, I think she came really out of curiosity, probably. So it was a rather formal conversation. I remember being amused at her appraising glances. [Chuckles.]

S: I'm surprised that she had that friendly of a contact with Krishnaji, because she didn't later.

M: Well, it wasn't all that friendly. It was a rather formal call. He was obviously wondrously polite and so forth, but it wasn't old friends meeting.

S: No. But she was hostile to him, as I remember, later on.

M: Yes, she was. Well, anyway, she came for tea, but nobody was smiling or made jokes or anything. It was just polite small talk.

Let's see, what happened then? It was cold and wintry. Anneke came back. I remember we had a discussion on whether the mind can be critical without condemnation? That was the topic of conversation. And we went to see the Z…how do you say it? Zorderzee?

S: Zuiderzee.

M: Zuiderzee. [Laughs.] Ah, yes.

After seeing that, I went off to case the route to the RAI Hall in Amsterdam so I could know how long it took, so know when we had to leave, how to get there, where to park and all that. After that, I spent the rest of the day in the Rijks museum, which I'd never been too, which was lovely.

S: Yes it is.

M: And so, on May twentieth, the next day, I drove Krishnaji to his first Amsterdam talk. The hall was full, and everything was fine. That afternoon, Mary and Joe Links, and two Dutch friends of theirs, a couple, came to tea! We had tea, went for a walk, and talked, and it was very nice. After they left, Krishnaji felt he hadn't had enough of a walk as they walked slowly. [S laughs.] So the two of us went back and walked fast through all this lovely wood. There were all kinds of ducks on the little waterways there, including those little crested ones. And the little baby ducks were there as well. There would be the mother duck and the little tiny ones afterward. And Krishnaji noticed sometimes there weren't as many the next day. Foxes or something must've got them. And his noticing that is strange because he remembered that later in Ojai, in his last days. He said, "Do you remember the little ducks and how there were less of them?"

S: Yes, I remember.

M: That was on May twentieth.

The next day he gave his second talk. A young American painter called Jay Polin came for lunch. I think Alain had met him and invited him for lunch. Also that day, Krishnaji did a taped interview for Dutch radio.

S: Can I stop here and just go back to Paris for a minute?

M: Yes.

S: How did Krishnaji get to the talks in Paris? Did you drive him there?

M: I drove him, and had trouble parking.

S: Exactly, I was just thinking that.

M: Well, they were supposed to save me a place on the street. There's no parking lot. So I remember had to park sort of half on the sidewalk.

S: So, after the talk, would you and Krishnaji get in the car together, or would he walk off and you pick him up someplace?

M: No, he would get out as fast as possible. He just walked right into the car.

The same thing in Holland, but there were much bigger audiences in Holland because the RAI holds a lot of people. But they did have a parking place at the RAI so I could more easily maneuver all that. Sometimes he would be sort of almost dazed after a talk, and he would stand in the next room to where he spoke, and I had to try to keep people away from him.

S: Yes, I remember doing that at Saanen and Brockwood, and eventually India.

M: And yet he didn't want me to keep people away. I had to play it by ear. It just shocked him to have people come up and start talking to him. And it happened often. In New York it used to happen.

S: Why don't you talk about that a little more now that we've started because that's interesting, and perhaps significant too. I used to think in my own, I don't know…jargon, almost, think of Krishnaji needing to come in for a landing.

M: He had to be grounded here.

S: Yes, because otherwise he was so sensitive after speaking that people…he seemed almost physically hit by someone's presence.

M: Yes, he was.

S: And certainly people who came up to him with an insistence, or an obsessive need to speak to him, it was like a physical assault on him. What do you think that was? How do you see it?

M: I felt it that as certain talks were so intense and so deep, that it was as though he was elsewhere, some part of him was deeply in the perception of that he was describing, and to come out of that, he couldn't suddenly be right back in a normal state.

S: He needed a re-entry period of some kind.

M: Yes, yes.

S: Can you say more about this?

M: Well, I can tell you, I remember once in Malibu, we were sitting in the living room having dinner on trays, and I think the television was on. We hadn't been talking, but something, I don't know what, made me speak about something on the television, and he came to with a start. I mean he'd been off. And my speaking to him shocked him, physically shocked him. It's like one mustn't wake him up. When one had to wake him up, one did it very gently, gently, gently, but never touch him, that would've been worse. But when I've had to wake him up, here, for instance, in Brockwood, I would speak very low, and very few words, and keep it up until it sort of eased into his consciousness. Then he could come out of sleep without a shock. It was sort of like that.

S: Yes, yes. I saw also he would also have a period of quiet to go into something, too. So it wasn't just at the end coming out, it was also before that he needed…

M: Yes. Quiet, and I never spoke to him in the car, going. For instance, in Saanen, I would be ahead of time—he wanted this—I would be in the car with his door open. The moment he opened the chalet door and walked the few feet to the car, I started the engine, he got in, closed the door, and we moved. And I never spoke to him, unless he spoke to me.

S: Yes, yes, exactly. And sometimes he would speak.

M: Sometimes. Those are the times he would say, "What am I going to talk about?"

S: Yes.

M: But I never initiated conversation. And then you took over when we got there while I parked the car.

S: And somehow, I understood that this was necessary. It seemed physically necessary.

M: Yes.

S: I didn't even have to be instructed in this. It was just obviously physically necessary because you could see the consequences on him physically.

M: That's right. And you wouldn't have let anyone come near him before. Luckily, no one tried that much. Once or twice I may have had to ward someone off. But in a way, I felt, not that it's the same thing, but the fainting, which, he said, was leaving the body.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And not to touch him, or do anything. Just wait. Because that would be a terrible shock to him to be brought back too quickly. I feel that it's somehow of that nature, but not that extreme.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm. One of the things, of course, that was sooo, I think, insulting or at least difficult for some of the people in India, was when Krishnaji wanted me to be with him after the talks in India, and we would go out walking. It was very much the same thing. And then there were a lot of people around. But it was like Krishnaji wanted a neutral companion or just someone who would be just neutral.

M: Yes, yes.

S: Respond when he said something, but otherwise…

M: Quiet.

S: I wasn't even looking at him really, just kind of aware of him. A neutral companion.

M: He used to, later, not in the early years in Saanen, you know, he would walk up the path so fast, as you've seen him.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And he would want me to follow him but not too quickly. He wanted to walk away from everything. And, as you saw, it took me a while to push through the crowd with the car without hitting anybody, to get him, and he was almost to the bridge sometimes.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And then he'd get in the car and then quiet from then on till we…unless he wanted to do something. Sometimes he wanted to do something, and he'd be perfectly normal.

S: We should say everything about this that we can think of, because this is something significant, because this is…I guess it's a physical expression of something quite other, quite different.

M: I think it is.

S: And so it's a very unusual thing. It's something that people reading Krishnaji's books will never have a sense of.

M: That's true.

S: So, there is this thing that Krishnaji would have to go through, and this is the kind of thing, of course, that Theosophists would say, "Oh yes…Ah, here it is…"

M: They would say, "Yes, that's the Maitreya."

S: Exactly. But it wasn't that.

M: It wasn't that.

S: It wasn't that at all.

M: I'm adamant about that, and people could say, "Well, what do you know?" but he could talk the same way that he talked on the platform if he were sitting on that chair.

S: Absolutely.

M: So, there's no possibility.

S: But also I would argue that from what one can sense, that there wasn't a sense of something else being present that wasn't there all the rest of the time.

M: It's just that he went into a certain region, I don't know what else to call it, a certain state, a certain depth of perception, which is beyond everyday consciousness.

S: Yes.

M: And yet, as you've seen yourself many times, when people from the audience would speak up or some nut would try to climb up on the platform, he was right there and coping with it.

S: Oh, absolutely. But he did need to…there was this before and after…

M: Yes. Before it was starting to…it's as though, I don't know what was happening…

S: Like gathering energy…

M: …but it's as though it was starting to move inside of him.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And then afterward, sort of like decompression. He had to be quiet and also it must've been, although he never said this, physically very taxing.

S: It must've been.

M: Because the tremendous power and energy that went into him. So that when the body begins to calm down, it must somehow manifest the, not exhaustion, but…

S: Depletion.

M: Yes.

S: Yes. And, as long as we're talking about some of these things, there was also that extraordinary phenomenon that we've seen where Krishnaji has gone onto the platform actually ill and weak, and then suddenly, at some point, he is just in full health, full of energy and vitality and strength, an extraordinary strength for a man of any age.

M: Yes, yes.

S: And that somehow was also part of this whole process, whatever this process was.

M: Yes.

S: And afterwards I can remember, or at least in my memory, but I don't know how accurate it is, he wouldn't go back to being quite as ill as he was before, when this took place.

M: Yes.

S: He would come down, but he didn't go back to being quite so ill.

M: Yes.

S: Is that how it was in your memory?

M: Yes, yes, yes. When he'd be ill beforehand, one would think, "Well, should we cancel the talk?" and then ultimately he gave the talk, and that thing you just described would occur. And he, he wouldn't go back to being weak and hardly able to stand up. [Pause.]

S: This is all part of something that's just very odd.

M: Yes.

It's become such a boring cliché these days to talk about energy. Everybody's talking about energy.

S: Mm.

M: But, in the context of Krishnaji's life, it was an amazing phenomenon, that energy.

S: Yes, yes. And of course he spoke about the energy that went through his body for several years. He talked about that. But what's just so interesting is that it was so visible; it was so physically manifest.

M: Yes. [Pause.]

S: I don't even know if…[long pause]…I don't know if a person could live with that extreme refinement, I would say, that Krishnaji had during those talks, because that's also what it seemed to me to be like after the talks. That he was in a state of such refinement, of such sensitivity, of such I don't know what, that normal life was almost too vulgar, or too coarse, or too something. [Pause.] I don't, for instance know if Krishnaji could have just physically survived or lived in that state the whole time. You know that kind of state that he had when he was giving a talk.

M: I don't know.

S: There was a sense that he had to come out of this, not…

M: Well, this again, is total speculation. I haven't even a notion about this till this moment, but in order to do what he considered his job was, which was to talk, he had to live on a normal plane to a certain degree. Now, if that hadn't been his job, as he put it; if he'd been able to do something quite different, which is to become a…

Issue 7: May 1967 to September 1967

This issue sees the first use of an editing convention mentioned in "Notes for the Reader", namely the use of single quotation marks [‘] to denote that Mary is reading from her diary. The change in her tone of voice on the audio tapes makes this unmistakable, and a check has been made against her actual diaries.

This issue also sees Mary's first experience of Krishnaji going through "the process." It is beyond the scope of this project to discuss this phenomenon, and it has already been presented as fully and as well as possible in Mary Lutyens's three-volume biography of Krishnaji. Suffice it to say that in 1922 Krishnaji began to have inexplicable experiences that appeared to be spiritual and continued intermittently for the rest of his life. The short-hand term for these was "the process."

This issue also sees the decision to start a Krishnamurti school in Europe, and Dorothy Simmons emerges as the person to head this school.

Mary: Well, as I don't remember exactly where we left off, I'll simply repeat. I know that it was in May 1967, and Krishnaji was giving talks in Amsterdam. He gave about six talks, and we were living in a really lovely place, which had been found for him by Anneke Korndorffer. It was a big farm-house that smelt faintly of farm life, which was rather nice. And a big room with a fire-place, and it was comfortable and it was very congenial for all of us, Krishnaji, Alain Naudé, Anneke, and myself.

Scott: Oh, Anneke lived there as well?

M: Well, she didn't live there full time. She was mostly in her place in Oosterbeek where she really lived, but she came and went a bit.

S: Ah, ha.

M: Anneke and I cooked when she was there, and I cooked when she wasn't there, and I did all the marketing, and so it was a kind of a home life, and very nice. And there was a beautiful privately owned park, but it had been arranged that Krishnaji could walk there, and it was ideal—winding paths through partly woodland and partly open fields, laced with canals on which there were all kinds of water fowl, and Krishnaji enjoyed looking at these very much. And there was nobody there, which made it perfectly lovely to wander about as though you were in the wilds somewhere.

Krishnaji was busy giving the talks, naturally, and also there were reams of young people collected largely by Alain at the talks. There were also groups of students from Utrecht, and he talked with them. But on the whole it was a very, very happy sojourn in Holland. We stayed until, I think, the end of May.

S: Mary, if I may just go back for a minute, because you've spoken about that time and Krishnaji remembering the ducks. It couldn't just have been the diminishing number of ducklings that made it so memorable…the whole time…

M: Yes, the whole time was wonderful: it was a beautiful place, he was feeling well, and I was feeling very happy and well. It was just a terribly lovely time. I remember it that way. And I remember talks in the early morning with him. My job was to get the breakfast, and so I would get up early and go in the kitchen and start making breakfast. And he would be up early too, and he took to coming into the kitchen and talking, standing or sitting in his white bathrobe and chatting with me while I got the breakfast.

S: What would he chat about?

M: I don't remember exactly, except it was sort of not too serious, joking a little bit, and just pleasant.

S: Mm.

M: I don't remember exactly what we talked about. He may have asked me questions about myself. I don't remember, really. I just remember the enjoyment of it, how nice it was.

S: Yes.

M: And he also was trying to help my bad leg [1] in those days.

S: Mm, hm.

M: In the afternoons or early evening he would give me a so-called treatment which, as I think I've described, he put his hands on your shoulder and something strange happened in the sense of a kind of tremendous…not tremendous warmth, though it did give a warm feeling, but he was sort of brushing away ill health and any pain. And it all was so…it was always something one felt very strongly afterward or during.

S: Now wait a minute. Can I just come back to this, too? Because you've described his healing you, or treatment with you in India.

M: Yes.

S: But could you describe it here in Holland? Because maybe if you recollect it again there'll be something different.

M: Well, it really wasn't what he did. I mean, from my point of view, what it felt like was not different. Although when I had the infection in India, he would draw his hands across the forehead and cheekbones where the infection was.

S: From the center of the face outwards?

M: Center of the face outwards, and then he would shake his hands.

S: Yes, like he was shaking something off.

M: Shaking off something bad, or getting rid of something.

S: Mm, hm.

M: But later on, when he was trying to help my bad leg, which was really the circulatory problem at that point, he would generally touch the shoulders, and again…shake his hands, sort of like wiping something away.

S: Was it from your spinal column out to your shoulders? That kind of…

M: No. Along the ridge of the shoulders.

S: Along the ridge, yes, but from the neck out to the ridge of the shoulders?

M: Yes.

S: So from the spinal column out, and then shake his hands again?

M: Yes, yes.

S: Did he put his hands on your leg?

M: I don't think so, and he would always go and wash his hands afterwards. I don't know if I mentioned that, as though there had been contamination from whatever the illness was. And he'd gotten rid of it, but he had to wash his hands.

S: Mm, hm.

And just again to clarify: when you say Krishnaji talked with you in the mornings in the farmhouse, would he be in one of the white toweling bathrobes made by Joan Wright?

M: Yes.

Anyway, the talks came to an end. There were immense crowds at the talks. The place was full, and there was usually a television screen in the lobby, so that the overflow that couldn't get in could still watch it.

S: Even in those days? Because that was true in the later ones, in the '80's.

M: Yes. Yes.

S: Impressive.

M: And also, so many came to the young people's discussions.

S: Mm. Where did the meetings with young people take place?

M: At the house, they'd come to the house.

S: At the house, where you and Krishnaji were staying.

M: The sort of central room that you came in. You came in the front door and it was a big room, like going into a barn almost. High ceiling. And a fire-place on one long wall. So with people sitting on the floor, there was room.

S: Mm, hm. How many people would come at a time?

M: I don't really remember, say thirty or forty.

S: Oh, a large discussion then?

M: Yes, something like that. And, of course, as you know, Holland is small so they could come from other places. Utrecht wasn't so far away, so many came from there.

Anyway, the talks ended and we were packing, as always, horrid! [Both laugh.] And every day we went, rain or shine, for the walk. That was a special part of being there.

We left in the two cars, as usual. Alain was driving his station wagon with all the luggage, and I had my car with Krishnaji. We drove across Holland and into Germany and met in Cologne for lunch and went into the cathedral and looked at all that. And then we went on, through Bonn to a place called Königswinter, and we spent the night there in a hotel called Hotel Petersburg, way up on a cliff looking over the Rhine. Just one night.

The next day we drove along the Rhine to a place called Oestrich and lunched there. We decided we were going to spend the night at Heidelberg, but we didn't. We wanted to push on. It was difficult because you never can keep two cars together on a trip like this.

S: No. Quite so.

M: We went through Wiesbaden to Karlsruhe and then on to a place where I had booked rooms for the night called Ettlingen, which has a very, very good hotel, and particularly good restaurant. My father recommended it and he…

S: [laughs] He knew about restaurants!

M: Indeed! So we stayed the night at the Erbprinz Hotel in Ettlingen. We were tired. [Chuckles.] Krishnaji had dinner in bed that night, and Alain and I went to the dining room. The next morning we crossed into Switzerland.

S: Now let me just ask something. Did Krishnaji ever say anything about Germany? Or about how he felt in Germany or the German people?

M: Well, he was aware that I was uncomfortable in Germany, but I don't think I told him that.

S: Well, you see Krishnaji never spoke in Germany that I know of, except once in Hamburg.

M: No, no.

S: And he never traveled in Germany. I mean he didn't go to Germany.

M: No. He didn't go to Germany. He picked up as he [chuckling] so easily did, he sensed what you felt. He sensed that I found being in Germany rather shocking in a way. I tried to explain it to him. I said that it's not that I feel anything against German people, but I feel like I'm visiting the scene of a crime, the scene of something dreadful that happened.

S: Yes, that's well said.

M: The atmosphere, at least in my mind, or the associations I have, are that something evil lived here, meaning the Nazi period.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: So, I just didn't feel, you know, perfectly willing to go there. I had a kind of revulsion of the atmosphere, to me. Now maybe that's just my projection, probably was. But I felt it.

S: But it is strange that Krishnaji didn't speak there except that once in Hamburg. I just thought he might have said something because of, you know, traveling through Germany at that time.

M: Yes. Of course we saw nothing of Germany because it was the autobahn from the time we crossed the border till we got to Switzerland. In fact, at one point we needed petrol, and I was loath to get off the autobahn because I didn't know where we were, or how to communicate with anybody. But we had to, so I drove off and, luckily, quickly found a petrol station and was able to fill up and get back on the autobahn because I didn't have a map or anything. And with Krishnaji I didn't want to go floundering around Germany, trying to find fuel.

S: Of course.

M: Anyway, so we got to Switzerland, and we lunched, I think, in Basel or Bale, if you prefer. We were going to stop in Bern, but we didn't. We thought we'd push on to Les Caprices in Gstaad.

Now we're on June third, and again this year, Vanda had the Chalet Tannegg apartments, but not until July. So, I'd gotten a little studio apartment for Alain, and Krishnaji stayed in the flat that I had before, which has two bedrooms and sitting room, kitchen, bath, etcetera. So he stayed there this time, and in a very little room, I'm sorry to say, but that's what it was, and he seemed perfectly happy there. We settled again into a very quiet domestic life, me cooking and marketing and housekeeping and walks in the afternoon. We also, of course, went right away to fetch his car. Which was most important.

S: Of course. In Thun?

M: In Thun, where it had been in storage all winter. And, of course, I still had, in those days, a Jaguar.

S: Very inferior car!

M: Very inferior car. [Both laugh.] But anyway, he brought the Mercedes back and I drove my car. Alain went with him, I guess. The next day, in my car, we went to see Doctor Pierre Schmidt in Geneva, his homeopathic doctor. He and Alain had check-ups, and I did some shopping. Then we had lunch at what became the place we always had lunch from then on, which is the Amphitryon in the Hotel des Bergues. It was always a pleasure; very old-fashioned.

S: Yes.

M: I've always felt in another time there, on another continent. I was in "Europe" somehow. You know that feeling?

S: Yes, yes. [Chuckling]

M: Yes, it's "Europe." Middle Europe has that feeling more than Paris or London.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Lovely white table cloths and nice flowers on all the tables, a very formal mâitre d'hôtel and waiters, two, at least, to one small table. It was fitting for Krishnaji, if you know what I mean.

S: Yes, yes.

M: It pleased my sense of the fitness of things! Because the food was very good, and they were most attentive to vegetarian requirements. And he enjoyed it without talking about it. You could see things were nicely done.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And then all the usual errands that one does in Geneva: Patek Philippe…

S: Of course. Jacquet?

M: Jacquet. All of that. The ritual of that. Let's see, I think we didn't stay very long, and at that point the Israeli war broke out, you know, the Six Day War.

S: Oh yes. Did you come back, you came back straight or did you go by way of Divonne again?

M: Um, let me see. I don't know. [Chuckles.] I don't remember.

S: So the Six Day War broke out?

M: Yeah, and it was over so quickly.

S: Of course.

M: And that was very pleasing.

S: That it was over so quickly?

M: It was over quickly, and Israel wasn't defeated.

S: Yes.

M: At least for me. I don't know, Krishnaji didn't comment on it.

S: Yes.

M: Then, what happened? Desikachar came. Around June twelfth Alain went down to Geneva and met him. Desikachar flew in from India, and we had a room in Les Caprices for him, too.

Krishnaji would have his yoga lesson in the morning, and then he'd rest and then lunch. I'd do the marketing and the cooking, and we'd have lunch, all four of us. After lunch he'd rest again, and then walks in the afternoon. I don't remember Desikachar walking so much; I think he did his own yoga. But, it was lovely. Gstaad was wonderful because there was nobody there in June. The crowds hadn't started. Krishnaji didn't feel, as he later came to feel, even that summer, he felt a sort of pressure of people's…looking…attention. Almost a psychic pressure focused on Tannegg.

S: Yes.

M: But then it was lovely. Oh, [laughs] we went back to Thun for a fender repair on the Jaguar. Krishnaji, Alain, and Desikachar joined me there in Alain's car. And, of course, Krishnaji began a sort of a campaign that I should have a Mercedes! [Both laugh.] So he engaged Mr. Moser, the garage owner, from whom he'd gotten his Mercedes in a conversation about what kind of Mercedes did he think would be pleasing to [both laugh] Mrs. Zimbalist? I wasn't adverse to this, but I wasn't leaping at it, either. [Chuckles.]

S: How did you get the bump in your fender?

M: Ah, how did I get my bump? I don't remember.

S: Then, presumably it didn't happen when Krishnaji was in the car because you would have remembered that, I'm sure.

M: I would have remembered that.

S: Right.

M: From Thun we went to a place along the lake we frequented often; Hotel Beatus in Beatenberg. It's along the east side of the lake about half-way down. We lunched there frequently through the years.

S: Hm, I don't know that place. Wait, is the hotel right on the lake with nothing else around it, and you go down a driveway to it because the road is higher?

M: A little, not very. Slightly, because it's right on the lake. In fact the little steamer that goes around the lake stops at Beatus.

S: Yes, yes, I think I have been there, actually.

M: You probably have.

S: Anyway, continue.

M: So, back to Gstaad. This trip to Thun was on the eighteenth, and my notes say that on the twenty-third, Krishnaji thinks I should get a Mercedes. [Both laugh.] He decided. And so Mr. Moser brought one to test drive.

S: Yes.

M: And I could see, it was [laughs] going to happen. [S laughs.]

Gérard Blitz and his wife turned up in Gstaad, and they came to lunch. At some point he became a member of the Saanen Gathering Committee.

S: Oh.

M: And so was I. I was invited during this period. I think it was later in July when the other members, who were Doris Pratt, and Mary Cadogan, and de Vidas, I think, and a weird man called Perizonias. Did you ever hear of Perizonias?

S: No, no.

M: Sounds like a character in an Isak Dinesen story. [S laughs.] She's a Dutchwoman, and she was in those days a member of the Dutch Stichting[2]. She was quite odd, and I can't remember all the reasons that I thought her so odd. She eventually disappeared from the scene, but she was then sought for membership. I think she was quite influential in the Stichting. Maybe she was head of it; I don't quite remember, but anyway she was there. And David Bohm came for lunch. I guess Saral was with him, though it doesn't say so in my notes. But he was only there a short time.

S: What was the interest in Gérard Blitz, other than the fact that he was obviously very good in the business world, and had all those kind of capacities and abilities?

M: Well, I think in those days, Krishnaji thought that Blitz would be his sort of what he called un homme d'affaires. In other words, advise about finances.

S: Because on the surface of things he's an unlikely character.

M: He's an unlikely character.

S: From my meetings with Blitz, anyway.

M: Yes. But he was supposedly enthusiastic about the teachings, though I don't know that it went very deeply. He was also very interested in yoga. In fact, as I think you know, he used to bring Desikachar to Europe, repeatedly for yoga demonstrations, and seminars, and lessons, and what all.

S: Yes.

M: On June twenty-ninth, Krishnaji had a fever in the night that went up as high as 101.8, which is a high fever for him. Alain got hold of Doctor Schmidt in Geneva, who prescribed some homeopathic remedy, and Alain went to Thun to get it. They didn't have any in Gstaad. That was the afternoon that Krishnaji became, what I then called, delirious. But, he had warned us in the past, or told me, if his fever goes up high he's apt to become unconscious. And sure enough he did. He was in bed, obviously, and I was sitting in a chair by the bed with him, and Alain had gone. He started looking around the room with sort of vacant eyes, and said to me, "Who are you?"

I said my name.

Then he asked, "You haven't asked him any questions, have you?"

I said, “No.”

Then he said, “He doesn’t like to be asked questions.” And after a pause or two, he said, “Even after all these years, I’m not used to him.” Through all of this he had a child voice, a little, little, little child. High voice.[3]

S: Mm, hm.

M: And again he had these large eyes that didn’t recognize me or indeed anything, and it just stayed that way. I didn’t attempt to talk to him. I think I replied to him using his name, saying, “Yes, Krishnaji” or “No, Krishnaji,” but that didn’t seem to have any effect. It was as though he had gone away, but he wanted to be sure that I hadn’t questioned him about anything. He didn’t want that.

S: This is exactly identical to other peoples’ descriptions of “the process.”

M: Mm, hm.

S: At least in its manifestation.

M: Yes, it was. It was the process.

S: But it’s strange that it would happen when Krishnaji was ill, in a way.

M: Yes, well, he had said that it might, if his fever goes up high, he’s apt…it’s apt to happen. And it did. Eventually, Alain returned, and his fever was still high, but he was out of that, ah…

S: How long did this last?

M: Well, Alain was gone several hours. And it wasn’t that he immediately fell into that, but I’d say it lasted at least an hour with me.

S: Were you frightened at all?

M: No.

S: Did you feel that there was anything else in the room? Or anything strange about the…

M: No, I was so conscious of him that I wasn’t conscious of anything else.

And he fell asleep finally. And when he woke up he was himself. He was sort of quietly sleeping most of the time after that.

The next day he still had a fever, and it was the same 101.8. He was very weak. There wasn’t any “going off” as it were.

S: No normal allopathic doctor was consulted or contacted?

M: No.

S: At Krishnaji's request?

M: Well, I mean, it was…they were both so homeopathically minded and Schmidt was his doctor; we didn't go into that.

Besides, he never called for a doctor. He wouldn't have called for a doctor for this. He might have called for the fever, but the fever was presumably being taken care of. I think, as I recall, Alain brought back some medication, and also we had to make a kind of tea out of the stems of cherries. That was the remedy.

But he was very weak the next day. I sort of gave him bed care, which I knew how to do from working in a hospital during the war. You know, sponging him off and getting him clean and comfortable. Now this was on the thirtieth when he was so weak, but he didn't have "the other," and he didn't want to cancel the Sunday meeting of the Saanen Committee, which was the second. So, in other words, two days before this meeting was to be held, he wouldn't cancel it, although he was so weak he couldn't get out of bed, really. Vanda arrived that afternoon, and he was to move up to Tannegg, but he obviously couldn't that day. But he was better. She got in, in the late afternoon, and Doctor Schmidt was consulted, and he said it was alright for Krishnaji to be moved the next day to Chalet Tannegg. So, the next day, which was I think Saturday, his fever dropped to normal.

Alain went off to Geneva to meet a friend from South Africa who was arriving, a girl. So I took care of Krishnaji that morning, gave him lunch, and then after his nap I drove him up to Tannegg in his car.

S: Did you ever tell Krishnaji what happened? That he'd gone off like this?

M: Oh, yes. Yes.

S: And what was his response to it?

M: He sort of nodded, you know, it wasn't…didn't mean much to him. I mean, it wasn't…

S: It wasn't abnormal in the sense that it wasn't…

M: No.

S: Did you talk about this with Alain?

M: Yes, I think so, must have. Must have.

S: So, but there was no attempt to explore what this meant or anything with Krishnaji?

M: No. None. I probably told Vanda too, though I don't remember that. I took him up there in his car and had tea with her and talked to her. And then went back, and Alain had brought his friend, a very nice girl called Jenny somebody. Anyway, so that was on the first of July.

I went up to Tannegg the next morning, and Krishnaji was fine and held the Saanen Gathering Committee meeting there.

S: Isn't that unusual? I mean, it's unusual for other people to have a high fever like that and for it to just drop down, and then be fine.

M: When he had to do something, if he was ill, usually the fever went away, or the sickness. He would carry on. It was curious. The next day he was fine.

He made me a member of the Saanen Gatherings Committee, and I remember that the others were Alain, de Vidas, and Frasiea. Do you know Frasiea? Frasiea was an Italian, an old friend of Krishnaji's, lived in, I think, Florence, or near Florence.

S: Frasiea, I know the name, I can't remember if I've met him.

M: He used to come to Saanen, spend a few days, see Krishnaji. And he was also a member of the very vague Italian committee for a while.

S: [laughs.] Which remains vague to this day!

M: Yes! And 'Mr. Perezonias was there, and Doris Pratt and Mary Cadogan. Blitz was to be added', it says. Afterward I lunched with Vanda and discussed everything: Krishnaji, Alain, and whatever.

S: Am I right that Vanda had been with Krishnaji going through the process before?

M: Yes, yes.

S: So she knew about this phenomenon?

M: Oh, yes. She knew all about it. I suppose I discussed it with her. I don't really remember too much. I must have because we were talking about his health and what had happened, and all that kind of thing.

S: I just want to put that down on the record that she actually had experiences herself of that with Krishnaji. So this was something known.

M: Yes, she did, that's right. She's written about it. There's a record in the archives about that.

So, the next day there was another Saanen Gathering Meeting at Tannegg, and I was asked to stay for lunch, and Sacha de Manziarly was also there. Sacha was always fun, he had funny stories to tell, and he was very fond of Krishnaji, and he would regale everybody with funny stories. He was a nice man.

Then Vanda, who had just arrived, talked to me about Tannegg. She only came to open Tannegg, bring Fosca the cook, and was leaving the next day. In her absence she wanted me to look after things, and do whatever needed doing, so we talked that over.

S: Right.

M: A few days later we went back to Geneva Krishnaji, Alain, and I for Krishnaji to have a check-up by Doctor Schmidt. Again we lunched at the Amphitryon restaurant, which we liked, and then drove came back via Evian to Gstaad.

S: Mm. Now did you move up to Tannegg then?

M: No, I didn't then, I stayed in the flat in Les Caprices. I did the marketing, helped Fosca, and things like that. And I also drove Krishnaji to the talks when they started. I also had my yoga lessons up there because by now Desikachar moved to Tannegg, the downstairs part.

S: So he stayed in the downstairs flat?

M: I think so. Must have. Anyway the lessons were up there for Krishnaji and whoever else had any.

Let's see, what happened? Again there was a trip to Doctor Schmidt, this was on the seventh of July and we lunched with Sacha at the Hotel Richmond and then drove back to Gstaad. Alain remained in Geneva to meet Balasundaram[4], who was coming in. Krishnaji and I walked in the rain when we got back, and the next day we went to see the tent, where the talks were to be given, that was going up.

The first talk was on the ninth.

S: What was the tent like in those days? Was it the airplane hangar kind of tent?

M: It was still the geodesic dome, I think. I'm pretty sure, but not positive.

There were a lot of people at the first talk. It was a beautiful day and afterward at lunch there was Balasundaram and Sacha.

The yoga lessons were in the very early morning because I remember going up at 8 a.m. for a yoga lesson and then later drove Krishnaji to the talk.

In the afternoon on the eleventh, there was a Saanen Educational Meeting at my flat. [Giggles.] I don't remember what that was! [S laughs.] My notes are rather vague. All sorts of people were there. Narayan was there, Mark Lee was there, Frances McCann, and Pupul arrived all of a sudden. I met her at the train station, and she spent the night at Tannegg. The next day Alain drove her back to Geneva, from where she went on to India. Alain met Nandini[5], and daughter, Devi Mangaldass, and brought them up to Tannegg by suppertime. They had the rooms downstairs, which were, in those days, the whole of the downstairs. Vanda rented part of it for guests. And so Nandini and Devi were downstairs and they hadn't been to Gstaad before.

I usually suppered at Tannegg, and a couple of nights I stayed at Tannegg. I don't remember why exactly, except that, it didn't feel right to leave Krishnaji alone. The others were downstairs, and of course Alain wasn't there—he was down at Les Caprices. And later on during this summer, when he was alone up there, he began to feel that thing of people focusing on him. He often used to talk about going on holiday where nobody would know where he was. Because he felt some sort of, it was like a pressure. I can't describe it, but I think I understand it. And occasionally he'd come back and use his room at my place at Les Caprices and sleep there so he could get a decent night's sleep, and go back up to Tannegg in the daytime.

S: Mm, hm. Because he would physically feel the pressure of people focusing on Tannegg?

M: Yes. It was like beams of people's attention, and he wanted to get out of the focus of it.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And quite a few times that summer, of course, Vanda wasn't there then, although she came back, it was as though it pressed on him. I don't know how else to say it.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm. Did he invite you to stay up at Tannegg because of that? Or just because it…

M: I don't remember; I stayed a couple of times only. It was, I think, when Nandini arrived, and I was doing things and had to be there in the morning and so he…I don't remember, really. It's just my notes say, 'stayed at Tannegg.'

S: Mm, hm. So do you think it might have been just more convenient because you'd have to be there early in the morning to do things for Nandini?

M: Later on, you see, Vanda had me stay there whenever she wasn't there. It was sort of the beginning of that, too.

S: Mm, hm.

M: I was to look after things.

S: Was there any sense that having you there in the house somehow made it more bearable for this beam?

M: It might have diffused, yes.

S: It might have diffused this beam somehow…

M: Yes, yes. It might have. He didn't really describe it too much.

S: Yes. I'm just trying to get your remembrance of it, or your sense of it.

M: I don't really remember why I stayed. It was something inconsequential; I mean, it was some convenience.

S: Yes, but it may also have been related to this beam?

M: Might have been, because then he wanted to get physically out of Tannegg, and so he came by occasionally to Les Caprices.

S: Was there any sense later on as the talks grew and grew and everybody knew where Tannegg was, of it being difficult for him? Did Krishnaji talk about it?

M: He didn't talk about it that way, but often, when people didn't know where he was, as we were motoring across France or something, he would say that he had a sense of freedom, because there wasn't that concentration on him.

S: How nice, yes.

M: When he talked about going on holiday, at times, it should be where nobody would know where he was so he wouldn't feel that, and even the last summer, when we were talking about whether to go back to Saanen just for a holiday when he was only going to talk at Brockwood. He asked, "will it be alright" if nobody knew he was there?

S: I remember that. Yes.

M: Or we should go somewhere else.

S: I remember. I remember.

M: So there was that, that funny feeling that he had. I understand it.

S: Yes, yes. I do, too.

M: So, not that he ever answered the telephone, but I've had it in my own life where, you know, you go away, nobody knows where I am, the telephone won't ring, or if it does it's not for me. There is that, you know, escaping from pressure, I don't know what else to say.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Anyway, I took Nandini and Devi shopping.

Ah yes, there's a note about Fosca, my trying to help Fosca with various things. And Krishnaji met another educational group in the tent. Now, I don't know whether that was young people, or people generally, or whether it was would-be school people.

Alain took Nandini and Devi to Geneva, and Krishnaji came down and had supper with me and stayed. It says here, 'Krishnaji again stayed the night at Caprices, feels the pressure of people's attention at Tannegg.'

It says for the twenty-fourth, 'Krishnaji and Alain discussed going to the U.S. later in '68 for a long holiday.' He wanted a long holiday—get away from things.

Also, 'we agreed to take the same house in Paris the next year. Marcelle Bondoneau and Gisela Elmenhorst came to talk to me about it.' Let's see who we had for lunch…? 'Balasundaram, Dorothy and Montague[6]. Krishnaji discussed with Dorothy, Alain, and me, saying we're probably going to have a school, probably in Holland' [both chuckle], in those days. And again, 'there was a meeting in the tent and it was announced plans for a school in Holland'!

I took Nandini and Devi to Interlacken. Krishnaji didn't come. And it says here, 'Extraordinary talk in the morning on the twenty-seventh,' and, 'Rajagopal telephoned from Ojai.' It was probably some disagreeableness, and again Krishnaji came for supper with me and stayed at Caprices.

Then Krishnaji, Alain, Nandini, Devi, and I went to Geneva. Again 'Krishnaji and Alain went to Doctor Schmidt' [chuckles and S laughs], 'and we all lunched at the Amphitryon and drove back via Evian, stopping at the Hotel Royale for tea.'

The big thing then was to go one way and come back the other way. And there was this splendid Hotel Royale up on the hill above Evian. Again, very Edwardian atmosphere, central European, Grande Luxe hotel.

S: Yes. It's kind of belle époque.

M: Yes, that's what it is. All the tables were out on a terrace looking over the lake, and it was very nice. We even thought of spending some time and staying there. We went and looked at rooms, but didn't in the end. [S chuckles.] Possible holiday. [M laughs.] And now, let me see. The van der Stratens appear in the notes, again Rajagopal telephoned. Ah, Alberto arrived, Vanda's son. Did you ever meet Alberto?

S: I've never met him.

M: Well, Alberto was very young then.

S: He's running the estate now, isn't he?

M: Yes, yes. A bright and pleasant young man then.

On the thirtieth was the final Saanen talk and…

S: How many people would come to the Saanen talks in those days, Mary?

M: Well, the tent was usually pretty full. Quite a lot. I actually can't remember which year we changed tents, but I don't think it was that early because the geodesic dome one was there for quite a while. And it wasn't quite as big as the eventual one.

'Spanish groups came.' All those people who didn't understand English came. (Chuckling.) And then he began in August his public discussions.

S: These became what was called "the question and answer sessions"?

M: Yes, yes.

On August second, the same day as the first discussion there was a meeting at Tannegg of those interested in a school in Holland. They all talked about what they wanted to do.

The next day there was another discussion about a school, and Anneke was there. Alberto brought a friend of his, a boy called Matthew Fox, and as Krishnaji liked to talk to young people, they went on a walk. Krishnaji then took Nandini and Devi for a ride in his car.

On August fifth was the fourth public discussion.

S: I think it's important to talk about these discussions for a minute. I can remember them when I first attended them, and I found it was extraordinary that a man up on a stage, all on his own, was actually holding a discussion with the whole audience.

M: That's right.

S: It was only later on when, they got so ridiculous, because of only about two people, that they had to be changed into formal question and answer sessions.

M: Yes.

S: Talk about what those early discussions were like, because they weren't video recorded, so people won't know what it was like.

M: They were audio recorded. Well, first of all, one must say that when I first heard him speak, and that's way back in the '40s, he had written questions, and he'd read them and then answer the way he eventually came back to doing. But at this epoch, as you know, people would just stand up and ask a question. There would be several questions, from as many people as wanted to ask them. He would then do what to me was a fantastic thing of remembering each question. He would say something like "Let's see if we can find an answer to all of them," and he used to do just that, which was even more extraordinary.

S: Yes.

M: One answer that would answer each question.

S: Mm, hm. And people would get up in the middle of his sentences and make comments. So there was actually a lot of back and forth.

M: There was, there was.

S: Which was phenomenal.

M: It was only changed later when it became continuously disrupted by that Norwegian man, and that Indian man and his waspish wife. She and the Norwegian sort of teamed up. It got so disagreeable that at one point they almost broke up the meeting. You were probably there.

S: I was there, I was there.

M: But these earlier times he would take spontaneous questions from the audience, and it was quite extraordinary what he did.

S: Yes, it was.

M: So, there was another educational meeting on the sixth, and on the seventh there was the last public discussion.

And then, right away the next day, there began six discussions on education with teachers, etcetera.

S: Were those recorded?

M: Must have been. Alain had gotten the Nagra, and he was the recorder, and as far as I can remember, every time Krishnaji spoke to any groups, it was recorded.

Sometimes these education meetings were in the tent, and sometimes they were up at Tannegg.

On the ninth we had a big lunch at Tannegg for twelve people, and Alan and Helen Hooker[7] cooked it. At 4 p.m. the Saanen educational meeting with Krishnaji was held at Tannegg, and it was decided that the school was going to be in Switzerland! [Chuckles.]

Again he came down that night for supper and stayed. He said, it says, 'has difficulty sleeping at Tannegg, as if people's attention is concentrated on him. He feels a target, but he has privacy down at Caprices.'

He was still working very hard because he held the last educational meeting on the thirteenth, and it was an extraordinary meeting. My notes say, 'it left me dazed.' This is August thirteenth.

We went for a drive up the mountain in Rougemont. Then at 4 p.m., Krishnaji had a talk with young people at Tannegg.

S: It was pretty relentless.

M: Very relentless. And again, on the fifteenth, there was another young people's discussion at Tannegg.

On the sixteenth, we drove in his Mercedes to Lausanne. Lunched at Ouchy and came back via Vevey, Montreux, Aigle, etcetera. The three of us had dinner and talked.

The next day I lunched with them up at Tannegg, and we went for a walk and talked of having a house for all of us in Gstaad. [S chuckles.] I remember there was a piece of land that we looked at. But it was incredibly expensive! I've forgotten now what it was, but something like $40,000 dollars for a little tiny piece of land you would just build a house on. But we were talking about all living together all the time.

S: Mm.

M: Presumably, the three of us, and then Vanda whenever she wanted to be there, the four of us, would share a place, but it didn't come to anything. [Laughs.] But we went on for several days discussing this building in Gstaad and somehow it was nice. We also went to look at some land near the Sonnenhof, you know up that way.

S: Yes, I know it.

M: I'd forgotten that. [Laughs.] Then Saral and David turned up, and they came for lunch, and walked, and talked, and everything.

On the twenty-second, Vanda came back from Rome. And then one day Krishnaji, Alain, and I went to Lausanne where they both went to the dentist, and I did errands. We had lunch at the Grappe D'Or. We don't want all these details, do we?

S: Well, it doesn't hurt. [M laughs.]

M: My notes say that on the twenty-sixth, I went with Mr. Graf to look at chalets and land we won't buy! [Both laugh.] And then with K for a drive in his car toward Gsteig, and we walked there. Do you remember Edgar Graf?

S: Yes, of course. So Edgar Graf was on the scene as early as '67?

M: Yes.

S: Uh, huh.

M: Then one day, interesting, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lippmann came for dinner at Tannegg. And later I took them to the Menuhen concert. They owned a house, a moulin[8], actually, near Fontainebleau, which they wanted to sell. So there was talk about that. On the next trip to Paris we went and looked at it. But we didn't like it.

S: Mm, hm. [M chuckles.] Were either of the Lippmanns interested in the teachings?

M: Well, they had met Krishnaji, and they knew Vanda, and so she invited them.

S: It was more social, then.

M: They happened to be in Gstaad. It was more social. But I think both of them had a considerable feeling of Krishnaji and what he talked about.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Here's one day when Krishnaji appeared at Caprices before lunch. His Mercedes wouldn't start. [Both laugh.] So he kept it down at Les Caprices. Some of the time he kept it down there, and sometimes he kept it up at Tannegg. So, we drove up in the Jaguar, and met the Bohms for lunch. My diary says 'came down after reading what K had written this morning on meditation and ecstasy. He wrote more here [at Les Caprices] while waiting for his car to be fixed. Later walked with him and Alain, and talked of Fontainebleau.' Fontainebleau is the new idea, you see.

S: This is the Lippmann place.

M: Yes, the Lippmann place. 'Again the next day the Lippmanns came for tea at Tannegg. And we started packing. Krishnaji came down to pack all his things that are here,' which means at Les Caprices. He left things in both places. Again 'we went to Lausanne, dropped Sacha, and then Krishnaji and Alain went to the dentist, and then on to Geneva for Alain to get his Indian visa. To Patek for Krishnaji's watch and back to Gstaad [chuckles]. Then we went to Thun and left Krishnaji's Mercedes for storage, and I ordered a Mercedes for April delivery'! [Both laugh.]

S: What did you order?

M: The first of the grey ones, like the one I have.

S: Was it the same, a 280 SE?

M: Yes, yes. [Chuckles.]

The Lindberghs came for lunch on September third at Tannegg. They had known Krishnaji and Vanda, and they had a house, over the mountain where Noel Coward and Joan Sutherland had a house. It was interesting to meet them.

On the fourth I drove to Lausanne, met Alain there, stopped for his tape recorder, and then I drove on to Paris via Saint-Cergue, Champagnole, Poligny, Dijon. [Laughs.]

S: And where's Krishnaji?

M: Well, he stayed in Gstaad, but the next day, I went out to Orly and met K arriving on a flight from Geneva. Alain drove in his car to Paris. We stayed at the Hotel Westminster in Paris, which is a rather uninteresting hotel. It says here, 'We went to Lobb's.' [Chuckles.]

It also says, 'We went out to look at the Lippmann house, which we didn't like. [Laughs.] Came back and walked in the Tuileries, lunched at Le Pre Catelan, walked in the Bois, and went to Lobb for a fitting.' Only you will enjoy this! Anyone listening to this tape in the future will be bored stiff!

S: [laughs.] That doesn't matter; I'm thoroughly enjoying it!

M: [laughs again.] 'Then we went to a movie, A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum.'

S: Oh, yes. Oh, yes.

M: The next day 'I left Hotel Westminster, Paris, at 6:45a.m., drove to La Touquet, 153 miles in three hours. Breakfasted and took the air ferry across the channel to Lydd. Drove to London in two and a half hours.' [Chuckles.]

On September ninth, 'I got to Kingston Vale and a house rented by Mary Cadogan and Doris Pratt for Krishnaji. It was rather dreary. [Both laugh.] We had three bedrooms and one bath upstairs, and downstairs there was a sitting room, dining room, kitchen.' I remember that if you wanted to wash any clothing the idea was to hang it over the stove in the kitchen, which I find squalid! So, it wasn't great, I must say. Anyway, we got there, and 'the Cadogans and Jane[9] were there, and we went over the house. Later I had supper with the Cadogans in an Indian restaurant in Wimbledon.' [Laughs.]

The next day, 'We went to the Heathrow and met Krishnaji and came back to the house by 3:30 p.m.. Went for a long walk in Richmond Park.' That was next door, more or less.

The next day Mary Cadogan came for lunch.

On the twelfth, 'Alain arrived in his Volkswagen in time for lunch.' [Laughs]. Alain must have stayed with Krishnaji in Paris, and then taken him to the Paris airport, and I met him at Heathrow. That makes sense. [Chuckles.]

Then, on the thirteenth 'we went to Huntsman, and I ordered my first suit there, after which we lunched at Mary Links's flat. I then went to the airport to meet Adrianna.' Adrianna was an Italian maid who Vanda had working in Tannegg. I asked her to take care of the house and cook the meals while we were in England, which didn't work too well, but anyway.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Rosalind Rajagopal was in London, and she telephoned Krishnaji and was invited to the house. She came an hour late, and talked to Krishnaji alone and disagreeably.'

S: What do you remember of it?

M: I wasn't present so I didn't know directly, but I know she was being troublesome, saying that Krishnaji must make friends with Rajagopal. She was always on Rajagopal's side.

S: Do you remember the kind of atmosphere she brought in with her? Was she disagreeable when she came in?

M: I just remember that she was disagreeable. My impressions were formed previously that she was a dreadful woman.

Then, Krishnaji started giving his talks in Wimbledon. Every day we walked in Richmond Park.

One morning Krishnaji said that Alain and I should come into his room, and we'd all three meditate together.

S: What did he mean by that?

M: I don't know! [Chuckles.]

S: Did you do it?

M: Yes.

S: What did you do? Describe that.

M: I just sat there. [Both laugh.] Nothing whatever came into my mind.

S: Now were you sitting on the floor?

M: Cross-legged on the floor.

S: And how long did you sit for?

M: I don't know. Not very long. A while.

S: Was it special for you? Or was it…

M: I don't know; it was sort of an experiment, but I don't think anything came of it.

S: What did Krishnaji say about it?

M: I don't know, he didn't say anything. [Both chuckle.]

S: What did Alain say about it?

M: There's no record in my memory. It was like an experiment, but there was no result from the experiment. [Laughs.] But we did it again: 'On the twentieth, meditation with Krishnaji and Alain.' It was just sitting quietly and watching, as it were.

Again, there was Huntsman, different people came to lunch. This is all boring!

S: Was Mr. Cummings at Huntsman in those days?

M: Yes, but Mr. Lintott was still alive, so everything was Mr. Lintott. Mr. Cummings was in the background. I had a second fitting, but my suit was not a success. They can't make women's clothes, at least for me. [Chuckles.]

On September twenty-third, Krishnaji said, "You are not responsible just to yourself anymore. You must be very careful."

S: Yes, he told me that, too, later.

M: Yes, he did.

S: We're running out of tape, so this might be the point to end.

Issue 8: September 1967 to April 1968

In this issue there is a discussion of a part of Krishnaji's understanding of reality that was important to him, but which he never brought into the body of his work: his view of good and evil. Part of this is his sense of "protection" in doing the right things.

There is also a discussion of peculiar relationships which had been part of his life since his boyhood.

Additionally, we see the three-person team of Krishnaji, Mary, and Alain Naudé moving smoothly and expansively around the world—England is decided upon as the venue for the new Krishnamurti school; an editing and publications committee is begun with no relationship to KWINC for the first time; and the first moves are made to recover Krishnaji's copyright.

Mary: I think we left off that Krishnaji was giving talks in Wimbledon and living in Kingston Vale. Does that make sense to you?

Scott: Yes, that sounds about right.

M: I also spoke of the experiment of the three of us sitting cross-legged on the floor in his room in the early morning in dead silence. What it was for the two of them, I do not know!

S: Did Krishnaji have you sit with your back against anything?

M: No; as I see it in my mind's eye, we were sitting on a rug in the middle of the floor. He had a big bedroom.

S: Because, years later when Krishnaji was teaching me pranayama and such like [M chuckles], he would have me sit with my back against the table leg of that white table that his stereo was on…

M: Yes, yes.

S: …so that my whole spine was straight.

M: Well, I think he was not thinking so much about our spines [both laugh] at that point. At least, I can sort of see it in my memory.

S: I'm just trying to picture it, that's all. How many times did you do that?

M: I don't quite know. But we did it several times, but it didn't become a habit by any means! [Chuckles]

S: [laughing] It wasn't a great success then?

M: You'd have to ask the other two! [Both laugh.] But I must say it was very moving to me, and I couldn't put into words why, except that Krishnaji, as you know, could induce tremendous quiet.

S: Yes.

M: And it was, for me at least, a kind of a wonderful space with nothing going on but quiet.

S: What did you do afterwards?

M: Oh, I don't know, I suppose we went and had breakfast or something, I've forgotten now. It was early.

S: It was pre-breakfast.

M: It was pre-breakfast. I guess I went down and got breakfast going, or something like that. No, I'm blank on that.

S: Were you dressed, or were you in exercise clothing or were you in bathrobes or…?

M: I probably had on pants and a sweater or something, in order to sit on the floor. And Krishnaji was in his dressing gown.

S: Right.

M: I've forgotten what Alain had on. He was dressed, I think.

But it was the time (I probably mentioned this the other day) when he began to say, "You are no longer responsible to yourself; you're responsible to something other."

S: Yes, yes.

M: And he was to say that to me over and over through the years to come.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm. If I can just interrupt here, Mary, and perhaps this is just to clarify in my mind, but when Krishnaji said that kind of thing to me many years later…

M: Yes.

S: It was very much in the vein of: you can't just do whatever you want now with your life.

M: Yes, that's right.

S: You can't just take risks, you can't just…

M: The risking was very much a feature of it.

S: Perhaps we ought to talk about that because somehow your life is no longer yours…

M: That's right.

S: …to just do whatever you want to with it.

M: That's right.

S: It's now part of something else, or it is, um…

M: Yes. You are responsible to the something else which was, I supposed, though he didn't say so, "the Other". But now, it wasn't your life any more. You were…

S: Yes, yes.

M: And the risk part, he was very insistent on. Whenever I would go back to California, and not go to India, he would admonish me: "Don't do anything unnecessary that's risky." And that usually was spelled out as unnecessary flying. It was alright for me to fly from wherever we were to New York and then go up to Martha's Vineyard to see my mother because that was necessary. And then fly back to California, but what wasn't alright would be, say I thought I'd like to run up to San Francisco for lunch with somebody tomorrow. Don't do that. You see, that was unnecessary. And he also used to say, though I don't know that he said it at this point, but maybe he did, "When you are with me you are protected, but when you are on your own, I can't protect you." Sometimes he would say, and I suppose one could ask, was he joking or was he serious, but he used to often say, "I'm sending two angels with you." And, I won't interpret that.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Whether he was just saying something metaphorically or not, I don't know. But then he would add, "But don't strain them!" [Laughs.] "Don't make them work too hard." In other words: Don't do foolish things that you could have avoided. In other words: Don't drive the car too fast, and drive carefully. An example of unnecessary things was in Saanen, where I was tempted, though I never did anything about it, to go up in a glider. It turns out he was, too; he thought that would be wonderful!

S: I know, I know.

M: But he thought that that was something that was unnecessary, and he shouldn't do it. And therefore, similarly for whatever came up in my life, I must be careful.

S: Let me give you my impressions of this and get your response. When Krishnaji said similar things to me, it was almost as if, if you were doing something that was necessary, there was an element of protection with you, because you were still somehow part of…

M: You were being responsible to something.

S: Yes, you were somehow part of some activity that you were supposed to be doing. It's like you were in the right place.

M: That's right. Yes.

S: But if you started doing something that was unnecessary, then you were outside of the right place.

M: Mm, hm.

S: And being outside of the right place you no longer had that protection.

M: It wasn't all that categorical.

S: No, it wasn't; I'm just saying this is the sense that I had.

M: Yes, that's right.

S: And, in fact, there was also…you were there when Krishnaji talked about…because we were involved in what we were involved with, there was even something terrible that was more inclined to…come out. I don't know if you want to talk about this.

M: Yes, I do.

S: It's almost like there was something like evil waiting for us to be outside of the zone of protection.

M: That's right. Yes, he said, at some point, I don't remember when, we may come to it later, if I have notes about it, but…he said it more or less…I don't want to try to quote him. I'll just give you my understanding of it. As though evil wanted to get at him…

S: Mm, hm.

M: …and couldn't, because he was protected by…

S: Whatever.

M: He was protected.

S: Yes.

M: Therefore, failing to get at him, evil might try to strike down those who were around him, who were in some way useful to him, a part of what he was doing.

S: Yes.

M: And therefore, we were targets.

S: Yes.

M: He didn't say that exactly, but that was the content.

S: Well, that was very much the sense…and I'm referring to this because the only…well, the first time, not the only time, but certainly the first time Krishnaji talked directly about that to me, was when he prevented me from climbing.

M: Yes.

S: Do you remember?

M: I do remember. [Both laugh.] He went to the heart of it with you…

S: Yes.

M: …because climbing was the most dangerous thing you were doing! [Chuckles.]

S: Yes, yes, and he prevented me from climbing.

M: I know!

S: Initially, he didn't tell me what he was doing, if you remember. He just said…because he had been [chuckles] worried and…this shouldn't be my reminiscences on this tape…

M: No, come on, this is a joint effort.

S: Alright. He had been worried about my climbing, and he'd been admonishing me, etcetera.

M: Yes.

S: And especially because I was climbing alone sometimes. And then one year he asked me at Brockwood before I left for Switzerland, "What are you going to do before the talks?" I said, "Well, I'm just going to walk and go up into the mountains." I didn't say I wasn't going to climb, I just made light of it. And Krishnaji was anxious…

M: Yes.

S: …that year, he was anxious. When I came up to see him, because I always went to see him as soon as I got to Saanen, he was anxious about me.

M: Yes.

S: And he asked me admonishingly, "What were you doing?!"

M: Yes.

S: He was very much scolding, "What were you doing…what…"

M: Yes.

S: And I had planned to go up again into the mountains after the Saanen talks, but as the talks were ending, he said, "Come and stay with me in Tannegg, for, you know…"

M: Yes.

S: "…a few days." And, of course, I was thrilled to stay at Tannegg! [Both chuckle.] I think the Olympics were on.

M: Yes, there was one summer when we were all watching television.

S: Yes, we were watching the Olympics. Anyway, so then the time extended on for a little, you know, I was just…

M: Yes.

S: …staying a little longer, and it dragged on for I don't know how long.

M: You never went walking in the mountains! [Both laugh.]

S: And then the weather went bad.

M: Mm, hm.

S: The weather changed and you could see on the weather map that for the next week it was going to be bad weather, so no climbing. And then Krishnaji said [laughing], "Well, if you want to go, you can go now!" [More laughing.] And that's when I asked, I said, "Now Krishnaji, you've been deliberately keeping me from climbing."

M: Mm, hm.

S: "What is this?"

M: Yes.

S: And that's when he talked with me about the whole thing, and he also said, as part of this whole thing, which is interesting, too, I feel, is that he seemed to sense that there were times when this evil force was stronger than other times. So there were times when it was more risky or was, was something.

M: Yes. Yes.

S: And I think that was also the year that he didn't want you to fly to see Filomena.

M: I'm thinking about that as you're talking.

S: You see because, somehow it was…

M: And one year…

S: Somehow this was…I don't know, and quite frankly and this might all be in my imagination…Krishnaji didn't make this connection to me at all…but there seemed to be something…like it was connected to what Rajagopal was doing. That somehow Rajagopal having…

M: Yes.

S: …more strength…more…was all…

M: It was…

S: …somehow a reflection of this evilness…

M: Yes.

S: …and it was like this was an especially dangerous time.

M: Yes. Well, I used to try to go every summer just for two days or three nights or something, to see Filomena—for the benefit of whoever listens to this in the future, she was a very dear and, by then, a very old Italian woman who had been in my family in various capacities…she was a maid to my aunt, and then she came to me and my husband after my aunt died. She was really a member of my family, more than her own family, and I felt the same way about her. She had gone back to Italy thinking she was ill (she wasn't really) to be with her family—she had retired, in other words. So I would try and fly down to see her in the summers, and it was alright. But then there was one summer when, really, it was upsetting, because Krishnaji asked me to telephone when I got to Rome. I drove down to the airport in Geneva and telephoned, and said, I'm here, on the plane any minute. But when I got to Rome, I couldn't get to a telephone until much later.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And he was worried that something had happened to me.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And I felt awful about it because I suspected this. And then, again, I'm not sure of the sequence, but I think it was the following year, which is the one you're referring to, Krishnaji asked me not to go. And it was, for me, difficult because Filomena lived for those visits. And I couldn't bear to hurt her in any way.

S: I remember it. I remember it.

M: But naturally when Krishnaji asked me not to go, I didn't go.

S: Yes, of course.

M: I tried to explain it to her as best I could.

S: Mm, hm.

M: There was that element that something might have attacked me, in a way.

S: Mm, hm.

M: When we were in Malibu, and I'd go into Los Angeles to do errands, if I was late coming back, he'd often be standing near the gate, waiting for me. And he would say, "I could feel you were coming."

S: Mm, hm.

M: He often had a sense when something was about to happen.

S: Mm, hm.

M: I remember when my father died, we were in Tannegg, and my father wasn't well at all and Krishnaji knew that. He hadn't been for a long time. But the woman who was looking after him, called me and that's how I learned that he'd died. I was in my room, and Krishnaji came in seconds later. He had sensed what had happened without knowing it.

S: Mm, hm.

This seems similar, in a way, continuing on this theme a little bit, this kind of sensing that there were moments of greater danger than other moments.

M: Yes.

S: At the end, in Ojai, when Krishnaji wanted us…remember there was a period we were never to leave him alone. It was a moment of particular danger. I think we both slept on the floor of his bedroom.

M: Yes. That's right. We both slept on the floor.

S: We were taking turns, but that one night it somehow…and then the next day he said, "It's passed."

M: Yes. "It's passed." that's right. And the first thing he said to me when he came back that last time [from India], if you remember I brought his car and drove him back, and you and Parchure went with Mark Lee and all the luggage followed.

S: Yes, yes.

M: The minute he got in the car he said, "I must tell you something very serious. You mustn't leave me alone for even a moment, for the next forty-eight hours." He didn't explain why, but it was…danger.

S: Mm, hm.

M: In a way, it was like what he told me to do in the hospital, but we'll get to all that later, and the thin line between living and dying, which he said was the way he lived.

S: Yes, yes.

M: The danger was that he would "slip away," as he put it during the operation and afterwards. And I must somehow prevent it. We'll come to that later.

S: Yes, but that's slightly different, isn't it? Because that wasn't a sense of some menace. That was a sense of his perhaps slipping away, and you were to prevent it. But this other thing we're talking about is like an active menace that somehow is waxing and waning.

M: Yes. Some extraneous thing was threatening or trying to threaten in some way. [Long pause.]

It's curious. Of course, this is all out of sync with our story, but since it came up…I suppose we should just talk about whatever we think of.

S: Yes.

M: Well, especially in his last few years, he had this feeling about darkness, that there was kind of…when the sun is gone, the forest, which he loved, and he felt a wonderful place to be…evil went into the forest at night. He said he would never go into a forest alone at night.

S: I remember something like that, that he felt there was a very strong sense of menace in a forest at night.

M: Yes. But there was also protection. I said, "Would you go in with me?" and he said, "Yes, but only if you were there." And, for instance at Ojai, apparently he wouldn't have gone out of the house at night alone, even to walk to Arya Vihara[1] for instance, once it was dark.

S: Mm, hm.

M: I mean he had no occasion to go, but I asked, "What if?" and he said no he wouldn't. It's as though something menacing, something evil, would come with darkness, and could creep into an otherwise benign and much loved place.

S: Yes.

M: Curious, isn't it?

S: It is very curious. It's very curious because…well, for a lot of reasons, but here was something that had a great deal of reality for Krishnaji, but he never brought it into his teachings.

M: No.

S: Now I can easily understand why, because of the superstition and the hysteria and all the imaginations.

M: Yes. What people would do with this?

S: I suspect that many people would just make a hash of it.

M: I know.

S: But it was something that was very real for Krishnaji.

M: Well, he said very categorically, if you like, that there is such a thing as good and evil.

S: Evil, yes.

M: And one is not the other face of the same coin. There is no relation between the two. But both exist.

S: Yes. Also I would just say this: when Krishnaji, this first time when he was talking with the two of us about this, and I can tell you exactly where we were when we got to that part of the conversation. We were on the walk, and we had just…

M: In Switzerland.

S: In Switzerland, walking up through the forest from Tannegg.

M: Yes.

S: And it was just where the path comes out to the road…

M: Yes.

S: …where he finally got to this topic, and we stopped and talked about it.

M: Yes.

S: And as Krishnaji was speaking about it, and he spoke very hesitantly, as though he felt he had to say some of these things, I think because I was forcing it with my questioning, in a way. But he also said something I can't exactly quote, but something to the effect that one has to be very careful in talking about it because you invite it if you talk about it.

M: Well, I was about to say that very thing. He said to me many times, not many times, but several times, it's better not…you shouldn't talk about evil…it invites it.

S: Mm, hm.

M: He said that, I know, in Ojai, he said it to me. And he also felt the contamination, as it were, of people who had evil intent or something evil in them. For instance, again this is way out of the progression of this saga, he told me I must never let either Rajagopal or Rosalind come into the cottage. Those two, he said…

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: Never let them come into this place. And so, at the very end, when he was so ill, I went to him and said, "You told me never to let either of them in here, but supposing the doorbell rings and I open the door and Rajagopal is on the doorstep, what do I do?" Of course, Rajagopal never did give a sign that Krishnaji was dying. But Krishnaji, in a way, shrugged, you know, as if he was saying well, I'm dying, you know. In other words, whatever, he was beyond being affected by it.

S: Mm, hm. Would you let either of them into the cottage? Well, Rajagopal is dead, but would you let Rosalind into the cottage now?

M: No! Heavens no!

S: I wouldn't either.

M: No, I would never have let him in, or her in, either, not that she would come.

So, he had a perception of good and evil as realistic forces.

S: Yes, as real things.

M: The way there is, I don't know, electricity or something.

S: Yes.

Well, we've had a little digression here. [Chuckles.]

M: Big digression. Shall we go back to September 1967?

S: Absolutely.

M: Where were we?

On September twenty-fourth, Robert Lutyens, the brother of Mary, who Krishnaji hadn't seen for probably decades. Decades! He and his wife invited Krishnaji to tea at their house on Mansfield Street[2]. I suppose they hadn't met in, good lord, I don't know when!

And at this point Mary and Robert were estranged. And his wife wasn't very sympathetic to all this. Anyway, we went for tea [S chuckles], and Krishnaji hadn't been for so long to the Mansfield Street house where he went so often. It was quite an interesting time. They had a child who was there, and the child and Robert seemed to get on quite well.

S: That's nice.

Was this the last family home? I mean, was this where Sir Edwin and Lady Emily lived?

M: Yes. They lived in it. Robert had inherited it, I guess, or acquired it in some way. It was interesting.

Then, Krishnaji had more young people discussions, which were held in the Wimbledon Community Center. The Bohms used to come and go for walks in Richmond Park with us. Krishnaji and Dave would walk ahead talking, or Saral and I would walk ahead talking. It was just the way he and David always were: discussing something intently.

Then later that week, I think it was, Krishnaji, Alain, and I drove down to East Grinstead to look at a house to buy! [Both laugh.] It was an Elizabethan house, a small one. A friend of mine who lived near there suggested that we go look at it. And we did. We didn't like it, but it was fun to go and look.

S: Mm, hm.

M: This is part of the question of where shall we live in Europe—all together, everybody. These were sort of pipe dreams, I guess. [Chuckles.]

S: Yes, yes. East Grinstead…I can't remember, but didn't Krishnaji spend time there as a boy with a tutor to help him get into Oxford?

M: Yes, he stayed at Ashdown Forest. There was a so-called cramming school.

S: That's right, isn't that near East Grinstead?

M: Yes. Ashdown Forest is right near East Grinstead. Mary writes about it in her book.

And that same week we went to Cecil Beaton's for photographs.

S: Mm, hm.

M: That's when those pictures were taken. I had known Cecil for years because of my career as a model. He used to come to New York in the winter, and there'd be parties and all kinds of goings-on. So when we wanted to have photographs for publications and had none, I called Cecil up out of the blue. I hadn't talked to him in years and years, and asked if he would like to photograph someone who is very interesting. And I said, "I think you'll like him because he's the most extraordinarily beautiful human being." That interested Cecil very much. So we went, and he took the pictures.

S: How old was Cecil Beaton at this point?

M: Oh, lord. Well, he was getting on. I suppose when I first knew him, which was in the thirties, he was, I suppose in his thirties then. So he would be in the sixties by now.

S: How did Krishnaji and he get on?

M: Well, I've seen Cecil in endless photographic sessions where he's very cheery and talkative. He has a way of making the subject relax [chuckles] by his chatter. He was the same way with Krishnaji, and he was very enthusiastic because he saw the remarkable face. The three of us went—Alain, Krishnaji, and I, and Cecil actually took a photo of the three of us; it isn't good, but he took a picture at the end of it of the three of us.

M: It's not very good.

S: [laughing] Oh, why haven't I seen it though, Mary?!

M: I don't know. [S laughs again.] I suppose I have it at home. He did it as a sort of present.

S: Well, I'd like to see that.

M: Well, if you come to Ojai, I'll try to find it. [Laughs.]

S: Alright, I'll be there in February.

M: Hm…

S: What did Krishnaji say about Cecil Beaton?

M: He didn't say much of anything. I don't remember what he said. [Chuckles.] But it was entertaining for me to see. [S laughs.]

S: Yes, from the little I know of Cecil Beaton, which is very, very little, I don't see a natural rapport occurring between them.

M: No, but Cecil had a great eye for beauty and quality—he was sensitive to those things. So I knew that he would very much like to do it. He put one of the photographs, one that I didn't like in a book of…well, he used to publish books of his photographs.

S: Yes.

M: I didn't like it much, but he thought it was very poetic and beautiful. It's a profile of Krishnaji, almost turned away from the camera. Anyway, so we did that.

S: Where was that?

M: At Cecil's house, in Pelham Place. He took pictures in those days just with a Rolleiflex and natural light. There was no big studio business.

S: Mm, hm. There were no artificial lights?

M: No, not in this one. I mean, he presumably did for other things, but that day he was using just a Rolleiflex and daylight coming through the window.

Again, there were public discussion meetings in Wimbledon at the Wimbledon Community Center.

Of course, whenever London was anywhere nearby, there were trips to Huntsman, after which we lunched at the L'Aperitif, which Krishnaji liked very much. It doesn't exist anymore, regrettably, and was supplanted by Fortnum's, which was a considerable comedown in the quality of the food. It was on Jermyn Street, but somebody bought the building, and the man who ran it, the mâitre d'hôtel, moved to Brown's Hotel and we went there and tried it once, but it wasn't the same. The chef was different, I suppose.

S: Why on earth did you and Krishnaji settle on Fortnum's where the food was so awful?!

M: I know! Because it was near Huntsman! [Both laugh.] And because the tables weren't close together. Mary suggested it.

S: Yes, so you could get some distance from other diners. But my god, there must have been other restaurants in walking distance of Huntsman.

M: You'd think so, but, no, there aren't. Name one. You can't.

S: Claridge's?

M: Claridge's is quite a ways away. I don't think he would have liked that.

S: Jermyn Street? Aren't there any others on Jermyn Street?

M: Not restaurants; there's a hotel. Anyway, it became Fortnum's.

S: …where the food was just appalling!

M: [laughs] Well, they had just the one monotonous dish that was vegetarian.

S: Yes. The onion flan or cheese flan.

M: The flan, yes. It really had nothing to recommend it except that we created our own tradition [both laugh], which became compelling!

S: Yes, and the Scottish lady.

M: Yes, Angela.

Angela's not there anymore. Mary told me the other day that she's working in Harrod's.

Krishnaji gave six talks in Wimbledon. There are the usual notations in my diary of walking in the park, etcetera. [Laughing.] This is rather repetitious.

I see that Pamela Travers came to lunch.

S: Ahh, yes, the Mary Poppins lady.

M: Yes. She came with Mary Cadogan. I think Mary Cadogan brought her to meet Krishnaji. That was the beginning of her contact. The trouble is that the ink is [chuckles] faded in this! [S laughs.] I'm having difficulty.

S: See, it should all be transcribed.

M: Oh lord! Well, I should live so long, as they say.

Now we're into October! We left Kingston Vale, drove to the airport and then Krishnaji and the maid Adrianna (who had come from Vanda to help us) flew to Rome. Alain and I, in his Volkswagen, drove to Lydd, flew on the air ferry to Le Touquet and drove on to Paris. I went to my father's to stay, and then I flew to New York.

Ah, there's more detail in this other diary—September twenty-eighth to October fourth. 'I went with Krishnaji in a taxi to the airport and Alain followed with the maid.' Then, like I said about Alain and I to Paris. While there, 'I settled the April rental for the house for the next year on the Rue de Verdun. Alain was to see Gérard Blitz, and then leave for Rome on the sixth of October. I arranged with Blitz to see him in Los Angeles after he had been to see Rajagopal.' I forget if I described this but…

S: You did. Yes. Blitz was going to talk to Rajagopal.

M: Yes, Blitz was going to talk business-man to business-man to find out what this was all about. So we spoke on the phone, and the next day I flew to New York and then, a week later, I flew on to Malibu.

On the eighteenth of October, I met Blitz and heard about his seeing Rajagopal. Somewhere there's a recording of that conversation, at least I thought I taped it. God knows where it is now. But he apparently had a lonnnng talk with Rajagopal, which he described to me. I then telephoned Krishnaji and Alain in Rome to report it. Blitz said that Rajagopal talked from ten points of the compass, you know; he'd be at times surly and antagonistic, and then he'd be ingratiating, and then he'd be very manipulative. Really nothing came out of it. They just talked for hours, apparently.

S: Hm.

M: Anyway, I reported it all.

S: Can you remember Krishnaji's response to your report?

M: No. It says here, 'I woke up at midnight for a clearer connection and telephoned Rome, spoke to Alain, then to Krishnaji.' They were leaving for India the next day. So, that was it.

S: Mm, hm. Why did you not go to India that year?

M: Couldn't tell you. Don't remember. I didn't go to India for quite some time. I went the first two times. And then I didn't go for a long time. More or less he didn't need me in India. There were a lot of people there to do what was needed. Alain was with him, and I had to sort of catch up with my own life a little bit. So I went on and did that.

S: Of course, of course.

M: It says here that 'I got a letter on the twenty-third from Krishnaji posted from the airport in Rome, which would have been the twentieth of October.'

And then on November third, 'I met Blitz at the airport and gave him papers from Krishnaji. He flew on to Paris postponing meeting Rajagopal again the next day.' He was supposed to meet him again. I've forgotten why he didn't. He had some business problem.

By this time, Krishnaji was on tour; in November he was in Rishi Valley. I got a letter from Alain in Rishi Valley on November thirteenth with a memoranda from Madhavachari for our lawyers. So we were already involved with lawyers.

S: In the Rajagopal case?

M: Yes, it hadn't become a case yet but it was heading that way. And, well, my notes from then on are just when Krishnaji moved around from Delhi to Rajghat to Delhi to…so forth…

S: Yes.

M: Oh, wait a minute, before I leave this, it says here, 'On December seventeenth, Blitz returned and had a seven-hour conversation with Rajagopal at the Vigevenos'.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'After that he came back to Malibu for dinner, and he taped a report for Krishnaji, and I cabled Krishnaji in Rajghat.'

On the nineteenth it says, 'Blitz telephoned me to ask if his lunch tomorrow at the Vigevenos' could be held at my house, and so I called them up and invited them.' And on the twentieth, 'Blitz arrived in the morning and made a second taped report for K. The Vigevenos came at twelve for a discussion and lunch. Blitz gave them his reaction to his meeting with Rajagopal. They left, and I posted the tape to K in Madras.' Well, that's about it.

S: Right.

M: Blitz was hoping in those days that the Vigevenos would somehow be helpful.

S: Yes.

M: But they were active in the case against Krishnaji from then on.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: So that was the end of 1967.

S: Before we get started in 1968, can I ask you about Krishnaji writing to you?

M: Well, I was about to say on the third of January I got a letter from him discussing the tapes that Gérard Blitz had made in reporting the conversations with Rajagopal. I think it was this year or '67 really, when he went to India, that I think he wrote to me every day. Which means that he would write a little every day, like a running diary of what he was doing. He would write a paragraph, either short or long, and when he'd covered two pages, he would have it posted. So, I didn't get a letter every day, but I would get letters that continued and that contained something from every day. And he continued this to the very end of it all, except eventually it became tapes.

S: Yes, I remember, I remember well.

M: Yes.

And then I got a letter from Alain about Krishnaji speaking in Claremont College the next autumn. He thought that that was a good idea and so forth, and so did I, and Krishnaji did eventually do that.

It says here that on the twelfth I met Blitz at the Los Angeles Airport between flights, and he suggested meeting Krishnaji in March, in London. Also that Mary Links had written, suggesting that when we came back to London that we stay at the White House Hotel on Marylebone Road.

On January thirtieth, Rosalind Rajagopal telephoned me, asking to see me. She came to Malibu in the afternoon, but it was a completely pointless conversation. She rambled on about how awful it all was, and then she started to talk against Alain. I said, "Look, we can discuss anything you want, but I will not discuss Alain Naudé with you. He's a friend of mine and that's out." But all she really wanted to say was attacking him. At one point I remember, she said she had some proof that she wanted to show me; a letter that proved something. She went out to her car and came back with some papers and proceeded to read me a letter [chuckles], which she didn't know that I'd already heard, because it was a letter she had written to Krishnaji, and he had read it to me, or I'd read it. So this proof of whatever it was she was trying to say wasn't a letter of any proof: it was her own concoction. She didn't know I knew that. [Both laugh.] Anyway, it was a completely pointless conversation, and she was just meddling, or trying to.

On the twentieth of January, I got a cable from Alain about meeting in March.

On the twenty-first, Krishnaji and Alain were going to Bombay.

On the fourteenth of February, Krishnaji and Alain left Bombay for Rome. Also that day, James Vigeveno telephoned, asking if he and his wife Annie could come to see me, which they did. They came down to Malibu, and they had a proposal for me from Ojai, [chuckles] meaning Rajagopal. The proposal was that I join the board of KWINC, as a trustee. So I asked them if they had consulted Krishnaji about this, and Annie said that she didn't see that that was necessary. [S laughs.] How do you like that! So I said I couldn't even discuss such a thing, unless it came from Krishnaji. So they left. [Chuckles.]

S: Good old Mary. Boy, I tell you the…

M: [laughing] Impossible!

S: It never stops…

M: Unbelievable what people will…

S: It's still…but it…I mean, it still goes on!

M: I know.

S: It would have served their purposes beautifully to have you on the board.

M: Yes. To have me as a figurehead.

S: Of course.

M: [laughs] Anyway, the next day I went to Claremont to look at possible places for K to stay when he spoke there the following November, and somewhere in here I got a cable from Krishnaji with a message to the Vigevenos. I've forgotten what it was now, but something to do with all of that. At this point my notes say: 'New guest quarters by garage finished.' This was because the house in Malibu had only two main bedrooms and baths, and it had the room that Filomena used which was in the back. So when Krishnaji and Alain were there I slept on the couch in the living room and used Filomena's bath. So, if they were going to be coming regularly, we needed more rooms. So I built a little apartment onto the garage, further back on the lot.

S: So alright, now here's a new piece of information that we didn't have before. That, when Krishnaji and Alain were staying with you in Malibu, you slept on a couch in the living room!

M: Yes! [S laughs.] Naturally!

S: So, Krishnaji had which room? Your room or the guest room?

M: He had, what was then, the guest room, what had been Sam's room. The house had my room and then Sam's room; each had a bath.

S: Right. So Krishnaji had Sam's room?

M: Yes.

S: And Alain was in your room?

M: Yes.

S: And you slept in the living room on a couch.

M: Yes.

S: And used the maid's bathroom.

M: It was the same couch, by the way, that you later slept on in Ojai!

S: Oh, I know that couch! That's a very comfortable couch!

M: It's a very comfortable couch. [S laughs.] It makes an excellent bed, and it's very easy to make up; you don't have to have all kinds of a…

S: I know. Although whenever I slept on that, I felt I should have been much taller! [Both laugh.]

M: It's a twelve-foot couch!

S: That's just it. I felt I should have been much taller.

M: Well, it served its purpose very well.

S: Yes. So you built the guest apartment onto the garage? How did you envisage that being used? Did you envisage yourself using that? Or Alain using that?

M: Either Alain could use it if he wanted to be aloof and independent or…

S: So you could stay in your room!

M: Yes! [Both laugh.] Or Filomena could move up there, and he could have her room.

S: Where was Filomena during this time? Filomena stayed in her room?

M: She stayed in her room while I was on the sofa.

S: Right, so then you shared her bathroom with her?

M: Yes. It was easy, I could scuttle through the kitchen to her bath.

S: Right.

M: But anyway, it was finished then, so all was in order.

On March second, I flew to New York. There were letters from Krishnaji waiting for me there. I arranged for an apartment for September in New York, which at that time was my ex-sister-in-law's flat, which I rented from her.

S: Bud's ex-wife?

M: Bud's first, yes, Bud's first wife.

On the ninth, I flew to London from New York. The next day I lunched with Mary Links, and then Alain telephoned from Rome, and it says here: 'We are not going to Castellaras.' Castellaras is in the south of France, and Blitz had a house there, and he was insistent that Krishnaji come and stay there, and there was much backwards and forwards about that, but in the end we never went.

S: Because Krishnaji didn't want to?

M: Yes. There was still the notion that someday we would all have a house someplace. And Blitz wanted Krishnaji to see Castellaras in case that plan ever panned out.

S: Right, so that you might buy a house in Castellaras area?

M: Something like that.

S: Right. Did Krishnaji, for personal reasons, not feel it was right?

M: I don't remember. It didn't sound like something we'd like. It was one of those things where it's a closed settlement of rich people who have houses and nobody else can come and all that. It didn't sound like what we'd like.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And, I don't know, I didn't take much to Blitz. I mean he was being helpful then, but…

S: That's why I'm asking this; whether you didn't take to Blitz or Krishnaji wasn't really taking to Blitz, or what.

M: Well, at that point he was being helpful, so Krishnaji thought well of him, but he wasn't someone who was terribly congenial. He sort of wanted to boss everything.

S: Yes.

M: On the fourteenth I dined with Mary and Joe and her daughter and son-in-law; and Mary gave me the manuscript of her book on Krishnaji to read. The first one. That was a big event.

S: Of the first biography?

M: Yes, the first volume of the biography.

S: Ahhh. But it didn't come out until much later?[3]

M: Well it didn't, but she'd written it; there was a manuscript, yes.

Then on March eighteenth, I flew to Paris and stayed with my father. One day we went out to lunch in Barbizon, at a very good restaurant there called the Bas-Breau. My father was partial to it. They had rooms to rent, so I looked at the rooms and booked rooms for the interval between London and our rental of the house on Rue de Verdun. We'll come to that in a moment.

Then on the twenty-second, I went back to London and the White House Hotel and moved in, and at 5 o'clock, Mary and Joe came, and we all went to meet Krishnaji at the airport. He flew in from Rome.

S: Would you have gone in two separate cars?

M: No, we went together. I don't know how we managed that, but we did. I didn't have a car there then. But, when we got back to the hotel, Alain had already arrived in his car. He drove from Rome. Vanda had put Krishnaji on the plane, and we met him. And in the mean-time Alain had driven his Volkswagen. So that night, Krishnaji, Alain, and I had supper together in our sitting room. The reason White House Hotel was chosen was that it had little kitchens, so I could get meals for us.

On the March twenty-third, Blitz arrived, and Krishnaji, Blitz, Alain, and I discussed everything all day [chuckles]. Lunching in the hotel—you could lunch there, too. And the next day 'again an all-morning discussion between Krishnaji, Alain, Blitz, and me. And then I took them all to lunch at the Savoy Grill.' [S laughs.] 'Came back to the hotel where Mary Cadogan brought a solicitor, a Mr. Michael Rubinstein[4], who specializes in copyright law.'

S: Ah ha. Enter Michael Rubinstein.

M: Enter Michael Rubinstein into our lives. Blitz then left and Sunanda Patwardhan came to see Krishnaji. She was in London.

Then the next day, on the twenty-fifth, 'Kitty Shiva Rao turned up. She was in London for one day, and she came to breakfast. And then Sunanda and husband, Pama Patwardhan came, and K told them of his break with Rajagopal.' And then, we went to Huntsman! [Both laugh.] What else!

S: Of course!

M: I took Kitty shopping. Then all of us, including Mary Links lunched at a restaurant Mary and Joe like called Angelo, an Italian restaurant.

On March twenty-sixth, 'the Bohms, Mary Cadogan, Dorothy and Montague Simmons came to discuss the school.'

S: May I just interrupt for a minute here? Do you remember the conversation with Michael Rubinstein?

M: Well, we brought him up to date on how things were, the discussions with Blitz, and what he'd said, and what he would do and wouldn't do and all that.

S: And did Michael see that you had the right case and you could get the copyright back and all that?

M: Yes, that was his opinion. I don't remember when he delivered that opinion to us. At the moment I can't remember, it may say in here, but that was really our first worry and concern—what would happen when Krishnaji broke off from Rajagopal, what would happen to the tapes, and the books, and Krishnaji's copyright, and everything?

S: Of course.

M: That was really THE, THE concern. And that was why Michael was chosen—his saying that no, you can't give away your copyright for life [which Rajagopal had had Krishnaji do], it's against some English law. I do remember that because it struck me as sort of funny in a way, that it was rooted in some concept of slavery. Don't ask me how or why, but that was an ingredient.

S: Sure, that all of your labor belonged ahead of time to someone else.

M: Yes, that was the idea. And, of course, this made a huge difference in a view of the future.

S: Of course, of course.

M: Anyway, we have Dorothy and Montague, who came to discuss the school, and the decision was made to go ahead and buy a place near Canterbury [chuckles] for the school.

S: At what point was it decided that the school would be in England? You see, because the last time that we heard…

M: Yes.

S: …and incidentally, since we last spoke, I pulled out and listened to the tapes of the 1967 education discussions in Saanen, and Krishnaji is saying, "we're going to have a school in Holland."

M: Yes.

S: So how, when, where did it change to England?

M: Well, as I recall, he was sending people off to find out about the different countries, what were the requirements, in Holland, England, France, Switzerland, etcetera. And I guess by now, although I don't remember when, it was apparent that England was going to win out. We must have heard from the other people. In Holland, I seem to remember, you had to teach part of the curriculum in Dutch, which limited things considerably. And France, de Gaulle was still alive and who knew what would happen when he either died or revolution occurred or something. Switzerland—there were too many private schools, and all too expensive, anyway. England was the obvious choice because there was freedom in England to do whatever you wanted scholastically, and by this time, Krishnaji was sure that he wanted Dorothy to be the principal. So, in the intervening months they'd obviously made some investigations. I remember that the Canterbury place…I never saw it, but I saw pictures of it, and it didn't look as nice as Brockwood.

So after talking to Dorothy and Montague, Krishnaji, Alain, and I lunched at the L'Aperitif, and then Krishnaji and I went to a cinema called Scalp Hunters [both laugh]. We walked back to the hotel from that and had supper in the rooms.

It says here for another day that we had lunch with Mary, and we went for tea with Mrs. Bindley. She was sweet, Mrs. Bindley.

S: Tell me about her, because I know she was from the old theosophical days.

M: Yes. She was the representative of the TS in Scotland.

S: Yes. Wow.

M: [both laugh] And she lived all by herself in a house up near the Kensington Church Street. I used to take Krishnaji there for tea, and then I'd wander through all the antique stores on Kensington Church Street while they chatted, and come back to pick him up.

S: So she had her own house there?

M: She had her own house. She was a very independent little lady.

S: Yes.

M: The Digbys lived not too far away and they kind of kept an eye on her.

S: Mm, hm. So you would drive Krishnaji there to tea and drop him off?

M: Yes, and in later years, some evenings, when he spoke at the Friends Place, he would come in from Brockwood and go to Mrs. Bindley's and rest there before going on to the talk. She was a little Scots lady; very, very nice. White hair, and a sort of bird-like manner, and she adored Krishnaji. She was really charming.

S: Hm.

M: Some dentist appointments are in here, and Krishnaji had a meeting with the Editing Committee. This must have been the beginning of the Publications Committee. Of course it would be Mary Links, Mary Cadogan, the Digbys, and at some point Ian Hammond comes into it.

On the twenty-ninth, after going to see Michael Rubinstein at Gray's Inn[5], Krishnaji went to the dentist, then to Huntsman, then Lobb. [Chuckles.]

S: He was going to Lobb in London?

M: Yes, he tried out Lobb in London again, but they failed the test.

S: Yes. Which dentist was he going to at this point?

M: Mr. Campion. I think Mary went to Mr. Campion or Joe or somebody, that's how we went to Mr. Campion.

It says here that on the same day, the twenty-ninth, 'I took the boat train to Paris, and then I went to Orly, where I met Krishnaji at 2:30 p.m., in a rented car.' Oh, this was a lovely time. 'We drove to Barbizon and the Hôtellerie du Bas-Breau. It was perfectly heavenly.'

As you entered, you came into a courtyard, and there was the hotel with a wonderful restaurant in it. But on the other side of the courtyard there was another building where they had a few rooms for rent. It was very quiet and very nice. We had two very nice rooms there. And we could walk in the forest, but it was rather cold. It was lovely. We could order from the restaurant and have supper delivered to the rooms. So Krishnaji could have supper in his dressing gown and go to bed early. Our routine was to walk in the forest before lunch, take long naps, go for another walk, and then supper in rooms.

Then on the first of April, two days later, he dictated a letter to the schools.

S: Oh, is that when that started?

M: Yes.

S: But the first Letters to the Schools wasn't actually circulated until much later.

M: Hmm, that's true. Well, I don't know whether that was an individual letter or the beginning of that series of letters. We'll see if it talks about it.

S: Because I don't think the letters to the schools started circulating until something like '76 or '77 even.

M: Well, it might have been just one letter that he wrote, I don't remember well enough.

It seems we drove over to Fontainebleau, but Krishnaji didn't want to go in. He's not a museum person. We sort of just stared at the palace. And then we walked in the snow. A snow-storm!

S: Good lord!

M: Mmm. It's cold! And it says here that we talked to Mary in London, and that her grandson Adam had just been born.

Krishnaji dictated in the morning, but I don't know whether that was these letters to schools or whether it was just letters to people, you know, correspondence.

S: He dictated to you?

M: Yes, yes, he would have. If Alain had been there, it would have been Alain, but it was me.

S: Did Alain have shorthand?

M: No. He wrote it all out in very scratchy longhand.

S: And you don't have shorthand either, so Krishnaji had to speak slowly if he was dictating to you.

M: Yes, well, one sort of… luckily he wasn't a fast dictator. And one developed a kind of shorthand that worked.

On the fourth of April, we were in the restaurant, as I recall, and saw a newspaper at another table that Martin Luther King had been shot. I remember the shock of that.

S: Mmm. Because you had marched with him from Selma to Montgomery. What was Krishnaji's response to Martin Luther King's assassination?

M: Just horrible. You know, I mean a sense of something truly ugly having happened.

On the fifth, which was the next day, we drove to Paris, and moved into the little house on the Rue de Verdun, unpacked, and called Alain in London.

This time, from the time we left London to when the Paris talks began, was meant to be a rest for Krishnaji. So, we went for walks in the afternoon in the Bois, and saw for lunch people we thought of as friends, like Mary and Yo de Manziarly. Yo was the younger sister who eventually turned and supported Rajagopal. She came under the influence of her older sister Mima Porter. But in those days she lived in Paris, and she was amiable.

There was a cook-cum-maid who came with the place, so my tasks were lighter.

We also went to the movies, of course, High Noon on this particular day. [Chuckles.]

S: Can I interrupt for a minute?

M: Yes.

S: It has to do with Yo, who you said had turned against Krishnaji eventually because of her older sister. It might be worth just talking about this for a minute or two because it's such an extraordinary phenomenon, and it seems to go on in this world of the teachings and the people around it, where someone can turn against Krishnaji or against another person. Now, obviously it's poignant for its own reasons, but it seems incredible that anybody could turn against Krishnaji.

M: I know [softly, sorrowfully].

S: Now, how did he respond to this? How did he take this? What did he do with it, or why do you see it happened? While perhaps Yo was influenced by her older sister, that's not the base of it. That can't be the base of it. There has to be something else going on. This happened to so many people.

M: I know.

S: Look at the Rajagopal crowd.

M: Yes.

S: Look at people like Wedgwood and Arundale[6].

M: Yes.

S: I mean all kinds of people, actually.

M: Yes.

S: Someone once said to me, "Oh, well, Krishnaji drops people." But Krishnaji said he never dropped people.

M: He never dropped anybody.

M: They dropped him.

S: But how?! I still can't…

M: People felt very strongly about Krishnaji, and if they had certain expectations of how he should be toward them, and when they didn't get that…they weren't recognized in some way, that may set up a terrible enmity. I don't know.

S: I think that there's something else that goes on. Again, this might just be a speculation, but it looks as though, from the bits that I have seen, despite everything Krishnaji says about the ego, that people's egos actually often get increased somehow.

M: Yes. I see what you mean.

S: It's like they start to walk around thinking: "Oh now, I'm more religious, I'm more enlightened or self-actualized than some other person."

M: Mm, hm.

S: And they actually become…

M: It's a kind of super-egotism.

S: Yes, a super-egotism if people aren't actually serious enough.

M: Yes.

S: And, of course, Krishnaji doesn't feed that, and I think people go to Krishnaji for confirmation of their superiority…

M: That's right, yes.

S: But they don't get that. And I think that they turn against Krishnaji because of that.

M: I think there's a large element of that.

S: And then there's also something about…if anybody listens to Krishnaji, they get a glimpse of something so extraordinarily wonderful. And at the same time, if we look deeply at ourselves, there is a lot that's really very ugly.

M: Mm.

S: And the deep challenge that Krishnaji set us…

M: I think the deep challenge is very much a part of it, because I'm thinking of, well now, I'm thinking actually of David Shainberg, where you've seen something and you haven't been able to rise to it. Therefore, the firmly entrenched ego says: "Well, it's his fault, not mine."

S: Yes.

M: It's the fault of the teachings. Or it's the fault of the way he lives, or the way he combs his hair, or the way…something…anything. And that fault is what's preventing me from realizing what I could if only he were different. You see what I mean?

S: Yes.

M: They displace…

S: All of their frustrations and their inadequacies.

M: And it's all his fault.

S: Which is, of course, repeated.

M: Yes.

S: But it is extraordinary, I mean, I still find it extraordinary that people don't catch themselves, here in front of this man that they couldn't catch themselves.

M: Yes, yes. The fact that people over and over say it's his fault, or the teaching's fault if everybody doesn't realize it. [Laughing.] It's nobody's fault but the person!

S: Yes, yes. I think there's an element, too, in this, which Mary Links talked with me about when she, in a way, left Krishnaji in 1929.

M: Yes.

S: It was, for her, as if the intensity of being with Krishnaji and all that he is, and all that he was doing internally, and all that was therefore called upon in a person…like she burned out…she couldn't face any more, and, without thinking, without anything, she just turned away.

M: Yes. Yes.

S: And, in a certain way that in itself is something significant that we should somehow be looking at because most people, if they, you know, they're with someone, and then they grow a little tired of that person, they simply don't see them quite so often. Instead of seeing them every week, they will see them every month and then three times a year. That's the way most people respond to estrangement; most don't react to others the way they reacted to Krishnaji.

M: Yes.

S: It says something profound about him that there was this deep kind of challenge.

M: And of course, too, in Mary's case, well, it's up to her to talk about her reasons, but it was also that she couldn't go on living in this sort of a limbo that it was for her.

S: Yes, of course.

M: I mean, she couldn't lead a worldly life and simultaneously lead a spiritual life; that was too much for her.

S: Mm, hm.

M: But she didn't turn against him.

S: No. Mary Links never turned against him.

M: No. No, no.

S: But she just had to kind of get space, get away and get off the merry-go-round she was on.

M: Yes.

S: Mind you, it was also a pretty crazy time, 1929, Eerde[7] and all the rest of it.

M: Yes.

S: But also Krishnaji had seen all this before, I guess, or he knew this happened, that people who were for him turned suddenly against him.

M: Yes, all those [chuckles] nutty theosophists, the Arundale types he'd seen all that, intensely egotistical…

S: Yes. And the Rajagopal crowd: wife, and then the daughter, someone who as a little girl had Krishnaji's attention and affection as she was growing up, and then she turns into that!

M: Yes.

The Suarèses are another kind of example of this.

S: Mm, hm.

M: You see, when Krishnaji decided not to stay with the Suarèses, it was because he had felt unwelcome there.

S: Yes, yes.

M: They took him for granted and complained about. "There's so much to do when you're here, it's such a strain." That kind of thing.

S: Yes.

M: And for a sensitive man like Krishnaji…

S: Of course.

M: And his having to always be a guest, he…

S: Mm, hm. He would feel that very intensely.

M: He would feel that particularly.

S: Of course.

M: And the Suarèses then turned nastily against him.

S: Oh, did they?

M: Oh, yes.

S: You see, that's incredible!

M: Oh, yes. Yes. They took him for granted and weren't sensitive to him. And then when he had an alternative…

S: They then turned antagonistic.

M: …they turned nasty. Yes.

S: To me this is just very weird behavior.

M: Yes.

S: And I don't think I ever saw this in my life before I came into these circles. You might go from having a close contact to kind of losing contact.

M: Yes, it sort of fades away.

S: Yes, but not going to this vitriol, this antagonism, this vindictiveness. It's just very odd, I think.

M: Mm, yes. I think it's that people didn't feel vague about Krishnamurti. They either saw something and revered him, or they rejected him in some way for their own peculiar reasons.

S: [big sigh] Anyway, we should probably move on. We have ten minutes left on this tape, probably. Where are we in our date-wise?

M: Well, we are in Paris in the first week of April.

Alain turned up on the tenth, 'and that afternoon,' [giggles] 'and Mr. Moser from Thun called saying he is bringing the new Mercedes' [S laughs] 'next Wednesday', it says. 'We were agog.'

Then on the eleventh, 'Mima Porter came for lunch. While she talked to Krishnaji, I went to do errands, and later met Krishnaji and Alain at Lobb's.' I think that was when Krishnaji was saying to her, 'Look, I want an answer from Rajagopal before the talks in Saanen. Either I am made a member of the KWINC board again, and am informed about everything, or I have to dissociate.' And so she then said she would go back to Ojai and talk to Rajagopal and deal with it. And so, he expected something from her.

Then what happened? Ah, well, I [chuckles] returned the rented car. So we now have just Alain's car and the prospect [S chuckles] of the new Mercedes! We went to another movie; what was it? It's a French movie with Jean Gabin called…can't read my writing…looks like Le Pacha, but I'm not sure. Blitz came for lunch.

S: There's going to be a Ph.D. somewhere, studying the movies that Krishnaji watched!

M: Yes! [Both laugh.] There's another one we went to the following day called Point Blank.

S: A thriller.

M: I have no idea what it was. It's disappeared from…

S: Yes, yes. [Chuckles.]

M: …my ken. [S laughs again.] We went to Notre Dame. It was Easter Sunday, and the three of us went to Notre Dame and listened to the Easter music. It was lovely.

S: Mm, hm. Do you remember what it was?

M: I don't know, the choir was singing something.

Marcelle Bondoneau, Gisela Elmenhorst, and her sister came for lunch that day. And there's another cinema! [Laughing.] We went every day! This is called, um, it's Italian, something paranormal something, I can't read my writing. We lunched at the Bouvard's. I think I've mentioned General and Madame Bouvard were part of the French world that went to hear Krishnaji; they lived in Paris, they came to Saanen in the summer, and they used to entertain. They're before your time. He was a retired French general, and she was a woman of somewhat a mystery. There was some vague…well, I'm not going to tell gossip to posterity, so it doesn't matter. [S laughs.]

S: Okay.

M: Anyway, they gave very nice lunches.

S: Gossip, gossip worthy of Mary.

M: Say no more! [Both laugh.] And then came what? Oh, his first Paris talk at the Maison de la Chimie. Now this was a big improvement over the Salle Adyar of previous years.

S: Ah ha.

M: This was on Rue de Grenelle, I think it is.

S: Gisela would have organized this?

M: Oh, yes and Marcelle, the whole French group did that. And it says here, 'Read that Iris Tree died last Saturday.' I knew she was dying when I'd seen her in London just a few weeks before.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Cancer.

On the seventeenth, Jane Hammond came for lunch and Mr. Moser arrived from Thun with the new Mercedes 280.

S: 280 SE.

M: SE. Yes.

S: 3.5 [M laughs.] I assume it's the same model that you have now.

M: And we all went for a drive.

S: Is it the same model you have now?

M: Yes, same one, but previous incarnation. And we all went for a drive.

S: So Jane Hammond came to Paris?

M: Yes, to the talks.

S: And came to lunch with Krishnaji?

M: Yes. And later we walked in the Bois.

So then, on the next day, the eighteenth, I drove Krishnaji in the new Mercedes to the second talk at the Maison de la Chimie. And the car was a great success. He enjoyed it. I enjoyed it. Everyone was happy. [Giggles.]

S: [laughing] I'm sure!

We can probably finish the third talk and then we probably ought to finish this recording session.

M: Alright. Then what happened? We had Madame Duchet to lunch. And we went to a cinema later, [both laugh] oddly enough! It doesn't say which one. And walked in the Bois, as usual. Then, it says just, 'cinema in p.m.' so that isn't helping us.

S: No, you're robbing history of valuable…

M: I know.

S: …information by not telling us which films you were watching!

M: I'm not being an archivist here.

His third talk was on the twenty-first of April, and some pupil of Alain's came for lunch. And then [laughing] we went to see a Jeanne Moreau picture.

S: I think we're going to have to end this because we're running out of tape.

M: Well, Kitty Shiva Rao came for lunch on April twenty-fourth, 1968. We went to Bagatelle in the afternoon for a lovely… [tape cuts her off.]

This was the beginning of his split with the Theosophical Society.

Issue 9: April 1968 to September 1968

This issue covers what was very significant to the organization of Krishnaji's work: his formal break with Rajagopal and KWINC, and the creation of the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust. This involved making the break public, and also quickly setting up mechanisms to keep informed those interested in Krishnaji's speaking schedule, coming publications, and how to contribute to his work.

Also, the first moves were made to recover his copyright, a vital element of control Krishnaji needed to recover for his work.

Mary adds to her previous discussion of Krishnaji's state of being before and after talking, and makes a link between that and "the process" that had existed in Krishnaji's life.

We also see the first forays into finding a location for a school in England.

Scott: We're beginning this from April twenty-fifth.

Mary: Well, I think we left off when Krishnaji and I and Alain Naudé were in Paris living in the little house on the Rue de Verdun, and Krishnaji was there to give talks in La Salle de la Chimie in Paris. He gave five talks, and had young people discussions. I think he had four of those. The rest of his life was seeing people, as usual, and also the walk in the afternoon. We used to walk in the Bois, or at Bagatelle in the Bois; otherwise we'd do a bit of shopping. There were various people in Paris whom we lunched with, or they lunched with us. That year, we had a male chef who did the meals in the house, so we had people over for meals, and they were generally people like the de Manziarlys, Sasha and Mar, and also one day Mrs. Porter came for lunch.

S: Ah!

M: Mima Porter was the one who was supposed to give Krishnaji's messages to Rajagopal, and something would result, she said. Well, in fact, nothing did result.

S: If I may just stop for a minute…when Krishnaji had these discussions with young people, did he have them in French?

M: No, no. He had them in English. They may have asked a question or two in French…I didn't go to those. So I can't tell you.

S: Where did the discussions take place?

M: Alain and I hired a room in the hotel where I had stayed previously, which was the Pont Royale, over near Rue de Bac, that section of Paris, and we just hired a room where they could meet.

S: Mm, hm.

M: I went to, I think, one or two, but I didn't go to them all, and mostly as I recall, it was in English. If it had all been in French, I would remember. Krishnaji was speaking English, and obviously they understood that. Now, this is interesting because this is the year of the "manifestations," as they called them in France; the student revolt.

S: Ah, yes.

M: Well, they very nearly overthrew the government.

S: I remember.

M: And we were told at that point by—who told us? Nadia Kossiakof. Do you remember her?

S: Yes, I do.

M: She, in those days, had to do with the publications of the French books. She was rather involved with the youth, students, the revolution, all those things, and she used to go to the Sorbonne, and apparently in one of their main meeting rooms, because the students took over the Sorbonne at that point, they had on the blackboard a saying of Krishnaji's, [S laughs], the spirit of the meeting, apparently. We were told that, but we didn't realize how intense the feeling was.

My recollection is that the day we left Paris, which was May third, I think, and we were driving along up the auto-route du Nord, toward Lille and Belgium, where we were headed, was the day that violence started. Students were pulling up the paving stones and throwing them.

Somehow I felt that Krishnaji's presence [S laughs] was part of the ingredients of all this. But maybe I'm just imagining it.

S: Well, who knows? Two years ago there were again demonstrations in Paris, and someone showed me a photograph of a group of students carrying a banner with a quote from Krishnaji on it.

M: Really?

S: Yes. [Laughs]

M: Well, there you are. [Chuckles.] So, we got out just before the paving stones flew, and were unaware of it. We didn't know till we got to Belgium what had happened.

What else? Oh, Blitz came over. Blitz had been to England and with Mary Cadogan had gone to see Michael Rubinstein because this was the time when people were beginning to say, “What do we have to do if Krishnaji wants to break away from KWINC?” So that was in the offing. But we went off, spent the night in Oostkamp, outside Bruges, at Château des Brides, which is a rather stately park and quite nice, something I found in Michelin, I guess.

The next day, we went into Bruges and stopped to see the Memlings.

S: Yes.

M: And in the city of Bruges there’s a statue by Michelangelo, which is quite beautiful. And then we went across one of those huge dikes. This is the dike of…oh dear, what is the name of it, where you drive right across it? It’s part of the outer protection of Holland. We were in Holland by now; and we were headed for Noordwijk, where Anneke had taken a house, which turned out to be right on the beach, or just above the beach. That sounded nice, but when we got there, we weren’t so enraptured. It was grim [laughs].

S: Was it?

M: The house was alright. It was a kind of rambling beach house with a lot of stairs, but it was cold and damp, and the wind came off the North Sea.

S: [laughs] Yes, I can feel it.

M: And after one night, we said, no, no, this is impossible for Krishnaji; it’s bad for him. And I tried every hotel anywhere around. Nothing. Not a room, not even one room. So we had to face it—we had to stay in this house, but it wasn’t one of the nicer places we stayed.

S: What were you going to Holland for?

M: Well, we were going there for the talks at Amsterdam.

S: Oh, in ’68?

M: Yes. And there was a little wood nearby, which was adequate to walk in; it wasn’t great. Anyway, we settled in.

I think the second day, or so, we went to see the tulips in, what is it called, Keukenhof.

S: Ah, yes, the Keukenhof, yes.

M: And that was lovely.

S: Yes. Was it at the height of the season?

M: Yes.

S: Oh, wonderful!

M: The tulips were blazing.

S: Yes, yes. [M chuckles.] And the daffodils there! Wonderful.

M: Yes, it was really lovely. So that was cheery.

And then I had to reconnoiter on how to get to the RAI in Amsterdam from that side, which was different, and Krishnaji came with me, and I got hopelessly lost [chuckles]. So I went again the next day and finally found the route. His talks were to begin on May eleventh.

On May eighth, Krishnaji, Alain, Anneke and I drove to Bussum to record Krishnaji answering people's questions. We watched on TV as Krishnaji answered eight questions in about forty minutes. It was faultless.

The questions were read out by somebody and without a hesitation out came a superb reply.

S: Who chose the questioners or the questions?

M: I think the station people. Alain or I may have had a glimpse before-hand. I don't quite remember, but Krishnaji hadn't seen them. His ability to be, in effect, word-perfect on microphone was once again demonstrated [chuckles], which was nice.

S: So Alain and Anneke were staying in the house also?

M: Oh, yes. Yes, yes.

S: And she was doing the cooking, or…?

M: She was doing the cooking.

S: Was anyone else there?

M: No. Oh, wait, that's not so. The chef we had in Paris arrived by train a couple of days after we got there. He did the cooking. So there was only the marketing to do.

S: How did you find that chef in Paris?

M: I think someone like Marcelle Bondoneau, or maybe Gisela Elmenhorst went to an agency and got a chef.

S: Mm, hm.

M: His name was André. His presence meant it was less wear and tear on the rest of us. So, we went on with life in Noordwijk. We found a better wood to walk in, but still, it wasn't wonderful. It was cold, and it was windy, and it rained, and it whistled. [S chuckles.]

Krishnaji's birthday came along, but, as usual, we didn't dare mention it. [S laughs.] That was the day he gave his first talk.

S: Ah, ha.

M: We got back for lunch. It only took about thirty-five minutes to go there, so it wasn't bad. That was the beginning. I think that day Alain went to see some Dutch TV people, and while he was there, the owner of the house came to lunch [laughter in voice] because he wanted to see his famous tenant. As I recall, that was rather sticky. I don't remember too much about it, but it wasn't one of the finer moments. [Both laugh.]

Let's see what else happened. We went to the Hague one day, and looked around. And, of course, people came to lunch; Doris Pratt came, Mary Cadogan came, and I think the Digbys came.

S: Mm.

M: But, anyway, we entertained [laughs] ourselves. I think Mary and Joe came.

After the fifth talk, coming home, one of those curious fainting things happened with him, where in the car he suddenly keeled over. But he came to quickly.

S: Who else would've been in the car? Was it just you, or was Alain there?

M: I think just me; Alain would've stayed on, but that was a particularly heavy day at the RAI, because not only was the hall filled, but the whole outer hall was filled with about 150 people watching it on television. And many people came up to him afterward; and he was in those days, and other days too, when he'd given a very intense talk, he would come out as though dazed, and he'd sort of stand, and the idea was to keep people away from him, but he always didn't want people kept away. He didn't want to be aloof.

S: That remained like that right through to the end.

M: Yes. So, people would come up and you could see him sort of…not recoil, but his body would shake from the effort to come out of the way he felt and reply to the person. I always wanted to stop people.

S: I know.

M: It was painful to see.

S: I know.

M: And I could see him standing there outside the hall and this was happening.

S: Yes, I've seen it. When he was on the stage and that "vast energy," as he called it in his final days, was pouring forth, even when people asked really stupid or even aggressive questions, he was unshakeable. There was nothing that was vulnerable about him.

M: No, nothing. And even when people, you know, nutty people got up, he would deal with it and calm them down.

S: Yes. Absolutely. Absolutely.

M: He was in total control, whatever happened.

S: And yet in the transition to his normal state, he would be tremendously vulnerable.

M: Yes. Someone coming up to him could be like a physical blow to him.

There were many, many times, and I suppose after talks was a particular example where you had to be absolutely quiet with him. So, it would happen for instance at Saanen, my job was to get him as quickly into the car after the talk as possible, and then he would sometimes want to just drive, just sit quietly in the car, and I'd drive and drive till he said, "Alright, let's go back." It was sort of coming out of whatever state of heightened action he was in. I don't know how to define it. And then the fainting on this particular day might have been part of that, the actual need to decelerate, if there is such a word, or if leaving the body, which the fainting was, according to what he said to me, was the way to …was a manifestation of that.

S: Say that again.

M: Well, this fainting that he would do at different times seemed to be, or he said it was when I asked him, he said, "It's leaving the body."

S: Mm, hm.

M: And he always, in the beginning said, "Don't touch the body"—in other words, just leave everything alone, and don't attempt to intrude by a gesture or a question.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Just don't say anything; just be there. And the only thing I ever did, which I've explained in these interviews before, is when he was going to fall, I moved so that when he landed on my forearm; it was no different than landing on a sofa, and I was trying to avoid his hitting his head on the steering wheel. So, that was different. I wasn't doing something. I just put an obstruction in his way to protect him.

S: I understand. Yes.

M: But, those were the necessities: to not interfere, and not be nervous. That was also a thing, "Don't let it worry you." That was in the beginning when he said, "Don't be afraid, if it happens, it happens; just be quiet, don't be alarmed." So, I think that there's a link between his coming out of being almost unconscious, like not-knowing-where-you-are kind of thing; not that he didn't know where he was, but gearing his mind down to ordinary perception of people and having to speak to people. He had to be quiet for a bit before he could get back into that other state, the normal state.

S: Now, Mary, this also, of course, has some relationship to what Krishnaji used to call "the process" and which has been written about so much, in the sense of going out of the body, the fainting.

M: "The process" was going out of the body, if I understand it, which anybody can criticize as partly avoiding the pain that was happening; when the pain got too bad, as it says in Nitya's account, Krishna went away and left the body, which was exemplified by the little child voice, to cope with it. That seems to be Nitya's description. I have no way of adding anything to that. Of course, going out of the body is not an extraordinary thing if you've gone into esoteric things.

S: Yes. It's just that it seems to have some relationship to this state right after he talked, to this fainting, to several things that were part of Krishnaji, even…I don't know, he said sometimes that he had a marvelous meditation, for instance, even though he didn't do anything anyone would call meditation. So, there's just these things which are worth mentioning and I don't know, just recalling to the best of our ability…

M: Yes, recall. I don't think anybody can explain this.

S: No, no.

M: And I don't think our talking about it is an effort to explain it.

S: No. But it's just important to get these things down.

M: To report what we observed, or were told by him.

S: Yes.

M: And how it seemed, bearing in mind that it may be my imagination, or my jumping to a conclusion that isn't so.

S: Now, while we're on this subject too, and I know we've spoken about this before, but the moments just before Krishnaji would speak were different to right afterwards, but somehow related. I also knew I was not to speak.

M: Yes.

S: I was not to speak unless Krishnaji said something to me; I was just to be there…

M: That's right.

S: …and keep people away, but really just to be silent with him.

M: That's right.

S: And Krishnaji went through something. It's not as if he just came in and walked up on the stage. He went through something.

M: Well, the good example, in my experience, was at Saanen, where he walked into the tent while I parked the car, so that he got there on the dot, and all that had to be silent and exact.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And if he did speak to me on the way down, it was usually something like, "What am I going to talk about?" to which I never replied.

S: Mm, hm.

M: It was a kind of preparation, as it were. And, as you remember, when he got on the platform and whoever it was put the mike on him, he would then sit there and look for a while. It was like…I don't know what, I don't know how to describe it, but it was…it was something he went through in the beginning.

S: Yes, exactly.

M: And then, I know you remember, he very often began a talk with saying, "This is not a lecture; it is not entertainment." He would give that preliminary thing, which was sort of like easing into something that he was then going to start examining. And I do think it was linked with what happened afterward, but it was different.

S: Yes, I know. All one can say is that it feels like it was linked, and yet it felt different also.

M: In the later years, after a talk, usually when we got home, he would lie down for quite a while.

S: How long?

M: It depended where we were, but, oh, at least a half an hour.

S: He didn't lie down after the talks at Brockwood.

M: No.

S: Because he would come up and have something to eat here[1], a salad or something like that.

M: Yes, he'd go into his room or the bathroom and I, in the meantime, had put the salad and fruit on the table, then he'd come out and he'd sit down and eat it. But then he would sort of decompress by looking out the window and commenting on the people…

S: I know.

M: And that [chuckle], that was usually rather critically.

S: [laughs] Yes, I remember.

M: People…

S: …especially people who were parking on the lawn, or doing something ridiculous.

M: Yes, something. And then, after he had eaten then he'd go back to the tent and face people on a different level. But then when he came up after that, he went right to sleep.

S: Mm, hm, mm, hm.

M: Which isn't surprising, considering what he gave out in those talks.

S: Yes.

M: I don't want to try to make anything more than what we've just said.

S: No, no. Anyway, back to…

M: Back to Noordwijk.

The talks ended and we took off; Krishnaji was with me in the Mercedes, and Alain was in his Volkswagen with lots of luggage. We drove across Holland and into Germany via Arnhem, and on this trip, we met somewhere near Frankfurt, I think, and had a picnic lunch. Oh no, we had a picnic lunch alone; Alain went alone—you couldn't keep track of each other on the autobahn. That was too difficult. So we drove and had our picnic lunch in a lovely wood, and then we drove on to Ettlingen, which was near Karlsruhe, where we had intended to stop, and we met Alain there at, I think it's called, the Erbprinz Hotel; we had rooms there. It was a good hotel; Father had told me about it, a very good hotel.

S: Mm, hm. Mm hm.

M: I had booked rooms for us, but that was the time when we got there and went in for something to drink, I could tell that he didn't want to spend the night, that he wanted to get on and get to Gstaad and finish with the travel. So, I said, "Well, if I can have a pot of coffee, I can drive to Spain!" I was doing all the driving. [S chuckles.] And so, they brought me the most wonderful whole big pot of coffee with lovely little cakes. Krishnaji had herb tea, and I drank the whoooole pot.

S: [laughs heartily]…and went racing off! [Laughs more.]

M: And felt I could do anything! And so we drove on. It was a 600-mile drive from Noordwijk to Gstaad, and we got there about 10 p.m., and Madame Duperrex, who was the concierge of Les Caprices, had everything ready, but she didn't expect us till [chuckles] the next morning. So there we were, went up in that silly lift, but we couldn't get into the flats. So, Alain went off and found out where she was, and she eventually came back about 11 p.m. and let us in. I had my usual flat. And Krishnaji stayed with me, and Alain had the studio, it was called.

S: Mm, hm.

M: But, we got there. It was a long drive.

S: [chuckles] Yes, that would've been.

M: And I remember the driving on the autobahn where every car was passing me, and I glanced at the speedometer and I was going 110 miles an hour. [S laughs heartily, M chuckles.] It shocked me so much, because it was as though we were going fifty.

S: Yes, yes.

M: [chuckles lightly] So that was how we got to Saanen. Now, what happens in Saanen?

S: So, what are the dates, just to keep some sense of chronology?

M: We left on the twenty-fifth of May, 1968.

The next few days we're unpacking, and going for lovely walks.

And then we had news from London from Rubinstein on the twenty-eighth that the copyright could be recuperated.

S: Great.

M: That was a major jump.

S: Yes.

M: We also were talking about the school, and that over near Canterbury they'd found something. That means Dorothy and probably Donald Hoppen[2] and Montague. Eventually it was said, "No, Canterbury's not possible." But on that date, we heard that, yes, maybe we could have it in Canterbury. But that didn't last very long because it was decided that the place near Canterbury wouldn't do.

And then I remember that on the thirtieth of May (this refers to Paris) that de Gaulle called for a referendum instead of bringing in the troops to fight the students, which would've been a real revolution. He said we'll have a referendum, and that deflated the students. Things subsided.

It was curious the other day—I was talking with someone and I said, "Were you in Paris during that time?" And he said, "Oh yes!" and what had happened, he rushed out in the street to see everything, and he told what it was like from his point of view. And I told what it was like from Krishnaji's and my point of view.

S: Hm. I'd forgotten that.

M: Yes. So that's something notable at that point. The news from Paris then got better every day, I mean, more quiet every day.

It says here that Krishnaji dictated to the tape recorder a letter to the schools, which he didn't usually do; he usually dictated to me. But he made a tape that day. Wonder what's become of it? Then we went to get his car in Thun and to get my car serviced.

S: Well, that would've been to the Indian schools.

M: Yes, yes. We didn't have a school. Yes, that was to India.

S: You don't remember why he did that, because that's an unusual thing to do, isn't it?

M: Don't remember.

Well then, much walking toward Lauenen, and I remember there was still snow under the trees, and it was warm, but the mountains were white, and under the trees where it was shady there was still snow.

S: Hm.

M: Beautiful, happy days. We drove to places like Turbach and walked up, isn't that funny?

S: Yes.

M: Turbach, down by the river.

And it says here that on the fourth of June, California held its primary election, and Robert Kennedy was elected the presidential candidate in California, and we got the terrible shock the next night that he was shot. It was horrendous for me, and Krishnaji was pretty shocked by that as well. That was in a way because earlier that year when we had dinner at Barbizon was when Martin Luther King was shot.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And here it was again. Very ugly, violent.

It shocked Krishnaji very much.

Um, let me see. [Long pause.] We went into Geneva to do the usual ritual things in Geneva, Patek, etcetera—the familiar routine.

S: Jacquet and…

M: Jacquet and the neckties were ordered. [S chuckles.] And we bought bath-robes, those bath robes we've all got, towel bathrobes, and we spent the night in the Hotel du Rhône, and we also went to a movie, *Guess Who's Coming to Dinner…*it's an old, well, old, it was new then, with…

S: Yes, I remember…Sidney Poitier.

M: …Katharine Hepburn and Sidney Poitier and Spencer Tracy. Uh [chuckles], Krishnaji and Alain went to see the homeopathic Dr. Schmidt, and they got good reports. And what else did they do? Oh, we went to another film the next day called Je t'aime, Je t'aime. I can't remember what that was. It was a French film. [Chuckles.] So then we came back, stopping in Lausanne at the Grappe D'Or for lunch; rather pleasant meal, a place we liked.

Then, what happened? We got confirmation that regaining the copyright looks possible. So that was cheery.

John Kenneth Galbraith[3] came for tea.

S: Mm.

M: We're still all in Caprices.

S: I didn't know he…

M: Galbraith used to spend a bit of time in Gstaad, and Krishnaji met him before. I had, too.

S: Was he an admirer of the teachings?

M: Not so you'd notice, but he was interested in Krishnaji, and was very respectful of him. I don't know how much attention he paid to the teaching.

On June twenty-fifth, we got news from Mary Cadogan that another possible school site had been found. But Krishnaji thought he ought to see it this time. I tried everything to get hotel rooms in London, but it was in the middle of Wimbledon, and there was nothing, absolutely nothing, every hotel I tried, including Claridge's, where at least I knew them, nothing doing; they hadn't anything.

On the twenty-seventh, Krishnaji, Alain, and I drove to Evian and lunched beautifully at the Hotel Royal, then onto Geneva and checked into Hotel du Rhône, where we also had tea. Errands. Then we saw a movie, Prudence and the Pill.

The next day we returned to Gstaad.

On June thirtieth, Mary and Joe arrived, and we had tea. Hay fever was quite bad for Krishnaji and Alain.

The next day, Vanda arrived and opened Tannegg. I had Mary, Joe, Krishnaji, and Alain for lunch at the Palace Hotel. Narasimhan brought Jayalakshmi from Madras. She will stay at Tannegg.

July third, the Linkses left for Italy; Krishnaji came to Caprices in early evening. He had a fever of 101 degrees, but he wants to go to Geneva as planned. I packed for Krishnaji, and we left for Geneva and the Hotel du Rhône. Krishnaji lay in the back of the car. That night the fever continued, which worried me.

On July fourth, Krishnaji awoke without a fever, so the three of us took a 9 a.m. flight to London. Mary Cadogan, Blitz, and Jane Hammond met us and drove us to Ayot Place in Hertfordshire, which was thought of as a possible school. Dorothy and Montague and David Bohm met us there. We went through the whole place and then had a picnic lunch on the lawn. It was a Jacobean building. I didn't particularly like it. The country around there was more built up, a bit more suburban, and there weren't any good walking places. I don't know where Krishnaji could've stayed in it. It wasn't really big enough. I would've had to find another house for him somewhere nearby. But it didn't come to that.

Alain dashed into London for an errand, then joined Krishnaji and me at the airport, where we caught a 5 p.m. plane back to Geneva and the Hotel du Rhône, where we had supper in our rooms. Instead of sleeping in London, we slept in Geneva, because of the hotel situation.

The next day, after breakfast, we returned to Gstaad. In the afternoon, Krishnaji did a TV interview for Holland.

The first talk in Saanen was on July seventh, and it was the first time we had the hangar-type tent.

Blitz and Michael Rubinstein arrived, and there was much talk about what was going to happen after breaking off with KWINC.

On July eighth, Rubinstein had breakfast with Alain and me. We were called to come up to Tannegg at lunchtime. Krishnaji met with me and Alain, and he was very upset by his morning talk with Blitz. We talked until 4 p.m. when Blitz, Rubinstein, Mary Cadogan, and Doris Pratt came for a meeting, and the decision was made then by Krishnaji to severe relations with Krishnamurti Writings.

On July ninth, before Krishnaji's second talk, Michael Rubinstein got up on the stage and read out to the audience a statement about Krishnaji's dissociation from KWINC, and the formation of a new Krishnamurti Foundation to be based in England, which would reflect Krishnaji's wishes and would ensure that his will would always prevail in it, as it should. If people wished to support his work, they may contribute to the new foundation. So that was that. Rajagopal's name was not brought into things. It wasn't explained why he disassociated himself.

There was a meeting the next day, the tenth. There was a fund in those days to provide for Krishnaji when Rajagopal was not providing. Krishnaji wouldn't take money toward the end from Krishnamurti Writings and so, to look after him, there was a fund donated by several people, and Krishnaji decided to give away a large amount of that to buy Ayot Place. We still were thinking of Ayot Place. The meeting that day was of the foreign committees, and Krishnaji named the members of the new foundation which were to be Blitz, Alain, Rubinstein, Mary Links, the Digbys, Dorothy Simmons, and me. When the foundation finally was actually made, it was changed, but that was his first choice.

There was another meeting on the eleventh with each foreign committee, country by country. And Rubinstein, Cadogan, and I met with them all together in the afternoon, and in the evening, at 7 p.m., we met with the U.S. people who had come to the talks.

The meetings continued the next day at Tannegg, this time with the Italian committee, the Swiss committee, the South African and the Finnish representatives. Krishnaji, Alain, Cadogan, Rubinstein, and I were present at these meeting.

Then…let's see. I'm trying to find out what day Krishnaji talked to those people from Ojai, and what's-his-name taped it.

S: Blackburn?

M: Blackburn. Al Blackburn taped it. Krishnaji didn't authorize the taping. I think he just didn't pay attention. And this tape became a great matter of contention with Rajagopal because in it Krishnaji explained why he'd broken off. When we, later on, had the court case, Rajagopal wanted this tape destroyed. But, in the end, it was a trade-off to get back the manuscript of the Notebook in return for giving the tapes to Rajagopal and destroying any copies that existed. In point of fact, Al Blackburn, unbeknownst to us, kept one, but we didn't know that.

S: Mm, where is that now?

M: Well, it's now probably in the KFA Archives [chuckles].

S: Good.

M: I assume. I don't know positively, but eventually, of course, after all this was over and Blackburn, I think, died, I think he gave it all in his will. Eventually, we got the tape.

S: What date was that tape made?

M: On July eighteenth.

Then there were more meetings from the thirteenth with Blitz, Alain, Cadogan, Krishnaji, obviously, and myself on plans for not only the school, but for a bulletin, and to let people know what was happening and to raise money through the bulletin and so forth. I mentioned that Mrs. Jayalakshmi was, during this time, in Saanen, and she would be at Tannegg for meals.

And the talks still went on. I eventually drove Mrs. Jayalakshmi back to Geneva, and she left for wherever she was going. Alain, I think, oh yes, it says here, Alain came on that trip, and we went to see the Royal Ballet with Fontaine and Nureyev dancing in Geneva.

S: Mm.

M: That was lovely.

S: What were they dancing?

M: I think Romeo and Juliet. Yes.

S: Mm. I saw them do that.

M: Yes, yes.

S: Extraordinary.

M: So, he and I drove back the next day, lunching at the Grappe D'Or [laughing; S chuckles], getting back to Gstaad in the afternoon. In the meantime, Krishnaji had his first meeting with the young people in the tent, a discussion. This was on a Wednesday, and the next day he had his sixth talk.

On the twenty-first, there was a tea for the foreign committees at Tannegg, and after that Krishnaji took me on a drive to Lenk in his car.

S: Did you go up to that little…no, you wouldn't know that walk, never mind.

M: We didn't walk. We just drove.

Then Mary Cadogan and I did a lot of business matters, which we discussed at length, but that isn't very interesting.

Again, Krishnaji had a young people discussion. I ran into Vanda in the village in the afternoon, and she insisted I come up and walk with Krishnaji back at Tannegg through the woods.

On the twenty-fifth, Krishnaji gave the ninth talk. Lunch at Tannegg with Vanda, Krishnaji, Alain, and myself. I was usually up there for lunch. Vanda very kindly invited me.

And then the tenth talk. He gave so many talks in those days…[Aside to Scott:] This account is going to take us into the next century.

S: It doesn't matter. [M chuckles.] We have the time.

M: There was a meeting. Krishnaji, Alain, and the Simmonses, and me. We discussed our staying at Ayot Place next year. I said I would look for a house for the three of us, and then Krishnaji, Alain, and I went for a walk and talked about a house. [Chuckles.]

On the thirty-first, Krishnaji began his public discussions in the tent. The Wingfield-Digbys were there and came for lunch.

On August second, Vanda left in the early morning, and I drove Krishnaji to the third public discussion. Before, she always drove him when she was there, at least in those years. Later on, she didn't bring a car; she came by train, so I drove him.

So, more public discussions. Vanda asked me to stay up at Tannegg while she was away to run things in her absence. So, I moved up to Tannegg, partially. I mean, I didn't like to sleep up there, but I would be there for meals and so forth, so I didn't move things out of Caprices.

S: Which room did you supposedly stay in?

M: The one right opposite the front door. That was really the only room.

S: Well, there was a small one off the dining room.

M: No, yes, I didn't use that one. Alain sometimes used that one, but he was down at Caprices at this time.

S: Who was cooking?

M: Oh, Fosca. Always Fosca. [Chuckles lightly.]

So the discussions went on each day. And then, a man arrived. Wait a minute. Oh, yes, this was—heh!—a Mr. Tomchuk. I haven't thought of that name since. He warned Alain that a man called Fred Williams, who was really, in fact, I think I'm about to get a letter from him; he was a violent, awful man, and Mr. Tomchuk warned Alain that a violent letter about him had been circulated by Fred Williams, or sent by Fred Williams to Rajagopal, and that Alain should be careful; Fred Williams might assault him, hit him. So, Krishnaji sent for Fred Williams and told him to leave Gstaad.

Williams turns out to be…well, he once insulted Mary Cadogan most grievously. Then one year, not this year, he came to the chalet, and wanted to see Krishnaji, and I said no. He said, "Well, I want to give him a book," and I said, "Well, I'm sorry, he's resting and can't be disturbed." And so he produced the book, which was the infamous Protocols of the Elders of Zion, you know, the violent anti-Semitic book that was a famous forgery.

S: Yes, yes.

M: He said, "You read it," and I said, "No, I don't wish to read it. I know what's in it." And we had a bit of a backwards and forwards about that. And the other day[4], well, this isn't important, I got a letter from Doug saying, "There's a book that's arrived and do you want me to send it on?" and I said, "Well, open it and see if there's a letter in it for me." And he said he would, and later when he told me that the book was from an F. Williams somewhere in northern California. I said I don't know any such person. Afterwards, I thought, my god, I bet it's the same man. And I bet it's another anti-Semitic book.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Anyway, it was suspected that he was supplying, I guess, cocaine, or whatever the drug of the moment was, to young people in the tent.

S: Mm, hm.

M: The last discussion was on the sixth of August, and that day, Krishnaji had a meeting with Colonel Noyes. Do you remember Colonel Noyes?

S: Of course, yes.

M: …and the Blackburns and the Hookers. I don't know what happened; I wasn't there, I don't think. Various people came. Nothing special. The Digbys came for lunch. We went for a drive in Krishnaji's Mercedes [chuckles]. Alain went to Paris, I forget why. Something to do with Blitz. Oh, Blitz had gone to the U.S. and he'd seen the Vigevenos in Los Angeles, and he was trying to find out what was happening for Krishnaji in Ojai. Madame Duchet came for lunch. Colonel Noyes came to see K. Then David Bohm. Alain telephoned from Paris, but I don't know what it was about. The Bohms frequently came for lunch.

[M chuckles.]

S: What are you laughing at?

M: 'On this day, it was a free day, and with Krishnaji in his Mercedes we drove to Lausanne, and part way on the auto-route the car went 115 miles an hour like a bird.'

We had lunch at Beau Rivage, drove back through Montreux, Aigle, and Les Mosses. Alain came back from Paris, and we all three walked in the rain up Turbach. Supper and talk.' [Chuckles.]

S: Mm, how nice.

M: Apparently 'I went down to Caprices and did some ironing,' which will be fascinating for history to know. [S laughs.] 'Back to Tannegg. Doris Pratt for lunch and we went again in the afternoon up Turbach, across the stream, and down the other side.' That was a long walk. There's a bridge or something way up there.

S: Yes.

M: 'The Galloways came for lunch.' Now, the Galloways were a couple that had lived in India; he was Scottish, I think, and at one point, Krishnaji wanted him to head the Indian Krishnamurti Committee, or whatever it was called then, but nothing came of that.

Krishnaji came down to Caprices. He still had a lot of clothes at Caprices, so he came down to consider his packing [laughter in voice].

S: [chuckles] They'd been there for over a month.

M: Yes. And he kept the car down there because it had a garage he could use.

[Chuckles.] He was sort of living in both places.

Then on the eighteenth, 'we packed at Caprices, and he went for a drive alone. In the afternoon, we walked up past the tent and up above the sawmill. The snow line was low on the mountains.'

On the twentieth, ‘we took Krishnaji’s and my Mercedes and Alain’s VW to Mr. Moser in Thun and left them. Krishnaji’s was to be traded for a new one in the spring.’ This is where he wanted to get a bigger one.

S: Right. Is this when the Green Beauty enters?

S: No, is the Green Beauty from 1969?

M: Well, what happened was that we ordered it, and it came, but the next year’s model had something ugly on it, some chrome stuff that I didn’t like, and Krishnaji didn’t like—nobody liked. So he then got Stuttgart to agree to change the order for the following year’s one.

S: Right, so it was a sixty…no, it was a seventy then.

M: I guess so.

S: The Green Beauty is a seventy? Must be.

M: I thought it was a little later.

S: I did, too.

M: Well, that’s what it says here. It’ll be revealed in due course. [S chuckles]

Then we took the ferry and went to Beatus. You can walk from Moser’s place to the lake ferry—a steamer is what it is—and get on, and then a couple of stops down the far side of the lake is Beatenberg; there’s the hotel where we used to go for lunch. It was a lovely, warm, clear day.

The next day, it says here, ‘the Russian army aided by the East Germans invades Hungary. Bulgaria is occupied, and Czechoslovakia is occupied during the night.’ That was another historically horrible day.

We, however, ‘went to Geneva, checked into the Hotel du Rhône, and lunched at the Hotel des Bergues, went to Patek, rested in the afternoon, and had dinner in our rooms.’

On August twenty-second, the three of us took the noon plane to London and went to the White House Hotel. It’s up near Regents Park, just down the road, on, um, what’s that big road where the Friends…

S: Marylebone?

M: Marylebone; it's down only a few blocks from where you go into Regents Park on Marylebone, east of Regents Park.

Krishnaji and Alain went right to Huntsman while I unpacked [S chuckles] and fixed supper. We had a little tiny kitchen; that's why we went there. Later that evening we watched films of the Russian tanks in Prague. It was awful. Complete occupation, just overnight.

The next day 'Doris Pratt lent me her car, and I drove Krishnaji to Huntsman. Sacha de Manziarly met him there, and we all lunched at the Ritz. We bought things at the health center for food. Then had a long meeting with Michael Rubinstein at the hotel. We walked in Regents Park, and we got a tape from Blackburn in Ojai, after he and his wife had met Rajagopal.'

On August twenty-fourth, Krishnaji, Alain, and I met with the Linkses, the Bohms, the Simmonses, and Doris Pratt. Later, the three of us had lunch at the Royal Lancaster, then went to a movie in Leicester Square.

On the twenty-fifth we went too, oh! Nice day! The three of us went with Mary and Joe to Epping Forest for a walk, and then back to lunch with them at the Saint George Hotel.

Then the next day Krishnaji, Alain, Mary Links, and I lunched and drove to Ayot Place. The Wingfield-Digbys and Simmonses met us there. We went through the house again and drove back and had tea at the Linkses. Sacha de Manziarly came to supper with Krishnaji and me. Then [laughing], I went to Heals to buy beds and linens for Ayot Place. I remember that I picked it all out in case the place was bought while I was in California. Nelly Digby was to arrange for their delivery if it happened.

On the twenty-eighth, a threatening cable came from Rajagopal to Krishnaji. Blitz and van der Straten arrived for the first Krishnamurti Foundation meeting with the new trustees.

This is when we founded the KFT[5]. It was in Michael Rubinstein's office. The KFT was legally founded with Blitz, van der Straten, George and Nelly Digby, Alain, Dorothy Simmons, and myself as trustees. Also present were Mary Cadogan, as the secretary, and Mary Links was there, too, but she wouldn't be a trustee.

M: Well, he was in Saanen, you see, all the time. They didn't seem to come to meals very much because it doesn't mention it, but, I don't know, Krishnaji knew him and thought that he'd be a good trustee: a businessman and interested in the teachings, and [laughing] a vegetarian! And he thought he'd be a good trustee, so he invited him. Krishnaji appointed everybody.

S: Mm, hm.

On August twenty-nineth, after tea with Mrs. Bindley and a walk back across Hyde Park, at supper, Krishnaji, Alain, and I discussed Ayot Place versus something else. We weren't so pleased with Ayot Place. It didn't seem a good idea.

The next day, the thirtieth, Dorothy and Montague Simmons came in the morning and Krishnaji told them to look further for a house. They went to agents and came back with information. K and I lunched at the White House Hotel. Jayalakshmi arrived from New York and came for supper.

On the first of September, 'the Digbys came in the morning and will help with house hunting for a school. Colonel Noyes arrived from Ojai with an offer from Rajagopal to turn over most of KWINC. We talked to Rubinstein and Noyes is to call Rajagopal back.' Krishnaji was suspicious, and he said, "Well, call him back and see if he means this." 'Krishnaji, Alain, and I lunched at Claridge's, came back with Mrs. Jayalakshmi and her nephew for a walk. A photographer and Noyes came for tea, also Doris Pratt.' It says here, 'Rather confused meeting. Finally all left and Noyes went to call Rajagopal. Came back to report utter failure. K wants archives and Rajagopal refuses all concessions until he has met Krishnaji. Same incredible behavior. We had postponed our flights to the U.S. until Wednesday, and it's too late to change back.' We'd switched the flight to let Noyes make this call, and Noyes came back in a state of shock, white-faced. Apparently, so he said, Rajagopal had said, "What do you mean by giving me such a message? I never empowered you to go…" Now, Noyes had been on his way to India, and because Rajagopal asked him to talk to Krishnaji, he detoured to London especially to talk to Krishnaji and deliver the message. So when he goes back to telephone, Rajagopal says, "I never sent you. I never told you to go. I never empowered you to do anything." This was standard procedure.

S: Right.

M: So, it wasn't a bit surprising to anybody on Krishnaji's side.

The next day we lunched Claridge's, Krishnaji, Alain, Fleur Cowles[6] (that's a friend of mine) and I. Michael Rubinstein and Doris Pratt came in the afternoon, and I finished packing.

September fourth, 'Drove with Krishnaji and Alain to the airport. They took the 11:35 a.m. plane to Madrid and on to Puerto Rico. I took a TWA flight to New York.' Well, then what I did was go to my brother's and so forth and so on.

Krishnaji was to speak in Puerto Rico, and I had to see my mother and family and so forth, so I didn't go with them. I waited in New York for them. Now let's see, we'll jump ahead because this is all about me, not about Krishnaji. I went up to the Vineyard.

S: Okay, so you arrived in New York, saw your mother in Martha's Vineyard.

M: Yes, then went back to New York, flew to Malibu briefly, and then flew back to New York on the nineteenth of September.

On the twentieth, 'I moved into the flat I had rented from my former sister-in-law, at 40 East 62nd,' and I sort of set up the apartment and marketed and things, and had it cleaned. You don't want to hear all this. Now, when does Krishnaji get here?

Krishnaji arrives on the twenty-third of September with Alain.

S: Okay. Alright, let's end it there, then. We're running out of tape.

M: Alright.

Issue 10: September 1968 to January 1969

This issue sees Krishnaji, Mary, and Alain in begin to get information on the shady dealings of KWINC, and their meeting with several lawyers to figure out how to deal with it. The basis for the legal case becomes clear.

This issue also sees the start of the new Krishnamurti organization in the US.

Finally, after considering many properties in England for a school, Brockwood is found and acquired.

Mary: So, we left off with Krishnaji and Alain arriving in New York on the twenty-fourth of September, and I had just arrived from Malibu. Krishnaji had been speaking in Puerto Rico. Alain was with him, and during that time I visited my family in the east, went back to Malibu for less than a week, and returned to New York to prepare the flat that I had rented from my former sister-in-law, which was at 40 East 62nd, a small flat, for the time that Krishnaji would be in New York.

Scott: Where was Krishnaji speaking in New York?

M: He was speaking um…indeed, where was he speaking? I haven't read ahead in this. [Chuckles.]

S: [laughing] Right, never mind.

M: It will be revealed!

S: Okay.

M: We had no sooner gotten there than we started to talk things over about the school in England, because there was said to be a house in Surrey, which was a possible school. So, it was decided that Alain would fly back to London, which he did the next day. And that he would go and look at it and report. So he flew back, and stayed with the Digbys.

On the next day, which was the twenty-fifth, we rang him and he'd already seen the house. We also received photographs of it and liked it. He liked it too, but said we should wait and discuss it when he got back. So that's all we know about that house.

Now in the meantime, Blitz was somewhere around, and Krishnaji wanted to talk to him. Blitz, as well as Krishnaji, received in the summer, while still in Gstaad, a letter from a Mrs. [Erna] Lilliefelt, who had read or heard the news that Krishnaji had disassociated himself from KWINC and that it had been suggested on his behalf that people who wanted to help with the work should donate to the new foundation. She was startled because she knew that over the years a great deal of money had been given to Krishnaji's work and why did he not have it? She wrote a very intelligent letter, I must say, which, when it came to Saanen, was like a breath of good sense.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And Krishnaji said, "Who is this Mrs. Lilliefelt?" It now developed that he wanted Blitz, and Mrs. Lilliefelt, and Rubinstein to come to New York and discuss the situation. So I rang Alain in London to please get Rubinstein to come. And I telephoned Erna, whom I didn't know at all in those days, and asked if she would come to talk to Krishnamurti. Both said yes. So, those were immediate things that happened.

Blitz came immediately on the twenty-sixth, and we had the meeting set up for the following week. Then what? Oh, we went to a movie! [Chuckles.]

S: [laughing] What did you see?

M: It doesn't say. Oh, wait a minute. Radio City, we went to an Ustinov movie. It doesn't say which one. We walked back from there, and Rubinstein called from London to say that he would come.

Alain returned the next day and had news of the house. The pictures were very nice, but it looked too small. It looked VERY nice. It actually turned out to be the house that belonged to…ahh…movie actor whose name we both know well…English actor. Can't think of it now! I'm not prepared for this. [S laughs.] Anyway, it was an attractive house. It was called the Newal, for some reason.

S: The whole idea was to have a house big enough for Krishnaji to have a place and a school, which is a sizeable building.

M: I know. Well, this building was made for one man, a single man at that. But it was attractive. So we talked about all those things. But, anyway [laughing], Krishnaji decided to buy the Newal [both laugh]. We telephoned Mary Cadogan to have Rubinstein negotiate. So, well, then we lunched and went to another movie not mentioned here, so I'll skip that day.

Now we come to the twenty-ninth, and Alain went up to Yale to see about Krishnaji's talking at Yale, and I went with Krishnaji to Mrs. Pinter's in the afternoon.

S: What was Mr. Pinter famous for?

M: I never met Mr. Pinter because he was dead before I came on the scene. He was a businessman who had known Krishnaji forever. Mrs. Pinter was a retired opera singer, and she was in poor health. Normally, when Krishnaji had come to New York in the recent years, he'd stayed with the Pinters; and with Mrs. Pinter after Mr. Pinter died. Mr. Pinter was the man who warned Krishnaji that Rajagopal was taking over and that Krishnaji would find himself completely excluded from his own organization.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Apparently Rajagopal used to come over to see them, and Pinter would put down, as Krishnaji put it, a bottle of Johnny Walker on the table and a glass. And by the time Rajagopal left, half of it was down his gullet. This loosened his tongue and he was telling Pinter what he was doing here and there, and Pinter saw what was going to happen.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And he warned Krishnaji. He said, "Look into it, or you'll be out of everything. He'll have the money and the power and the whole, whole thing." But, of course, Krishnaji didn't know how to go about that.

S: Mm, hm.

M: They were down on 58th Street West. And that's where Krishnaji would have stayed the previous year, when he was talking at The New School, but Mrs. Pinter wasn't very well, and that's when Krishnaji asked me to find a place for him and Naudé to stay in New York. And I did that, if you'll remember, by taking my brother's flat.

S: Yes.

M: So that's who the Pinters are. She was more or less an invalid and an elderly woman, and she regrettably died fairly soon after all this, I think. She disappears from the story. Alain also went up to Brandeis University to also arrange for Krishnaji to talk there.

And now Mrs. Lilliefelt makes her first appearance on the scene. She came to New York and came to tea, and we talked. It says here 'Krishnaji fell ill in the night, but he nevertheless went to his first talk at The New School at 4 o'clock.' Huh, he must have talked twice at The New School.

Mrs. Lilliefelt came to lunch the next day, October second, and so did Mitchell Booth. Mitchell Booth was my father's lawyer in New York; and sort of our family lawyer. He still takes care of Bud's affairs, my brother's.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And if I had any affairs he'd look after them. He makes wills and things like that. We talked about all these Rajagopal matters. Erna brought with her her research that she had done on the transfers of property—land, houses, real estate that Rajagopal had done where he played what we called the Shell Game. He would transfer something that belonged to the Brothers Association[1] and transfer it to the Star Bulletin and then some other local Star thing, and then he'd move it again. He moved these things around creating little foundations as he went. And, lo and behold, everything went into the ones controlled by him and nothing was left in the ones where Krishnaji had the power that Mrs. Besant had insisted he have, which was meant to be total power.

So everything had just been removed to empty shells. So Erna Lilliefelt had, by tracing land ownership, because land ownership has to be recorded; if you sell me a house, you have to record the sale to me in the county.

S: Mm, hm. So she could trace land?

M: Yes, she could trace land.

S: But she couldn't trace money.

M: No, she couldn't trace money. But she traced enough land to show how he would sell a property to KWINC at a high price. Then he would have KWINC pay to improve it vastly. And then he would buy it back from KWINC at a low price. So KWINC's money was spent, and he wound up with just about everything, including the house, which had been built by James Vigeveno for his daughter. When Vigeveno's daughter divorced her first husband and moved out, Vigeveno owned the house because he'd built it. That was then sold to Rajagopal by Vigeveno, but with money that Rajagopal had gotten through these manipulations.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So Erna had this really curious picture of the transfer of assets, and that's what she brought with her and showed to Mitchell Booth.

So the next day, the third of October, there was a meeting with Krishnaji, Alain, Mrs. Lilliefelt, Blitz, and me, and we went through all these papers again. Michael Rubinstein arrived from London at 2:30 p.m. And at 3:30 p.m., Krishnaji and I went to The New School for the second talk, but Rubinstein, Blitz, and Lilliefelt continued to go through all these papers. When we returned, Blitz had gone to Los Angeles, and we talked some more with Rubinstein, who stayed for supper.

The next day, October fourth, Erna Lilliefelt, Michael Rubinstein, Mitchell Booth, and I all met, and we went over all this again until the afternoon, when Rubinstein flew back to London.

S: Now what was the purpose for Rubinstein coming?

M: Well, he's the one that had done the initial recuperating of the first thing, which was the copyright. He'd been the legal advisor then. But when we get to New York, it's obvious that all this has to be coped with in the U.S. where he couldn't participate. So then Mitchell Booth was brought up to date; they sort of talked lawyer-to-lawyer.

S: So it was really to bring Mitchell Booth up to date that Michael Rubinstein came.

M: Yes, yes. And then, as will develop in all this, Mitchell Booth then suggested that we get a Los Angeles lawyer, and he suggested the one that we eventually went to.

S: Who?

M: Saul Rosenthal was the one who handled it, a youngish man, very bright, very nice, but he was in a big—a very prestigious law firm in Los Angeles.

S: Mm, hm.

M: It was good advice that Mitchell gave. Eventually, and this is down the road, but when it was seen that it would be tried, if it came to trial in Ventura county, Rosenthal said "Look, when you get out of Los Angeles, the judges, the courts, the whole thing, tend to favor local people over the big Los Angeles law firms." So he advised that we get the man we got, Stanley Cohen, who was in Ventura.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: So after the beginnings of it were all handled, things were eventually all transferred to Michael Stanley Cohen, who was the lawyer throughout the entire case for Krishnaji and the Foundation.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: Krishnaji had his third talk at The New School, and Paola, Vanda's daughter, and her husband, John Cohen, came to lunch. And we went to a movie called Rachel, Rachel, which I don't remember at all. [S chuckles.]

S: Just while we're here, if I may interrupt, who would choose the movie? How did it get decided?

M: Well we'd go through the list, and you know, just…we'd say what they were about. It was all tailored to fit Krishnaji's interests, obviously. Or something we thought he would like. If there was no cowboys, something, then we'd try to figure out, um…I remember once going to a lovely movie, and he liked it, called The Endless Summer. Did you ever see it? It's a surfing movie. It was the first epic surfing movie. It's just two boys wandering around the world looking for the perfect wave.

S: Yes, I do remember that.

M: I remember going to that and he enjoyed that. [M chuckles.]

S: Were you eating all of your meals in the flat?

M: Well, sort of. I was scrounging around, I guess. I seem to have done a lot of cooking in those days. We went out occasionally. I see that we lunched at The Colony one day, Krishnaji, Alain, and I [chuckles], which was THE restaurant of my youth and childhood. [S chuckles.] My father used to take me there when I was old enough to be a presentable child [S laughs and M chuckles], when I was nicely mannered and nicely dressed and he felt I did him credit. [More laughing.] I loved it.

S: Does it still exist? I've never been in it.

M: It doesn't exist anymore. It was a wonderful restaurant! And it was THE chic restaurant in New York, but it wasn't flashy-chic; it was just wonderful food. And it was run by three Italians who had a brilliant sense of what tables to give to whom [both laugh]. There was a terrific hierarchy in New York life in those days.

S: Ah ha.

M: The service was superb, and the food was wonderful. I've never been anywhere better. So we went there one day for lunch.

Fourth talk. Did I say that? Erna had gone back to California. Then there was a series of young people's discussion, also held at The New School.

There was a fifth talk on the tenth of October, after which we did some shopping. There was another discussion for the young on the eleventh. About 400 young people came.

S: Wow. That's remarkable.

M: Yes, it was very good.

S: This was all at The New School?

M: Yes, at The New School.

S: Was it at an auditorium there? Or…?

M: Ah, yes, in an auditorium.

Then on the eleventh, Erna called from Los Angeles to say that she'd gone to see Saul Rosenthal, our new lawyer.

On the twelfth, it was Alain's birthday, and at 10:00 a.m. Krishnaji gave his sixth and final talk at The New School. Then Krishnaji lunched with Narasimhan and U Thant at the UN. I don't know if I've mentioned Narasimhan before. He was at the UN, the second to U Thant, who was the head of the UN then. So, he was Chef de Cabinet, and a cousin of Jayalakshmi's in Madras. He had known Krishnaji for a long time.

Alain and I went to La Côte Basque, which was another wonderful restaurant.

There was talk of having a New York Krishnamurti office, but K didn't have confidence in the people who wanted to do it, so nothing happened.

S: Who were these people?

M: I don't think I listed them all. We'll let them fall into obscurity.

S: [laughs] Alright, but don't leave things out, Mary, because this is supposed to be a complete record.

M: The fact that he didn't want it was sufficient; we don't want to blacken their names.

S: No, we don't want to blacken anyone's name. [Chuckles.]

M: Besides, I can't remember.

We went to another movie on the thirteenth, which was Rosemary's Baby, which he did not like.

[Chuckles.] And then at supper, it was decided to cancel the trip to Yale, but go to Brandeis on Thursday. I forget why we cancelled Yale. For some reason.

S: Where did you walk? In the park?

M: In the park or up and down Madison Avenue or 5th Avenue, but usually in the park.

S: Hm. How would you walk to the park?

M: We walked across 62nd Street to the park because 62nd ends at 5th Avenue, which is on the park. The apartment was between Park and Madison.

On the seventeenth, we lunched at Voisin (that's another old, but good restaurant) and then we went to LaGuardia airport, flew to Boston, rented a car, and drove to the Charter House Motel in Waltham. The dean of students at Brandeis University was there to greet us, and we had dinner in the dining room.

The next day, the eighteenth, we were taken around Brandeis by some students. That was rather fun. We lunched in the faculty dining room, and at 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji gave his first talk to the students.

S: Do you remember how many people came?

M: I'd say about three hundred. It wasn't big. But it was…

S: That's enough.

M: It was good. Yes.

The next day, the nineteenth, Hughes van der Straten arrived from Brussels, and came for lunch. I don't know where we had lunch. Krishnaji gave interviews in the afternoon. Then with Alain we went for a walk, and then Hughes joined us for supper.

On the twentieth, we talked all morning with Hughes about houses in England, and there's a new one in view, and its name is Brockwood Park.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'In Hampshire,' it says. 'All four lunched. Hughes left in the afternoon, and Krishnaji, Alain, and I went for a walk', after which there were more interviews. One was with Jacqueline Onassis Kennedy.

'There was a morning discussion on the twenty-first at Brandeis between Krishnaji and students. And in the afternoon he gave another talk at 4:30 p.m.'

On the twenty-second, 'in the morning we watched on TV the return to earth of the astronauts from four-day orbit. At 10:30 a.m. Krishnaji held a discussion with students at Brandeis, and we walked. Professor Klee', it says here, 'lunched with us.' I don't know who he was, and then 'in the afternoon there was a third talk at Brandeis.'

On the twenty-third, 'we had a quiet morning, but at 3:00 p.m. Krishnaji spoke to graduate students at Brandeis.'

He worked an awful lot in those days, as you see.

S: Yes, he did. Giving private interviews in the afternoon, and occasionally…

M: Yes, and discussions and then talks and so forth.

S: Mm.

M: On the twenty-fourth, 'we left Waltham, drove to Boston, and flew to New York. We lunched at The Colony. We packed.' Then my family came in, and my father was suddenly in New York, so I had dinner with him.

The twenty-fifth: 'We left New York at noon and flew to Los Angeles. Amanda[2] met us with the Jaguar; also the Blackburns came from Ojai. We went to the house in Malibu.' It says here 'the house and garden looked lovely. Filomena had everything shining and ready. We unpacked, and we had supper in the quiet peace of the house.'

S: Tell me about the contact between Filomena and Krishnaji.

M: Oh, it was wonderful.

S: Describe it. Talk about it a little bit.

M: Well, she immediately…he was all the things that are enshrined in Filomena's estimation. He was a great gentleman. He was also courteous and friendly, and she immediately took to him. And he recognized all her lovely qualities. Eventually, somewhere in here, she had awful arthritis pains, and he asked me if I thought he could put his hands on her to try and help her. So, I spoke to her, and she, of course, said yes. So he had me be present, I don't know why. He did what he always did: stood behind, putting his hands on her shoulder. When he finished, as always he did, he left the room to go wash his hands, but he said to her: "Just sit quietly." So she sat there, as though in a trance and finally got up. Afterward, that's when she said to me, as I've already reported, "A les mani di un santo." He has the hands of a saint.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm. How nice.

M: Well, we started right away having beach walks, which was pleasant. But, you know, Krishnaji's walks were not a stroll.

S: I know, I know.

M: They were vigorous. I suppose about an hour, all told, by the time we got back.

The next day, the twenty-seventh, Mr. and Mrs. Lilliefelt came.

S: Was this the first time you'd met Theo[3]?

M: Yes, yes.

Then the next day, the twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji, Alain, and I went to meet the Lilliefelts at the lawyer's. The lawyer we saw was something like Berkowitz, Selvin, something and Myers. It was one of those kinds of names. We met a senior lawyer, Mr. Berkowitz, and Rosenthal at 4:30 p.m. Then on our return home, we got a letter from Mary Links about Brockwood. Well, she thought Brockwood was the place. And, as she explained, there was a part of it called the West Wing, which could be a sort of separate residence for Krishnaji. And she'd already picked out who got which room. [S laughs.] We didn't stick with that as she was giving Krishnaji the room you sleep in now[4]. She liked it right away, and I must say, that had a big influence on us.

We got a cable and a telephone call from Mary Cadogan on the twenty-ninth saying that Blitz had resigned from the Krishnamurti Foundation at the trustee meeting yesterday. We also learned that Brockwood can be ours. And Krishnaji sent a telegram to Rajagopal suggesting that they meet to discuss KWINC.

S: Wait a minute. Let me go back here, because in my discussions with Nelly[5], Nelly was at that trustees' meeting. And she said that a telegram arrived during the meeting for Blitz, telling him to resign.

M: I don't think so.

S: From Krishnaji.

M: I have no such recollection. No, Blitz…

S: She said it arrived right in the middle of the meeting. She said it was very embarrassing; it was obviously something that was memorable for her.

M: I remember that Blitz's resigning was in disagreement over something. I think financial.

S: Well, Dorothy[6] used to say that Blitz insisted that before a school could be started there had to be X amount of money.

M: Yes, I think that's true. I think that's what it was.

S: And there wasn't that amount of money, so he was in disagreement about starting the school.

M: Yes.

S: And I think Mary Cadogan told me that as soon as he resigned he went out and bought a yacht. [Both laugh.]

M: My recollection is that we know that Blitz resigned on this date. I do remember that there was a disagreement financially between Blitz and everybody else, that he was uneasy about starting the school until we had lots of money collected, and of course we didn't. But we did have enough to buy Brockwood, and that was enough for Krishnaji. So, whatever persuaded him, whether Krishnaji was the author of a telegram and what may have been in it, I don't know because I don't have any record of it today. But I don't think Krishnaji would have told Blitz to resign. That's unlike Krishnaji, but he would have said that he wanted to go ahead. But that's speculation, because I have no record of it in this account. And I don't remember it well enough, but I do know that at the time I felt Blitz was being very high-handed. He wanted his own way in most things, and when it didn't go that way, he resigned. That was my recollection of it.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm. And, if there had been a telegram, it wouldn't have been sent by Krishnaji personally; it would have been you or Alain?

M: That's right. Yes. Anyway, he resigned.

To continue, 'Krishnaji sent a telegram to Rajagopal, saying he would like to meet with him to discuss KWINC and he would like the meeting to be held at the Lilliefelts'.' Whereupon 'Rajagopal telephoned and spoke to Krishnaji, and he refused. Then he called back and Krishnaji had me talk to him, and Rajagopal hung up on me. Then Rajagopal called Erna at home and was insulting,' according to Erna. So the gist of it, as I recall, it doesn't say here, but you know: "Who are you to interfere? You people are outsiders. This is between Krishnamurti and me." That's the line he always took.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Also on that day, Alain went to Claremont to settle everything about Krishnaji speaking there. Also, my brother got married, but that's out of [S chuckles] this story. [M chuckles.]

The next day, the thirtieth, 'Krishnaji decided to have the Lilliefelts head the USA branch of the Foundation, and to commence forming it. The Lilliefelts and Blackburns came down at 3:00 p.m. We talked of plans, and had tea. Later, Rajagopal gave me a message for Krishnaji, who didn't want to talk to him: There will be no meeting unless they talk alone first.' That was his pitch the whole time. He wanted to get Krishnaji alone and browbeat him. And Krishnaji wasn't planning to do that.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Alain went to Ojai the next day. And Krishnaji and I lunched here, then went to Santa Monica to look for…coat hangers!' [Both laugh.] What in the world did we want with coat hangers?! I guess he wanted to come along. [More chuckles.] 'We drove through Topanga and Mulholland. Alain got back after having trouble with the car. Krishnaji spoke to Vigeveno, and gave him a vivid talking to on the gravity of the meeting with Rajagopal and the board. Krishnaji said, "It's very grave and you must realize it and there must be a meeting at which not just Rajagopal, but the whole KWINC board must be there." And he was very firm.'

'The next day we talked with Erna on the telephone about getting the KWINC board here for Krishnaji to see. And he invited—'

S: "Here" meaning to Malibu?

K: To Malibu, get them to come to Malibu. And 'he invited Mima Porter, the Vigevenos, Castlebury…they refused. So no meeting was held. Krishnaji had made every possible gesture,' which was what he was aiming to do. He didn't think they'd come. They wouldn't dare come.

Then it says here, 'Rosalind called to ask to come here tomorrow.' So she came the next day, which was November second. She came at 10 a.m. and stayed till 1:30 p.m. in a three-way conversation with Krishnaji and me.' And I [laughing] have in my notes: 'ugly people.' Alain wasn't there, but I remember what she did. [Chuckles.] I received her at the door, politely as hostess and took her into the living room, at which point she announced, "You sit here, and Krishnaji sits there, and I'll sit there." This was in my house, so this was a bit much.

S: Hm.

M: So, we sat down, and I don't know, she talked in circles, sort of. It was just junk, you know.

S: Give me a feel of it. What do you mean?

M: [Sigh.] She was berating Krishnaji: "How can you have this quarrel with Raja?" and "It's all awful, and you don't know what you're getting into." You know, it was just picking at him, picking at him. It was just unpleasant. She was attacking Alain, too. And she said to me, "Oh, well, you, you're infatuated with him." [Laughing.] And Krishnaji and I looked at each other and burst out laughing. [Both chuckle.] It was ugly.

S: Was Rajagopal financially supporting her at this point?

M: No, she's a rich woman by this point. She had inherited from Mr. Logan a great deal of money. He left her in his will. Plus, she had several houses.

S: So this was just at Rajagopal's behest? Do you think? Why would she be doing this? What interest was it of hers?

M: Because she was in cahoots with Rajagopal. The whole thing, in my opinion, in all these things, I mean, they fought over their own complications…she didn't want him to divorce her, or her to divorce him when he wanted to marry Annalisa, but that wasn't to preserve a beautiful marriage; it just suited her the way it was. They had fought over that, back in early '60s. But, no, they were manipulating Krishnaji. They wanted him to be subservient to, in this case, Rajagopal, whatever Rajagopal decided. And she was prepared to testify for Rajagopal in the case. She went to our lawyer, which is absolutely beyond the pale; you can't do that, and they said that she couldn't do that; they had to show her out. She wanted to say that there were things they didn't know about. As though she knew what they knew. So, she tried to blackmail our lawyer before she blackmailed anybody else. It was all blackmail from beginning to end.

S: Extraordinary.

M: The hold they thought they had over Krishnaji were those stories about an affair. She never said it, but she hinted at it, and that Rajagopal had letters that would be compromising. Our lawyer said: "I'm sorry, it's immaterial, you have nothing, and we can't talk to you" and they put her out.

S: Hm. [Pause.] Now, she had already somehow gotten hold of the Happy Valley School?

M: Oh, years before!

S: Back in the '40s or something.

M: Yes, yes. Way back. No, they were, at least to me, perfectly clear, and Krishnaji felt this too, that their interest was in holding Krishnaji, and controlling what he did. It was alright for him to go around and talk and for people to send money, that's fine. They didn't think anything was wrong with that, but they wanted to control everything after that.

Now we come to the third of November. 'The Lilliefelts came at 11:30 a.m. to talk and then have lunch. There was a wire from James Vigeveno saying that a meeting "can be arranged" for K personally with the board at the KWINC office after Claremont,' because Krishnaji was going to Claremont. 'It was unacceptable to Krishnaji as it was a rejection of his invitation.' So, we talked some more to the lawyers the next day and the Lilliefelts. 'A rude letter came from Byron Casselberry. And we went for a long walk on the beach. Betsy[7] dined with us.'

'We instructed our lawyers to write to Rajagopal,' but I don't remember the details of what that was. It may be in Erna's account. But in other words, we instructed the lawyers to enter the picture as our lawyers, and it was the first time, as far as I know, this been mentioned straight to Rajagopal.

The next day, 'Annie Vigeveno turned up and brought a letter from James Vigeveno about Rajagopal, etcetera.' I'm sure Rajagopal wrote the letter. Actually, a lot of the Vigeveno letters, which are very ugly letters…Gaby Blackburn, who is the daughter of James and Annie, has since told Erna, that James Vigeveno never really wrote those letters. Instead, Annie got her husband to write something, which she then took to Rajagopal, and she and Rajagopal rewrote it, and then James just signed it, and they sent it out.

S: Wow.

M: I thought Vigeveno was a worm to do it, but I wouldn't be surprised if it were true. Then the same day, on the sixth, 'we drove in two cars to Claremont. And we met at something called the Blaizedell Institute,' which is the entity that invited K to come to talk, 'and a Mr. Rempel, the head of it, showed us to the house that was provided,' and it was a very nice house. And I remember the first evening, a family of raccoons came to the porch, obviously expecting to be fed. They were charming, and that was enjoyed by Krishnaji and me.

The next day, 'Krishnaji took a canyon walk in the late afternoon. And I put food in the house. Rosenthal rang'…about legal matters.

'We were shown around the campus the next day, and at 7 p.m. Krishnaji gave his first talk to the students and faculty and public in something called "Bridges Auditorium."'

On the next day, the ninth, 'Krishnaji discussed the threat from Ojai with Alain and me and what to do. There was a student from Fordham, Jim Eagan, who came to lunch with us. We walked.'

On the tenth, the Blackburns came to lunch, Krishnaji gave the second talk after which the Lilliefelts came to the house. They left after supper.

On the eleventh, Frances McCann[8] came to lunch and at 4:30 Krishnaji had a discussion with students.

On the thirteenth, 'Krishnaji gave a talk and discussion at the School of Theology. After lunch, Krishnaji, Alain, and I walked two miles up the canyon while Krishnaji gave us a history of Zen!' [M chuckles, then S chuckles.] 'And back down in the dark,' it says. 'Four miles in all.'

On the fourteenth, 'Huston Smith came for lunch to discuss a televised discussion they are to have tomorrow. At 4:30, Krishnaji held another discussion with students.'

S: How did Krishnaji get along with Huston Smith?

M: Well, it didn't seem to be going anywhere as far as I was concerned. I was very unimpressed with Huston Smith, why…I don't remember. Krishnaji didn't comment.

There was the just-mentioned recording for television discussion in the morning, and at 4:30 p.m. another discussion with students. Then it says, 'Krishnaji decided to cancel a Tuesday meeting, and go back to Malibu on Monday.'

The next day, Krishnaji 'decided to cancel the Monday afternoon meeting at the college and leave for Malibu after lunch. But he had an informal discussion with students.'

S: Why did Krishnaji do that? Was he disappointed in the way the talks were going?

M: I really don't remember. I guess he thought he'd done enough or something; I don't know. I shouldn't say because I can't remember.

On the seventeenth, 'after lunch, the Blackburns came by and wanted,' they were always wanting, to get into the work, so-called. So, the only thing that Krishnaji could come up with was, "Well, if you want to travel at your own expense with us"—meaning the 3 of us—"maybe Gaby could type and Al could help record, that was alright," but it had to be at their own expense, because we couldn't afford it.

On the eighteenth, Krishnaji recorded a television interview for NBC. 'We left in the afternoon, and were home in Malibu by 4:20 p.m.' It says 'home to stay for a while!' exclamation point. [S chuckles.]

S: When Alain was there, he was going off and arranging meetings, so what car did he use?

M: That's a good question. What car did he use? I don't remember. I only had one car in those days. I suppose I must've rented a car for him or something like that. I can't remember. But, there must've been another car because he was all the time going somewhere.

On the twenty-second, 'at 11 a.m. on the twenty-second, there was a meeting with Krishnaji, Alain, the Lilliefelts, me, and lawyers Berkowitz, Selvin, and Rosenthal. They will now write to Rajagopal to meet with him and his lawyers.' It's getting into serious legal things now.

Now, there had been talk that Alain should go away for a holiday, and it had been back and forth between Krishnaji and Alain and me, too. But, at this point, Alain said that he would prefer, instead of going away for a holiday, he would like to do things he enjoys, such as writing, etcetera, here in California. So, that was decided. It didn't happen that way, but temporarily it was decided.

The next day we went to the Zeffirelli movie of Romeo and Juliet.

S: Wait a minute. This holiday of Alain's?

M: Yes?

S: Didn't he suggest to Krishnaji that instead of going away for a vacation, that he would prefer to have a series of discussions with Krishnaji?

M: Yes, that's what develops.

S: Isn't that the holiday book, what's called the Holiday Book?

M: Yes, that is the Holiday Book.

S: Hm.

M: Well, we went to the dentist, we went to the movies, we took walks, we bought a windbreaker for Krishnaji.

S: Where would you go shopping?

M: In Beverly Hills or Westwood. Are we running out of tape?

S: No, we have lots of it.

M: Well, it's a succession of beautiful days and beach walks for quite a while. We always walked in the afternoon, at sunset, which was lovely.

S: Sounds heavenly.

Give me approximately what would happen on the typical day here, when you're all having time off.

M: Well, Krishnaji would have, as usual, breakfast in bed.

S: What time?

M: Oh, dear me. I don't know…eightish, I guess. And then we would often sit, he in bed, and Alain and me sitting on the couch or on a chair or something, for quite awhile. And then eventually, Krishnaji would get up and bathe, and be dressed for lunch, and meanwhile, I usually cooked the lunch. Filomena would assist but I did the main cooking. And then, he'd rest after lunch. And later, in the afternoon, go for a walk. Or, if we were going to do errands, we'd have gone probably in the afternoon.

S: Instead of a walk?

M: No.

S: In between the end of the rest and walk time?

M: Yes.

S: Right.

M: Another young people discussion on December first, and Alain and I went to hear Vladimir Ashkenazy at the Music Center.

Here's a nice day. December second, 'Windy day, after lunch, went to town for errands, saw Amanda, had tea with a friend. Radha[9] rang Krishnaji, and Sidney Field came to see Krishnaji.' Radha gets into the picture to chivvy Krishnaji on behalf of her father. And Sidney Field was a long-standing friend of Krishnaji's, and Krishnaji would get Sidney Field[10] to help him wash the car! [Both laugh.] That was a big event, or go for a walk on the beach with him sometimes.

S: How often would Sidney Field come over?

M: Well, he came every couple of weeks or so, I don't know.

S: Where was he living?

M: In Hollywood. Now, here it says that 'Alain went to the Huntington Library for Mary Links.' She needed some research. 'Krishnaji and I went to the dentist, and then there was a meeting held with Mr. Selvin and Rosenthal, and Rajagopal's lawyer, Mr. Loebl,' and it says here, 'pessimistic outlook.' Alan Watts[11] offered his mailing list to Krishnaji.

S: That was nice of him.

M: We're getting to the end of the year. Oh, on December fifth 'After lunch, Jennifer Selznick'—that's Jennifer Jones, the actress—

S: I don't know Jennifer Jones, but I hardly know any actresses.

M: Well, Jennifer Jones, what was she in? Duel in the Sun, The Barretts of Wimpole Street, um, all kinds of movies. She's a big star, big, big Oscar-winning star. And she was married to David Selznick, who produced Gone with the Wind and all kinds of movies that you've seen. So, she had a son by her first marriage to an actor called Robert Walker. She called up and asked to come to tea. I knew her vaguely, and she brought her son.

S: Did she come to see you, or to see Krishnaji?

M: Krishnaji, naturally. Her son was on drugs, I think.

S: And she was somehow interested in Krishnaji?

M: Well, supposedly, but not really.

S: Not so you'd notice! [Both chuckle.]

M: Um, now this is interesting: on December seventh, 'Erna made a draft of questions about KWINC for our lawyers to ask.' She was the one who knew where all those bodies were buried in the county records. She'd done all that research. In fact, Erna did all the research, really, for the case; she was really remarkable about that.

'Twenty-odd people came for lunch, and to discuss with Krishnaji' on the eighth of December.

S: They came to the house in Malibu?

M: Yes.

S: Obviously, the handiwork of Alain?

M: Yes, he was the shepherd.

Next day, that would be the ninth of December, 'in the afternoon, Krishnaji, Alain, and I went to town, did some shopping, and then at 6 p.m., we had tea with Sidney Field. Then, we went to see Judge Robert Kenny.' Now, that was a very important day because we had all this data that Erna had dug up, and didn't know what to do about Rajagopal. Judge Kenny was a very good man. He'd been the attorney general of California, and he was now a superior court judge, or something like that, and just a very nice, very liberal man. He used to fight for all kinds of good, liberal things in California, and he was a friend of Sidney Field. So, Sidney suggested that Krishnaji go and talk to Judge Kenny, and we went on this particular day, the ninth of December 1968, and told him what we knew. He said that there was no question that all this was very suspicious, and that we must take the evidence to the present attorney general immediately and present it to him and he would then advise us. But it was clear that something is there to be investigated. So, that is just what we did.

On the eleventh, 'Christopher Isherwood and his friend Don Bachardy came to lunch.' Do you know who I mean by Christopher Isherwood?

S: I know the name.

M: Well, you know Auden, the poet?

S: Yes.

M: Auden and Isherwood were the two young people from Cambridge, and both were writers.

S: Yes.

M: Isherwood's best-known book is the Berlin Stories, which were about Berlin in the early Nazi days, and it was also made into a movie. He had been living for some time in Santa Monica, and Don Bachardy was the man he lived with, and was a painter/artist. Isherwood became a Ramakrishna disciple, and he wrote the life of Ramakrishna, a very good likeness. It's well-written. So he was very involved in Ramakrishna things. He was also a friend of Huxley, and all that English literary world.

S: Yes.

M: 'In the late afternoon, Rajagopal telephoned. Krishnaji picked up the phone, and then put me on.' [Chuckles.] 'Rajagopal again said he wanted to meet Krishnaji alone,' etcetera, you know, the same old thing. I think that was the time that he said, 'Wasn't that Krishnaji who answered the phone?'

I said, "Yes."

He then said, " I want to speak to him."

I replied, "He doesn't want to speak to you. You'll have to tell me whatever it is."

The next day, 'Deborah Kerr and her husband Peter Viertel, a movie writer, came for lunch. Also Amanda. Krishnaji and I had a lovely walk at sunset.'

S: So, people like Deborah Kerr, they would call up and ask if they could…

M: No, no. I knew Deborah. She was in Sam's picture Quo Vadis, and I used to see her and her previous husband and the children quite a bit. I heard she was in town, so I invited them for lunch, and they came.

On the fourteenth, 'the first of the discussions that we held at the house began at 4 p.m. and about 15 people came.' Again, that's all Alain's doing.

S: They'd be young people?

M: Youngish, not student age, but people interested in the teachings.

The next two days saw another discussion with youngish people and lots of interviews.

Oh, on the morning of seventeenth of December, 'a cable came that Brockwood papers were signed today, and is Foundation's as of today.' Heh-heh. It's nice to be able to sit here and say that.

S: Yes, yes, it is.

M: On the nineteenth, 'we all three drove to Ojai and to the Lilliefelts for lunch. There was a tea afterwards for Krishnaji to see Ojai friends.' Lots of people came for that. It says here, 'I was having trouble with my leg.'

On the twenty-first 'Krishnaji talked to Alain and me about Alain's feelings of tension between Alain and me, and apparently my remoteness was at fault.'

S: Between you and Alain?

M: Mm.

S: [laughs] You must've cured that fault in a big way, because I've never known you to be remote!

M: [laughs] I thought I was rather nice! [Both chuckle more.]

On the twenty-second, 'there was the fourth discussion of the group.' My leg was too numb to walk, so I didn't walk on the beach.

S: Mm, this is your famous leg?

M: My famous leg.

[Chuckles.] On December twenty-fourth, 'in the evening, we had supper and watched the live television of the moon from the Apollo flight. After the tenth orbit, they headed back to earth.' Oh, they didn't land that time.

S: They didn't go till '69.

M: Oh, I didn't remember that.

'We watched a Horowitz concert on television.' This is Christmas Day.

S: What would you have typically done with Krishnaji on Christmas Day?

M: Well, it says 'quiet day at home.' We don't do anything about Christmas. 'Miranda, Philippa, Jessica, and Miranda's beau all came to tea, after which Krishnaji walked on the beach with Steve, the beau, and Jessica, while Miranda and I talked in the car.'

[Chuckles.] 'Supper as usual by the TV and watched the Horowitz concert. I spoke to all of my family in New York,' and that was this Christmas. We didn't celebrate Christmas.

S: Did you ever give each other gifts for Christmas?

M: Oh, no. Heavens, no.

S: Well, I'm just trying to get all this on the record. [Both laugh.]

M: Christmas is a heathen festival. [S laughs more.]

S: Now, where was Filomena on Christmas, because was Filomena a practicing Catholic?

M: Oh, yes.

S: So, she would've gone off to mass on Christmas Eve, and would she have made a special meal for Christmas, or done anything like that?

M: No, because I did the meals. We just did lunch. I probably gave her a present, yes. And I probably gave the Dunnes, too, because…

S: I'm sure you did to the Dunnes.

M: But I didn't go over there or anything like that.

On the twenty-seventh, 'On seeing the face, I should by now.[12]

There was another group discussion on the twenty-eighth at 4 p.m. and another at 11 a.m. the next day.

Mm. On the thirtieth, 'Freedom from the Known, Krishnaji's new book edited by Mary L. arrived, published by Gollancz. This is the first Krishnamurti Foundation copyright book.

I can't imagine that posterity will be anything but bored by all this!

S: [laughs] No, I don't know, but anyway, we need something for serious researchers.

M: Like you!

S: Exactly [humor in voice], and maybe this is just for me!

M: I'm sorry, I haven't got the proper book, which might be a little more flowery.

S: You will for 1969, right?

M: I'm not so sure.

S: You do have 1969, don't you?

M: I have everything from '70 on, but I haven't yet located '69.

S: You haven't located '69?

M: No. I'm really quite worried about it because I…

S: '69 is a big year.

M: I remembered that you had said, "Please, bring everything." So, I thought I had. Now, why isn't it here? It's worrying…

[End of recording.]

[12] This is a long and very intriguing subject, which is dealt with at length in a later discussion. It is just worth noting here because it is the first mention of this topic.

Issue 11: January 1969 to May 1969

At the end of the last issue, Issue 10, we read that Mary had brought her diaries with her from Ojai to Brockwood for the purposes of these discussions, but she found that when she got to Brockwood, she didn't have diaries for 1969. As a consequence, we simply skipped 1969 and went on to 1970, intending to go back to 1969 after she found the missing diaries. We knew that, if she had indeed left the 1969 diaries by mistake in Ojai, we would have to wait to cover 1969 until the following spring, when she returned to Brockwood from Ojai. This discovery of the missing diaries and our discussions that skipped 1969 took place in the summer of 1995. In fact, when Mary got back to Ojai, she scoured everywhere for the diaries, but couldn't find them.

Mary and I continued our discussions, and in 2005 we had progressed in the chronology of Krishnaji's life to 1983. I was, by that time, living in Oregon, and I would regularly fly down to Ojai to continue this project with Mary. That year, mysteriously, and Mary never understood how, the small daily diary for 1969 appeared among her collection of diaries. It is important to note it was only the small daily diary, because the size of this diary matters. The pages of these diaries are 4 inches by 2½ inches (10mm by 6mm), and each page contains space for two days. So, the actual writing space for any particular day is only 1¾ inches by 2½ inches (4.5mm by 6mm). This is miniscule, and it has an impact on what you will find in this and the next two issues (Issues 11, and 12).

One impact is the sparseness of detail, and another is the frequent use of incomplete sentences. As to the larger diary that Mary kept for other years, she either didn't keep for this year, or it never miraculously reappeared as did the small one. Readers may remember it had previously been stated that for most of the years Mary knew Krishnaji, she kept two kinds of diaries: one was a small daily diary that she would fill in every night before going to sleep; and the second was a larger diary that was more like a small notebook, in which she would write whenever there was something she felt needed greater exposition and detail than her daily diary allowed.

By the year 2005, Mary was 90 years old, and frail. It had taken us eleven years to discuss the beginning of her contact with Krishnaji as well as the first nineteen years of her intensely working and traveling with him. In 2005, we still had to cover the material from 1983 until Krishnaji's death in 1986. We did not want to rush through this; we wanted to be as thorough with the remaining years of Krishnaji's life as we had been with the previous years. Still, there was an unspoken acknowledgment that we had only finite time to complete this project. And this project was important to Mary, as she had come to feel this project was the way she would meet her promise to Krishnaji of presenting to the world what it was like to be with him. The energy she had for her own writing was now a trickle.

There was also the sense in 2005 that our discussions had slowly and meticulously gone over every aspect of being with Krishnaji that Mary could think of. We had discussed, explored, and unfolded every detail we could imagine; we had gotten to 1983—within sight of the finish line—and now we had to go back to 1969. And 1969 was such a momentous year in so many ways. The details of that year had to be reported for the record. So, we set about doing this, but with a spirit of getting things right for the record, rather than discussing things, and you readers will notice a difference between the style of these issues covering 1969 and both the previous issues and the subsequent ones.

1969 saw the founding of the Krishnamurti Foundation of America, and the quickening of the legal case against KWINC. This was a major change in Krishnaji's work and life. In 1969, the newly formed Krishnamurti Foundation Trust in England bought Brockwood Park; Brockwood Park Krishnamurti Educational Centre started with one student. By the time Krishnaji, Mary, and Alain made their first trip to Brockwood in March, there were four students. That autumn, the first public talks at Brockwood were given, and these would continue for the rest of Krishnaji's life. 1969 was also the year that Alain Naudé stopped traveling and working as intensely with Krishnaji.

All these momentous things occur, and Mary and I have very little discussion about them. Instead, this and the next issue read like a list of short diary entries, which, essentially, they are. All the things that we could have and should have discussed were discussed in the previous years, so these two issues are an anomaly. To flesh out some of what should have been discussed, I have put in quite a few "Editor's Notes."

Mary: So, off we go. 1969, January first. Krishnamurti was staying that winter in Malibu. My diary reads, 'What a lovely way to start the year. A warm beautiful day, clear, still—like summer. Krishnaji, Alain, and I were out on the lawn before breakfast. Krishnaji dictated in the morning.' He would've dictated to Alain at that stage.

Scott: Mm, hm. These dictations that Krishnaji made to Alain, do we know where those are? Does Alain still have anything like that?

M: Not that I know of. It was all processed into books and things. I've now forgotten which books have what, but there's quite a lot of those things in one of the books.

S: I wonder if Alain still has anything, like you know…drafts of old…

M: Well, we can call him. I'm remiss. I owe him a call.

S: Well, if you call him, ask him what things he might have that the archives might be interested in.

M: I will, I will.

S: Good. January second?

M: January second. 'Alan Watts and the Basses, and wife.' The Basses were a couple (I've forgotten their first names) who lived down in San Diego, who were friends of Alan Watts. All four came to lunch this day. 'Alain Naudé left afterwards to drive north, and set up Krishnaji's talks in Berkeley, Stanford, and Santa Cruz. Krishnaji and I went for a beach walk.

The third says, 'to town for errands. Back before lunch. Krishnaji made the first direct tape by himself. After lunch, we went to Sears and bought Krishnaji blue jeans, then to Saks for loafers. Home for supper. Alain rang; spent last night in Buellton and tonight in Carmel, having come along the Big Sur Road.'

January fourth. After lunch Krishnaji held a discussion with a group at 4 p.m., and the next day 'the eighth group discussion at 11 a.m. Then lunched alone, rested, and went for a walk on the beach.'

On January sixth, 'Desk work. After lunch Krishnaji came with me to town while I went to Tassell.' Tassell was a designer of clothes. I had quite a lot of clothes from them.

S: Ah, that yellow coat?

M: Yes, that yellow coat, it's a Tassell. 'We then looked at a Leicaflex.' That's a camera.

On January seventh, 'After lunch with Erna and Theo Lilliefelt, they followed Krishnaji and me to a session with Saul Rosenthal about the list of questions for Rajagopal and KWINC. Also set up the Krishnamurti Foundation of America. Very productive,' it says.

S: Yes, there wasn't a foundation in America yet. This was the founding of it.

M: That's right. After we all studied the questions, we had the lawyers send them off.

Editor's Note: There needed to be a legal American entity to receive the money and property that had been given for Krishnaji's work, but these were controlled by Rajagopal, a fact that would eventually become the subject of the lawsuit. The Krishnamurti Foundation of America eventually got the copyrights for Krishnaji's pre-1968 works, an important legacy.

On the ninth, 'Ruth Tettemer and her daughter Eve Siegel…' Ruth was eventually a trustee of the American foundation in those early days. '…came to lunch, and at 4:30 p.m. I had another injection. An X-ray of my left leg showed my blood vessels were causing intermittent claudication.' Those were what the pain spasms I was having all the time were called.

Editor's Note: Mary had been one of the first people to receive radiation treatment for what doctors believed to be cancer when she was a girl. It was dramatically overdone, and she suffered radiation poisoning as a girl, which left the muscle, bone, and vessels of her left leg permanently damaged. As she got older, the left leg broke several times. She had constant pain in her leg all the years I knew her, but she never complained, though it was a constant vulnerability.

On the tenth of January, 'Krishnaji and I drove via Moorpark through Santa Paula to Ojai. We lunched with the Lilliefelts. Krishnaji gave two interviews, and we drove home along the ocean.'

The next day, 'Alain returned from San Francisco in time for lunch. There was group discussion number nine, and the next day at 11 a.m. there was the tenth discussion.'

Then there are just a lot of days with small things happening until the fifteenth, when 'I flew to San Francisco at 9:15 a.m. Looked at Canterbury Hotel for our stay in February. Then, to the Clift Hotel where father and Olive'—Olive is my father's wife—'are. Lunched with them at the Villa Taverna, and walked back through Chinatown. Flew back to Los Angeles at 4:45 p.m. and was home in time for supper.'

S: What were they doing in San Francisco?

M: Well, they were staying there for a while. They traveled all the time.

S: Yes.

M: On January eighteenth, 'The eleventh group discussion in the morning. We all three went'—that means Alain, Krishnaji, and I—'at 4 o'clock to meet Mary and Joe Links, who arrived on a polar flight from London. They have rooms at the Casa Malibu, but came here for a late tea and early supper.'

S: That was such a big deal to fly over the poles in those days.

M: Yes. [Both chuckle.] It was awful. Mary and Joe came to get away from the London winter, and it rained every day they were there. [Both laugh.] And the day they left, I remember, as their car disappeared to the airport, the sun came out! [Chuckling.]

For the nineteenth, it says 'Pouring rain! The Linkses came to breakfast. The Lilliefelts and Ruth Tettemer followed. Talked about the Bulletin, donation appeals, etcetera, until the group discussion began. Mary and I went over Brockwood matters. Then, after the group left, we continued discussions of the foundation and Bulletin[1] matters with Krishnaji, Mary, Erna and Theo, and Ruth Tettemer. Finally, Krishnaji, the Linkses, and I had a late lunch. Talked most of the afternoon. Rain kept pouring down. The Linkses are going to Pasadena tomorrow.' She was going to the Huntington Library[2]. 'Filomena and I fought leaks.' [Chuckles.] Then the next day it says, 'Filomena and I fought mud in the garden!' [S chuckles.]

Editor's Note: The mudslides were, and remain, a hazard to the cliff-top property in that part of California. Mary eventually lost a substantial portion of her property over the cliff.

January twenty-first. 'The storm total is seven inches. It cleared in the morning. Early lunch, and three of us went to a movie, Bullet, in Hollywood.' That was a good movie. It looks like ‘Alain went on to join the Linkses in Pasadena, and Krishnaji and I came home.’

Various people came over during the next few days: Gavin Lambert, the movie writer, and Jennifer Jones Selznick, and Betsy Drake.

On January twenty-third, ‘I bought a Leicaflex camera with a 90-mm lens…’ It was really for taking pictures of Krishnaji, because the new books and the Bulletin that were planned needed photos. ‘…and was back by tea. Mary and Joe came for dinner. We watched the Traverses’ film of lions in Africa.’ That was Born Free. ‘Listened to some tapes of the conversations in the Holiday Book collection.’

The twenty-fifth of January: ‘Mary and Joe came to breakfast, lunch, and supper. There was a group discussion in spite of being, for a while, cut off by the rain and mudslides. Ojai was blocked, but one boy, Lloyd Williams, from Ojai walked seven miles to a bus to come!’ How extraordinary. ‘Mary and I made notes about Brockwood. The roads are blocked to the north. The Linkses and Alain decided to fly to San Francisco instead of motoring.’

January twenty-sixth. ‘The Linkses came to breakfast, and the fourteenth and final group discussion was at 11 a.m. The rain stopped at last. After lunch, Krishnaji and I drove the Linkses and Alain to the airport where they flew to San Francisco. Krishnaji drove the Jaguar back and practiced parking in Santa Monica.’ Heh. That’s when he wanted to get a license. ‘We walked on the beach strewn with driftwood. A quiet supper in a quiet house.’

Well, on the next few days there were some legal meetings, including setting up the American foundation, which required, for some reason, some life members, which Erna and I became. I’m afraid this became a point of contention with Alain, as he was only made a member for a year.

On the twenty-eighth of January, ‘Rang Alain. Unhappy conversation. Felt sick. Rang Lilliefelts to discuss with Rosenthal if there isn’t some other way. Krishnaji drove as we went to the dentist for a filling that he lost. Eve Siegal and children came to tea. Krishnaji took his driving license test. Excellent on the written, but nervous on the driving part. They gave him only a temporary permit. We had a picnic in the car.’ Then it says, ‘packed.’

Editor’s Note: We have been reading of Krishnaji driving for several years now, in America and in Europe. Mary comments that he was a good driver, and that he enjoyed driving on occasion; but from this and subsequent material, it seems that he didn’t have a license in America or in Europe. This didn’t seem to be of much concern to Mary.

January thirtieth, ‘Krishnaji and I left at 11:45 a.m. in the Jaguar and drove north. Stopped beyond Santa Barbara in Dos Pueblos for a picnic lunch. Drove on. The country was green and beautiful. Big Sur Road was closed, so we took the inland 101 freeway through Salinas and into Carmel Valley. Spent the night at the Highlands Inn.'

Thirty-first of January. 'We drove down the Big Sur Road a little to Point Lobos. Walked and I used the new Leicaflex. We shopped in Carmel, and lunched at the Pine Inn, then drove on to San Francisco, arriving at the Huntington Hotel at 5:30 p.m. Alain was there. We unpacked, and had a long three-way talk, and supper.' We had quite nice rooms in the Huntington; there was a kitchen, a sitting room, and two big bedrooms and bath.

Editor's Note: There isn't any note of what was talked about, but after the difficulty of "life membership" and knowing that there were many three-way conversations trying to resolve Alain's unhappiness, as well as seeing that Mary felt the need to write about this conversation despite there being so little space in her small diary (implying this conversation had significant psychological weight for her); we can assume that the "long three-way talk" was about all that. I do know that Krishnaji tried to support and keep Alain in the work, and since Alain stayed, at least for now, we can assume that Krishnaji had some success.

The next day we lunched in the sitting room. 'Then we drove to Muir Woods and were able to walk only a short way, but Krishnaji had a good walk.'

February second. 'A sunny day. Michael Korman of KPFA'—that's a nonprofit radio station out of Berkeley that played audiotapes of Krishnaji's talks—'for lunch. Later I went to see Father, walking down the hill but not up it.' They were down at the bottom of the hill; we were up on top of Nob Hill. The leg is very numb. Joan Baez came to see Krishnaji. Alain and I dined downstairs in the restaurant, L'Etoile, and reviewed our Friday conversation.' [Seems to start to explain:] Alain was upset about the life memberships for setting up the foundation and his not being one of them.

S: Yes, I understand.

M: On the third, Alain and I went to Macy's for an electric pot to do wheat in.' I was making wheat meal, it's like oatmeal, but made with wheat. 'I made wheat meal for lunch, then Alain and I reconnoitered at the Berkeley Theater, where Krishnaji is to talk. At 8 p.m. I drove Krishnaji to the first Berkeley talk. There were about 2,500 in the audience. We had supper afterward.'

The next day there was the second Berkeley talk. 'Tremendous, tremendous one,' it says here. Also, 'Krishnaji has a slight cold.'

Fifth of February. 'Rain. Sonoma student, Terry Agnew, came to lunch, then to the third Berkeley talk.' The next day, 'the final Berkeley talk. It was a great one.'

February seventh. 'Michael Korman came to lunch. Krishnaji, Alain, and I went to Alan Watts' in Sausalito; he had people to meet Krishnaji. Messy discussion!' Alan Watts, do you know who I mean?

S: Yes.

M: He lived on a houseboat in Sausalito, and he had wanted Krishnaji to come and meet all the distinguished, intellectual people in San Francisco. But when we got there, both he and his wife were drunk! And the people asked stupid questions. It was a fruitless event! It was just a mess. We left.

Editor's Note: I have never heard of anything else like this: someone inviting Krishnaji and being drunk on the occasion, thereby showing disrespect toward Krishnaji. This seems particularly odd for Alan Watts who showed on other occasions great respect for Krishnaji, and wanted to be helpful to Krishnaji's work.

S: Oh, dear.

M: February eighth. 'With Krishnaji to a meeting arranged by KPFA at 7 p.m. in Berkeley. Came back to supper. Rajagopal has formed another foundation called K & R.'

Editor's Note: There was the suspicion, at the time, that Rajagopal's new foundation was merely a legal tactic to help defend his possession of the assets he controlled but which had been given for Krishnaji's work. In any event, it didn't work.

Ninth of February. 'We lunched, and then Professor Nader and family came to tea. Father and Olive came at 7 p.m. Then, I took them down to dine in the L'Etoile.' That was the very good restaurant downstairs, down just next to the Huntington.

The next day, we 'packed, left the Huntington, and drove to Sonoma State College, where Krishnaji spoke. We lunched with students, Terry Agnew and Helen Hauserthen, then drove south to Palo Alto, where we had rooms at the Stanford Faculty Club.'

February eleventh, 'lunch with Buckminster Fuller, Michael Kerina, and John Digues.' John Digues is the one that brought Buckminster Fuller. 'A discussion was taped for KPFA. At 4:30 p.m., went with Krishnaji to his first Stanford talk, but I had to return to San Francisco to an appointment with a vascular doctor.' My leg was troubling me, and my Los Angeles doctor said I must see this vascular person. 'He thinks the femoral artery is blocked.'

On the twelfth, 'Leg a little less painful. Have a cold. Krishnaji decided to cancel the Australian tour, then he went to the second Stanford talk.' I'd forgotten about the intention to go to Australia.

The next day, 'Krishnaji is tired, but he gave his third Stanford talk. Alain out for supper. He is to go ahead of us to Europe.'

Finally on the fourteenth, at 4 p.m., 'the final Stanford talk.' The next day Krishnaji and I both rested all day in bed.

On the sixteenth, ‘we packed, had lunch, and drove to UC Santa Cruz. Krishnaji and I were lodged in a nice flat. Alain was nearby. Krishnaji gave a talk at 8 p.m. to students in Cowell College. The next day, he gave his second talk.’

On the eighteenth, ‘Krishnaji had the day off. We went for a drive inland through the Redwoods. He walked while I followed him in the car.’ I couldn’t walk much at that point. I used to drive along, you know, slowly.

S: Yes.

M: I can still see him. [S laughs.]

On the nineteenth and twentieth, Krishnaji gave his last two talks at Santa Cruz.

On the twenty-first, ‘We were early. Breakfast at 7 a.m. Alain loaded the car and Krishnaji and I left Cowell College and Santa Cruz at 8:45 a.m. Drove via Carmel, Big Sur, stopped briefly at Nepenthe’—you know that’s that restaurant right on the water. ‘The coast road only just opened after the storm and mudslides. Had a picnic lunch near Cambria. Krishnaji drove the rest of the hundred miles to Santa Barbara, and then I drove the remaining way to Malibu, arriving at 4:20 p.m. Good to be home. House and garden beautiful. Filomena was well. Alain arrived afterward in the night. No rest for me, pain in leg.’

February twenty-second. ‘Beautiful morning after the rain. After lunch, Erna and Theo Lilliefelt, and Ruth Tettemer came; we discussed affairs and formally signed, before a notary, the trust’s founding documents of the Krishnamurti Foundation of America. Trustees are Krishnaji, Erna Lilliefelt, Ruth Tettemer, Alain, and me. Had our first trustee meeting.’

February twenty-fourth. ‘Took Alain to the airport. He flew to Paris, and will go to Gstaad and find housing for students next summer. Went to the French consulate for Krishnaji’s visa, then to Henry Bamberger about my tax and selling Alain’s VW.’ So, that was the car Alain had.

Nothing much happens until the twenty-seventh. ‘Krishnaji and I met the Lilliefelts and Ruth Tettemer at Rosenthal’s office. We all went to the attorney general’s office downtown for a meeting between Krishnaji and Laurence Tapper, the attorney general. He will investigate KWINC. Krishnaji and I had lunch in the car. And then I went to fetch the visa and my Tassell coat, while Krishnaji had a haircut.’

The next day, ‘we packed, and I took four bags to Pan American cargo for shipment to London.’

Then nothing very special until March fourth. ‘A big slide where my pump house had been. The trees there dropped thirty feet down the cliff beyond the gate. Have to leave it to Carlson’s hands’—he was a contractor who did things like that. ‘We left at 10 a.m.

Amanda drove Krishnaji and me to the airport, where we took a new Pan American flight nonstop to London. I went first class with Krishnaji.'

On the fifth of March, 'Krishnaji and I arrived in London, and spent one half hour waiting in transit before flying on to Paris. Telephoned Mary Links, the Digbys, and Mary Cadogan. Alain surprised us by being at the Paris airport with his car. He had got rooms in the new school in Schonried for students. We all lunched and talked. Krishnaji and I walked over to see my Mercedes in the garage, brought by Mr. Moser from Switzerland. We took naps, then phoned Madame Duperrex.' She was the very nice concierge of the rooms in Caprices at Gstaad. 'We rented rooms in Trois Ours.' Yes, she was also the concierge for this chalet just below Tannegg. Instead of staying down in the village at Caprices, I had wanted to stay there.

S: Ah, yes, Trois Ours. I remember it.

You're in Paris at the moment. Where were you staying in Paris?

M: Um, where were we staying? Ah, it says here, 'Le Pont Royal.'

'Dined in rooms. Tired. Alain has a new Nagra.[3]

March sixth, 'We left Pont Royale and Paris in both cars at 8:40 a.m. Krishnaji and I drove to Le Touquet, 160 miles in three hours. Alain met us there and flew both of the cars to Lydd. We lunched there, and then at 2:30 p.m., left and drove across southern England, 120 miles. We met Alain at the West Meon Hut, and then together, we all went to Brockwood.' This is the first time we'd been to Brockwood!

Editor's Note: Brockwood Park was built in 1769, and was what was known as an English "country house." In the decade or so before it was acquired by the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust, it had only been used for a few weekends every year for pheasant hunting. It had been sold to the local landowner only a year before the KFT bought it, and he only wanted the large amount of land attached to the house, but not the house. Unfortunately for him, Brockwood was listed as a historic building, so he could neither tear down nor neglect the main building. He then had to find someone who wanted to buy such a large historic house with very little land (only about fifty acres). The only buyer for something like that was either someone wanting to start a hotel (but there was nothing to bring clients to a hotel in that area) or someone wanting to start a school. The landowner was thrilled to have the KFA as a buyer, and sold the house, the gate house, two cottages, a barn, and the fifty acres for £40,000.

I remember…well, anyway, 'just as sun was setting, the Simmonses, Donald Hoppen, Doris Pratt, Alan Hooker, and four boy students were there. The house and grounds are beautiful. Saw it, had supper, and went to bed.' I remember that I was so tired because I had misjudged how long the journey would take. I knew how long it took to get to Le Touquet from Paris, then cross over in the plane; that was easy. But then, on the map, it didn't look very far to cross the south of England.

S: Yes, I know. Going across southern England on those little B roads takes forever.

M: Yes. I'd been driving since…what was it? Eight in the morning or something, and by the time I finally drove up the lane to Brockwood, and had the first glimpse of Brockwood, I was in tears from exhaustion.

S: Yes, yes. Oh dear.

M: Anyway, it was nice, though.

S: Where did you stay that first night at Brockwood?

M: Oh, in the West Wing.

S: So, someone must've furnished it before you got there?

M: Well, I had, on a previous trip, knowing we were going to do something like this, I'd asked Nelly Digby to go to Heal's and get sheets, and I'd picked out beds. Krishnaji's room had everything it needed, and my room had that big dressing table, which was left by the former owners. And there were shelves. I'd bought the two little white drawer things in my bathroom. I bought those at Heal's, too. And I'd asked Nelly to install those things, if we got a place. Those are the things that I thought I would need.

S: Right.

M: I learned that from my aunt or someone who put Heal beds in a house in Rome, because they were supposed to be wonderful. And so, we planned all that ahead of time.

S: And Nelly was there to carry it out?

M: Yes. So we had the necessities. We had beds, linens, and towels.

S: And there were shelves and cupboards in the bathrooms.

M: Yes, yes.

S: So you could unpack things.

M: Yes, we could unpack.

S: Where did you get those big white tables?

M: Oh! Huh. You know that place that had very good modern furniture…

S: Started by Corin.

M: Yes, yes.

S: What was his name, the designer. Not Corin, but something like that.

M: Yes.

S: Yes, yes. I know the place.

M: And the main shop was in London. There was one also in Southampton.

S: And so those were bought subsequently?

M: Yes, and everything else. I got the chairs from Mr. Bekema in Alresford. I still had to do all the downstairs.

Editor's Note:* "…do all the downstairs" sounds fairly innocuous, but it was anything but that for Mary. What Mary refers to as "the downstairs" was the formal drawing room, the sitting room, and a secondary sitting room of Brockwood. Mary knew this is where Krishnaji would have formal interviews, where filming would take place, and where trustees would meet. The rooms are beautiful, built as the original part of the house in 1769, and Mary felt that the furniture should be from that period, and that the rooms should be "worthy" of all that would occur in them. For the next year or more, we see Mary laboring to make these rooms the beautiful spaces they became.

S: Right. But that could come afterwards. At least there was a place for you and Krishnaji and Alain to stay.

M: Paul Anstee will come into this. He got me all that furniture downstairs; the drawing room and all that.

M: So, predictably, on the seventh, 'unpacked. Mary Cadogan arrived for lunch and talked with Krishnaji, Alain, and me. Went for the first walk with Krishnaji in Brockwood Park. Lovely, small copse…seven redwood trees, the cedar of Lebanon trees, the fields and orchard, and an enormous rose garden and vegetable garden.'

The next morning, 'Alain and I left early and drove to London and the airport to fetch the four bags I'd sent a few days ago by Pan American cargo. Frost on the fields. Lovely landscape. Returned in time for lunch. A discussion with Dorothy Simmons about which rooms will be Krishnaji's section of the house; also of plans for the school.'

On March ninth, 'The Linkses came to call in the morning. The Digbys and the Cadogans came to lunch. Trustees meeting all afternoon. George Digby reassured on KF of America being able to contribute funds.' [Both chuckle.] Well, in those days, the KFA had nothing much to do except run an office, so Erna was glad to send funds to England.

It turned out pretty soon that it was illegal to give charitable funds from the USA to a foreign entity.

S: Yes.

M: But George Digby was concerned. 'I went for a short walk with Krishnaji and Alain. Krishnaji decided we must use only two floors of the West Wing.' Well, what else would we have used?

S: There was the floor above and that staircase to it.

M: Ah, yes. 'Discussed alterations, etcetera, with Donald Hoppen. The weather was still clear and beautiful.'

The next day. 'Cloudy with rain later. Went on to Winchester with Donald Hoppen to buy some household things. Back for lunch. Ironed shirts for Alain. Walked in the rain with Krishnaji.'

March eleven, 'Krishnaji decides not to spend the night in a hotel in London before and after tomorrow's talk. Relief to all three of us to stay in Brockwood. Spent a quiet day doing household things.'

Editor's Note: Brockwood became Krishnaji's and Mary's home in Europe, and the place Krishnaji would spend more of this time than any other location in the world. The public talks at Brockwood eventually replaced the London talks.

The next day 'I drove early to London with Donald Hoppen. Hunted for carpets and chintz. Lunched with Fleur at Albany.' This is my friend Fleur Cowles again, and when she heard what I was doing, she said, "You need Paul Anstee." Anstee was a young man, a decorator.

S: Right. Yes.

M: I met her at Albany, where she lived 'and called Paul Anstee to help with the furnishings and made an appointment at Brockwood for Monday. Met Donald Hoppen and Mary Cadogan at builder's service to look for kitchen equipment. Alain had taken Krishnaji to Mrs. Bindley after lunch. At 5:30 p.m., I went there to drive him to the first talk in Wimbledon at 7 o'clock. We drove back to Brockwood afterward.'

Then various people came: Claudine and Gérard Blitz, Mary Cadogan, Mary Links, and Hughes van der Straten. Frances McCann came to stay for several days.

On the sixteenth, 'Krishnaji and I drove to Wimbledon at 9 a.m. for the 11 o'clock talk. Went via the Hog's Back.' Do you remember that road?

S: Oh, yes. I do indeed. Guildford.

M: Yes, 'to Guilford. The ride in was one-and-a-half hours. Sat in Richmond Park for a while. Then, to the hall. We drove back afterward, immediately afterward, and had our picnic lunch in the kitchen. Rested, and then walked. Very cold, about twenty-nine degrees.'

On the seventeenth, 'Paul Anstee came to discuss furnishings for Brockwood. He, Alain, and I lunched at the West Meon Hut. Then continued work on same, all afternoon.'

On March eighteenth, 'With Krishnaji and Alain to London by train from Alton. He went to Huntsman, and then he, Mary Links, Alain, and I lunched at Claridge's. Krishnaji and I went to see the BBC for a color television interview of Krishnaji. I did errands at Harrods, etcetera, and met them at Waterloo Station for return train at 6:30 p.m.'

S: So there was a color interview?

M: Apparently. Then there are lots of meetings to outfit the house, plan the kitchen, and all that.

Krishnaji had the third talk at Wimbledon on the twentieth.

On March twenty-first. 'Went to London with Alain and Narendra in Krishnaji's car.' That was an Indian boy student that made such difficulty for Alain. Alain and Dorothy quarreled over him.

S: Yes.

M: 'I left them at Harrods and drove to Kenwood to look at a wall color.' Kenwood is, um…oh dear, who lived there? Famous writer, can't think. I can see it; I can drive there, but I can't tell you the name—anyway, I had seen it when I used to go and look at houses like that. The point of it was I remembered that there was a color on a room, a living room, that was sort of like coffee with milk in it. It was a beautiful color. And I was trying to think what to paint the drawing room in West Wing, so I went to refresh my mind.

So, where was I? 'Drove to Kenwood to look at the wall color. Had coffee there. It was a cold day. Left the car for Alain in the parking lot, and went to Paul Anstee to see samples of materials, carpet, etcetera. Came back to Alton by train and then onto Brockwood.'

On the twenty-third, 'Motored with Krishnaji to Wimbledon for the fourth and last talk of the series, a very moving one. We came back and lunched alone. Then a lot of people came. Krishnaji had a school discussion which included the Simmonses, Alan Hooker, Alain Naudé, and me.'

Editor's Notes: Krishnaji spoke more to the people at Brockwood than he did to any other group. He eventually settled into having one discussion a week with just students, one discussion a week with just the staff, and one discussion a week with staff and students together, as well as any other guests who were there. People would come to Brockwood just for the day in order to attend these discussions when this pattern became known. So, this is three discussions a week for approximately six months a year—a tremendous number of discussions.

It is also worth noting that while most of these discussions would have seemed normal to any audience of Krishnaji's work, a great many of them addressed problems in the school.

The times when most of Krishnaji's discussions were aimed at problems seemed to come in waves, and this beginning of Brockwood was certainly such a time. The reader will see that Mary mentions below how Krishnaji discussed with students and staff questions of authority and the responsibility of the then-principal Dorothy Simmons. The first several years of Brockwood (as with many new schools) were volatile; conflict, factions, staff and students leaving in the middle of a term, attempts to take power away from Dorothy, etcetera.

It is not within the purposes of these memoirs to explore the nature of these conflicts (which readers will see re-emerge in the early 1980s) or to explain them, but the great many discussions the readers will notice in this first year need to be somewhat described as Mary was in the thick of it, and these would have been part of what it was like to be with Krishnaji.

The next day Krishnaji and Alain took the train to London and I drove in. I did household errands, and they went to Huntsman and then Sullivan & Wooly. Wooly (which was their nick name) are down the street from Huntsman and less expensive.

For the next few days I continued to work on house things, plus dictations from Krishnaji, and I worked a little in the garden, pruning.

For April first, it says, 'Packing. Painting samples for walls.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I in the Mercedes, and Alain in the VW left Brockwood at 10:30 a.m. Outside Rye, in a place called Playden, a man ran into the Mercedes, crushing the right rear fender. The police said it was the man's fault. They bent the metal away from the wheel, so I continued to Dover. Krishnaji rode with Alain for less weight. We all got on the 4:30 p.m. ferry to Calais. We had driven the 144 miles in England and then on as far as Montreuil, where we spent the night in a charming hotel, Château de Montreuil.' That was a nice hotel.

On the third of April. 'We left Montreuil at 9:45 a.m. and drove via Arras to the autoroute to Paris. Krishnaji and I arrived at 12:30 p.m. at 16 Rue de Verdun, and Alain slightly later.' That's the house I rented.

S: I remember.

M: 'There was a maid, Marguerite, and a cook, André, and they had lunch ready. We unpacked and rested. After supper, Alain and I went to the Salle Pleyel and heard Sviatoslav Richter play Bach's The Well-Tempered Clavier, numbers 13 to 34. Infinitely beautiful playing!' I was a big fan, still am, of Richter. So, it was nice.

On the fourth, 'Lunched with father, Bud, and Lisa at the Berkeley. Olive is still in the hospital. Went shopping with Bud and Lisa and bought Herend and Limoges china for Brockwood.' Herend is the stuff with the birds on it.

S: Yes, yes.

M: It's a copy of the old Meissen, but it's made now in Hungary. I drove my father and company to the Tour,' that's the Tour d'Argent[4], 'and got back to the house in time for supper. Krishnaji and Alain had had a good day of shopping.'

On the fifth, 'Krishnaji dictated more of the Holiday Book. De Vidas came by. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Alain, and I went to a movie, Mackenna's Gold.' [S chuckles.]

The next day, 'Krishnaji worked on the book and after supper I played a tape that Alain made of his notes of conversations with Krishnaji.'

There's nothing much until the first talk on the tenth, in the Salle de la Chimie, except walking, shopping, seeing some people, movies, and—oh yes, I bought two paintings from Dieter Kopp, who visited. Those are the two green paintings in the front hall of the West Wing.

On the eleventh, 'I left at 1 p.m. for Orly, flew to London, spent the day with Paul Anstee, working on Brockwood. Lunched at Au Pere de Nicole'—that's on Pics Street; nice restaurant—'…left at 6 p.m. and took the 7:20 p.m. plane back to Paris.'

April twelfth, 'Krishnaji and Alain worked on the book. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with young people at the Hotel Pont Royale.' That was followed the next day with the second talk at the Salle de la Chimie.

On the thirteenth, 'Suzanne and Hughes van der Straten came for coffee and stayed till 5 p.m. Invited us to stay with them on the way to Holland. Spoke to Anneke about a house at Hilversum.'

The next day, 'I had my hair done at Elizabeth Arden, and a Chinese boy and woman came to lunch.' I think this is Tunki. Do you remember Tunki?

S: Yes, very well, but he didn't have a wife.

M: She was an older woman, like a governess or something. He was like a little prince.

S: Yes. He was! [Chuckles.]

M: They came to lunch.

On April fifteenth, 'Mary and Joe Links arrive in Paris. I shopped. Met Krishnaji in town and brought him back for lunch. Alain was lunching with the Linkses. Mary Cadogan came in the morning. Alain got word he has been granted British citizenship.'

There are notes here about walking in Bagatelle, which I loved, but you don't need to hear about that again.

On the sixteenth it says, 'Second young people's discussion.'

The next day, after shopping and lunch with my father and brother, after which I visited an old friend I roomed with in boarding school. It says, 'Back in time to drive Krishnaji to the third talk at the Salle de la Chimie.'

On the eighteenth, 'Fetched the Mercedes. All fixed.' That was after the Rye episode. Marcelle Bondoneau and Doris Pratt to lunch. There was a tea at 4 p.m. for the French group, which consisted of the Suarèses, de Vidas, Ma de Manziarly, Madame Samuel, Madame Safra, Madame Ettori, Madame Banzet, someone Leroi…'—I don't remember that one—'…Mademoiselle Borel, someone Suydoux and Frances McCann.'

Another young people's discussion on the nineteenth at 4 p.m, followed the following day by Krishnaji's fourth talk.

On the twenty-first, left for Orly at 5:45 a.m., took a 7 a.m. plane to London. Paul Anstee met me and drove to Brockwood. The daffodils were all out. We spent the day on painting problems. He drove me back to the airport just in time for me to catch an 8:30 p.m. plane back to Paris.' [S chuckles.] Active life!

S: Indeed.

M: On the twenty-second, 'Krishnaji saw de Vidas about his telling lies to Mary Cadogan.' Goodness, he did? 'Yo de Manziarly came to lunch. Took Krishnaji to get his visa photos and then to the Pont Royale for another young people's discussion.' Oh, I had tea again with my former roommate.

On the twenty-third, 'Krishnaji saw Doris Pratt, and then Alain with her. Loads of criticism.' [Chuckle.] 'I went with Krishnaji and Alain to UNESCO, where they taped an interview with Krishnaji. Talked to Alain, who is upset at the Pratt / De Vidas criticisms.'

'At 7 p.m., Krishnaji had his fifth and last Paris talk.'

On the twenty-sixth, 'We left Paris at 11 a.m. and drove to Arras, lunching at Le Cheuzy.' It was on the way, and a very nice restaurant. 'Left there about 3 p.m. and drove around Lille to Tournai, crossing into Belgium. Onto Brussels, where Krishnaji, Alain, and I spent the night with Suzanne and Hughes van der Straten. Their children Gauthier, Favienne, Marie-Laure, Evrard, Marjolaine and Ariane were there. A nice, immense, comfortable house, and very nice family.'

The next day, we 'spent a pleasant, relaxed morning with the van der Stratens and left after lunch. A three-hour drive to Hilversum in Holland, and to the house at S'Gravelandsweg…' [Chuckles. S laughs.] And if you lived there, you know how to pronounce it!

S: Yes, well, I did at one point.

M: And if you don't, you can't say it. [Both laugh.] '…where Anneke was waiting. A house rented for Krishnaji and furnished with loans from well-wishers.' [Chuckles.]

I spent the next morning 'getting settled. After lunch, Krishnaji, Alain, and I drove to Keukenhof,' that's…

S: Yes, I know Keukenhof. Beautiful flowers.

M: Yes. 'The tulips were just beginning. I ordered perennial bulbs for September delivery to Brockwood. On return to the house, we heard of de Gaulle's resignation.'

S: Hm.

M: What do you know?

On the twenty-ninth of April, some people to lunch, Krishnaji came with me to do errands in Bussum, 'and then walked in a lovely wood near the farm house we lived in two years ago.'

The next day, 'I did errands in Bussum. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Alain, and I went to Amsterdam to a movie: Peter Sellers' The Party.'

Then the usual: various people to lunch, errands, etcetera, until May third. 'I drove Krishnaji via S'Gravelandsweg [chuckles] to first Amsterdam talk at the Congress Centrum, in the RAI. It was a very strong talk. Krishnaji was slightly faint in car on the return. After lunch, he came with me to Bussum on errands. Then I typed for Alain. We all three went for a walk. It was a warm spring day.'

On the fourth of May, 'With Krishnaji to the second talk in Amsterdam. There was an afternoon tea for all the people who have helped in the week here.'

On the fifth, I had a discussion with Krishnaji about how we might cut down on some of his traveling and talking. And the very next day, we continued the discussion on the way home from a 5 p.m. young people's discussion at the Congress Centrum.

Editor's Note: Since Alain and Mary started traveling and arranging Krishnaji's speaking schedule, the number of talks, interviews, discussions, etcetera, exploded. Krishnaji was, by now, 74 years old, and I believe it is correct to say that he had never been more active. An actual count of the number of speaking events he had in these and subsequent years would be interesting.

It is interesting to note that Mary started talking to Krishnaji about cutting back on the demands he was putting on himself, a subject that was to continue with many of those around him for the rest of his life.

On May seventh, 'It was Filomena's seventy-second birthday. After lunch, Alain and I went to Amsterdam to the Theosophical Society Bookshop to buy a book that Alain wanted.' And I remember vividly, they had a big picture of Mrs. Besant and a big picture of Leadbeater on the wall, life-size, in sepia…you know, old-fashioned. And I looked at these two photos. It could've been 300 years ago. I thought, those two people were in Krishnaji's life! And the contrast between the apparent age of these people in the photographs and Krishnaji, who was as young as could be, was astounding.

S: Yes…yes.

M: 'Returned and met Krishnaji taking the walk.'

On the eighth, it just says 'Second young people's discussion.'

For the next day it says, 'Krishnaji decides not to come to Amsterdam next year. I marketed all afternoon. Alain and I rang Madame Dupperex in Gstaad about Chalet Trois Ours.'

On the tenth and eleventh, Krishnaji had the third and fourth talks.

Then I went to see the Van Gogh paintings at the Kröller-Muller Museum in Osterloo, while Krishnaji had interviews.

On the thirteenth, Krishnaji had the third young people's discussion, and the next day he gave the fifth and final Amsterdam talk.

On the fifteenth of May, it says. 'Packing. Went to meet mother and Huges'—that's my stepfather—'at Schiphol, and drove them to the Park Hotel in Amsterdam. They came from Rome and are staying here five days and then go to London. We then joined Krishnaji and Alain at a young people's discussion at the RAI. The hall was full, and there was an audience listening outside in that big room. After that, I brought Krishnaji home.'

Sixteenth of May, 'We left Hilversum at 10:30 a.m., and drove to Rotterdam, where we got lost for an hour, but finally found the airport. Alain was already there. The attendant broke the Mercedes' left window. We flew on British Air Ferry to South End, where

Mary and Joe Links were there to meet us and guide us into London through terrible traffic.' [Chuckles.]

S: So, this was another one of those car-airplane ferries?

M: Yes. 'Arrived at 7:30 p.m. at Brockwood.'

The entry for the next day reads, 'Brockwood is lovely. Slept well, unpacked, and put everything in order. The carpet is down in my room. There was a meeting between Simmonses, Krishnaji, Alain, and me on school matters. Walked with Krishnaji through the bluebells in the woods.'

The next day was 'a quiet day at Brockwood, but Alain is feeling low.'

On the nineteenth, 'I drove Krishnaji and Alain to London. Left them at Huntsman's, then they went to lunch with Mary L. while I took the Mercedes to be fixed. Then went to Anstee and miscellaneous shopping for the house. Came back to Alton on the 4:56 p.m. train.' I must've left the Mercedes. 'Krishnaji and Alain came back on the 5:20 p.m. and I drove back to Brockwood with them. I have a sore throat.'

On the twentieth, 'Alain had a long talk with Krishnaji. Mary Cadogan came and we had a meeting with her and Dorothy. We are going to have the gatherings at Brockwood in September on two weekends. My mother and Huges are in London at the Goring Hotel.'

For the twenty-first it reads, 'A lovely, quiet day. Stayed at Brockwood resting. Felt much better, and went for a walk with Krishnaji across the field. It was warm and beautiful. Krishnaji's talks to Alain seems to have changed and cheered him.'

The next day, 'Drove Alain's car to London. Went to the Chelsea Flower Show and to Anstee's and Harrods, etcetera, on errands. Back to Brockwood for supper. The kitchen cabinets and appliances arrived.

The following day I returned to London to pick up the Mercedes and it took me three hours to drive back to Brockwood through the Whitsun weekend traffic, arriving at 9:30 p.m.

S: I think we're going to have to end it there.

M: Okay.

[4] Mary's father and stepmother, Olive, had an apartment just beneath the famous restaurant La Tour d'Argent, which is on the top floor.

Issue 12: May 1969 to December 31, 1969

The introduction of the last issue was really the introduction to both Issues 11 and 12.

The only thing to draw the reader's attention to in this introduction is the growing tension in the school and the entourage, and Alain's departure.

Mary: Alright. Shall I jump in?

Scott: Jump in!

M: So, we're living at Brockwood, and Anstee was helping me get the furnishing for it. I'm oriented now.

On May twenty-fourth, it says, 'to West Meon on errands. Then, worked on the shelves in Alain's room,' I must've been putting things away, I can't remember what it was. 'After lunch, Krishnaji, Alain, and I in both cars drove to Blackdown for tea with the Linkses.'

S: Where did they live in Blackdown?

M: Well, south of Godalming. It was out in the country, but that's the nearest town. It was a nice house. I don't know why they sold it eventually, or they gave it…I forget, I think they sold it.

S: But, it was their little country retreat.

M: Yes, their little country place.

Anyway, on the twenty-fifth, 'Finished Alain's room.' I was doing something with the shelving in there, putting shelves in. 'David Bohm and Donald Shoemaker came for lunch.' Who was Donald Shoemaker? Well, anyway, he came to lunch.

S: Which room was Alain's?

M: Where you and Kathy[1] wound up.

The next day, 'I washed the kitchen walls. Unpacked cabinets. The Chinese-Indonesian family of possible student came.' That's Tungki.

Over the next several days, I went to London and Winchester to find things to furnish the West Wing, and do odd jobs around the house, including on the twenty-ninth, when 'Krishnaji and I began weeding the lawn.' Heavens.

S: [chuckling] That must have been a task!

M: That was…yes. [Both chuckle.]

On the thirtieth, 'Krishnaji, Alain, Donald Hoppen, and I drove to Broadway in the Cotswolds at 10:30 a.m. We lunched at the Lygon Arms, then visited Gordon Russell's furniture factory…' [Pause.] 'Found nothing.'

S: But that's where the school dining room tables came from, wasn't it?

M: Yes, that's right. 'Drove back to Brockwood through lovely country.'

Then various things, like my mother and step father visiting. Nothing major except the first and second of June, Krishnaji and I continued to weed the lawn. And on the second, 'Took Alain to Winchester. Did errands. Alain brought back Desikachar from the airport when he arrived from Madras. Also, a Mark Schmidt also arrived from the U.S. to become a teacher at Brockwood.'

On June fourth, 'Drove to London early. Had my hair cut. Lunched with Mary Links at Le Méridien. Shopping. Errands. Mercedes light fixed. Anstee at 4 p.m. Bought two more sofas and a chair. Tea with Mother and Huges at the Hotel Goring.' That's where they were staying in London. 'They fly to New York Friday. Back to Brockwood by 8:30 p.m. Krishnaji began a new book.'

S: Is that to read a new book?

M: Oh! Yes, it wasn't writing, it was reading. I don't know why I didn't put what the book was, but I didn't.

On the fifth of June, 'Had fifth yoga lesson with Desikachar. Very good with the leg.' In other words, he didn't do what Iyengar had done, which hurt my leg.

The next day, 'Mother and Huges fly to New York. Krishnaji washed the car. The kitchen is finished. I began cleaning it. The Linkses brought Alain, who had spent the night in London, back to Brockwood, and they had tea.'

On June seventh, as well as work in the house, 'There was a meeting after lunch with Krishnaji, the Simmonses, Alain, and me about Brockwood policies.'

Editor's Note: We can read this code for difficulties about school policies between Alain and the Simmonses.

S: Stopping a minute here: you're mentioning you having lessons with Desikachar.

M: Yes, I began.

S: Was Krishnaji having lessons at the same time?

M: Oh, yes. He'd come to work with Krishnaji, and I was just lucky.

S: Right, yes.

M: So, June eighth. 'A warm day. Yoga at 4 a.m. Drove to Dorking to lunch with Ginny Travers[2] and children. Back to Brockwood for supper.'

Then the next several days there was nothing special, just more work to find things for the house. A trip on the eleventh with Krishnaji to London for tailor, dentist, haircut, etcetera.

It seems that on June twelfth, 'Krishnaji's right foot was swollen and sore,' which continued the next day. Also the next day, 'An unhappy discussion between Krishnaji, Alain, and Dorothy Simmons. Alain called me in the night, talked to him for hours.' He and Dorothy didn't get on at all. And it was over that student, that Indian boy. Alain felt he was his guardian or something. The father had given him permission to put him in the Brockwood School, and Dorothy didn't want Alain interfering. They didn't get on at all, and Alain was very emotional about these things. This was the year that Alain finally left.

M: And I was trying to, you know…

S: Make things work, yes.

M: June fourteenth. 'Alain rang Dr. Schmidt.' That's the Swiss homeopath who says that 'Krishnaji has gout. The Digbys and Mary Links came in the afternoon for an editorial meeting. Joe Links came with Mary's grandchildren, Anna and Nicky. We had tea. After supper, Krishnaji, Alain, and Dorothy had another meeting about Alain to which I didn't go.'

The next day, 'Another long talk with Alain. Walked alone in the afternoon.'

June sixteenth, 'Talked early to Alain, then Krishnaji. Then we had a three-way talk with Krishnaji, Alain, and me, at which it was resolved that Alain promised not to talk about leaving or to leave.' Well, that didn't last, but anyway, that's what happened in June. 'Winchester in the p.m. On return, I took Krishnaji for a drive toward Droxford along the lanes. Breathtaking countryside.'

June seventeenth, 'It was raining. Yoga lesson number twelve. Krishnaji came with me to Alresford and Winchester. After supper, Krishnaji talked to Alain and me about the danger of destructive forces.'

Editor's Note: Readers will remember in Issue 8 that Krishnaji's understanding of "good" and "evil" were not abstract notions, but real and palpable; and that "the good" was often under siege by forces wanting to destroy it.

There are no other notes of this day's discussion, that I know of, on "the danger of destructive forces" that Krishnaji wanted Mary and Alain to understand; but Mary often subsequently expressed that she felt that the forces that compelled Alain to leave the important work he was doing with Krishnaji were more than anything easily understood.

S: Mm, hm, mm, hm.

M: Then, there's more about decorating and buying antiques for the house. Oh, on the nineteenth, 'Mr. Knight brought a desk for Krishnaji.' That's the desk you have now. It was fun going to the antique dealer's.

S: Of course.

M: Then let's see…Krishnaji's foot was better so he could walk. He was also practicing his driving so he could get his English drivers license. Then on the twenty-second of June, 'Krishnaji held first talk and discussion at Brockwood in the big room. About 165 people came, including two boys, Terry Agnew and Alan Hansen from Sonoma. Sandwich lunch afterwards.'

Krishnaji drove me to Winchester and beyond, practicing with the Mercedes for the driver's test. We had our first meal at the new long table in school's dining room. Krishnaji played a game of throwing the Frisbee on the lawn after supper.'

S: The big room you mentioned where the public discussion occurred, is that currently the big sitting room at the school?

M: That's right. In the school.

Editor's Note: One hundred and sixty-five people in that room would have meant the room was absolutely packed, with everyone sitting very tightly on the floor.

S: Right. And the school's dining room is where the new tables were laid out.

M: Yes; when we bought Brockwood, where the dining room area currently is was a billiard room. In my mind's eye, I see billiard tables. I guess they were taken away. But that had been nothing but billiards, because their dining room was the paneled room.

S: Yes, yes.

M: So, on the twenty-third, 'Alain went to town. I had a yoga lesson. Krishnaji spoke of a committee to supervise everything someday. Heh-heh. [Both chuckle.][3]

The next day, 'Krishnaji talked to two new teachers, Mark Schmidt and John Digues as well as the Simmonses, Alain, and me about the school.'

On the twenty-fifth, 'Alain took me to the 8:50 a.m. Alton to London train. I met Mr. Knight, went to Christie's and then Sotheby's, Mallets, Partridge, etcetera,' they were all antique places. Christie's and Sotheby's you know. 'Spent the rest of the day doing errands. Had tea with Fleur and her sister and caught the 5:20 p.m. train back.' In those days, we always went to Alton, till we discovered Petersfield was more convenient.

On the twenty-sixth, 'Anstee came in the morning and he slightly darkened the glaze, and gave final okay to the painter to go ahead.' That was the drawing room.

S: Yes. We should say it was a very special old-fashioned painting technique that was used. And people won't realize that. Called scumbling or stippling.

M: I can tell you how to do it.

S: Good. Tell us.

M: Well, you painted the room the color you wanted, and then to get the stippled effect, to make it look like parchment, you take a thick painting brush that's very tight and doesn't bend.

S: Right, with short, stiff bristles and you tap it.

M: That's right; up and down and all around.

S: Right, tapping the ends of the bristles, and you don't drag it, like normal painting. You just tap it with the end of the bristles. And this makes little tiny dots.

M: But they do it very regularly, and that gives a textured effect.

Editor's Note: Click here to see an example of this method of painting

S: Right, right. But, now, isn't it that there is one color underneath it, and one color on top of it, so that when you do that banging effect, it actually shows through the surface color to the base color, or something like that?

M: The word "glaze" keeps coming into my mind.

S: Yes, that's the surface one. That's the surface one.

M: But it doesn't have to be colored. It's kind of like honey, almost. I mean, it's just the substance of it—there's not pigment in it.

S: Oh. Anyway, it's a very old fashioned technique. And you had to have…

M: An old, old, old painter.

S: He had to come from London, right?

M: He had to come from London, because local painters just couldn't do it.

S: Yes. I remember, there were these two wonderful old painters who worked on the Krishnamurti Centre in 1987, wonderful old, old painters, who would come in their white overalls [M laughs], paint all day long, and take them off at the end of the day, and they were immaculate! [M laughs.] There was not a splash of paint on their fingers or clothing! [Both chuckle.] They were also painting at an incredible speed, and absolutely not a drop spilled. [Both laugh.] And I showed them that room, and they were…

M: They knew.

S: They appreciated the work of the West Wing. They said they could've done it, but they said the West Wing was done by someone of the old school who really knew how to do it properly, and [M chuckles] there weren't many left.

M: That's right. And when we had the fire…

S: I remember.

M: …I had to repair some of that.

S: Yes.

M: I got it through a lady who paints for Anstee, what's-her-name.

S: Oh, that lady. I remember her.

M: Yes, she was providing…

S: Right.

M: …decorating help. I mean not decorating, but furnishing.

S: Right, yes.

M: And she got me the painter; this old fellow, and she brought him down from London to do it.

S: Yes.

M: 'School meeting in the afternoon; Krishnaji, Alain, the Simmonses, Digues, Schmidt, and me. Tensions are everywhere. Alain was very tense. Had a yoga lesson.' Everybody was tense, particularly Alain.

S: Yes.

M: The twenty-seventh of June. 'Talk at breakfast with Alain. Then, he and Brant Cortright left by car for Paris en route to Saanen.' Brant Cortright was a student, I think. Krishnaji and I went to Winchester in the afternoon. Got his temporary driving permit.'

The twenty-eighth of June 'A lovely day. Gentle day. Meeting on school matters in the morning. We will accept Marcus Lavarra and Alan Shapiro as students. Mirror for the drawing room arrived, and so did the desk for Krishnaji.'

Oh, here's something fun. June thirtieth: 'In the afternoon, Krishnaji passed his driving test in Winchester and now has a lifetime license!' That was a triumphant day! Because, if you recall, he'd gotten turned down in California, and he was unhappy that he'd flunked. So, he said he'd get one in England, but to be on the safe side, he engaged an equally aged gentleman to give him driving lessons, so he'd learn the English driver's laws and techniques. And [S laughs] this day, what happened was that the teacher, a little old man, came, and he rehearsed Krishnaji, though he didn't tell him that, by having Krishnaji driving all through Winchester. He said, "turn left here" and "stop here" and "turn right here", and all that. He knew exactly the pattern that the inspector would take Krishnaji.

M: And Krishnaji did it flawlessly. So the old man got out, and the inspector got in, and they went over the exact same route.

S: Oh, perfect.

M: And Krishnaji got it. And he came back very happy, because everyone had said to him, "Oh, nobody ever gets it the first time, and they're very difficult."

S: Right.

M: And he was quite put out at having flunked in California. [S laughs.] He came back, you know, just triumphant!

S: Good.

M: It was a splendid day. [Both chuckle.]

July first. 'Krishnaji and I to London by car. Took him to Sulka, where Mary Links met him while I went to fetch bedspreads, etcetera, and with Anstee to find Japanese shades.

Met Krishnaji and Mary and L'Aperitif for lunch. We went to Lobb afterward. Then Krishnaji and I drove back to Brockwood.'

July second, 'Packing, etcetera. Krishnaji washed the car in the afternoon, and while backing into the garage, his foot slipped on the accelerator and the back of the car was slightly demolished [chuckles as she reads this] against the garage door.' I was upstairs doing something, and he came up looking stricken! Stricken!

S: Oh, yes.

M: I thought he'd hurt himself. I blurted out, "What happened? Are you alright?", you know. He couldn't speak, he was so shocked.

S: He'd hurt the poor Mercedes.

M: Yes. [S chuckles.]

July third. 'Krishnaji is still shaken by yesterday's car episode. Dorothy Simmons in the Land Rover drove Krishnaji, me, Desikachar, and Narendra to the London Airport.' Narendra was the bone of contention between Dorothy and Alain.

S: Right, the Indian boy. I remember.

M: We ate sandwich lunches there, and then Krishnaji, Desikachar, and Narendra flew to Geneva where Alain was to meet them, and Dorothy and I came back to Brockwood. The Mercedes had been towed to Southampton, and they will let me know the damage tomorrow.' There didn't seem to be very much.

S: So, Alain had already gone.

M: He'd gone. Alain would have taken Krishnaji to Vanda at Chalet Tannegg because she would've been there. She always came in July.

M: The fourth of July. 'Krishnaji and Alain in Geneva to see Dr. Schmidt for a check-up, and then they went to Gstaad. I put things away at Brockwood, paid the bills, etcetera. Two months to fix the Mercedes! The house is so quiet. There's scarcely anyone here. Alain called from Gstaad, got me an Avis rental car.'

The next day 'I put everything away in locked cupboards for Krishnaji and Alain. Packed for myself. Went to Winchester to get a plane ticket.'

On the sixth of July. 'Donald Hoppen drove me to the London Airport. I took the 2:40 p.m. Swiss Air flight to Geneva. An Avis VW was waiting, and I drove to Gstaad and found Chalet Trois Ours.' That was the year I rented part of Chalet Trois Ours, which is just below Tannegg, as you come up the hill.

S: Yes.

M: I took a flat in it. About half of the house.

S: Right.

M: 'Went to Tannegg to see Vanda and Krishnaji. Unpacked a little at Trois Ours. Alain came in later.'

The next day 'I had the twenty-sixth yoga lesson with Desikachar at Tannegg. I lunched there with Vanda and Dorothy. Talked to Vanda till 4 p.m. Did errands in the village, and finished unpacking.'

July eighth. 'Lunched at Tannegg with Krishnaji and Desikachar. Krishnaji held a discussion with the young people at the Schonried School.'

Krishnaji held another young people's discussion on the tenth.

On July eleventh, 'Early lunch with Krishnaji and Alain. Then, we drove to Thun, where Krishnaji got his new Mercedes sports car! [S chuckles.] I drove back with him. Exhausting afternoon, and on into the night with Alain. He was being impossible.'

July twelfth, 'Lunched at Tannegg, with Vanda, Krishnaji, Alain, Brant Cortright, and Narendra. Alain saw de Marxov at 2:30 p.m. and I had him to tea to discuss Alzina.' Alzina, I've been into that with you.

S: Yes, but who is de Marxov?

M: De Marxov was the person in charge of Alzina. Alzina was an account that was for Krishnaji to use as he chose.

S: Right. Yes.

M: Frances McCann was behind it. And de Marxov was broker or businessman or investor. He was quite an elderly man.

July thirteenth. 'Drove Krishnaji to Schonried, where he spoke to young people. We had lunch at Tannegg, Vanda, Krishnaji, Alain, and a Mr. and Mrs. Raul, a UNESCO man from Paris. Had a nap. Then, a looooong conversation with Alain on all the difficulties. Had a violent headache.' He was so being difficult, and I was trying to keep him with us, because I thought he had very useful capacities and skills in bringing young people.

S: Yes, you've always said that.

M: And I felt that was important.

S: Yes, it is.

M: He wanted to storm off, and I wanted to hold him there, for Krishnaji's sake, the work, and everything.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And this particular day, we had this awful conversation that really baffled me, and suddenly, I got a blinding headache so severely that I almost fell over, and it shocked him out of his tirade.

S: Right.

M: But it was most unpleasant.

Editor's Note: Mary always maintained that Alain had been so good for Krishnaji's work as he was the one who brought groups of young people, and got Krishnaji to speak at universities. In fact, no one did that after Alain left.

The next day, 'Lunch at Tannegg with Vanda, Krishnaji, Alain, and Desikachar. At 4 p.m. I went with Krishnaji in his new Mercedes. He had his hair cut. Then, we went for a long, peaceful drive across Les Mosses.' You remember Les Mosses?

S: Yes, I do.

M: 'And back via Le Pillon. Krishnaji asked me to talk to Vanda about Tannegg next summer.'

July fifteenth, 'The thirty-third and last yoga lesson. Desikachar leaves tomorrow for England. Then, meeting with Krishnaji and Noyes…' Colonel Noyes, do you remember Colonel Noyes?

S: Ah, yes.

M: '…the Hookers, etcetera, about the Live Oak School.' Noyes was running a little school in Ojai. 'Lunched at Schonried, in the young people's chalet.'

The next day, 'Desikachar left. Vanda went to Geneva and met her son-in-law. Krishnaji took me for a drive to Lenk, and then we lunched alone. Astronauts Armstrong and Collins took off on Apollo 11 for a moon landing.' That's going on.

July seventeenth, 'Drove Krishnaji to the opening Saanen talk. The question and answer period was broken up by an angry Norwegian boy.' That was before your time.

S: No, no, it wasn't. I mean, I wasn't there that year, but that Norwegian kept going forever.

M: Yeah, I know.

Editor's Note: Lest the reader think there was any substance in the outbursts, this Norwegian and a female confederate were invariably off subject and seemed only intent on showing off or drawing attention to themselves. There were clearly psychological issues involved. They were simply disruptive.

Anyway, 'the Simmonses, Donald Hoppen, Alain, and I met afterward with Krishnaji who offered Donald de Vidas's job in the Saanen Gathering. He is to think it over.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji had a meeting with Mary Cadogan and Alain. Vanda and I had a brief talk and agreed to all share Tannegg next year.'

On the nineteenth, 'There was a Saanen Gatherings Committee meeting at 10:30 a.m. with Krishnaji, Alain, de Vidas, Mary Cadogan, Doris Pratt, and me, plus Donald Hoppen, who can't accept Krishnaji's offer to run Saanen in de Vidas's place because he needs one more year in the U.S. for his final qualification there as an architect, but he will help. De Vidas's resignation was accepted as of the end of this season. But he has not resigned as head of the French group, as his letter implied. Lunched at Tannegg. Krishnaji, Vanda, and I talked about young people's housing next year. Vanda and I talked alone about sharing Tannegg and its costs next summer. Went to a movie alone in the evening.'

On July twentieth, 'I drove Krishnaji to his second talk. Lunched at Tannegg with Krishnaji, Vanda, and Alain. Alain and I dined with the van der Stratens, and at 8:30 p.m. news came that the astronauts Armstrong and Aldrin had landed a capsule on the moon.'

The next morning. 'Went to Tannegg at 6 a.m. to watch on Krishnaji's television, Armstrong followed by Aldrin, setting foot on the moon. Vanda left for Florence after lunch. I moved up to stay at Tannegg.' When she went away, she had me come and run things. 'Watching at 6 p.m. TV shots of the astronauts taking off from the moon to rendezvous with the main capsule and the waiting astronaut Collins.'

On the twenty-second, 'Took Krishnaji to his third talk. Robert Weikoff and his fiancée, Favienne van der Straten, came for lunch. Desikachar's wife had a baby girl!' Gosh, he got back just in time. 'But it didn't live.' Oh dear.

S: Yes.

M: 'John Digues not to be a Brockwood teacher. Fetched Krishnaji up the hill after he walked down it.' [Chuckles.]

On the twenty-third, '9:30 a.m. meeting, all the committees of other countries. The Simmonses stayed for lunch. Krishnaji took me for a drive and a walk toward Lauenen.'

Krishnaji held the fourth talk on the twenty-fourth. 'Came back and watched TV of the perfect landing and pick-up of astronauts in the Pacific.'

On the twenty-sixth, 'Krishnaji had taped discussion with Swami Venkatesananda.

Then, there was a meeting of Mary Cadogan, Donald Hoppen, Ms. Keller of the Swiss Committee, and Mr. and Mrs. Graf. Latter three are to handle the Saanen business matters for the Saanen Gathering Committee. Cragnolini, Senior Navarra, and Bruno Ortolani came for lunch. A secretary, Ms. Anderson, arrives. I brought her up to Tannegg to take dictation.'

S: This was the secretary that was to help you?

M: Yes. But I'm not good at dictating.

July twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji to the fifth talk. On return, Mark Schmidt made a fuss about Dorothy Simmons's remark.' I don't know what that was. 'Suzanne and Hughes van der Straten came for lunch. Then, at 4 p.m. there was a Brockwood meeting. Krishnaji, Alain, Simmonses, Schmidts, Donald, and Laurents'—were they there in your time?

Editor's Note: It seems extraordinary that in such a small school, there could have been so much conflict, and that Krishnaji would have to be pulled in. But Mary's diaries, and many conversations with people who were present at the time, confirm that this is what the beginning of Brockwood was like.

S: No.

M: He was a Frenchman who taught yoga, and he had a wife and a child, and they eventually went off because it was decided that there couldn't be little children underfoot at Brockwood.

The next day 'I became signatory for Krishnaji of his account. I went for a drive with Krishnaji. Mrs. Travers…', that's Pamela Travers, '…Frances McCann, and Ted Santos for lunch. Donald rang and asked to see Krishnaji, and came at 2:30 p.m. I fetched the Simmonses, who were disturbed over the friction yesterday. Krishnaji is upset too.' This was a bad summer, I mean overall.

On the twenty-ninth, 'With Krishnaji to his sixth talk. Meeting afterwards with the Simmonses, Donald, and finally Alain. All ate lunch late.'

On the thirtieth, 'Krishnaji and I to Thun in the Mercedes while it had its 500-kilometer service. We took the lake steamer to Spiez and back, having a picnic lunch on-board.

Then, drove to Interlaken in a borrowed car. We got caught in traffic. Came back in the Mercedes, slightly late for Krishnaji to go to a Spanish tea.'

On the thirty-first of July. 'With Krishnaji to the seventh and last of the Saanen talks. There was an interview. Marketed. More interviews. Krishnaji walked almost to Saanen, and I picked him up and took him to say goodbye to Swami Venkatesananda. Donald came to supper and talked to Krishnaji.'

First of August. 'A long talk with Alain at breakfast. Vanda arrived from Florence. She is coming with Alberto', that's her son, 'on Monday. David Bohm and the Hammonds came for lunch. There was a tea for all the foreign committees. Krishnaji walked to Saanen afterwards and I picked him up. Madame Duperrex…' She's the very, very nice concierge of Les Caprices and also Trois Ours'. '…suggested renting Chalet Trois Ours to someone else for August' because by this time, I was taking care of Tannegg with Vanda away.

S: Of course, of course.

M: She was very nice and said she could rent it to someone else for August, because I'd taken it for the summer. 'Talked to Alain, who came to supper.'

The next day 'Krishnaji spoke to an encampment of young Theosophists. There was a meeting of the Dutch Committee. There was a discussion all afternoon between Krishnaji, Alain, and me.'

On the third of August, 'Krishnaji came to breakfast with Alain and me, and talked till almost 10 a.m. Then, we dashed to the tent for the first of the public discussions.'

August fourth, 'Krishnaji held the second public discussion. Simmonses, Donald, and Alain to lunch. Talked afterward without Alain. Then there was a meeting of the Saanen Gathering Committee after which Alain came to Tannegg. Krishnaji talked to him with me there for three hours. Alain will no longer be his personal assistant. He is to work away from him.'

The next day was the third discussion. In the afternoon, I took Krishnaji to Schonried for a discussion with young people. At 5:30 p.m., the Simmonses and Donald came, and Krishnaji told them of Alain's change of work.'

Editor's Note: It doesn't seem right to proceed without underscoring the amount of talking Krishnaji was compelled to do in four days.

- Long talk with Alain at breakfast.
- David Bohm and the Hammonds for lunch.
- Tea with the foreign committees.
- Speaking to an encampment of young Theosophists.
- An all-afternoon discussion with Mary and Alain.

- Krishnaji speaks to Alain and Mary from breakfast to 10 a.m.
- First public discussion.
- Second public discussion.
- Simmonses, Donald, and Alain over lunch.
- Saanen Gatherings Committee meeting.
- Three-hour discussion with Alain.
- Third public discussion.
- Afternoon discussion with young people.
- Late afternoon discussion with Simmonses and Donald about Alain.

On the sixth, 'there was the fourth discussion. Supper with Vanda, her son Alberto, and Melanie Wyler.' Melanie Wyler was the daughter of Willie Wyler[4], an old friend of mine from the movies.

S: Right.

M: August seventh through ninth were the fifth through seventh, and last, public discussions.

On the tenth there was a long talk between Krishnaji, Alain, and me about Alain's new work for Krishnaji. All sounded well. After the walk there was a phone call from Dorothy that Narendra was leaving Brockwood to go with Mark Schmidt. Krishnaji disapproves. A cable was sent to his father. Narendra was at the base of the Alain's ill temper.

S: And what was he doing, Narendra was going off with Mark Schmidt?

M: He was going with Mark Schmidt somewhere, I don't know why.

The next day, 'Krishnaji, Alain, Vanda, and me in discussion on the Narendra thing, all morning. A second cable was sent to the boy's father.'

On August twelfth, 'Krishnaji and I took a picnic and drove in his Mercedes down to the Col de Pillon, Les Avants, and then back via Bulle.' You know, down to the lake and then up to the mountains again.

August fourteenth, 'With Krishnaji to the bank to put his account from AN to MZ account, "trust account"'—that was to authorize me to handle it. 'Frances, and Pietro came to lunch, also Madame Duchet. Walk with Krishnaji.'

Then Krishnaji has a series of personal interviews, and I had a lesson from Alain on running the Nagra as I would have to do the taping from now on.

On August eighteenth, 'Last talk between Krishnaji, Alain, and me on his plans. Krishnaji and I went to Thun to leave his car with Mr. Moser's garage for the winter. We had a picnic lunch by the lake. Returned to Gstaad in Alain's VW. Posted tapes to the Lilliefelts. Packed. Alain, Vanda, and I had supper. Alain goes to Italy tomorrow, so does Vanda. Alain said goodbye to Krishnaji, and then to me.'

August nineteenth, 'Vanda left very early for Florence. Alain also left early for Italy. Krishnaji and I left at 11 a.m. and had a picnic lunch near Rolle on the lake. Continued to Geneva and the Hotel du Rhône. It was such a relief when Alain left.' You know, this drama and tension that was going on was terrible. When we drove down to the lake, I remember we were, huhhhh [deep breath out], you know, relieved.

Editor's Note: While Mary is expressing relief at the moment when the source of tension was finally relieved, it was in fact a deep sorrow for her that she continued to express even decades later. Not only did she feel that Alain was important for Krishnaji's work, but she had a genuine affection for Alain and an appreciation of his company. There had been the understanding for many years that Krishnaji, Alain, and Mary would be a lasting team; a living, loving unit that would spend their remaining years together. Mary never lost her affection for Alain.

S: Yes, yes.

M: On the twentieth, 'Krishnaji and I carried three tape recorders and a camera. Flew to London at 12:30 p.m. Dorothy and Montague met us. One of the shipped bags was lost. Arrived at Brockwood at 5:30 p.m.'

The next day, 'I unpacked. Mary Links came for tea. Explained some of the events of the summer, Alain, etcetera. She is disturbed. Also, she doesn't want to do the Bulletin anymore. The Mercedes won't be ready for three weeks.'

Editor's Note: Mary and Joe Links remained close to Alain, and were of the opinion that Dorothy was a large part of the reason Alain was no longer part of the work, but that Alain had suffered all the consequences. I remember the Digbys voicing something similar.

On August twenty-third, 'Krishnaji dictated a conversation. In the night I kicked something and the next day I had a sore foot. In the afternoon, Alan Hooker drove me to Winchester. The foot was x-rayed at the hospital. A slight fracture of a toe.' Huh.

On the twenty-fourth, 'Krishnaji dictated another "conversation" to me. We walked around the garden.'

August twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji has a cold. I went to London by train. Met and then made the rounds of the King's and Fulham Road.' That was, you know, picking up things for the house, all the different antique stores.

Editor's Note: All with a slightly fractured toe.

S: Mm, hm. Yes, yes.

M: August twenty-sixth, 'To Winchester with Donald about a TV set for Krishnaji. His cold is better, but he's very tired. He stayed in bed all day. I moved furniture, and changed rooms around. Krishnaji's study goes to the school.' Krishnaji's study was what became the school library, the end of the building, under my room. 'Alain's study goes to the school and his bedroom becomes a guestroom. The present guestroom becomes the dining room, and the dining room becomes an office.'

S: That's right. That was a little room that became your office.

M: That was my office eventually.

S: Right, which you never used.

M: Never used. [S laughs.] I used it a little bit. It was just easier to do it in my room.

August twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji stayed in bed all day resting. His cold is improving. I did desk work.' Let's see…he seems to have stayed in bed until lunch on the twenty-ninth when 'Krishnaji got up for lunch. Saral and David Bohm came. There was a discussion with Krishnaji about the school.'

August thirty, 'In the afternoon, Krishnaji and I drove in the Hooker's small car, now bought by Brockwood, to Blackdown to have tea with the Linkses.'

On the thirty-first, 'Krishnaji dictated to me in the morning. The Digbys came to lunch. After tea, they left, and Krishnaji and I walked down the lane across a golden field. How lovely this country is. Worked on learning to use the Nagra.'

September first, 'Krishnaji dictated to me. Frances McCann arrived to stay through the talks. I went to Heathrow to meet and bring back the Biascoecheas, who are also staying here through the talks.'

The next day Krishnaji held a discussion with the school at 4 p.m.

On September third, 'I went with Krishnaji and Donald to London by train to Sullivan and Woolley. Then, Krishnaji and I went to Huntsman, then to L'Aperitif, where I saw Winny Portarlington.' Lady Portarlington was a great friend of my Aunt Dorothy, and I knew her as Winny. 'We came back on the 4 o'clock train.'

On the fourth of September, 'the tent is up in the field.'

On September sixth, 'Krishnaji gave his first talk at Brockwood in the tent in the field. Ginny and Bill Travers came and lunched afterwards with Krishnaji, Suzanne, and Hughes van der Straten, and me in the West Wing dining room. First meal there.' I'd forgotten that. 'Trustee meeting at 3:30 p.m.'

On September seventh, 'Krishnaji gave the second Brockwood talk in the tent. The Bohms and van der Stratens lunched in the West Wing. Krishnaji invited David to be a trustee. There was Indian music in the afternoon. I spoke to Sidney Roth about TV films of Krishnaji.' Sidney Roth was the man from Chicago who was paying for filming Krishnaji, and he must've come to Brockwood, I guess.

On September eighth, 'Meeting at 11:30 a.m.: Krishnaji, school members, and the Bohms.

The following day, 'Krishnaji had a discussion in the tent with about sixty people. It went well. We ate the cafeteria lunch that was on sale. Walked with Krishnaji around the lanes.'

Editor's Note: Unlike every other place that Krishnaji spoke around the world, the kitchen at Brockwood Park felt it was right for them to feed people who came to hear Krishnaji. The small kitchen staff with a few volunteers consequently sold lunches and snacks to any who wanted it; preparing meals for sometimes six times as many people as when the school was fully occupied.

September eleventh, 'I spoke to Alain who arrived in London, and will see him Monday. Krishnaji held the second discussion in the tent. We lunched there again.'

On September thirteenth, 'Krishnaji gave his third Brockwood talk. We lunched in the tent. At supper we were forty with sixteen nationalities. Mercedes was delivered after ten and a half weeks.' That was from when he pushed it into the garage.

The next day was the fourth Brockwood talk.

On the fifteenth, 'I drove to Blackdown and saw Alain and Mary Links. I brought Alain his belongings. We lunched in a pub. Then they went to London and I went to Guilford to the garage that fixed the Mercedes for a mirror adjustment. Back to Brockwood by suppertime.'

On September sixteenth, 'Krishnaji decided against the scheduled public talks in Rome and so will go there later, staying here until about October twenty-first. In the morning he dictated a conversation to me. We walked in the afternoon.'

The next morning, 'Krishnaji dictated a very subjective conversation to me, #93.' Well, he was dictating those over a period of years…they were called conversations, but it was just a dictation. In p.m., Krishnaji drove me in the Mercedes to Ringwood and Netherbrook antiques'…that was the antique store I wanted to go to. 'Came back via the New Forest. A lovely afternoon.'

Over the next two days, Krishnaji dictated two more conversations to me, #94 and #95.

On the nineteenth, 'Krishnaji's head is bad.'

Editor's Note: "The head is bad" was Krishnaji's expression for times when he would suffer terrible pain in his head. They did not seem to be headaches or migraines or anything commonly understood. "The process" almost always involved such pain.

On September twentieth, 'Pupul Jayakar arrived. I met her at Winchester. She spent the day and night here. I took Krishnaji and her for a drive in the surrounding country.'

On the twenty-second, 'David Bohm came and there was a discussion with Krishnaji, staff, and students.'

On September twenty-third, 'Krishnaji and I drove to London. He had a Huntsman fitting and haircut. We had a picnic lunch in Hyde Park.' You know, we just drove to London as though it was driving to Alresford. It was nothing in those days, no traffic.

S: Yes, yes. Well, without traffic, it's not very far away. It's only about 60 miles away.

M: Yes, and the parking was easy.

S: Yes. No longer.

M: It became impossible.

S: Yes.

M: Anyway, we went. 'We had picnic lunch in Hyde Park then looked at some furniture in Mallet's on Bourdon Street and then left him for an hour with Mrs. Bindley. Left some papers at the Digbys for Alain, who was staying there. Krishnaji and I left at 3:30 p.m. and got back to Brockwood in record time.'

On the twenty-fourth, 'Mr. Graf of the Saanen Committee was at the house. There was a meeting to decide on a tent versus a building for 1970. We chose a tent.' In those days, I think we thought of building something permanent…

S: Yes.

M: …with rooms for teachers to come and stay. [S chuckles.] We chose a tent. 'Met Michael Rubinstein at Alton. He lunched with us. I took him back to the train later.'

On the twenty-fifth, 'I missed the 8:55 a.m. train from Alton, but got to London in time to have my hair cut. Krishnaji came by a later train alone' which worried me…I'm saying today that it worried me, whether it worried me then…[S chuckles]. 'We met at Huntsman, after which we went to the Digbys for lunch. Did errands, and saw a chair. Took the 55 train back.' The chair was something more for Brockwood, maybe.

There doesn't seem to be anything until the twenty-seventh, when Krishnaji dictates another conversation.

On the twenty-eighth, Krishnaji held another discussion with the staff and students. It was a good one.

On the twenty-ninth, 'Krishnaji dictated conversation #97. In the afternoon, Krishnaji washed the car.

On the thirtieth, 'To London by car.' Where I did various things for the house, then at '4:30 p.m., there was a Publications Committee meeting at the Digbys'. The Hammonds, Mary Links, and Mary Cadogan were there. Got back to Brockwood after 9 p.m.'

On the first of October, 'there was a school meeting with Krishnaji at 11:30 a.m.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated conversations #98 and #99 to me. He washed the car. And we walked.'

On October third, 'with Krishnaji in the car to London. Stopped at Anstee's to see tables. We went to Huntsman and Sullivan, then picnicked in Hyde Park in the car. Then, we drove to Beckenham, where we visited the new Krishnamurti Foundation Trust office, where there was Mary Cadogan, Jane Hammond, and Ms. Reid. Jane Hammond guided us back as far as Cobham and so home.' I didn't know how to get out of Beckenham without going to London.

S: Yes. Quite right. [Laughs]

M: On October fourth, at '11:30 a.m. another school discussion with Krishnaji and David Bohm. After lunch, Krishnaji and I drove to Blackdown. Walked and had tea with the Linkses. Drove home in marvelous late afternoon light and rising mists, such a sense of peace and beauty.'

The next afternoon, 'we went for a wandering drive to Woodlands, Selborne, Pulborough, Hooke, and back via Petersfield.'

On the sixth and seventh, Krishnaji did another two dictations to me. Also on the seventh, Krishnaji held another meeting with the school, and talked about responsibility and authority, and Dorothy Simmons' responsibility in particular.

Then nothing much until the tenth, when 'with Krishnaji to London. Huntsman, bookstore, lunched at L'Aperitif. I bought a Phillips tape recorder for Krishnaji to take to India. Went to the health food shop and back to Waterloo to catch an early train home. Krishnaji postponed our trip to Paris by two days.'

On the eleventh, 'a quiet day. We went for a walk and cut ivy from trees along the lane.'

On the twelfth, there was another school discussion with Krishnaji.

On the fourteenth, I went to London to get Krishnaji's visas for France and Italy, and did more antique shopping.

The next day, Krishnaji dictated another conversation. It also says, 'walked in the afternoon. Pondered Mercedes.' But I don't know what that means. Who did the pondering and what for?

S: I think it had to do with if the Mercedes remained a British car, then you had to pay some import tax, which was very heavy.

M: It was very heavy, and that's why I kept cars for a long time in Switzerland, to avoid it: the tax was terrible.

S: Yes, it was.

M: For the sixteenth of October it says, 'Krishnaji and I to London by car. We went to Huntsman and Krishnaji had a dentist appointment at 12 p.m. Teeth are all fine. We went to the Mercedes agency for advice. Then, had a picnic lunch in the car in Hyde Park, and Krishnaji went to see Mrs. Bindley and we drove home via the Heathrow, Camberley way.'

The next morning Krishnaji dictated a conversation, and at 3:30 p.m. a trustee meeting began that lasted the rest of the day.

On October eighteenth, 'Krishnaji dictated conversation #105 to me. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Donald Hoppen, and I walked the boundary of Brockwood to consider conceding a piece of land to the previous owner, Mr. Morton. Rajagopal telephoned Krishnaji from Ojai.'

Nineteenth of October, 'Krishnaji had another discussion with the school on authority.'

On the twentieth, 'Went to Winchester about custom and excise on the Mercedes. Then we went to Guilford about the Mercedes' last fixing.'

The following day, 'Krishnaji held another discussion with the school. In the afternoon, he washed the car and gave another private interview.'

On the twenty-second of October, 'Krishnaji and I to London by train. He had fitting while I fetched his Air India ticket. We met at L'Aperitif where we lunched with Mary L, Winny Portarlington, Ian Mingies'—that's a friend of Winny's—'and Martin Batteisby. 'Then, Krishnaji and I returned by train to Brockwood.'

On October twenty-third, 'Krishnaji had discussion with school at 4 p.m.'

On the twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji held a discussion with the school in the afternoon on love, pleasure, etcetera. We went for a last autumn walk. After supper, Dorothy brought another Labrador puppy, female, 8 weeks old, and golden. A lovely puppy [S chuckles] named Whisper.'

October twenty-sixth, 'Krishnaji and I left Brockwood. Dorothy drove us to Heathrow. We took Air France flight to Paris, at 3 p.m. after eating a picnic lunch in the car. We have rooms at Plaza Athénée. Unpacked and took a walk. Supper in our rooms. Today was most beautiful autumn day ever at Brockwood, and Paris was gentle and a soft gray.'

My diary for October twenty-seventh says, 'Lobb was closed. We bought books, went to the Jeu de Paume [S chuckles], walked through the Tuileries to the Louvre, saw the Victory of Samothrace…' That was lovely because, if you remember the Louvre…

S: Oh yes, the Winged Victory. Yes, of course.

M: The Winged Victory. It's up at the head of a great marble staircase.

S: Yes, yes.

M: We went in, and for me, the sight was: Krishnaji, very small at the bottom of the stairs, looking up with just total enjoyment of this marvelous statue, and the whole scene was quite wonderful.

M: Yes, he did.

S: And I have that photo.

M: Have you?

S: Yes. He kept that photo, and I know he loved that statue.

M: Yes, he found it wonderful. All those really ancient Greek things he had great feeling for.

S: Yes, yes. But that in particular. It was just a black and white photo, but it was nicely lit. It was an old postcard.

M: Postcard. I think I remember that Naudé sent it, actually.

S: There was no writing on the back.

M: There wasn't?

S: No. There was no writing or postage on the back. He got it. Well, maybe Alain Naudé bought it for him.

M: Yeah, I think he did. But I'm not…

S: And sent it in an envelope.

M: Anyway, this is the day we went. He was here on the steps, in front of the statue, and I was over to his left, but I was out of the frame, as it were. We'd come in from the left.

'We had lunched at the hotel. And then went to the cinema, and the movie was Once Upon a Time in the West' [S laughs, M chuckles], which he liked because it was a western.

Editor's Note: Krishnaji's preference for movies was westerns and thrillers, and he would make a face and a disparaging remark whenever a romantic scene appeared. His taste in reading was thrillers.

S: Yes. Of course.

M: 'We walked back, stopping to buy a bag at Vuitton and shoes at Mancini,' that's a good shoe store. 'Marcelle Bondoneau came to tea with me, and G.V. Rao came to see Krishnaji. We had supper in our rooms.'

S: When you say had supper in your "rooms," if I may ask here, would you both have it in one room, or would you have it in separate rooms?

M: Oh, no. We'd eat together. We'd tell them to bring the supper to his room or my room, whichever.

M: They were identical rooms.

S: I know. It's just that when you say "rooms," you mean that you had it in one of your rooms.

M: One of our rooms, yes.

M: I don't want to imply that we were sharing a room.

S: No, no, no. We're not doing that. [Chuckles.]

M: So, that's where we had our supper.

October twenty-eighth, ‘We went to Lobb’s. Krishnaji ordered four pairs of shoes, and then we went to Au Vase Etrusque,’ which is sales of china that I was buying for Brockwood; two sets and those white place settings.

S: Where is that?

M: It’s on the Place Madeleine. Then, ‘We lunched at Conti,’ that’s the Italian restaurant that he likes so much. Monsieur Conti was an ebullient, cheerful man.

S: Where is that?

M: It’s up near the Étoile on Rue…I can see where it was, but I can’t remember the name of the street. ‘Then, we went to a movie, The Wild Bunch.’

S: Ah, ha. [Both chuckle.]

M: ‘Donald appeared at the hotel with letters from Vigeveno and Alain. About the Vigeveno one, Krishnaji had me telephone Erna in California, and then he sent a cable to Rajagopal.’ Vigeveno wrote these awful letters, but really I think Mrs. Vigeveno did it.

S: Right.

M: Krishnaji never quite blamed him because he thought that he was being manipulated by his wife. Doesn’t say here what any of this was about, so I can’t tell you, but it was one of many unpleasant communications. ‘Went to Madame Welser for Krishnaji to help her.’ She was a French woman and an invalid, she used to come to Saanen, hoping that he could help her, heal her. ‘Then, we came back to the hotel and had supper in our rooms.’

Editor’s Notes: Although Krishnaji did heal people, and sometimes had spectacular results, this was not something he was known for, and in fact often asked people not to talk about it. I once asked him what he did when he healed people, and it is one of only two questions I ever asked him (and I asked him thousands) that he wouldn’t answer.

On October twenty-ninth, ‘Accompanied Krishnaji to Orly. His 1:30 p.m. plane was postponed till 3 p.m., so we lunched there, and then he left for Rome. I went to see my father and stepmother for dinner at Conti’s.’

S: Didn’t you and Bud and I and Kathy go to dinner at Conti’s?

M: I think we probably did.

October thirtieth. ‘Telephoned Rome. Spoke to Vanda and to Krishnaji. I shopped at Dior, lunched with Father and Olive at Le Doyer. Then, dined with them and Thomas…somebody…at the Tour d’Argent.’ That was a friend of Father’s.

The thirty-first of October. ‘Left the Plaza Athénée, lunched with Father and Olive at the Ritz, spent the afternoon with Lacerta,’ that’s an old friend. She was German or Austrian, and her father was a herpetologist, and Lacerta is the name for lizard in Latin. Anyway, she lived in Paris, so I went to see her. ‘Had a light supper at Father and Olive’s. Then, took the 10 o’clock boat-train for London.’

November first. ‘Arrived in Victoria station, caught the train from Waterloo to Winchester, was back in Brockwood by 11:30 a.m. I did sorting of papers all afternoon.’

The next day I was putting things in order for the winter, and packing because on the third of November, my diary reads, ‘Finished packing. Dorothy and Doris drove me to Heathrow, having sandwiches in the car as we did with Krishnaji on Sunday.’ I then flew to New York.

Now the rest of this is mostly about my life away from Krishnaji, but there are some Krishnaji-related things, and I’ll mention those.

November sixth. ‘First letter from Krishnaji written and sent from Rome.’ Then there was a meeting with someone from Harper and Row—they were one of Krishnaji’s publishers—and Curtis Davis of NET about the films of Krishnaji they made.

Mary Zimbalist’s house in Malibu

On the tenth, ‘I took a noon plane to Los Angeles. Amanda met me; Filomena and Cracker,’ (Cracker was our Siamese cat) ‘welcomed me to Malibu.’ Um, ‘Malibu has had two inches of rain and looks beautiful. Also talked to Erna about the meeting between the attorney general’s man and our lawyers, which was postponed.’

On November fifteenth, I got the first letter and cassette from Krishnaji, written in Delhi.

The next day, ‘I drove to Ojai to lunch with the Lilliefelts. Spent the afternoon with them and saw the new Krishnamurti Foundation of America office.’

On the twentieth, ‘I drove to Claremont and met the Lilliefelts and Sidney Roth at the Blaisdell Institute.’ We were setting up Krishnaji talking at Claremont College again. ‘Lunched with Mr. Rempel’—he’s the man that ran the institute—‘and then saw the film made last year of the discussion between Krishnaji and Huston Smith.’ Rempel had had to do with that.

Inside house in Malibu

November twenty-first. ‘Letter #3 from Krishnaji in Delhi. The Lilliefelts and Roth came to lunch, and we discussed filming Krishnaji.’

On the twenty-third, ‘Brant Cortright came to discuss Krishnaji’s speaking at Santa Cruz.’ That was a student. He’s appeared in the record before. Oh, ‘he told of meeting Rajagopal and possible eavesdropping. I wrote to Krishnaji.’ Rajagopal was always surreptitiously recording conversations.

The next day I got two letters from Krishnaji. They often didn’t come in the same sequence as they were mailed.

November twenty-fifth, ‘Erna came, and we went to Santa Monica auditorium about Krishnaji’s talks there. Then to see the videotape of Krishnaji that the Claremont students made last year.’

I see I typed Krishnaji's conversation dictations in here.

On December first, 'Letter and cassette #2 from Krishnaji. He goes from Delhi to Rajghat tomorrow.'

On the fourth, 'A letter from Krishnaji in Rajghat. He went today from Delhi to Bombay.'

The next day I got a cable from Krishnaji.

On the eighth, I wrote a report on Brockwood for the Bulletin.

On the thirteenth, 'A letter from Krishnaji in Bombay enclosing a letter to KFA trustees about Rajagopal.'

Kitchen – Malibu house

On the fifteenth, 'Alain'—that's Naudé—'telephoned and arrived from London last night. He is staying with the Morrises. Alain came for tea; took him back afterwards to where he is staying.' The next day Alain came to supper.

On the seventeenth, 'Cable from Krishnaji about an attempt by Rajagopal to telephone him in Bombay. Spoke to Erna and Saul Rosenthal'—that's our lawyer—'as Krishnaji's cable asked me to tell Rosenthal,' so that's why I called him.

The next day, 'Call to Bombay came at 6 a.m. Could scarcely hear Krishnaji's voice, but he said he is leaving India January twelfth.' Uh, 'I drove to Ojai for trustees meeting with Erna and Ruth Tettemer. Returned for a quick tea with Alain.'

Mary's bedroom – Malibu house

S: Yeah.

M: December twentieth, 'Cable from Krishnaji. He's canceled the Rome talks and is coming here February first.' He would've gone, as usual, to Brockwood first, I guess. And I see that I'm still working on typing Krishnaji's conversation dictations.

On December twenty-second, 'Typed all morning. Letter from Krishnaji in Bombay about Rajagopal. Erna Lilliefelt and I to see Rosenthal and Leipziger'—Leipziger was another colleague of Rosenthal—'about a January meeting between them and Rajagopal and his lawyer. Erna and I came back. Alain came for his luggage and then left. And then Rajagopal telephoned me and talked for half an hour. I wrote to Krishnaji until late.' Rajagopal would sort of grow hot and cold with me, and then he would say, "we've known each other so long" and be sort of that way.

December twenty-third, 'A letter from Krishnaji, and Alain came to supper. Krishnaji goes to Madras on that day.'

Editor's Note: The relationship between Alain and Mary remained cordial for the rest of Mary's life, but Alain would not be traveling with Krishnaji again. The exact nature of Alain's work has never been clear to me other than he was, in some way, to help arrange for Krishnaji to speak in different places. I have no sense of how effective this was.

The next day, 'A letter from Krishnaji about Rajagopal. He's coming here February first.'

On December twenty-seventh, ‘To Ojai with Krishnaji’s letters and to talk to the Lilliefelts.’

Then the last day of the year, ‘Letter from Krishnaji, posted in Madras.’ End of 1969.

Krishnaji’s bedroom – Malibu house

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Kathy was my wife for most of the years I was at Brockwood, and played a pivotal role in the video recordings of Krishnamurti, and starting the first adult center for Krishnamurti’s work.

[2] Born Virginia McKenna, a British stage and screen actress who married Bill Travers. She had been a friend of Mary’s since the 1950s.

[3] Krishnaji suggested this until the end of his life, but there was never any agreement among the Foundations about it.

[4] William Wyler was an American film director, producer, and screenwriter. He won an Academy Award for directing Ben Hur, which Mary’s husband produced.

Issue 13: January 1970 to April 1970

If you will remember from the introduction to Issue 11, the discussion for that issue and Issue 12 occurred ten years after the discussion of Issue 10. Mary couldn't find her diary for 1969 for that length of time. Instead, the discussion that produced this issue occurred right after the discussion that produced Issue 10. Consequently, the tone of the conversation in this issue is much more like those of the earlier issues.

Mary is still trying to explicate a fuller picture of Krishnaji's character and of his relationship to the outside world continue to emerge in this issue. Things like his peculiar handwriting in his letters to Mary, and his normal morning routine at this time are discussed. We also see Krishnaji's inability to repeat himself (making it impossible to edit his work with him). Also, even though he had spoken to thousands of people at a time for most of his life, Krishnaji's peculiar shyness is discussed. We also see Krishnaji's extraordinary disassociation with himself.

Scott: So I think we're starting on January first, 1970.

Malibu house

Mary: Well, 1970 began with Krishnaji in India, and I was in Malibu. He'd been in India since the autumn. In January, the first thing that happened to me was that I went down to La Jolla because there was a possibility that Krishnaji would speak in San Diego. I went down to find a place for the three of us to live and to talk to the people at San Diego State University. There I met a man who was the head of religious studies, a Dr. Ray Jordan. I also met, from the philosophy department, Dr. Allan Anderson, who, as we all know, is the person who eventually did the video recorded dialogues with Krishnaji. I also met a woman called Martha Longnecker who had a house down there, and she very kindly offered it if Krishnaji came down. It was a little house, a very nice house. She is a potter, and had a nice comfortable small house, which she turned over for Krishnaji—she moved out, and Krishnaji and I lived there.

On the twenty-sixth of January, Krishnaji left Bombay and flew to Rome, and after two days he flew on to Brockwood, where he stayed until the second of February, when he flew to Los Angeles. I met him at the airport, and we drove up to Malibu. He'd been up by then for twenty-four hours, but instead of being wilted, he was full of vim and talk. It was lovely.

In those days he was writing to me, and he brought with him…he wrote small amounts every day, but he didn't mail the letter every day, only when he had about two pages…letters numbers 25 and 26; one he wrote while at Brockwood, and one he wrote on the plane.

S: [laughs] How nice!

M: They were always wonderful, especially the ones he wrote on the plane. He would describe what he saw out the window and things like that. And his handwriting, it was more like his early writing, because it's become more pinched together somehow.

S: Um.

M: He would write right to the edge of the page. And if [S chuckles], let's say, the last word on the line was 'that,' it would be t-h on one line, and then a-t on the next line. [Both chuckle.] He wrote right till you fell off the edge of the page. In other words, he didn't write…what is the word we use in computers?

M: Yes, yes.

M: It was right justified with a pen. [Both chuckle.] Anyway, now he rested for a couple of days. I caught him up on all the news of what was happening with the Ojai people.

On the fifth of February, we got a letter report from our lawyer in those days, who was essentially Saul Rosenthal. David Leipziger was a fellow lawyer, youngish fellow—both of them were young in that office. David did a lot of handling the case day to day. Saul was slightly more overall. Anyway, we got a letter from David, who had just met with the attorney general, Laurence Tapper, the deputy attorney general, and Rajagopal, and Rajagopal's lawyer. In those days, his lawyer was a man called Jim Loebl who lived in Ojai. And as a matter of fact, Erna had gone to talk to Jim Loebl when we first started to think of dealing legally with Rajagopal, but he stopped her—she'd known him personally, socially, sort of—in mid-sentence and said, "I represent Mr. Rajagopal." [Chuckles.] And that ended that meeting.

Eventually, Rajagopal changed and got a big law firm in Los Angeles. Anyway, Leipziger had a meeting, and so he reported all that. We read it through, and then Krishnaji had me telephone Rajagopal to say that he had arrived in Malibu and that he would telephone himself in a few days when he was rested. So, that was the opening contact with Rajagopal. When that was done, we went off to see a movie, Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid…

S: Oh, yes!

M: …which Krishnaji was very pleased with.

S: Mm.

M: That was just right for him. [Chuckles.] Two days later, we went to another movie, Topaz.

S: Ah, yes.

M: On the ninth, we drove up to Ojai and had tea with Erna, Theo, and Ruth Tettemer; and then drove back.

On February tenth, Krishnaji began to dictate to me. It was the opening of a book to be done in 1970, and you're going to ask me which book it turned out to be.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And I'm not quite sure. [Both laugh.] I'll have to go further in my notes before I'm sure which one it turned out to be.

A couple of days later he dictated one to me on suicide, which was a topic generated by me. And it's in one of the books, it's one of the books that the Digbys did, the big, big fat book.

S: The big fat book is The Awakening of Intelligence.[1]

M: I think it's The Awakening. I'll have to look it up; it may be another one. I really interviewed him in that, on suicide.

S: Mm, hm.

M: But it was really interesting, whether there was ever a justification for committing suicide. The question was…but it's in the book, so it's no use going on about it. There's one chapter in whatever book it was.

S: Mm, hm.

How would this interviewing typically come about? Would Krishnaji have said to you, "Come, I want to dictate some things. Let's start a new book."

Malibu house – Mary's bedroom

M: Yes. Or, he just wanted to dictate. It was, I think, to be a new book, but it hadn't…he didn't think that far ahead.

S: That's what I'm trying to get at. He didn't think that far ahead, he really just wanted to dictate some things.

M: Yes, he wanted to dictate. On a regular basis.

S: On a regular basis.

M: Probably for a book.

S: Alright. But he said to you that he wanted to do dictations on a regular basis.

M: Oh, yes, he did.

S: Right.

Malibu house

M: And he dictated…well, my diary, for instance, says he dictated in the morning, and so forth.

S: Right. Also, since this is going to be for the record, you don't have shorthand.

M: No, I don't have shorthand.

S: So you had to write this all down furiously in your own personal…

M: …in my own longhand, which is…has…

S: Yes, has some your own short-hand shortcuts.

M: Yes. And he didn't dictate that fast, so it was not difficult. I've got the old notebooks, but I don't want to put them in the archives because they look so messy. [S laughs.]

S: This will be a good thing for historians to think about!

M: Tom[2] has already sort of dismissed that point of view.

S: (jokingly) Completely…completely useless point of view! Absolutely!

M: And, generally what I used to do was take it down and then Krishnaji would go and have his bath, and I would go and look at what I had written in the notebook, and then if there was something that needed clarification, I would ask him. But he didn't like to repeat…he was very apt to change.

S: I know.

M: You know he [S sighs] would rewrite or re…something.

S: I know. In the few things that he dictated to me for the Centre and for the video—every time he would dictate something and I would bring it back to him and I would read it, he would change it all.

M: That's right.

S: Eventually he said, "Look, I'm going to change it as many times as you bring it back to me, so you just decide [both laugh] whether you like what you have!" Because I was just automatically bringing it back to see if he liked it but he…

M: He couldn't repeat!

S: Yes. Alright now, let's set the scene here, because you said afterwards he would take a bath, so…

M: Well, this was after his dictation in the morning.

S: Right, so set the scene. He would have his breakfast in his bed.

M: Oh, yes.

S: Right.

M: And then came the dictation.

S: And then came the dictation, but he was still sitting in bed?

M: Yes.

S: And, he would dictate for an hour?

M: Ah, I suppose so. I don't remember accurately, never timed it. But, he'd dictate till he was finished with it.

S: In those days did he have the same routine that he had later on? That when he woke up, he would have something hot to drink like nettle tea or…?

M: Yes, yes. And then he would do his exercises.

S: Right.

M: And then breakfast.

S: And then get back into bed for breakfast?

M: Yeah. As far as I can remember that was always the routine. Unless we were traveling or something.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, usually, for this particular February we are in now, the day was spent at home with this in the morning, and then lunch, and then he'd take a nap and after that we'd take a beach walk.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Unless there was someone for lunch, and even then he'd take a nap. He would unwind from all the traveling and it was lovely, it was nice.

Let's see. On February twelfth, the Lilliefelts, Ruth Tettemer, and Sidney Roth came for lunch. Sidney was a man from Chicago, a business man, and he had given money to KWINC, and because he had, it was felt by the lawyers that someone who was a donor had the right to say, "What have you done with the money that was given in donations?" And so, Sidney became involved in the case.

S: That's right, I remember that.

M: His lawyer would advise with our lawyers.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Anyway, we all went into town after lunch to see Rosenthal and Leipziger, and talk over where we stood in all this.

S: But Sidney Roth disappeared from the scene.

M: He disappeared eventually, yes, meaning by that he went back to Chicago. But he'd appear from time to time, but he didn't take any further active part.

One day, we went up Corral Canyon, which is about a couple of miles up the beach, and it goes back into the mountains. And if you go all the way on the road, you get up, well, it's on a ridge that runs along on top of the mountains behind Malibu. And for me that was a special day because Krishnaji suddenly said, "Oh! This is the real old California mountains and scenery." And it pleased me because that thing that he loved about California, he saw it in Malibu for the first time. It wasn't just a house on a hill looking over the ocean.

S: Yes, yes.

Malibu house – Krishnaji's bedroom

M: It was a part of California that he cherished.

S: Yes.

M: Then, he spoke one day to Rajagopal. He called up, as he said he would.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And Krishnaji invited him to come and to discuss what Rajagopal envisaged as a peaceful settlement, which of course Rajagopal was always saying, "When you come to California again, we'll get together and talk and make a peaceful settlement."

And so, Krishnaji would say, "Come and let's discuss it." And that called Rajagopal's bluff, because he immediately said he couldn't discuss it, his lawyer wouldn't allow it. So, this was the sort of come-on that he was doing forever. When you'd say, "Alright, what about it?", the door slammed in your face.

On February twenty-first, Alain came down from San Francisco, and brought two friends for lunch. Later that day, we had twenty-eight people for a discussion, mostly rounded up by Alain[3].

The next day, there was the second discussion with the same group. And according to my notes, it was videotaped. What's become of that? Have you ever come across it?

S: This is probably one of those old tapes that no one can play or copy.

M: No?

S: Mm, hm. Okay, I'll check.

M: One of the ones that we can't play?

S: Yes.

M: I thought Jean-François[4] found someone.

S: He found someone that could do it, but I think that it's gotten disrupted with his leaving and all of that.

M: Not that there's something extraordinary on it; I just was curious that it was videoed that far back.

S: Yes. It would be nice to have it.

M: So, then, ABC, the American Broadcasting Corporation, wanted to interview Krishnaji for a news thing. So, we went into the ABC studio and a man called Robert Abernathy interviewed him. It was a fifteen-minute thing for a news program.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Abernathy used to do commentaries on the news every day in those days.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Again, it wasn't something brilliant. Abernathy had done some homework, but it was rather routine.

So, we come now to March. On the first of March, he gave his first Santa Monica talk. He gave four in all. The auditorium in Santa Monica is not very attractive, but 3,000 people came. Some had to be turned away. The auditorium is fairly good-sized, and it was full to overflowing. But I remember after the fourth one, during the drive home Krishnaji said, "I felt it was like singing to the deaf."

S: Mm, hm.

M: They weren't a very good crowd. Then he started giving interviews to people. Some of the people, I don't remember now who they were, but they were mostly people who'd been in the discussion group; other people had written in. So they came to the house. Then one day he started speaking to me about the events of his life, and he went in, very much, to the sort of …I forget whether he called it this, but a "protective providence" that looked over him. I mean there's many references to his having felt it all his life.

Inside Malibu house

S: Protected, yes.

M: Protected. And he talked a lot about that to me. Nothing that is new, I mean, for me to tell you now, that hasn't been said.

S: Mm, hm.

M: But that was a very strong conviction on his part.

S: Well, more than a conviction in a sense, a feeling.

M: A feeling, yes.

S: He felt that protection.

M: He felt that protection. It was a fact to him. Let's put it that way.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Oh…it was on February seventeenth that we did the piece on suicide. I just came across a note on that.

S: Okay.

M: On March tenth, Krishnaji gave three interviews to people who had written and requested them. And Erna telephoned and reported [chuckling], with satisfaction that we'd grossed $13,600 in Santa Monica [S chuckles] and netted between $9,000 and $10,500.

S: Let me ask you just a little bit about the interviews, Mary.

M: Yes.

S: You say Krishnaji had three interviews. Now, would he determine how long he would spend with each one? So that he would say "Have one come at 3 o'clock, one at 4 and one at 5"? Or would he just have them come together and they would wait?

M: Well, either of the above. They were spaced apart, but how long he talked to them was one of the mysteries of my life that I could never [both laugh] understand. Because, at times he would talk quite a long time, and at other times, especially here in Brockwood, when he was seeing a lot of people, troubled people would solemnly enter the room, close the door, and within fifteen minutes they would come out looking transformed. [S laughs.] And I thought it was impossible that he could even listen to what they would come to tell him in that time, much less solve their problem. But that's how it appeared to me outside the door.

S: Right, right. But the Malibu situation. Where would the people wait?

M: Um…

S: Where would he see them? And where would they wait?

M: That's an interesting question. Now wait a minute. They'd have to wait in the only living room there was, and he would have seen them, I guess, in his bedroom. There's no other place because there was only the one. The dining room was open to the living room; it wasn't closed off, so he couldn't have had it there.

S: Mm, hm. Was there a study or anything like that?

M: No. There were just two bedrooms, two baths, a living room and then a dining room, but there's no door between the living room and dining room. So I guess, although I haven't a direct memory.

S: Okay.

M: But his bedroom was a good-sized room; it had a sort of couch and chairs and things.

S: Mm, hm.

M: It wasn't just a bedroom.

S: Yes; there was a sitting part to it, too.

Inside Malibu house

M: Yes, yes. So…hm. Again, more interviews are noted. And again, beach walks, and again, we discussed Krishnaji's remembrance of childhood, which wasn't very great. And we talked about Masters[5], etc. And he remembered something that happened that was of a spiritual significance. And he knows that it happened, but he can't remember any details of it, just sort of a vague fact that something happened.

S: So now is this in connection with Masters?

M: Um, well, it was after talking about Masters, so it may have been…uh…

S: So Krishnaji remembers that something happened and that it was important and it had spiritual significance, but he can't remember what it is.

M: Yes. Now it might have been the pepper tree event[6], but I don't…I'm not sure.

S: Mm, hm.

M: My notes, alas, are incomplete. Because otherwise, he said he didn't remember that.

S: Yes. Can you recollect what it was he was saying about the Masters?

M: Well, he had that way of talking, explaining the theory, and never saying whether it was so or not.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And he would tell you in detail about how the whole hierarchy worked; he did this at various times.

S: Yes, I know. [Laughing.]

M: Most notably the time driving from Rishi Valley back to Madras, and Dr. Parchure was sitting in the front seat, and Krishnaji was talking to me in the back seat and giving the whole picture of everything from the Lord of the World, down. Parchure remembers that.

S: Hm.

M: So you have to…we're in unknown territory when we go into that.

S: [laughing] I know. [M chuckles.]

M: On March twelfth, we went to Ojai, but Krishnaji drove the whole way and we went to Lake Casitas and took a picnic lunch with us and had a lovely day sitting by the lake, on the ground, and on a hill looking over the lake. And then we went to the Lilliefelts where Krishnaji rested; he took a slight nap. And then we had tea and then there was a discussion for Ojai people; a lot of the old timers appeared.

S: Mm, hm. And that discussion took place in the Lilliefelts'?

M: The Lilliefelts' living room.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And everyone that knew him, except the KWINC people, were there.

S: Where would Krishnaji have sat in Erna's room?

M: He would sit near the piano, if you can remember.

S: I can.

M: And then people would fill the rest of the room, and even out in the front hall where they had lawn chairs.

S: Right.

M: We came home in time for supper. The Dunnes came over and we all went to the movies together.

Amanda and Phil, Miranda Dunne, my friends, for the benefit of future tape listeners, they lived next door to me in Malibu. There was a sort of a canyon, so called, a kind of a little valley between the two places.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And it runs out to the beach and into the sea. And they're, well, like family to me.

S: Yes. What did the three girls feel about Krishnaji? Or how did they get along with him?

M: They loved Krishnaji. They were delighted in his presence. He was wonderful with them, as always.

S: Of course.

M: And, they were devoted to him. Alas, they were not very impressed by what he said, but I, of course, am the world's most zero missionary. [S laughs.] I never attempt to persuade or anything. So, although they think he was a very wise man speaking absolute truth and a wonderful human being, and loved to be with him, I can't really tell you more than that. I've given them the books for Christmas, just so they have them. But I don't push it at all.

S: Of course, of course.

M: But they loved him. And the parents also, particularly Amanda. Phil, of course, has a different take; he's intellectual about everything. But, anyway, as a person they liked him enormously. He was rather shy with them in a funny way, the parents. He knew they were my closest friends, and it made him sort of not want to intrude, as it were.

S: Mm, hm.

M: In a way, I wished he hadn't felt that way. But he was always a little bit shy.

S: I don't know [laughing] if this is the point to bring it in, but I can remember so many times Krishnaji kind of humorously chiding you that they were your only friends!

M: Yes, yes.

S: He would kind of … [Chuckles.]

M: Yes, he chided me for being too…

S: …a hermit or something.

M: …remote or too hermit-like or something. [S still laughing.] Also, when we would get into descriptions of what was wrong with people, and I used to tease him and say, "The reason that you are always so critical of married couples, and say that they nag,"—he always used the word nag—"is that people only come to tell you their troubles. They never come to tell you how rapturously happy they are."

And he would say, "Well, who do you know that are happily married?" and I would say, "The Dunnes!" [S laughs.] And I wasn't very good with further examples.

S: [laughing] Well, there aren't a lot.

M: So, anyway, they came and over [S chuckles], and we all went to see a movie called Anne of a Thousand Days in Beverly Hills. That night Alain arrived late.

We're making a snail's pace through history here.

S: Great.

M: If you say so.

On March fourteenth and fifteenth, there was a third and fourth group discussion this year, also videotaped.

Then Alain went back to San Francisco.

On the seventeenth, Krishnaji resumed dictating a book chapter, and he gave another interview.

S: Mary, can I just ask, when we're clipping through these interviews here, if anyone is, I don't want to say, famous, because I don't care if it's an actor or something; but if it's anyone that it looks like they would have been influenced by Krishnaji's work, then…

M: Yes, of course. Well, you see, now I see a name, F. Fraser; I don't know if it's a man or a woman. And so names like that I don't…

S: Right, no, but I'm just keen also that we trace, when we can, the influence that Krishnaji had on things.

M: Yes. Well, there are names here, but most of them I can't even remember.

S: Yes, it doesn't make any difference.

M: Again, Krishnaji's dictating in the mornings, and giving interviews during the day, and then a beach walk.

Then on the nineteenth, we drove to Ojai via Santa Paula and stopped at that little park at the top of the valley that looks out over Ojai where Lost Horizons filmed that view that was used. We had a picnic lunch there. And then we came down to the Lilliefelts', and he held his second Ojai discussion with the group that had been there before.

The next day, Krishnaji had a toothache. We went to a dentist in town, and the dentist said the tooth had to come out because it was just worn down. There was hardly any tooth left. On the way home we went to Lindberg's, the health food store. He took quite a pleasure in going to the health food store. He would walk around and look at everything. We went there quite often.

S: Mm, hm.

M: People who recognized him would walk around and look at him! [S laughs.]

That evening we saw on television the first of the NET films made in 1966. They were the first ever done in the Oak Grove when he talked, those black and white…

S: I remember them. But they weren't shown until then? That was the first showing four years later?

M: That was the first showing, and that was the first one of the series.

S: Ah ha.

M: The next day was a Saturday and his toothache continued, but he gave interviews, and held the fifth group discussion. It says here, "Good discussion." But that's all it says.

Editor's Note: The Krishnamurti Foundations have put online a great deal of material they have of Krishnaji's public talks and discussions. When Mary feels that an event is especially good, as she does about the talk just mentioned, from now on a link to that event will be given to the readers of her memoirs whenever possible.

On Sunday, he held the sixth Malibu discussion with the same group, and again interviews in the afternoon. On the beach walk we ran into Jennifer Selznick[7]. I mentioned her before. They had a house on the beach.

On March twenty-third, Krishnaji gave two interviews, one to a nice boy, Bill Burmeister, who has since disappeared. He was a seventeen-year-old boy, and he used to come to Saanen in later years. But who knows where he is now.

At 4 p.m., Krishnaji had his tooth pulled out, which was loose and infected. The tooth came out easily, but Krishnaji fainted twice in the car on the way home. The tooth has probably been making him feel under par for months, according to the dentist.

He felt better the next day. Bill Angelos and his wife, and Charlotte Zuteman came for lunch. Then some people I knew who had lunch the day before with Rajagopal at the Vigevenos, they came by and told about the meeting. The Vigevenos and Rajagopal had said that Krishnaji refused to see him. A black lie. [Both chuckle.] So, later I telephoned Rajagopal and asked him with or without the Vigevenos to come here to see Krishnaji. He said he would think about it and let me know. Rajagopal always claimed he wanted to see Krishnaji, but alone and on his territory, which Krishnaji wouldn't do. We all believed Rajagopal taped everything, all conversations, without telling you.

S: Mm, hm.

M: On the afternoon of March twenty-fifth, Krishnaji held a young people's discussion. Young people brought by Sidney Field and Laura Huxley and four sent by Dr. Weininger. I forgot whether his name has come into this.

S: I don't think so.

M: Well, Weininger, you would remember, because two of his children came to Brockwood as students. Ruben…

S: Ah, yes, and Rachel?

M: Rachel. They were Weiningers. He was a psychoanalyst/psychiatrist, lived in Santa Barbara, had known Krishnaji for a long time, and was responsible for Krishnaji's only trip to Washington before he spoke there in 1985. He'd taken him to see a meeting of psychiatrists, and I think Krishnaji was taken through a mental hospital, which I think was called St. Elizabeth's in Washington. But any contact that Krishnaji had with psychiatrists in those days was through Weininger.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Laura Huxley was working with Weininger, doing some sort of psychotherapy. They left, and Krishnaji and I walked around the garden. When we didn't have time to go to the beach, we'd walk around the garden, and he saw for the first time the great-horned owl that had come to stay.

S: Mm, hm.

M: That was lovely. It nested in a big eucalyptus tree out by the garage, and you could see it sitting up there with…

S: [chuckling] …with his horns, yes.

M: Wonderful.

On the twenty-sixth, we again went to Ojai via the inland way and had a picnic in the little park, Dennison Park. Again, at the Lilliefelts', there was the third discussion with the Ojai people, and then Krishnaji had an osteopathic treatment from Dr. Edna Lay, who was a very good osteopath. And we drove back to Malibu.

The next day, the Lilliefelts, Ruth Tettemer, Sidney Roth, and Donald Hoppen all came at 11 a.m. and we held the annual KFA board meeting.

S: Was Donald Hoppen a trustee?

M: No, he wasn't. But he somehow was there. Alain was supposed to come down for the weekend, and…

S: Because Alain was still a trustee?

M: Yes, he was a trustee. So, I sent Narayan to pick him up at the airport, and he arrived in time for lunch with everyone else. The meeting lasted till 4 p.m., when Krishnaji gave interviews. He was tired that night. That was the first trustee meeting after the formation of the Foundation.

My diary says for the twenty-eighth, Saturday, that we had an interesting discussion at breakfast. When Alain was there, Krishnaji would come to the table so we could all have breakfast together, and we'd often talk quite a long time. It was recorded onto an audio cassette, Krishnaji, Alain, and me. In the afternoon, there was a seventh group discussion at 4 o'clock, and that was videotaped.

That same day, a letter came to Krishnaji from Rajagopal saying that he couldn't leave Ojai to meet Krishnamurti.

On the twenty-ninth, Krishnaji held the eighth group discussion, which was videotaped. Afterward, on the remaining tape, Krishnaji restated something he said at the board meeting about the future of Brockwood and of the foundations. He also discussed Rajagopal's reply with the trustees. I wonder where all these ancient things are.

The next day, 'Alain has decided to stay in California, and in the afternoon, Krishnaji gave an interview to two rabbis, Rabbi Rabin and Rabbi Lymen.' I remember them, sort of.

On the thirty-first, Krishnaji, Alain, Miranda, and I lunched at the Bel Air Hotel. That's a rather nice hotel in Los Angeles, in a canyon; very pretty hotel, lunched in a sort of garden-ish place. And then we went to Hollywood to see a movie called Airport. After that we drove Alain to the airport and he went back to Oakland and Berkeley, and he said that he planned to go to Europe in May, gather his things, trade in his VW for a new one, bring all this over. Said a warm goodbye, and Krishnaji and I came back to supper.

Then nothing much happens until the third of April. 'At breakfast, we decided to go to La Jolla the next day, instead of today. I said, it was too nice here, and we didn't want to leave.'

S: [laughs] How nice.

M: Yes. So, we had a long, lovely beach walk in the afternoon. Krishnaji had written a letter to Rajagopal, which we posted, and he rang at suppertime and said he wanted to see Krishnaji before he left. Krishnaji said he would ring before leaving. It was a brief conversation.

The next day, 'I packed for Krishnaji and myself, and we left at 12:30 p.m. on a hot, calm day for La Jolla. Stopped and had a picnic lunch in the car, near San Juan Capistrano, and arrived at 3:45 p.m. at Martha Longnecker's in La Jolla. She has lent her house to Krishnaji for the week of his talks at San Diego State. She and the Lilliefelts were staying nearby. We unpacked and went for a walk along the cliffs above the ocean. I made supper.'

On the fifth, 'we went to the hall in the morning with Mrs. Longnecker to see it, and Erna and Theo were there. And then we came back to La Jolla, and I quickly marketed and had lunch cooked for Krishnaji by 12:30 p.m. I drove him to Montezuma Hall at San Diego State campus, where he gave the first of his talks at 3 o'clock. We came back, and walked in the neighborhood. Krishnaji spoke to me about the two months he spent alone in a cabin at Sequoia…' I'm sure he's told you about that.

S: Mm, hm. Absolutely.

M: Yes. And his shyness in avoiding people. He was always more or less shy, but particularly in the early days, and 'he would go to the store in Sequoia, when he figured out there'd be the least people around. He had to buy his own supplies because he did his own cooking. He was shy even of the ranger who cautioned him to be careful on his long walks. He says even today he's too shy to have ever walked alone when we were here on Sunday.' In other words, he wouldn't have walked in La Jolla alone; he'd have been too shy. He's alright when it was in a wild place like Sequoia, but around people he is very shy.

S: So, you didn't walk in La Jolla?

M: Well, I was with him. He didn't do that alone.

S: Right. Now, you have to explain that. Is that because if he is alone, more people will come up to him?

M: Well, La Jolla was a town, I mean, a town in California means houses with gardens and sidewalks.

S: Yes. So he wouldn't have walked alone?

M: No, out of shyness.

S: But, you have to explain that. Why is it alright with you, and not alone?

M: Why? [Laughs.] I suppose because people wouldn't have spoken to him, or, I don't know. All kinds of things he could do if someone was there, that he wouldn't have done alone, apparently.

S: I'm no doubt just putting my own interpretation on it; but one of the reasons that I have always liked traveling alone is because people do come up and talk to a person alone; whereas, if there's even just two people, they won't; they leave you alone.

M: Well, that's it then. Yes, he…first of all, he would always attract attention because of his looks. And people who knew who he was would probably want to speak to him.

S: Yes.

M: And he was shy. I'd forgotten that he said that.

The next day was the sixth, and he gave his second San Diego talk at 7 p.m. They were college students that came to that. It was well attended, as I recall, but nothing much came of it.

On April seventh, 'in the morning, Krishnaji had the Lilliefelts and Roth come to discuss legal matters. And then Roth consulted by telephone Mr. Wyatt (his lawyer in Chicago). The attorney general's man, Mr. Tapper, was aroused by the situation set forth by Leipziger and Rosenthal and a meeting of the results of the January twenty-first meeting with Rajagopal and Loebl. We had lunch alone, and Krishnaji rested all afternoon. 'At 7 p.m. he gave his third and a great talk,' it says here, 'at San Diego State. We had supper afterward.'

'It was another beautiful day' on the eighth, 'and at 11 a.m., he held a big public discussion at San Diego State. On the way back, we stopped to see a Mr. and Mrs. Mark Sellon who live on the top of a hill above La Jolla. He is ninety-five years old and knew Krishnaji in Adyar, years ago.'[8]

S: How nice.

M: 'He gave early books to the Foundation. We came back for lunch. And then, with Theo Lilliefelt, we went to Coronado'—oh, Coronado—I remember this, this is nice—'and visited a heavy cruiser, the Saint Paul, which Krishnaji found very interesting.'

S: Oh, what's this?

M: There's a naval base at Coronado, and Krishnaji had wanted to visit a naval ship. The only one we could get him permission to visit was a heavy cruiser, but he walked around and looked at everything, the way he looks at cars.

S: Yes.

M: It was a little bit like the time in Australia, and the American aircraft carrier; Krishnaji was fascinated by that. I wanted to get him a battleship, but there wasn't one handy!

S: Yes. [Laughs.]

M: On the ninth, 'there's a long telephone and talk with Sidney Roth and his lawyer, Mr. Wyatt, who gave advice. Krishnaji and I lunched quietly, and at 7 p.m., he gave his fourth and final talk at San Diego State. There was a huge crowd,' it says. Then, it says here: 'Krishnaji's comment on seeing the photo of himself in a 1929 Star Bulletin.' We got that from Mark Sellon the day before. 'He said, "He must've been a very gentle person."'

'We were up the next morning at 6 o'clock. Had breakfast, loaded the car, and had left La Jolla by 7:30. Martha Longnecker came to help and receive her house back. Krishnaji drove the first eighty miles, and we were home in Malibu at 9:50 a.m. The garden and the house was bright with flowers. The Blackburns came at 11 a.m. to see Krishnaji. He wants to do tape duplication for Krishnamurti Foundation.

S: I wonder if it's worth saying something about a seeming disassociation that Krishnaji had with his physical self. I have heard it many times, and it was absolutely genuine. A lot of people could think it was contrived. By contrived, I mean things like Margaret Thatcher's third person "we feel," etcetera.

M: There was nothing contrived about Krishnamurti.

S: I know, and it's important to say that. But, it is also perhaps important to just uncover this phenomenon a bit, because in a way I find it completely consistent with what Krishnaji says about the ego, about not identifying, about the past, etcetera. But all of us live so much the antithesis of that—we look back at a picture of ourselves when were four years old, and we say, "Oh, that's me." Krishnaji would look at a picture of himself as a young boy, and he would see a young boy, and like he would look at any picture of a person, he could tell certain things about that person. Now, Krishnaji seemed to have this disassociation, well, I don't know if it's an exaggeration, but almost about what he was yesterday or five minutes ago.

M: And it's also in the talks. He never liked to say "I"; he'd say "the speaker."

S: Or, K.

M: Or, K, yes. It was part of his…it was his…it was so natural to him. It, um…

S: To me, this is actually an indication of something quite enormous, that he genuinely didn't remember things about himself because in a way, I don't know, perhaps there was no one (no ego, no identity) there to record the events at the time. I can remember, I think when he was reading the first volume of Mary Lutyens' biography of him, he wanted to find out what happened to that boy. It was like he was reading about something with which he did not identify in any way. That's an extraordinary thing.

M: And yet he didn't identify with anything else. I mean, people might easily say, "Well, he identified with a Master or the Maitreya or the World Teacher or something," but it wasn't what we call identification. It was, as you said, there was no self to identify.

S: It is quite a phenomenon.

M: Yes, it is. It is. Last night, I was looking through that little book, The Young Krishna, that Mary's just done, and reread the part where Nitya talks about when the little child was talking to him.

S: During "the process."

M: Yes, "the process." Nitya writes how the little boy would prattle on to his mother and saying that he had some biscuits in his pocket. You remember that part? And quite a lot of them, he told his mother, and then he confessed that he'd been stealing them from her cookie jar, although he didn't call it a cookie jar, but wherever she kept them, and so he thought he ought to tell her because he thought she maybe suspected it. And Nitya makes the comment that he must've been a very nice child. In a funny way, that character was still there.

S: That's the other part which is remarkable. That character, which one seems to see in early photographs, or one hears about in the early stories, so much of that character never left.

M: Yes. There was…there was…

S: And yet there was not continuity of a "person."

M: When you say he had a childlike quality, this was that in a man in his eighties or something, and it was not in any way odd or incongruous. There was that wonder that a child has, and if he was interested in a motorcar or something, he was like a child looking at toys, with that kind of…

S: Simple absorption, and it's uncomplicated.

M: Yes. [Pause.]

S: [Sighs] All of this, Mary, all that Krishnaji asked us to do, being able to convey to other people what he was like, it's absolutely impossible.

M: It is impossible.

S: It's just impossible.

M: How can you say a man of eighty-something is, in a way, a child? He sounds as though he's senile or something…

S: I can remember going for a walk with Krishnaji, and he said something about the "old people," then caught himself, realizing that he was old, in that he had lived many years. He started to laugh and then said, "No, no, the really old people," because he wasn't.

M: He wasn't.

S: He just was never old. [Pause.]

M: And the heartbreaking thing is that toward the very end, when he knew how bad the cancer was, that it was fatal, he said, "What did I do wrong?" as though it was…

S: A punishment.

M: …a punishment, or that he hadn't been responsible enough to keep the body healthy, which was his job to do, that he had failed in that. And that just broke my heart. [Long pause.] It's…I don't know…I don't think…I don't think we can convey this. We can try, and use words, but unless someone intuitively picks it up, or someone perhaps saw some evidence of this in him and would recognize what we're trying to say. Otherwise, people will think we're just devoted devotees…

S: Yes. It also doesn't make any sense…

M: …there's nothing remotely sentimental about Krishnamurti at any moment. He was absolutely repelled by it, and it just wouldn't have…it wouldn't have been possible. And nothing about him should ever be interpreted as sentimental.

S: Yes. Well, that's why it's important, why I want to stop on something like this, because this is such an unusual thing where he could look back at himself as completely divorced from it.

M: Yes.

S: And he always seemed to do that. At least all the time I had contact with him, he always seemed to do that.

And something that seems related: When I saw Krishnaji look at photographs of himself, or the first video of himself that I shot, it both was and it wasn't himself he was looking at. There was no…

M: He also had a fairly—I'd say it was an aversion, though he didn't do it all the time—I often had photographs of him on the desk or somewhere, and he would turn them face down. [S laughs.] He wouldn't make a point of it; he'd just, as he walked past, he'd turn it over and go on doing whatever he was doing. [S chuckles more.] Or, if a book had a photograph of him on the dust jacket, he'd turn it, so it didn't show in some way. And he seldom, as you know, listened to any recordings.

S: I never knew him to listen to any.

M: I remember being aware of it in Rome the first time when Alain was playing for Vanda and me one of the talks, and he'd come into the room and stood there looking questioning. He just stood there and listened a couple of minutes, looking rather critical, and then he'd disappear.

S: Well, this is out of sequence, but that first videotape that we made, and Krishnaji wanted to see it, he came down that evening to the Saanen tent, and there it was, and he looked at the picture for, I don't know, seconds, if that, and then he wanted to look at the wiring, he wanted to look at the back of the machine. He wanted to look at everything other than the picture. He saw that it was a picture of him, and that was enough, you know. But he wanted to look at everything else.

M: He wanted to see how it worked.

S: Exactly.

M: That's why he came, probably.

S: He didn't want to see the picture. Yes, he wanted to see the machinery. Anyway, let's move on.

M: On the eleventh of April, 'we watched Apollo 13 take off for the moon.' That was something he was interested in. 'After lunch, Krishnaji, Filomena, and I went to Santa Monica and saw the movie True Grit [S chuckles] with John Wayne.' [M chuckles, too.] That he also liked.

S: So, Filomena would come with you to the movies sometimes?

M: Not often, but sometimes.

The next day I 'telephoned Alain, who is flying into London and returning in June. The Lilliefelts and Alan Kishbaugh came at 4 p.m. about publishing.'

S: Ah ha, this is the first appearance of Alan Kishbaugh.

M: Yes. He was in those discussions. I'd forgotten that.

S: In your house?

M: Yes. That's where I first met him. I forget how he came to be there. We'll have to ask him. But, he was really the only person in those discussions who seemed a likely person to be helpful with things.

S: Yes. And he was working for a publisher in those days.

M: He was working for a publisher. It was, um, oh dear, what was it? The ones who published Mary's book initially in America. A very good publisher. I can't remember names, anymore. Anyway, he was their representative on the west coast, and dealt with authors and such.

We're about to go to England. So, 'in the afternoon on the thirteenth, there was a 3 p.m. meeting with Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, Ruth Tettemer, Sidney Roth, and Saul Rosenthal.

Krishnaji and I had supper as usual and then news came of the electrical trouble on the Apollo 13 moon mission, forcing cancellation and return to Earth.'

The next day, 'young people came to discuss with Krishnaji in the afternoon. A letter came from Rajagopal and the Vigevenos, and a telephone call from Mima Porter came while we were out.'

On the fifteenth, 'I telephoned and spoke to Sidney Roth and his lawyer, Mr. Wyatt. And spoke to Mrs. Porter. The osteopath came to the house and gave both Krishnaji and me treatment.' That was nice.

We watched the fourth NET film that was shot in 1966 on the seventeenth. I wrote to Mima Porter.

S: I'm sure Rajagopal kept all these letters too, so…

M: Oh, don't think he didn't. Then the next day, 'Rajagopal telephoned Krishnaji and said "Don't desert me."' Imagine that. Hm-hm. 'It was a brief conversation. We had lunch. It was a clear, lovely day, and the flowers and birds fill the garden. Amanda came over at 1:30 p.m. We said goodbye to Filomena and drove to the airport. Krishnaji and I took the 3 p.m. TWA nonstop flight to London. Smooth flight, but virtually no sleep.'

You don't want me to read these day by day!

S: Yes, I do. Yes, I do.

M: Alright.

So, this is the nineteenth. It says, 'Krishnaji and I arrived in London at 10:30 a.m. The Digbys came to greet Krishnaji, and Dorothy was there to bring us back to Brockwood in the Land Rover. Dorothy said this was the first spring-like day. We arrived at Brockwood, where the daffodils are out but the trees are still bare. The house looked lovely. Everyone gave a warm greeting, and we were just in time for lunch. Both were groggy and tired. Telephoned Mary Links at Blackdown. Alain was there, having flown from San Francisco last Monday. Slept all afternoon.'

On the twentieth, the morning, 'I felt sick, but better later. Very tired. Krishnaji felt the same. Mary Cadogan came by in the morning and for lunch. I brought her up-to-date with the news. Slept in afternoon. I did a little unpacking. Krishnaji and I went for a walk with the two dogs, Badger and Whisper.'

The next day, we're still getting unpacked. 'The Mercedes was reactivated, and in the afternoon we drove to Winchester on errands. Krishnaji talked to me about change that is necessary and quiet within and without.' He was always talking about being quiet within. As you know, a little-paid-attention-to factor in his teaching, the real necessity to be quiet, which, of course, is the emptiness.

S: Yes, an inner quiet.

M: An inner quiet.

S: Mm, hm. Yes.

M: He talked often, often about that.

Heh-heh. The next day, it says, 'A quiet day, and I was quiet, too.' [S chuckles.] Unfortunately, I wasn't as quiet as I should've been.

On the twenty-third, Krishnaji and I left the car at Alton and 'we took the train into London. Alain met us, and then both Alain and Krishnaji went to a homeopathic doctor, Dr. McGowan, the one that's best in England, according to Alain. He gave Krishnaji a general checkup, and then we went to L'Aperitif, where Mary Links and Alain lunched with us. Alain is to go to Rome on Saturday and later to California. Krishnaji and I went to Flora's and Hatchard's for nature books, and then to Dr. Peter Campion.' Krishnaji's dentist in those days was Dr. Peter Campion, not Mr. Thompson. 'He X-rayed him for an abscess, results tomorrow. Then, we went back to Huntsman, where Krishnaji fitted an overcoat and ordered a blue suit, and I ordered a pair of slacks. We caught the 5:45 p.m. train back.'

S: We must stop there 'cause we're running out of tape. Okay.

M: That was the twenty-third of April, and I'll put this here to mark it.

S: Okay.

Issue 14: April 1970 to June 1970

In this issue Mary brings up what she perceives as Krishnaji speaking on several different levels simultaneously, and also living on different levels.

There is also a discussion of what Krishnaji may have meant by "dialogue" or the exchange he was always looking for in his discussions.

Krishnaji's interest in why he wasn't conditioned as a boy is explored, as is "silence."

Brockwood Gathering 1970

Scott: We're picking this up where we left off, which was April twenty-fourth, 1970.

Mary: Good. Well, we were then at Brockwood. And on that day, I went to Paris and stayed in the Hotel Plaza Athénée.

S: Was this to see your father?

M: It was to see my father because his wife, my stepmother, was very ill. She looked dreadfully, and she was in the hospital. So, I stayed there.

I got back to London on the twenty-seventh, and went from Heathrow to Waterloo Station in London. Mary Links met me there, and we both met Krishnaji when he came in by himself at 3 o'clock. Dorothy would've put him on the train.

We all met at Waterloo. [Chuckles.] And then we went to the dentist, who did more X-rays on Krishnaji's teeth. And…oh dear! There was a necessity of three more of Krishnaji's teeth to come out.

S: Oh dear.

M: The dentist was to confer with Dr. McGowan and report. But while we were waiting in the dentist's waiting room, Mary, Krishnaji, and I, to some degree, talked about the biography.

So, we went back to Brockwood, and Dorothy met us at Alton. Krishnaji had written to me both of the days I was away. He had letters for me, which was lovely. [Both chuckle.]

S: He wrote to you, and then gave them to you when you came back?

M: That's right.

S: Yes, how nice.

M: Yes. He wrote whenever I was away. And even though I came back two days later, I had two letters, two letters.

S: How nice. If I can come back to Mary's biography, how did she come to write that?

M: Mary must've been in communication with Shiva Rao[1]. You know, Shiva Rao was supposed to do the biography, and he assembled a lot of material. But then he got too ill and old and so forth, and so Krishnaji asked Mary to take it over, and Shiva Rao turned over all that he'd written and also the research material, which he'd gathered quite a pile of it, he turned all that over to Mary. She continued, really out of politeness I think, to communicate with Shiva Rao for quite a while. But the book that came out eventually is really all hers because she has a very different style, I think. But that day, he talked very much of what he talked often about, which was, why was the boy unconditioned, and what looked after him? He wanted to discuss it some more another day. He kept coming back and back to that. It's such a…well, now, I find, reading through things, his teachings I mean, his writings, I keep highlighting some things. It keeps jumping out at me, this necessity for everyone to be able to have this emptiness.

S: Mm, hm.

M: He talks so much about emptying the mind. There's some place where I've probably come upon it in notes where he says that every night, before you go to sleep, empty the mind, go through what happened, what you've been preoccupied with that day, and empty it. Finish it! So the mind can start anew the next day. And, of course, this is something few of us even think of trying to do, much less doing it.

S: Yes. There are two things, Mary, in regard to this. It is extraordinary that even up until the end, through all the time I knew him, Krishnaji was interested in why that boy, meaning himself…

M: Yes, yes.

S: …why that boy was never conditioned. And, I can remember Krishnaji also talking about himself once and talking about the Buddha. As you know, it's never a kind of egotism with him, but he was talking about the extraordinariness of the Buddha, but the Buddha had been conditioned and then freed himself, liberated himself from his conditioning; whereas Krishnaji never was conditioned.

M: You know, one of the great mysteries of right now, and I would think it will continue to be mysterious in people who really take this very seriously, is the apparently extraordinary fact or phenomenon of this man who apparently was unconditioned and yet he lived on so many different planes.

S: Yes.

M: I mean, I can rattle on about everyday life with him, but the infinite fact of this man is that that played a very small part, I think—I mean, I'm guessing actually, in the totality of what he was. A lot of what I've been talking about this summer with Dr. Parchure is looking in old, early talks of the 1930s (the collected works that are part of the record), and the hints which a lot of us mightn't pick up in the writing because he'll say something, but it has a much deeper meaning in another context, and yet it seems understandable in our context. We understand it on our level, but it has a deeper significance if you continue to study and see how he's really testifying, or there seem to be very strong hints of a lot of things he didn't go into in depth with that audience, because they wouldn't have understood it. Or, he may come back to it later and deepen it. The study of Krishnamurti seems infinitely subtle.

S: Yes. But he really was living on all of these levels simultaneously not because he's skipping from one to the other, but what he expressed sometimes seemed to have been about different realities.

M: Yes. He moved…it seemed he could operate on all of them.

S: He seemed to operate on all of them at once, which is also what, to me…well, one of the extraordinary things was how fascinating it was to watch Krishnaji do anything, even the most mundane thing.

M: Yes.

S: Getting his food from the school buffet…

M: Yes, how he would do it.

S: …or going for a walk…because there seemed…there were always intonations, there were all these hints of some vastly different consciousness that was at work.

M: Yes.

S: It's not that he was just picking up his salad. It was something…

M: Yes.

S: …which is why, I could've sat and just watched him, just watched him, all day. And I think there is this, it was almost as if Krishnaji was speaking a language which had different kinds of meanings.

M: Well, it did. It did.

S: Yes. And it had a very profound meaning; it had a surface level…

M: And he would take language, the computer, just working on, and rearrange its position, he would substitute a new word for an old word, but it really was the same thing he was talking about.

S: You know what also comes across whenever we talk about this kind of thing, something that strikes me, and almost it's like an ache of how alone Krishnaji was. He had no kind of soul mate; he had no real colleague that actually could journey with him…

M: Yes.

S: …wherever he went. And he seems often, in the things I read, to be calling for someone to go with him.

M: Well, he was calling…

S: And no one was capable.

M: …in the sense, he was looking, or at least he hoped we would find, someone. I think that he felt that with David Bohm, he'd gone as far as they both could go. But he used to say, there's more…

S: Yes.

M: And, I would say to him, "Krishnaji, couldn't you just talk?" And he said, "No. It takes, a kind of"…he didn't use the word stimulus, but…

S: …a resonance.

M: Yes, a process of having not only just a listener, an audience, but there's that communication, you know…we sit here opposite each other on either side of this kitchen table, and I know from your face if what I'm saying is registering, and similarly, he could tell, or so he said, what the other person was picking up. Therefore, he knew, had he explained it properly.

S: Yes.

M: He did this in talks. This he did tell me. He would find a face somewhere in the audience that seemed to be following, he could tell, and he would talk at that person, not necessarily just looking at him constantly and excluding the others…

S: No.

M: …but that was like a thermometer of the temperature of interest, or what he was saying was communicating to somebody; somebody was going with him. And he used to say, he used to say, "Does this interest you?" or "Do you understand?" or "Are you going with me?" He wanted that reciprocal response.

S: Yes.

M: Not that he had to have it, but it made it easier.

S: I think this is what Krishnaji also meant by dialogue.

M: Yes.

S: The other person that one is talking to forms a part—their listening, their understanding forms a part of what is expressed.

M: Yes, yes. That's probably why he would say to the audience it was dialogue, even though he was doing all the talking.

S: Yes, exactly.

M: But there was that sonar going out and coming back, which somehow paced his talking. In other words, if he had to go into it again, or that curious pattern of how he would go forward and then he would loop back part of the way, and then go a little forward, like endless figure eights on the side.

S: Yes.

M: And therefore, he also needed the challenge. He wanted someone to challenge him, which would make him dig deeper into his perception and his language to bring it out.

S: Yes, is this partly…it's not that Krishnaji didn't have the insights or the depth of perception without this, but to form this into an expression, to form these things into a communication, words, it needed someone who was listening, who was understanding, and he could test whether this communication worked or not. So, it's not as if Krishnaji needed…

M: Well, maybe we don't disagree about this, but I'd like to put that, it wasn't that he sat there and saw the whole distance of whatever it was infinitely into…who knows what. It was that in order to talk and have this…because he was communicating something, he had to get something back to tell whether he was communicating it adequately. But, at the same time, the challenge of questions made him look deeper. It wasn't that he was sitting seeing, you know, a whole ocean there; he had to go deeper into his power of perception to meet the challenge of a question, and what he brought out of that made it…it sort of stimulated another step.

S: Yes, yes.

M: It's, it's, uh…

S: This is very important because I've often thought that Krishnaji…and I'm convinced of it…that Krishnaji heralded in a new age, as the Buddha heralded in a new age.

M: Yes. I think so, too.

S: And part of this new age is the way in which one can find the ultimate truth. Whereas the Buddha seems to have done this through a solitary meditation, and then set up a teaching…

M: Steps…

S: Steps, but it's also a teacher and the students, and somehow the teacher would teach the disciple and so it was passed down. Whereas Krishnaji was really saying that this process we are trying to engage with, we're fumbling around with, which one can call dialogue or…but what was so extraordinary is that two people, neither of whom was enlightened, could—by this process of exploration that I feel Krishnaji demonstrated in every talk—by this process, they could come upon the ultimate truth.

M: Yes.

S: And that's unprecedented, as far as I know, in religious literature. And that's quite an extraordinary thing. And Krishnaji kept talking about this dialogue; I feel he kept demonstrating it and I feel also Krishnaji kept dropping whatever it was he had seen before, and it was always dropped, stopped…and…

M: He never wanted people to turn it into a process.

S: Yes.

M: Even when he was saying to negatively look at what's going on in you, don't try to look at what's out there. Nevertheless, people tend to say, "Oh yes, I must be aware." Well, people have no idea what he meant by awareness. I don't know what he meant by awareness, but I know from reading and talking and so forth, that it's infinitely deeper than just being aware of sitting in the kitchen, and flowers on the table, and I'm sitting here trying to think.

S: Yes.

M: Also, he seems to be calling for…I've been talking about mutation with Parchure and what Krishnaji meant by that, and Parchure has looked up what science has said causes mutation, to try to see what this thing is in outward life. In other words, scientifically, it's mostly medical, about the genes, all the genetic things they found and how that works. And the thing that Krishnaji's always said which is it's the constant change and flow, which is really of life. I mean, as we sit here, we're both changing, both organically in various ways and psychologically. And he was trying, I think, by all the ways that he spoke of awareness and watching and all these things, to bring people into that perception that thought is never the flow. In other words, the stuff of thought happened, it's over; it's a reflection of something that is by now static and over. And to bring people into a state where psychological change can occur, because the mutation is a psychological mutation, obviously. This is also why he was so interested in talking about the brain, and the repercussions of perception in the brain cells; and even into genetic change. He seemed to foresee all this way back before science caught up with all these things, that that is the evolution, not some step-by-step unfolding of human potential. I don't know what else to say. It's a psychological "going further." We've evolved physically over a period of whatever it is, but now what is required in order to survive, and it's part of the survival thing. The mutation that's possible and the next…what human beings should be doing is to mutate psychologically, which would be into this state of not being bound by conditioning, and all the level that we live at ninety-nine percent of the time, and which we perpetuate in a way, by thinking; because as we think and talk, we're adding more data into our brain cells, which is indeed, that's where the self lives, and the self wants to keep that going and resists the emptying, resists the something that threatens it.

S: Mm, hm.

M: I don't know. I may be doing a lot of interpreting here or this isn't too…?

S: No.

M: But you see, it's fascinating to read…read almost between his lines…

S: Yes.

M: …and not without interpreting, but seeing he says this, and that on that level is what he meant to say, but what else…the depth of these things.

S: Yes, yes.

M: People don't realize the extraordinary depth of what he was saying.

S: Yes.

M: Sometimes it sounds so simple, which is where people get hung up because they think it is simple. It isn't. It's immeasurable.

S: Yes. Let me come back to this, Mary, because this question that Krishnaji kept asking, why wasn't that boy ever conditioned? And then, tie that in with something else that Krishnaji said, which is that you only need one Thomas Edison to invent the light bulb.

M: Mm, hm.

S: And everyone after that only has to flip the switch.

M: Yes. (Chuckles.)

S: There is something about the role of Krishnaji and the fact that for whatever reason, and one can only suppose that they're otherworldly, he was not conditioned, and therefore could continue to speak out of this unconditioned state and communicate to all of us in our conditioned state from an unconditioned state.

M: Yes.

S: And that this communication, I'll call it from the unconditioned to the conditioned, this dialogic process, had the potential to foster or encourage or assist in this mutation. That he, well, one can't say he underwent that mutation, because it's almost as if he started off mutated! (Both laugh.) He called himself a freak often.

M: You can't mutate to something you already are.

S: Exactly. You have to be something to mutate from, yes.

M: Yes. It's two things.

S: Exactly, so I feel this ties back into this thing that started off this diversion here, which is Krishnaji being so interested in why "that boy" was never conditioned. Because it's not just curiosity…you know, "Oh, it would be nice to know why this boy was…"

M: No.

S: But, it is deeply related to something that is absolutely at the core of the teachings about this mutated brain. He might have been the Thomas Edison, and while we might be able to just flip the switch, we don't do it!

M: (chuckling) That's right.

S: So, it would seem that somehow whatever allowed him to be the Thomas Edison is probably directly related to our being able to flip the switch—this facility with electricity, or this facility to be unconditioned, or to have an empty mind. It seems that somehow, with all the teachings, with all that Krishnaji has said about desire, and love, and meditation, and death, and all of the…there is something extraordinary…about silence.

M: Yes.

S: And emptiness that Krishnaji keeps coming back to, and seems more important than everything else, almost.

M: Yes.

S: And it seems, this silence is directly related to the state of mind that Krishnaji spoke from. It seems also directly related to having no conditioning and to this dialogue process that he talked about so often.

M: Yes.

S: And while Krishnaji was talking about why wasn't this boy conditioned, he often, in almost the same sentence, would talk about how that young boy had such a vacant brain. So, it's related to that, too.

M: Yes, yes.

S: Somehow the vacancy is what perhaps contributed to his not being conditioned or…

M: Oh, yes!

S: …maybe it's a reflection of his not being conditioned. One doesn't know what comes first but…

M: It wasn't resistance to conditioning, because he didn't resist anything. He said it just went through him. You know, they told him all these things and the heavy conditioning of a Brahmin life at that point.

S: Yes, and Theosophy and…

M: And then Theosophy. And he went along with it, I mean, he was…

S: Mm, hm. Yes, he didn't rebel, or…

M: No. On the contrary he loved to go to the temple with his mother.

S: Mm, hm.

M: In fact, he went to temples by himself in Rishi Valley, there was some temple way up some mountain that he used to climb up and go to it. I think it was a deserted temple or something. So he didn't either embrace it or resist any of all this. The more, the more one ponders all this, both Krishnaji as a human being and his teachings, the more extraordinary both become.

S: Mm, hm.

M: It's just our shortsightedness that prevents us understanding all that or seeing it.

S: Yes.

M: But it's important, I think, to realize that, to know that. To never say, "Oh yes, this is, this is what he meant. I understand this."

S: Yes. Yes.

M: It's just like the light coming in this window. You can't say, "I've so much light now and I've got it."

S: Yes, yes.

M: It's alive; it's there.

Well, now, I guess we have gotten to the twenty-eighth of April, and Krishnaji went on dictating chapters of a book. You know, we mentioned that earlier. And then the dentist rang, and said that he would come and pull the teeth out here at Brockwood.

S: Good grief!

M: Yes. He wasn't coming that day, but that's what was said. And let's see, we went to Winchester, and bought some warm gloves, etc.

S: Where would you have gotten them in Winchester? At Jeeves and Hawks?

M: Oh, I know, there's a place that isn't there anymore. No, not at Jeeves, it had nice sweaters, those things Krishnaji liked that turn up at the collar and the long sleeves.

S: Ah, ha.

M: So that's where we went. And then we came back wandering around all the lanes, you know, behind Brockwood on the way back from Winchester.

S: Yes.

M: Krishnaji liked to do that and I loved it.

The next day, Krishnaji 'dictated another chapter. And we talked to Mary Cadogan and also to Mary Links about publications. Mary and Joe were to go to Venice the next day for a fortnight.' Also it says, 'In the p.m., Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I drove to pretty country beyond Petersfield and walked there.' Well, I now know exactly where that is because when I go over to see Christopher Fry I go on that road, and there's a field where we walked. I discovered it later on in going there, realizing that, "Oh yes, that's where we were."

S: Oh, how nice.

M: Because, at the time Dorothy was driving and I didn't really know where I was at the time.

For the thirtieth, it says, 'Nixon sends troops into Cambodia, and Krishnaji dictated another chapter and we went for a walk.'

On the first of May, 'Again Krishnaji dictated in the morning, and in the afternoon Mr. Campion and a nurse arrived and they set up their equipment in the guestroom. Campion pulled two of Krishnaji's lower left molars. They came out very easily. Krishnaji felt well enough to listen to a little of some Indian musicians who came to play for him at the school. He went to bed and had a liquid supper.' He had a terrible time with his teeth all the time. And as a dentist once said, they just wore out.

S: Yes.

M: The next day, 'Krishnaji was feeling fairly well, and he got up for lunch and came with me on errands to Petersfield, and we went for a walk.'

S: That must have been pretty unusual though, for the dentist to be making a house call.

M: I know, well this is, remember, many years ago. We're talking about 1970. [S laughs.] A different civilization! A different society! Medical people came to you if necessary [S laughs more]. No more!

On the third, he spoke to the students.

S: My goodness, after having two teeth out.

M: Yes. For the fourth, it says, 'it was a spring day at last,' so it must have been rather cold. [Chuckles.] 'There was a Saanen meeting in the morning. And we walked across the fields and down into the lanes, and started cleaning ivy off trees.' He was very intent on getting the ivy off the trees.

S: I know.

M: Yes, so there was a lot of ivy cutting. It still bothers me!

S: I know! It's one of my stories also because in later years when he and I were going out for walks, we'd clean the ivy off of the neighbors' trees…

M: [chuckling] I know.

S: …which is not necessarily something they wanted! [Both laugh.] So, at one point I asked Gary[2], who was then the principal gardener, to clean the ivy off some of the trees because it was too thick.

M: Yes.

S: Gary said, "Well, it doesn't hurt the trees at all, and it's good for butterflies" and I can't remember what else. When I reported this to Krishnaji, Krishnaji looked at me like I was absolutely crazy (M chuckles) and said, "Can't you see it's strangling the trees? Can't you see?" (M laughs) as if he had direct communication from the trees that they didn't like it; and what was I doing asking for scientific, biological, or horticultural advice when I could have just asked the trees?!

M: Yes.

S: And it made sense actually, but I remember thinking to myself [laughs]: I've done this completely backwards by trying to get the existing knowledge about this, rather than just looking at the tree and having an insight that, "Yes, of course the tree doesn't want this."

M: Well I, to this day, if I pass a tree and I think the ivy isn't too strong, if I can get a grip on the ivy and pull it off, I will.

S: Yes. Yes. [Both laugh.]

M: It makes sense!

S: Yes, it does make sense. I continue to do it, too.

On the fifth and sixth, I went to London, and Krishnaji came on the second day. 'Usual errands.' And, oh, 'we looked for raincoats in a place on Piccadilly called Cordings.'

S: Oh yes, of course.

M: Do you know that place?

S: Oh, yes!

M: 'Then to the L'Aperitif for lunch. Good lunch,' it says here. 'We bought books at Hatchards, sweaters at Peale's and W. Bill, and reached Mr. Campion at 4 o'clock.' You know, to see how the missing teeth place was. And it says here, 'On the train in the morning, we had a discussion of what is sacredness, and what freedom is to the sacred.' I'm afraid I don't remember the contents of that. 'Later Krishnaji had an idea to bring his Mercedes to England and sell mine in January.' But then he changed his mind because he didn't want to bring the little one.

Now we come to the eighth, and 'a student meeting and made a tape from it on education to be used in Finland at an educational conference in June.'

The next day, James Brodsky interviewed Krishnaji and stayed to lunch. Saral and David Bohm came for the weekend.

On the tenth, Krishnaji spoke to students in the morning. I talked to the Bohms and the Simmonses about trying to raise money by the English Foundation for a grant for Brockwood. Obviously, we didn't get it.

According to India, the eleventh was Krishnaji's seventy-fifth birthday. And it says here, 'as he brushes it away, no reference is made to it in the school. He dictated on the book in the morning. And he washed the Mercedes very thoroughly.' [Both chuckle.] 'I went for a walk alone as he'd had enough after the car washing." [Chuckles again.] That was his seventy-fifth birthday. [Both laugh.]

The next day we went to London and Huntsman for a fitting for each of us, and then to the dentist…

S: Huntsman is working very fast in those days if you're having two fittings within…

M: Yes. Within a month.

S: …two weeks.

M: Two weeks, yes. Well everything was different in those days. [S laughs.] You don't realize because you're so young that there's another era [both laugh], which I remember well. Now this is the day that Huntsman, I realized, wasn't going to do too well by me, and they realized that, too. So they gave me the name of a Mr. Hewitt who now no longer exists, and I went to him for a tweed skirt. [Chuckles.]

S: Was he just around the corner?

M: Yes.

S: Near Gieves and Hawkes?

M: He was up, well, in those days he was up the street on, um…what do you call it, the street? [Chuckles.] Anyway, Mr. Hewitt disappeared after a bit, but he was a nice round-faced man who made things nicely. Then we had lunch at the Aperitif and then went to Mr. Campion and Krishnaji had a bridge fitted while I went and cased the Friends Hall for parking because the talks were coming up. And then we drove home. Krishnaji drove from Guildford to Brockwood. In the evening, 'we watched on television a BBC film of the trial of Roger Casement and Krishnaji remembered it a little.' You probably don't know who Roger Casement was.

S: I don't.

M: He was an Irish patriot, very distinguished, bright, intelligent, quite remarkable man, and he was tried and I think executed for treason, for having favored the Germans in the First World War. Apparently there was tremendous feeling at the time because he wasn't a traitorous man; he was a very distinguished man, supposedly. But Krishnaji remembered the trial.

So, he spoke to students again on the fourteenth about, 'What is stupidity and what is prejudice? And in spite of the rain, he washed the Mercedes in the afternoon and then we went for a walk.' [Both chuckle.]

The next day, 'Krishnaji did a dictation for The Bulletin, on the functions and future of the Foundation and Brockwood.'

On the sixteenth, 'Krishnaji and I left at 11:30 a.m. and drove to London, taking a picnic lunch, which we ate in Richmond Park.' In those days we drove in quite a lot because it was possible to park. After eating, 'we went to Mrs. Bindley's at 2 p.m., and Krishnaji slept for an hour, and then he went to the Friends Hall where he gave the first of his London talks. The hall was just about full. We drove back to Brockwood easily; no traffic. It wasn't too tiring for him.'

The next day, 'there were some Dutch visitors, and Krishnaji discussed with them about a school.' For many years there were people from Holland who wanted to start a Krishnamurti School in Holland, but it never came to pass.

For the eighteenth, my diary says, 'House still full of Dutch people. Donald Hoppen returned from California. In the afternoon, there was the showing to the school of the first of the three parts of those NET 1966 talks,'—those first ones that were ever filmed of his talking—'and Krishnaji again washed the car!' [Chuckles.] 'A Miss,' something like, 'Tara McCarthy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation came and wants to do a taped interview of Krishnaji.'

On the nineteenth, 'Krishnaji dictated a statement for The Bulletin, the Dutch all left, and the house was quiet again. We walked across the fields and back by the lane. Again pruned ivy from the trees. I had a telephone from my father that his wife was dying, so I rang my brother in New York and asked him to fly over, and I will go.'

The next day, a Wednesday, 'Krishnaji and I drove to London and went to the Digbys, where Krishnaji rested and then, taking Nelly with us, we drove to the Friends Hall for his second London talk at 7 p.m.'

S: Yes, because the Digbys lived very near Mrs. Bindley.

M: Yes, just about three blocks away. It says here, 'the talk went wrong for him. He felt that the talk didn't get going. The answer period went better, but the audience was not good at all. We came back to the Digbys, and had supper. Krishnaji and I spent the night there.'

'We left the Digbys the next morning, picked up Mary Links. Krishnaji had an appointment with the dentist to have the bridge looked at, during which time Mary and I sat in the car and talked. When Krishnaji was finished, we took Mary to lunch at L'Aperitif, and then went on to Huntsman. After that we went to Hatchards for books, and Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt while I fetched my Air France ticket. Then we drove back to Brockwood, with Krishnaji driving from Gilford the rest of the way.'

Well, the next two days are not material to all this: I was in Paris visiting my father and very ill stepmother.

On the twenty-fifth, 'I flew back and when I got to Brockwood, it was a lovely warm day. Krishnaji had washed the car [chuckling], and we went for a stroll in the Grove.'[3]

Again, we went by car to London on the twenty-seventh, taking a picnic to eat in Richmond Park. Krishnaji rested at Mrs. Bindley's all afternoon. I went to tea with Mary Links and then came back and took Krishnaji to the Friends Hall for his third talk at 7 p.m., a very fine one this time. We had a quick picnic supper on Wimbledon Common in the car on the way home and arrived at Brockwood after 11 p.m., which was too late.

I went to London the next day to see my mother, and then went to a Publication Committee meeting at the Digby's.

On the thirtieth, Krishnaji and I left Brockwood at noon, had a sandwich lunch while driving, and reached Mrs. Bindley by 2 p.m. Krishnaji rested, and then we went to his fourth and final London talk in the Friends Hall, a very good one. Drove straight back to Brockwood.

On the thirty-first, there was an all-day trustee meeting with the Digbys, Hughes van der Straten, David Bohm, Dorothy Simmons, and me.

Krishnaji's hay fever began on the first of June, and he had to stay in that day, the next day, and the following day; but still gave an interview to a French woman from Pondicherry called Jannie Pinson.

On June fourth, Krishnaji and I had one of our lovely days in London. We went to Huntsman, then I went to Mr. Hewitt for my fitting, then to W. Bill for a cashmere turtleneck, and Demiel's for underwear. Then, as usual, we met Mary for lunch at L'Aperitif, and again to the dentist while I hunted for hay fever remedies! Then we went [chuckles]—this was fun—we went to Mallett at Bourdon Street, that's the antiquaire, where we saw a beautiful eighteenth-century Italian table and then in another shop on Davis Street, we saw three large pictures of trees made by needlepoint. They were hung over the stairs, and I remember he was behind me, and we were both looking up at these needlepoint trees, and he said, [mimicking in a whispery voice]"Oh, that's very nice," in that kind of a voice.

S: Yes.

M: And that's how we came to get the ones downstairs. Krishnaji felt well in London as his hay fever was less there. Anyway, we went back to Huntsman, and he gave me two scarves and then we went back by train.

On the fifth, Mary Links came down, and I met her at the early train. She interviewed Krishnaji for the biography, and I taped it and sat in. Later, Krishnaji chided me for not pursuing questions, and for trying to guess what he does or doesn't want to say, and editing my own questions. He seemed to be pushing us to inquire, though not stating himself what it was that was behind "the boy," and what, if any, power looked after him, etcetera. Mary stayed to lunch; we walked in the grove and saw the handkerchief tree and talked. Francis McCann arrived to stay, and the Digbys came for the weekend. Also, the Finnish ladies and Joan Wright are here. [Long pause.] All through this, my brother was with my father and he was talking about his life being over.

On the sixth, 'after lunch, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and Sebastian put two hives of bees, which arrived in cartons, into the new hives in the orchard. Krishnaji said later, "Now I feel this is a real place; it has bees."' [Both chuckle.] "Bees are a marvelous thing," he said. He used to take care of bees, as you know, in Ojai.

S: Yes.

M: Yes. So he felt very pleased with the bees. [Chuckles again.] 'At 4 o'clock, he held a discussion for about 200 people who were invited. It was held in the big room, and he talked mostly on violence. Afterward, he gave an interview to Mrs. Zarick. I talked to Sybil Dobson and the Digbys about The Bulletin. Supper was served out on the lawn. It was a cloudless, hot day.'

On the seventh, 'Krishnaji held a second group discussion in the big room. It was videotaped, but the picture was faulty. We had a picnic lunch on the lawn afterwards. It was a very hot day.'

The next day, 'in spite of his hay fever, Krishnaji went for a walk. It was very hot.'

Here's something on the ninth: 'Krishnaji said there was a different something in meditation in what would have been described in old terminology as an initiation.'

S: A different something?

M: I don't know what that means. I don't remember. Alas, I wasn't keeping proper extensive notes at this point. But we're getting into July, when I did.

The next day is the tenth, and I went hunting for furniture with Paul Anstee in London, on the Fulham Road. That was always fun; we'd wander down the Fulham Road and go into all the antique stores. And also, we went to the Antique Dealers' Fair, and I lunched at Cranks. Then I took Krishnaji's trousers to Huntsman.

The next day was less hot, so Krishnaji washed the car! [Both chuckle.]

The twelfth of June, oh, this is a nice day! 'After lunch, Krishnaji and I drove to the Traverses' for tea, but got caught in a cloud burst outside Dorking. The car stalled for over half an hour. We finally got there. Ginny and Bill were there with the four children; we had tea.' Well, I could tell this, so I don't have to read it. I'd heard from Ginny Travers that…shall I explain who the Traverses are for posterity?

S: Yes.

M: Well, the Traverses are Virginia McKenna and her husband Bill Travers, both actors. I've known them for many years, since they both acted in a picture that Sam did many years ago in London. And they have lived near Dorking with their children, and they made the film in Africa called Born Free, about Elsa the lioness who was taught to be free. So they, as a result, have a passionate interest in not only lions, but all animals, which has become almost a career with both of them. And some of their children, too, later on, but this is back in 1970. Apparently what had happened was that they were in London one day walking down the Kings Road, and Ginny went into some store for clothing or something, and Bill wandered into an antique store. There was a young man who was there, the salesman, who recognized him, and said, "Mr. Travers, I think I have something that would interest you in the back." So Bill went into the back expecting to see a table or a desk or something, instead of which he saw a young lion, a young male lion. Bill said, "Where did you get him?" The young man replied, "Harrods." It seems that at Christmas time in those days…

S: Yes, yes, yes, I remember.

M: …maybe today, Harrods would have all sorts of exotic, odd things to sell to customers, including this lion cub. This young man was so horrified by this that he bought the lion cub and raised it, but by now it was getting pretty big, and it was getting difficult to keep in the back of an antique store on the Kings Road in London. Apparently, Bill asked, "How do you manage it?" And the young man said, "Well, there's the vicar of a church down the Kings Road, who allows me to bring it at night time to the graveyard so I can exercise it." [Both laugh.] Well, as a result of this, Bill and Ginny took over the lion's fate and they had it at their place near Dorking, which is where Krishnaji and I went on this day, the twelfth of June, to see the lion. And indeed we did. We went out in the back and they had in the garden an enclosure with a high wire fence, and there was this young male lion. It had a great big rubber tire as a sort of plaything. Krishnaji immediately wanted to go in and touch the lion, but both Ginny and Bill said, "No, I think not." Ginny said, "We can go in because he's used to us, but we'd rather you didn't." So, we stayed outside. Bill went in and fed it. And indeed, I could see why they were so careful because one of their younger children, who was about four years old, came trotting along and outside the fence with us, and the lion looked and immediately began to stalk it from inside.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And the parents said, "You see, they think that humans, because we're taller than they are, get some respect, but a small child is prey in the lion's mind."

Anyway, Krishnaji was delighted by seeing that. 'After seeing all that, we drove home via Billingshurst, Petworth, Midhurst, and Petersfield. Krishnaji's hay fever was better in the rainstorm, but Brockwood is still in a month's drought, and he coughed a great deal in the night. It has moved into his bronchial tubes a bit.'

On the weekend of the thirteenth and fourteenth, 'the Digbys came for the weekend. We rang the doctor, Mr. McGowan, for a new remedy for the hay fever. In the afternoon, Krishnaji had the third group discussion, which was videotaped. The big room was full.' Where are these tapes?

S: No idea.

M: The next day, he held the fourth Brockwood discussion. Narasimhan came for lunch, and we ate it in the West Wing. We went for a short walk. Later [pause], Krishnaji asked if I might carry on the work when he is gone: "You have listened to all this."

The fifteenth of June was spent in 'Krishnaji giving an interview in color for the BBC television. He was questioned by Oliver Hunkin, head of the religious department of the BBC, and a Miss Shirley du Boulay was the producer of the show.' I remember that; it was in the drawing room.

On the seventeenth, 'we went to London for Huntsman and then the dentist for Krishnaji's bridge to be adjusted. Then we lunched with Mary at her flat, and continued the discussion of Krishnaji's early life for the biography. The Uher'—that was my tape recorder in those days—'didn't work, so I took notes. Krishnaji felt tired on the train back and quite sick when we got home. He coughed a lot, and though he was without fever, he became somewhat delirious. And he said, "He shouldn't have gone to town. Who's looking after him? He's left the body. No, no, not that."'

S: Can we talk for a minute about Krishnaji's, what we have called, "going off"?

M: Yes, "going off." You see, he wasn't well that day, and he'd done too much. When he first told me about the "going off" thing, he said, "If I have fever this may happen."

S: There's an interesting and an unexpected correlation here, because this "going off," which was associated originally with some spiritual or some religious process, and at the same time it could occur because of an illness.

M: Yes. When it happened to me in Gstaad, it was a fever when he left, you know, "Krishna's gone away."

S: Yes. It's unusual in any case, but something spiritual is not normally thought of as being brought on by an illness.

M: Yes, but remember the fainting, when he told us about the fainting…

S: Yeah.

M: …and not to be worried. That often happened after some physical strain, either being tired…

S: Stressed. Yes.

M: …or stressed or when he had that cyst in his mouth, I think we went into that, and he fainted in the car coming home…

S: Yes.

M: …three times, I think. And Krishnaji said it was like violence to the body: apparently illness or fever, particularly fever. The time in Gstaad he said, "If I…if my fever goes up…"

S: It's really as if this leaving the body was so ready to happen, that the slightest excuse, the body couldn't hold this…

M: When the body was under great stress, and in the hospital it happened, too. See, when the body was under stress from either operation or fever or a slight, even…

S: Mm, hm.

M: …thing in his lip, Krishna would leave the body. Krishna would go away. And the little creature that was left…

S: The little person…

M: Yes. I don't remember that it was a child's voice, this time. You see, he went by train that day; and then he went to Huntsman, and then the dentist, and then the lunch with Mary, the discussion, and he was tired on the train and sick when we got home. He coughed a lot. It says here 'without fever, he became somewhat delirious. He said, "He shouldn't have gone to town. Who was looking after him?"' He's left the body. And then he said, '"No, no, not that."' I don't know what that refers to.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And the fainting, he later explained, was a kind of leaving the body to rest something.

S: To rest something?

M: Yes. He didn't say that, it's not a quote, but that was…and once he fainted after arriving on a plane from London; in the apartment he fainted.

S: In what apartment?

M: It was the apartment that I took in New York. We passed that, I don't think I mentioned it. He fainted in the apartment I took on 62nd Street. And yes, we came in from the airport, and I was showing him his room and so forth, and he fainted. It was fatigue, in a way. But he would only faint when he was with people he trusted. He wouldn't faint in public.[4]

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, we finally got there, and I took him in a sort of back room, the main room, and showed him where it was and ah, he was standing by the window and fainted.

S: Did he fall on the floor or…?

M: [in a whispering voice] Yes. He fell on the floor. I wasn't quick enough to catch him. I'd turned away or something. That time, I was not warned. Every other time I've…something has always warned me.

S: Has warned you?

M: Yes. But it's some relief from some kind of strain.

S: So it's healing in some way?

M: Yes.

S: Would you imagine that Krishna going away, when he comes back he somehow is stronger or he, ah…?

M: I don't know. I can't make even an imagination of what that is.

S: But it is healing?

M: It seemed to be, yes. It's as though from time to time…well, again, this is such speculation, that as though he needed to be away from the body, and perhaps when these things happen to him in sleep, it's that happening, you know these strange sort of meditation things, where…I don't know. That's all just speculation.

S: There's in some of the early process things, it's as if [pause] when Krishna is away from the body, other powers are doing something to the body.

M: Yes.

S: They're doing something to the brain, they're doing some…

M: Yes. It's to spare "Krishna" that.

S: It's to spare Krishna that. So, in a way, one could also say that that would then tie it in with this illness because if Krishna is away while the body is not well, and the body is healed by whatever, then Krishna comes back. Then there's an equation between the illness and the spiritual realm.

M: Mm, hm. Maybe. We must be careful not to try to fit it into something.

S: No we mustn't, I agree. But at the same time, one has to say all these things because people in the future will speculate. So, we can say what we know and…

M: Well, we're speculating now; we don't know, really, what happened. We can only say…we can describe what happened and what was said.

S: Right.

M: Those are the only facts.

S: Yes, but we can say something like, that Krishnaji would be stronger afterwards or would be healed slightly, and that is something that is significant.

M: Yes, it…I, and again this may be just me, but I feel that the faintings in the car, when they happened, especially the one after Paris that first time, it was like…it, it was a rest.

S: Mm, hm.

M: A rest and therefore restorative.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: It's like a kind of…

S: Relief?

M: Relief, yes. But that…who knows.

S: Yes.

M: The next day, the eighteenth, 'Krishnaji was shaky and weak at first, but he stayed in bed all day, but felt better after lunch. He read and watched television. I put Kaolin poultices on his chest. The new blue sofa came for the drawing room, and so did the needlework trees. My stepmother was in a coma in Paris.'

On the nineteenth, 'Krishnaji stayed in bed all day and had poultices again and rested. But he was coughing less by then.'

The next day, 'he remained in bed till 4 o'clock when there was a discussion in the big room. He's weak but much better. It was another warm day, and there was a picnic supper on the lawn.'

On the twenty-first, 'he held the sixth discussion at Brockwood, but he stayed in bed otherwise.'

On the twenty-second, 'I went to London for furniture, but Krishnaji stayed in.' Then there's nothing much for a while as I had to fly off to Paris. So perhaps, we should end here.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Shiva Rao had been part of the circle of people around Krishnaji since at least the early 20s, in the days of Theosophy.

[2] Gary Primrose was head gardener at Brockwood for many years.

[3] The Grove is a one-acre ornamental grove at Brockwood with spectacular rhododendron and azalea bushes and redwood trees.

[4] As strange as this may seem, I heard about this several times, and it is as if there was something protecting him from fainting at times that would be dangerous or deleterious to him.

Issue 15: June 1970 to August 1970

This issue is the first time we see the effects of what Mary called "the big books"—the large page diaries she periodically kept which allowed her to write as much as she wanted about any day. We have more direct quotes from Krishnaji, and more details of her daily observations of Krishnaji.

Consequently, although there are the customary twenty-some pages of material in this issue, it only covers just over two months.

Mary provides an interesting description of the infectious nature of Krishnaji's enjoyment of things, which was such a large part of the time Krishnaji and Mary spent together.

Mary: So, from the twentieth of June, which is where we left off, until the twenty-fourth, there is nothing much to report. And even on the twenty-fourth, there's nothing about Krishnaji (except, of course, he was giving interviews), but I flew on that day to Paris to see my father. His wife, my stepmother, was very unwell and in the hospital. Bud had flown there from New York. I returned to Brockwood on the twenty-fifth.

The first notable thing we did was on the twenty-seventh, when 'we drove over to Blackdown and had tea with Mary and Joe. We took a walk and had a lovely time. "Let's enjoy ourselves," said Krishnaji.' [Both chuckle.] 'And we did. We had fun.' He was so quick to enjoy things, when things were nice and enjoyable, he entered into it with such relish…not relish, it's the wrong word, that sounds…

Scott: …with such ease and such speed.

M: Yes, and such a kind of childlike—I keep using this word childlike for a man who was so far from childhood—and yet he still had that lovely quality of openness and entering so easily and quickly into anything nice that happened.

S: Yes. That's true.

M: It made one want him to be pleased…

S: Yes.

M: …because seeing him enjoy something was really such a selfish pleasure for me.

S: Mm, hm.

M: A delight.

S: I completely understand that. Yes.

M: One had that joy also because of his reactions.

S: Exactly: We could enter into it, too, because of him.

M: Yes.

S: Whereas otherwise, I…what is it? We become so blasé, or so jaded, or…

M: Exactly.

S: …so complicated and…

M: Yes.

S: …all those things that Krishnaji wasn't and I guess we wish we weren't.

M: He sort of swept one along into his joy without meaning to.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, one shared that kind of wonder and enjoyment.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Yes.

So, on June thirtieth, 'we left Brockwood and drove to Hastings, and then to Lydd, where we flew the car across to Le Touquet in France, as we had before. Krishnaji drove about halfway there.'

S: To Hastings?

M: To Lydd, yes. 'We went on a little further to Montreuil,' where we had stayed a number of times, 'and stopped at the Château de Montreuil,' which was a very nice hotel, a château made into a small hotel. It's right on the sea with battlements in front of it.

S: How nice.

M: 'We walked along the battlements before supper with the sea wind blowing in. It was lovely. We had a pleasant supper in the dining room,' and that was it. 'We'd driven 141 miles,' it says here. [Both chuckle.]

'We left the next morning,' the first of July, 'and went via Arras to the autoroute and reached Paris at about 1 p.m. We lunched at the Tour d'Argent with my father.'

S: Oh, so Krishnaji lunched with your father there also?

M: Yes.

S: What did your father think of Krishnaji?

M: I don't know. Father didn't ever say, but he appreciated Krishnaji's presence, his grace, his beautiful taste in clothes, his manners, and all that. Beyond that, he didn't know what it was about.

S: Of course.

M: But, he liked him. My father wasn't a very expressive man. If he didn't like someone, he clammed up, but he was impressed [with Krishnaji], obviously not knowing how much there was to be impressed about. But he took it for granted that he was someone very distinguished, very remarkable.

S: Hm.

M: So, 'we left Paris, and went to the hotel Bas Bréau in Barbizon,' where we'd stayed before. 'We had the same rooms as before, which was very nice.' It was a little upstairs in another building. It was very quiet. 'We went for a walk in the forest and had dinner up in the rooms.' You could have meals brought, which was nice.

The next day, 'we left Barbizon and drove to Sens, where we took the little tiny yellow roads on the maps,' those small country roads…

S: Yes.

M: '…and wound our way. We went to Troyes, and beyond Troyes we lunched at the Hostellerie Pont in Pont Sainte-Marie. We went on towards Chaumont and finally came to Prangey, where we had rooms in the Château de Prangey,' which wasn't so good. 'The food wasn't too good'; we didn't like that too much. I got all these things out of the Michelin.

S: Of course.

M: But that was one of the few ones that didn't turn out well. 'We went on' the next morning, the third, 'through Dijon, Dole, Poligny, and Champagnole, where we lunch nicely at the Grand Hotel Ripotot.' Have you ever been there?

S: No. [M giggles.] Champagnole, yes, but not the Grand Hotel Ripotot.

M: Yes. 'And then on via Saint-Cergues,' you know, you go over the pass.

S: Right.

M: 'Down to Nyon and to Geneva, and to good old Hotel du Rhône.'

S: Yes! [Chuckling.]

M: 'We're both pleased to be in Switzerland and in Geneva' and naturally, the minute we were into the hotel, we left our things, and we went to, guess where?

S: [laughing] Patek Philippe.

M: Patek Philippe!

S: Of course.

M: 'We left my wristwatch and both K's montre de poche to be cleaned,' and then went where?

S: To Jacquet.

M: Yes, of course! [Both laugh.] You know your lines! 'And we chose fine neckties to be made, and we spoke to Vanda, who was already in Gstaad.'

The next day, the fourth, 'Krishnaji stayed in bed all morning, and I went out on errands. In the afternoon, Narasimhan…' you know who I mean by Narasimhan?

S: Yes, you mentioned him before.

M: He usually was in New York at the UN. He's also a cousin of Mrs. Jayalakshmi's, comes from Madras, same family. 'We visited with him for a while, and then drove to Gstaad.'

S: Which way did you go?

M: Let me see if it says…it doesn't say. But I'm sure we went along the lake; I think we went up via Bulle. In those days we always went that way. And arrived at Chalet Tannegg. 'Vanda was there, also Fosca, and a maid called Olga.' So we were well looked after.

The next few days were quiet: 'Krishnaji stayed in bed most of the time. Sacha de Manziarly came to lunch, and for that Krishnaji came to the table' because he was fond of Sacha. Sacha told him stories and made him laugh and that was very nice.

'Unfortunately, Krishnaji was having hay fever trouble. They were tossing the hay in the fields, and that got to him, as it always did.'

On the tenth, 'Vanda left for Florence. Krishnaji and I drove my Mercedes to Thun and had just a lovely drive. We picnicked at the edge of the lake, which was fun.' Swans used to come in and beg for food. And it was fun to see them with their baleful eyes, but lovely, long, graceful necks.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Then we went back to the garage, by which time Krishnaji's Mercedes was ready, and we drove back to Gstaad.'

On the thirteenth, 'Krishnaji was feeling quite a bit better, and he got up for lunch with Marcelle de Manziarly. We went for a walk along the Turbach River in the afternoon. Vanda telephoned from Florence about Krishnaji's speaking in Italy in October; some talks in Perugia and some in Firenze.' He was asked to speak there and she arranged it. 'Krishnaji spoke after lunch to Herri and Hilda Moorhead[1], and he talked about India a lot with them, and who can carry on the teachings in the school and see that they're followed and taught. Also, and if money becomes available from KWINC for the Indian schools, who is to see to that and see that it's used for the teachings and not used for buying tractors, etcetera?' [Laughs.] 'He also asked, "Who has the teachings at heart?" They had no answer. "All the old Foundation for New Education, that is the present KF India, is mostly old followers who don't want any interference, even by me. They care about the status of it and little else." The Moorheads pointed out something about the Krishnamurti Centre in Madras, and The Bulletin, and Krishnaji got quite upset. He wanted to revise the text of his statement, but I pointed out that the omission in the statement was because of his talking of all three foundations and not all the allied committees.' I don't know quite what that's about. I don't remember it.

'We went for a walk up the hill toward Turbach where the river has again tried to wash out the road, and the burly Swiss workmen were slowly and skillfully repairing it.'

'In the evening, Krishnaji suddenly said to me, "Make a note of it. I've been talking in India, spending more time there than anywhere else, and there is not one person who listens and has changed. It is terribly difficult for people to change. They are what they are. When I die, it will be over. I thought Naudé might have done something, but he wasn't ready. What will happen to you? People aren't serious. Are you serious? I've been talking over forty years, and I'd be a damned fool if I didn't realize people are as they are. I'm not depressed by it, I'll go on talking." It was a kind of…I don't like the word frustration about Krishnaji, but he felt that people were all busy there, but it wasn't…the teachings were somehow, I don't know what, taken for granted, as it were.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, the next day, the fourteenth, 'Krishnaji wanted to go for a drive and we took the Mercedes, stopping at the Biascoecheas. We went past the tent and on to Château d'Oex and Les Moulins. Krishnaji said he was nervous in the car. I don't know why. We came back and had lunch at Tannegg alone. I spoke to the doctor in London about his health and also to Mr. Moser about the cost of another 280 Mercedes next year, if we could put the present one in trade. Krishnaji gave interviews…' if you want to hear about all that.

S: Yes. Mary, just read it. It's so powerful to read what you wrote at that time.

M: Really?

S: Yes, really.

M: Huh? But, it's full of stuff…

S: No, that doesn't matter, Mary.

M: Alright. 'Krishnaji gave interviews to Mrs. Semmel. Her husband, Doctor Semmel, died a few weeks ago. We went for a walk toward Turbach. Krishnaji asked what will happen to me when he dies. He said that it depends on what I do and am now, i.e., the changes in me. He asked me if I felt any presence of Sam after he died. I said yes. We discussed what is evidence and what is imagination. I said I felt it strongly but neither saw objectively nor heard anything. It was a strong sense of presence and communication, real to me, but I cannot offer it as objective evidence to another. Krishnaji said to me, "You can tell the difference between imagination and a something." He wished he could remember how it was when his brother died. I asked how one can assess such things. I don't assert anything because I cannot see how it can be proven. But I pay attention and do not deny any part of it. I spoke of the conversation with Vanda last week: her saying that neither she nor I have theosophical conditioning and therefore her experience of being spoken to when Krishnaji was unconscious and the words spoken to me when Krishnaji was sick on June seventeenth…"—that was when he said he shouldn't have gone to town, who was looking after him—"…were not out of our projection."' That's what Vanda felt.

Krishnaji then spoke of change and listening, i.e., '"if you really listen and see, that erases the habit, the previous imprint. The new then functions in the mind and whenever an action of the old pattern arises the mind alerts the consciousness, the conscious attention." He spoke of my bad habit of frowning, and the need for "a quiet face"'—he always used to say to me, "Have a quiet face"—'remains because I haven't seen the importance of changing them. If I had, the old pattern would be erased, he said. He said, "The body sometimes takes time to relearn, but the mind can be instantly alert, therefore, to listen, to see, to change, to wipe out the old pattern. Lack of change is inattention," he said. "What is listening? Make a note. I will talk about that."'

On July fifteenth, 'The weather is suddenly cold and rainy. It was a quiet day, and I did desk work. We ate lunch alone. In the afternoon, I did errands, went to the tent and to the camping site to greet the Simmonses. After a walk alone, I talked to Vanda in Firenze about Krishnaji's Italian schedule.'

On the next day, 'it was snowing early. I drove Krishnaji to the tent for his first talk of the year. There were many people, and it was a good talk. The Simmonses came to lunch. We walked in the afternoon. I felt a little light-headed. Donald Hoppen had arrived from Brockwood and he spent the night here, and will look for a place of his own.'

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji spent the whole day in bed resting and reading. I had a good day's work at the desk. It is still cold with thick clouds. I went down to do errands in the afternoon, and ran into Fabienne van der Straten and Donald, who came with me for a walk.'

The next day, 'I took Donald to a chalet where he has taken a room up the mountain above Saanen and near Chalet Helios, where Brockwood people are staying. I visited there. Krishnaji and I went to the Biascoecheas' for lunch. Krishnaji asked Enrique to tell me about the dreams he had before Krishnaji was found as a boy. In Enrique's dream, Mrs. Besant appeared with a young Indian and said, "This is the world teacher-to-be." The dream was so strong that Enrique, who was speaking at a Theosophical meeting, announced that a boy had been found before he knew it officially.'

S: Hm!

M: [Chuckles] '"What was he like when you saw him?" Krishnaji kept asking. But Enrique was only able to discuss what he himself felt and not what the boy was like, except that he was very warm and friendly. "Write it down, sir," said Krishnaji. I asked later, would it be interesting for Mary's biography? At 4:15 p.m., Krishnaji saw Gisela Elmenhorst's sister's son, Andreas, who is retarded due to an injury in childhood. Krishnaji came out and asked Gisela, who was talking to me, "What do you want to do? Are you asking me to try to heal him?"

"We ask nothing", she said, "only perhaps my sister would like any advice you would be willing to give her."

Krishnaji explained about healing which sometimes works and sometimes doesn't. He looked from one of us to the other, and we were silent. And then he said he would do it. The boy must come each day for a week. Gisela was almost in tears. He went back, and saw the boy.'

On the nineteenth, 'it was another beautiful day and it was Krishnaji's second talk in the tent. Herr Graf had water trickling down the exterior of the tent to cool it, but the tape recorder picked up the sound of it, so the water had to be turned off. Krishnaji spoke on freedom, authority, compassion, and the basis of fear. In response to a question, "Is it possible to learn all the time?" he said, "You block yourself in such a question. If you are watching, there is nothing to learn."

People swarmed around him afterwards. One of the hippies, bearded, barefoot, in jeans and a skivvy top, was wearing a pistol and walked out before the end.' I remember that.

'Krishnaji wanted to drive before going back to Tannegg and we went toward Lauenen. The snow on the mountains at the end of the valley was marvelous. At Tannegg, he saw the boy, Andreas, and then a Doctor Sinai, a German woman in a white sari, sent by Vanda, as she was in charge of the conference in Florence, at the end of which Krishnaji will give a talk on October twenty-ninth. We stressed that he is not to be part of the conference, which is on science and meditation and has Western doctors, etc. Also Gopi Krishna and Swami Chidananda,' and somebody else. 'Vanda is hiring a hall for Krishnaji separately. We lunched quietly alone, and I, too, took a nap afterward. Krishnaji will not go to Geneva Tuesday if Narasimhan calls with Mercedes news!' [Chuckling.] 'It is too much for him.' Narasimhan was looking into the possibilities of getting another Mercedes, what the facts were about it.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'But he doesn't want me to go alone. He suggested Dorothy going with me, and we went to ask her in the camping[2]. She was out, so we went for a walk along the river by the airfield. Krishnaji said he didn't want to walk far as he was tired, but he kept saying, "Further," and we walked to the end and back, which was too far. My leg was protesting; he looked tired. We saw Dorothy on the way back. Krishnaji seemed full of energy in spite of being tired.' Do you want me to go on?

S: Oh, this is wonderful!

M: Alright, so, the twentieth, let's see. 'A rainy day. Joan Wright fitted two dressing gowns for Krishnaji. I went on errands while Krishnaji saw the boy, Andreas. Frances McCann came for lunch. She says that Krishnaji's audiences are no longer welcome in Gstaad. Krishnaji attracts hippies.'[3] [Chuckles.]

'Krishnaji and I went for a walk in the rain down behind Gstaad. He had me make mental notes that "Creation is never conflict," and later that "You all don't make use of me enough." I asked if he meant we didn't ask the right questions. He said, "Partly. It's all so vast. You are not serious enough."'

'Narasimhan rang from Geneva with Mercedes lore. It is unnecessary that I go there tomorrow. He will send all the information and suggested I ship my car to New York, where he will sell it, then order through him, getting 10 percent off on the diplomatic discount! [Chuckles.] Krishnaji was very pleased.' We didn't do that, but that was the suggestion. [Both chuckle.]

On the twenty-first, 'Krishnaji gave his third talk in the tent. A very good one on inner real revolution, the dangers of analysis, time, and postponement. The Lilliefelts were there, having arrived early by car from Spiez, Frankfurt, and California. They came up for lunch and we asked Señor Fresia too. After the latter left, Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, and I caught up on all the news. A letter came from James Vigeveno in the usual vein i.e., "it is a personal matter between Krishnaji and Rajagopal," the usual threats, etc. Krishnaji refused to touch it. He made me open it. When I began to read it to him, he stopped me and made me jump to just tell him the gist.' He didn't like to touch or be too close to these things that he found soiled and dirty and somehow evil.

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘I read most of it to him over his expostulations as he should know. Each of these letters has seemed something unclean to him. He would not touch or look at them. He gave it to the Lilliefelts to read. A meeting of lawyers is now set for the sixth of August. The summary of a settlement offer is due here any day. Harper & Row are eager to do the books. Urgency of Change is coming out in time for Christmas, so they want the talks from 1969 on and are trying to buy up ones Servire[4] have. Mr. Cutler’—that must have been the man at Harper—‘is very enthusiastic. The Lilliefelts are staying at The Rössli.’ That’s a hotel. ‘Krishnaji invited them to stay downstairs when Vanda is not here. They will think it over.’

‘Krishnaji had walked down the hill before lunch, so we went for a drive in his car toward Les Mosses. I talked of the hippies to Graf, who says the locals wouldn’t rent a barn to Krishnamurti people because the hippies come and behave amorously near the tent [S laughs], next to the children’s encampment!’ [Both laugh.] I don’t quite know how far that went, but that’s what it says. ‘Krishnaji sent Graf to see Mr. Mueller to find out if the community is really becoming hostile. Krishnaji decided to hold discussions with the young people in the tent. Older people could sit silently in the back if they want.’

‘He spoke of a quiet mind.’ I’m having trouble with my eyes.

S: Let me turn on this light, too.

M: Yes, that’s better. ‘I discussed the endless serving up of thoughts and images that is all trivia. If one widens the scope, like looking from one’s finger to the wide valley, it is still an act of the conscious mind and will, and not very different.’ I don’t know what that means. ‘Then, attention to inattention can become a succession of images. As I spoke I find myself saying that a different sense comes about when there is great physical quiet in that there is almost a detachment from the body, a different quality of mind. Krishnaji said, “Try to act from emptiness. Find out what it is and do that. It is the way one should live.”’

S: Hm.

M: Throughout his life the emptiness has been the most dominant quality.

S: I know.

M: Both for him, naturally, and to try to convey that to us.

S: Yes.

M: On the twenty-second of July, there was ‘a meeting at Chalet Choucas of all the committees. The Lilliefelts were there and later came to lunch. Suzanne and Hughes came too. After his nap, Krishnaji walked down the hill, did some small errands in the village, and picked up his car, which was washed. Later Krishnaji said, “You must be transformed in every way inside and out.”’

‘The fourth talk,’ on the twenty-third, ‘was a very good one. He spoke about the only change being the inner one. Solutions to fragmentary problems only create new difficulties. Biascoecheas, Sendra, and a lawyer from Puerto Rico named Farias.’ Oh, he was an awful man! He was a Puerto Rican lawyer, but a rough man, not very nice. ‘Krishnaji tried to question Sendra about his trip to South America for the Krishnamurti teachings, but couldn’t get him to understand his questions.’ Sendra used to go off, claiming to represent Krishnamurti all over South America giving lectures, usually talking to Theosophists.

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘Krishnaji met a group of the Spanish-speaking people who admit that most of the Spanish people who come to Saanen come to see Krishnaji, not because they can understand what he says. The day was hot, so we went for a drive in his car to the Col du Pillon and back by the Col des Mosses.’

On the twenty-fourth, ‘Krishnaji held a young people’s discussion at 10:30 a.m. in the tent. Others could attend but could not speak. It was almost as full as for the talks. Very good on Krishnaji’s part. The slight initial aggression in questions evaporated. We drove a little afterward, but it was too hot. Had a quiet lunch. Ortolani came for coffee, bringing a present for Krishnaji of a jersey shirt from a French woman. He examined it very carefully with the absorption of a child and liked it. Put it on; it looked very nice.’ [Chuckles.]

‘Later, we went over the hill, along the river and saw a machine clawing enormous rocks from the river. Ran into Mr. and Mrs. Graf. He has got a tent as shelter for the hippies to camp in.’

‘Krishnaji asked me what I would do if he died. I asked what he would want me to do, but he wouldn’t say. Later, he came back to it again, saying how he lives between life and death—it has always been a very thin line for him. Sometimes he feels like disappearing. I asked if he meant dying. He said, “No, no,” just going off where nobody knows him. He said he had often told me that talking is necessary in what he is supposed to do. Could living quietly, remotely and just writing be sufficient? And he said, “No.”’

On the twenty-fifth of July, ‘Krishnaji weighs only fifty kilos on the scale, but looks less thin and is full of energy. This morning he had me telephone Mr. Moser in Geneva about a Mercedes. He thinks it’s too complicated to ship mine to New York as suggested by Narasimhan, as it involves getting it to the port, finding an agent, insurance, etcetera. So we are back to plan A, which is to order a new 280 SE 3.5. This took the whole morning. So, he polished shoes with a fury,’ [laughs] ‘and had his bath as the Simmonses and Lilliefelts arrived for lunch. He went merrily off down the hill for his walk. I fetched Donald and a dessert, and then we went back for Krishnaji. Erna and Theo had a baptism of fire about Brockwood as Dorothy described some of the behavior of the students before she left. Her worries over the girls here in Gstaad is because of the hippies.’ She was afraid the girls would get mixed up with the hippies. ‘I talked to Erna and Theo while Krishnaji napped. They left and then Krishnaji and I did some errands and then for a walk up over the hill. The weather has turned cold again.'

The twenty-sixth: 'A cool day. Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen talk, an absorbing, very clear one on fear and pleasure. To be caught in them is the bourgeois mind, or rather "the essence of the bourgeois mind is pleasure and fear." When you are aware of yourself, see the action in you, what happens? There is a greater sensitivity. You don't suppress or reject it; you see. The sensitivity sees joy, enjoyment, which is different from pleasure.' Is this making sense?

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: 'Madame Welser'…oh, she was a French woman who had multiple sclerosis. She 'came, as did Frasier and Dorothy, for treatment. Then, Nadia and her husband Nicolas Kossiakof.' Did you know Nadia Kossiakof? She was an Egyptian woman with…

S: Yes!

M: …enormous turquoise eyes.

S: Yes, yes, yes.

M: Dark hair, very portly.

S: Yes, I did.

M: And she was married to a Russian, Nicolas Kossiakof, who was a journalist. Very bright man. She used to handle the French publications. 'Also, Marcelle Bondoneau came for lunch. Krishnaji stayed talking till 2:30 p.m. Nadia spoke of seeing Radha and Jim Sloss. This prompted him to speak a little about the Rajagopal situation.'

'Mary Cadogan had an appointment to see him at 4:15 p.m. I fetched her and sat in. The problems of Miss Keller.' Miss Keller was a Swiss lady on the committee who didn't like Graf. They couldn't work together. And it says here, 'she sounds highly neurotic. Various other matters. Then, Mary brought up reactions to Krishnaji's talks and discussions and the feeling some people have that they can't get through to him. Krishnaji listened and examined it and said, "The speaker also feels you are not coming to him with great buckets, etcetera. He says, 'Please take anything you want,' and you say, 'Here, give us a little bit of that.' He doesn't want to push. He can pour, pour when you say, 'That is not enough,' then he can pour. He, the speaker, he says, 'Alright, I'll give you…you know?'"

'It was decided to hold smaller, daily, more intense discussions at Brockwood. I took Mary back to Chalet Choucas while Krishnaji walked down the hill. We walked together a way and ran into the Simmonses. At Krishnaji's urging, Dorothy had had a word with Alexandra and Yvonne on the danger of the hippie boys.' That was two of the students then.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Yvonne was the…

S: …Carnes's[5] daughter.

M: Carnes's, yes, and Alexandra was the one with the blonde Botticelli hair. 'On our walk back toward the car, we passed U.G. Krishnamurti, who gave the Indian salute unsmilingly with a sort of hunched turning away. Krishnaji said after we passed, "I felt something unclean.'"

S: Hm.

M: On the twenty-seventh, well, it's about my father and his wife, who no longer recognized even the nurses and had worsened, and later that day died. And my brother flying out to help father who is in Baden-Baden[6], etcetera. I spoke with my father on the phone and will go by train to Baden-Baden and return on Friday.

On the twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji gave his sixth Saanen talk, and an Italian hippie, Enzo, shouted at him in the middle of it. Krishnaji, who had been talking about pleasure in sex, in various things, was quiet, then resumed, "You take pleasure in violence, in anger, etcetera."'

'Anneke, Doris Pratt, and Jane Hammond came to lunch. A professor and Mrs. Foster, a niece of Fredrick Pinter, and her daughter came to tea. Krishnaji and I walked later. I talked to father by telephone; Bud arrived in Paris.'

[Chuckling.] This is the twenty-ninth, 'Krishnaji said to me, "I came from Madanapalle[7] to make you intelligent." [Both laugh.] The taxi I had ordered didn't come, so Krishnaji put a coat over his dressing gown, and drove me down to the station. I caught the train to Zweisimmen, and he took the car back up the hill.' Well, this is when I go to Baden-Baden, and you don't want to hear about all that.

I was in Baden-Baden till Friday the thirty-first. 'I left my brother and father and took the Trans-Europa Express to Basel, changed there for a train to Bern, then on to Spiez, and then to Zweisimmen. At Spiez I had a forty-five-minute wait, so I called Tannegg to say that I'd be later than planned. Krishnaji heard the phone ring and was sure it was me and offered to meet me in Zweisimmen, but I dissuaded him. I was back by 8:45 p.m. Erna and Theo have moved into the downstairs flat. Antonia arrived to replace Olga, who leaves tomorrow'—that's the maid. 'Krishnaji held the second discussion with young people this morning.'

On the first of August, 'there was the annual Saanen Gatherings Committee meeting. Krishnaji, Edgar Graf, Mary Cadogan, Doris Pratt, and me. Miss Keller said she was ill. She has been talking indiscreetly outside the Committee, saying Graf is not honest and doesn't cooperate with her. He is the treasurer; she is the secretary. Krishnaji will talk to her next week. Fresia was also away. George Digby came for lunch (Nelly was sick), and so did Erna and Theo. They met Thursday at the Cadogan's and all was very friendly, thank goodness. Erna's negotiation with Harper and Row has been accepted, and they will do all the books. After lunch, there was a Krishnaji, Digby, Cadogan, de Vidas, and me meeting about French publications followed by a Spanish one with the same cast, plus Biascoechea, Farias, and Sendra. It developed that they want their own foundation. Erna was called into this meeting. There is a resentment of the English Foundation, which was evident. Mary Cadogan and George Digby are disturbed by this. Farias is quite aggressive, calls people gringos. A long, tiring day. Krishnaji and I walked a little over the hill.'

On the second of August, 'Krishnaji held his first public discussion in the tent. The Lilliefelts and Olaf Campbell to lunch.' He was an American who used to come.

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave the second public discussion. Mary Cadogan came to see him. She is disturbed about the resentment of the Foundation. She has to leave tomorrow. Badger died from garden poison at Brockwood.' That was one of the school dogs.

S: You know, I had no idea that the first dog was called Badger.

M: Didn't you?

S: I never knew that.

M: Yes. I named Badger, Badger. Whisper came with the name Whisper.

S: Isn't that funny. I never knew…[8]

M: But Badger was black. We got a black one and a beige one.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And, ah, I thought up the name Badger just because he was black and because of Brock…

S: Well, that's how I named Badger! [Laughs.]

M: Yes. We'd only had the first Badger less than a year. 'Mrs. Pamela Travers and Ruth McCandless came for lunch. Mr. Moser came at 4 p.m. and discussed trading in my present Mercedes on a similar one, a new 3.5 with English right-hand drive for next year.'

On the fourth, 'Krishnaji held the third public discussion in the tent. A Saint Bernard tethered to the fence near the car jumped at him aggressively but didn't hurt him. After the discussion, Krishnaji saw the Biascoecheas upstairs at Tannegg, while I had a meeting downstairs with Joan Gordon and the Lilliefelts about New York next April.

Then Madame Duchet and Marcelle Bondoneau came to lunch. Krishnaji asked questions on what he was like when he was about twenty-two and Marcelle first met him. Marcelle imitated the way Indians talk, animated.' [M and S chuckle.]

'At 4 p.m. Krishnaji gave interviews to the two Shepard sisters from South Africa, and a Bertil Gedin. A girl named Blazier telephoned to say she couldn't come because she had just given birth to a baby.' [Both chuckle.] 'She was at the discussion this morning!' [More laughing.] 'Krishnaji drove his car a bit, and we did errands in the village.'

On the fifth of August, 'Krishnaji's fourth public discussion on fragmentation and thought; it was a very good one. Krishnaji saw Achard and Gaillard before lunch.' Achard is the one who did a thesis on Krishnaji at a university in a city in the Savoie. My mind's gone blank.

S: In the Savoie?

M: Yes. Achard did his thesis on "Le Langage de Krishnamurti" because the university wouldn't accept a thesis just on Krishnaji's teachings, so he had to figure out how to do it and it was acceptable to do it on Krishnaji's language.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Cragnolini, Malvias Navara, Ortolani, and Signore Betilli came to lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji interviewed the twenty-year-old Californian, Jim Wallace.' Do you remember Jim Wallace?

S: No.

M: Big blond boy. 'Krishnaji had me vet him for his staying at Brockwood for a while. He is not a hippie, and was not involved in the fracas at the San Francisco Hotel, but seems really interested in inner things. I felt the first spark of hope that here might be a serious one who could truly benefit from Krishnaji's teachings.'

S: What was the fracas at the San Francisco Hotel?

M: Can't remember. [Laughs.] 'He and Krishnaji walked down the hill, and I picked Krishnaji up on the road to Saanen.'

For the sixth of August, it reads, 'Did errands early; lovely summer morning light in the villages, clean. The early people doing marketing. Such a sense of summer, simplicity, and that lovely inner shine this time of year always brings me. Krishnaji gave a superb fifth public discussion on inner and outer revolution. Answered all the youthful insistence on social revolution. He had enormous bursting energy. Anneke came for lunch with us in the car and discussed Amsterdam for next year. She also raised the matter of the antagonism of the Suarèses, who are here. He lectures about his Kabbalah book and doesn't come to the talks. He doesn't come to the talks, and he's hopeless, according to Anneke, but she [Mrs. Suarès] came to listen and is also full of lies from Rajagopal, who has been wooing them.' In other words, his wife came to the talks, but he didn't.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: 'Anneke stayed to lunch and de Vidas came, too. At 3 p.m., I met Dorothy at the bank and transferred to her some gold for Brockwood, which was…' [Laughs.] I remember this! '…which was left to Krishnaji by an old French woman. This makes 48,280 Swiss francs or $1,115 US dollars. Dorothy was up till 3 a.m. with Joanna, who was having a fight with a hippie.' That's Joanna, who was a Brockwood student then, and who was here just lately with her child.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Dorothy is in a mood to expel the three girls who have behaved badly here. She is tired of playing policeman to save silly girls from delinquency. The school was meant for more than that, she said. At 4 p.m., she brought up Mr. Motani, Sunita's father.' Sunita was that same group of first students.

S: Ah, yes, yes, yes.

M: The girl was from Pakistan, I think. 'A Mr. and Mrs. Perrine!' You remember Warren Perrine? He used to come around quite a bit in those days. They lived in California, up near Big Sur.

S: The name says something to me.

M: Yes. They were quite nice. It says here, 'Perrine from California wants perhaps to buy the hundred-acre place across from Brockwood.' What? What hundred-acre place?

S: Maybe Morton was going to sell a piece.

M: 'They would go there and see it. It had been a very hot day, but Krishnaji walked up to the river and back. The meeting for Tapper, Leipziger, Loebl should have occurred today in Los Angeles.' Those are the lawyers on the case.

S: Mm.

M: On the seventh of August. 'Krishnaji gave another superb discussion in the tent. Number six. Nadia spoke to us about the Suarèses. When I came back, I telephoned to invite the Suarèses to lunch, but Madame Suarès was busy. After Krishnaji had treated Madame Welser'—that's the paralyzed lady—'Dorothy and Anneke and Krishnaji held a meeting with Miss Keller, Doris Pratt, and me on why Miss Keller was so antagonistic to Mr. Graf, her general indiscretions and remarks about him. She said she could not work with him, so she resigned from the Committee and will be responsible to Mary Cadogan at the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust for selling books in Zurich.'

‘Nadia came up and sat with Krishnaji through lunch and discussed the Suarèses, Rajagopal mess, etcetera. Krishnaji is upset by it. On top of everything else, another Vigeveno letter came, he says his last, saying that only Krishnaji can save the situation without interference with lawyers, etcetera. Krishnaji again would not touch it or read it but had me tell him the gist of it. He had a brief rest before the Saanen Gatherings meeting at 4 p.m. with the Grafs, Doris Pratt, and me. Krishnaji asked Graf to suggest a Swiss replacement for Miss Keller and also why, after he has been speaking for ten years here, there are only about a dozen Swiss at the talks? And what to do about this. When they left, we prepared for a walk, but there was such a thunderstorm with hail and heavy rain that we went downstairs and called on the Lilliefelts. Krishnaji is tired, and all this Suarès/Vigeveno junk is a harassment to him. He slept poorly; his body’s disturbed. He says I mustn’t be tired or it affects him.’ [Sighs.] ‘Talked to my father.’

On the eighth of August, ‘Krishnaji’s eighth public discussion. Miss Keller has not resigned from everything. Sybil Dobson and Erna and Theo came for lunch. At 4 p.m., all the foreign committees came, fifty-some people. Krishnaji talked about the function of the committees after his death and much about publications. He spelled out that Vimala Thakar has nothing to do with anything. George Digby has to answer endless questions asked by the Spanish group who, as usual, monopolize things. A Romanian woman was there, also a Russian woman, who translated books.’

On the ninth of August, ‘Sidney Roth rang from Chicago, and Erna took down in shorthand the news that will come in full from Leipziger next week. At the meeting on the sixth between Tapper, Loebl, Leipziger, Tapper proposed a settlement that leaves KWINC as a shell but gives all assets to the KFA. Loebl for the first time was conciliatory. Each lawyer now consults clients, etcetera. All of us feel Loebl’s attitude is now a key one to persuade Rajagopal. So far, so good.’ Of course, Loebl was soon out of it. Rajagopal fired him, I think.

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘Krishnaji gave the eighth and last of the public discussions in the tent. It seems these talks and discussions were the most intense Krishnaji has ever given. Superb. He came back and saw Madame Welser, Dorothy, and Anneke for treatments. Anneke told me she has a faulty valve in her aorta. Krishnaji saw the girl, Dorothy Blazier, who had the baby last Tuesday. The baby died.’

S: Oh, dear.

M: ‘George and Nelly Digby came to lunch. We had a relaxed time, very congenial. Krishnaji talked till 4 p.m., when the Ojai group came to tea—the Hookers, Noyes, Kate Nadje…’ Kate Nadje died soon afterwards. She lived in Ojai. ‘…Essie Bates…’

S: I remember…

M: Essie Bates was a real estate woman, old lady, in her nineties.

S: Mm, hm.

M: '…Verna Krueger and the Lilliefelts. Krishnaji went off for a walk and when they'd gone, I joined him. I saw his footprints along the muddy road. It had been raining and then the remote figure in his raincoat and beret came along the path. He is tired but full of energy. These concentrations of meetings seem to bring him the necessary, almost limitless vitality, but they all are now over, and he will give no more interviews, etcetera. He was restless at night, cried out, "Mama! They don't know how vast it is." He said he might start writing.'

The tenth was 'a cold, foggy day. Krishnaji wanted to shop for shoes, so we went to the village and he found a pair he liked for walking. Joan Wright, the American young man Jim Wallace, Canadians John and Elaine La Marquand came for lunch. The latter was a boy who seemed to be listening so intensely in the talks. Madame Duchet saw Krishnaji briefly at 4 p.m. Then Krishnaji took Dorothy Simmons and me for a ride in his Mercedes. Let her drive it, too. Both of them were quite nervous at that.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji and I walked with Dorothy down to the van der Stratens, where she and Montague went, and Krishnaji and I came back.' They had that chalet right by the palace before you turn down…

S: I remember.

M: 'In the morning, Doris and Graf came by. Until the Saanen Gatherings Committee gets more members next year, Graf will sign checks alone. Paola and Jon Cohen and Alberto appeared after supper. They will move here Wednesday when Erna and Theo leave.'

S: That's Vanda's daughter and…

M: Yes, and Jon is her husband. And Alberto is Vanda's son.

The eleventh. 'I fetched Madame Suarès up the hill to see Krishnaji at noon. She has sided with Rajagopal through misinformation of Mima Porter, according to Nadia Kossiakof and Anneke, but she was upset. So Krishnaji talked to her and gave her the facts. She had been told that Krishnaji had refused to see Rajagopal. He explained why he wouldn't see him alone and that he had tried repeatedly to meet. Blitz's story was distorted. Alain was blamed for all of it. Krishnaji said that his trouble with Rajagopal had been going on for over ten years before Alain appeared. Krishnaji didn't mention the attorney general at all, but said that things are now up to Rajagopal if he wishes to settle. Mima Porter sent her a seventeen-page copy of accusations for Suarès to read. If this is the Leipziger letter sent by Tapper to Loebl, it means that the KWINC board has seen it. Krishnaji told her that he doesn't ask her or care what she does, but if she wants to write to Porter, to remember that now is the time for Rajagopal to settle. Madame Duchet, Marcelle, and Madame Suarès were at lunch. Everyone kept the amenities going. Krishnaji talked alone with Madame Suarès for a short time after lunch and then they left.

Krishnaji saw Topazia, and her daughter.' Topazia Alliata is an old friend, lives in Rome, and is a friend of Vanda's.

S: Mm, hm.

M: You know her. She…

S: Yes.

M: 'Also an Italian young man who wants to start a school. I fetched from the bookstore the large copy of a photo of Krishnaji taken in Chicago, on the roof of the Palmer house when he was very young. Alain had it blown up and it was used on Mrs. Ruisch's bookstore window when Krishnaji's books are on display. She is selling the store. The photo is too big to take to Brockwood this year. We will store it here. Krishnaji and I walked to inspect the river. Talked to Erna and Theo a little. They leave in the morning.' What's happened to that photograph?

S: I think it disappeared. Dorothy had it for years above her desk.

M: Yes.

S: And then she took it down, and I don't know what happened to it.

M: Huh.

S: Shortly after I became principal we looked for it. We couldn't find it.

M: Mm.

On the twelfth, 'The Lilliefelts left; and the van der Stratens came for lunch. Krishnaji said he read in his Maigret[9], which he reads to practice French, the phrase, "his thought was faster than his words."' [Chuckles.] 'And he realized that when he is giving a talk, he does not think at all!' [Both laugh.] 'Paola and Jon Cohen, Alberto, and an American girl moved into the flat downstairs.'

The thirteenth of August. 'It was a marvelous morning, cloudless, warm, clearly the day to go out in Krishnaji's car, and off we went, down to Aigle, Montreux, and to lunch in Lausanne at the Grappe D'Or. We walked up the hill and looked for knitted shirts. Found some. Also size 9½ socks. They were women's socks, ribbed nylon, just what we've looked for. We drove back the Bulle way. It was beautiful. I took some pictures. We could see the Dent du Midi.'

'Along the way, Krishnaji said, "Shall we talk seriously? That no one has made the change. Is there something he should do before he dies about this? I don't feel I'm to blame." I began to ask him what the process is of meeting a statement of his, such as "having an empty mind," i.e., hearing that, my mind sees it has known such moments but doesn't know if what I have known is what he refers to. I suspect it is far less, but that is speculation. How indeed should one proceed? He seemed to want to go into it but not today. I am to bring it up again. This drive was a little too long for him and he was tired, but still wanted to stop at the shoe store in Saanen—Kohi—where he found some walking shoes that pleased him. Later he said, "I come from so far away."'

S: Hm. Completely trivial here, but that shoe store, was that the one that was right on the edge of town?

M: Yes, of Saanen. And the man who was…

S: He made shoes.

M: Yes, he made shoes. And he was a mountain ah…

S: Mountain rescue man.

M: Yes.

S: And then he went out of business.

M: Yes. A nice man.

S: Yes. Yes indeed.

M: 'The next day, the weather was clouded. Paola, John, Alberto, and Phyllis came to lunch. I went afterward with Madame Duperrex for a ride high above Château D'Oex.' Madame Duperrex was the concierge at Caprices; nice woman, and she used to look after things for me. 'She's such a nice person. Came back and walked with Krishnaji.'

Saturday, the fifteenth. 'Paola, Alberto, John, and friend to lunch. Krishnaji saw de Vidas at 4:00 p.m. and went to the shoe store in Saanen again. Better size for Krishnaji was 39½. We went for a walk by the river. He said he thinks the second-rateness of the early people (Rajagopal, Rosalind Rajagopal, Suarès, Vigevenos, etcetera) was just that they were at hand, and therefore served a purpose in a practical sense to whatever seemed to order things around Krishnaji.' That was his estimation. 'The present entourage is more mature-thinking. He used the word indecent about Rajagopal and RR'—RR is Rosalind.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'She once kicked him with her knee, and he was in pain for days. But he never felt angry. It left no mark in his spirit. Rajagopal was as he is from the beginning. Krishnaji and Nitya both felt an aversion to him. Rajagopal once had rheumatism in India, and an Ayurvedic doctor said he could cure him if treated for a year. Rajagopal refused, saying he must leave with Krishnaji or Krishnaji would forget him. "Which was true," said Krishnaji!' [Both laugh.] Oh dear! [They laugh again.]

On the seventeenth of August, 'I talked to Vanda in Rome. Ruth McCandless came at noon. Ruth told me, at my request, the sequence of her experiences as follows: that Mrs. Shannon, who was here in 1965, through her met Margot Wilke. In early 1968, after Krishnaji had agreed to speak at Claremont that autumn, she was invited by Mrs. Mathias, with whom Wilke stayed in San Francisco to meet Rosalind. They quizzed her on how Krishnaji came to be speaking at Claremont. "He can't do that," said Rosalind. "Was it a group or an individual, who had arranged it?"'

'"Both," said Ruth. "The individual would be me, and the group was Blaisdell"'—that's the place at Claremont that invited him. '"Oh, we knew Allen Blaisdell," said Rosalind. It wasn't until this year that Ruth learned from a passing remark of Mr. Rempel'—he was the head of Blaisdell—'that they had to override Allen Blaisdell to have Krishnaji speak at Claremont. Within a day or two, Rosalind invited Ruth to tea and told her how easily influenced Krishnaji is, and that now I and Alain Naudé were doing so, and then launched into her usual libel of Alain. Shortly after that meeting, Mrs. Mathias rang Ruth and said that she had known Rosalind for years and knew her to be without guile, whereas she, Ruth, had guile. Furthermore, she and Margot Wilke, and Rosalind, had been friends for years and years, and no one was going to break that up. This left her amazed, said Ruth.'

'The Suarèses then were fetched up the hill to lunch by me, and after that, Krishnaji talked alone with Mrs. Suarès, told her to ask Yo'—that's Yo de Manziarly—'why she didn't attempt to find out the facts, but instead turned against him.' You see, Yo sided with Mima, her sister…

S: I know.

M: …with Rajagopal, whereas Marcelle and Sacha remained friends of Krishnaji's.

Let's see. Oh, this is all about Biascoechea: 'I went to the bank with him, where the bank manager sent a draft of $25,000 to the Cantonal Bank for the account of Alzina.' Alzina was an account for money for Krishnaji's needs, as he wasn't getting any money from Rajagopal, obviously.

S: Why was the name chosen?

M: There was a Mr. de Marxof, who was a financial advisor to Frances McCann, and he suggested having an account in Switzerland where money could be put, and he thought up the name.

S: Did this account later turn into the Teachings Trust?

M: Yes.

S: Hm.

M: Yes. I was the one to handle it for Krishnaji, and the bank advised on how to invest it. 'The bank invested in Danish bonds, paying 9 percent annually on March third, redemption in 1982. These are not subject to withholding tax. This new Alzina account is a numbered one, and Krishnaji is the owner, and power of attorney is given to me. On Wednesday, Krishnaji will come to the bank for signing. Meanwhile, at his instructions, I put a £2,000 scholarship for an Indian boy to be selected by Krishnaji to go to Brockwood, given by Madame Duchet. I put it into Dorothy Simmons's account at the Cantonal Bank. I also arranged for Krishnaji's trust account, and personal account to get 5 percent net. I deposited money for our use next year at Tannegg. Krishnaji walked down, and had his hair cut. We did some errands; walked by the river.'

Are we near the end of the tape?

S: We're near the end of the tape. Is the next day a short day? It looks short—why don't you read that one?

M: Alright. The eighteenth of August. 'It was a nice day, clear in the morning. With Krishnaji driving, we went to Thun in his car. We ate our picnic in the same little place beside a church at the edge of the lake. We left the car for the winter at Moser's and went over the contract for the trade-in of mine to order a new Coupe 280 SE 3.5 for the end of next April. Then we walked over to the lake steamer and took it to Spiez. The Mönch, Eiger, and Jungfrau were visible with heavy new snow. We took the bus from Spiez up the hill to the train station. Krishnaji had given much of his rice at lunch to the swans [chuckling] and some ducks. So, we went to the buffet and he had a bun and some tonic water. We took the train to Zweisimmen, where we changed onto the Gstaad one, which delighted him. He stood all the way, absorbed as a child, [S chuckles] with his hands in his driving gloves, holding the edge of the window, lost in looking out; that remote, absent look. He followed where the road went, but saw all the countryside, silently. Later he said, "I like to go in trains. You see better. I must go more in trains."'

S: Hm.

M: 'He used to watch from trains in India, the vast country unroll in the days before he flew. We got off in Gstaad at 6:18 p.m., bought our paper, took the shortest and most expensive ride in a taxi ever, paid five francs and got off at the palace and walked the rest of the way up hill.' [Both laugh.] And so…do you want one more short one?

S: Yes!

M: Wednesday, the nineteenth, 'Packed. Spoke to Vanda in Rome. Mrs. Lindberg and the Biascoecheas came to lunch. Mrs. Lindberg talked about ecology, concern of young husband in the Philippines. She talked quite a bit, rather intensely, nervous but direct, both assertive in conversation and shy. Shyness is not the surface thing, though perhaps is behind it. She was dressed in a pantsuit with odd pantoufle. Very nice, very perceptive person. Krishnaji was pleased to see her. Later, Krishnaji and I went to the bank, where he opened the Alzina account to house the Biascoechea sum. Power of attorney to me, and Krishnaji received power of attorney from Isabel Biascoechea for another $25,000.' That was money Krishnaji could use, but it must go eventually to Isabel if something happened to Enrique.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'We went for chemist things, then came and took a last walk of the season to the river. Inspected the stonework. Later Krishnaji said, "Since the train ride I have felt very far away."'

S: Hm.

M: I think that's a good place to stop because the next day we went to Brockwood.

[7] The small town where Krishnaji was born.

[8] In 1986, the school got a new school dog, and he was named "Badger" because Brock is an old English name for a badger, so Brockwood means badger-wood.

[9] Krishnaji's favorite reading matter was what he called "thrillers" detective stories, or spy stories, and his favorite French detective was Jules Maigret, a fictional character who appeared in seventy-five novels by Georges Simenon.

Issue 16: August 1970 to October 1970

This issue is the normal length, but covers only three months, which means it is full of detail. In it we see enthusiasts of Krishnaji's work wanting to start Krishnamurti Foundations in several different countries, and a clarification of Krishnaji's role in the possible new foundations.

We also see more of Brockwood's early teething troubles, many of which reflected more that period of history (the late 60's and early 70's) than anything about the individuals involved.

Several attempts at a peaceful resolution with Rajagopal and KWINC are made, but come to nothing.

Throughout this time, Krishnaji is dictating a book on education which, interestingly, has still not been published.

Mary: We pick up this account on August twenty, 1970, and the day starts in Gstaad. 'It was a cool grey day, and Krishnaji and I said goodbye to Fosca and Antonia'—that was the extra maid—'and drove in the Mercedes toward Geneva at 11:30 a.m. We had a terrible time finding a gas station open to fill the tank. But we did and we had a picnic along the autoroute before we got to Geneva. We arrived at the Geneva airport where Mr. Moser met us.' He's the man who sold us all those cars.

Scott: Mm, hm.

M: 'We signed the order for the new Mercedes 280 SE Coupe 3.5 for next April, and he drove off in the dear present one.' As usual, I got very sentimental [S laughs] about giving a car away.

S: I quite understand.

M: It's going to be maltreated and awful things are going to happen to it. It's going to the knackers, [S laughing] as they say here about horses. 'It had hummmmed at 105 miles per hour on the auto route.' [Chuckles.] 'The nicest car I ever drove,' I say. 'Krishnaji and I took the 3:15 p.m. British Air flight to London. Dorothy met us, but on exiting the terminal, found that her car had been impounded [chuckles] for illegal parking! [S laughs.] So there was a delay while she got it back. We then drove to Brockwood. Krishnaji was very silent and remote. He has been "far off," he says, since the train ride on Tuesday. He said that Rajagopal and Rosalind must have asked him for things when he was in such states, and he would say, "anything you say," the way he used to say to Leadbeater. His face was an austere mask in the car, but he returned enough to greet people on arrival at Brockwood, and wanted to have supper downstairs with everyone. Dorothy looked tense. Brockwood needs pulling together, but it is good to be back. Slept very well.'

On the twenty-first, 'Unpacking. I put all of Krishnaji's drawers and cupboards in order. Rang Mary Links at Blackdown. Also Doctor McGowan to give him Krishnaji's health report. Paul Anstee says the new leather chair looks very nice in the drawing room.' [Chuckles.] You don't want all this, do you?

S: Yes, yes, absolutely.

M: Okay. 'At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a meeting with the Simmonses, Doris, Donald, and me on Brockwood and all problems and general disorder. A female teacher, who was left in charge of Brockwood with an American couple called Janetson, is having…' oh, well, I can't go into this.

S: Yes, you can.

M: Censored!

S: Why can't you put this in?

M: Because it's nobody's business.

S: But this is the kind of thing that Brockwood has gone through, don't you see?

M: Well, someone was having an affair with someone else at Brockwood, and that was the problem. [Laughs.] 'Krishnaji really blazed at all of us. He said, "When you have tried reasoning, talking with them, and it does no good and you don't want to use threats, what do you do?" He hammered so hard on Dorothy, the others kept silent, but I was afraid she would come apart, so I drew some of the fire, and what a fire it was! "You can't walk away from me. You have to educate them." In the end it was a matter of saying that we have tried dissuasion, and they have turned that into a game of contention.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: Sound familiar?

S: Only too familiar. You see, Mary, this is why it's important to put all of this down—because all of this is familiar, and also unfortunately, it is what's going to happen in the future. This is all going to come up again, and there has to be some way of looking at this…

M: History.

S: Yes.

M: 'Krishnaji said, "We are through with that. This is the direction of Brockwood, not your direction, but the original direction for which it was begun. Do you want to come with us? If so, it will be an answer in action and not merely verbal." It was 7:00 p.m. by the time this meeting ended.'

On the twenty-second, 'Krishnaji finished unpacking and I put away all his things, reorganized drawers, etcetera. In the afternoon, he gave interviews to Mr. Warren Parriae who wants to do something about an annex to Brockwood,' it says here.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Krishnaji and I went for a walk around the lanes.'

On Sunday, the next day, 'the Lilliefelts arrived, having motored around southern England for a few days. They are in the West Wing spare room. Krishnaji was interviewed at noon for the Times' Educational Supplement. Mr. Parriae wants to invest $100,000 in a house nearby, which Brockwood can use. After lunch, I took Erna and Theo around the place. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji had another meeting with the Simmonses, Doris, Donald, and me. Dorothy has asked all the extraneous people to leave, including…' those people who are having affairs.

S: Alright, without naming names here…

M: Yes.

S: …as you feel uneasy about that, but what is significant here is that…

M: He was dealing with it.

S: …and that people were engaged in their own relationship difficulties…

M: Mm.

S: …which was felt by Krishnaji and obviously others to be inappropriate in a school.

M: Right.

S: Now, this is a very contentious issue. And this is something that needs a little light shed on it. Because they were insisting that it was right, or they wouldn't stop…

M: Mm, hm.

S: …or something, even with Krishnaji around, they were saying, "No. What I think is right."

M: Yes.

S: That's something that's very interesting to go into. Do you remember anything about why Krishnaji said it was inappropriate? I mean, obviously, it would either mean some people were married to other people when they were having the affairs…

M: Yes, yes.

S: And this was just felt to be a bad influence on the students or…

M: Well, it was…

S: …were they just too self-indulgent…

M: …messy.

S: …and stupid?

M: It was messy.

S: Yes.

M: I mean, I can't quote him on it, and what I'm saying might just be my interpretation; but it seemed these people were putting all their personal junk first, and not the school.

S: Yes, and also, it puts into perspective the kind of arguments that happen now after Krishnaji is gone, when people say, "No, I have a right to do this, or this is my living the teachings. Who are you to say that I can't do this?" I mean, it puts it in perspective that people were even willing to say that to Krishnaji.

M: Mm, hm.

S: Which is staggering, when you think of it.

M: Well, the very next morning he talked to the woman concerned before lunch. But I wasn't there so there's nothing about what he said. And 'in the afternoon, I went to Winchester with the Lilliefelts in their car and then went alone by train to Southampton. At the Hertz office I rented a tomato-red Volkswagen and drove home to Brockwood. Krishnaji went walking with a young man who wishes to be part of Brockwood. This was good news to me until Krishnaji added that this young man said that he had a feeling of Krishnaji's death and that he would be present then when Krishnaji is seventy-seven.' This is the kind of nuttiness that floats up.

S: Oh, lord.

M: 'This so shocked me that I felt sick and wished never to hear of this young man again. [S laughs.] Krishnaji was impatient with all this. "You must face it," he said. "I don't know why you all make such a fuss about death." I said I would face it when it came, but I didn't want to face the trivial references to it conversationally. Later, he said, "I think I will live quite a lot longer, or pop off any time!" [S laughs heartily; M chuckles.]

S: All very comforting!

M: Yes! I was reassured, you can see.

S: Yes. [More laughing.]

M: The next day 'was quiet. Krishnaji slept a lot. We walked a long walk in the afternoon.'

August twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji and I in the red Volkswagen went to Alton, then to London on the 10:20 a.m. train. Naturally, our first stop was at Huntsman, where I ordered a pair of grey Birdseye slacks, and Krishnaji liked the material so much that he ordered a double-breasted suit of the same material. [Chuckling.] We walked to W. Bill Limited and bought two Shetland pullovers for Krishnaji, and then went to the Aperitif, where Mary Lutyens met us for lunch. Krishnaji asked her about "continuing conversation" for the next book…' That must mean some provisional title. I don't remember.

S: Mm, hm.

M: '…or doing one on parents, children, and teachers. He will start that. We went to Mr. Campion.' Mr. Campion was the dentist.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'And while Krishnaji had his teeth done, I did errands. Then we came home. Erna has heard a rumor that Loebl has resigned as Rajagopal's lawyer.'

'The next day was a lovely, warm, clear day. I did deskwork all morning while Krishnaji slept. In the afternoon, we drove to the Itchen River near Avington. Lovely clear stream. We walked along it, but it was too short and we came back to Brockwood.'

S: That must have been from the Bush Inn?

M: It's the Bush, yes.

S: Hm. [M chuckles; S laughs.]

M: On the twenty-eighth, 'Before lunch, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I continued the conversation Krishnaji and I had on what are our reasons to the students against their sleeping together. [M chuckles.] He had to stop for lunch before we finished. Then Krishnaji met the staff and two students who are here for discussions of what cooperation is. Krishnaji said the feeling of cooperation comes first; then, out of that comes its objectives, etcetera. On the walk after, he lit into me, saying I didn't understand when I asked if the cooperation doesn't imply action with others, and around some endeavor, the objective or some general nucleus of something, a direction stimulates a feeling of wanting to cooperate. Or, does it get started in the beginning? It generates the wanting to cooperate. I had felt in the discussion that he was stressing cooperation as a primary thing to lead people past the pitfall of beginning by defining what the objections are.' Does that make any sense to you?

S: Mm, hm.

M: I think I know what he was saying.

S: Yes, I think I do, too. Krishnaji would say that you cooperate for the sake of cooperation.

M: Yes, and then you…

S: Not for a thing.

M: That's right; you don't get inspired by the problem and then cooperate.

S: Yes, yes.

M: You cooperate…

S: …out of the spirit of cooperation.

M: …and then deal with problems when they come up.

S: Yes, yes.

M: '…and, hence, my bringing up the above went against that. He said he has no plan, but I had said in discussion, that he did. That it was not so. That he was examining and had no preconceived plan.' I was saying, "You planned what you would say." He was vehement and impatient. I felt an impasse I couldn't bridge. Later, he sensed this and said he was sorry. He had been rough and it wouldn't happen again. When he saw Dorothy later, she was almost in tears of exhaustion. People tried to push their way into staying at Brockwood. Somebody in the garden left.' Can't read the writing.

On the twenty-ninth of August, 'there was the first official meeting of the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust and the Krishnamurti Foundation of America. Present were Krishnaji, Dorothy Simmons, Mary Cadogan, George Digby, David Bohm, Erna and Theo Lilliefelt, and me…also Hughes van der Straten, who stayed for the night. Earlier the post brought Leipziger's account in detail of the Tapper-Loebl-Leipziger meeting held on August sixth. In it, we learned for the first time the disturbing news that Tapper, without consulting Leipziger, proposed that Rajagopal be allowed to carry on publications of post-1968 material. Everyone thinks this is non-negotiable. Krishnaji leans to thinking that perhaps Rajagopal may want to settle with him rather than go through lawyers. All this plus the Indian Foundation, Spanish-American, and Australian potential foundations were discussed. Finances look somewhat more optimistic.'

Next day, 'there was a long morning talk between Krishnaji, Hughes, Erna, and me about the impossibility of the Tapper proposal, that Rajagopal carry on publications. Erna cabled Leipziger our feelings and drafted a stiff letter on all of this. Krishnaji again explored the idea that Rajagopal doesn't really want to carry on this work; he's too old and sick, but wants the rapprochement with Krishnaji, and may want to hand things over personally to him.' This was his perpetual hope…

S: Mm, hm.

M: …or optimism. 'Hughes flew back to Belgium. After lunch, I drove Erna and Theo to Blackdown for tea with the Linkses. Krishnaji was ready to come but looked so tired that he stayed and slept. Mary had written to him yesterday to suggest that Brockwood needed his presence eight to nine months of the year. It was a warm day, and pleasant at the Linkses. We got back to Brockwood in time for supper.'

On the thirty-first of August, 'Krishnaji dictated to me, in the morning, a conversation on the meaning of cooperation for The Bulletin. In a resolve never to fall behind, I spent most of the rest of the day typing it, and before going to bed had it in an envelope and in the post, on its way to Mary L. for vetting. If I could keep up-to-date with book, letters, and laundry, all would be well.' [Both laugh.] 'I rang father in Deauville. He is well and busy with his friends, returns to Paris Thursday. At lunch, Dorothy gave a resume of the instant hostility of the latest pupil from the U.S. He wants to leave after being here two hours'—[both laugh]—'because of his hair!'

S: Oh, yes!

M: 'It was suggested that it be kept reasonably clean, neat, and not too long. Hair is one's most sacred object these days. Krishnaji and I and Whisper walked along the road toward West Meon and then down the hill between the fields, a long and lovely walk.' That's when you go toward West Meon and then you go left. There's a way you can go down.

S: Down to the Farm Shop?

M: Yes, toward the Farm Shop.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: 'The first time there for me. Krishnaji decided to start a new book tomorrow on education. Giving views of parents, students, and teachers in India, Europe, and the U.S. Mary L. wants to start editing his next book in January, which means we must work on this one every day. I will put aside typing the other one and try. I must keep this one typed without falling behind. It takes me all of a day, so it will take some doing.' [Both chuckle.]

The first of September. 'Krishnaji began dictation of the new education book. It began very like the conversations except that the questioner was a group of parents, in this case, Indian ones. There was the usual lovely bit of nature descriptions at the beginning—Rajghat in this one. Though I typed in the afternoon, it was impossible to finish. Krishnaji talked to the Biascoecheas at 4 p.m. and wanted me present on it, as it was about the Hispano-Americana Foundation. Then we took Whisper for a walk. Erna and Theo went to Stonehenge, Longleat, and the New Forest.

The next day, 'Krishnaji did #2 of the education book. I went to Winchester on errands. It rained and the de Vidases came for the talks.'

On the third of September, 'he dictated #3 of the education book in the morning. We had a 12:30 p.m. lunch, and made the 1:50 p.m. train from Alton to London. Both had Huntsman fittings. Krishnaji bought a windbreaker at Lillywhites and we were back at Brockwood by 6:30 p.m. On trains, Krishnaji gets very dreamy.' [Chuckles.]

The next day, 'again he dictated. The house is swarming with people. Balasundaram arrived from India. There's a letter from Rosenthal'—that's our lawyer—'who will be in Norwich on Sunday.'

On the fifth, 'Saturday, a lovely sunny day. The tent had been put up in the field beyond the swimming pool, and in it, Krishnaji gave his first of four talks. About 600 people came. The sound system worked excellently this year, and lunch was had after the talk by everyone, including Krishnaji. Martha Longnecker was there—the Digbys, the Lilliefelts, and I discussed publication matters afterward.'

Sunday the sixth, 'another lovely day and Krishnaji gave the second talk, very good, very strong. Again, a picnic lunch in the tent—800 to 900 people today. At 4 p.m., the two Krishnamurti Foundations met—Biascoechea, Farias, and Sendra, regarding their forming a Krishnamurti Foundation; a Krishnamurti Fundación Hispano-Americana. They never could give a reason why they wanted to be called a foundation, but it looks as if they will. There was talk of how more protection could be put in all the foundations' charters to protect Krishnaji's intention. For instance, they would publish only his books, etcetera. Later, we took Whisper for a walk, and later I spoke to Father in Paris.'

The seventh of September, 'Erna and I rang Saul Rosenthal in Norwich. He can come here next Sunday to discuss settlement proposals.' Then things about my brother and sister-in-law. 'Krishnaji dictated No. 5 on the education book. At 4 p.m., he held a meeting with the school. Brockwood's intention is intelligence, which is sensitivity and freedom. Freedom equals freedom from one's own conditioning. A very good discussion;

Editor's Note: The linked discussion is labeled as being on the eighth of September, but the archivist of the Krishnamurti Foundation of America reassures us that this is actually the discussion on the seventh, and is simply mislabeled in the book as the eighth.

it should be in The Bulletin. Krishnaji walked with Balasundaram, and I walked with the Lilliefelts. Mrs. Jayakar has the flu in Bombay and can't be here till the eighteenth, missing the meeting on Monday. The Lilliefelts' charter flight leaves that day. We will go ahead with the meeting on Monday. A tiring but busy day. Balasundaram showed Rishi Valley slides in the evening.'

Tuesday, the eighth of September. 'There were showers, and it was colder. Krishnaji held a discussion in the tent for those who are staying in the neighborhood between the weekend talks; 150 to 200 people or more. Questions were on education and ran rather like yesterday's school discussion, except that he made it sound utterly new. Intelligence, freedom, and the fragmented conditional mind could see that it is patterned as it happens, and that instantaneous perception frees it.'

'The Bohms asked to see Krishnaji and he talked to them at 4 p.m., and later Krishnaji went for a walk with Dave. Meanwhile Erna, Theo, Balasundaram, and I talked until suppertime. Balasundaram gave us the background of the Foundation for New Education in India.'

S: What happened to the Foundation for New Education?

M: It became Krishnamurti Foundation of India. They just changed the name.

M: But there was a big fuss about whether Krishnaji could be on the board.

S: I remember.

M: I don't know if that's mentioned in here.

S: Do you want to mention it now? Let's just talk about that for a minute, that whole fuss, because that was a really interesting [laughs] ordeal.

M: It must come in here somewhere. Um, well, let me read what it says here.

S: Ok.

M: Just the end of this day and then we can discuss that. As I was saying, 'Erna, Theo, Balasundaram and I talked till suppertime. He gave us the background of the FNE-KFI, and we gave the reasons for the charter of the KF England—an effort to safeguard Krishnaji's legal rights to the hilt. At the end, he asked what we wanted them to do in India, implying that they would.' And then it says, 'to be continued.' I suppose that's sort of me being—[S laughs]—skeptical! 'Earlier, we gave him Leipziger's report in June and Tapper's letter to Loebl, etcetera.'

S: Do you want to talk about what happened with this Foundation for New Education?

M: Well, I can't remember the exact details, whether it had already happened or happened later. But they…it's as though when Krishnaji started making Krishnamurti Foundations, that became the thing to do, if you know what I mean.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And that's, I think, why the Biascoecheas wanted a fundación in Puerto Rico, instead of just a committee. And also, India caught on that they were a bit out-of-date if they didn't do something to equal KFE, as it was known then (Krishnamurti Foundation of England, later known as KFT, Krishnamurti Foundation Trust) and KF America. But, as I recall, and I can't give you the dates of this now, but it may emerge that they did that, but with the interesting condition that Rajagopal was a member of it and Krishnaji wasn't. So figure that one out! [S laughs.] Reasons were, for Krishnaji, that he shouldn't have to bother with things like that. He was above all that. He was a spiritual head and shouldn't be troubled with the nitty-gritty of meetings.

S: Right, the things of the material world. Like money. [Laughs.]

M: And why they were holding onto Rajagopal was never clearly explained. Eventually, they dropped him when he came up for reelection, I think, as I recall. Maybe. Anyway, eventually he was out. And, of course, what changed everything, and I am now being catty, I guess, but it's how it happened, was when they wanted Vasanta Vihar[1], they had to bring a lawsuit against Rajagopal to get it and almost didn't.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So that kind of changed their attitude.

S: Yes. And there were also some strange people on it, though, as I remember, in the early years, who were left over from Rajagopal's school of thought that…

M: Yes, there were. And, of course, Madhavachari was on it, and the head of it, and it turned out in the end, to their surprise, that Madhavachari had been passing all the information about the case that he got from Krishnaji to Rajagopal. So Rajagopal knew what was being planned. A real betrayal. That sort of took the icing off their feelings for Madhavachari.

S: Yes. Terrible. But also, Pupul also was not wanting Krishnaji on this board.

M: No, no.

S: None of them: Sunanda, Pama. None of them, as far as I remember.

M: Well, I remember Pupul as the chief spokesman for this point of view.

S: Mm, hm.

M: But I don't know how many…it's an odd group of people, because a lot of the people, as you know, don't know what's going on, and only turn up for a yearly meeting where they sit silently and nod.

S: Mm, hm.

M: The people who ran it were the…

S: …same ones who run it now.

M: Exactly.

S: Yes.

M: Well, you could say that of us, too. Only we don't run it quite as…

S: [laughing] No, some of us don't run any of it anymore. [S laughs more.]

M: No, some of us don't run it anymore! That's right! [Laughs.] I don't know whether to boast or to sort of mention it out of the side of my mouth. [Both chuckle.] Anyway, that's how it was then.

The next day was Wednesday the ninth, and 'gale winds and cold prevailed. Krishnaji was full of fire and dictated No. 6 on the educational book.'

S: Which we still don't know the name of.

M: Which we still don't know the name of[2]. 'At 3:30 p.m., de Vidas, Erna, and Theo were to meet, but de Vidas was late and I had to leave them to tape Krishnaji's discussion with the school. We continued, "what Brockwood is about," how to bring about intelligence and freedom in this. And what is discipline? What do we do if after discovery through intelligent discussion and agreement the person still doesn't follow through?' That's what we talked about. 'Hair was brought up as a subject by Dominic. If clean and tidy, fine, but otherwise is disagreeable to others who have to live alongside. Sensitivity, consideration, should prevent dirty bare feet, etcetera, etcetera.' Oh dear! [Both laugh.] That was the early problems. 'But if a person perpetually disregards all this, do we discipline, punish which is repellent? What do we do?' [Chuckles.] It became almost a detective story, wondering how Krishnaji would solve it. Later, he told me that he had no idea where he was going; it just came out. That it is the reluctant person who punishes himself by pulling away from the intelligence of an offer to live in friendship and accord, and the learning process here.

Krishnaji was too tired to walk after all this, and went to bed. I was exhausted, too. Erna and Theo and de Vidas were still talking. That was useful, too. We called George Digby about a meeting on Saturday afternoon for publications for the foreign members here. Erna had earlier drawn up a letter answering Leipziger's questions on past publications. In the evening, Balasundaram talked with Biascoechea and said he had seen Krishnaji's Indian horoscope at Adyar, and that he was born at 12:24 a.m., after midnight on May thirteenth, 1895.' That's still another date. 'The Indians traditionally counted the day as starting at 6 a.m.' I thought it was 4 a.m.

S: I also thought it was 4 a.m.

M: So they consider that May twelfth is his birthday, but according to Western figuring, it is 24 minutes into May thirteenth. Well, all that's wrong[3].

S: Hm.

M: 'Theosophy said Krishnaji, in a former life, was one of the Buddha's disciples. Balasundaram gave me a photo of Krishnaji when young, and said'—this is all Balasundaram—'said Krishnaji, in answer to his and Pupul's question on how it was he could see things without division, etcetera, how it came about. Krishnaji replied, he could remember that as a boy he had always seen things without any division, i.e., the observer and the observed were there from the beginning in him.' The perception of that. 'Yesterday, Balasundaram told me of Rajagopal's bullying Krishnaji in India in 1957, and also Rosalind's rudeness to him in India in 1956.'

On the tenth of September, 'Krishnaji held the second discussion in the tent for those here between talks. A woman new to all this and a worker in a mental hospital, by the name of Spooner, kept asking, from the psychiatric point of view, questions on thought, solving everything, trying to understand through the brain. Krishnaji gave a brilliant analysis, laying bare how thought is the cause of trouble—fear, as an example, cannot exist without thought. Erna and Theo left for London after lunch and spent the night there.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated #7 in the education book. Rosenthal rang from London and will be here on Sunday. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I took a long walk down the lane between the fields. Erna and Theo returned. They'd had a long lunch with Michael Rubinstein and Mary Cadogan. After supper, I talked to Balasundaram about Indian publication matters.'

The twelfth of September 'was pouring rain in the early morning, but it luckily stopped in time for Krishnaji's third talk in the tent. He lunched there, sitting with Mar de Manziarly, who had just come from Boston. Later, he showed her through the West Wing. Erna, Theo, and I were talking right up to the 4 p.m. meeting with the Digbys to persuade George, at Krishnaji's instructions, that the foreign committees must be able to get publication rights for their languages from KF London directly and not have to go to Servire or Gollancz[4]. George clings, like a limpet, to his concept of loyalty and to Verhulst of Servire. He feels overly indebted to him for publishing the talks when we first began to do it and we hadn't a publisher. Verhulst has profited by this, and has, in fact, done us no favors, but George cannot see that the committees, though they have every sound reason not to want to deal with Servire and Gollancz, nevertheless, do much work and are owed something by the Foundation, too. De Vidas has been the opponent of Digby, rude as usual, and has stirred up others too, but he did come up with an offer from Delachaux et Niestlé, a Swiss publisher, to do the French translations, and George had brushed him off. Nelly was on our side in all this, and Erna, Theo, and I talked to George right up to the 4 p.m. meeting attended by Krishnaji, de Vidas, Madame Samuel, Farias, Sendra, the Biascoecheas, Tilly Von Eckman, Schmidt, Balasundaram, and the Greek and Danish representatives, Sybil Dobson (who took minutes), the Digbys, the Lilliefelts, and me. Krishnaji led the meeting. Then there were sparks between de Vidas and Digby—de Vidas being his rude and heavy-handed self, George resenting it and defending Servire. It came out, at one point, via Tilly, that Verhulst hadn't even published in Dutch, except the Gollancz books. With Nelly prodding, George said that The Flight of the Eagle—it was called the Cry of the Eagle then (selected 1969 talks being published by Harper and Row shortly)—is available without Servire, and they all dove for that. De Vidas will offer that to Delachaux et Niestlé. Then, when the meeting was all over, George said to de Vidas he would have to wait three weeks until George had talked to Verhulst. At that point I went back in, and Nelly and I pointed out that he had to give de Vidas a letter authorizing him to offer the book immediately. A long day.'

Sunday, September thirteenth, 'Erna, Theo, and I met Saul Rosenthal at Alton, and we all came back in time for Krishnaji's fourth talk in the tent. A big crowd. Afterward, the four of us lunched and talked in the new West Wing dining room. Krishnaji ate in the tent, then joined us, and we set a line of proposal to be made to Rajagopal to join us, and become a trustee of KFT in London.' What?! Well, that's what it says. 'Via a cordial letter from Saul and Leipziger to Loebl saying that Krishnaji would come on his way to Australia to Ojai to meet Rajagopal to invite him into the fold. Specifics to be worked out by lawyers later. Discussed this as essentially what Rajagopal seems to want as an ultimate face-saver for him. Krishnaji then rested and went downstairs, and he questioned Mary Cadogan on events in the past. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji came down and the English trustees, i.e., the Digbys, Dorothy, and David Bohm, met Saul. All of us discussed the above proposal and got their consent to inviting Rajagopal to join KFT London.' I don't remember anything about that!

S: I never heard of that before.

M: Well, it obviously sank into the mist, and was never heard of again, but at least it showed an effort to try to have come to some accord.

On the fourteenth, 'Saul Rosenthal left Brockwood and flew to Los Angeles. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, the Digbys, Dorothy, David Bohm, Balasundaram, and I met to discuss the Indian Foundation and relations between the three Foundations. The question of Krishnaji's formal position on the KF India was discussed, but can't be settled until Pupul Jayakar arrives later in the week. Krishnaji raised the question of what is his and everyone else's responsibility in all these matters, and bore down on Balasundaram about whether the Indian schools really work at the teachings. Otherwise, the American trustees—if they get Ojai funds, can't, with a responsible conscience, support them,' meaning India. 'Balasundaram gave the history of the Rishi Valley Trust, the Foundation for New Education and its relation with KWINC, and finally the structure of the present KFI. This took all day.'

The next day, 'Erna and Theo left Brockwood to drive back to Frankfurt and fly from there to California. Krishnaji dictated #8 in the education book to me. The de Vidases left. I put de Vidas clear on the story he got from Vigeveno, and has repeated, that in 1966, when Krishnaji came to Ojai, he refused to see Rajagopal but sent Alain Naudé instead.' That was a complete fabrication. 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked in the p.m.'

The next day was pretty much the same.

On the seventeenth, 'he dictated #10 of the education book. Pupul Jayakar was met at airport by Dorothy and Balasundaram, and arrived at Brockwood for a very late lunch. Krishnaji talked to her and Balasundaram, and after tea Dorothy, Krishnaji, and I went for a walk.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji, Pupul Jayakar, Balasundaram, and I met in the morning and discussed the KFI's relations with the other KFs. She understands, as does Balasundaram, that funds in the United States cannot be divided equally.' They wanted whatever KFA got to be shared.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'She suggested an annual meeting be held of at least one member of each of the three main Foundations, as only then could there be cooperation built for now and for the future. Suggested topics: the needs of each foundation, publications, matters of overall policy, and any other pressing matters. She had read the legal papers about Rajagopal and is shocked. She wants Madhavachari to see them. Krishnaji asked for suggestions for a settlement, and it was suggested that Rajagopal be given something to do. Krishnaji then told her and Balasundaram, in total privacy, of what was decided during Rosenthal's visit last Sunday, i.e., to offer Rajagopal membership as a trustee of KF London, and this in return for all assets in archives.' You can see why…

S: I can see why that didn't float. [Both laugh.]

M: 'They both welcomed the idea and approved completely. We discussed Krishnaji being on the KFI board as a distinction for three main Krishnamurti Foundations, and as a differentiation from subsequent ones.' If he was on the board, that would be the difference between the three main ones and any future ones. 'They will try to come up with something, what will probably be honorary.' You see, they didn't want him to have any power.

S: Any voting rights, yes.

M: 'Pupul says that if Krishnaji disapproves of anything, everyone on the Indian board would do what he says.' And then I have parenthesis question mark: '(?)'

S: Mm.

M: 'Later in the day, I voiced my doubts about being an Indian trustee. She said it had been a gesture, and it didn't matter if I couldn't attend meetings. She seems to understand that it wasn't feasible to have representatives of each Foundation on all the boards.' That was another thing that came up. 'But thought the idea was a good one in principle. Hopes that the annual meeting of representatives from each Foundation will have the same effect. In the p.m., Krishnaji held a meeting with the school. A Wilfred Thomas telephoned to ask to interview Krishnaji for Australian broadcasting. Michael Rabiger of BBC came to talk over a half-hour film of Krishnaji and Brockwood next weekend. This was a long and tiring day.'

On the nineteenth of September, 'Krishnaji dictated #11 in the education book. Balasundaram left. In the late afternoon, Krishnaji and I took a long walk, coming back across the fields and into the Grove. We had Whisper with us, and we no sooner entered the grove than there was an extraordinary silence. Neither of us spoke, and we walked as though we didn't want to tread on the grass. There was no wind; an utter stillness. The great trees were like silent living guardians of something, witnesses. There was a sense of something sacred, a presence that was total stillness. When we came out, latched the gate and walked across the field, Krishnaji said, "Did you feel it? It was something holy. One didn't even want to step on the grass. Whatever there is about this place is centered there, not in the house." Late in the evening, I remembered my dream several summers ago in Gstaad.' Oh, that's the river dream; I don't want to go into it again.

'After supper, Mrs. Jayakar and I talked in the drawing room. Krishnaji was above in his room, and while we sat there, that strange quality was in the room. She spoke of the book she is writing on art and yoga. We spoke of Krishnaji.'

On Sunday, the twentieth, 'Krishnaji planned to write, but a conversation at breakfast lasted into the morning. He sat with Pupul and me in the West Wing dining room, and got onto the subject of kundalini. He questioned Pupul on whether her observation of what happened in Madras and at Ooty in 1948[5] could have been kundalini. Her version, which she wrote in detail, was taken by Rajagopal, who forbad her to make a copy. She described it to Krishnaji and me. She and Nandini were staying in Vasanta Vihar. They heard Krishnaji groaning in his room and went in, fearing he was sick. He looked at her and said, "Are you Rosalind?"

She said, "No."

He told them to stay in the room and not leave him alone. He said, “Krishna has gone away,” and then he put his hand over his mouth and said, “I mustn’t say his name. He doesn’t like me to say his name.” He was in apparent pain, sweating and faint.

This happened again the same year when he was staying with Frydman[6]. It would start around 6 p.m. and lasted until 1 a.m. He told Pupul and Nandini to stay in the room’—this is the Ooty occurrence—‘but wouldn’t have Frydman there. He would faint and an extraordinary beauty would come into his face. Pupul described what was happening to him as seeing a total cleansing of his mind.

In reply to Krishnaji’s questioning, she said that she wouldn’t describe it as kundalini, which is a result of conscious deliberate meditation on chakra centers in the lotus pose, and the result of great effort and a release of great energy, bringing various powers, etcetera. But Krishnaji’s various related experiences were different. Leadbeater, who knew at least something about kundalini, couldn’t explain Krishnaji’s experience. In kundalini, there is a breaking of the energy in the mind, like an explosion. Krishnaji never seems to have been caught in conditioning. He was very interested, and questioned her at length. After these episodes, he has no memory of them at all. In Madras, and maybe it was at Ooty, he spoke of “the shining ones, the great ones are here.” In the afternoon, Krishnaji spoke to the school and we took a walk.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji dictated #13 of the education book. I went for my postal order for a new passport for Krishnaji. Pupul will take the application to the high commissioner tomorrow. We walked in the afternoon.’

On September twenty-second. ‘Pupul left, and the following day, Krishnaji dictated #14 in the morning. I dashed for the 12:50 p.m. train to London and, with Anstee, covered many shops looking for a table and something to put over the fireplace in the drawing room. Home by 7:15 p.m.’

On the twenty-fourth of September, ‘Krishnaji and I to London by train. Huntsman fittings for both of us. We lunched at the Aperitif, stopped at Mallard’s for Krishnaji to look at the third piece of the tapestry we could get for the drawing room’—that’s the one over the fireplace—‘and a vase of flowers. Krishnaji liked it, and so I will get it for the fireplace. We took an early train back.’

Friday, the twenty-fifth, ‘Michael Rabiger who works for the BBC and is making a half-hour color film of Krishnaji and Brockwood, came with two others to start three days of work on it. Krishnaji dictated #15 to me in the morning. I met Sacha de Manziarly at Alton. He is spending the weekend.’

On the twenty-sixth, ‘Krishnaji dictated #16 to me in the morning. In the afternoon, there was filmed discussion between Krishnaji and fifteen students and staff. We took a walk with Henri Methorst, who came for lunch. Anneke came in the evening. I met her at Winchester. She is to spend the week.’ Do you know who Methorst is?

S: Mm, hm.

M: Sunday, the twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji dictated #17 in the morning, and then held a discussion with the school later in the morning. In the afternoon, he was interviewed on film by Michael Rabiger.

On the twenty-eighth, 'I read in the Times that there is a huge brush fire in Malibu. Krishnaji said I should telephone immediately, but it was 1 a.m. in California then, so I waited. Then a telegram came from Betsy saying both houses are safe, the Dunnes and Filomena as well. Krishnaji finished dictating #17 that he'd begun the day before.'

On the twenty-ninth, 'With Krishnaji to London. He to Mr. Campion'—that's the dentist—'and I to Mary Cadogan, and then to American Express to pick up Krishnaji's new passport and tickets. Straightened out my own at TWA, and bought at Pan Am my LA to Sidney/LA ticket. Meanwhile, Mary Links fetched Krishnaji at Campion's, and we met at L'Aperitif for lunch. Sacha came, too. Krishnaji and I did errands and finally took the train home.'

On the thirtieth, 'I took the 7:50 a.m. train to London. Got Krishnaji's and my Australian visas and then Krishnaji's Italian and U.S. visas, and got to the Brompton Oratory at 1 p.m., where Ginny Travers met me, and we found a small Italian restaurant in Beauchamp Place for lunch. Bill is in Spain on a picture. The lion that Krishnaji and I saw in June is now in Kenya with George Adamson.[7] [Both chuckle lightly.]

At 3 p.m., I met George Digby at the Victoria & Albert and had a very nice afternoon, being shown all through his department, which was textiles. I saw a tapestry like our tree and the vase one at Brockwood. I went with him to their house, and had a pleasant tea with him and Nelly. Caught the 7:42 p.m. train home. A letter had come from Filomena about the fire.'

On October first, 'for the first time, Krishnaji and I went to London via the Winchester Station. Krishnaji was very pleased with it, as it was a better train. Part of the scenery was new, with some yellow fields of mustard. He was "lost" and far away. Later, he tried to put it into words in a dictation: emptiness and stillness within, which lasts all day. "That is my rest," he said. We went to Huntsman and to L'Aperitif, where Mary L. joined us. Krishnaji went to Mr. Campion while I walked to the health food shop on Baker Street. We had luck in immediately finding a taxi, which took us to the train back to Winchester.'

October second. 'Krishnaji had said he would have only one more talk to the school this coming Sunday, but Doris Pratt came upstairs and made a rather dramatic plea for one today, too. I said it was too much, but left it to him. "Nonsense" from Doris; she said something to the effect that people were going to kill him with their demands anyway, so it was necessary for the school that she should be the one to kill him by asking for the meeting.' That was Doris's…

S: That was Doris's logic.

M: …logic. [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji said, oh, it didn't matter; he would see them at 4 p.m. He thought I was angry, which I wasn't, only disapproving, but leaving it at that. He charmingly tried to divert me by saying lovely things and about the trees and sky. [Both chuckle.] He began dictation on #18, but it didn't come, just a description of yesterday in the train. He intended to do one from the point of view of European students, but gave it up. A walk after the school discussion, and he was tired and wanted to turn back before either Dorothy or I did.'

October third, 'I got a letter about the California fire: horrendous. Krishnaji switched the student in the dictation to an Indian one, and completed #18. He slept well last night. There was a cable from Erna that Rajagopal telephoned her last evening, asking "as an old friend" if she would see him. She said yes.

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated #19. Roger Straus of Farrar, Straus & Giroux came to lunch with Krishnaji, bringing an Italian woman, Lucia Marionetti Barbi. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with the school.'

On October fifth, 'I spoke on the phone to friends in Malibu. Krishnaji dictated #20. We talked Anneke about the Stichting[8]. She left after lunch. Krishnaji was interviewed for Australian radio by Wilfred Thomas and his wife. We took a late walk in the rain.'

The sixth, 'was packing and deskwork all day. The drama over Dominic leaving or not leaving continues. He wants Krishnaji to see him. The students also want Krishnaji to see him, and Dorothy said it would help their state of mind. So, he saw Dominic. The boy really had nothing to say.'

'In the afternoon, we fled the packing and had a marvelous walk down the lane between the fields. The sky had dark clouds with bright sun, illuminating the earth. Autumn has touched the trees. There was the lovely color of the Hampshire earth, honey-buff and pinkly brown where some of the fields were plowed. The air was bright and clean and had the sharpness of autumn, though it wasn't cold. We cut across the great bowl of a field and ate blackberries along the hedge. Whisper has learned to catch them. What a lovely land it is.'

On the morning of October seventh, 'we were up early at 5:30 a.m. Krishnaji did his exercises, and I packed. Doris was very helpful with last-minute things, and yesterday, she got the interview correspondence off my back'—that means she typed things for me. We said goodbye to Mary L. by telephone. Everyone was lined up on the driveway to say goodbye to Krishnaji. I went around first, and there was a real warmth of affection in each one of them. Even Dominic, who was leaving the scene, was on the point of tears, and leaned suddenly to kiss my cheek. Katherine Merriment Lane, the new student, gave me two little letters, one for Krishnaji, one for me. A very touching and gentle goodbye. Krishnaji then shook hands with each one; and with Dorothy in the Land Rover, we drove off for Heathrow.'

‘Letters had just come from Erna, describing her telephone call from Rajagopal. Copies of lawyer Wyatt’s reactions to Rosenthal-Leipziger draft. I read them to Krishnaji in the car and raised the point that Rajagopal may well try to telephone Krishnaji in Rome. We discussed what he would say if this happened, i.e., that if Rajagopal asked to see him, that he is coming via California to Australia and might see him then. Wyatt made a strong point that Krishnaji shouldn’t see Rajagopal alone, and Krishnaji said he would take me, or if Erna has seen Rajagopal by then, that the three of us should see Rajagopal. Wyatt wanted a witness to what is said at the meeting.’

‘At Heathrow, we negotiated our mountainous luggage, mostly mine. Went first to Alitalia and checked Krishnaji through, then to Air France for me. Dorothy said goodbye to us and we went through immigration and sat in the departure lounge for about forty-five minutes. Humanity was a scruffy lot, and Krishnaji was all elegance and simplicity. His Rome flight was called and he went off with the grace, exquisite manners, and face lighting up in affection that only he has. My flight was an hour late leaving. Krishnaji was arriving in Rome before my Air France took off at 3:15 p.m. The walk to the plane and from it in Orly was almost more than I could manage. I carried camera, cassette tape recorder, Uher, typewriter, and a bag with all of Krishnaji’s dictations, and both books in tape and notebook form. [Both M and S laugh.]

S: That’s your playing Sherpa once again. [Said laughingly; M chuckles, too.]

M: I went to Father’s and found him looking well. We talked and had supper. Doris telephoned from Brockwood that Rajagopal had just rung from California for Krishnaji, and was told he’d gone to Rome. I thought about telephoning Krishnaji to let him know Rajagopal might call, but thought this morning’s conversation covered it. Shortly, the telephone rang again and it was Vanda’s voice, and Krishnaji wanting to tell me that Rajagopal had just rung in a very pathetic voice, and wants to see Krishnaji as soon as possible. Would he come to California? Krishnaji said he already planned to go there en route to Sidney. Rajagopal wants to see him and tell him that he loves him, and then see that things are alright. Krishnaji said he would think about it and Rajagopal said please telephone as soon as you are there, that the meeting was more important than the talks in Australia, that he wants to see that things are alright and be his old self. Krishnaji said to me he thinks Rajagopal is afraid he will die and wants to mend things with Krishnaji. Asked me to tell Erna but have her keep it quiet.’

The next day, ‘I wrote a cable and letter to Erna with Krishnaji’s messages. I lunched with Father at Ledoyen, and bought a suit at Dior.’

On the ninth of October, there is more about Paris. ‘I went to Charvet and chose four shirt materials for Krishnaji. During supper, Vanda and Krishnaji telephoned. Rajagopal had rung again from Ojai. Vanda asked him not to speak to Krishnaji, who was resting. Rajagopal gave his message that if Krishnaji didn’t “withdraw for technical reasons,” Rajagopal would be forced to go to court to defend himself, and Krishnaji would be “exposed.”’ You see, it was always one day that, and the next day this.

S: Remarkable.

M: Yes. 'That he loved Krishnaji and that the reason he was calling was that Krishnaji must see him in California. I asked both Krishnaji and Vanda if Rajagopal had said he would go to court, or it would go to court. Krishnaji put Vanda on, and she wasn't positive which of the two it was. Rajagopal asked if I were there, and she said I was in Paris. Rajagopal said that Krishnaji would never have done all this but for those around him.' [Both M and S laugh.] 'Krishnaji had been resting in bed'—this is in Rome—'and felt (quote) "washed out" (unquote), but went for a walk and to Marchetti today, but found it closed.' That's the shirt-maker.

S: I remember.

M: 'The telephone connection broke at this point. Wrote another cable to Erna about Rajagopal.'

'The next day I moved to the Plaza Athénée to make room for my brother and Lisa, his wife.'

On the eleventh, 'We went to Longchamp. I spent the evening typing in the hotel.' [Said with a chuckle.]

On Monday, the twelfth, Paris. 'Krishnaji telephoned from Rome. He has had no more calls from Rajagopal. He has been resting and going to the cinema. Sounds relaxed and as if he felt like chatting. He speaks in Perugia on Saturday. He asked me just when I will be in California.' Well, then it's family things.

'I went to the Goya exhibit at the Orangerie, and walked to Robert's chemist for a Braun electric razor for Krishnaji. Arranged with Mr. Dickinson at Lobb to get Krishnaji's new moccasins and *embauchoir[9] by Wednesday. It was a hot day, 75 degrees or more. Marcelle Bondoneau came to tea. There was a late supper at Father's. Played parts of Betsy's tape with the Dunnes and Filomena on the Malibu fire to Bud and Lisa.' Betsy went out and interviewed them all. They'd had a terrible fire; we almost lost their house and my house next door.

On the thirteenth, "to the races again with Father. His colt came in second in a race. Bud asked where Krishnaji and I would stay in New York in April. I asked Father if I could be the tenant of his Ritz Tower flat. He said he wouldn't use it; go ahead and talk to the manager about it. No offer to let me have it or reduce the rent. Bud was aghast, but I wasn't surprised. Father seems to have some sort of insecure feeling about money, bordering on anxiousness.'

The next day, 'Father is taken in an ambulance to the American Hospital. He was in intensive care. He'd had a heart attack.'

S: Oh.

M: ‘But it doesn’t seem too severe. I canceled my flight tomorrow. Bud telephoned Ms. Neilsen to tell Mother and so forth. I packed and checked out of the Plaza Athénée and moved over to Father’s flat. We went to see him in the afternoon and he was sitting up and reading a detective story and complaining most energetically about the supper they gave him. I talked to the doctor. I talked to Krishnaji in Rome and told him the change in my plans. He goes on Friday afternoon to Perugia and returns to Rome on Sunday.’

On the fifteenth, ‘I went with Bud and Lisa to the hospital. Father was sitting up very talkative, indignant at the food.’ Then it’s all about Father.

S: How old was your father in 1970?

M: He was born in ’92. So, he was 78.

I’m still in Paris on the sixteenth. ‘Father was better and so I decided to leave for New York tomorrow. He was eating lunch when we left the hospital, so absorbed in it that he didn’t look up when we left. We ran into Dr. somebody, the English doctor who examined…’ well, that’s all about Father. The heart event did no damage to the heart, but he’s not generally in good condition, nor is his whole vascular system.’ Well, I won’t go on about that.

On Saturday, the seventeenth, ‘the news from Father at the hospital was that Father spent a good night. This allowed me to pack early and breakfast with Bud. The bags were already loaded in the car by Michel’—Michel was the chauffeur. ‘When the telephone rang, it was Krishnaji from Perugia asking for news of my father and my plans. I said he was better and I was leaving in ten minutes. “Oh, in that case, I won’t say what I was going to suggest?”’

‘“What was it?”’

‘“That if you have to stay with your father and you want to come with me when I go? Do you want to come with me when I go?”’

‘I said, did he want me for any reason? That I would, if he wanted me to. It was very tempting. But I would still have to go to New York eventually and settle everything there. So, we talked just a little. He gave a talk this afternoon. The call made me happy.’

‘So I went to Orly and took the noon plane to New York.’ Well, it was about the plane; officials are looking at baggage now of suspicious-looking things. Had a seat in the non-smoking center section. ‘Got to New York seven and a half hours later, exhausting wrestle with my six checked bags and four hand-carried ones.’ [S laughs heartily; M chuckles.] ‘Went to Bud’s apartment. Spoke to everybody on the telephone.’

The next day, ‘I went up to my mother’s at the Vineyard, and went to Seven Gates and walked around.’ And we’ll skip all that.

S: Did your mother just have property at Seven Gates?

M: Mother owned the property; it was hers, and she left it in her will…

S: The property that Bud has?

M: Yes. She left it in her will to Bud and me, and as I never intended to use it, Bud bought me out and built his house. Mother owned it for years; she kept talking about building, but she never did.

There's just family stuff until October twenty-second, when 'I left on an early flight to Boston, then New York. Letter from Erna about her calling Rajagopal to accept his request that they meet, which got postponed, of course. Went to the Ritz Tower to speak to the manager about Father's apartment for Krishnaji in April. The daily rental is $108!' Huh-huh. That seemed awful to me by the exclamation point.

S: [chuckling] Oh, yes.

M: On the twenty-third, 'I went to meet Mr. Donald Cutler and Mrs. Marie Carlton respectively, religious books and publicity department at Harper. Saw the cover of The Urgency of Change, which has a dark blue and black background, full face of the Beaton head of Krishnaji. George Digby says Mary L. dislikes it. Not a photo I like, but thought the cover used it fairly well. Discussed TV and magazine interviews and articles with Krishnaji for the spring visit. They suggested David Frost, Dick Cavett, and Newman on today's shows, also New York Times Sunday Edition and TIME Magazine. Went to the Town Hall and met the manager, Ms. Bean, who showed me around, and discussed details for Krishnaji. Lunched with Phyllis Lutyens. Bought a T. Anthony bag. Quiet evening. Typed the dictations. Telephoned June Gordon, who had told me there was a rumor among the Gurdjieff people who quote Alan Watts saying that "Krishnaji has died, and they are keeping it quiet."' [S chuckles.]

It goes on about family things. Hehhh. 'Went to Asia House where I saw an exhibit of Asian statuary, including two Cambodian statues of a standing Maitreya.' The rest is all family stuff. I'll skip all this.

On the twenty-seventh, 'I left Bud and Lisa after breakfast with seven bags checked, four in hand still.' [Laughing].

S: You picked up another bag! [chuckling]

M: 'Took TWA to Los Angeles, passing over Monument Valley, the snowy Rockies, and down into the dirty brown smog of Los Angeles. Amanda met me and we came to a burned, black Malibu. Filomena, looking strong and healthy and full of energy, rushed up the path. A Santa Ana'—that's that wind, you know— 'was blowing in the night and had destroyed the garden flowers and the pristine neatness she had achieved, but the inside of the house shone with white immaculate walls. She has painted the whole inside; ceilings, cupboards, shelves, everything. New blue and white curtains were up in Krishnaji's room, made of the toile Anstee got for me and sent over. Outside the trees are brown. The eucalyptus may come back; I doubt the pine trees will. The fire went over the brick wall and burned all the oleanders right up to the house. I haven't yet walked to see all the rest, but the canyon is a blackened void. Went at 5 p.m. to the Dunnes' and sat for an hour and talked with them both. How good it is to be with them, to see Filomena, and be in this dear, beautiful, and surviving house.'

'There was a letter from Rome written by Krishnaji each day. He had rested a lot and went to the movies. He says he might have more rest in the future. I must see to it. Oh, how willingly.' [S laughs.]

S: Boy, that came really close, that fire.

M: Yes. That was part of the awfulness of Malibu, these fires that you could do nothing about. And then ironically, you know, Sam and I lost our original house to fire, but not one of these wildfires. So, there's a pause here.

S: Good. Where do we pick up? We'll stop now.

M: We'll stop now.

S: But where do we pick up?

M: We pick up on Thursday, November third, 1970.

Editor's Note: A loose leaf of paper fell out of one of Mary's diaries when I was checking on something. The paper is undated, so I have no way of knowing where to put in in the chronology of these memoirs. Nevertheless, it seems important to put the contents somewhere, as they appear to be direct quotes from Krishnaji. The four short quotes are as follows:

"I woke up yesterday a.m. I don't know how to describe it—I never had it in my life before. I had it all day. It is there now."

"A sense of tremendous brain power—not to do something—just pure brain power. I got a little nervous of it watching. Yes, it is indeed. Entirely different—never had it before."

"Woke up with it."

"Woke up and there it was. Then I got a little nervous—it was so strong, as though tremendous power was there—limitless, vast. I don't know how to describe."

Issue 17: October 1970 to May 1971

This issue sees a flurry of attempts to have a resolution of the Rajagopal conflict without it going to court, but they are all futile.

This issue also seem to contain, more than most issues so far, Mary's expressions of wonder and appreciation of Krishnaji's nature, and her dedication to him and his teachings.

Scott: Where are we beginning?

Mary: October twenty-seventh, 1970.

S: Okay.

M: Well, it starts for me in New York. I'd been there for a week or more with members of my family. I flew back to Malibu on that date, and it was lovely being home. There was a letter from Krishnaji, um…

S: Yes, read everything. [M chuckles.]

M: Well, there was a letter written by Krishnaji each day. 'He had rest and more rest and had gone to the movies. And he says he must have rest in the future and I must see to it,' which of course pleased me profoundly, because I thought he should, too. So we now jump to November…

S: Maybe this is just an interesting point for a diversion, because [chuckling] I know Krishnaji used to say that he needed to rest, or he would acknowledge that it was good for him to rest…

M: Yes.

S: …but as soon as something came up, Krishnaji would give it his attention.

M: That's right. That's living in the present!

S: [laughing] So, it was absolutely hopeless to try to get any rest for him!

M: I know. I know it well! [Laughs.]

S: Well, this is just important to mention for the historical record.

M: For those who may someday listen to all this.

S: Somehow he always put his own well-being after the needs of…

M: Yes.

S: …other people and the places he created.

M: Quite so. [S laughs.] We now jump a week to Tuesday, November third, 1970: 'Krishnaji left London on TWA at 2 p.m.' Krishnaji had flown to England after his brief series of talks in Italy. 'I voted in the morning and met him at the airport at 4:30 p.m., and he looked very well in spite of the long flight. He wasn't at all depressed by all the fire'—if you remember, or anybody remembers in this account, Malibu had been devastated by fire—everything was black and horrible. But, 'he didn't seem to be downcast at all. And said, "It will all grow back."'

S: Mm, hm.

M: He thought that everything would be razed to the ground, but what little was left, the few houses, surprised him.

The next day, 'we had to go to the dentist because Mr. Campion in London had given him a bridge, which was hurting him, so we went to my dentist, who fixed it. And then we came back for lunch, and Erna, Theo, and Ruth Tettemer came at 4 p.m. to see Krishnaji, have tea, and talk everything over. Earlier that day, I had talked to Saul Rosenthal'—our lawyer—'who had rung Mr. Loebl'—Rajagopal's lawyer—'to prod him for a reply to our offering Rajagopal to become a trustee of both the English and U.S. Foundations.' There was no reply, obviously.

The fifth of November 'was a lovely, quiet day and Krishnaji slept mostly. I spoke to Alain Naudé in Berkeley and invited him to come down for the weekend.'

On the sixth, 'Krishnaji felt feverish in the morning. His temperature was 99.6, going up to 100.2 in the afternoon, but it fell back to normal by nighttime. I met Alain at the airport in time for lunch, and he rang Dr. Schmidt, a homeopathic doctor who is the brother of Pierre Schmidt'—the one that Alain and Krishnaji had gone to in Geneva. 'He suggested ferrum phos,' which is like giving aspirin in homeopathy [both chuckle]; if you don't know what to say, you give ferrum phos! [S chuckles.] It can't do any harm. Anyway, 'Alain reported that there were no serious religious people where he'd been. In the evening, Rajagopal rang and told me to "give Krishnaji his personal, not legal, greetings."' That was the message.

The next day, 'Erna said that Rajagopal had also rung her and asked her when Krishnaji arrived and when was he leaving.' And then, well, there's a lot about my father's health, which was bad. Oh, yes, 'Alain said that what he saw around him was a drug-oriented society. He said that a good article he wrote was refused in the Berkeley Barb…' That's the university paper.

S: Yes.

M: '…because it implied criticism of drugs. Krishnaji was well on this day, and wanted to go to a movie. So we drove to Hollywood and saw something at the Chinese Theatre, which was dreary,' [chuckling] it says here.

November eighth, 'we had breakfast in the dining room, all three, and talked at length. Krishnaji said that if one is serious about inner things, the means come about. One doesn't worry about it. Later, Alain was taken back to the airport by friends, and Krishnaji and I had a beach walk. He asked me to telephone Radha Sloss and give her his greetings, to say he had not been feeling well, but he would ring her on his return in March.' You see, we're now about to go to Australia.

On Tuesday, the tenth, 'Krishnaji rested and I did deskwork. After lunch, we drove to Santa Monica to fetch things at the Jaguar place, and bought some Scholl's sandals. [Chuckles.] After that, we then went to a movie called Cougar Country. In the evening, Rajagopal telephoned. Krishnaji wouldn't speak to him. He told me to tell him that because he (Rajagopal) had been abusive on the telephone in Rome, he would not talk by telephone. If he had anything to say, to write to him.'

'Rajagopal said angrily, "I will never write him," and rang off. Later, he rang back in a different tone, and asked if I would talk to him. Then there ensued a part of his neurosis, saying Krishnaji had destroyed him all over the world, with people thinking he is an embezzler, etcetera.'

'I tried to get through and say that first Krishnaji had not talked about him—on the contrary. And that if he wants to be reconciled with Krishnaji, to reply through Loebl to the settlement suggestion we had made. That the door was open to a solution, and that we all wanted it, and with deepest sincerity. But from his non-response, we could only conclude that he didn't want a settlement.'

'"How can I work with people who think I am an embezzler?" he said. Then he said that there would be no settlement until there is a meeting between him and Krishnaji. That it is a personal matter.'

'I said, "Krishnaji has said there is nothing personal to discuss, only what concerns KWINC, the Foundation."'

'"What foundation?" said Rajagopal. "You aren't in this," he said, "It is between Krishnaji, Rosalind, and me."

'I repeated Krishnaji's statement, and said that Krishnaji had been repeatedly willing to see Rajagopal, and that in every instance Rajagopal had prevented it. His last telephone call to Krishnaji in Rome was an example of his being disagreeable and abusive.'

'"I didn't abuse him," he retorted. "He is a liar, a hypocrite, and a coward."' [S laughs.] '"He hides behind women," meaning me and Vanda.'

‘I finally rang off.’

The eleventh. There’s a long thing about my father, which I won’t repeat. But also, ‘I talked to Saul Rosenthal and David Leipziger and reported the conversation with Rajagopal. They have a reply from Loebl, which is discouraging. Loebl wants to know if our offer for Rajagopal to join the Foundations as a trustee rejects the suggestions of Tapper about publications.’ You will remember that Tapper[1] had said that Rajagopal should have something to do with publications, which we were dead against.

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘I said he has summarized Tapper’s suggestion incorrectly, that Tapper’s suggestion had been that Rajagopal would get copyright to the post-1968 material, etcetera. I said Krishnaji and I both felt Tapper should take hold and bring in the KWINC board. Krishnaji and I then took a beach walk. In the evening, Rajagopal again telephoned and asked to speak to Krishnaji. Krishnaji told me to tell him that he had again abused and insulted him through me, and therefore, if he had anything to say, to write. Rajagopal was angry, and said a “goodnight” and hung up.’ This went on and on.

S: Extraordinary.

M: On Thursday, November twelfth. ‘We finished packing. Krishnaji and I had supper at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 p.m., Amanda came and drove us to the airport. We boarded a Pan Am 747 plane at 8:30 p.m., but were almost two hours on the ground before taking off. We landed at Honolulu around midnight. The tropical soft air was lovely and we walked for exercise and circulation briskly up and down the airport waiting room for forty-five minutes. We changed to a 707 and flew on across the vast ocean.’

People stared at you, you know, if you didn’t just sit down or stand there.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm. This is also an opportunity to say that Krishnaji often exercised in breaks on flights. And that’s unusual, walking briskly up and down.

M: Well, it was as I recall, a twenty-two-hour flight.

S: Yes.

M: So it was a good idea to walk.

S: Yes, but even on the flights to India, and from Europe to America, he would exercise if there was a stop.

M: Mm, hm. Yes.

Friday, November the thirteenth, 'crossing the international dateline, we lost this day. But in East Pakistan there was a devastating typhoon and tidal wave which may have killed a million people.' God!

Saturday, November the fourteenth. 'We crossed the equator somewhere west of Fiji—a first for me—and landed in Sydney around 10:00 a.m. The press and television people interviewed Krishnaji. We then were met by Mr. and Mrs. Reg Bennett, Barbara and Spencer English, Donald Ingram Smith, and a Mrs. Marsha Murray. We were taken to Manly, a suburb of Sydney, to a very nice apartment on the eleventh floor of a new building above the harbor with a magnificent view of the bay. The Bennetts and Englishes have thought of everything. Mavis B. and Barbara E. are to do the marketing and lunches, and I will do the rest here. They would come each morning. Krishnaji and I took naps all afternoon.' [Chuckles.] It was very nice. They had arranged everything very well.

Sunday, the fifteenth, Sydney. 'Krishnaji rested all morning. Mavis Bennett and Barbara English did the lunch. We discussed the plans for the meetings in Sydney, TV, and newspaper interviews, etcetera, and also their thoughts on whether an Australian Foundation is necessary. Reg Bennett and Spencer English came in the afternoon for the walk. In the evening, Krishnaji and I watched the Hitchcock movie North by Northwest.' [Both chuckle.]

The next day, 'Donald Ingram Smith brought a TV interviewer, also a reporter from the newspaper The Australian. The Bennetts and Englishes and Smiths were all at lunch. The Bennetts took me to Manly for errands, and Krishnaji and I walked at six.'

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji had a public discussion in the Mona Vale Memorial Hall at 10:30 a.m. He said later it was like, "pushing a weight."' [Chuckling.] 'We drove with the Englishes and their son David, who came back for lunch. We had naps in the afternoon, and Krishnaji and I went for a late walk. At supper, we saw the television interview that Krishnaji made yesterday, and out of all that they shot, they only used one minute of what he said. They spent the rest of the time on the story of his arrival here in 1925, when the Australians thought he would arrive walking on the water.' [M and S laugh.]

The next day, 'Krishnaji showed the Leipziger and Tapper letters about Rajagopal to Reg Bennett and Spencer English[2]. The Bennetts then took me on a drive northward to Ku-ring-gai, where I saw koala bears, emus, and wombats, all kinds of brightly colored parrots, and went in the kangaroo enclosure where you can come close to them. They have soft fur.'

S: Hm.

M: On Thursday the nineteenth, 'Krishnaji held the second public discussion in Mona Vale, and it went better; they seemed to catch on.'

‘The next day was quiet. In the afternoon, I went in to Manly and bought paperbacks for Krishnaji to take to India. Detective stories,’ obviously.

On Saturday, November twenty-first, ‘we had a quiet morning. I made a light lunch for us, then we went with the Bennetts to the Sydney Town Hall, where at 2:30 p.m. Krishnaji gave his first talk. There was a crowd of around fifteen hundred. It was Election Day, and some rather rowdy young people, who had been passing out communist papers at the polling places next door, came in and called out rough questions. One came down to the edge of the stage and challenged Krishnaji on a question of social change. Krishnaji’s answer quieted him to silence.’

Next day, Sunday, ‘Krishnaji and I drove with the Englishes to Sydney for Krishnaji’s second talk, a most intense one. In the middle of it, a young man climbed up on the stage and sat himself self-consciously at Krishnaji’s feet. Krishnaji was taken aback for only an instant and asked him to move further away. He then took up his talk where he had been interrupted. When it was over, Krishnaji had that half-faint, far-off look. In the p.m., we walked alone. At 7:00 p.m., we saw a good nature film on TV of rare Australian animals; and at 7:30 p.m., the Bennetts and Englishes came and showed a color film of the Great Barrier Reef.’

On Monday, November twenty-third, ‘Krishnaji held a discussion with about thirty-five people chosen by the Bennetts and the Englishes, here at the flat in the morning.’

The twenty-fourth. ‘Krishnaji has been questioning the Bennetts on what it was like here in the Leadbeater days; why people accepted Leadbeater, etcetera. They suggested asking Harold Morton, who was once one of “Leadbeater’s boys” and still lives here with his wife, whose brother is Oscar Kollerstrom, a Leadbeater favorite, now a psychologist in London. So, Morton came for lunch. He was a white-haired, pink-faced, aged, adolescent-looking man. He spoke with some detachment and a tinge of humor about it all. Krishnaji questioned him, and most of his answers as to why people believed so in Leadbeater were that they wanted to believe in all of it, in the supernatural, his supposed clairvoyance; and so, no one really dared question him. Krishnaji asked him if Leadbeater was homosexual, and Morton replied that he was; he knew it definitely in two instances, one from the boy himself, and in the other from the father of the boy. Krishnaji was appalled that a man would so use his position of trust. The clairvoyance was discussed, its apparent genuineness, first of all in the recognition of Krishnaji, and in foreseeing a ship sinking which turned out to be the Titanic. Also, its nonexistence, as when he cabled for news of one of his boys, Tom somebody, who had already died.’

S: Hm.

M: ‘Krishnaji and I walked in the rain in the late afternoon. In the morning, we had watched the departure of the aircraft carrier S.S. America. Krishnaji said it would be fun to be its captain. He would like that.’ I have photographs of that; we were standing on the balcony.

S: Yes, I've seen those.

M: This splendid great carrier was going out through what they call "the heads," which are the two cliffs on either side of the entrance to the harbor. It was a very splendid sight. We could see right across. We were high up on a hill and also on the eleventh floor, so we had a great view of this, steaming out through the heads.

On the twenty-fifth, 'he gave his third talk.' I don't seem to say much about it.

On the twenty-sixth, 'Donald Ingram Smith and Marsha Murray came to take Krishnaji and me to the Australian Broadcasting Corporation, where at 1:45 p.m., Krishnaji was interviewed on television for half an hour by a Ross Saunders. It looked excellent on the monitor. Krishnaji paid little attention while Saunders read passages on belief from Penguin Krishnamurti Reader, which is published here, too. Then Krishnaji demolished belief, religion, etcetera, and went on with such a fresh clarity until the end of the half hour, covering a great deal with simplicity and eloquence. We must get a print for the archives. We took naps when we got back and then walked in the rain.'

Editor's Note: The linked text is labeled as occurring on November twentieth, but Mary's daily diary is certainly correct.

On Friday, the twenty-seventh. 'After lunch, the Englishes took me to see The Manor, where Mary Lutyens and Ruth Tettemer, as well as the others, lived with Leadbeater. It is now a Theosophical home for retired people. We drove past, then went to a Swiss health food shop where I arranged for some good lecithin granules to be packed so that Krishnaji can take them to India. Then we went into Sydney and got Krishnaji a beige sleeveless pullover, which he likes so much that I will try to get a cardigan to match. Kitty has written'—that's Kitty Shiva Rao—'that it is cold in Delhi.'

On Saturday, 'Krishnaji had a quiet morning in bed. I fixed us a light lunch, and then we went with the Bennetts to Town Hall for Krishnaji's fourth talk at 2:30 p.m. At the end he spoke of beauty, asking, "Is it in the object? The sky? The white sails on the harbor? A Velázquez?"—which sold yesterday in London for $2.2 million pounds,' [chuckling] 'which I had heard on the radio and told him about at breakfast). "Or is it in you? As long as there is space between you and that, there is no beauty. Only when there is no self is there beauty." He was tired when we came back and we skipped the walk.'

On Sunday, the next day, 'he gave the fifth talk at Sydney. He said to me, "I don't feel as if I had been working here," which made my spirits soar. He said he wasn't tired because he had done nothing when not talking. He had slept, read, and walked. NO'—underlined four times—'private interviews. I am to reply to inquiries in the U.S. saying there will be no interviews.'

Monday, the thirtieth. 'Krishnaji held the second private discussion in the apartment. He was delighted with the cardigan to match the beige pullover I bought on Friday. If I see something I think he would like, in the way of some good detective novels, I am to buy them for his arrival in Malibu. “I like new things,” he said, with his face alight.’ [Chuckles.]

S: Mm.

M: So, December first. I went into Manly to cash a check and send flowers to the Bennetts and Englishes. This was a packing day. The Bennetts and the Englishes came by in the p.m. for the walk. In the evening, Krishnaji told me to write only letters that could be read by anyone, as his mail is not secure in India, and even at Brockwood, letters could be opened by mistake. He said about Rajagopal that I, Erna, and Roth lawyers must discuss what to do, and not wait to consult him. He will not be a part of litigation, but if we decide to pursue Rajagopal, “All the better.” He said this might need immediate decisions to be made, and he trusts me to make them. If I am acting for him according to the thing, not because of my personal feeling, I will be alright. He said Rajagopal has stolen. That he, K, will not accept any telephone calls from him or any emissaries. It may be a question of money to finance a suit, and we, KFA, must decide. This was the first thing he wanted to tell me, and the second was that we are getting older and must beware of falling into bad habits,’ [chuckles], ‘i.e., I have rubbed my nose in an unbecoming way lately.’ [Chuckles.] ‘Three, he is feeling increasingly far away: “Lately, perhaps, I am becoming as I was as a little boy, vacant.”’

S: Hm.

M: ‘I must look after things, somehow do things anonymously, so people will not resent it. “We must figure out a way.” He asked me about the book’—that’s the book he’s writing. ‘He feels it should have another five chapters. I am to send him a list of what questions were asked in the student section of the book. He may add to it. I asked him about the part in which he said, “You have raised a generation with regard for nothing.” And he agreed that it was too harsh, and that I must change it. We talked about the personal letters that came for him; he has changed back and forth whether I am to open them or keep them for his arrival. It wound up that I should open them and, if they appear very personal, to hold them. But no one must know they have been opened by someone other than him. He said he felt very well; he looks and acts well.’

On the second of December, ‘Krishnaji and I had breakfast and were packed and ready by 9:45 a.m. The Englishes came and took the luggage, while Krishnaji and I drove with the Bennetts to the airport. I checked Krishnaji through for his flights to India; his tickets and passport. Then, checked myself and luggage onto Pan Am for my 5:30 p.m. flight back to L.A. There were some people to see Krishnaji off. He had that remote look.’

‘It was hard to have him go on such a long flight alone. His Qantas flight to Delhi went via Hong Kong, ten hours, and then another six-and-a-half hours to Delhi. He had said goodbye to me in the apartment; from then on, he was far off. It was a hot day, and he wore his cotton grey sports shirt and carried the nice Gucci bag that Vanda gave him. At the airport, he wandered off and stared while waiting to leave, as he does so often in airports. He shook hands very formally with everyone, including me, and went to his plane. We all waited and watched until it took off and became a tiny white dot in the sky.'

'I went back to Sydney and took the Bennetts, the Englishes and David English, Marsha Murray, and Donald Ingram Smith to lunch. Had something called the Salad Bowl in Kings Cross. Then said goodbye to them and went back to the airport with David English, who works in a restaurant there. I sat and talked to him for an hour, and then read until my 5:30 Pan Am flight.'

'Krishnaji had left at 11:30 a.m., was due in Delhi at midnight. I flew all night and landed back at Honolulu at 7 a.m., which was also December second because of gaining back the day that we lost on November thirteenth. I went through customs there, and walked for exercise for an hour. Then, in another aircraft, flew to Los Angeles. Flying along the coast on such a clear day, I could see Ojai and houses all the way down to the airport. Arrived at 4 p.m. Amanda was waiting, and we came back to Malibu in clear, clean air. Five-and-a-half inches of rain fell here last weekend. I cabled Krishnaji of my safe arrival as he had asked me to.' That's it.

Krishnaji in India

Editor's Notes: On December fifteenth, Krishnaji wrote to Mary from New Delhi that "We did another dialogue this morning with Pupul. They are going to be rather good." http://www.kfoundation.org/transcripts/701215.txt

Krishnaji wrote that "Pupul & others said, what a marvelous talk etc." he'd given on December twenty-fourth. http://www.kfoundation.org/transcripts/701221.txt The Archivist assures us this is the talk from the twenty-fourth, but is mislabeled as being from the twenty-first.

There isn't much about Krishnaji until February twentieth, when Krishnaji flew from Bombay to Rome after his India program, and on the twenty-second, from Rome to London to stay at Brockwood for a couple of days.

So, on February twenty-fourth, 'I drove to the Los Angeles airport at 4:30 p.m. and ran into Peter Ustinov[3], who was also waiting for the Pan Am arrival. He said he has children who live near Lausanne. Krishnaji arrived from London at 6 p.m., looking marvelous. We came home and had dinner by the fire.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji rested and slept most of the day. We talked at length. He taught me a new pranayama[4] taught to him by a sannyasin from Bangalore. We went early to bed.'

On February twenty-sixth, 'at 11:30 a.m., the Lilliefelts and Ruth Tettemer came, and with Krishnaji we discussed current matters. At 1 p.m., Sidney Roth joined us for lunch. We continued our discussion until 5 p.m. Theo drove Roth to town, and dropped Krishnaji and me at the repair place, where we picked up the Jaguar with its new fender, and from there we came back to Malibu. Krishnaji and I had supper by the TV.'

The next day was a quiet day. Krishnaji slept a lot. We walked around the garden in the afternoon.

'Four days after his arrival, I telephoned Rajagopal and invited him and Mima Porter here on Krishnaji's behalf. Rajagopal said that he couldn't leave Ojai because he was ill; we must come there. It was agreed, and an appointment was made for March third, at 2 p.m.'

On March second, Krishnaji reported having a dream of a large man who was unfriendly to his being in this house. Something about the man's mother in the dream.

On the second, 'Krishnaji began a new dictation tentatively titled, This is meditation.' I think I labeled it Dictation No. 1 – Spring, Malibu. 'It was a clear, cold day. We walked in the garden.'

On the third, 'the weather was marvelous. We had an early lunch, then Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai and met Rajagopal at his house at 2 p.m. He, in bare feet, Krishnaji elegant in grey flannels, turtleneck jersey, and a tweed jacket. His wife was there initially, but soon left. Mima Porter was half an hour late, so we sat and made social chat. Krishnaji looked splendid and was quite relaxed. The talk was casual of things and doings in India. This continued for some time after Mrs. Porter's arrival.'

'Rajagopal seemed nervous and unable to begin a serious conversation or say what he had asked Krishnaji to come and hear. Krishnaji was poised. Finally, he asked Rajagopal to talk about whatever it was he had to say. Rajagopal began what became a tirade, saying that Krishnaji had attacked him, blackened his name, etcetera, etcetera. Krishnaji explained why he broke with Rajagopal and KWINC, and said he had completely lost contact with Rajagopal due to all this, and probably there had never been a real relation between them. This seemed to shake Rajagopal. At one point, when I was pointing out to Rajagopal his inconsistencies, he tried to silence me by saying that I was trying to protect Krishnaji. I said I was replying to what he, Rajagopal, had said and continued, and it looked for a moment as though he would come apart. He shook. He cannot stand logic and pressure. He veers off and tries to muddy the issue. At the end of three hours, he said that Krishnaji must retract all criticism, announce publicly that he was mistaken, that Rajagopal has done nothing improper, apologize, and then, perhaps, the right time could be set to discuss what should be done with KWINC and KFA. We left at 5 p.m. and went to the Lilliefelts' for tea. Ruth was there, too. We were back in Malibu by 8 p.m.'

The following day, 'Krishnaji dictated a letter to Rajagopal saying that he had come to try to find a basis for some contact with Rajagopal, and that it was up to Rajagopal to respond in deeds—that his action would be his reply. It was up to him. I spoke to Leipziger. After lunch, we went to the Truffaut movie Bed and Board. Home in time for a walk.'

On March sixth, 'Krishnaji, Alain Naudé (who arrived yesterday for the weekend), and I had breakfast in the dining room. Krishnaji rested all morning. We had an early lunch. At 2:30 p.m., Krishnaji and I drove to Santa Monica for the first of Krishnaji's four talks at the Civic Auditorium. It was full. We walked in the garden on our return. Krishnaji and I were alone for supper.'

The next day, 'I cooked an early lunch for Krishnaji and Alain. Krishnaji and I drove to the Civic Auditorium just in time for the 3 p.m. talk number 2. He spoke of the violence of comparison, and as long as thought exists there can be no meditation. Afterward, Frances McCann, Ruth McCandless, and the Lilliefelts came to tea. Krishnaji, Alain, and I had supper by the TV.'

On March eighth, 'Alain, Krishnaji, and I talked at breakfast and Alain talked alone with Krishnaji during the morning. Krishnaji, Alain, and I drove up Coral Canyon and walked along the top of the hills.'

The next day, 'Alain left for Berkeley. Krishnaji and I lunched alone. After his rest, we went to town for errands. Bought books at Campbells, etcetera, and came home to supper.'

On March tenth, ‘at 4 p.m., Peter Racz, a young man who had come from Brazil to hear Krishnaji, had a meeting with him. We walked in the garden. A copy came of Tapper letters to Loebl regarding Rajagopal’s abuse of trust.’

The next day, Sidney Field lunched with us.

There is nothing more on Rajagopal matters until ‘a letter came to Krishnaji from Mima Porter dated March twelfth, hinting at “personal matters between Krishnaji and Rajagopal,” which Rajagopal was hurt by Krishnaji not coming openly to tell him squarely what had happened, surreptitiously that all this was the crucial matter Rajagopal wanted to clear up in private conversations with Krishnaji.” Hence, Rajagopal’s exasperation when Krishnaji wanted only to discuss KWINC affairs and not “that cadaver which is rotting between you and him.” And she added that Rajagopal is the victim. To this, Krishnaji wrote to her: “If there were problems between Rajagopal and myself, I do not see that it is anyone else’s business. The fact is there are no personal matters that need discussion between Rajagopal and me. The constant implications of something personal is a very obvious attempt by you, by Rajagopal, by others, to evade the serious issues of KWINC and your grave responsibilities to that trust.”’

On March thirteenth, ‘Krishnaji gave the third talk in Santa Monica.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji gave the fourth talk at 3 p.m. in Santa Monica. A wonderful one on meditation. The Lilliefelts came for tea afterwards.’

On March fifteenth, ‘Krishnaji sent a letter to Mrs. Porter. A Mrs. Nicholson and her son Richard came for interview as a possible Brockwood student.’

The next day, ‘after lunch, Krishnaji and I drove to Santa Monica on errands. We walked in the garden. Rajagopal telephoned to speak to Krishnaji but hung up when I relayed Krishnaji’s message that he wouldn’t speak to him, but to write or give me a message.’

On March eighteenth, ‘we left at 10:30 a.m. for Ojai. Krishnaji had a treatment from Dr. Lay. Then we had a picnic lunch at Lake Casitas. It was a clear, hot, marvelous day. Wind from the lake kept us cool. Krishnaji was delighted. We went to the Lilliefelts’, where Krishnaji rested. Then at 3 p.m., there was an open house for all and sundry to see Krishnaji. We were home by 6 p.m.’

Three days later, ‘Dr. Lay gave Krishnaji a treatment in Malibu and stayed to lunch. Philippa came, too. We did a garden walk.’

On March twenty-second, ‘Krishnaji dictated book material and letters. A letter came from Rajagopal to Krishnaji saying that it was obvious that Krishnaji wished their personal friendly relationship to cease, but that he intended to continue his work for the teachings.’

On the next two days, Krishnaji dictated on the meditation book and also letters. And on the twenty-fourth, Krishnaji had me ring Rajagopal and say he wished to see him and Mrs. Porter next week, and that he had something very serious he wished to say. It was set for next Wednesday. It was subsequently postponed by Rajagopal by two days.'

On the twenty-fifth, 'we drove to the University of Southern California; at noon, Krishnaji held a discussion with students. The Lilliefelts came back with for a late lunch. We talked all afternoon.'

On March twenty-sixth, 'I went early to town on errands, including renting a Nagra tape recorder. I then met Alain and Professor Jacob Needlemen and wife at the airport, brought them to Malibu where a taped interview occurred between Krishnaji and Needlemen. At the end of that we had tea, and then there was a second discussion. Alain drove Needleman to the airport and came back for supper and to stay. We all three watched a TV version of "Gideon" with Peter Ustinov.

The next day, 'I recorded two dialogues between Krishnaji and Alain. Alain was in good spirits and behavior, helpful, relaxed, and nice. In the evening, a French mathematician, Yegor Reznikov, came to call on Alain and they went out to dinner. Alain will continue what he is doing, but hopes that through some charter to get paying speaking engagements in the fall. Krishnaji is going to give him his old bequest from Mrs. Dodge[5]. I will try to help.'

On March twenty-eighth, 'after breakfast, Krishnaji and Alain did a Nagra recording of a discourse on good and evil. We discussed Rajagopal. Krishnaji rested in the afternoon. We all went on a garden walk, then had an early supper, and were early to bed.'

On March twenty-ninth, 'Krishnaji, Alain, and I drove to the University of Southern California, where at noon Krishnaji gave the second student discussion. We gave a lift back to Westwood to Yegor Reznikov, and then the Jaguar blew a gasket. Alain collared a taxi, and Krishnaji and I returned to Malibu in it. Alain got the Jaguar to Brentwood Motors, and came home in a taxi. The Lilliefelts arrived too, and we all had a late lunch and talked all afternoon. We took a late walk in the garden. Alain is to leave tomorrow.'

Friday, the second of April. 'Krishnaji and I, on a lovely day, drove after lunch to Ojai and Rajagopal's house. Krishnaji had said that he wanted to be outside, so we sat on a balcony. Mima Porter was there. Krishnaji had brought notes in his handwriting of the points he wanted to cover.' You see, they had to be in his handwriting. If they were in my handwriting, Rajagopal would say, "This isn't you. You're being influenced."

S: Mm, hm.

M: That perpetual nonsense.

S: Hm.

M: 'He said it was a last attempt to bring order. He spoke of his reasons for the break; Rajagopal's refusal to inform or consult, and the limited activities of KWINC; the systematic elimination of Krishnaji as the founder, and the plot by Rajagopal; the Vigeveno letters, and the Casselberry and Porter letters, all threatening; the lawyer saying that Vigeveno and Casselberry letters were extortion; Porter's broken promise in Paris about the archives; the Noyes' settlement offer which came to zero; Rajagopal using KWINC money to fight Krishnaji; his showing letters to Hislop'—Hislop was a man who was around—'spreading stories to Fred Williams.' Fred Williams is that awful man.

S: Which awful man?

M: Oh, he was a violent man. He came to Saanen and he threatened to kill Alain Naudé, or at least attack him. He was very rude, and awful to Mary Cadogan. He's the one who was terribly anti-Semitic.

S: Mm, hm. Yes, you told me about him.

M: 'Rajagopal and Porter were dead quiet through all of this. Krishnaji was nervous, but spoke very slowly, almost hesitantly.'

'Porter took exception to the comment of her doing nothing, said she had written to Krishnaji in '68 that Rajagopal would hand over everything to him.'

'Krishnaji said, "I never got that."'

'I reminded her that her letter had said that Rajagopal loved Krishnaji and that they should talk it over in the autumn and settle it then. But that this was a brush-off at the time, and not an offer to turn everything over to Krishnaji.'

'Rajagopal then said that he had been accused, and that "your lawyer" had dug up information and that he must have the chance to refute it.' Actually, it was Erna who did all the research on finding out his maneuvering with real estate sales to his own benefit.

'Porter went on about the letters of criticism of Rajagopal.'

'I said that the ending of all this, if it was so distressing, was through the open door of the settlement, a dignified reconciliation and joining of forces.'

'To Krishnaji's saying that KWINC funds were being used to fight Krishnaji, Rajagopal said, "Your funds were going to lawyers."'

'I said that that was not so. Not a single dollar of public donation had been spent for legal fees, only private and special money given for that very purpose.

Rajagopal was so insistent that only a public vindication would satisfy him and that reconciliation with Krishnaji wasn't enough, that we said it was then fruitless to continue, and that he was choosing to push it to court. He said we did; that we offered a reconciliation with one hand and a gun with the other. We started to leave. Rajagopal said that he had wanted a private conversation with Krishnaji, and then the work, etcetera could be allocated in discussion between all of us. Krishnaji said he would do that, but that now he was too tired and had to leave. He went out to the car. I rose to follow, and Rajagopal said he had the Dodge papers I had requested for Krishnaji. These turned out to be a statement from the First National City Bank in New York and a checkbook on an account in Krishnaji's name at Security Pacific in Hollywood. Rajagopal said he would ring me tomorrow about another meeting. I said that, if it concerned the work, that Erna Lilliefelt should be there. He said, "not now."'

On Saturday, April third, 'A hot day. Ruth Tettemer lunched with us. Erna and Theo went to town to lunch with Sidney Roth, and brought him here. Krishnaji napped while the rest of us discussed relations of Roth's fund and KF of A. Sidney has given ten thousand dollars outright for legal reasons and ten thousand for filming. But part of the legal ten went into the filming so as to not miss the opportunities to record Krishnaji on film. He pledged $30,000 in total, but $20,000 is to be paid back out of the film income, if and when we get it. The formula for this was the subject of discussion. Also in dispute is Sidney Roth's wanting us to pick up his expenses.' Well, I won't go on about that, but we said we couldn't put them on our books. 'We said that none of us, as trustees, are charging the expenses we incur, but are doing it in our personal tax return. The KF books should cover no personal expenses, even though incurred in the pursuit of KFA duties. Sidney Roth is emotional, touchy, but basically kind and generous. His unfortunate long-windedness wears everyone out and causes both Erna and me to push somewhat to get to the point. He feels, or felt, till today, antagonism in Erna, but today's meeting cleared the air.'

'A proposal to find an educational film company to put up funds to finance the film we have in storage, distribute them, might solve the above $20,000 problem. Theo took Roth back to town, and Krishnaji, Erna, Ruth, and I had tea. Krishnaji wondered out loud about what would be a proper response if and when they meet and Rajagopal admits his faults. Meanwhile, Rajagopal has not called about this next meeting.' Krishnaji was always hopeful that the man would behave decently.

S: I know. I know.

M: 'It was a hot day' on Sunday, the next day. 'Ninety-three degrees in town. I rang Rajagopal about a meeting tomorrow at 3 p.m. I worked all day at the desk, except for weeding and pruning a little in the garden. And then a walk with Krishnaji around the lawn when it was cool. When I asked Krishnaji on whether he wanted to go to a movie, Wellington'—there was a movie called Wellington—[mimics Krishnaji's voice] '"What! Go to see my favorite hero defeated?"' You know he was a great fan…

S: Of Napoleon! Yes!

M: Of Napoleon! [S laughs.] Which I found absolutely incomprehensible! He was a man who defeated all of Europe, who did nothing but wage war [more laughing by S], and Krishnaji admired him. [Both laugh.]

'As part of our ongoing feud about who was doing the dishes, Krishnaji said, "I'm carrying out the dishes, and if I can't do that, I'm going back to Madanapalle!" I said, "Do you want to be the Rishi of Rishi Valley?" Krishnaji said, "Yes."' [Both laugh.] Oh, dear.

On the fifth of April: 'We drove on a hot lovely morning to Ojai. At noon, we had a board meeting of the KFA: the Lilliefelts, Krishnaji, Ruth, and me. Then lunch. At 3 p.m., Krishnaji and I went to Rajagopal's, and Krishnaji and Rajagopal talked on the balcony while I sat in the car. Mima Porter arrived at about 4 p.m. and sat with me in the car. We didn't discuss anything serious.'

'At about 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji called to us to join him. Rajagopal said they had completed a personal discussion, and I asked Rajagopal to repeat to me his proposition. Rajagopal said it was the offer he had made through Colonel Noyes in London in 1968 with some modifications. I asked why then he had withdrawn the offer, or denied it.'

'Rajagopal said because Krishnaji had "demanded that the archives be turned over to him."'

'I said that request was made after Rajagopal had sent word to Krishnaji that he would have to go to court to get a tape of the talk he had given the day before in Ojai, and refused him his own manuscript.'

"I deny that," said R.'

'I said, "Don't deny it to me. I came over to this very door with Alain Naudé, and asked you for it, and was refused admittance." I said I could not remember the details of the Noyes memorandum. Would he have Loebl send it to our lawyers?'

'He said he didn't want to do it through Loebl. That he and Mima Porter would draw it up and send it to us. Then all of us and our lawyers could consider it with Tapper and, if we have an agreement, then all the lawyers could draw it up in legal form. All through this, Rajagopal was alternately irritable, ready to fly off the handle, or insistent; which irritated Krishnaji, and made him try to stop Rajagopal from hammering points. This, in turn, made Rajagopal madder. I tried to quieten it and get him to say what he proposed. He wants, of course, a statement from Krishnaji withdrawing accusations.'

'We left, and Krishnaji told me the personal side of their discussions. The bickering in the past, past disputes, hurts. Krishnaji injecting himself into Rajagopal's divorce dispute. Krishnaji told him of Rajagopal's daughter's visit to him and me. I don't know whether Rajagopal knew about it, but probably yes. I also don't know if Rajagopal had just secretly recorded Krishnaji's conversation with him. My last words of warning to Krishnaji as we drove in the entrance were, "Remember, please, that he could."'

'"I completely forgot," said Krishnaji. "I looked at the mountains and forgot everything."'

'We drove to the Lilliefelts'; Ruth was there, too, and we all talked a while and then we left. On the way home Krishnaji said he felt free of a weight, the weight of Rajagopal. It wasn't until later that he wondered if he had said too much. Said he had done everything he could to reach Rajagopal, to go far beyond halfway in trying to solve it all. He never wants to see Rajagopal alone again. He said, "I don't know how to deal with people like this. I would be vague and agree to anything. That is what happened in the past."'

S: Mm, hm.

M: That's the only time they talked alone during all these years.

April sixth. 'Donald Hoppen just arrived from Brockwood, and came to lunch. He feels Brockwood lacks vitality. It needs better staff but something in the atmosphere has kept some good prospects away. He showed a plan for a new dormitory and pictures of a model of it. It will go where the pavilion[6] is. Krishnaji was tired and didn't have his mind on Brockwood. He asked Donald to make a memo on it. Krishnaji went to bed after a short walk and supper.'

The next day 'we went to the dentist, and Krishnaji had his teeth cleaned. A memorandum came from Rajagopal on the settlement basis he spoke of Monday. He proposes to "turn over part of the real estate," but it is so poorly worded with assessor's value and cash value that it is unclear whether he will give it or sell it to K Foundation. There was no mention of Arya Vihara. There was also no mention of K & R…' That's the K & R Foundation, '…or AB trust.' That's the, um…

S: Annie Besant.

M: …Annie Besant trust. 'He wants funds for salaries for KWINC and he wants statements clearing him. From all this it appears he will keep the assets transferred and the K & R, the archives, and some of the land. What KF would get is problematic. I read it to Erna and then to David Leipziger on the telephone. The latter will discuss it with Saul Rosenthal.'

The next day, the eighth. 'Leipziger and Rosenthal do not think Rajagopal's memorandum will lead to a settlement, but think we should reply in the form of a letter from Erna, Ruth, and me as trustees, keeping Krishnaji out of it; asking for clarification of his points while stating that we are continuing the lawsuit, because of the long delay in exploring "other avenues" of action. Erna is to draft the letter.'

The following day, 'Erna, Theo, and Ruth came in the afternoon with the draft of a letter, much of it by Leipziger. Erna and Theo looked up assessors' maps and discovered that an eleven-acre piece south of the Happy Valley School is part of the twenty-three-acre piece. Apparently he will keep most of the fifteen acres around his own house. Erna, Ruth, and I are on the committee for KFA to sign for this end. Krishnaji doesn't want to have any part of the settlement negotiations. Erna retyped the letter with some small changes, and we signed it.'

On the tenth of April, 'We packed. Sidney Field, and a Mr. Harry Wolfe, whom Krishnaji last saw in 1935, came for tea. Donald Hoppen came later. We discussed Brockwood, and also the possibility of Alain Naudé being there.'

S: Of Alain going to Brockwood?

M: Yes, being part of Brockwood. You see, Alain had then left all the Krishnamurti organizations. But, um…

S: But Donald thought that perhaps he would do some good at Brockwood?

M: Probably.

Sunday, the eleventh April. 'Such a lovely morning. The Bullock's Orioles were bathing and preening their feathers. A great-horned owl made his sound in the pale dark before dawn. It was quiet and completely perfect waking up in this house.'

'Then, in the morning, Krishnaji felt he should telephone Radha Sloss[7] because he had said he would. There ensued a tirade from her, hammering at Krishnaji. Her father might go to jail. Krishnaji said it was up to Rajagopal. He had been offered a settlement to wipe out the past, but he hadn't taken it. If Rajagopal settled, Krishnaji said he would make a public statement of reconciliation.'

'"You should make it first," said Radha. "You care about money." She repeated this over and over. When Krishnaji said it was up to Rajagopal, the way out had been offered, she said, "I don't accept that. You told me three years ago you wouldn't have anything to do with KWINC as long as he was head of it."'

'Like both her parents, she reiterates what was said in the past as though the present didn't exist. Her blistering nag had Krishnaji shaking. It was worse than his meeting with Rajagopal. He was a wreck by the time he was able to end the conversation.'

'An hour later, during lunch, she rang back and said that her father had offered a settlement and had no acknowledgement. Krishnaji said it would reach him Monday or Tuesday. Other people are busy, too. "But you'll be gone. Who is he to deal with?"'

‘Krishnaji said he was out of it, and that the KFA would reply. At the end of this conversation, Krishnaji said that he would never ever see any of them again alone, that I must remember this, and remind him, and protect him from this sort of bullying.’

‘I asked if I had his permission to answer them immediately if they should telephone and handle it directly without going to him to ask what to do. He said to do it myself. It was monstrous to see him belabored this way. I felt bruised as if it had happened to me. Curiously, it was as though I felt what he felt, rather than the effect it would have had if it had been directed at me. Later in the afternoon, I went over to see Amanda and Phil, while they had supper. The peace of sanity there [chuckling] and the rare lovely quiet of the house and garden and place we love.’

The next day, the twelfth of April. ‘Amanda came at 7:30 a.m. and drove Krishnaji and me to the airport, while Filomena followed in a taxi with our pile of luggage. Krishnaji, Filomena, and I flew on TWA to New York, arriving at 5 p.m. A car and driver met us, and we went through the slow traffic to the Ritz Tower, where Krishnaji and I have taken Father’s apartment, and Filomena has a studio in the same building.’

The next day, ‘I did some marketing. We lunched in the flat, and went in the afternoon to the Hotel Lombardy, where Krishnaji had his hair cut. Then over to Doubleday to buy some detective novels, and Krishnaji chose a new Barzini book, From Caesar to the Mafia.

S: Hm.

M: I have that at Brockwood.

S: In Ojai?

M: No. This is, I took it to, ah…

S: Oh, you brought it here?

M: Brockwood…no, it’s at Brockwood.

S: We’re at Brockwood.

M: Sorry, I’m disoriented. [S laughs.]

S: I know; it feels like we’re back in Ojai.

M: We’re in Brockwood, are we? [Laughing.]

S: Yes, we are. [Laughing.] I think so!

M: Yes, we are! [Both laugh]. It's here, probably in the other room. I saw the shelf in my mind's eye and thought, that's at Brockwood! [Both laugh]. Hippocampus gone! 'We walked back. Narasimhan came to see Krishnaji. [Chuckles.] His new Mercedes 300 was stolen on the streets of New York.'

S: Oh, dear!

M: 'We spoke of China opening up; the U.S. ping pong team has just been invited there. Sees rapprochement between U.S. and China and Russia in the future. Rajagopal received the letter from Erna, Ruth, and me today. We don't know yet what happened.'

April the fourteenth. 'After lunch, Krishnaji and I took the American Airlines flight from LaGuardia to Washington. It was a pretty day; daffodils were in the park, and they pleased Krishnaji. We went to the Shoreham Hotel where the American Society of Newspaper Editors is holding a conference, and where it had engaged rooms for us. Krishnaji didn't want to go out for a walk, so we had supper in the rooms.'

The next day, 'Mr. A.A. Smyser of Honolulu Star Bulletin was in charge of Krishnaji. We met him downstairs, also Mr. Newbold Noyes, editor of the Washington Star and the man who had invited Krishnaji, and also his assistant editor, a Mr. J. William Hill. Krishnaji was the last speaker after the others, who spoke on the future. Toffler, the author of Future Shock, was the first speaker. We had to wait downstairs for about twenty minutes. Krishnaji was to speak, but they only left him fifteen minutes. He spoke forcefully and to the point, but he felt afterwards that it was a waste. Theo had come down. He and Erna had arrived in New York from Ojai yesterday. Krishnaji, he, and I had a meager lunch at the Shoreham, and left for the airport. It is impossible for Krishnaji to eat in this country in restaurants [chuckles]. We flew back to New York and Theo came up for tea. Then we walked a bit down Park Avenue. He and Erna are at the Commodore. Krishnaji wonders if it had all been worth it.'

The sixteenth, 'After lunch, Krishnaji, Filomena, and I walked up 57th Street to the Sutton and saw a movie, Little Big Man.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Krishnaji said it was very good. We shopped in the Bloomingdale's food department, and came back in time to have Erna and Theo to tea. They brought a copy of Krishnaji's latest book, The Flight of the Eagle, a Harper paperback, 1969 talks in Europe, and some Saanen discussions. Nice-looking cover. They also brought a book, The Quiet Mind by John Coleman, a former CIA Agent who has two chapters in it about Krishnaji. He came to Brockwood and had an interview with Krishnaji in September '69, and had met Krishnaji in India previously.'

'After supper, Krishnaji spoke of chastity. It must have an absence of ego, will. It is missing in most people.'

Saturday, which is the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji felt sick to his stomach at lunchtime and ate almost nothing. He slept till 4:00 p.m., then had a cup of rose hip tea. At 5:15 p.m., in Bud's station wagon with a driver, we went to the Town Hall on 43rd Street. A huge queue outside. We caught Narasimhan outside of it and took him in. The house was totally filled, and some had to be turned away. Krishnaji showed no sign of weakness, but spoke in that deep other voice, almost from the beginning of the talk. There were difficulties with the sound, and an officious woman was clearing the aisles. The talk was videotaped. The audience seemed young in a larger proportion than usual. Afterward, Krishnaji was dizzy, far-off, and seemed almost faint, but wanted to sit at the card table where we eat, and even turned up the television. "It helps me unwind," he said. He ate very little, and went right to bed.'

'In the talk, he had said, "The worst crime is to be in conflict." And later he told me to remember to tell him, "Knowledge is the basis of the mind being hurt." During the talk, a man brought a brilliant red rose and put it at his feet on the platform. Later, when he seemed to cough, another one brought him a paper cup of water. Krishnaji put it on the floor and seeing the flower, tried to put the stem into the paper cup. He said later, "That man on the platform must know a great deal." [Both laugh.] And we talked of pain, as opposed to suffering. Pain can be felt organically, or through sensitivity, but suffering is when the mind holds onto it.'

The next day, 'at 5:30 p.m., Krishnaji gave his second talk at the Town Hall. During the day, he spoke of Rajagopal, Rosalind, and what makes people go wrong. I asked if there were ever a time when Rajagopal and he would talk about the teachings, about all the things he and I talk about, and he said, "Never."'

On Monday, the nineteenth of April, 'I did deskwork all morning. It was a bright spring day, and we walked to the Côte Basque and lunched with the Ingersolls. He thinks,' [meaning Ingersoll] 'that Krishnaji should talk only to a few influential people. Wonders if the young today are not a suicidally self-destructive generation. Mrs. Ingersoll mistook Krishnaji's estimate of the world as cynicism. Krishnaji and I went to Mark Cross for my annual new wallet, and then went to Tiffany's, where Krishnaji chose four twisted gold rings for me. We came back to the Tower and he took a nap while I went to see Natalie Davenport at MacMillan for fabrics for the living room in Malibu. I brought back samples for Krishnaji to see. We walked up to 70th Street and back.'

On the twentieth, 'Mr. Clayton Carlson, the new religious book department head of Harper and Row, brought Mrs. Claire Rosen of TIME Magazine to interview Krishnaji. A nice, bright woman. In the p.m., we went to look for other fabric samples for Malibu sofas, and decided the first one was best.'

The next day. 'TIME Magazine sent a photographer, who took about a hundred pictures of Krishnaji. He sat quietly as though it were part of the job.' I never could get hold of those pictures. I wrote and tried to get hold of some.

S: From TIME Magazine?

M: Yes.

S: Hm.

M: 'Frances McCann came for tea at 4 p.m. and talked to Krishnaji. We walked her back to her hotel.'

The next day, 'While Krishnaji called on Mrs. Pinter, I shopped at Bergdorf, and then we walked back to the Ritz Tower. Then we walked to see a movie called The Andromeda Strain, science fiction, and Krishnaji found it exciting. Mitchell Booth[8] came in to see us, and said that the people most prone to court litigation are schizoid, paranoid personalities. [Both chuckle.] Quite late, Krishnaji said, "Angels are looking after you. They will look after you after I am gone." He repeated it.'

On Friday, April twenty-third, 'Krishnaji asked me if I remembered what he had said. I repeated what he said about angels, and asked what he had meant. "You should have asked the man then," he said. "Probably it meant you are protected, and will be after I am dead." I felt and said my life's meaning for me is usefulness to him. He said he had a marvelous meditation in the night.'

'I went to Bloomingdale's and bought him a new Tourister bag. After that, Jonathan Ward of CBS came and interviewed Krishnaji for radio, accompanied by Miss Margo B'—something—'of Harper and Row. Ward seemed intelligent, and the interview, which will be used in segments on the CBS network, went well. Krishnaji again talked of the futility of external change.' The rest is just family.

The twenty-fourth of April. 'Krishnaji said that in the night his head felt as though the brain were being operated on. There was no pain but "the body was frightened." Had I been awake, he would have talked to me and "gone off." The unusual thing is that I was quite widely awake in the night. At lunch, he seemed "off" and remote, a little unconnected, and said he felt quite empty. At 5:30 p.m., he gave a very good talk, the third at the Town Hall, on relationship. "Corruption is absence of relationship," love, and death. He spoke for one hour this time, and over half an hour on questions. An Indian woman, Susheela Deshponde, had an appointment to greet him backstage very briefly.' I forgot to say that Narasimhan came by to see him in the morning. 'Krishnaji looked exhausted, and for a short time, as we sat down to supper, he was still in the state of the talk. His hands were cold. And then he relaxed, and television, as usual, came like an aspirin for him.'

Sunday, April the twenty-fifth. 'It was my father's birthday and so I went up to lunch at Bud's and we talked to Father, who was in Paris. I got back in time to go with Krishnaji to the fourth talk at the Town Hall. It was another superb one on religious meditation. These four have been among the very best.' I haven't listened to those talks since. I should have; I will.

The next day, ‘I went for Krishnaji’s French visa. Krishnaji and I took the Lilliefelts to lunch at Orsini. We decided to rent Carnegie Hall for Krishnaji next year. The Lilliefelts leave tomorrow.’

April the twenty-seventh. ‘I fetched Krishnaji’s French visa and got him the Netherlands one. In the afternoon, we went to a movie, Valdez is Coming, and walked back. David Leipziger telephoned that Tapper wants a copy of the complaint to go to the KWINC board before he calls them. There has been no reply to Erna’s, Ruth’s, and my letter by Rajagopal. I talked to Erna, who has gone to Connecticut. Theo flew home to Ojai.’

The next day. ‘Packed. Filomena and I rushed over to Bloomingdale’s to exchange Krishnaji’s new suitcase for another one. Packed until at 4:00 p.m. Bud’s car with a driver came. We said goodbye to Filomena, who flies back to Malibu tomorrow, and left for the airport. Our flight to London, which was to leave at 8 p.m., was merged with another and later TWA one. We ate a miserable salad in the TWA restaurant, and finally took off at 11 p.m. Krishnaji was appalled at a gross woman [chuckles] who had false eyelashes, a low-cut dress, and dyed wild hair. “An insult to women,” he said. We had little sleep.’ [Chuckles.]

The twenty-ninth. ‘Dorothy Simmons, who had been waiting since 7 a.m., was there when we arrived at 11:30 a.m. In the Land Rover, we drove to Brockwood. Spring is just beginning. The trees are still bare, but the daffodils are bright. It is lovely to be here again. We were in time for a late lunch with the school. We took naps. Then, Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I took a walk, which blew the staleness of travel out of our lungs. I slept profoundly.’ Now this is…you’re not there yet, are you in ’71?

S: No, I didn’t start at Brockwood until 1974.

M: Well, the next day we unpacked and I talked to everybody.

On May first, ‘Krishnaji and I drove to Blackdown for tea with Mary and Joe. Alain has just arrived from California, where he spent Wednesday night with the Dunnes, and was there for a weekend, and will be in London for a month. We all took a walk and saw the bluebells and came back to tea. Amanda Pallant[9] and her children, Anna, Nikki, and Adam were there. It was her seventeenth wedding anniversary and hard for her, as she and John[10] are still separated.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji talked to the students, and I taped it on the Uher.’

On the third of May, ‘Mary Cadogan and the Digbys came down. We all talked before and after lunch, discussing all sorts of things, including what the Perrine building would be used for.’ This is the building that never came about. Mrs. Warren Perrine was going to build a building over where the pavilion used to be. It never happened. ‘Krishnaji said a dormitory for students and lodging for an ashram when he holds that. If the school had fifty students, it could break even.’ [Both chuckle.] Oh, those were the days. Krishnaji mentioned to the Digbys the idea of Alain being invited for the ashram if the hatchet between him and Dorothy could be buried. The Digbys were enthusiastic about the idea, but questioned if it could come about.'

Editor's Note: An "ashram" is what Krishnaji was calling, in the early days, what came to be called "The Study Centre." Krishnaji seems always to have wanted a place, or places, where serious adults could come to study the teachings, and have dialogues with each other. It took fifteen years of his requesting this at Brockwood for it to come about.

The next day, the fourth, 'Krishnaji talked to students in the morning' and, well, I did errands.

Then, on Wednesday the fifth, 'Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to Heathrow airport, stopping in the short lane near the airport 'as we've done before, and had a picnic lunch.'

S: Mm.

M: 'Our Air France 3 p.m. flight took off at 4:45 p.m. We sat in the departure lounge and read. We lunched at Orly airport outside of Paris on our arrival, and took a taxi to the Plaza Athénée hotel, arriving at 6 p.m. I rang Solange'—that's my father's housekeeper—'to tell Father I would be there at 7 p.m. I got K's supper ordered. Then he wanted to go for a walk, so we went for a short one, and I reached Father's at exactly 7 p.m. He seemed about the same as in January, but had no recollection of where he had seen me, and asked if Olive had already died by my last visit.' That's his wife. 'We had supper. A new nurse was present. He has been to the races lately, and invited me to Longchamp tomorrow, as he has a horse running. I was back by 8:30 p.m. Krishnaji had had his supper in his room.'

Then, the next day, 'I went to Chanel and ordered some things. They are very expensive, but in the end should be better than money wasted on inferior things. I then walked to Charvet where Krishnaji met me, having come from the hotel in a taxi. We picked out material for four shirts and bought four ties. We returned to the Plaza Athénée, and with the help of Roland in the Régence'—that's the maitre d'hôtel—'I ordered lunch for Krishnaji and Marcelle Bondoneau, who were to go to a cinema. At 1:15 p.m., Father and Madame Hadé, his Danish nurse, came by in the car driven by Michel'—[pronounced Michelle]—that's the chauffeur. 'We lunched at Conti, Father rushing through his food as he does at home. We went to Longchamp,' but I won't go on about Longchamp. 'The horse ran well. The interest in racing has given Father energy. He dropped me at the hotel. Krishnaji had been to the cinema. All had gone well, and we went for a walk before having supper in our rooms.'

The next day was the seventh of May. 'We packed and went quickly to Charvet for more ties, and got back to the Plaza at noon, where Moser and wife'—that's the salesman of the car—'were waiting with the new Mercedes 280 SE 3.5 coupe, which he had driven from Thun. I paid for it and Moser left. Krishnaji and I went into the Régence for a pleasant lunch. In the atmosphere of such a restaurant, his elegance makes him the embodiment of every aristocracy the past has ever produced. He was wearing his navy blazer, the best cut of all his Huntsman clothes, and looked superb. Also, as innocent as a beautifully mannered child. We felt festive: the new car, Paris, the delicate smells of a very good French restaurant, the ease, the fun, the expectation of the drive. There was that lovely sense of adventure, of our life together. For me, the fun of providing fun for him. The decorative embellishments to amuse him, to which he is as charmingly responsive, again as a child might be.'

S: Hm, hm [chuckles].

M: I'm afraid of calling him childish in this thing.

S: No, you're not calling him childish.

M: I don't know what else to say!

S: It's that innocence, it's that extraordinary simplicity.

M: It's innocence. It's his response in which his face lights up.

S: Yes. I absolutely…

M: There's no sophistication in it at all.

S: Yes. Nothing jaded…I know exactly what you mean.

M: I mean, "childish" sounds as though he was retarded or something. On the contrary…

S: Yes, on the contrary…

M: It was this wonderful response.

S: It had all the beauty and cleanness of a young person.

M: Mm, that's true.

S: Where is the Régence restaurant?

M: It's the name of the restaurant in the Plaza Athénée.

S: Ah.

M: They had a small restaurant, which is sort of separate, and then they had their main…well, they had two main restaurants: one's inside, and the Régence is in the front of the building. And this is in May; also, there's a courtyard, and we'd eat out there. The hotel is built around a courtyard.

S: Mm.

M: And the maitre d'hôtel was a tall, thin, nice man named Roland, who liked to please Krishnaji. 'We bade Roland goodbye, had the luggage put in the Mercedes for the first time, and drove in this splendid new car up the Étoile, out to Avenue de Wagram, to the autoroute du Nord. She drove as though on air.' [Chuckles.]

S: Autoroute du Nord? Where were you going?

M: We were going back to Brockwood.

S: Ahh.

M: 'Krishnaji took the wheel for over an hour. We had to get off the autoroute for petrol, but arrived at Château de Montreuil by 7 p.m. Krishnaji kept me going only slowly to break the car in properly.' [Both laugh.] He was absolutely severe about that. You couldn't drive over, I don't know what, thirty or twenty or something.

S: Well, even when I got the two Mercedes vans for the video equipment to record the talks in Saanen and Brockwood, and they were brand-new Mercedes, he insisted before I left for Saanen that I only crept along. I think that I drove from Brockwood to Saanen at thirty miles an hour [laughing].

M: And the Mercedes people say that's not necessary! Never mind what they say! [S laughs.] So, 'We had the rooms we've always had from our first visit. Krishnaji had the Boiseries Room'—it was a lovely old-fashioned room with boiseries all over the wall—that is wood paneling; they had lovely carved wood paneling in France.

S: Oh, how nice.

M: Which is either plain or painted, either one is called "boiseries."

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'We had dinner, and felt very well. Later, Krishnaji said that he had a meditation in the night. For some reason he has had them in these old hotels, as if being away from people's attention being focused on him is a factor. I was afraid the trip would be tiring for him, coming on top of all the rest, but he said, no, it broke the pressure of people.'

S: Mm.

He went on to write, "This kind of breathing is kept secret & he has learnt it from some somebody who won't teach others who are not serious, Sannyasin, Brahmans etc. This Sanyasi wants to help others and that which has been kept secret, he wants to see man benefit from them. He said he knows Mr. Iyengar quite well & has told him that what he teaches is not yoga but he won't listen."

Issue 18: May 8, 1971 to July 31, 1971

This issue covers Krishnaji's busy summer schedule of the end of the school year at Brockwood, Amsterdam, Paris, and Switzerland.

There is another discussion about Krishnaji's sensitivity to his surroundings, and the effect this had on him.

Mary: I think we start on the eighth of May, 1971.

Scott: Right, yes.

M: So, 'we left Montreuil and drove to Boulogne-sur-Mer and took the hovercraft to Dover. It took thirty-five minutes, and it was the first time that I'd ever been on a hovercraft, or that Krishnaji had ever been on one. The old air ferry to Lydd is no more.' We used to do that.

S: Yes, I remember.

M: 'Krishnaji stood looking out the window all the way, observing everything. He had that look that he so often has when he studies things when we're traveling.'

S: [chuckling] Yes, I know that look.

M: 'We drove across southern England.'

S: How would you describe that look?

M: Well, it's very circumscribed in that he doesn't wish to be seen to be staring…

S: I know, I know.

M: …at anyone or anything. So, it's very kind of held within. But nevertheless, he's taking in everything…

S: Yes.

M: [chuckles] And he's quite absorbed in the study.

S: Yes.

M: And I can tell what he's looking at and sort of how he's reacting.

S: Yes, but he even held his mouth in a funny way a bit. Of…

M: He sort of held his chin in a little bit, didn't he?

S: Yes. And not that his mouth was quite open, but his lips [both chuckle] were only loosely closed.

M: I don't see the mouth, but I see the general attitude of him…

S: Yes.

M: …the way he stood.

S: Yes.

M: And the head…

S: Wishing he could be invisible.

M: …the chin, yes, yes. He was invisible in a sort of way. [Chuckling.]

S: Yes.

M: And the chin in and head slightly down and eyes not appearing to stare. Anyway, [S laughs] he did that.

S: Yes.

M: 'We drove across southern England on a lovely sunny, warm day, stopping for a picnic lunch somewhere west of Hastings. Montreuil had made us sandwiches, which turned out to be a huge half a baguette [chuckling] with a good Normandy cheese inside and butter. [S chuckles.] We drove south of Chichester, through Arundel, near Portsmouth, and turned inland at Fareham to West Meon, and along the lane to Brockwood, where we arrived by 6 o'clock.'

'The next day, Krishnaji spoke to the students in the morning, and we walked in the afternoon.'

On the tenth, 'we went to London by train. Krishnaji had a Huntsman fitting on a topcoat he ordered two years ago, and a suit of grey-green tweed. He has decided to keep a complete wardrobe at Malibu and one at Brockwood so that he need never carry a lot of luggage between the two. [Both laugh.] So, with some excitement, he discussed what things he would need. Another grey flannel.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'We then walked to Brown's Hotel. L'Aperitif is no more; the building is coming down and Ferdie'—that's the maître d'hôtel—'who had been there for thirty-five years, is now at Brown's. Mary L. and Alain met us there for a happy lunch, but alas the food is not L'Aperitif. Krishnaji suggested going back to Mary's to talk to her, so Alain went off shopping, and Krishnaji, Mary, and I went to Hyde Park Street[1]. Krishnaji then told her the essential history of his years with Rajagopal and Rosalind in Ojai, which she had not known and which shocked her, as she still had a slightly schoolgirl memory of Rosalind as a nice person. "I had a crush on her," she said. Krishnaji had me describe the atmosphere when I was there with him and Alain in 1966, and the reason for my estimate that both R's worked together to dominate Krishnaji.'

Tuesday the eleventh. 'After lunch, Krishnaji and I drove to Heathrow. Krishnaji had given the Mercedes its first wash in the morning.' This is the new car, you understand.

S: [laughs] Mm, hm.

M: We met Nandini and her daughter Devi Mangaldas and the latter's daughter, Aditi and son Arditia, who had been in Rome with Vanda for ten days. We got back to Brockwood in time for supper. I had fixed the West Wing dining room with three cots for Devi and the children, with Nandini in the spare room, but for some reason they all four slept in the dining room.' That kept happening with Indian guests.

S: Yes.

M: They'd all pile into one room.

S: I know, yes.

M: I never quite understood it. [Both chuckle.] Still don't!

The next day, 'Nandini and Devi went to London for the day. Krishnaji rested, and I went to Winchester in the afternoon, and then joined Krishnaji and Dorothy on a walk. It was Dorothy's birthday.' Now this is the twelfth of May, you understand.

S: Mm, hm.

M: But in this book is a gross inaccuracy because it says, 'Thursday, the thirteenth of May, 1971, at thirty minutes after midnight, it was Krishnaji's seventy-sixth birthday, but no mention was made of it as it is something he quite ignores. A quiet day.' The dates were still not precise.

S: Yes.

M: Now, unfortunately, we only have the little book until July. I clearly wasn't doing a very good job of keeping notes. Anyway, on the fourteenth of May, 'I went up to London alone and did the rounds of antique shops with Paul Anstee, looking for a table for the drawing room. Alain met me at Anstee's at 1:15 p.m., and we walked to Au Pere de Nico for lunch. He told me that Yo de Manziarly visited Mary Links yesterday and was full of lies and slander about Krishnaji and about Alain. We discussed the books, and also I touched on the possible ashram matters at Brockwood in the future. Um, now wait a minute, there's nothing interesting…

S: It doesn't matter. Don't leave it out because it's uninteresting; leave it out only if you want to censor it, but not if you…

M: Well, it's, you know…we went for a basket at Peter Jones, and then we walked to so-and-so. I mean, this'll be never-ending if I put in everything.

Yo had telephoned Krishnaji, but hadn't spoken to him. I first spoke to Mary at Blackdown, then returned Yo's call.

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I spoke to Mary L., but it was all about the KF of India wanting the freedom to edit Indian dialogues. We walked in the rain. Earlier, Krishnaji had washed the car.'

On May sixteenth, 'Nandini, Devi, and children left to fly to Toronto. Krishnaji held a student discussion at 11:30 a.m., a very good one. The weather turned cold, but we walked in the evening.'

The next day, May seventeenth. 'We packed and left at noon with Dorothy for Heathrow. Had a picnic lunch in the car and at 3 p.m., Krishnaji and I flew on KLM to Amsterdam. Anneke and Willie Perizonious met us. I rented a Hertz Ford Escort and we all drove to Huissen, where Dinneke'—that's Anneke's cousin—'and Professor van der Veen have lent Krishnaji their house for his visit. They were there to greet him and then left. We unpacked, and Krishnaji, Anneke, and I had supper.'

The next day, 'I drove into Bussum to get Krishnaji a Phillips electric razor.' He was always buying electric razors.

S: I know.

M: I can't count how many electric razors over the years.

S: And I usually inherited them; well, some years later, I would inherit them.

M: Yes, other people did in the meantime. He liked having the latest one.

S: Yes, but also [laughing] they weren't quite what he wanted. They were initially, but then…

M: Yes, they faded somehow.

S: Yes. [Laughs.]

M: Anyway, we got a Phillips one—being in Holland it seemed appropriate, I guess. 'In the afternoon, there was a meeting of the Stichting Krishnamurti. Anneke, Professor van der Veen, Tilly van Eckman, and Perizonious, with Krishnaji, and I were present. Discussed was the future of the Stichting and a documentation center.' Anneke was always talking about how they must have a documentation center.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And indeed, they eventually…

S: It was eventually in Deventer. Yes.

M: Yes, they did in Deventer. It also says here, 'we had tea and then Krishnaji and I walked northward across fields of heather.'

S: The documentation center[2] really was her creation, wasn't it?

M: Yes, it was. And most of what was in it was her own collection.

The next day, the nineteenth, 'I went to Bussum on marketing errands. Krishnaji met Mr. Methorst and his son Erik about work with young people and vitalizing interest in the teachings in Holland. Mr. Verhulst came by'—that's the publisher, remember—'and gave Krishnaji a copy of the latest publication, The Flight of the Eagle. I did deskwork after lunch, and then Krishnaji and I walked once again in the lovely wood near the farm we lived in four years ago.' That was that magical wood with the little canals running through it, and the ducks.

S: I remember.

M: 'In the evening, I watched on television some of the questions Krishnaji answered on film here in 1968.'

On the twentieth, 'Krishnaji gave a taped radio interview, and I talked to Mr. Van Praag, who did the TV interview with Krishnaji here and in Gstaad. He wants to do another one, at Brockwood in June. It is tentatively agreed to. Van der Veen, Peter and Joyce Marenbreker, and Dick Richardson came for lunch.' These are all Dutch people, except for Richardson. 'Later, Krishnaji saw a newspaperman, and I worked on correspondence before the walk. There was a television program about divers and the Andrea Doria.' Do you remember the Andrea Doria?[3]

S: Mm, hm, of course.

M: It was the Italian liner that went down, and onboard were my mother and stepfather, and also Betsy Drake.

S: Ah, that's right, you told me about that.

M: On May twenty-second, 'Krishnaji and I drove into Amsterdam for his first talk at the RAI at 11 a.m. The crowd had overflowed into an extra hall. It was a very good, very long talk. [click here for a hyperlink to the audio of this talk] We came back to lunch, rest, and then Krishnaji wanted to go into Bussum on errands. We then had tea and walked past the farmhouse where we were four years ago, and into the lovely little wood.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave the second talk at the RAI at 11 a.m. We brought Mar de Manziarly and Nadia Kossiakof back in the car to lunch, and Anneke brought Betsy Debass.' Do you remember her?

S: No, I don't.

M: She was an Egyptian; a friend of Nadia's. An Egyptian woman, portly, used to go to the Saanen talks, and lived in Geneva. 'Later, I took them to the station in Bussum. Krishnaji and I went for a walk. After supper, Dutch television showed the BBC-filmed interview of Krishnaji by the religious affairs head, made at Brockwood last spring. I saw it in black and white, though it was made in color. It was very good. Best yet of Krishnaji.'

The next day, 'Frances McCann came to lunch. I bought a Phillips cassette recorder, and I went with Krishnaji to the third Amsterdam talk held at 7:30 p.m. at the RAI—an evening one.'

May twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji gave his fourth talk.' I don't seem to say much about it.

The next day, 'I did correspondence, ran errands in Bussum. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji, Anneke, and I were at the RAI where Krishnaji held a young people's discussion with several hundred untidy, sad-looking young people.'

The twenty-seventh of May, 'We packed. After lunch here, we drove to Schiphol and took a 2 p.m. flight to London. Dorothy met us. We got to Brockwood in time for a walk. Oh, it is good to be back!' [Both chuckle.] 'A new washing machine and dryer has been installed in the West Wing kitchen.'

Then there doesn't seem to be much until the twenty-ninth, when 'I met Suzanne and Hughes van der Straten at the train station in Winchester, and got back to Brockwood in time for lunch. Later, Krishnaji and I went to tea with Mary and Joe at Blackdown. Alain was there. He flies to Pretoria next week. Mary and I discussed the Indian dialogue book and then Krishnaji joined us for further discussions. He will read it.' I don't know what that means.

Editor's Note: This was in the early days of the Krishnamurti Foundation of India starting to try their hand at editing Krishnaji's material, and there were differences of opinion between India and England about what constituted good editing. Most of the important people in the KFI had been involved, in some way, in the Indian struggle for independence of India from England, so this contention, though seemingly dealt with sensitively, touched some very real trigger points.

S: Mary, there's something that has not been gone into here. A short while ago, it had been suggested that Alain might look after some kind of ashram here, or something…

M: Nothing came of that.

S: …if he and Dorothy could bury the hatchet.

M: He and Dorothy never buried any hatchet, and Alain never came here.

S: Yes.

M: Whenever we met, it would be in London, or at Mary and Joe's, or somewhere.

S: Oh, so Alain never even came back to Brockwood?

M: I don't think he ever came back. No.

S: Do you think it was more on Alain's part or Dorothy's part?

M: Both.

S: Did that sadden Krishnaji, or did he just say well, that's…?

M: No. You see, by this time Alain had left. He was living his own life, and these were all possible things to discuss, but…

S: Not serious intentions.

M: Not, no. You know, maybe it would be nice, but…

S: Right. It didn't happen, and so that's alright.

M: It didn't happen, and that was that.

S: Yes.

M: I don't remember ever discussing it with Dorothy.

The thirtieth of May, 'Krishnaji held a student discussion. I taped it for the archives. Before that, I fetched Dieter Kopp at Alton.' He's the man who painted those two greenish paintings downstairs, a young German artist with a little daughter, a very pretty little tiny daughter, aged about five or something. 'He attended the discussion and lunch with us. The painting that Krishnaji and I had liked in the photo was too large. I gave him another down payment on some future paintings. My mother happened to be in Paris and telephoned.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji started revision of the Indian dialogues. He did three.' That's interesting.

S: What were they for? Did they go into anything?

M: Can't remember. We'll have to wait and see.

S: [chuckles] That's interesting, that he revised them himself, though.

M: Yes. I can't remember how that came about.

The first of June. 'With Krishnaji to London by train. He had a Huntsman fitting. We met Alain for lunch at Claridge's, and discussed future writings. We then walked down Bond Street, and Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt, and Alain went off. He goes to South Africa, then returns to London on the third of July and then goes to Italy. Krishnaji and I went to tea with Mrs. Bindley and came home by train. [Laughs.] It says here, 'in the evening, Mr. Morton talked to the students about farming.' I think that was one of the times when he made a terrible mistake. I've probably told you this: He told all about the crops and all that, and then he suddenly talked about pheasants as a crop[4].

S: Oh, I'm sure that went down really well.

M: And there was shock! A thudding, icy [S laughs], silence. He was not the most sensitive man, as I recall, but he realized something had changed [both laugh], and he didn't know what he'd done! [Chuckling.] I think this is the time that happened, although it doesn't say so. [More laughing.]

The next day, 'Krishnaji worked on the Indian book revision. Jane Hammond came for lunch and tea. Dorothy and Jean-Michel came with us for the walk.'

S: Jean-Michel?

M: Yes.

S: Not Maroger—he wasn't in the picture then?

M: It's some other Jean-Michel. Jean-Michel Laborde? Not sure. 'Students have been discovered using drugs,' it says.

S: Hm.

M: On the third of June, 'there was a staff meeting on the drug situation; then the students and staff had it out. Two boys are to leave, and possibly a new girl.' I can't remember those students. It says here that 'TIME Magazine has an article on Krishnaji.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji worked on the Indian book revision in the morning. The table for the corner at the end of the long sofa was delivered.' I must skip these things.

S: No, no! This is history.

M: On the fifth, 'Krishnaji held a meeting with the whole school in the morning, and went into responsibility and freedom. In particular, for Dorothy, who must be given room to do her job here, without being attacked as being authoritarian.' [S laughs.] You might be interested in that one.

S: Yes, I imagine! [Both laugh.]

M: The next day, which was the sixth, 'Krishnaji rested, and in the late afternoon Krishnaji, Dorothy, Montague and I went to Bedales School at the invitation of the principal, a Mr. Slack,' it looks like. 'We were shown around the school, which was near Petersfield. And at 6 p.m., Krishnaji talked for an hour to the students. There was a ceremony of the students shaking hands with the staff. The staff all lined up, apparently, after their meetings or this sort of a meeting, and every student shakes hands with every member of staff, including us, on the way out. A very formal ceremony.' I don't know whether they do it all the time, but they did then.

So, it looks like the most significant thing for Krishnaji over the next days is that he continued to revise the Indian book.

On the tenth of June, Krishnaji held a discussion with the students, and showed me what to do to improve my pranayama.

On the eleventh of June, 'Doctor Chok of Rajghat arrived.'

On the next day, 'Pupul Jayakar came. She stays till Monday. Doctor Chok talked to Krishnaji almost all day long. It was a cold, rainy day. We went out for a walk dressed for winter.'

Pupul left at 7:15 a.m. on the fourteenth. 'At noon we held a Krishnamurti Foundation Trust meeting. Present were Krishnaji, George Digby, Mary Cadogan, David Bohm, Hughes van der Straten, Dorothy, and me. We continued after lunch. It is as cold as March, and the boiler is not working—no hot water, either.'

On the sixteenth of June, 'I left Brockwood on the 7:15 a.m. train from Alton to Woking, where I got a taxi to Heathrow. Then the 10 a.m. BEA flight to Orly.' Well, this is again with my father. We don't have to go into all this.

S: Ah, so this is just you traveling?

M: Just me. And I'm there until, let's see…oh, until the seventeenth. 'I did several family things and errands and got back to Orly for 5:30 p.m. Air France flight to Heathrow. Taxi to Woking. Caught the 7:45 p.m. train to Alton. Arrived as Dorothy and Doris met me with a car.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji had hay fever, but we went to London for a Huntsman fitting. Then met Mary L. and took her to lunch at a small restaurant near there, San Marino. Krishnaji went to the dentist, Mr. Campion, and I to get his Swiss visa. It was rainy and cold, and we went right to Waterloo and home.'

On June nineteenth, 'Krishnaji spoke to the students and staff in the morning.'

Then nothing regarding Krishnaji until June twenty-first, when Dorothy tried to deal with a thorny issue with a gardener, and talked with Krishnaji about it.

Then, on June twenty-second, 'Krishnaji felt ill. He thought it was something he ate, but he had no nausea or other symptoms. He felt he couldn't get up. He stayed in his room all day, sitting in a chair, or in the bed. He said that he felt that "if I went through that door I could die," he said. "The wall between living and dying is very thin, and it always has been that way with me. Suddenly, it will be there. But not today."'

'He told me I must not be upset by his illness, or it would upset him, and then he will not tell me. He ate a fairly good lunch and supper in bed. We watched Wimbledon tennis and a Gary Cooper movie on TV. The Dutchman van Praag and his son came to film some questions for TV with Krishnaji tomorrow. I went over all that with them. Took a short walk with Dorothy and discussed the gardener situation. Krishnaji seemed better by evening.'

June twenty-third, 'Krishnaji was better and was able to do the filming of questions and answers directed by F. Van Praag and his son for HIRO, the Dutch television channel. It was shot in the hall of the West Wing. Later, Van Praag went for a walk with me and Whisper.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held a very good discussion with the students and staff on thought.'

On the twenty-fifth, 'We both went to London and to Huntsman. I bought Krishnaji some jerseys. We lunched for the first time at Fortnum.[5]' [Chuckles.]

S: Hm.

M: 'Krishnaji liked it! We bought books at Hatchards. Krishnaji went to Mr. Campion for the completion of three fillings. I fetched'—something—'and we took the train back.

Krishnaji coughed badly in the night. He has a touch of bronchitis. He had been free of hay fever in town.'

On June twenty-sixth, 'Jean-Michel'—could it have been Laborde?—'suggested Contact for the hay fever. I went to Winchester with Dorothy and got some Contact and also Friars Balsam for Krishnaji, who spent the day in bed. Dorothy met Narayan and Shakuntala and their daughter Natasha[6], and we all came back to Brockwood with Dorothy. Krishnaji rested all day. The Contact seemed to help him and stopped the hay fever.'

On the twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji had slept fairly well and was able to give a superb talk to students on what is most important in their lives. He said, "For me, it is to be nothing."' Yes. I remember that. 'The Narayans left. We packed.'

On the twenty-ninth, 'We left Brockwood in the morning and drove via Midhurst, Petworth, on the A-272, then Uckfield, Tenterden, and Ashford to Dover. It took four-and-a-half hours. We found the hovercraft cancelled, so we took the 4:30 p.m. ferry, which left half an hour late, and finally reached Boulogne at 6:30 p.m. Brockwood to Dover was 141 miles. [Chuckling.] Then Boulogne to Montreuil and Château de Montreuil. We had the same rooms again. We dined nicely and slept well.'

The next day, 'we left Montreuil at 9:50 a.m. and drove via Arras to the autoroute where Krishnaji did part of the driving. He said he had a meditation in the night. He feels the lack of pressure which is when he stays'—this is this strange thing about pressure, when people know where he is—'in places where people concentrate on him, that's what bothers him. We reached Paris by lunchtime, but coming down the Champs-Elysées, [chuckling] I bumped into a car and damaged the grill of the Mercedes. We reached…' This is when [laughs] I used to drive on these long drives with my shoes off.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And as we were coming down the Champs-Elysées and getting near the Plaza Athénée, I was groping for my right shoe and a car in front of me stopped [chuckling], and I ran into it. But I barely broke his taillight only. Out got a furious owner who upbraided me: "How could I do such a thing?!" He saw it was a foreign car—it had Swiss plates in those days—so he thought I was Swiss. And my one thought was to get Krishnaji to the Plaza Athénée quickly…

S: Of course.

M: …and anything that had to be done in the meantime was fine. So, I expostulated a bit, but said, "Look, it's not very much. How could I make this good?" You know, and so forth. So, I opened my purse and said, "What can I pay you?" And he took everything I had! [Both laugh.] I didn't have all that much cash; it wasn't that it was hundreds of francs, but it was more than I…

S: It was more than the price of a taillight. Yes.

M: …for the taillight, and he went off still surly. So, this is the beginning of Krishnaji saying, "Never change your shoes in the middle of the Champs-Elysées." [S laughs.] And from then on, he would tell me, admonish me about this forever, whenever we drove! [More laughing.] It was a sort of a joke. [Chuckles.]

S: I think we might discuss something: this curious thing of Krishnaji feeling the pressure of people who are concentrating on him, and how, when he didn't feel that pressure, then these meditations would come. What can you say about that? Because he would feel that, for instance, in Saanen.

M: Mm.

S: Even when he kept to himself in Gstaad, it's not as if people would see him every day, but it was just that there were all these thousands of people there, concentrating on him.

M: Mm.

S: And this was something that was a palpable force.

M: Yes, he felt it.

S: A pressure, an energy.

M: It was a sort of psychic something that pressed on him.

S: Did he ever say much about it?

M: No, except that—I mean, just what you've just articulated. And I didn't really ask him more, because I thought I understood that.

S: Also, there were times when he would be some place that was kind of neutral—not a "Krishnamurti place"—and someone would recognize him, and he was always so disappointed.

M: Yes. [Both laugh.]

S: It's just such an interesting response.

M: Yes, he didn't like to be stared at or noticed. I mean on the platform, obviously, I mean, you accept that, but otherwise…

S: Yes.

M: And he felt it in Ojai.

S: Mm, hm.

M: People used to say that they knew he was there, or could feel he was coming, all kinds of things. It was something like he was pinned to the wall by the concentration of people's consciousness on him. And being extraordinarily sensitive, he felt it. And that was one of the reasons that he liked, in these days, the motoring because first of all, he saw the lovely country, which he liked, but also nobody really knew where he was. I mean, they knew he was somewhere in Europe or France, but there was no pressure involved. I don't know, I mean, it never surprised me; I could instinctively understand it.

S: Yes. But it says something interesting…you see, I'm quite convinced that this is not just something that Krishnaji imagined. Now, if it was, for instance, me who felt this, I would have to be questioning myself: Am I imagining this? Is this just something I'm making up? What's my problem, etcetera.

M: Mm, yes.

S: But, for a variety of reasons, I don't believe that this was something subjective with Krishnaji…

M: No, and he didn't…

S: …so it says something very interesting about the nature of people's attention and focusing, and really also says something about the kind of self-sacrifice that Krishnaji continued to make.

M: Mm, hm, yes. Well, in a way, I think, there is in ordinary people some sort of psychic something that happens. For instance, with an audience, if you're an actor, you feel something from the audience, either negative or positive. Or maybe it's the quality of attention, and it just isn't because they clap or don't cough or something.

S: Mm, hm.

M: You feel a tangible something that's invisible.

S: Oh, yes.

M: A rapport going on. And Krishnaji felt that, too, when he talked, because he reported that sometimes the audience seemed to be deaf and not understanding, or that they were, as he used to say, hypnotized. He felt that response in a mass of people.

S: Yes.

M: Whereas, if I suddenly thought that people are staring at me or focusing on me, people will think that I'm getting paranoid. But with him it was, it seems to me to be something, a variation of what would be normal in other people, but only in certain circumstances.

S: Yes.

M: Maybe it's the same kind of thing for an athlete, you know, playing at Wimbledon, and they feel the crowd is with them; it gives them something. There is that unspoken communication.

S: Yes. The first time I felt something of this was really at the start of some of the talks when I had to make announcements…I used to hate making announcements.

M: Yes.

S: Just hate it.

M: Yes.

S: And finally, I just sat for a few seconds before speaking, and looked at the audience, and tried to see what I was hating.

M: Yes.

S: And there is a tremendous force coming from a group of people looking at you.

M: Yes.

S: It's a physical force!

M: Oh, yes.

S: And when I finally saw that, I could see that it was this force I'm reacting to. This is really powerful. And I'm not exactly a delicate flower.

M: There's a communication between a speaker, be it theater or something else, and the people that are listening.

S: Yes. But, you see, Krishnaji could even have it, for instance, just being in Ojai. So, it's just so interesting that it could happen not just in a room where everyone is physically looking at you and you see them.

M: That's right; they're just in the neighborhood.

S: They're just directing their attention to him.

M: Yes.

S: And that's already enough for someone sensitive.

M: I forget where I've read it, because I've been reading so many things lately, where Krishnaji talks in Ojai about wishing we could have a little cabin in the hills somewhere, where we could go and get away from that focusing on him. I even thought of renting a house at the beach in Carpentaria, where…but again, it was a bit too close, and people would have known he was there.

S: I know.

M: And, of course, in the end, nothing happened, but it was in my mind to find a place, probably up in the mountains. I sort of understood it, when he talked about it…

S: As one stops to think about it, it's quite something, because it's kind of a force field that our thinking about someone puts out.

M: Yes. And in a way it's part of human—not understanding, but—consciousness, you know, like people praying for someone who's ill.

S: Mm, hm.

M: There are those who believe that goodwill flowing toward a sick person can help them. Maybe so, I don't know.

S: Yes.

M: It could work negatively or positively. And if someone is ignored, that can be perceived without anybody doing or saying anything. There's a lot of psychic or psychological communication that goes on that people don't really know anything about objectively, or what it is, but it's felt. I think one feels it quite often. Don't you feel it?

S: Yes.

M: Well, you must! Oh!

S: Unfortunately, I've had more of that than I even want to talk about…

M: Yes!

S: But, for myself, I always have to question how much am I making this up? How subjective is this? And so I always—I don't trust my sensitivities, whereas I do trust Krishnaji's. You see, this is why it's an interesting point to discuss.

M: Yes. I completely understand. Was it yesterday that we came across Krishnaji saying about how pain and suffering are two different things?

S: Yes.

M: You see, that's something to do with that. Pain can be a response to a physiological sensitivity. But suffering is the mind…

S: …holding on to it.

M: …holding on to it. That has great meaning.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And it has a lot to do with what's gone on here.

S: Absolutely, absolutely.

M: So, do we continue?

S: Absolutely.

M: Yes. So, we can go on. Where did I leave off? Um, hm, hm, hm, hm. Oh, 'he spoke about meditation in the night. He feels the lack of pressure, which builds when he stays in one place and people concentrate on him. We reached Paris by lunchtime, and the Plaza Athénée. I ordered Krishnaji some lunch, and went briefly to see my father, and got back to the hotel quickly.'

The next day, July first. 'Krishnaji had a quiet morning. We had an early lunch in the hotel and left at 2 p.m., missing the traditional July first traffic exodus from Paris. We drove slowly, relaxedly south on the autoroute, not going over sixty except in spurts. It was a beautiful day. Krishnaji felt full of delight in the country and in slowly drifting along. We reached Saulieu in three-and-a-half hours from Paris. We had rooms at the Hotel Côte d'Or. Took a walk through the old part of the ville. Had a good dinner and were in bed early. Feeling much better than yesterday.' [Chuckles.]

The next day. 'A lovely day. We left Saulieu at 10:45 a.m. and drove on 77 bis'—that's the little tiny yellow road [S chuckles]—'to Sombernon, then the N5 to Dijon and on to Dole for lunch at the Grand Hôtel Chandioux.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: We'd been there before. 'Then on via Saint-Cergue and Nyon to the autoroute, and to Geneva and the Hotel du Rhône. We walked to Jacquet, where Krishnaji ordered nine ties, and to Grand Passage, and to Patek, where Krishnaji looked at a new Naviquartz clock.'

S: Mm, hm!

M: Remember the Naviquartz clock?

S: Very well; very, very well!

M: Have you got the Naviquartz?

S: No, Krishnaji gave it to Dr. Deutsch.

M: Yes! I'd forgotten. Of course he did. Oh, of course.

S: He asked, when Kathy was coming over for the plans of the Study Centre…

M: To bring it.

S: …he asked specially that she bring it so he could give it to Dr. Deutsch.

M: Hm. I must ask Gary about that.

S: Yes.

M: So, 'we had supper in the rooms, and telephoned Vanda at Tannegg.'

The third of July. 'A relaxed morning. We went back to Patek and looked at the Naviquartz clock again [chuckles], shopped for sweaters for Vanda and Fosca, and had lunch at the hotel. Then drove along the Route du Lac'—the one he liked—'to Lausanne and on up to Gstaad. Vanda, Fosca and Antonio, and Antonio's cousin Silvana as their summer extra maid, etcetera, were there. Krishnaji's hay fever worsened between Lausanne and Tannegg. We unpacked his things, and I did mine. He stayed in bed the next day, nursing his hay fever. And Vanda and I talked and walked.'

On the fifth, 'Krishnaji remained in bed. I did errands in the village. Vanda showed me pointers on pranayama.'

On the sixth, 'Krishnaji felt better in the morning, but less well after some yoga in the p.m. He has bronchitis. Vanda and I talked long about his health. She plans to leave tomorrow.' Then, just things about my father.

The seventh of July, 'Vanda delayed her early train departure until noon to see how Krishnaji felt. I talked to Dr. Pierre Schmidt in Geneva who will send some palliative remedies. I took Vanda down to the train. Krishnaji got up for lunch and came with me to Moser's in Thun to have the Mercedes repaired'—that was the grill that was hurt in the Champs-Elysées collision—'and also have its three-thousand-mile service. We picked up Krishnaji's SL Mercedes and drove to Beatus for tea and came back, Krishnaji driving all the way from Thun.'

The next day, ‘Krishnaji felt very tired, with less energy than yesterday, but the congestion in his chest is less. He came to the table for lunch in his dressing gown. Vanda called from Firenze. I did errands for Krishnaji in the p.m. He wanted some thin trousers. The weather is still hot. Krishnaji had supper on a tray with me in the living room.’

July ninth, ‘Krishnaji is better, but stayed in all day. He’s taking the Schmidt remedies and bronchitis salts. Biascoechea came up to see him. I met Balasundaram at the station. He is staying in one of the rooms downstairs at Tannegg. Krishnaji ate in the dining room for lunch and supper. It was a hot day and Mary Cadogan arrived.’

The next day, ‘Mary Cadogan came up to Tannegg. She, Balasundaram, and I spent the morning and much of the afternoon discussing the Krishnamurti Foundation of India. Krishnaji joined us at lunch. Later he went for a very small walk.’

We’re getting close to where the “big book” starts.

On the eleventh, ‘Krishnaji had coughed in the night. There is still some congestion in his bronchial tubes. He did no exercise and stayed in, reading. He was at the table in his dressing gown for meals. I worked at the desk all day and took a walk alone.’

On the twelfth, ‘Krishnaji felt better. I went on errands in the morning and deposited money for Vanda’s account at the Cantonal Bank. Krishnaji walked down the road before lunch and I drove him up. Mary Cadogan, Isabel and Enrique Biascoechea, and Mr. Faria came to lunch. Balasundaram went to Cheseaux to Kudelski with the old Nagra. We discussed the affairs of Foundation Krishnamurti Hispano-Americana. Later, after much thunder, rain! It changed enough for Krishnaji, Balasundaram, and I to walk down the road past Trois Ours and back.’

We now resume the other journal, the “big book,” so we’re finished with the little one.

July thirteen, 1971, Gstaad. ‘Krishnaji was feeling well enough, though still some wheezing in his chest for bronchitis, that he wanted to come to Thun with me to fetch my car. So we went in the morning in his, he driving. He said “a marvelous meditation” had been in the night.’

‘I asked what made it marvelous, special. Was it the intensity or content?’

‘He said, “Both.”’

‘I asked if it had content, and he said, “Of course not.”’

‘I asked, “Is it a feeling without content, without words?”’

‘“Yes,” he said; it was in his sleep, but continued when he awoke and got up in the night, and when he went back to bed.’

‘My car was looking pristine again after the bumped grill from my idiot shoe-changing in the Champs-Elysées. Moser had a brochure for Krishnaji on the latest Mercedes sport model SL350. Krishnaji’s eyes lit up. [S laughs.] We drove both cars, me following, back to Tannegg. He drove faultlessly. It was enormously touching to watch the little silver car winding precisely along the road, the head and shoulders just showing through the rear window. We had a 1:30 p.m. lunch alone as Balasundaram was out. At 4:30 p.m., a Mr. de Marxov came to tea and talked ponderously and interminably for two hours.’ He was the man who was Frances’ financial advisor; an old man who advised for the account called Alzina. I think I’ve mentioned it before. ‘Most of his decisions have been hesitant on getting out of his bad choices, and on the whole, Alzina has not been well-handled since the Brockwood money was so luckily taken out. At present, I am uneasy at continuing as is. I will write to Bud. Krishnaji walked with Balasundaram while I coped with de Marxov. Erna telephoned. She and Theo just arrived from Ojai. No news at all of Rajagopal, whose lawyers have till Thursday the fifteenth to show cause to the attorney general why we shouldn’t file suit.’

Sunday, the eighth of August. How did we jump to that date? Dear me.

S: Well, we can go back to the little book.

M: We better go back to the little book. [Chuckles.]

So, on the fourteenth of July, ‘At noon, there was a meeting at Tannegg of Mary Cadogan and Graf. The Lilliefelts and Balasundaram had lunch, with Mary Cadogan joining afterward for an all-afternoon discussion of business. Krishnaji had a haircut. He, Balasundaram, and I went for a walk toward Turbach.’

The next day, the fifteenth. ‘I drove with Balasundaram to the Geneva airport so we could meet Pupul Jayakar, and came back to Tannegg. It was a tiring drive. I walked with Krishnaji and Balasundaram.’

On July sixteenth, ‘there was an all-morning meeting of Krishnaji, me, Pupul, Balasundaram, Mary C., Erna, Theo, and Hughes van der Straten. Pupul wants copyright for India. [S chuckles.] Long discussion. I finally suggested that the KFI be given permission to publish in India only in perpetuity, and it was accepted. She resisted Krishnaji being on their board but agreed in the end to some special title for him, such as founder. We had a buffet lunch. The Hispano Fundación in persons of Biascoechea and Faria came at 2:00 p.m. So the first four-Foundation meeting took place. They planned the second in Rishi Valley in December of ’72. Mary C. leaves tomorrow. Krishnaji, Balasundaram, and I went for a walk.’

The seventeenth of July. ‘I did errands, saw Dorothy, Montague, and Doris. They came in the Land Rover via the south of France. In the p.m., Yves Zlotnitska[7]’—remember him?

S: Mm, hm.

M: '…ran a BBC film and an NET film for Pupul, Balasundaram, van der Straten, Lilliefelts, Enrique Biascoechea, and Faria. Krishnaji, meanwhile, intently washed the car! [Both chuckle.] And then a thunderstorm came. Krishnaji and I were alone.'

On July eighteenth, 'I first took Pupul and Balasundaram to the tent (a new, very stately one), then drove Krishnaji there for his first Saanen talk. The tent was almost full. A good beginning talk on "What are you serious about?" He talked for forty-five minutes and took questions for half an hour. Mar de Manziarly came to lunch and stayed for the 4 o'clock showing of the NET film of Krishnaji's discussion with Huston Smith at Claremont. I hadn't seen that one. It was most overwhelming to me. Everyone had tea. Erna and Pupul discussed ways to help India with films there.'

On the nineteenth, 'Dorothy came in the morning to see Krishnaji and talk to Pupul and Balasundaram about Indian scholarship pupils coming to Brockwood. Pupul and Balasundaram had an early lunch, then left with Yves Zlotnitska for Lausanne, where Pupul took the train to Geneva, Paris, and on to Rome and India. Balasundaram went to Kudelski and fetched Nagra Three'—I think it is—'plus new equipment to take to India to record Krishnaji there. Krishnaji and I had a quiet lunch, enjoying the quiet house. Later, we drove down and did errands. We went for an early ride to Gsteig, and took a walk when we came back. We saw a man with a twenty-year-old Mercedes beautifully kept.' It was parked up above the road when you leave Tannegg and go up and around…

S: Mm, hm.

M: …and it gets sort of flat and then it goes across the field. Well, up there, under some trees, was parked this beautiful old Mercedes, and of course, when we walked up there, Krishnaji saw it, and the man—I think he was English, I'm not certain—was polishing it, and tending it, and caring for it. Krishnaji was charmed [S laughs] and wanted to see the whole thing [chuckles]. He kept it parked there for some time, and every day he would come and polish the leather or polish the chrome or something.

S: Mm.

M: 'It pleased Krishnaji,' it says. 'Balasundaram returned for supper.'

On the twentieth of July, 'Krishnaji gave his second Saanen talk, on order. Dorothy, Montague, and Balasundaram came to lunch, after which I drove Balasundaram to the train, and he left carrying the old Nagra on his way to India. I went to see Erna and Theo. A letter from Leipziger says Loebl's father died, so a further delay is allowed for a response by Tapper from the fifteenth deadline to the nineteenth, i.e., yesterday. I got back in time for tea and a walk with Krishnaji and Peter Racz.' He's a Brazilian boy.

S: I remember that, yes.

M: 'A lovely quiet supper by ourselves and early bed time.'

On Wednesday, the twenty-first, 'Tilly van Eckman came to lunch, and Sacha de Manziarly arrived to stay at Tannegg until Saturday.'

S: What happened to Sacha?

M: He died.

S: When? I never met him.

M: I remember his death. Krishnaji had just arrived in Paris, I can't remember which year, but we'll come to it, and Sacha was in the American Hospital. So, we went, and Krishnaji saw him just before he died…

S: Mm, hm. Well, we'll come to it then.

M: Yes.

S: Okay

M: On the twenty-second, 'I went early to the tent and then came back for Krishnaji. He gave his third Saanen talk. Seeing with no observer. No subjective anything, but only objective fact. Seeing uncolored by any residue of time past, therefore without self. Sacha and Marcelle Bondoneau at lunch. Krishnaji was very absent, concerned with the car. I did some errands and coming up the hill met him walking down. We went to look at bags in a boutique.' Don't know what that was for. 'Came back to tea with Sacha. Then we walked to Turbach. The talk had left him washed out mentally. He couldn't read, and his body was hypersensitive. He dined at the table with Sacha and me. There was too much chatter.'

July twenty-third. 'We left at 10 a.m., picked up Dorothy and Montague, and drove to Thun. We saw the SEL 350 Mercedes at Moser's. I left my car for the replacement of…' something. 'We lunched at Beatus and returned to Thun on the steamer. We tried out the 350 SEL. Krishnaji was delighted by it. We made deal for delivery of one for him next year, using his present one as a trade-in. Then, in my car, we drove back. Sacha had supper with us and went to see the Krishnamurti films in the tent. Krishnaji and I stayed in.'

S: Now that must have been the Green Beauty[8]. Wasn't it?

M: Well, what happened was the next year, he didn't like the model that came out. And although the deal had been made, somehow Stuttgart was willing to put it off for a year—great exceptional, you know, concessions being made, etcetera.

S: And then it was the Green Beauty.

M: That was the Green Beauty.

S: Right.

M: The next day, July twenty-fourth, 'Sacha left. Krishnaji and I had lunch at the Biascoecheas' and rested. Then we washed the Mercedes.'

On the twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji gave his fourth Saanen talk. It was on relationship: If there is a center of self, there is no relationship. It was hot in the tent, and Krishnaji felt very tired afterwards. He lay down until lunch. Erna, Theo, and Warren Perrine came to lunch. Afterward, we discussed the pros and cons of a Saanen film proposed by Guido Franco.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: Oh, we had endless trouble with Guido Franco. 'I walked down for the paper in the late p.m., and Krishnaji met me halfway up and we walked back. We telephoned Vanda in the evening.'

The next day, 'Dr. and Mrs. Questiau came to see Krishnaji at 12:30 p.m. Fresia to lunch. At 4 p.m., Biascoecheas and Sendra came and saw Krishnaji for one hour, sapping his energy. We then walked to the Turbach Road, and Krishnaji treated me for my eyes.'

On July twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen talk, a continuation of his "thought-space," a memo he gave me on Monday.' I can't read my writing. Something about 'can the mind inquire into the quality of the immeasurable? Can this be free of all distortion? Factor of distortion is fear and demand for pleasure. It was an intense talk, and it was very hot in the tent. Immediately afterward, he saw for an hour the Spanish-American Fundación: Faria, Biascoechea, Sendra, and another; then de Vidas, who is ailing; and finally for lunch Frances McCann, Pietro Cragnolini, and Malvina'—that was a friend of Cragnolini's. 'Later, Moser came with the contract for the new SL 350 for next year, and took away in trade Krishnaji's present one. I did some errands for him and drove Krishnaji up the hill after he walked down.'

On the twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji treated Fresia and de Vidas. Mrs. Pamela Travers and Dr. Steven Schoen came to lunch.' That's interesting; that's the man that wrote that book I have in the other room.

S: Aha! On the origins of Krishnaji's thinking.

M: Is that what it is?

S: Well, that's the one that you discussed, or where his teachings came from, or something like that.

M: No, that's another one, that's Sana. No, this is a book that was published some years ago. I have it in the other room. But I didn't realize he'd come to lunch. 'Krishnaji told Mrs. Travers some of the early history of finding "the boy." We walked to the river.'

On the twenty-ninth, 'Krishnaji gave his sixth Saanen talk, another intense one. The Digbys and Lilliefelts came to lunch. Krishnaji was tired in the afternoon. He wasn't going to take a walk, but in the end, he decided to, so we went to the river.'

July thirty. 'Jane Hammond and Sybil Dobson came to lunch. At 4 p.m., the annual meeting for all the foreign committees. Fifty-six people came, and Krishnaji was present. George Digby presented various questions. Dorothy reported on Brockwood. Sybil reported for The Bulletin, George on publications, and I very briefly on the KWINC situation. Fruit juice afterward, and then Krishnaji and I went for a walk.'

The thirty-first. 'A lovely, empty, quiet day. No one for lunch. Rest. We cleaned cars a little and took a walk. Watched the Apollo 15 astronauts, Scott and Irwin, on the moon.' End of July.

S: Okay, we should end there because we are running out of tape.

M: Good. I'll put this marker here.

[1] That is where Links' house was.

[2] The documentation center holds all of Krishnaji's published material in English, and as much material translated into Dutch as had been produced at that time. There are also photographs, newspaper articles, video tapes and audio tapes, and anything else the Dutch Committee could collect.

[3] The SS Andrea Doria sank off the coast of Nantucket in 1956 after being rammed by another ship. Most of the passengers and crew were rescued.

[4] The school was vegetarian.

[6] Narayan was Krishnaji's nephew, Shakuntala was his wife, and Natasha is their daughter. Narayan and Shakuntala had been working at the Rishi Valley School, and Narayan would eventually return to be headmaster of the school. Shakuntala came to teach at Brockwood for many years.

[7] He was a professional sound recorder who, for a short period, took over the audio recording of the talk at Saanen.

Issue 19: August 1971 to September 1971

This issue covers less history (just two months), but much more discussion.

A settlement with Rajagopal seems tantalizingly close.

Also discussed is Rosalind's disturbing physical abuse of Krishnaji, which he tolerates, even though he would not tolerate any attempt to influence his teachings.

Krishnaji's peculiar memory is explored, as well as his inability to visualize from maps or architectural drawings, and what this may imply about image making.

There is a discussion of Krishnaji's seeming fragile health, and the possible relationship there might be between this and his inner life and "the process."

There is also brief mention of Krishnaji's peculiar aversion to using the telephone.

Mary: Alright, we're picking this up at August first, 1971.

Scott: Great.

M: Well, that date finds Krishnaji in Saanen, obviously, and 'he gave his seventh Saanen talk, which was on intelligence—intelligence that comes when thought realizes it cannot go beyond itself, and is still. It was a very hot day, and Krishnaji said that he felt ill that day. He said he was as tired as though he'd been ill. And he said that he felt like disappearing after the talk. Instead of that, he treated people: de Vidas, and the Kossiakofs. Marcelle Bondoneau came to lunch, and we discussed doing an interview for French television.' You'll remember that, later on, as a result of all of this, Krishnaji did a television interview in French for a Monsieur André Voisin, who was an interviewer on French television. We'll come to that later, because we did go over to Paris for that.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'We discussed also the dead-end of hippy-ness in the young, and their need to see that intellectual action is not against Krishnaji's teachings, but lives alongside it. He said that he wanted to go into this in his next discussion. He was tired, too tired to walk, but dusted the car'—[chuckling]—'instead. And I went off up into the meadows, high on the hill for my own walk.'

The next day, the second. 'He was still tired. He felt as if he had been sick, he kept saying. I went to the village on errands, and he met me at the station, and we started for a drive, but it was too hot. He was nervous for some reason that day. I don't know why. Coming up the hill, something punctured the right tire on the car, and I somehow got it all the way up the hill and into the garage before it was literally destroyed. There was no tire left.'

‘At four o’clock, all the Ojai people came to tea. And Krishnaji spoke about what was going on.’ It doesn’t say what here. ‘Dorothy came at 5:30 p.m. and went for a walk with us to the river. Krishnaji persuaded her and Montague to move up to Tannegg to try to get some rest.’ When they were in the camping site, they didn’t have a moment’s privacy, and people were always dropping by unexpectedly, and it was wearying. ‘Later that day, we watched the Apollo astronauts, Scott and Irwin, take off from the moon and dock with the space capsule.’

‘The Simmonses moved in the next day to Tannegg downstairs. They had lunch with us. A new tire was put on the Mercedes, and Dr. Padma Modulka came for tea with me.’ I don’t know if you’ll remember that Indian lady.

S: Oh, a little.

M: She’s a doctor.

S: Yes, and she was a small lady. Yes, I do remember her.

M: And she lives or…lived—for all I know she’s still there—up near Uttarkashi, I think.

On Wednesday, the fourth of August, ‘Krishnaji held the first of seven daily public discussions in the tent. This one was on conscious and unconscious, and seeing the whole. Madame Duchet, Marcelle Bondoneau, and Gisela Elmenhorst came to lunch, and that Fred Williams came afterward and brought an anti-Semitic book for Krishnaji. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I had talked about new teachers for Brockwood.’

On the fifth of August, ‘Krishnaji gave his second Saanen discussion, a marvelous one, one on the old brain and the new brain.’ Do you remember when he…well, you weren’t there then. ‘Thought is the old brain, and cannot find that which is beyond itself, which is the new.’ Make a note; it would be interesting to hear that one again. “The perception of this is intelligence,” he said. In this perception, the old is quiet and in abeyance, but it’s there; it just doesn’t interfere. Then the new one can be, and this is intelligence. Intelligence can perceive the unknown, the new, and this can use the old when it is necessary.’ An interesting talk.

S: Mm, hm.

M: It says here ‘it was a talk that left me drained with its intensity. We came back, and at 3 p.m., Krishnaji came with me to the bank to close an account that Rajagopal had opened, and which he was co-signatory of. Also, we bought some detective novels and a Mao book, which I’m to read and report on to him later,’ it says [chuckling].

S: Which Mao book?

M: The Little Red Book! [Both laugh.] And I never read it! [More laughing.] Or reported on it, and I don’t think it was ever referred to again, but that was my task! [Both laugh.]

S: I don't see you walking around with The Little Red Book for some reason!

M: No. I didn't either; in fact, I just forgot about it quickly [chuckling]. 'At 4 p.m., the Saanen Gathering Committee came: Krishnaji, the Grafs, Doris Pratt, and me. Later, Krishnaji and I walked alone by the river. I spoke to Vanda in Rome, and we will renew Tannegg for the following year.'

On the sixth, 'Krishnaji held his third discussion in the tent. This one was for young people. A letter finally came from Leipziger saying that Rajagopal is trying to get the firm ____'—and then I have a blank because I don't know the name of firm—'to represent him either with or without Loebl. Rothman'—that's a member of the new firm—'is to look into whether to take the case, and hence another delay. Erna and Theo came for lunch and we discussed all this. Sybil Dobinson also was there, and we discussed with Krishnaji material for The Bulletin. It was still hot, and Krishnaji and I were both too tired to walk.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave his fourth discussion. I fetched the Suarèses up to lunch. The Lilliefelts also came. Later, Mr. and Mrs. Sloss, the parents of Radha's husband, came to tea. Mr. Sloss said that Krishnaji should take Rajagopal to court. He has no use for Rajagopal or Rosalind. Krishnaji and I washed the car.'

S: So, she's still married to…?

M: This is her in-laws.

S: Right. So they have no use for Rosalind or for Rajagopal! [Laughing.]

M: No, that's right.

On the eighth, 'Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen discussion, mostly on fear. The audience seemed limp. At lunch were the van der Stratens, Topazia Alliata, and Frances McCann. Krishnaji was abstracted during lunch. The ladies talked heatedly about education and permissiveness. Topazia thought marijuana should be legally sold. Krishnaji said she didn't know the dangers of it. They left, and Krishnaji went for a nap. At 4 p.m., Sybil Dobinson and the Lilliefelts came to tea with me to discuss The Bulletin and the German Publication Committee,' and then it says here, 'there really is none. A Mr. Werner, whom we haven't seen and whom Grafs says doesn't want a committee around him, and a Mr. Kanthor'—remember Mr. Kanthor?

S: Yes.

M: …'a humble, earnest, not too educated man, not capable to deal with publications.' That's my comment. [S chuckles.]

'Nelly had copies of letters given her by Mrs. Fidélius written by Methorst saying that he had been asked by Krishnaji and the KFT to show films, play tapes, and collect money to pay for films; also that he had been asked by Dorothy Simmons to collect for Brockwood. Dorothy Simmons told Nelly this is untrue [chuckles]. Erna, Theo, and Sybil Dobinson arrived, and Krishnaji joined us. We had tea and went into some of this and then discussed The Bulletin. It was agreed to condense business news and to make the rest of it Krishnaji's material. Sybil, who had had no material given to her, could now have Indian discussions and possibly talks, the Australian ones, and discussions from the KWINC period. It was agreed to go ahead. If Rajagopal challenges, we will deal with it.' That's about publications challenges.

'Krishnaji and I told Erna and Theo of the meeting at tea yesterday, when Mr. and Mrs. Sloss, parents of Jimmy Sloss, came. Mrs. Sloss obviously wanted to find out the Rajagopal situation. Krishnaji asked them if they wanted him to speak of it, and Mrs. Sloss replied, "Yes, but before you do, I want to tell you, I'm on your side!" [Chuckles]. Krishnaji described ten years of Rajagopal's refusal to let him know anything about KWINC, the necessity for the break, etcetera, efforts to find a settlement, and Rajagopal's refusal to answer. Krishnaji said that he had gone three times to see Rajagopal. Mr. Sloss said that Krishnaji should get a lawyer and sue Rajagopal, that Rajagopal wouldn't listen to anything else. Mr. Sloss also said that Rajagopal lied to him the first time they met. He repeated that Krishnaji must sue and "let the chips fall where they may." He took me aside and said that he had no use for either Rajagopal or Rosalind Rajagopal, and that Jimmy had told him he wanted nothing to do with either of them. We reassured him that we had excellent lawyers and had gone to the attorney general and we had him on our side as a result of his investigations. Sloss left saying, "You go ahead."'

'After the Lilliefelts left, Krishnaji and I started to go for a walk just as Iyengar was coming in with Mrs. Walsh.' Mrs. Walsh was the lady who lived in the east apartment, downstairs in Tannegg. She took that every year. And she was the hostess to Iyengar every year.

S: Mm, hm.

On the ninth, 'Krishnaji held the sixth Saanen discussion; this time on education. The questions were mostly poor. Madame Welser came for a treatment'—that was that paralyzed lady. 'Peter Racz, the young Brazilian, and Bill Burmeister, a nice boy from California, came for lunch. At 3 p.m., Mrs. Henry Heller came to see me about the possibility of starting an Austrian committee. She's a teacher of hatha yoga in Vienna and learnt it in India under a Raja yoga teacher, but she teaches only exercises. She also has classes in English for an atomic commission of the UN in Vienna [chuckles]. She was a Jewish refugee from Hitler, and her family went to Scotland.' I don't know why I tell all this, but anyway…'She seemed businesslike, aware of things to be avoided, i.e., propaganda, interpretation, etc. Would want three others to form a committee under Austrian law. She has an apartment that could be used for offices.' [Seems to make an aside:] I don't think anything ever came of that, as far as I know.

S: Mm.

M: 'She seemed sensible and workmanlike in her approach. I suggested she write to Cadogan and see if during the winter she finds other seriously interested people to share the work and committee-hood. Then come here next summer and discuss further whether to become an accredited committee.' Then I went for a back treatment'—I was having back treatments by a chiropractor. 'Ran into Cragnolini, Pietro. He says the eclipse of the moon affected Krishnaji in his health because it was Aquarius or something. I met Krishnaji coming down the hill, and we went up. I paid a deposit on Tannegg for next summer. They have raised the rent by five thousand francs [chuckles] to eleven thousand for two months.'

On the tenth, 'Krishnaji held his seventh Saanen discussion, completing this year. We had a quiet lunch alone. Dorothy and Jean-Michel Laborde'—that was the Jean-Michel that we'd talked about, and his wife.—I mentioned the couple earlier—Margot Laborde.

S: Right. So she went off?

M: Yes.

S: But he stayed?

M: He stayed around for a while.

'Dorothy, Jean-Michel Laborde, Sara Garetson, and Sunita Mahtani came for tea.' Sunita and Sara were in the first group of Brockwood students…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …and in the film Can You Live That Way[1]?

S: Yes.

M: 'Then, Krishnaji spoke to six young, lost-looking people who want to start a school as a result of yesterday's discussion. They haven't the vaguest qualifications or plans. [Both laugh.] Suarès brought a Monsieur Bey, editor of Stock, to greet Krishnaji briefly.'

The next day, 'Madame Welser came at 9 a.m. Erna came to lunch, Theo was in Zurich. They leave on Saturday for Majorca before going home. I had a back treatment; met Krishnaji at the foot of the hill, and we walked up together. I dined with Suzanne and 'met parts of their vast family, the van der Stratens' [chuckling]. 'The car was drenched with rain, and when I got back, just after nine o'clock, Krishnaji came out and said it must be wiped dry, so we did it.' [Both laugh.] Oh, goodness!

On the twelfth, 'Madame Duchet came to talk to me about a French committee. At noon, Krishnaji and I walked down the hill and met the Grafs at the new curling building, as a possibility for the talks. It is large and efficient, but looks like a factory. Krishnaji didn't like it at all. So we will stick with the tent, which is a very good one this year, but costs

Swiss francs 37,000—$9,000 to rent. The Grafs lunched with Krishnaji and me at Tannegg. At four, Nadia Kossiakof saw Krishnaji. I invited her to stay in the West Wing during the September gathering at Brockwood. Bruno Ortolani and his lady friend came to tea.'

The thirteenth 'was a clear, warm, beautiful day. Taking Dorothy and Montague, Krishnaji and I drove to Thun. We left the Mercedes to have its door lock fixed and walked to the steamer, where we boarded for the two-and-a-half-hour sail to Interlaken and back. We took a picnic and also ordered on the steamer to be able to use a table.' [Chuckling.] You had to order some food to use a table.

'The lake was a deep jade and the Eiger, Mönch, and Jungfrau were majestic in their snows. It was a peaceful, far away day. The car lock disgorged a piece of metal mechanism that Moser said might have been part of an attempt to break into the car. I arranged to store the car with him this winter. We drove back to Tannegg. Dorothy and Montague dined upstairs with me and we went to a concert in Saanen church. Maurice Gendron played the Bach unaccompanied cello pieces. Then Menuhin, in beard and kurta, sat on the stage with Ravi Shankar and Alla Rakha and played a raga. Lastly, Shankar played without Menuhin. Some of the usual audience left, and the hippies clapped wildly. Bad form in the church. [S chuckles.] I got noddingly sleepy.' [S chuckles again.]

Saturday, the fourteenth of August. 'The Simmonses left for Brockwood, somehow taking two of our bags in the Land Rover. This was Krishnaji's suggestion; he doesn't want the Mercedes to carry too much!' [S and M laugh heartily.] Oh, dear! 'How Dorothy managed that I don't know' [laughing]. Yvon Achard came to see me at eleven. He's going to make an anthology of Krishnaji's writings in French, which will give much circulation in French academic circles. He teaches hatha yoga.' He lived in Grenoble.

'When he had gone, I opened the letter box and there was a three-page cable from Leipziger saying that he had met the day before with Tapper and Rothman (Rajagopal's new lawyer), and at Rothman's request discussed settlement along the lines of the memorandum we drew up: Rajagopal and the KWINC board to resign, and the KFA to have control, plus two or three others'—meaning on the board—'with publishing or educational background.' That was the project. 'All property, archives, etcetera to be turned over. Rajagopal to do some limited editorial work, but copyright goes to KFA. Tapper wants only California residents on the board, suggests not having Krishnaji on the board because of his age and travel. And KWINC retained as an entity as the easiest way to accomplish things, rather than dissolve it. Leipziger wants a reply by Monday from us so that he can tell Tapper who will present it to Rothman. Rothman says that he will have a reply from his client'—meaning Rajagopal—'within a week. Leipziger is due to leave for England a week from today.'

'Krishnaji said, "I knew something had happened" when I relayed all this to him. Meanwhile, Erna and Theo had left Schonried this morning en route to Majorca. But I caught them at the Hotel du Rhône in Geneva and told them. Krishnaji wanted them to come right back, which they immediately did, moving into the room downstairs that the Simmonses had vacated. They arrived around 3:30 and the four of us talked for two hours, and then rang Leipziger in Beverly Hills. Erna took it all down in shorthand. The call lasted sixty-nine minutes.' [Almost inaudible:] 'Expensive.'

'Well, the Biascoecheas came for lunch on the fifteenth, and they and Erna and Theo and I talked about all this possible settlement business all afternoon.'

August sixteenth was 'another hot but lovely day. I had a back treatment. The Suarèses for lunch. The Lilliefelts were out. Had my hair cut.' This is boring!

S: No, it's not. Let's get it all down. There might be a little gem in there. We're not going to say that everything is fascinating, but…

M: Alright. 'I met Krishnaji at the station at 4:30 p.m., and we went to shop for walking shoes for him in Saanen. When we came back, we took a walk with the Lilliefelts. They and I had supper together.'

On the seventeenth, 'The Lilliefelts went off to see the Matterhorn. Topazia saw Krishnaji and then lunched with us. Aurobindo Bose…' Who was he?

S: I don't know.

M: [chuckles] Familiar name; I can't put anything to it. '…came to see Krishnaji. After that, we went down to the village and changed the shoes, bought the paper, and read that Nixon is floating the dollar. Froze wages and prices for ninety days, etcetera. The stock market rose thirty-two points on a $31 million share day, and the dollar has dropped everywhere, and there is difficulty changing dollars in Europe [both chuckle]. We went for a walk.'

August eighteenth 'is a hot day. We left at noon and drove through Cheseaux, where we picked up the Nagra from Kudelski. It had been serviced. Stopped along the autoroute for a picnic lunch and went to Geneva. Picked up Alain's watch, which had been serviced, and then bought the Naviquartz clock for Krishnaji. Came back to Gstaad, with Krishnaji driving about fifty miles. The Lilliefelts were also back. They and I had supper and went to a Menuhin concert in Saanen—Schubert trios.'

There, we get to August nineteenth, which is…

S: Back to the big book.

M: …other book again. 'As Erna, Theo, and I were finishing breakfast, Krishnaji came in and began a talk that lasted until a quarter to one, when we had to go to the Biascoecheas for lunch. Krishnaji began casually by asking when we might have word from the lawyers on the results of the Tapper settlement proposal.'

‘Then he said, as he has so often, what went wrong with Rajagopal? He was intelligent, chosen for the work, able when young, chosen by Leadbeater, but never especially liked by Leadbeater, nor was Mrs. Besant close to him. He was the son of a district judge. His brother was like him. Krishnaji described seeing the brother in India, and thinking for a moment that it was Rajagopal. He sat just so, expecting to be waited on, had Rajagopal’s refusal to do anything with his hands. Krishnaji used to clean up after the dog in Ojai. Rajagopal always had reasons not to do the dishes. Has Rajagopal remained Theosophist at heart or has been in fact all these years? Did he go with Krishnaji to eventually lead him back to Theosophy?’

‘Krishnaji doesn’t think so. But Erna remembered an odd remark by Radha when discussing what might happen to Happy Valley School at the time when Rosalind was managing it, and was being possibly unbalanced. Radha said she didn’t think Erma Zalk would object’—Erma is the sister of Rosalind—‘would object to returning it to the T.S. Rosalind considers herself the representative of Mrs. Besant. Anna Lisa Rajagopal’—that’s Rajagopal’s second wife—‘joined the T.S. after marrying Rajagopal. Krishnaji spoke of incessant quarrels with Rajagopal and Rosalind. He said it was surprising they had not shot him. Rosalind Rajagopal once taking a hammer and hitting him on the head in the car, taking a bottle and trying to hit him with it in India, witnessed by Sunanda, etcetera. Telling him to jump under the train once at a station’—that was in Santa Barbara. ‘And hitting him in the groin with her knee once so that he could barely walk for a day.’

‘Why, I asked, had he not turned away from these people after all this?’

‘“I don’t know,” he said. Talk went to the protection of the boy when young. There were always with two initiates to accompany him, the right food, etcetera, etcetera. Necessity for the body’s protection. But if the body was attacked by Rosalind, why was she tolerated by him? And if there are some powers watching over him, by whatever they may be, why did no one else help him out of the situation until Alain Naudé and Mary Zimbalist and now Erna and Theo Lilliefelt came along? I asked him if the two Rajagopals had ever tried to influence him in his speaking. “Never,” he said. “I would not have tolerated that.” Suddenly it seemed clear, and I asked if it was that if he were attacked personally he would do nothing, but if an attempt were made to influence his teachings he would not have tolerated it for an instant. “What would you have done?” I asked.’

‘“I would have left,” he said.’

S: Now let’s just review this. [Sighs.] Rosalind hit him on the head with a hammer in the car?

M: Yes.

S: Is that what you’re saying?

M: Yes.

S: And she tried to hit him with a bottle…

M: Yes.

S: And that was witnessed by Sunanda Patwardhan.

M: In India.

S: In India. And has Sunanda spoken to you about that?

M: No. I don't know if it was only Sunanda.

S: And this whole thing that he would put up with anything physically against himself…

M: But not against the teachings.

S: But not against the teachings.

M: Mm, hm.

S: But why wasn't he protected?

M: I don't know. I've asked myself that for twenty years. If he was protected and…

S: The protectors were doing a lousy job.

M: To leave him in the hands of these two really despicable people. [Long pause.] I never understood it, and I still don't.

S: No.

M: Now, there are no more entries in the big book until October.

S: Alright, so let's go back to the little book.

M: The little book. That was the nineteenth, so now the twentieth. 'Erna and Theo left for Frankfurt and California. Krishnaji and I are alone. Then Krishnaji and I went to the village, him to have his hair cut and I to the bank. The car wouldn't start. Then it started. I drove to the post office; then it wouldn't start again. It was towed to the Mercedes man in Saanen. It started, and we drove back to Tannegg. Must have it fixed by Moser. Later, it started perfectly. [Chuckles.] Krishnaji gave me a long talk on my face and hands, my restless habits that get on his nerves.

S: Hm, what, you fiddle with your hands or…

M: Yes.

The next day, 'Packing, and Moser sent a mechanic from Thun who checked out the car and tightened one wire connection. I went to the bank, the post, etcetera. We lunched alone, and both walked down to the village for last minute errands. Then we washed the car and loaded it with almost all the luggage. Telephoned Vanda in Rome.'

On the twenty-second of August, 'we got up at 3:15 a.m.!' Heavens. 'After saying goodbye to Fosca and Silvana'—Silvana was the girl helping—'we left at 4:10 a.m. The roads were dark and empty. It was light when we reached the border at Saint-Cergue. We drove through Morez, Lons-le-Saunier.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: [chuckling] Remember those days?

S: I remember them all. I think I could drive from Brockwood to Saanen and back in my sleep.

M: 'To Chalon-sur-Saône in four-and-a-half hours and 175 miles. We bought croissants on the way and had our picnic breakfast with fruit by the roadside.'

I will digress from reading for a moment to talk about Krishnaji's strange memory, which didn't remember all kinds of things, but he would remember places on the road. And this place, where we ate our croissants, I guess this was the first time. We did this every year after that. We'd buy croissants and then we'd drive to this little place sort of off the road, like a bypass in England. Behind some trees and bushes.

S: Yes.

M: And we would have our breakfast there; we'd carry fruit and breakfast from Tannegg, but we'd buy these lovely hot croissants, just out of the oven!

S: [chuckles] How nice. I'll just also digress on this point because when I would drive to Saanen, inevitably Krishnaji would say, "Which route did you take?"

M: Yes.

S: And he knew them all. Again, this funny thing about his memory. I remember once reporting to Krishnaji that "We got off the highway at the Chalon-sur-Saône exit and then we went by…" and I couldn't remember the names, but he knew the names of the villages.

M: Yes.

S: And then you can either go through Nyons or you can go to Geneva.

M: Yes. He knew all that.

S: He also impressed me later on when we would go out for a walk on his first time back to England for the season; walking around the grounds, he would notice small things that had been changed. Small things.

M: Yes.

S: So it's as if he had an extraordinary memory for things that were not personal.

M: Yes. Yes, the look of things, the look of places. But at some point, when we were going some places we didn't know, I tried to get him to be the navigator, look at the map, and he was hopeless! He'd tell me, "Drive on, drive on, drive on!" when I should've gone left or right or something. And I'd have to stop and look at the map and back up and turn around. He was no good at that at all. But when he'd seen it; it was a visual thing.

S: That's interesting, because the same thing as his not being good with maps, he was also not good with building drawings.

M: No. He had no visual sense, imaginary visual sense. But once it was imprinted…

S: Yes, exactly. There's something strange about this, the ability to go from an abstraction or representation, which a map is or an architectural drawing is, to see the real thing. That's something that he just didn't…

M: Didn't have at all.

S: …have, or didn't do it.

M: No, no.

S: But, and I'm not sure that I could have said to him, if I was with him in India or in California, "Well, Krishnaji, you know going through the gate to the grove…"

M: Mm, hm.

S: "…we changed the little gate closure." I don't think, or I'm not sure he would've remembered that. But actually being there…

M: Yes.

S: …and seeing that the gate closure had been changed, he'd say, "Ah, you've changed this." So it's something, there's something…

M: Yes. Well, that ties in with, for instance, he said that he could not evoke his brother's face.

S: Yes.

M: And yet, if you showed a photograph, he not only naturally knew his brother, but he knew all these other people because he saw them.

S: Yes, yes.

M: He once told me that he couldn't tell me what Vanda looked like when she was away. And one of the reasons he wrote to me all the time, he said [chuckling] was that…

S: It kept the memory alive.

M: …it kept the memory alive.

S: So, there's something very strange in this.

M: Mm. It's interesting. At some point in the building of the Centre, didn't we have a maquette[2] or something?

S: Yes, we had a model.

M: Yes.

S: That was for the first architect.

M: Yes, yes. We didn't have one for…

S: The eventual building, no. But it's only because we didn't have time. I really had that model made for Krishnaji.

M: Mm, hm.

S: And that's when he saw that he didn't like it.

M: Yes, he had to look at a thing.

S: Yes. There's something sensible about that. But…

M: Well, now we're talking about all these people. Unless you'd never met them, at least some image comes into your mind.

S: Yes.

M: Mine, too. I don't remember the man who was the chiropractor; that is blank.

S: Yes.

M: I didn't remember the name. But all the other people, I can see them in my mind's eye…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …as I read their names.

S: One of the things that we do is that we make a confusion, or I'll say me, I make a confusion between reality and images. It's part of the human condition that Krishnaji spoke of.

M: Mm.

S: But, it seems that Krishnaji didn't make images. His brain just didn't seem to make them.

M: Mm, hm.

S: If I see the drawings of a building, I can visualize what the building would be like. I can walk through it…

M: Mm, so can I.

S: …from the drawings. But then I think that that capacity also leads to some quirky things about creating images of things that aren't really there, and mistaking them for things that are there.

M: I'm trying to relate this to building the house in Ojai, or remodeling it. But again he… he was relating to things he'd seen.

S: Mm, hm.

M: He wanted the brickwork because he liked the house in Malibu, which was white brick. So he wanted it to look like that. And the floor, the tiled floor…

S: Mm, hm, mm, hm.

M: …he knew what that looked like, and he liked that. And then when I asked him how big he wanted the living room to be in Ojai, he related it first to the number of people to have at meetings. When I asked how many people, he said, "Oh, about fifty." But then I said, "Do you want it as big as the Malibu living room?" which was I think only thirty feet long. He wanted the Ojai one a bit bigger, but, again, he was relating to a physical thing that he knew.

S: Krishnaji also did the same thing with the Centre. He'd asked how big the guest rooms would be; I would have to mention rooms here at Brockwood.

M: Mm, hm.

S: Yes, now that you mention it, he always did that.

M: Yes.

S: What would this or that look like…

M: Yes.

S: …and we'd have to talk about something that he had seen.

M: Yes, yes. Hm. It's interesting. Well, I don't know how we can better describe this, but it's something to do with the way his mind worked.

S: Mm, hm.

I wonder if we could talk about something else at some point, and this is possibly a good time. Krishnaji's fragile health. Because Krishnaji never seems to have been robust, at least in my understanding. And I never questioned it, or looked at it, or thought about it, but it seemed to be a consequence of the extraordinary sensitivity that he had, and perhaps also of internal things that he was going through. It's not as if he was just someone who was frequently poorly because his body didn't work well; quite the opposite. In fact, it seemed that his body worked extremely well, but it was put under such severe pressure…

M: Mm.

S: …by his internal life, or by his sensitivities, or by the process, or something like that, or the demands that he made on it with what he gave out to the public in his talks.

M: Yes.

S: So, I might have just imagined all this. But there was also a very strange phenomenon —and we have already talked about this—of his not being well, and we didn't know if he could give a talk or not; and then, suddenly, this incredible force would be there, and he would be fine.

M: Yes.

S: And he'd generally be fine until the talks were over and then…

M: Yeah, that's right.

S: …he would collapse.

M: No, this thing about energy coming to him through…what other, what source, I don't know what to say. But it was from the viewer's point of view; it was extraordinary. Where again and again and again, he would be ill the day before or two days before, and then…

S: I know. Just roaring…

M: Blazing in effect…

S: But what about his kind of fragile health? Do you feel that this is just a connection I've imagined?

M: No! I mean, that's the way I saw him, too. Now, he would sometimes say that it was something he ate if he didn't feel well. But I don't think it was something he ate. I think it was that he was under too much demand physically. And all the traveling around, he said it more than once, that if he just sat in India under a tree and people came to him, that he'd probably live longer.

S: Oh, yes. And at one point when he said that to me, I asked, "Like a hundred?" He said, "Oh, no, very old!" as though a hundred wasn't. [Chuckles.]

M: Well, his predictions of how long he'd live were so varied.

S: Yes.

M: It's like the, um…

S: Coming back to his health; it's just very strange, for instance, that Krishnaji would have a fever…

M: Mm, hm.

S: For no apparent reason, no apparent infection, and then it would be gone…

M: Mm, hm.

S: …in a day or two. That's all very strange; people just don't get fevers and then it goes.

M: Well, of course, he did have…he did have medication of some kind, naturopathic or homeopathic. But, yes, his health was delicate, but on the whole his health was very good when you consider it, except for certain times like in India when he was so sick for so long. And in the '40s, when he was supposed to go to India, and he had some sort of kidney trouble.

S: Yes.

M: But on the whole, he didn't have any of the things like heart trouble or any of those things.

S: No. He didn't have any of those things. He took just immaculate care of himself. But, at the same time, his body just didn't function like a normal body. At least, it didn't seem to me.

M: Yes.

S: It seems…it was like his saying that the, the line between life and death was v e r y faint and v e r y thin, or there is a very thin thread.

M: Yes.

S: So, it's just not…there was just something odd about his delicacy that didn't seem to be biological or physiological. It seemed to be a physiological consequence of something else.

M: You have to also consider this: An awful lot of conflict went on around him…

S: Oh, yes.

M: …when he lived with the Rajagopals, it was awful. And later on, in the school, we know all that.

S: I know.

M: And in India there were always problems.

S: I know.

M: Now, the things that make for stress and worry and wear and tear that the rest of us all cope with, in a way, he didn't. They bothered him at the moment they were happening, because that was what was happening, but he then dropped it. I mean, it was gone. It was dropped. I don't know how to put it, when it wasn't in front of him. Now, that would have a lot of effect on your physical health. I mean, the way that we worry about something that affects our health, but he didn't have those things.

S: No, he didn't…exactly. He didn't have any of those.

M: He didn't worry. But, he would say to me, "You mustn't get tired, or it will affect me."

S: Mm, hm.

M: And you must do so and so because it will affect me. Now that, if you put two and two together, it was as though it would affect him in the moment, if you know what I mean.

S: Mm, hm.

M: It wouldn't affect him beforehand or the next day, but if I were tired, that would be what was happening then, and that would affect him.

S: Mm, hm. Is it that, if you're tired, it's as if that puts something into the atmosphere…

M: Mm.

S: …and being so sensitive, and taking things in…

M: That's right.

S: He would then take that in.

M: Yes.

S: And so, when he went to London or he went to the airports, all of the crudeness and insanity and violence and all of that…human condition…

M: Mm.

S: …was just so intense and that's what was hard on him physically.

M: That's right.

S: Well, he said as much…in many, many things.

M: Yes. And, for instance, his not wanting to go into hospitals is part of that. When I had the skin graft on my leg, it wasn't serious, but he said to me, "You know that I can't come and see you in the hospital," and I said, "Of course I know, I wouldn't hear of you coming to see me in the hospital!"

S: Mm, hm.

M: He knew I was in the hospital, but it wasn't so much me in the hospital, but it's all the terrible things that are happening to people all around. It was the hospital, not me.

S: Yes. I'd like to come back to this because to continually deal with the awfulness, which Krishnaji did—as he traveled, as he spoke publicly, as he subjected himself to terrible atmospheres with different people, problems in Brockwood, and all…

M: Mm, hm.

S: …god knows what. All of that seems to have taken a physiological toll. It's not that it created some kind of psychological stress where it made Krishnaji anxious or whatever…it's not that.

M: No, he didn't sit up worrying about things.

S: It was actually a physical assault.

M: Yes. And when he said to Dorothy or to the school, "If you don't settle all of this between you, I will close the door to the West Wing," and that would be a physical cut-off.

S: Yes. But also, it seemed that he was saying that if that happened, then something like his aura or the atmosphere around him would then not go into the school.

M: Yes.

S: It would be stopped…

M: Yes, yes.

S: …at that door. Which, to me, was the most horrible thing that could possibly happen.

M: And when he would come to Brockwood, when the troubles were going on, he would pick it up the minute he got here, that it was…

S: Yes. And it had physiological consequences. This is why I feel that part of his fragile health is that all of this would physiologically attack him.

M: Yes. It also ties in with him saying that he wanted students, when they came through the gate, to feel something.

S: Yes. They were to be instantly changed the moment they set foot on Brockwood…

M: Yes. Well, that would be, for him, a normal thing! You see what I mean.

S: Yes. Perhaps it is normal for all of us, but most of us are not conscious of it, whereas Krishnaji was conscious of it.

M: Yes.

S: I don't know; maybe it attacked him physically, not just because he was conscious of it, but also because…there's a sense that he almost wasn't really meant to be…and was only just…

M: How do you mean?

S: Well, all of these things in the different accounts of people when Krishnaji was going through "the process" that there would be, you know, "is Krishna going to come back? Watch out…"

M: Um.

S: …you remember when the bell tolled in Austria[3]…

M: It nearly killed him.

S: …and it nearly killed him, and all kinds of things where his being here was just sooo iffy.

M: It's an extraordinary extreme of sensitivity, an extreme of protection from the results of that sensitivity.

S: And being subjected to extremes of awfulness.

M: Yes.

S: The whole thing—it's a very bizarre mixture. I mean, quite frankly, if I had grown up, with my insensitivities, but physical robustness, etcetera, in an environment with Leadbeater, Arundale, and Wedgwood, and then in the clasp of Rajagopal and company, I think I would have been dead by the age of twelve! [Laughs.] I mean, it was just an awful existence! An extreme sensitivity, being brutalized terribly, having fragile health, almost not meant to be, or just barely meant to be, and yet surviving all these things. It's just …it's very strange.

M: It is. [Long pause.] I keep coming back in my mind—I know we talked about the angels. Two angels who were looking after me.

And he asked me the next day, "Do remember what we talked about?" and I said, "Yes, about the two angels." And then I said, "What did you mean by that?"

S: Mm, hm.

M: And he said, "You should have asked the man then." That has been haunting me.

S: Yes.

M: What did he mean by "the man"?

S: Yes. [Long pause.] Who was saying that?

M: Exactly.

S: Yes.

M: And when I said something, he said, "Probably." I mean that was a bystander's comment.

S: Mm, hm.

M: It's very strange if you start questioning these things.

S: I know, but one needs to question them, because this thing that Krishnaji said to you, and what he said to Mary Lutyens about water can't know itself. It seems he couldn't just say who he was…

M: Yes.

S: …but he could answer your questions.

M: He would know if we were right.

S: He would know if you were right. So, you could say things and…it's almost like the person who said, "Probably"…

M: Yes.

S: …or the person who says, "Well, you should have asked the man."

M: Yes. It's not necessarily the same, and there's that strange repeated statement reported by Nitya in "the process" times of "the man who came to watch." Did you read those things?

S: I did, but I can't remember them.

M: Well, there were different entities during "the process"; there was Krishna, who went away; there was the little child who was left; and there were entities or "somethings" who were doing operations.

S: Yes.

M: And then the man who came…

S: That was in Pupul's account.

M: Well, Pupul got it from Nitya. Yes, but the man who came to watch.

S: Yes, there was a man who came to watch. [Long pause.]

M: So, "the man"…

S: Yes. [Long pause.] Mm.

M: Mm.

S: Anyway. Yes, let's go on. [Chuckles.]

M: [chuckling] Where were we?

S: I don't know! [Both chuckle.]

M: We go wandering around in this uncharted land. [S chuckles.] Ahhh…the picnic place, that's where we were.

S: Yes.

M: 'We stopped again for a picnic breakfast with fruit that was with the croissants, by the roadside. At Chalon we took the autoroute, and Krishnaji drove for fifty miles. We stopped again for a picnic lunch, went through heavy showers and reached Paris and the Plaza Athénée at 2:30 p.m., 160 miles from Chalon, or a total from Gstaad [chuckling] to Paris of 385.5 miles.' [S chuckles.] Being very statistical! 'We unpacked a little and then went to a movie, Big Jake, with John Wayne at 4:30 p.m. [Both chuckle.] Supper in our rooms. While driving, Krishnaji said he had a meditation,' it says here. '"Be empty and aware from within."'

S: Mm.

M: That's what he told me out of that.

The next day was the twenty-third of August. 'We lunched in the garden at the hotel. While Krishnaji rested, I went for a final fitting at Chanel. We both went to Charvet to order eight shirts and sport shirts! To have four at Malibu and four at Brockwood. [Both chuckle.] Then we went to a movie,' ah, I can't read my writing…it's a French movie. It's something Des Hommes. 'We had supper in our rooms.'

The next day, 'I went back to Chanel and looked at winter coats. Then I met Krishnaji at Charvet; he came back briefly with me to Chanel to look at the possibilities. We lunched at Chez Frances,' wherever that is. 'Bought some linen for Brockwood at Porthault; rested; then went to a late afternoon movie, The Horseman.' Don't remember that. 'Supper in the rooms.'

On the twenty-fifth, well, family things. My father was in Deauville at that point. 'We had lunch in the garden at the Plaza Athénée; the Chanel things were delivered; we left at 2 p.m. and were soon out of Paris on the autoroute. Krishnaji drove all the way until we got off it, and we went via Arras to Montreuil. Spent the night at the Château de Montreuil, and took a walk before dinner along the ramparts.'

The next day, 'we left Montreuil for Boulogne and took the 11:30 a.m. hovercraft to Dover. No difficulty with the car at the customs' [chuckles]; that was the anxiety for me. 'We drove the 145 miles to Brockwood via Ashford, Tenterden, The Hawkhurst, Cross In Hand, Petworth, etcetera.'

S: The old 272 route.

M: Yes. 'Stopping to eat picnic lunch. [S chuckles.] A long winding trip, which took until 6 p.m. to reach Brockwood.'

S: I know.

M: 'Five-and-a-half hours from Dover.'

S: I know.

M: 'Everything looked beautiful. It is so good to be back.'

S: It would take as long to get from Dover to Brockwood as from Geneva to Paris.

M: That's right.

S: Ridiculous.

M: That's the 272's fault. Well, 'unpacked; talked to Mary L. and the Digbys; went for a walk.' Father suddenly was in the American Hospital, but it wasn't serious.

On the twenty-ninth, 'In the afternoon, I met David Leipziger, the KFA lawyer, and his wife at the Alton train station. They came for the night. Krishnaji met them at tea, and Leipziger recounted the Tapper-Rothman meeting and settlement discussion in detail. Rothman should have his reply on Tapper's desk by tomorrow.'

The thirtieth of August, 'Leipziger talked to Enrique Biascoechea and Doris Pratt about Rajagopal in the past. In the afternoon, I took him and his wife to Winchester and the train.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I went to London by train to Huntsman for a fitting, shopped for shoes, and met Mary L. and Alain at Fortnum's for lunch. Krishnaji went to Mr. Campion,' the dentist, 'and then we took the train back to Alton and Brockwood.'

On September first, actually through the third, 'Krishnaji dictated three essays, the first of which was on attention. People began arriving for the Brockwood Public Talks. I fixed flowers and the Digbys arrived to stay in the West Wing for the weekend and to bring lovely porcelain "Japanese porcelains for the drawing room."' They brought all those lovely things.

'Krishnaji gave his first talk on the fourth in the tent at Brockwood,' marquee as we say here. 'It was a lovely day, a big crowd; everyone ate in the tent afterward. We are seventy-two people at meals in the house. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I went for a long walk.'

On September fifth, 'Krishnaji gave his second Brockwood talk. It was again a lovely day, and it was a very great talk', it says here. 'At tea time, Mr. Albion Patterson talked with Krishnaji, the Digbys, and me about the anthology he wants to make of Krishnaji's published works from 1945 to 1968.'

The next day, the sixth, 'in the afternoon, just as I was leaving for a walk with Krishnaji, my brother telephoned from Paris saying that Father had a sudden fever of 105 degrees. The doctors are unsure if he can survive the night. I caught the 6 p.m. train to Woking, a taxi to Heathrow, and would have left on Air France at 8 p.m. but the flight was delayed till after 10 p.m. Reached the flat in Paris by midnight. Father is slightly better. Bud and Lisa'—that's Buds wife—'were at a hotel. I sat with Father till 2:30 a.m., then slept on the sofa. Father couldn't recognize me. He has heavy congested breathing, which I encouraged him to cough up. He heard and tried.'

The next day I'm still in Paris. 'Father's fever is slightly less. The doctor said it was pneumonia as a result of poor heart function. Penicillin is controlling it, but the brain function has lessened. He may get a little better, but cannot be cured. Father seemed to see Bud and me for a few seconds. When I said all the family is together, he repeated it.' Oh, I won't go on about all this.

'I spoke to Krishnaji on the telephone and said I would return tomorrow. Doctor Theng came again; Father's about the same, but he cannot pull through this, said Theng, but Father is without pain or discomfort. He cannot say when it will end. Father replied "no" when asked if his hiccups bothered him. Bud and I talked till late.' Well, this goes on…Father didn't die then…'He had a quiet night. Bud and I talked at length; then after seeing Father one more time, as he slept quietly, I went downstairs to where Marcelle Bondoneau was waiting for me for a lift to the airport. I said goodbye to Bud. He and Lisa are flying to New York at 5 p.m. Michael,' that's the chauffeur, 'drove me and Marcelle to Le Bourget. Nadia came there, too, and we took Cambrian Airway flight to Southampton, and then by taxi to Brockwood. Was unpacked by the time Krishnaji awoke from his nap. I was very tired by nighttime, but we took a beautiful walk across the fields.'

On September ninth, 'Krishnaji held the second discussion in the tent. It is perfect weather, warm. He gave an interview in the afternoon. Then, he, Dorothy, Whisper, and I took a walk across the fields. Krishnaji had supper downstairs, and then went to the tent to see the Felix Greene film on China. I slept the sleep of exhaustion again.'

On the eleventh, 'Krishnaji gave his third Brockwood talk in the tent, and he also had lunch in the tent. The Digbys brought some more china for the shelves in the drawing room. Krishnaji met first with the Grafs and then Mr. Kanthor, the German Committee, and Mr. Struzenegger…' Do you remember him?

S: [laughing] No!

M: [chuckles] '…about the Swiss German Committee work. They want Krishnaji to talk in Munich or Hamburg. Then Anneke, Nadia, and Marcelle met with Krishnaji and me about the functions of a committee and relationships to people who want to talk about Krishnaji and the teachings.' My mother-in-law, Sam's mother, had died the day before.

On the September twelfth, 'Krishnaji gave his fourth Brockwood talk—a marvelous one. We lunched in the tent, and I talked to Cadogan and Mr. and Mrs. Agashi'—I'm not sure that's correct—'an Indian who lives in Canada and who has written a book on the effect of Krishnaji's teachings on himself. He wants the KFT to publish it. We explained that that was impossible. Then discussed with the Digbys, Cadogan, and Anneke a problem with someone in Holland who is a self-proclaimed authority on Krishnaji's teachings. Krishnaji spoke briefly with Miss Helen Meyer'—it looks like—'of the BBC book review program on BBC radio. They will do a broadcast on The Urgency of Change using what Krishnaji said. We had the Digbys up for a brief tea. Then Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the lovely fields. In the evening, we ran a film of Krishnaji's interview made in 1968. Felix Greene talked to me about doing an interview with Krishnaji, on film, for young people. Krishnaji agreed to do it.' When do you get into your story?

S: I arrive in '74.

M: Oh lord, we have a long way to go.

S: Yes, I know. I go to my first talk in Saanen in '72, but I'm invisible until '74.

M: [chuckles] I feel you were there through all of this.

S: [laughs] I am now.

M: 'Most of the visitors left on the thirteenth. We walked in the fields. Father is slightly better. The fever is gone, and he is taking a little soup.'

On September fourteenth, 'Krishnaji and I went to London. We both had Huntsman fittings, and both went to the Dior boutique, but it was too crowded. We went to Hatchard's and ran into Mary L., who was lunching with us at Fortnum's. We had a "just right"'—that's from him—'lunch there. Looked at some clothes, but Krishnaji found them cheap-looking. I was wearing my new Chanel coat for the first time, and he liked it. He had a filling put in by Mr. Campion, which fell out by evening!'

S: Oh dear!

M: 'On the train, Krishnaji observed with horror three businessmen, commuters. "Society must change! Some other way to live must be found," he said. [Both laugh.] We came wandering home from Alton via Selborne, Liss, Hawkley, Privett. Found a letter from Leipziger in which the Rothman-Tapper settlement was discussed.' Doesn't say what happened. Nothing happened [chuckles].

The next day, 'we telephone Erna in Ojai regarding Leipziger's letter, but we are to await her letter.'

On September sixteenth, 'at 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a meeting with the staff on what we are trying to do in the school. A new physics/chemistry teacher arrived from the U.S. and was present.' I don't remember him.

S: He didn't last very long.

M: 'Students are arriving for the start of school on the Sunday. After lunch, Krishnaji and I telephoned Erna in Ojai as we had received her letter. We are all in agreement about the settlement terms Tapper should offer to Rajagopal. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I for a walk across the fields. Father is physically better, but there has been cerebral deterioration in the last three days.'

S: While we're just talking of you and Krishnaji calling Erna, it just reminded me of something…Krishnaji didn't like speaking on the phone very much.

M: No! He would sit beside me and cue me.

S: [laughing] And cue you, I know! But that's also rather funny.

M: He very seldom talked on the phone.

S: I know, and the times that I've spoken with him on the phone, you could tell he was uncomfortable.

M: Yes.

S: And he made it as quick as possible.

M: Yes.

S: And then, I think he always just handed the phone to you. It was like a few words from him and then [laughing] passing it on to you.

M: Yes, he always did that. Mostly. [S laughs.] Sometimes I'd have to almost force him to speak so the person would know that it wasn't just me!

S: That he was there…yes. [Both laugh.]

M: On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji and I went to London. Huntsman fittings; I bought a raincoat and some shoes; we lunched at Fortnum's; bought some sweaters' [chuckles]. 'And he went to the dentist, and the tooth was filled for the third time!'

S: Oh!

M: Yes, 'the tooth he filled last week and which fell out the same evening. Then we caught the 4:12 p.m. back to Alton and were at Brockwood in time for a late walk across the fields and down to the lodge to look at a sign from Ojai.' That's the Brockwood Park sign made by that man in Ojai who makes those signs.

S: Mm, hm.

M: [chuckles] I don't know why we had to send it to Ojai, but…[S laughs]. Krishnaji had…

S: Things were always better if they came from somewhere else.

M: Somewhere else, yes! Also the sign man made them lovingly out of…you know, something. [S laughs.] 'Krishnaji had supper downstairs. The Sherman twins have come in; Krishnaji took a particular interest in them.' That was…oh, dear! They were two children that Krishnaji ran into down by the river in Saanen with their mother. Their mother was, well…but two beautiful children. And we took them on as students. Yes, it says here 'he saw them in Gstaad while on a walk and thought they were nice children.'

S: [chuckling] That's a nice admissions policy! [Laughs heartily.]

M: Well…the next day nothing happened, except Krishnaji held a discussion for the staff. So…

S: Alright, so we'll start our next discussion on September nineteenth?

M: Okay, good.

Issue 20: September 19, 1971 to December 31, 1971

The winter introduced in this issue is one of the few in which Krishnaji doesn't go to India because he is exhausted and he says, his "body is rebelling against it." So, after a few weeks in Italy, Krishnaji joins Mary in Malibu, and we, as readers, see more of him than we would normally over this period.

This issue includes discussion about an aspect of Krishnaji's presence that is very difficult to put into words—that people could have a sense of what he was saying without knowing (in any conventional sense) what he was saying.

Mary: So, we'll begin on September twentieth, 1971 because nothing happened on the nineteenth.

Scott: This is at Brockwood.

M: Oh yes, we're at Brockwood. And on that day, 'Krishnaji talked to the students and the staff on the opening day of school. We had thirty-two students, of fourteen nationalities, and they looked like a nice group.'

On the twenty-first, one of my godchildren came by to stay for a while.

On September twenty-second, 'Mary Cadogan came to lunch and Krishnaji, she, Dorothy, and I discussed the building at Brockwood and Donald Hoppen's[1] failing to return until possibly in December. We decided not to do a new building, which would cost almost as much as Brockwood did when we first bought it, but to remodel a bit in the house and convert remaining external buildings.' So much for that.

On the next two days, 'Krishnaji held a discussion with the staff and students. But also, on the twenty-fourth, my' [chuckles] 'Tiffany clock disappeared!' [Laughs.] There was much drama that ensued.

S: Now, wait a minute, what? Was it stolen?

M: I've still got it. But, yes.

S: It was stolen?

M: It must have been stolen because nobody could find it, and I searched my room minutely. Then I had the good idea, as it turned out, to get the students in to help me search. Perhaps they were better at searching. And lo and behold, it turned up [chuckles] in my room.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Somebody had put it back.

S: Mary, what was going on with Donald Hoppen at this time? Because this was also, um, a small drama in the making, wasn't it? Or in the unfolding by then?

M: Yes, he had that plan for a building, which was going to be…

S: A multistory building where the art pavilion was. And the students were going to help, or something like that.

M: I don't remember the details, but it had the look of no results from the beginning. But let's let it unfold. The next couple of days are busy with nothing in particular.

On the thirtieth of September, 'I taped on the Nagra a discussion Krishnaji had with the students. Then, he and I caught the 12:50 p.m. train from Alton. We had a picnic lunch on the train, then Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt & Hill. After that, we went, for the first time, to a new dentist, Mr. Hamish Thompson.' He was the good dentist who took care of Krishnaji's teeth from then on. 'He was recommended by Mary Links' sister, Mrs. Herbert Eggar. Krishnaji said he was excellent.'

Then on the second of October, 'a letter from Marcelle Bondoneau came saying that Mr. de Vidas had died.'

On October third, 'Krishnaji spoke to the students in the paneled study. I taped it on the Nagra. The Moorheads came to lunch and they spoke to Krishnaji later, and so did David Bohm at 4 o'clock. I copied the Nagra tapes onto the Uher. Then we went for a walk.'

October fifth…oh, we can jump to the big book.

S: Read out the whole thing.

M: Okay. 'Krishnaji gave a wonderful talk to the students on the vividness of awareness and a quiet mind. He showed them pranayama. We went to Winchester after lunch for the Normandy Ferry tickets, intending to go on to Southampton to scout out where we would dock, but Krishnaji was tired after trotting around Winchester, so we came back. It was a marvelous, clear, sparkling autumn day: very exhilarating. We went for a walk and Krishnaji said, 'This is better. Now I feel better.' [Chuckles.] Later he told me he had dreamt he met Winston Churchill talking to a girl. Churchill said to Krishnaji, "Oh, it doesn't matter if you marry a girl or not." Krishnaji said to Churchill'—[laughing] I'd forgotten this—'"If you'll forgive my saying so, Churchill, you are naughty!"' [Both laugh.] 'To which Churchill replied to Krishnaji, "I love you, I love you."' End of dream! [Both laugh.] 'Krishnaji said to me, "I've met very many distinguished people on the astral plane."' [Both chuckle.]

S: But he's joking about that?

M: Of course.

S: Well, we have to make that clear for posterity. [Laughing.]

M: Well, take it as you like, but it was said with humor. 'At lunch, a Tony Fergusson telephoned to know why he hadn't a reply to his letter to Krishnaji. He had joyous news about the reincarnation of Annie Besant. He said that there was a rumor that Krishnaji wouldn't see him.' [Chucking] 'Krishnaji said, "Oh, for god's sake," when he was asked about it. Ian Hammond[2] telephoned; he will come down Saturday about plans to enlarge the dining room, etcetera.'

Now we're back to the little book, but [chuckles], it was worth that one entry.

On the sixth of October, 'we went to London. There was the usual visit to Huntsman, and then lunch with Mary and Joe at their flat. Afterward, we went to Mrs. Bindley's for tea, and then came back to Brockwood.'

'Krishnaji had another discussion with the students on the next day, and then on the eighth. Mr. van Praag of Holland, who did the film interview with Krishnaji in June, came back and did two nine-minute segments in color.'

S: Oh, on film?

M: Yes. On the ninth, 'Ian Hammond came at 10 a.m. and with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me, went over our plans for enlarging the Brockwood dining room, and making the Cloisters where the kennels and potting sheds are.'

On October tenth, 'Krishnaji talked to the students, and I taped it on the Nagra. The Digbys came for lunch, and we discussed publications with Krishnaji after deciding to go ahead with the Cloisters building plan. It is still lovely weather, warm and dry.'

The eleventh. 'Dorothy and Doris drove me to the 8:50 a.m. train Monday to London. I went for Krishnaji's Italian and French visas, and purchased his air tickets. I walked to Harrods, where I lunched with a friend. Then I went to the Digbys' for tea with Nelly. Changed at 6:30 p.m. and went with them to a preview of a Cecil Beaton exhibit of photos at the Victoria and Albert Museum. We came back to the Digbys' and dined, and I spent the night there.'

The next day, 'after breakfast at the Digbys', I went to Waterloo train station where I met Mary Cadogan. We discussed business on the train to Alton. Dorothy met us, and we reached Brockwood just in time to set up the Nagra for Krishnaji's discussion with students. After lunch, Krishnaji, Mary C., Dorothy, and I went over money and other matters. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields.'

The thirteenth. It says, 'Rain finally. Went to Winchester. Met Mary L. and Amanda at the Wessex Hotel and brought them back to lunch at Brockwood. We all went out to look at the Cloisters space. I had an idea for a garage and parking on the Morton land behind it. Eventually, I took Mary and Amanda to Alton; and came back to tea with Krishnaji. He, Dorothy, and I walked in the rain.'

On October fourteenth, 'Krishnaji again talked to the students and the staff, and I taped it on the Nagra. It was a cold, clear, beautiful day. Krishnaji washed the Mercedes. He, Dorothy, and I took a long walk.'

'I was packing all day on the fifteenth. Jane and Ian Hammond came for lunch and brought drawings of the proposed Cloisters. It looks very nice. Krishnaji was pleased.'

Again the next day, 'I packed all day. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across and around the fields. How marvelously lovely it is. We had supper downstairs and then loaded the car with the luggage, and the school was there to say goodbye. Krishnaji and I drove off in a light rain to Southampton, where we loaded the car onto the Normandy Ferry. We have state rooms, fairly comfortable. The seas were a bit rough in the night, but alright.'

On the seventeenth, 'the ferry docked at Le Havre, and we drove off at 7 a.m., going in the direction of Rouen. Stopped on the autoroute for a breakfast and were in Paris at the Plaza Athénée shortly after 10 a.m. It was an easy drive. I unpacked, bathed, and telephoned L'Hotel'—that's a hotel called L'Hotel. 'I found that my brother and Lisa had got in at midnight. She is there for a museum conference. They came over to see us before lunch. Mary and Joe Links are here for a Venice exhibition, and came over as well. We all sat and talked. Moser arrived from Thun and took the car off for its winter storage. Then Mary, Joe, Krishnaji, and I lunched in the Régence. At 4 p.m., Nadia Kossiakof came to talk to me, and then Mr. Voisin and an aide came to discuss doing a filmed interview for O.R.T.F. Krishnaji said yes. He and I then went for a walk and had supper in the rooms.'

On the eighteenth, 'I went early to see my father. Monsieur Voisin and his crew set up for a TV interview in the sitting room. Krishnaji came there at noon, and the interview was filmed. Afterward, Nadia Kossiakof and Marcelle Bondoneau lunched with us in the Régence. Krishnaji rested a little and I went to Chanel for fittings on a coat. Krishnaji came by taxi to see if he liked it. I ordered a tweed suit. Then, Krishnaji and I went to Charvet, and then walked back to the hotel, and had supper in the room.'

On the next day, 'Krishnaji did a further interview in French for O.R.T.F. He has done a total of four hours, including yesterday.'

S: Four hours of interviews?

M: Including the day before. They recorded four hours of interview. And he was talking French through all that, you must realize.

S: What was it for again? What's the name of the company?

M: O. R. T. F.…um…something television Français.

On the twentieth of October, 'Krishnaji flew on Alitalia to Rome. I went with him in Father's car to Orly. Returned to Paris, saw Father, etcetera, etcetera. Came back to the hotel tired.'

'A letter from Erna came, regarding the counteroffer from Rajagopal: he wants to keep the K & R Foundation, and $400,000. This is unacceptable to Tapper. Tapper is to call in the KWINC membership as a last ditch effort to settle. If not, the complaint will be filed.'

On the twenty-first, 'I telephoned Krishnaji in Rome and told him of Erna's letter. Rosalind tried to telephone him at Vanda's last night. She had postponed her trip to Israel in order to see him, "not about the dispute." Krishnaji sent a reply via Vanda that he did not wish to see her about anything. Erna's letter stressed that it was more important than ever that he not see Rosalind.'

On the twenty-fourth, 'my brother and his wife left for New York, and nothing of interest happened. Talked to Dorothy at Brockwood; all is well. Wrote to Krishnaji.'

The next day, I'm still in Paris. 'I went to exhibits at the Orangerie. I saw my father, had a fitting, then came back to the hotel, and telephoned Krishnaji in Rome. He has been resting since his arrival. There is still no decision yet on his going to India. The war news between India and Pakistan is still tense.'

The following day, October twenty-sixth, 'I left the Plaza Athénée and went to Orly. Took a TWA plane and got to New York at 2 p.m. Went to my brother's, and dined with him.'

I have a feeling there's not going to be much in these while I was there. 'I went up to Martha's Vineyard to see my mother and stepfather; the island was lovely. Saw the redone town hall, gift of Katherine Cornell. They came for dinner.' Well, you don't want to hear all this stuff.

'Telephoned de Marxov about Krishnaji's decision to liquidate Alzina.'

S: Mary, why wasn't Krishnaji going to go to India that year?

M: The war.

S: Which war?

M: Well, there was a war, I mean, a possible war between Pakistan and India.

S: Mm, hm.

M: On October thirty-first, it says, 'Krishnaji was to give a public talk this morning in Rome.' Now I'm back in New York. It's all family stuff.

On the first of November, 'I got letter #1 for that year from Krishnaji in Rome, which he began writing on October twenty-first.'

On the second, 'I flew to Los Angeles.' Then there are things about the Dunnes, Filomena, the house. 'We have a new cat called Timosi.'

S: Where did the cat come from?

M: I don't know. Cats just come, you know, they turn up and you have a cat! [S chuckles.] 'Rothman'—that's Rajagopal's lawyer—'told Tapper that the KWINC board refused to see him unless he had a substantially better settlement offer to make. Tapper has no such intention and therefore authorized Leipziger to file the complaint. I cabled this to Krishnaji in Rome. How arrogant to tell the attorney general "Don't bother to come unless you're…"' [S chuckles.] Really! 'I spoke to Leipziger; on Erna's return, we will go to the next steps in the R-KWINC matter. I wrote to Krishnaji.'

Nothing interesting. Just home things.

On November sixth, 'I had a letter from Krishnaji. He has decided not to go to India. Not because of the war possibility between India and Pakistan, but because "body is rebelling against it." Needs a complete rest. He's staying in Rome till the sixteenth, then goes to Brockwood, and then comes here'—meaning Malibu. 'I feel infinitely relieved and happy. I cabled to him.'

On the seventh, 'a letter from Vanda came that Fresia has died.' He was an old friend of Krishnaji's, and he was head of, well, as much as there was a head, of the Italian committee. He lived in the north of Italy. Nice man.

On the eighth, 'I talked to Erna, who returned yesterday; also Leipziger.'

The next day, 'at 4 p.m., there was long conference between Leipziger, Saul Rosenthal, the Lilliefelts, and me about the next steps in the KWINC-R issue.' I guess the complaint was filed by then.

On November tenth, 'Alain Naudé turned up. He was speaking at USC and staying with Alan Kishbaugh. We had an early supper, and he went off to make his speech. I went to Ojai and saw the Lilliefelts.'

S: What would Alain have been talking about? Music or Krishnaji?

M: Krishnaji.

S: Mm, hm.

M: In the beginning, he wanted to talk about the teachings. That was his original intention. I don't know how far he went with it. He used to say that he'd been talking here or there, places.

S: Mm, hm.

M: On the thirteenth, 'a letter came from Krishnaji. He is very tired and worried he may be involved in the Rajagopal case. He must be protected. I talked to Erna and agreed that he must be totally shielded, no matter what.' Then, I did all kinds of errands, and came home. 'I telephoned Vanda in Rome. She says Krishnaji is alright. Just tired. I spoke to him and reassured him about the case and about getting money for the Cloisters.' I don't know what that was. 'He goes to Brockwood on the nineteenth and will be here on Thanksgiving.'

On November fifteenth, 'Alain Naudé came from Ojai for dinner and to stay in the guest house till Wednesday.' That was on Monday. 'He says that Rajagopal and Annalisa Rajagopal were served with papers in the complaint.'

The next day, 'Alain was here all day. Alan Kishbaugh came to an early dinner and went with Alain to the Bodhi book shop where Alain spoke.'

On November nineteenth, 'Krishnaji flew from Rome to Brockwood, and I had a letter from him.' And…well, nothing happens the next several days.

On the twenty-fourth, 'I got an express letter from Krishnaji sent from England, Monday. Leipziger telephoned about Biascoechea doing a deposition and it being possibly taken here. Also, there are possibilities of protecting Krishnaji if he should be subpoenaed by Rajagopal.'

On the twenty-fifth, we jump to the big book. It's Thanksgiving, and it says: 'Krishnaji began this day awakening at Brockwood at 3 a.m. He couldn't sleep and so got up and did exercises and later left in the Land Rover with Dorothy Simmons and Doris Pratt for Heathrow, where he took a 10 a.m. TWA flight for Los Angeles. It was misty here. Philippa came over. I made soup and left early for the airport. The plane wasn't due until 4:15 p.m. Driving, I had that curious intense sense of awareness of every inch of the road and the other cars, because once again, I was on Krishnaji's business. It is conscious, but more than that, it is as if something took charge and my actions become, as Krishnaji has so often told me, responsible to whatever his are. That was a very strong feeling.

S: Do you want to talk about that a little more?

M: [sighs] Well, I can only say that I felt it, you know. I wasn't just trotting along in my own life. Suddenly, the things became serious.

S: Mm, hm. Also implied is that this is not subjective, this is not subjectively created. It's not that you suddenly decide, "Oh, I must get serious," and so you create it.

M: No, no. Oh no, no. It's something I become aware of. For instance, whenever I went to an airport to get him, I thought, what if I have an accident on the way? He'll arrive and he doesn't have any telephone numbers, he has no money, what happens to him? You know, I've felt that intense sense of responsibility. Drive carefully. Get there, be there.

S: But now, there's also something else in this.

M: Yes, there's something else. It was a feeling; people could say, "Oh well, she imagined it," but…

S: Well, people can say all that, but I mean according to you, something affected you.

M: Yes.

S: Something came that affected you.

M: Yes. I mean it…it was, it was there. It was happening.

S: Yes, I understand.

M: And the responsibility was both to him personally, because I naturally wanted to do everything for him that I could, but it was, as he had said to me early on (somewhere I must have talked about it), "You are no longer responsible to yourself, you are responsible to the Other."

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'So, sitting at the airport, waiting for him was for me a feeling of at once a very quiet intentness and the limitless feeling of joy at his coming. Again, most intensely personal and at the same time beyond and apart from any personal dimension. The plane came in precisely on time and through a window I could see him second off the plane, carrying his Gucci bag. In half an hour, his two bags were wheeled out of customs behind the porter. He was here! Somehow, his coming now, only five weeks from when we were last together in Paris, seems more momentous than it had been after the long weeks of the Indian tour. In some way, it is intently important that he has changed course and come here for, at last, a thorough rest.'

'He looked bright and very well in spite of accumulated fatigue, and the very long flight of eleven hours. Once turning onto the freeway, I thought he was about to faint, but touching him lightly seemed to prevent it. It was only when we were unpacking in his room, and he had just given me a little bottle of eye drops, that he suddenly fainted toward me, so quietly that I could only break his fall. It lasted about two minutes. Then he was alright, took a shower, and insisted on having his supper tray in front of the television news. Then, quickly to bed. He is wound up from traveling, chattery, and full of sparks, but his very simple supper came up, as had the food on the plane. He brought me a letter he had written at Brockwood, and today, to me, written on the plane.'

‘He wrote, “There was a right action when the Order of the Star was dissolved. There was a right action when the castle and land were returned. There was right action when he broke with Rajagopal, and there is right action now. We are dealing with a crook, unscrupulous, utterly unreliable, and deeply antagonistic, with a considerable hate. Action, any action where he is concerned will have in it the elements of distortion. We are not concerned with him. He’s unbalanced and self-centered. It is not the money we want, nor the property, nor the manuscript, etcetera. I feel that money was given with great devotion, sacrifice, love. To those people who gave it, we are responsible. And what is our responsibility? People, including Signora,”’—he always called Vanda, “Signora”—“‘have said to me, ‘Is it not violence to embark on the path of lawyers?’ Signora was wild about it. Personally, money, etcetera is nothing. But to leave it all in Rajagopal’s hands seems and feels totally wrong and not right.” And then, “Right action under any circumstances is always true, and from that everything flows easily. It is like a flowing river. The flow of the river is not inaction. Its action is of itself from the beginning to the end. There is a right action in this.”’

‘And later, he said, “One must be a complete outsider, and so the most true revolutionary, and then action will be incorruptible. We must act as outsiders with Rajagopal.”’

S: Mm, hm.

M: I think that’s important…

S: Yes, it is.

M: …that that be part of history.

S: Absolutely.

M: Monday, the seventeenth of April…oh, it jumps again!

S: The seventeenth of April?

M: Yes, oh, big jump. Yes. I was very bad about…I mean, I wrote something like that, but the daily things I was not good about. There’s a lot that’s going to be…

S: It’s okay. We’ll just take it as it comes from the little book.

M: The next day. ‘We just were home and he walked around the garden.’

On the twenty-seventh, ‘the Lilliefelts and Ruth Tettemer came for lunch. Krishnaji talked at length over what is best to do with the Rajagopal affair. What is right action in this? We came to the decision to proceed with the Biascoechea deposition and request for an injunction for a receiver…’ Oh, I had to have a receiver appointed for KWINC. That didn’t happen.

On November twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji slept all morning and again after lunch.' [Chuckles.] Krishnaji and I watched the Walter Mitty movie with Danny Kaye on television, and Krishnaji laughed endlessly.' He was a great fan of Danny…Donny Kaye, as he used to call him. [S laughs.]

S: That's right, I remember!

M: "Donny Kaye is the funniest man," he used to say. [M chuckles.]

On the twenty-ninth, 'we were home all day except for my going to the market. Leipziger telephoned about Biascoechea coming here for the deposition.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai. We each had a treatment by Dr. Lay'—she was a chiropractor—'and then we went to lunch with the Lilliefelts. Ruth was there. We held a KFA trustee meeting with Krishnaji, and Krishnaji temporarily withdrew from the board to avoid participating in the litigation. He suggested Theo Lilliefelt as a substitute member, and this was carried out.' That's how Theo became a member; we had to have one more.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And so, there we were. We have usually been against having husbands and wives on boards.

S: Yes.

M: But anyway, that's what happened. 'We then discussed Alan Kishbaugh as a possible trustee and agreed to invite him to become one. Krishnaji walked ahead down Grand Avenue with Theo, and I followed in the car, and we drove home from there for supper. Doctor Lay had said that his body is bone-tired. But Krishnaji says his mind is bursting with energy. He needs to slow down till his body can rest and catch up.'

The first of December was a quiet day at home.

The next day, 'we went to town, had a picnic in the car under the trees.' We used to find shady streets in Beverly Hills. There are lots of trees there, and we would sit in the car and eat our picnic. 'We shopped for French records and books' [chuckling] 'and went to Saks Fifth Avenue, where Krishnaji saw monstrous, devouring women shoppers!' [Both laugh.] 'He was horrified! We went to Bullock's for a windbreaker. Bought a small record player. Krishnaji fainted leaving Veteran Avenue. Drove home safely. It rained a little bit.'

December third seems to have been 'gardening. We had two gardeners come and help plant things. Krishnaji and I did a French lesson. Later we went into Westwood and saw the movie The French Connection.' Do you remember that? It was a thriller.

S: Ah, yes.

M: [chuckles] December fifth 'was a lovely, quiet day at home. We did French lessons in the morning. Alain Naudé telephoned from San Francisco. He's moving into an apartment. We walked on the beach road. Krishnaji dictated during lunch an article for The Bulletin on relationship.'

The next day, 'we did a French lesson, and we walked on the beach. There was a cable from Balasundaram about hearing from Frydman in Bombay that Krishnaji was in a New York hospital.' This happened all the time, rumors about Krishnaji.

S: I know, I know.

M: 'Erna says Biascoechea is coming out for the deposition in January.'

On December eighth, 'Krishnaji came with me on errands and to arrange to buy a Nagra 4.2. We had a picnic lunch in the car. Then we went to a movie, Man in the Wilderness, in Hollywood.' Don't remember that at all.

The next day, 'we did another French lesson in the morning. Sidney Field came for lunch. And we walked on the beach.'

S: What were these French lessons you were doing? Because Krishnaji already spoke French, and so do you.

M: Well, we were supposed to get better.

S: Mm, hm.

M: We played records.

S: Ah, you played records?

M: That's all we did, yes. You know that he…you know the story, the very last year of his life he wanted to improve his French.

S: I know.

M: 'I talked to my brother in Paris. The whole family, except me, were there with Father for Christmas.'

December tenth, 'Donald Hoppen came to lunch and talked afterward with Krishnaji about his relation to Brockwood, etcetera. I left them and took Filomena to the doctor for her arthritis. Krishnaji had walked in the garden when I got back, but had had no nap. He went to bed early.'

December eleventh, '"No more interviews," said Krishnaji. He's tired from the Hoppen one yesterday. He said he awakened in the night with a sense of joy and felt the room was filled with people. Quote: "Eminent, holy beings who seem there when something happens in his brain. My head felt enormous." We did French lessons in the morning and…'

S: He said that those people, those beings seemed there when something happens in his brain?

M: That's what it says, "who seem there." "Eminent, holy beings who seem there when something happens in his brain."

S: Yes.

M: '…and in the afternoon we went to a movie in Santa Monica, Play Misty for Me. That was a Clint Eastwood movie. It says here, 'not very good,' but…

S: No, that's only you…

M: …doubtless…

S: Doubtless, it was wonderful[3]. [Both laugh.]

M: It says, for the next day, 'home all day. French lesson. Walk in the garden.'

On December thirteenth, 'Krishnaji said to me, "You must be cured, not corrected."' I guess that was my ailments or maybe my habits [chuckling], I don't know which. [S laughs.] It doesn't say. [Chuckles.]

December fourteenth, 'we went to Ojai. We each had a chiropractic treatment with Dr. Lay. Then to lunch with Erna and Theo, Ruth, and Albion Patterson. There was discussion of the origins of the Happy Valley School and dissident teachers there wanting to hear the facts of it from Krishnaji. Would he see them or not? He and Theo walked, and Erna and I met them on the road. Krishnaji and I drove home, seeing a marvelous sunset.'

The next day, 'cold weather. Indian troops almost into Dhaka.' I haven't been following the war in this little book.

On the sixteenth, 'The East Pakistan army surrenders. India orders a ceasefire on West Pakistan front. Yahya Khan says he will fight on.' See, there was a war.

S: Yes.

M: That's when East and West Pakistan…

S: Yes, I remember, and Bangladesh broke off.

M: Yes, that's right. 'We went early to town on miscellaneous errands. Went to get the new Nagra. Krishnaji had rested all day. He walked around the garden, and had met me when I drove in. Krishnaji remote, as if aware of other things in the house. "Something is going on in the head," he said, but he slept throughout the night.'

On December seventeenth, 'India and Pakistan officially end the war after fourteen days. Yahya Khan accepts the ceasefire. We were home all day, and we walked on the beach. Krishnaji's head hurts.'

The next day. 'The pain in Krishnaji's head continues. He rested all morning, but wanted to go to a movie, so we saw the Disney Bedknobs and Broomsticks with Angela Lansbury. The pain stopped for Krishnaji, but resumed as we came out of the theater. He fainted in the car on the Pacific Coast Highway. We walked around the lawn on returning home, and at supper saw a TV program of the Indian war.'

On December nineteenth, 'Krishnaji's head was better. The Perrines came to lunch. Krishnaji talked to them about the purpose of a hot springs place they are thinking of having in the mountains in the back of Big Sur.'

The next day, 'we had a beach walk. Krishnaji felt better. No pain in his head.'

On December twenty-first, 'we drove to Ojai, and we each had a chiropractic treatment from Dr. Lay. We lunched with Erna and Theo afterward. Barbara Lama…' Barbara Lama was Albion Patterson's stepdaughter, I think, something like that '…and her husband. Albion Patterson and Mr. Sperry, a former teacher at Happy Valley, and the Essels came to ask Krishnaji about the background of Happy Valley, and under what condition he would be interested in the school. He said only if the trustees remove Rosalind. Krishnaji walked and talked for half an hour with Erna and Theo, and then we drove home.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji, Filomena, and I went to a movie, Fiddler on the Roof. My bedroom roof leaks.' [Both chuckle.]

On the twenty-third, 'I went to the airport to meet Alain, who is spending Christmas with us. In the p.m., I took Filomena to the doctor,' etcetera. Well, anyway, 'when I came home, Krishnaji and Alain had gone for a walk.'

On the twenty-fourth, Christmas Eve. 'Talked to Mother in New York. All the Taylors are in Paris with Father. Philippa and her young man came to lunch with Krishnaji, Alain, and me. Krishnaji, Alain, and I walked in the afternoon along the beach road.'

Christmas. Well, nothing. [Laughs.] 'I went over to the Dunnes' in the morning. Just another day.'

S: Hm, hm. Mary, you and Krishnaji didn't exchange presents on Christmas, did you?

M: We didn't even exchange "Happy Christmas."

S: Right, I know that, but I'm just saying this for the record. [Both chuckle.]

M: No. We ignored Christmas totally.

M: As we did birthdays, too.

S: Yes, I know.

M: On December twenty-seventh, 'Pouring rain. Took Alain and John Diegis to the airport. Shopped at Lindberg's'—that's the health food store—'and came home. Krishnaji got a letter from Vigeveno. Dr.…' somebody, looks like something '…Cotton and George'—looks like—'Ariba of the Happy Valley School board came to see Krishnaji. It is clear that the school is in a total mess, and that the board is totally under Rosalind's thumb.'

December twenty-eighth, 'there was rain in the early morning and then it ended. Six inches had fallen. We were home all day except for the trip to the Pacific Palisades, and then we walked on the lower road.' I don't know what we did at Pacific Palisades, probably marketing. 'Krishnaji dictated a reply to Vigeveno. I discussed it with Leipziger.'

On December twenty-ninth, 'The rains stopped, and it was a clear, beautiful day. While talking to Erna on the phone, we heard there was snow on the mountains in Ojai. Krishnaji said, "Let's go." So, we took a picnic and drove to the Lilliefelts'. Had our picnic there, and then walked with them three miles. The mountains are powdered with snow. We came home for supper.'

S: Hm.

M: [soft chuckle] That was the twenty-ninth, so we're almost finished with 1971.

On December thirtieth, 'we had an early lunch and then drove to Hollywood and saw a movie, Dirty Harry, a detective one. We came back [chuckles] via Pacific Palisades and bought a twelve-inch Sony color TV. We discussed in the car, "what is it to be bourgeois?" It is self-centered, desiring ego. Material things, concepts, but more than that, an inelasticity. I asked if I were that. Krishnaji thought I am not attached to money or things, and I answered, "no" to deriving ego from them. We posted Krishnaji's reply to Vigeveno.'

There was wind all night on the thirty-first. 'It was a beautiful, bright day. Krishnaji dictated a piece on what the bourgeois mind is. The wind was less in the afternoon, and we walked at low tide on the beach.' It says, 'a blessed way to end this year.'

S: When he would dictate one of these things, you would tape it or just take it down?

M: I would take it down.

S: Okay.

M: He dictated reasonably slowly, so even though I don't know shorthand, I could, with my horrible writing, scratch it out. And then immediately afterward, I would go through it, and if I were uncertain about anything, I would read it back to him.

S: Yes.

Mary, I also wanted to ask about something that came up the last time we recorded.

M: Yes.

S: It's something that I should have picked up before. And this has to do with Krishnaji waking up and saying that he'd had a marvelous meditation during the night. Now Krishnaji said that many times, and even to me…

M: Yes.

S: Toward the end of his life, also.

M: Yes.

S: The reason I want to pick this up is because Krishnaji is using the word meditation in such instances in a very different way from the way he uses it when he gives his talks. In the talks, for Krishnaji, meditation seemed to be a state of being that one should live in all day long. It wasn't something you sat down and did. But here, this is something else, because this is something that comes to Krishnaji.

M: Yes.

S: And in his sleep.

M: Or waking.

S: Or semi-sleep.

Editor's Note: This discussion seems important, but also challenging, at least partly because the word "it" sometimes refers to Krishnaji's meditation, and sometimes it is a grammatical device (e.g., "It is a grammatical device."). It is clear in listening to the audio tapes which "it" is being used, but less clear in the transcript. To help the reader avoid confusion, when the word "it" is used to refer to meditation, it will be in bold and italics (it), but will otherwise remain in the normal font.

M: And sometimes in there, he says that it came in sleep and continued when he was awake.

S: Yes.

M: But, he has said, I think many times, or certainly elsewhere, it comes to you; you cannot go to it.

S: Well, he would sometimes use the word other for that.

M: Yes, but he used meditation in various ways. I mean, he would say, "I had a marvelous meditation last night."

S: Yes.

M: Well, what are you going to call it? People would say, "Why use the word teachings?" But, what are you going to call them?

S: I know.

M: So you use the word teachings finally, although he resisted the word at times.

S: Yes.

But what I'm trying to get to here, and I don't know if we can say anything more than what we've said, but it's the relationship, perhaps, of this meditation to sleep. So that somehow when the brain was quiet or, well, sleeping, it would come.

M: That's right. And you remember at the end of his life in the hospital.

S: I know, I know.

M: It came to him.

S: Even when he was back home right to the end.

M: Yes.

S: And his face would just…

M: Yes.

S: …glow.

M: Yes.

S: Did he ever say anything to you about…? Now, presumably this also came to Krishnaji during the day—I don't know. I can't remember him ever saying that, but it seems that when he said this was mostly when it would come at night.

M: Well, I don't think there are any rules about this. It came at night, and it came when he was awake. It came—I think, I don't know this—but I feel that when he was walking by himself ahead and far off. But I find hard and fast definitions of words…

S: No, I don't want that. I'm not looking for that.

M: I know that you're not looking for that, but I think we have to; when we're talking, recording this way, people are apt to seize on words.

S: I know.

Well, this is something that I feel that they'll seize on. This is why I'm bringing it up…

M: Yes.

S: …because they'll say, "Ah, but look at what Krishnaji said in all these public talks about meditation, and this seems to be something different." And indeed, it does seem to be different. He is using the word in a different way.

M: Well, I don't know if it's different; it may be wider than whatever we conceive of as meditation.

S: Mm, hm.

M: One instance of it, and I'm uneasy of trying to explain anything too much because I don't think I have any right to…

S: Of course. What I'm doing is fishing around for any comments he made, anything else he said. See, even your saying "maybe it came when he's walking off alone…far ahead on his own in nature that…"

M: And he wouldn't talk about it then, but he would say afterward something about it. He wouldn't say, "I am having a meditation."

S: Yes.

M: It would only be mentioned afterward because…

S: Mm, hm.

M: Though once, I remember when we were in that house in Kingston Vale, and Alain was with us. I must have already talked about it in these discussions. He had us come in and sit on the floor in his room. And just be silent like a sort of meditation where nobody spoke, a sort of an emptying-the-mind kind of a thing.

S: Mm, hm.

M: But he wasn't very specific about anything. But it was to sit and sort of be very quiet and turned in.

S: But you see that's something very different.

M: Mm. That is different.

S: You sit down and you deliberately do this.

M: Well, you sit down and you make yourself available by sitting down…

S: Exactly, yes. Exactly.

M: You see, it isn't that you do something.

S: No.

M: You make circumstances possibly more conducive to something happening if something is going to happen.

S: Exactly. But something else seems to happen at night or can happen.

M: I don't even want to call it something else.

S: Alright.

M: Because I don't know what happened at night, and I don't know what happened when he was walking in the hills. I don't know in the sense of something definable or describable.

S: Mm, hm, mm, hm.

M: And yet it seemed, well, it was, to the degree that anything could be said about it, it was not only something deeply important, fundamentally important in his life; it was persistently a presence of something that he—it was something centered in his life, I felt.

S: Mm, hm.

M: I mean, I felt, in a way, the reality of that for him was stronger than all the exterior things.

S: Mm, hm, mm, hm.

M: Maybe I'm inventing that, I don't know, but it was…

S: That's your sense of it.

M: …a strong feeling, a sense of it, yes.

S: Yes.

M: [pause] It's so easy to assume things. To make something…fit…what one can imagine.

S: I know.

M: And I'm very leery of that.

S: Yes, rightly.

M: Judgments about these things are…

S: We're not in a position to know anything.

M: No, no.

S: But I feel very strongly that we are in a position…and I feel we even have a responsibility to simply report what we saw…

M: Yes.

S: …and also what we sensed, recognizing…

M: What we sensed…

S: …that we might be completely gaga[4]…

M: Yes.

S: …and it makes no difference. But we still have to say these things.

M: It's like talking about the teachings. I feel profoundly, and also Krishnaji, in a way, okayed it, that one can talk about the teachings if there's always the ground rule that one's exploring, and one may be totally wrong, up a tree, who knows. And anyone who listens or participates or joins you, or reads this or listens to whatever happens to all these tapes, must look at the whole reporting of it, because…

S: Yes.

M: …I suppose if I had to sit down and separate out what I could say of absolute facts that I could vouch for, like, you know, we walked on the beach on such and such a day [chuckling], things like that, there could…but so much else was happening with Krishnaji all the time that is not verifiable.

S: I know.

M: And, in a way, I feel uneasy about going on about "we did this; we did that; we did something else; went to the movies; we walked on the beach"—as though that was his life. His life was…who knows where? What we find so difficult or impossible to put into words was his life.

S: I know, I know.

M: This was his outward, physical life, his human life.

S: Yes. This is absolutely what was so interesting to me; the small time I had with Krishnaji, every year, or the years that I saw him here, there was an intensity and there was a fullness in his presence…

M: Yes.

S: …I mean, it just seemed that there was an awful lot going on.

M: Yes.

S: But if you reduce it to the physical, measurable—call it what you would get if you were following behind him with a television camera,…

M: Mm, hm.

S: …that kind of recordable information, well, it wasn't much.

M: Mm.

S: He went here and he talked, he then went there and he talked, and he shopped, and he went there and he talked, and…

M: Yes.

S: …you know, ad infinitum. But that's not really what was going on.

M: That's right.

S: And this is a little bit…this is why I keep prodding, I keep prompting, I keep trying to find some way of making more of that presence…

M: Mm, hm.

S: …that was going on, somehow, even though it is our subjective opinion, our…

M: Well, I think, we must…because all this stuff is really dangerous. Supposing somebody plays only one or two of these audio cassettes seventy years from now. It sounds all sort of trivial because we're putting in so much trivial…stuff, over and over and over.

S: I know, but somehow, this is why, whenever we have a chance to abstract something that's significant, or talk about something that's significant, I feel we always have to do that. It's like this thing about Krishnaji saying that he had a marvelous meditation at night. Well, we could just glance over that, or we could stop and say, now wait a minute…

M: Yes.

S: …this has significance here. Or, for instance, the feeling that you had which you wrote about so eloquently…

M: Mm.

S: …on that one page when you wrote that you had a sense of responsibility when you went to meet him at airports[5]. See, all of that, now, that charged the atmosphere around him. And I would maintain that it was not subjective…but one doesn't know how to talk about it. I mean, it is actually very difficult to talk objectively about things that are taken in.

M: Yes. Because the measure of them is, to the listener, you or me.

S: I know.

M: And people just have to, well, do whatever they're going to do. I don't know.

S: It's probably a good analogy for talking about these things with Krishnaji, to say it's like talking about love, even puppy love between two young teenagers who don't know anything about what they're experiencing.

M: Mm.

S: It's actually very difficult to talk objectively about that.

M: Yes.

S: But that does not mean that it's not going on. Whatever they're experiencing, whatever they're feeling, it is there, going on. And just like you were saying, it is more real than a lot of the physical phenomenon…

M: Yes.

S: …so much of this that was around Krishnaji, it was more real than the physical phenomenon.

M: Absolutely.

S: And much more intense and much more alive and…

M: It's just…I mean, statistically, we're flooding this tape recorder with trivia, in a way. Providing…this other sense that you're talking about now, can be seen to be the important part.

S: If it can come out, exactly. If it can just somehow come out at all, it makes the whole thing worthwhile.

M: [very softly] Yes.

S: Because this whole question that Krishnaji used to ask over and over again, "What will you say when the man from Seattle comes up to you and asks, "What was it like to be with K?"…well, we can say, "We went here, we went there, we did this, we did that."

M: Mm.

S: But that's not what Krishnaji was asking about.

M: No.

S: And it's that very difficult task of conveying this other, almost impossible state of being that was around him. I don't know how else to talk about it. I mean, here's myself, here's this physical body. It goes here, it goes there, it goes to another place, but there are different states of being depending on what one lives. And the state of being that was there because of Krishnaji's presence…

M: Yes.

S: …was absolutely remarkable, I think, because of his state of being. It just affected the other states of being around him.

M: Yes.

S: And maybe it was because of him and maybe it was because of something beyond him. One doesn't know. Krishnaji told you that you are responsible to the Other. But we don't have to conjecture what that means.

M: No, we don't. Except that we have to speak for the fact that there was a great deal that was beyond. And that we can't prove it or come up with…

S: Well, also, what we can say, though, Mary—and this, I think, is just a little bit the kind of thing we don't like to say—but we can say that when Krishnaji said something like, "You are responsible to the Other"…

M: Mm, hm.

S: …we had a sense of what he meant, rightly or wrongly…

M: Mm.

S: …and it made sense at the time. It seemed, "Yes, that's true!"

M: Yes. Of course!

S: It was "Yes, of course, it is correct" because there was a sense of that thing.

M: Yes, yes.

S: And that's important also to say. It's not just someone coming up and saying, "Oh well, you're responsible to, you know, the holy spirit or something…" We'd say, "What is he talking about?"

M: Well, the reason it seemed so right is that, at least for me—you'll have to say for you—is that one had already felt that.

S: Yes!

M: And it wasn't that you'd thought it up or imagined it; it was a sense of great reality that was already that way.

S: Yes. Exactly. And this is why I…

M: And it wasn't from him.

S: Right.

M: And it wasn't from me. It was from…I don't know what.

S: Yes. And it was obvious.

M: That's how it was, it was like the sun is shining today. It's a fact.

S: Exactly. It's just obvious. You don't even have to ask about it.

M: That's right.

S: And this is the source of my many regrets about the questions I didn't ask…

M: Yes.

S: …and should have.

M: Yes.

S: Because Krishnaji would say something of this nature, and, as you say, one would just say, "Yes, it's obvious, there's nothing…" you knew what he was talking about…there was nothing really to ask. But, of course, later on, when trying to talk about it or explain it or think about it, one thought, "I should have asked him, 'What do you mean?'"

M: Yes.

S: Or, "Would you explain that?" or "Could you go into detail?" Or, all these things, which I don't know if they would have been answered or not…

M: Well, I…yes…"You should have asked the man,[6]" you see.

S: Exactly!

M: Now I should have said, "What man?" or "Who do you mean?"

S: Yes, yes. "Is that man different from you?"

M: Yes! You see.

S: All of…I know. [Laughing.]

M: But I had this blanket thing about not prying.

S: Mm, hm.

M: If he wants to tell me something, wonderful. I want to hear. But, because I have this extraordinary opportunity of being able to ask him, I'm not going to nag him with questions.

S: Yes, I know.

M: If he wants to tell me something, he will tell me. And if he doesn't, I'm not going to pry.

S: I know, of course; I had that sense, too.

M: And that was true about everything.

S: Yes. But what I don't know is…it seemed right at the time, but… [Both laugh.]

M: Well, I took it to be…

S: But I do wish now that I had asked some of those questions.

M: Yes, I know. I know. Well, I used to say to Krishnaji, "Don't answer this if I'm asking the wrong question."

S: Yes.

M: Which I figured was, um…cricket.[7] [Both chuckle.] But I could have done that a little bit more.

S: Right. Well, I don't know. What is significant is that it is our reasoning, rationalizing, mechanical brain that says we should have asked more, but at the time, these things were obvious.

M: Yes.

S: A lot of these things just were obvious. One didn't have to ask any more.

M: No, no.

S: And that's also significant because that says something about the nature of the presence that was around him, and I think also the state of being that he elicited in us.

M: Yes.

S: There was a different way of knowing. There was a…or a different sensing or a… something. No one…I can't go too far with this…

M: No.

S: …but it's just that, it was different. And now, looking back, there are a hundred times…I think it's like your good example of "You should have asked the man."

M: "Should have asked the man," but one thing I should really not have been so retiring about is on one of the last mornings, he wanted to tell me something, wanted to teach me something. And I don't think I said anything, because I felt, you know, he mustn't make any effort for me.

S: I know, I know.

M: And when I later said to him, "You wanted to tell me something. Do you want to tell me now what it is?" And it…it…

S: It was gone.

M: It was gone. I was…I was probably wrong.

S: I don't know, Mary. I don't know.

M: I mean, the way it seemed to me at the time was…

S: I know. Don't make any efforts that…

M: Yes. If I don't learn anything, it doesn't matter. What matters is the way he, his energy, his health, his everything was. And I probably made a mistake.

S: No.

[Long silence.]

M: It's now 7 o'clock.

S: And we have gotten to 1972!

M: So we have. [S laughs.]

S: Great, okay. We begin there.

[1] A young architect who contributed to the early years of Brockwood.

[2] Husband of Jane Hammond who has appeared preciously in these accounts, and who was an architect. He was the eventual designer of the Assembly Hall and The Cloisters complex. The Cloisters were a square-shaped housing complex with a covered walkway around the inside, resembling a traditional cloister—hence the name.

[3] Krishnaji and I were great Clint Eastwood fans. We would watch his films together on TV or rented video, and Mary would generally leave the room.

Issue 21: January 1, 1972 to March 31, 1972

This issue takes place only in California, so there is necessarily a great deal of activity about the legal case against KWINC. But these onerous activities do not dominate Mary's memoirs. Krishnaji is active giving public talks in Santa Monica, holding group discussions (including education discussions in Ojai and thereby laying the groundwork for the school the KFA would eventually establish there), and engaging in many recorded discussions. A series of such recordings were done in San Diego with experts on religion, and they were videotaped.

Yet, probably of most note in this issue for people interested in Krishnaji is his frequent telling Mary (often only very briefly) about what was happening in his inner life.

Mary: I believe we begin today on January first, 1972.

Scott: Yes, that's right.

M: Well, the scene is Malibu, and on January the first, 'it was a clear and beautiful day. Krishnaji watched the Rose Parade on television, saying "These people are crazy."' [S laughs.] 'Later, he watched the start of the Rose Bowl football game.' [S chuckles.] 'I went over next door to see my friends, the Dunnes. When I came back, Krishnaji had had his nap, and then we watched the end of the Rose Bowl.'

The next day was 'another beautiful day, and Krishnaji talked into the Nagra about the first of his reminiscences. He talked about the discovery of the boy in the early years. We walked on the beach in the late afternoon. And at night there were gale winds and the house shook with it.'

On January third, 'the winds had quieted in the morning but began again at lunchtime. The Dunnes had part of their roof ripped off.' Such were the winds.

The fourth of January, 'there was news from my brother about my father, and Dr. Joseph Pollock, who is the son-in-law of the late Louis Zalk, and his son came to tea with Krishnaji.' Does that name mean anything to you?

M: The Zalk house is the one above the KFA building on Besant Road, at the top of the hill. It's now where there's the Ojai Retreat. Zalk was married to…how did it go? His wife was Rosalind's sister, Erma, and their daughter married Dr. Joseph Pollock. He's a, I think, medical doctor. They came for tea. The reason I'm talking about it at all is because he was on the Happy Valley School Board, and he was making overtures to KFA or to Krishnaji to somehow heal the breach or have some connection between Happy Valley School and KFA. He said he was not pro-Rosalind, and he wanted to hear what Krishnaji's position was about the Happy Valley School. Well, Krishnaji didn't want anything to do with it. It's developed later, what Krishnaji said.

S: But, just give us a brief history of this. The Happy Valley property was bought by Annie Besant to start a school.

M: Yes, that's correct. But the school wasn't started until the '40s, during the war.

S: And as with everything else, Rosalind and Rajagopal eventually had everything in their names.

M: Yes, and it ceased to have anything to do with Krishnaji, although they used his name.

Now, Pollock and his wife were friends of Evelyne Blau[1], and Evelyne thought we could get back the Happy Valley land, and don't forget, in these days, we had no place for a school, but there were intentions to start a school. And if we could have gotten the land back…

S: That could've been a good place for the school.

M: Yes. Hence, one listened to what Dr. Pollock had to say.

The fifth of January, 'Sidney Field telephoned that his brother John had died suddenly the day before. Krishnaji spoke to him and asked him to come to lunch the next day. In the afternoon, Krishnaji and I went to a James Bond movie, Diamonds are Forever, in Hollywood.' And it says here, 'terrible movie.' [S laughs.] And it also says that 'Krishnaji shouted a bit and didn't sleep well at night.' He used to call it "shouting," you know, he woke up with…

S: I know, but why don't you explain what that is. I think you did earlier, but it is worth repeating.

M: Well, I heard it my first time way back in Rishi Valley, when we were all about to go to, I think, Bangalore, and I got up early. It was dark, and Frances McCann and I were right under Krishnaji's bedroom. I heard this cry and it sounded like distress. I didn't know what to do, so I went to Alain Naudé, and said something's wrong with Krishnaji, and I described it. He said, "Oh, no, no. Pay no attention, it happens all the time; Krishnaji doesn't like to talk about it, and it doesn't mean a thing." This was the first inkling I had of, really, part of the process, in a way.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Well, Krishnaji called it "shouting," and often he woke himself up by doing it.

S: Yes.

M: The next day, Thursday the sixth, 'Sidney Field came for lunch, and there was talk between Krishnaji and Sidney, and I was present, about life after death.'

On January seventh, 'Krishnaji did a Nagra dictation about Rajagopal.'

On the ninth, 'we drove to Ojai and met the Lilliefelts, Ruth Tettemer, and Albion Patterson to record a discourse on the Nagra based on their questions to him on the concept of the World Teacher. We lunched there afterward, went for a walk, and then drove home.'

The next day, 'Isabel and Enrique Biascoechea flew here from Puerto Rico. Theo met them at the airport and brought them to Malibu for tea, then took them onto Ojai, where they're staying with the Lilliefelts.' You'll recall that it was decided by the lawyers that we ought to do a deposition of Biascoechea[2].

On Wednesday the twelfth, 'Krishnaji and I went to look at a Volkswagen in the afternoon.' I think that was a car I was getting for Filomena, but I'm not quite sure.

On January thirteenth, the Lilliefelts took the Biascoecheas to see Leipziger the lawyer, and then they all came back to Malibu for lunch. After that, the Lilliefelts left and the Biascoecheas stayed here in the guest room. At 4 p.m., Dr. Pollock came to see Krishnaji again, and reported that the Happy Valley trustees want nothing to do with Krishnamurti.' [S chuckles.] 'But he got Krishnaji to say that if they reconsidered, he and KFA members would talk to them. I was upset that Krishnaji was appearing to woo them.' I was. I didn't want anything to do with them. Dreadful people.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'The Biascoecheas told Krishnaji and me that Erna was on the verge of exhaustion from so much work, and I tried to get Krishnaji to see what adding a Happy Valley School controversy on top of all the other would mean to her. But, it is still in his mind,' it says. 'I drove the Biascoecheas to Leipziger's office. Erna and Theo were there, too. Enrique gave a deposition with Terry Christensen representing Rajagopal. It went poorly.'

What happened was that years before, Biascoechea was donating some money to KWINC, and he wanted to know more about the finances of KWINC.

Rajagopal refused to give that information, and said that if there were any difficulty about it, he would reveal that Krishnaji had a relationship with Rosalind. And this so shocked Biascoechea, not the relationship, but the fact that Rajagopal would blackmail him. And poor Biascoechea was concealing this for the rest of his life, including through the deposition. So, this wretched Terry Christensen lawyer got him to lie, that Rajagopal had never done anything wrong about money.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, that was what that was all about.

S: So he, in order to protect Krishnaji, Biascoechea said that Rajagopal had never done anything wrong with money, because he, Biascoechea, was afraid that Rajagopal was just going to bring all this out.

M: Yes.

S: Oh, poor man.

M: Yes, he was a sweet old man who adored Krishnaji.

S: Oh, poor fellow.

M: He was put in this awful position. [Sigh.]

S: And Krishnaji didn't know anything about this, presumably?

M: Ah, no. No! Krishnaji wasn't there.

S: And Biascoechea hadn't talked with Krishnaji about all this?

M: No. No, of course not.

S: Right.

M: He wouldn't have been so indiscreet as to mention a thing like that.

S: Yes.

M: So, Biascoechea was, in effect, blackmailed by Rajagopal. Poor fellow.

On January fifteenth, 'the Biascoecheas left for Oakland. Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai. We lunched with Erna, Theo, and Ruth, and discussed the Biascoechea deposition and the Dr. Pollock visit.'

S: So, you didn't know why, at that time, Biascoechea was lying, either?

M: No. Biascoechea had told Erna about it, but not me. I only knew about the purported "relationship" between Rosalind and Krishnaji from Krishnaji.

'At lunch was born the idea of a Krishnaji Education Center in Ojai. We planned to hold meetings in Ojai. Erna, Theo, Krishnaji, and I took a walk. Erna told me of Rajagopal's blackmail of Biascoechea in 1946.'

The next day 'was a beautiful day. We went to a movie called Scalp Hunters in Santa Monica.'

S: [laughs] Traditional fare, in other words?

M: Yes.

On January eighteenth, 'we went to Ojai. Krishnaji had his hair cut, and we both had chiropractic treatment from Dr. Lay. We lunched with the Lilliefelts, Ben Patterson, and Ruth. We discussed the Krishnaji Educational Center meetings, and set them for four days, commencing March twenty-ninth in Ojai. Erna and I telephoned Leipziger, and discussed the Biascoechea deposition. Coming home in the car, Krishnaji said he is willing to make a deposition, but have we gone as far with the case as is necessary morally?'

On the nineteenth, 'Sidney Field again came for lunch with Krishnaji, and talked to him about reincarnation.'

S: Was that recorded?

M: No, it wasn't recorded. You see, these conversations just happened. The one that was eventually done was a reconstruction of one of these things. We'll come to mention it.

S: Aha! Yes, I remember it, yes. So, these two were not actually recorded.

M: Never tape-recorded. No.

On the twenty-first, 'again we drove to Ojai and talked to Erna and Theo about the case. Lunched and drove home.'

The next day. 'I sold'…oh, I had a little MG car that Filomena used, and I sold it. Krishnaji and I went to a movie, Le Boucher.' Don't remember a thing about it.

On January twenty-fourth, 'we drove to Ojai. Krishnaji held a discussion with about sixty-five young people at the Lilliefelts'. I taped it on the Nagra. We lunched there with the Lilliefelts, Ruth Tettemer, Catherine Kieran, Albion Patterson, and KFA's new trustee, Alan Kishbaugh. After lunch, we held a trustee meeting and discussed the education plan and publishing.'

On the twenty-fourth, 'I met Alain at the airport, and went to the Volkswagen agent and bought a beige station wagon.' [Chuckles.] 'I left the Jaguar to have its 30,000-mile service, and drove home in the VW. Krishnaji was waiting by the gate, and approved the purchase. Alain gave Filomena a driving lesson in it.' It was for her use. She had to have a car when I wasn't there.

S: Of course.

M: 'At lunch, we taped a discussion on reincarnation derived partly from Krishnaji's conversation to Sidney Field last week. We walked on the beach.'

The next day, 'we drove in the new VW to Rosenthal's office. We met him and Leipziger and the Lilliefelts. We talked about possible future events in the case. The decision was made to go ahead. The Lilliefelts came back to lunch with us and Alain, and we discussed the education plan.'

'Later, Krishnaji and Alain had a conversation on the supposed Masters, which I taped on the Nagra. Krishnaji and Alain went for a walk while I rested a little.' [Aside.] Now that must be somewhere…

S: Yes. It's in the archives list.

M: 'Krishnaji and Alain did another discussion the next day.' And it says, 'a marvelous one.'

'I went to fetch the Jaguar and then all three of us went for a cold, windy walk on the beach.'

On the twenty-seventh, 'Krishnaji and Alain did another taped dialogue, starting with the Upanishads, and going on to emptying the mind of everything but fact as the ending of thought. A mind that is not empty can never find truth. We lunched at home and walked on the lower road.'

The next day, 'I have a headache. Krishnaji and Alain did another tape. Mr. Faria arrived from Puerto Rico. Theo met him and brought him here to tea, then took him to Ojai, where Theo and Erna are putting him up. We discussed a little about the KWINC case with him.' He was a lawyer. 'Meanwhile, Alain left for San Francisco.'

The twenty-ninth of January 'was a lovely, quiet day. Krishnaji said there was "a fire of energy" in his head in the night. He said "memory is the source of the self." We did letters and walked on the beach in the afternoon.'

'A letter came from Marianne Borel about the de Vidases, having been threatened by Rajagopal in the past.' Remember Marianne Borel, that sort of spinstery, spidery French lady; she used to go to Saanen all the time, and she used to put up the money for the barn where all the young people stayed.

S: Ohh, yes, yes, yes. [Laughs.] The most unlikely supporter of the Saanen hippie crowd.

M: Yes. Absolutely.

S: I know. [Laughs.]

M: She was like sort of a bird, with white hair and very nice.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: January thirtieth 'was a windy, clear day, and Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai. He spoke again of extraordinary light burning in the mind.' It says he was awake three hours with it in the night.

'We lunched with Erna, Theo, Ruth, and Mr. Faria. Faria had read all the papers on the case and advised going ahead. We went for a walk up McAndrew Road and then drove home.'

The next day, 'I took the Nagra for an adjustment, then met the Lilliefelts and Faria at Saul Rosenthal's office. We discussed going ahead with the Rajagopal deposition with Rosenthal instead of Leipziger. I spoke briefly to Saul afterwards. Erna drove back with me and Theo, and Faria followed. We all had tea with Krishnaji.' He hadn't come to that meeting with the lawyers.

February first, 'Alain telephoned about some possible Zen experts for a discussion with Krishnaji.' That was when we had the idea of getting people from different persuasions or disciplines to do taped video recordings with Krishnaji. Or audio recordings, either one that we could.

'Krishnaji and I drove to the Lilliefelts' for lunch. Faria was there but left later. We discussed finances a bit. I had a treatment with Dr. Lay while Krishnaji and Erna walked. Then we drove home in time for supper. Martha Longnecker telephoned. San Diego State University wants to film the discussions that Krishnaji might do with various people.' That was the origin of all those videos that were done down there.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated a reply to Marianne Borel's letter. Sidney Field came and went for a walk with Krishnaji in the afternoon.'

On the third of February, 'Rosenthal is to file immediately for a Rajagopal deposition. Talked to Sidney Roth, Erna, Alain, Martha Longnecker about Krishnaji's videotaped meetings in San Diego. Krishnaji wants to give two public talks in Ojai in April.' Sidney Roth put up the money for some of that.

The next day, 'we went on errands in town. Passport photos and so forth. We bought books and silk lining for Huntsman gray flannel at'—well, a silk store I went to. 'Krishnaji says he hasn't felt so rested since the war,' i.e., the '40s.

S: How nice. How nice.

M: Having been there that whole winter was wonderful.

S: Yes. I'm sure it was so good for him.

M: It was marvelous for me, also, in spite of the case and all that goings-on—he was able to walk, to sleep, to just be quiet, more or less.

S: How marvelous.

M: The next day, the fifth, 'we went to a movie in Santa Monica, Snow Job, with Jean-Claude Killy'—it was a skiing movie. It was probably because I like skiing movies and surfing movies. [S laughs.] So, I guess that's why we went. 'Alain telephoned. He has found a Jesuit, Father Schallert, at San Francisco University to do a videotape dialogue with Krishnaji.'

'Krishnaji told of waking last night and seeing for a brief moment that it was as if something were being done in his brain, his inner brain,' it says. 'It disappeared, that is the feeling, and he felt he mustn't pursue it. It is part of what has been going on lately,' it says.

S: Hm. [Pause.]

M: On February sixth, 'I worked at my desk and Krishnaji slept. We watched the winter Olympics on television, and walked on the beach.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji wished to come with me to Inglewood to get new tires for the Jaguar. We tried to walk around there while waiting for the tires to be put on, but there was a sense of danger in that part of town, and we went back to the tire place. Krishnaji stood and watched the installing of the tires being fitted. He said, on the way home, that he shouldn't have gone there.' It was a part of town where gangs were beginning, and it really was a dangerous place; it wasn't somewhere to go for a stroll…

S: Exactly.

M: …which is what we did to pass the time. He felt it and I felt it, too.

S: Yes.

M: February eighth, the Rajagopal deposition was filed for.

On the tenth of February, 'Krishnaji slept in the morning and the afternoon. We had a beach walk. In the evening, Krishnaji was given a shock when I spoke to him while he was "far away" while watching television. It caused him to shake and he felt it all night, so sensitive has his body become.' We were sitting watching television, and after supper, I remember it clearly, I casually spoke to him. I didn't realize he was off…

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: …and he came to with this jar. It was like waking him up, which he said, never wake him up, or if you have to, when I did, I would make small noises, so that it would gradually enter his consciousness.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: It was something that…you never woke him up the way you would someone else, and that was a moment when I should have been aware, but we were watching television. Anyway.

On the eleventh, 'we went to Ojai with Krishnaji driving. We lunched again with the Lilliefelts, Ruth, and Albion. We discussed the educational gathering in Ojai during Easter week, and whether to meet a Mr. Kern from the Kern Foundation when he and Joy Mills and Helen Zahara of the Theosophical Society come here.' Mr. Kern, of the Kern Foundation, was then and still is publishing the Commentaries on Living. 'They have a huge amount of money to spend on publishing.' And in those days, we needed to publish.

S: Yes.

M: 'We went to look at the Ojai Bowl as a possible place for Krishnaji's talks in April, and to see a little house that a Ms. Gilman is giving to KFA. She is a little, bright-eyed old lady, shyly delighted when Krishnaji came.' I remember nothing more about it.

S: Where was the Ojai Bowl?

M: It's in town, where the little park is.

S: Oh, yes.

M: And there's the little tennis courts and there's a small stage, like a bowl, and they give concerts. They have the Ojai Music Festival there, and Krishnaji did speak there eventually.

February thirteenth. 'It was a beautiful day, all the loveliness of California. I cooked all morning. Father Eugene Schallert and his assistant, a Miss Jacqueline Kelly, came to lunch. He will do a dialogue with Krishnaji in San Diego on Thursday. He's a professor of sociology at San Francisco University, the Jesuit university. They left at 4 p.m., and we went for a beach walk. Television showed the first half of Ben Hur, and Krishnaji wanted to see it.' That happened to be my birthday, but nobody mentioned that. [S laughs.] I concealed it.

On the fourteenth, 'I packed. We had an early lunch, and left at 1:45 p.m. for La Jolla, 140 miles away, and to Martha Longnecker's house. She is lending it for Krishnaji's stay. We arrived at 4 p.m. She and Sidney Roth were there. Dr. Alan Anderson came to call. He is a teacher of Religious Studies at San Diego State and will do videotaped conversations with Krishnaji on Wednesday.' She had a very nice house.

S: Did it overlook the ocean?

M: Well, it was back in the town, but it slopes up a ways so you can see the ocean. It was a small house, but nice, and just right for us. She moved out so we could move in.

S: How nice.

M: The next day, Krishnaji rested while I marketed and checked motel arrangements for the Tibetan Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche, and for Naudé and for Schallert, etcetera. I made our lunch and we went to San Diego State University, where Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche and his assistant, Marvin Kasbar, arrived. Krishnaji and Trungpa were videotaped in dialogue. The Tibetan was nice, but contributed little.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji did it all, so very valuable. The Tibetan, Kasbar, and two followers came back to tea.' [Aside.] I don't remember that. 'After they left, Krishnaji and Alain, who had arrived for all this with Trungpa, went for a walk, and I fixed supper for the three of us.' [Aside.] I forgot that he came for tea.

The sixteenth, 'Krishnaji did a videotape in the morning with Dr. Allan Anderson of religious studies, San Diego State. Krishnaji, Alain, and I lunched, and later went for a walk through La Jolla. Shopped at Tweeds and Weaves, and Krishnaji and I had supper alone.'

The next day, 'in the morning, Krishnaji did another taped conversation with Father Eugene Schallert. There was trouble with the assistant, Miss Kelly, about signing the release.' [Chuckle.] 'We loaded the car, took sandwiches for lunch, and Krishnaji, Alain, and I drove to Malibu.'

'Rajagopal is to make a deposition on March twentieth.'

On the eighteenth, 'Father Daniel O'Handlin from San Francisco came in the morning and we taped on the Nagra a conversation between Krishnaji and him. He stayed for lunch and then left, and later Alain left for San Francisco. Krishnaji and I beach-walked and went over to the Dunnes'. We were quiet at last after a busy week.'

The nineteenth 'was a quiet, gentle day. I did deskwork, and Krishnaji rested and slept. Leipziger called to ask if his wife Mary and infant son Charles could come by the house. They came for tea. Krishnaji and I walked later on the lawn. Krishnaji wonders if something in my past life' [laughs] 'causes my sometime mannerisms of tension.'

S: [laughs, as M laughs again, too] Was he serious about that?

M: I don't know. How do you know when he's serious about these things?

S: [laughs] I don't know.

M: And you didn't ask.

S: No…of course not.

M: If there's any posterity listening, you may well wonder why I didn't ask, and I'm tired of explaining that I didn't want to push, or ask pushy questions. If he wanted to tell me, hooray. If he didn't, he didn't have to.

S: I know. Yes.

M: Maybe that wasn't, from an archivist point of view, the thing to do.

S: But there was just a sense of that around Krishnaji; that there were certain things that you just took in, in another way, and didn't take in with your reasoning brain. That's just what one did.

M: And also, my point of view was to make everything go well for him.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: Anyway…There's nothing interesting about Krishnaji until the twenty-second, when 'he said, meditation was so strong that he couldn't sleep.' All these days, there's a walk on the beach, but I don't always mention it.

Nothing of significance until the twenty-sixth…

S: What about the twenty-fifth? What happened to twenty-fifth?

M: Nothing. I drove Filomena to the Italian consulate office and so forth, got home in time for lunch. Krishnaji walked with Sidney Field, and I went to see the Dunnes. You don't have to know everything!

S: Yes, we do. Absolutely everything [laughing].

M: But why? [Laughing.]

S: Well, we know that Sidney Field came. That's important.

M: …it says on the twenty-sixth, 'after lunch, we went to see a movie, The Hard Rock, a comic detective film. Coming out, Krishnaji asked about ice cream, which he hadn't had in years. So we went into Will Wright's—that was a little store that had wonderful ice cream—and he chose English Toffee. We had a small portion at supper. It promptly [laughter in voice] came up, but he said, "I see why people like it!"' [S laughs.] He liked ice cream, from then on.

S: How funny.

M: But his stomach couldn't take it initially, but it got used to it. 'Later he told me I should write some of the things he tells me very well, with style.'

S: When does the big book begin again?

M: It begins on seventeen April.

S: It doesn't begin until then? Okay. So you didn't heed his advice right away? [Laughs.]

M: No. [S laughs.] Um, oh, things about my family.

S: Alright, but you're not allowed to leave out one little thing about Krishnaji, not one little scrap.

M: The twenty-seventh 'was another quiet day at home with a lot accomplished. Because of my back, walking on the slant of the beach is difficult.' I'm sure you want to know this.

S: Yes, I do.

M: 'We explored other places for walking up Serra Road. At supper, we watched on television Nixon's return from China and a NET film The Restive Earth on the formation of continents.'

The first of March, 'was a clear, warm day. We drove to Ojai. Krishnaji had his hair cut, then we lunched with Erna, Theo, Ruth, Albion Patterson. Afterwards, Krishnaji answered questions, mostly from Patterson, on the relation of his personal early history to the teachings for people without that background. Krishnaji said it had no relevance. "What happened to him interests people who are not really interested in themselves."' [Both laugh.] '"There is no path, no system. There is a quality of mind you cannot put into words that can go into the question of truth. There is a mystery which one must approach with extraordinary delicacy. The conscious mind cannot do this. The word is not the thing. If one comes to the thing, one never puts it into words, but can say it is there. I know it is there." Krishnaji walked, but was tired and we drove home. Krishnaji wants to stay in Ojai during the educational meetings. Erna invited us both to stay at their house.'

March two. 'A quiet day at home. Deskwork for me and rest for Krishnaji. He added a small bit to yesterday's tape, saying he had no ill feeling towards the TS people who opposed him. He had no relationship at all to them.'

The fourth of March, 'was another hot day. In the afternoon, Krishnaji wanted to walk on the beach. The salt air does him good, and I feel my back better since not walking on the slope. So he walked on the beach, and I kept parallel on the beach road. We both walked very fast to Puerco Canyon and back to the end of the beach road.'

‘Krishnaji read a report on some kind of research that predicts the collapse of the world economies in seventy years unless growth, birth, and pollution are drastically halted. Krishnaji asked what is the individual’s answer to such catastrophe? He said the response must come not out of the problems, or compulsion, but out of freedom. What matters is to live rightly.’

On the eighth of March, ‘with a pot of beans, we left at 9:30 a.m. for Ojai. There’s a meeting at the Lilliefelts’ with John Kern of the Kern Foundation, Joy Mills, and Helen Zahara (of the TS National Headquarters in Wheaton, Illinois), Erna, Theo, Ruth, and Albion Patterson. Krishnaji explained vividly why his books should not be published by Quest, the TS publishing house, and they left.’

S: Hm. Was that recorded too, do you think?

M: I don’t think so.

‘We discussed miscellaneous business matters. At three, David Young and Mrs. Marjorie Keller came to talk to Krishnaji alone. Do you remember Marjorie Keller?

S: No.

M: Well, she had a daughter here at Brockwood who married Frodo.

S: Ah! Yes. Oh, I remember her. Cassandra. Yes.

M: Cassandra.

S: Oh, that’s Marjorie Keller. Aha.

M: And David Young—he was mixed up in Ojai and Happy Valley things. ‘They came about Rajagopal’s dispute and talked for one-and-a-half hours, after which Krishnaji recounted it all to the rest of us. He made it all very clear to them that if Rajagopal wishes to settle, it must be handled by lawyers and the attorney general.’

The next day, ‘Erna and Theo came down about Santa Monica Auditorium for Krishnaji to talk in. Sidney Field came for a walk with Krishnaji.’

On the twelfth [laughs], ‘Krishnaji and I telephoned Dorothy at Brockwood just for fun.’ [S laughs.] ‘Again we walked on the lawn. I was busy with income tax. Rajagopal has asked for postponement of his deposition for March twenty to the twenty-eighth.’

The next day, ‘we went to the dentist the next day and saw West Side Story on television. Krishnaji said meditation was so intense in the night that he wanted to get up. Also felt something evil outside so that he looked out the window, “as if when there is great good, evil attempts to come sniffing around.” He often said about that.

S: I know. [Pause, Mary sighs.] He said once that great good attracts evil.

M: Yes, yes.

S: And that there were times when evil was present and it was dangerous.

M: Yes. There were such times. He'd feel danger, and he would also feel protected, but—I know I've said this in a previous discussion—but he spoke of it often, that evil would try to get at him through…

S: People close…

M: …some others, you or me or somebody…and it really does. Not that we'd be evil, but that we'd be vulnerable…

S: …be hurt, or in an accident, or…

M: …yes, yes,

S: We'll talk about this later because it comes up later, I know.

M: Yes.

On the seventeenth, 'Alain arrived just after lunch, having motored down from San Francisco. He brought ties for Krishnaji and a pretty scarf and a little bottle for me. He and Krishnaji walked on the beach, and I went over to see the Dunnes. They were playing Mozart. Before lunch, I went over the Nagra equipment with Alain, who will tape Krishnaji's talks tomorrow.'

On the eighteenth, 'Alain went to the Santa Monica Auditorium early with the Nagra. Krishnaji and I got there at 11 a.m. A process server handed Krishnaji a summons for a deposition backstage just before he went on stage to speak. It was a cross-complaint from Rajagopal et al. against Krishnaji, Erna, Ruth, me, and Sidney Roth.'

S: How charming [sarcastic tone], just before Krishnaji is to give a public talk.

M: Yes, wanting to discourage him.

S: That guy was such an absolute, terrible, evil…

M: 'It had no effect on Krishnaji.' [S chuckles.] 'He handed it to Theo and went in and gave a fine talk' [for the video] [S chuckles.] 'for one-and-a-quarter hours. Erna and I telephoned Rosenthal, who was shocked at the service before the talk, but not surprised at a cross-complaint.'

‘Krishnaji, Alain, and I had lunch at home and Erna and Theo came by on their way to Ojai. Krishnaji was very sharp on analyzing Rajagopal’s actions, especially about the alleged oral agreement that Rajagopal says Krishnaji gave him on a trusteeship for life. Krishnaji said to me later, “Judas isn’t in it”—i.e., Judas was pale by comparison.’

S: Mm, hm.

M: Next day, the nineteenth, ‘Krishnaji gave his second Santa Monica talk with tremendous force. He based much of it on the questions asked in a letter handed in yesterday by a Bob Stevens: How can one be free and still be part of a rotten system and society due to having a job? At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview to a physics professor, Dr. Mael Melvin.’

On the twentieth, ‘Alan Kishbaugh came for dinner, and Krishnaji came to the table and stayed up till he left. Betsy[3] was there till they left.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji, Alain, and I drove to town. Krishnaji had space shoes fitting.’ [Laughs.] ‘Then we all had Mexican food at the farmer’s market. I took them to a movie in Hollywood, then I went for a fitting at a dressmaker.’

S: We should say what those space shoes are, for those people who don’t know [laughing], because we call them space shoes.

M: How could people not know what a space shoe is? [S laughs.] Well, they are remarkably clumsy, big shoes that are extremely comfortable and good for your feet; and how you acquire them is you put each foot into a shoebox, which is full of plaster of Paris, and you sit there. It’s usually very cold. And when you’ve sat long enough, the shoemaker takes it; from that he makes a form of your foot, and from the form, he makes two shoes which absolutely conform to every little bump or anything on your feet. And they’re light, because the bottoms are made with cork. They look heavy, like Frankenstein sort of shoes, but they’re actually quite light because they’re made of cork. I still wear them. And I thought Krishnaji would like them. He liked the idea, but I must say [chuckling] he didn’t wear them much. [M and S laugh.] They weren’t quite the best leather. They didn’t have a certain je ne sais quoi…

S: Exactly.

M: …that Lobb has, but anyway, he went along with it. [S laughing.] But beyond that, I can’t say too much. ‘I picked up Krishnaji and Alain after their movie, and we came home.’

Then, it says here, ‘Sidney Roth, Martha Longnecker, and a Mr. Van Lewin, and Miss… Mrs. Robinson or Mr. Robinson’—I don’t know—‘came to show the video cassette made of Sunday’s talk. Very good. The color is excellent. Ease of cassette. A Sony device. Exceptional.’ I don’t know what that is.

The next day, ‘we were home all day. Krishnaji saw Tara Singh at 4 p.m.’ Do I have to explain Tara Singh?

S: Yes, if he’s in this, you have to explain him.

M: Tara Singh is a Sikh. You can tell by the name. He left India ages ago, and he’s known Krishnaji for years. He was a man of mystery back in those days, who apparently could live in the United States without any visible means of support. Eventually, (he hadn’t yet at this point) he turned himself into a guru, and to this day, I think he has a some sort of a foundation.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And he teaches people to do miracles, I think. I’ve been told he’s written a book about it. I haven’t read it. And I don’t want to say too much more about him [laughing, S laughing, too] because my impressions are not flattering. And it’s of no moment to anybody for me to immortalize my opinions of Tara Singh. But, anyway…

S: Alright. We’ll let you off the hook on this one.

M: He had an interview.

‘Sidney Field came the next day, joining Alain and Krishnaji on the walk.’

On the twenty-fourth of March, ‘Alain checked two of the transcripts of dialogues with Krishnaji. I wrote a long letter to my lawyer in New York, Mitchell Booth, about the Miss Dodge will and Krishnaji. And also about the cross-complaint by Rajagopal about Mr. Pinter’s papers.’

S: What’s that all about?

M: I can’t exactly remember…Mr. Pinter, whom I never met, or I think I spoke with him early, he warned Krishnaji that Rajagopal was making off with everything. And that Krishnaji would wind up with nothing, without even a presence, much less any influence, in his own organization, which of course is exactly what happened. Somehow, all this came into the case. I don’t quite remember the details.

On the twenty-fifth, ‘Krishnaji gave his third talk in Santa Monica. He said, “order carries its own law, which is its own discipline.” We went back to the house for lunch. A woman called Ruth McCandless lunched with us, and so did Erna and Theo. And Leipziger has received some of the papers asked for from Rajagopal’—we’d asked for them. ‘No delay has been asked so far by Rajagopal for his deposition next Tuesday.’

March twenty-sixth. It says, ‘Krishnaji and I have been living on two levels for the last two days. He gave his fourth talk at Santa Monica, a superb one, [for the video] on energy that comes when thought is ended. The first step is the last, and it is freedom.’

Alan Kishbaugh brought Frank Waters, an anthropology writer on Native Americans, and Giovanna d'Onofreo, a voice teacher, to lunch. Krishnaji and Waters are to do a taped dialogue tomorrow. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave interviews to five people. Later, Krishnaji, Alain, and I walked on the lawn.

The next day, 'I had to do errands while Krishnaji held discussion with Frank Waters, which Alain recorded. At 12:40 p.m., Krishnaji and Alain met me at a movie theater, where we saw The Godfather with Marlon Brando. Krishnaji brought a picnic lunch, but didn't eat it till afterwards in the car in the parking lot. Krishnaji and Alain bought some shirts and we came home. I listened to the discussion recorded this morning and spoke with Saul Rosenthal, who will do Rajagopal's deposition tomorrow. Erna called later to say that Rosenthal wants her present at the deposition.'

I must say, I'd like to hear that tape again.

On March twenty-eight, 'Dorothy telephoned from Brockwood about the tenders on the building. We need £23,000 sterling more to complete the Cloisters. Krishnaji told me to say "Find out how much of it we can build doing the foundation of the whole."' I don't know what that means.

S: Do the foundation for the whole thing, and then only build like one wing of it or something.

M: I guess so. He suggested Dorothy write to Perrine, too. Krishnaji and I then drove to Ojai, arriving at 5:30 p.m. Erna had been all day with Rosenthal at the Rajagopal deposition. Rajagopal had done himself no good, she said.' Now, I perhaps shouldn't read what I wrote because we have an agreement not to discuss what was said in Rajagopal's deposition, so I'll have to censor this. So, I'll skip the part about the deposition.

S: Okay.

M: We spent the night at the Lilliefelts'.

The next day, 'Krishnaji held the first meeting of the educational gathering, a discussion with thirty-odd invited teachers and others. I taped it on the Nagra. Alain, who had spoken in Los Angeles last night, came up from Malibu. Erna again spent today with Rosenthal at Rajagopal's deposition. I marketed before the meeting, and did all the meals. Krishnaji, Theo, and I walked down the road and met Erna returning. All walked back and talked.'

'Rajagopal is turning and twisting. Rosenthal was very good, Erna says. He went through Rajagopal's complaint against us. Nonsense. Rosenthal bore down on Rajagopal about threats. Rajagopal said he had only seen Krishnaji alone for five minutes.' I can say this because it doesn't refer to his finances.

On the thirtieth, 'Krishnaji held the second meeting of the educational gathering, mostly on comparison. I taped it on the Nagra. I cooked for Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and me, then we went to Dr. Lay'—that was the chiropractor. 'I did marketing and then met Krishnaji and Theo on the walk. I invented a new soup for Krishnaji…' [Laughing.] Oh dear, you don't want that.

S: Yes, we do.

M: Alright, but I'll just say, 'Swiss chard and various vegetables. We had supper alone as Erna and Theo were out. In the morning, Krishnaji came to me with almost tears and said, "Come, let me show you this place." We looked down the valley and at the hills. He loves this place so much. The air was filled with the smell of orange blossoms, and he had me listen to a hum, which was the bees in the grove. I asked him if he would like to get a place here, that I would sell Malibu if he wished it. He wouldn't hear of that, but came back later to thank me.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: March thirty-first. 'Krishnaji held the third meeting of the educational gathering. It was a good discussion. Robert Gold, a lawyer from Blaisdell, lunched with Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and me and discussed the case. He advised receivership for KWINC. Krishnaji, Theo, and I walked down the Thacher Road. On our return, Krishnaji had me write down that he had, in the early morning, a feeling of meditation that he had never had before. "From my center, from my heart that filled the whole valley. It went on for a considerable time. From that, it went to my head, and was a most extraordinary thing. It has been pursuing me on all the walk and when I was talking to him"'—the lawyer Gold—'"it was just a voice talking. There was no reaction. It was just happening."'

S: Hm.

M: That takes us through the end of March, 1972, and a good place to stop.

Issue 22: March 27, 1972 to May 6, 1972

This issue covers events that were almost entirely in California, but we see some significant things occur. The legal case intensifies, and a settlement outside of the courts seems all but impossible. Krishnaji discusses the future of the organizations he has created since his break with KWINC; what should the foundations do after his death, etcetera.

Also of significance are the first meetings on education in Ojai. This is clearly the beginning of the Krishnamurti school in Ojai.

We also see Krishnaji's first request to Mary that she write about what it was like to be with him; a request he would repeat for the rest of his life.

Mary: We were supposed to start at April first, 1972, but we have to backtrack.

Scott: That's right, but we're being thorough.

M: In the last discussion I had only consulted my little diary for the last part of March, but, in fact, I have entries in my big diary for March twenty-seventh to the end of the month.

S: And we don't mind hearing the same things again in more detail. [Laughs; "hmmpff" sound from M.]

M: Alright, we're now in the big book, so-called, which isn't very big, but anyway, it begins Tuesday, twenty-seventh March, 1972, Malibu to Ojai. Oh, this is boring.

S: No, it's not.

M: 'Lovely, bright morning. Dorothy telephoned from Brockwood. We have a building permit.' I've probably already gone into that.

S: No, we didn't hear a thing about it. [Chuckling.]

M: Well [chuckling], 'she called about the tender estimates from the builders. It is £63,000 sterling and we have only £46,000 sterling.' Doesn't that sound familiar to you? [S laughs.] 'It was not a competitive bid, which the builder knew. It was a company which had given a low bid based on Hoppen's plans for other buildings. To get other bids will cost us £1,200 sterling, delay of considerable time, and meanwhile the costs are rising. Krishnaji spoke briefly to her and we suggested asking Ian Hammond how much of the Cloisters can be done, including doing preparation for the foundation…' You understood that when I read it before.

S: Yes.

M: So you remember. [Seems to be reading again.] '…for the whole. Krishnaji wants to get on with what we can and hope to raise money for the balance. She will write to Perrines.' I know I already said this.

S: Yes, but we only got an abbreviated version of this.

M: 'We packed and did a hundred things before we left for Ojai. Then, Philippa comes by'—we'll skip that. 'Alain also was there. He was giving a talk at the Bodhi bookshop the next day. Krishnaji and I got off at 3:35 p.m. instead of 3 p.m., which made too much sun on him in the car, and he felt sick[1]. We got to Ojai and the Lilliefelts' at 5:15 p.m. Theo was there, but Erna only arrived later, having spent the whole day with Saul Rosenthal at Rajagopal's deposition. It took place in the KWINC office and Terry Christen, Rajagopal's lawyer, and a court stenographer were present.'

And then I'll skip the part about what Erna said about it because of legal constraints.

[Chuckling.] 'At one point,' this isn't very vital, 'Rajagopal denied that the old office next to Pine Cottage was a KWINC office. "It was," said Krishnaji' [strong mimicking voice, followed by laughing]. 'Rajagopal rambled, evaded, doesn't listen to the whole question before replying.' That's very bad if you're a good deposition-giver. One of the cardinal rules—I was schooled in this as it came to me eventually, listen to the question thoroughly before you answer; don't jump in. Anyway, 'Krishnaji and I stayed for the night.'

On March twenty-ninth, 'Erna spent the second day with Rosenthal at the KWINC office on Rajagopal's deposition. I marketed and did all the meals. Krishnaji said that he had not slept too well. He felt psychic crossfire "of those two"'—meaning Rosalind and Rajagopal. 'At eleven, he held the first of the educational gatherings. About forty people in all, mostly professors, and a few psychiatrists. I taped it. Alain arrived from Malibu. Alan Kishbaugh was there, Albion Patterson, etcetera. I made lunch for Krishnaji, Theo, and myself. Later, we walked down the road and met Erna returning from the deposition. I walked back and talked.'

My diary says, 'Rosenthal bore down on Rajagopal about the threats to Krishnaji, but Rajagopal wouldn't come out with it…'—he wouldn't admit it. 'It showed him that we knew what he had been up to and we are not responding to the threats. The cross-complaint was gone through and it said that the rest of us have sided with Krishnaji, that Erna had played the tape to someone[2], and that I prevented Rajagopal from seeing Krishnaji. Rajagopal said that he hadn't seen Krishnaji alone, and then said that he had only seen him alone for about five minutes. He denied that he had taped that meeting. He admitted to taping Krishnaji's telephone conversation in 1966, the last call to Malibu before Krishnaji left California, and also taping a meeting they had face-to-face. He denied any other taping. Saul said that he felt Rajagopal might want to settle soon. There was to be another deposition meeting next week. Saul had to give the court stenographer a lift, and his comment on Rajagopal was that he is "a lying bastard."' This shocked Krishnaji because of the language, but as Erna told the whole story, Krishnaji again said,

"he is a crook,"'—[soft chuckling]—'"he is lying."' I underlined that four or five times. [More chuckling by both M and S.] 'Erna and I sent a cable to Mary Cadogan, asking her to find out if Miss Dodge left a will in which Krishnaji and Rajagopal are mentioned.'

March thirtieth, a Thursday. 'Clear, exquisite morning. Krishnaji came to me and said "Come, I want to show you this place." We went out on the Lilliefelts' driveway and looked down the valley toward the mountains, and Krishnaji was half in tears at the beauty of this place, which he loves so much. The air was filled with the smell of orange blossoms, and he had me listen to a hum, which was bees, thousands of bees, that work in the orange groves. I said that if he would like it, I would find a house here, and sell Malibu. He wouldn't let me finish the sentence even, but later came to thank me. Today he didn't feel the psychic crossfire of Rajagopal and Rosalind. He had slept well. The silence here is good for him. No noise of cars or even the sea.'

'At 11 a.m., he held the second educational gathering, mostly on comparison. Afterwards, Krishnaji went in Alan Kishbaugh's BMW for a spin and pronounced it a good car, next to a Mercedes. [S chuckles.] I made lunch for Krishnaji, Erna, and Theo, and then went for a back treatment. I ran into Alain Naudé in the post office and asked him why he had in 1966'—oh, this is funny—'gone over to the office next to Pine Cottage when Rajagopal was there meeting with Krishnaji.' This was when we first came back and Rajagopal and Krishnaji had a meeting alone and Alain and I sat in the little flat in which he was staying next to Pine Cottage.[3] And at one point, I'd forgotten what happened, but Alain wanted to go over and wanted me to come with him. We thought that they were meeting in Krishnaji's flat in Pine Cottage.

S: But in fact they were meeting in the office?

M: Yes. And this is Alain's remembrance of it, which I'd forgotten. 'He remembered that we had thought they were meeting in Pine Cottage and that Rajagopal might be taping it. We went over looking for wires or something that might show this [laughing]. It happens that they were meeting in the office, which we didn't realize, and Rajagopal came to the door.' In his deposition, Rajagopal said that we had been listening. We hadn't. 'It happens that we were right about the taping because Rajagopal admitted that he had taped that conversation.' [M chuckles.]

'Krishnaji and I had supper alone, Erna and Theo being out, and Krishnaji had fun looking up things in a Random House Dictionary, which has all kinds of things in it.' [Chuckles.]

'Friday, March thirty-first, Ojai. Krishnaji held his third meeting of the educational gathering, a good meeting.'

S: Could we just stop for a minute, because that's the kind of thing that Krishnaji would do.

M: With the dictionaries?

S: Well, have fun doing something like that…

M: Yes.

S: …some small thing, that he would suddenly have a lot of fun doing.

M: Yes. He liked to look at certain objects. I can't give a category for what the objects were.

S: Well, give us some examples.

M: Looking up words is one of them. And what else? Well, he'd also be fascinated by very ordinary objects I bought, or things I got for the house, just what you buy when you go to the market.

S: Yes, I know.

M: He'd never done things like that.

S: Yes, I remember he would peer through all the shopping bags.

M: Yes. He had me put them out in the old kitchen in Malibu.

S: Yes.

M: He had me put them out on this very table that we're sitting at here at Brockwood. And then he'd look at them [S laughs]…boring things!

S: [laughing more] I know; detergents, cereal boxes, all kinds…

M: Yes, toothpaste. Soap. Kleenex. But he'd look at each one as though…

S: As though he was from outer space or something.

M: Yes.

S: Oh, this is what humans buy!

M: Yes. [S laughs more.] I mean, what do you do when you go to a market? Where do you go in? And then you buy? Well, here they were. [Laughs.]

S: Yes. I remember that. I'd completely forgotten that. And saw them, too, at any place, he'd just be…

M: Yes! Yes…

S: …fascinated by anything that was bought.

M: And then, of course, when he went in with me to the health food shop, he would walk around and look at the shelves, again, as if he was from outer space, as if he'd never been in places like that before. He probably hadn't. [Both laugh.]

S: Remember the time when he wanted to try a new kind of a shampoo because he saw it advertised on a plastic bag in Saanen?

M: Yes, that's right.

S: We were in Gstaad.

M: Yes, he would always be trying something new.

S: I went out and got the shampoo. [Both laugh.]

M: And he, as you remember, in that cupboard in his Brockwood bedroom, which is now a doorway…

S: I know.

M: …to your room, he had more things in that!

S: Yes. [M laughs.] I know, we'd joke about his cornering the market on certain things.

[S laughs heartily.]

M: I used to say that he had more in that cupboard than Boots had because he liked squirreling things away.

S: Yes, that's what I mean. He'd cornered the market in one shampoo.

M: Yes, he'd buy several, because we may not be able to get it.

S: Yes, quite right. [Laughter.]

M: And I, of course, encouraged him because I thought it entertained him.

S: Yes. [More chuckling by both.]

M: Anyway…where were we?

S: Incidentally, I still have some of his things.

M: I do, too.

S: Some of his hair things, and some of his…

M: So do I. I have lots of hair oil in Ojai if you ever come to call.

S: Yes. [Much laughter.]

M: But I don't use hair oil, and I don't know anybody who does who is worthy of receiving it.

S: Exactly, but when that worthy person come along…[M laughs.]

M: Where are we?

S: Thirtieth, weren't we?

M: Alright. We already mentioned the good educational gathering. 'Afterward, a lawyer named Gold brought by Mr. Rempel'—he's a lawyer from the Blaisdell Institute—'was asked for lunch. Erna and Theo had dined with him last night and had been asked about the Rajagopal case. This man is an aggressive lawyer. He said our case was political.' Do you want to hear all this?

S: Mm, hm. Absolutely.

M: 'Wyman'—he's one of the partners of Rajagopal's law firm—'being a political figure might have pull with the attorney general's office. Krishnaji gave him a background of the case, the reasons and unreasons for Rajagopal's animosity, including threats, etcetera. Gold thought we should ask for KWINC to be put in the hands of the Receiver. It might force Rajagopal to settle if it were all taken away from his control. Thinks we could ask the district attorney to act on embezzlement or bring suit against him personally instead of as a member of KWINC. The case can drag on five years with enormous lawyer bills, he said. The Receiver, if effective, could be a cheaper and quicker way to go. At the end of the conversation, it came to light that Faria and Theo had been upset by my returning to talk to Saul Rosenthal alone in our meeting on January thirty-first. I had explained it to Erna in the car on the way home, but apparently that wasn't enough for Theo till today when I talked about it and my worry over the responsibility of letting an ugly battle shape up around Krishnaji.' I had gone back to see the lawyer as I wanted to know what we were getting into, and the Lilliefelts were suspicious. I don't know what they suspected I was up to. People are quite weird.

'Later Krishnaji, Theo, and I walked up around Thacher Road. On the return, Krishnaji told me what had happened in the night. These are his words, quote: "I have never had this before, this feeling of meditation. I woke up this morning at 5 with the feeling from my center, from my heart that filled the whole valley. It went on for a considerable time, and from that it went to my head and was a most extraordinary thing. It has been pursuing me on the walk. When I was talking to him'"—the lawyer Gold—"'it was just a voice talking; there was no reaction. It was just happening."'

April first. ‘Krishnaji had the fourth meeting of the educational gathering’—this was in Ojai—‘and we stayed through lunch with Erna and Theo. An Ojai newspaper had a headline about the suit against Rajagopal. And then all four drove home to Malibu.’ Who were the others? I guess Alan Kishbaugh and Alain Naudé.

Anyway. Nothing much of interest. On April third, ‘there was a tea for eight people who had worked at the Santa Monica talks.’ Nothing of interest. On the fourth, ‘Krishnaji gave interviews and walked with Sidney Field.’

S: Well, that’s interesting.

M: [laughs] You find everything interesting. ‘Mitchell Booth…’ Mitchell Booth, to remind everybody, is the New York lawyer, whom. . .

S: Is your family lawyer.

M: Yes, my family’s lawyer who helped us first evaluate where we were legally with KWINC. He ‘telephoned as we’d asked him to look up Miss Dodge’s will because there was a legal point we wanted to know.’ She had left a living trust for Krishnaji, and also one for Rajagopal, and under it a yearly amount went to each one. I think there was one for Nitya, too, but she died after Nitya died, so I don’t know what happened to that. This is not discussed in the deposition, in which case I shouldn’t talk about it, but Rajagopal had always maintained that he was independently wealthy from benefactors, and at one point Krishnaji used to get his check sent automatically from the New York bank that handled the trust to his bank, which then was in Hollywood. I changed it to Ojai later. And by mistake once, they sent the check for Rajagopal to Krishnaji, which showed how much he was getting. Now, Krishnaji was getting the, I suppose, generous amount—when it was done, but almost meaningless by 1972—amount of £500 sterling a year, which didn’t even buy him a pair of trousers in 1972 [both laugh]. Nevertheless, it was his entire income. Rajagopal’s was less, so he didn’t become independently wealthy via Miss Dodge. So, I’d asked Mitch to find out if her will was probated there and if there was any mention of Krishnaji or Rajagopal, and he said there was no mention. The amount goes under agreement with a living trust made for her niece, a Mrs. Vanda de Webb, which means that probably the money went to Krishnaji and Rajagopal during their lifetimes and eventually to her niece. But that’s a living trust…living trusts don’t come up in probate.

April fifth, ‘Sidney Roth and a cameraman from San Diego came to the house and Krishnaji was videotaped in color, walking about the gardens. This is to be used in the titles of the San Diego films. We had a very quick lunch and left for four days in Ojai. Krishnaji drove the second half of the distance. We went to the Lilliefelts’ and left our things and then went back into Ojai, where Krishnaji had a haircut. Then we came back and walked with Erna and Theo. There was a good plain article in the Ojai Valley News on the talks in Ojai this coming weekend. At supper, Krishnaji brought up the subject he had raised with me earlier: What should be done by the Foundations when he dies? He spoke at first of support for people who might travel and speak, but the Lilliefelts and I too wonder how one would choose such people, even if there were any to consider? Only Krishnaji can judge that. Again, I had an idea that came, as it had about the Educational Centre while sitting in the same place at the Lilliefelts' table, that a Krishnamurti library to house books, tapes, films, and people could come to study quietly would be part of the answer.' Well!

S: How about that?!

M: I thought of that? That's what it says.

S: Well, good.

M: It said "I" or Krishnaji; I never said "I." I didn't remember that. 'The rest of the three of us felt the Foundations should pursue every current activity, i.e., continue publishing of all the books. Krishnaji then dreamt of what to do if KFA gets the land here from KWINC. He felt the Oak Grove and adjoining fields for parking should be kept while he continues to speak and that the rest be sold, except the McAndrew Road property. The office there becomes an archive office, always keeping the present one in town.' Well, as you know, we didn't keep the office in town, very long.

'Pine Cottage becomes rearranged into a library and discussion center, and Arya Vihara be fixed for his living place. When I spoke of the sense of contamination there a few days ago, he had said, "Oh, one night there and we will sweep it away."' [M and S both chuckle.] '"You must do the house, nobody else"'—he meant me.

'"He didn't go into all the changes we spoke of to the Lilliefelts, but did say the upstairs of Arya Vihara where Rosalind and Radha lived are poorly planned and cheaply made and should be removed. India should make Vasanta Vihar into a center for a library, etcetera, continue the schools and education; England should continue the publications and support Brockwood both as a school and as a center. He spoke about my having use of the West Wing for life, which I said I couldn't possibly do. Krishnaji said, quote: "I say you must have it. What you do is up to you, but you like England and it should be your home there." Erna pointed out that all of us have probably only about fifteen-something years to carry on. Krishnaji said, "I am going to live another fifteen years." He mentioned cremation, scattering of his ashes, no ceremony, no churches, temples. Erna said that all these matters should be legally recorded as his intentions.'

'We spoke then about the third deposition of Rajagopal tomorrow, the point that he may be a Theosophist. His wife is. Casselberry had joined the Liberal Catholic Church, according to Sidney Field, and that others on the KWINC Board have shown open hostility to Krishnaji as well as acting counter to his teaching by those affiliations. I feel he should be asked under oath'—this is Rajagopal—'if he is a Theosophist. He could be planning to turn KWINC over ultimately on his death to the Theosophical Society. Joy Mills, the present TS president, whom Krishnaji saw here on March eighth, in spite of telling Krishnaji she would withdraw from her election to the Happy Valley Board, accepted the membership.'

Thursday, April sixth, Ojai. 'Erna went with Saul Rosenthal to the third day of the Rajagopal deposition. Fred Volz, the editor of the Ojai Valley News, interviewed Krishnaji about Ojai, what its quality was, the years Krishnaji has known it, and what will happen to it. The interview was taped by Volz. Krishnaji, Theo, and I lunched. The text of Rajagopal's first deposition arrived, 170 pages. I read about half of it after lunch, and it reads very evasively to my mind; at times, hardly a sentence is grammatical English; gives ridiculous explanations for holding all the land, for forming the K & R Trust and the Annie Besant Trust; real estate transactions are very weak. He said his birth date was seven September 1900, born in Periyakulam, South India.'

Then I went to the village, and ran into Erna and Saul at the KFA office. They came back to the house while I fetched Krishnaji and Theo, who were on a walk. We all had tea together. The deposition is finished and Saul said useful things were in today's. Erna said explanations…' [seems to make an aside] well, I can't go on about it…'it's just too much, she said.'

S: Yes. Because it's about the deposition?

M: Yes.

S: Yes, okay.

M: 'Rajagopal did admit that he was a lifelong Theosophist'—it was about his money that he didn't want anybody to read—'and so was his wife, Casselberry, and Austin Bee. He declined to answer about the others, i.e., Porter, Vigeveno, Weideman. Krishnaji was visibly shocked by all this and said, "How could a man that had corrected the talks and been part of this be at the same time a Theosophist?" Saul talked a little to Krishnaji about his own deposition, this week. Krishnaji said he felt a little nervous. An important question is going to be why Krishnaji broke with Rajagopal and KWINC. Saul left and all of us went for a walk. At supper, Krishnaji talked more about how Rajagopal could have become so crooked. Erna and I both feel he is even more devious than we suspected and is so deeply antagonistic to Krishnaji that he is trying to destroy him and the meaning of his teachings. Does he really believe in Theosophy? Can he believe in anything except his own overweening sense of self?'

Friday, April seventh. 'Another clear, warm morning. Krishnaji was out early looking at the mountains and down the valley. The smell of orange blossoms is like the warm sea. The morning dove and the bees are the sounds. Krishnaji again talked about making the eleven acres on McAndrew Road a center office, Pine Cottage the library/discussion center. Arya Vihara a private place for him during his lifetime, and then convertible for a quiet place to read, listen to tapes, etcetera. He also spoke again about Rajagopal being a Theosophist—is shocked and appalled by it. I worked all morning on letters, made lunch, and in the afternoon went to the chiropractor, Dr. Lay. I fetched our tickets from the travel service, marketed, and looked over the Bowl for tomorrow's talk. When I came back, I found Krishnaji and Theo just finishing a walk. At Krishnaji's urging, I walked alone and encountered Albion Patterson, who said that he thought Annalisa Rajagopal was parked outside the Lilliefelts' house on Thursday when Krishnaji was seeing Volz.' She was scuttling around; who knows what she was doing?

Saturday, April eighth. 'Krishnaji took me out to see the wonder of the lovely morning, the hills and valley. He had slept well. I prepared lunch, then took the Nagra to Libbey Park in Ojai where Krishnaji is to give two talks this weekend. I set it up and left it to Alan Kishbaugh to watch while I came back for Krishnaji. Erna has stayed at the house till I came, feeling uneasy at Rajagopal's people doing…anything. I drove Krishnaji at 11 a.m. to the talk and it was videotaped in color by Ben Lewin…' He was a photographer.

S: It was videotaped?

M: Yes. '…arranged by Sidney Roth, who was there. A large, attentive audience. Krishnaji spoke of beauty, of the valley, of preserving it. Most of the talk was on thought. Erna said that Loebl was there with a tape recorder.' Loebl was Rajagopal's first lawyer. 'Casselberry was there, too. Kishbaugh dismantled the Nagra for me and joined us for lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji saw Mark Lee, his wife, and the twins. Sidney Roth and Martha Longenecker came with slides and the titles for the San Diego State University film of talks and videotaped dialogues with Trungpa, Anderson, and Schallert. They went over the rest of introductions, and the text of introductions, with Theo and me. I went to market. Krishnaji and Theo walked, then Erna and I walked passing Ruth's house. Donald Hoppen came out.'

S: Ruth Tettemer?

M: Yes, she lived down McAndrew Road from the Lilliefelts.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Donald Hoppen came out to greet us. He was quite friendly. He had written a note asking to see Krishnaji and me. I will try to arrange it here tomorrow. Said he was at two of the Santa Monica talks. I made a soup for supper that Krishnaji liked. [Chuckles.] It had everything…'

S: Good. That's what we want.

M: '…and he stirred it and sniffed it appreciatively. It was leeks and celery mostly, with one potato…' Do you want everything?

S: Yes, everything.

M: '…one zucchini, lots of parsley, the outer leaves of a lettuce, and cubes of concentrated vegetable broth, all put through the blender. At supper, Krishnaji talked of Rajagopal, his refusal of Krishnaji's healing, his self-pity. Krishnaji quoted Rajagopal as saying, "People will always look after you." Krishnaji made a gesture at me, "But me, who will care about me?" Erna said that Rajagopal told her that he and Rosalind had a shared spiritual bond. Krishnaji wondered how, with this extraordinary protection that has characterized his life, that those two'—Rajagopal and Rosalind—'were allowed to come into it as they did.'

S: Absolutely.

M: Do we not all wonder that?

S: Exactly.

M: Sunday, the ninth of April. 'We went out to look down the valley and listen to the bees and the morning dove, which sat on a tree and made its lovely sound. I gave Krishnaji his breakfast tray, started lunch, and then took the Nagra to Libbey Park, set it up, and left it again with Alan Kishbaugh. I came back to fetch Krishnaji to his second talk. A strong, superb one, tremendous energy in it. He said, "Order is not within the field of consciousness." Bill Quinn, from past days in Ojai, spoke to him briefly after the talk, almost in tears. In the car, Krishnaji was shaking from the outpouring of speaking. It had been broadcast live on radio and was videotaped. He had worn a middling dark red knitted shirt, which came out well on colored video. We drove back very slowly, followed by a hippy. Krishnaji spoke to him. He was too choked up to speak to Krishnaji and later when we left, he was waiting by the gate to see Krishnaji again. Mark Lee and family came by for Krishnaji to touch the children's heads. His wife brought idli[4], which Krishnaji, Erna, Alan Kishbaugh, Ruth, and I had with our lunch. At lunch, Krishnaji gave Kishbaugh a summary of what Theosophists believe, part of it very funny. I did a roll on the Leicaflex of him across the table as he talked.' I have those pictures in the other room.

S: Hm.

M: 'After lunch, we had a trustee meeting. When it was over, Donald Hoppen saw Krishnaji. I spoke briefly to him as he left and he said his being upset and angry is something he now looks on as a passing phase. Krishnaji and I then left and drove home to Malibu in time for supper. It had been a long and full day for Krishnaji, but he wanted to watch High Noon, a movie on television, and it was a diversion from all that had gone on.'

S: Donald Hoppen was talking about his own being angry?

M: Yes, he was angry at…

S: …at Brockwood and things.

M: Yes. I think it was because we didn't build his buildings for the school.

Monday, the tenth of April. 'Krishnaji found *Candles in the Sun[5] in the bookcase and he read in it. He read me the part in which Lady Emily and others resigned from the TS and Dr. Besant offered to as well when Krishnaji broke with it. "And yet Rajagopal didn't," said Krishnaji. "How could he remain in it? This is worse than his stealing money." He told me, and probably Erna, that if he'd known that Rajagopal continued to be a Theosophist all those years, he never would have let him edit the talks.

S: That's interesting.

M: Yes.

S: It's also interesting that Annie Besant offered to resign from the TS.

M: Yes, yes. He often talked about that.

S: I didn't know about that.

M: Oh, yes. She said, "I'll give up all this and follow you." And he felt she shouldn't.

'Krishnaji and I walked on the beach road. At lunch, after reading Candles in the Sun, he spoke of "protecting the body", how it is necessary. Crossing the beach road together, Krishnaji paused and a car came along fast with the sun in its eyes. I called to Krishnaji, who was just out of my reach, and he said, "I see it, I see it," but he didn't move. He has an odd tendency never to act quickly when there is danger from traffic. He says he sees it as though that was enough.' [S laughs.]

S: Maybe it was.

M: [laughs] I remember the first time crossing Piccadilly road with him: he was about to step into traffic and I, without thinking, grabbed him. And he said very casually, "You just saved my life." And I was horrified, and he said, "Well, it wouldn't happen if I were alone. Then I pay attention." [S chuckles.] So, I thought, my god [S laughing], I have to save his life every time we come to cross a road, possibly. And once he went—it's probably in here somewhere—I left him for a fitting at Huntsman. We were going to lunch at Fortnum and when I came back, he'd gone on his own! I was in panic wondering which road he'd taken and rushed out, and he then reappeared. He not only crossed, but he crossed back, twice. Such things [S laughing] shortened my life span. [M giggles.]

Anyway, where are we? Oh, Tuesday, eleven April. 'We took a picnic, did a few errands in town, ate in the car, and met Erna at the law office. We conferred with Saul Rosenthal and David Leipziger about Krishnaji's deposition tomorrow. He was told to listen to the whole question, be sure it is understood, and answer what you know or remember. We came back to Malibu and spent the night.'

'In the morning, Krishnaji asked me to write each day, "What is it like to be with a man from Madanapalle."' [M and S laugh.] 'He said I must be able to write well. He has been reading Out of Africa because of my suggestion and sees that it is a style which means much to me. He said to do this, and that it is more important than all those letters to spend

“an hour or two each day.” This is something that I would like to do most deeply. Where that hour or two each day is to be found, god knows! I am drowning in deskwork, hopelessly behind. There are days after days when I cannot even read some of the mail that I should be answering. But he is right. And if he wants me to do this, “do it!” as he would say. He is confident about tomorrow.’

Wednesday, April twelve. ‘Saul Rosenthal came at 9:30 a.m. Then, a Mr. Nevel, a court reporter, then came Terry Christen, Rajagopal’s lawyer, and his assistant, G. Gilbert. I suddenly looked out the kitchen window and, completely unannounced, saw Rajagopal, Mima Porter, and Annie Vigeveno. I met them on the driveway and walked ahead of them to the house to warn Krishnaji and Erna. It was a shock to Krishnaji and an angry one to Erna and me. We sat at the extended table in the living room, Krishnaji facing the ocean. I sat just behind him and tried to draw the baleful stares of Rajagopal. He looked like an angry ancient baboon, a tense mouth, heavy, decayed body, and hands clasped and twisting, and angry eyes moving as if at a tennis match to the questioner and back. He would stare at my stare, not wanting to cede, and I had the feeling of calmly sending what I thought of him along the wire of his stares. [Chuckles.] Porter and Vigeveno sat at the end sofa, old and endlessly ugly, Vigeveno tense and hidden behind very black glasses. Tense, pursed mouth. Porter in her crazy ranch-hand face’—I was really not very flattering when I wrote this—‘sat in frozen attitudes, twisted over with her hands over her face. They looked cold and dead.’

‘Krishnaji spoke in a deep, slightly hoarse voice, slowly, carefully. When he became tired in the afternoon, he had difficulty concentrating on Christen’s questions and asked often for their repetition.’

‘During the break for lunch, Krishnaji went into the dining room and his body shook from head to foot. He lay down in his room for half an hour, and it resumed until 4:30. In the morning, Christen had asked for long explanations of Theosophy and what had happened in the early years. It occurred to me that he was trying to tire Krishnaji before more pertinent questions. Krishnaji answered carefully, giving more than necessary and making no derogatory references to Rajagopal. It is so against his nature to speak critically of someone that even in this context, he cannot do it. He also, out of a politeness, gave us margins for doubt in some of his answers, as though not wanting to contradict Christen. After it was over, he looked drained. When we saw that Rajagopal and the others had gone, Erna telephoned Theo to come, too, and he rushed from Ojai. He accompanied Krishnaji on the beach walk, and Krishnaji came back looking much better. Erna and Theo spent the night here. Krishnaji was shivering a little when he went to bed.’

S: I can’t believe that Rajagopal, Porter, and Vigeveno came to your house.

M: Yes. You see they had a right to be there, but they didn’t communicate they were going to come.

Thursday, the thirteenth of April. ‘Another even longer day of deposition. Again, Rajagopal, Annie Vigeveno, and Mima Porter lumbered in and sat as yesterday. These two days are the only times I have ever seen Krishnaji sit with his legs crossed. At moments of fatigue, he would sit that way. Rajagopal sat opposite at the other end of the table and again was silent but with an attitude of shrugged shoulders and unspoken indignation. Porter stared out the window with a vacant eye one sees on senile wards.' [Chuckles.] I'm sorry, it's…

S: It's perfect. It's fine.

M: 'Vigeveno was controlled, hidden, venomous, but she provided the only humor for us. Before the meetings, I had put a telephone in the living room and suspected that Christen might be instructing her to get the new unlisted number. I had removed the number, leaving the old number [chuckles] on the instrument. In late morning, Vigeveno asked if she could telephone and when she had finished she scurried back to her purse, opened it, and surreptitiously wrote on a scrap on paper inside it with Rajagopal looking over her shoulder. The old number! [Chuckles.] Which they already have!

S: Why did you change your number?

M: To prevent his telephoning.

S: Right. So it was really to prevent him from calling all the time…

M: Yes, yes. I changed my number, but I figured that might happen, and so it did. 'This made Krishnaji laugh repeatedly in the evening after I told him. The questioning went on. Christen, a'—what?…A something—'in a loud striped shirt and tie, gold spectacles and rings, polite words, sharp eyes, ably and doggedly putting forth questions, seemed to be uncertain what would come from Krishnaji or how to deal with him. Rajagopal asked for a break in mid-morning because Krishnaji had forgotten having seen Joy Mills, etcetera, last month in Ojai. This was corrected. Yesterday, before leaving, Christen had left copies of letters he wished to put in as evidence. We had read them; Krishnaji had not. Some were so sad, Krishnaji apologizing to Rajagopal and mentioning a betrayal. They were letters written at Rajagopal's insistence. One in 1952 was written for Mrs. Bindley in London. Krishnaji was asked to identify his signature, but not the content, for he has no memory of them. Christen had shown us only about a dozen as he is supposed to by agreement.'

You see, probably you know this but, when you're in a case like this, you can ask that anything offered in evidence be shown to each side in advance of cross-examination.

'Krishnaji was shown only about a dozen as he is supposed to by agreement with Rosenthal, but Rajagopal offered some forty in all. The copy of the deposition will give the back and forth of all this, but when we stopped for lunch, it looked as if the questioning might be prolonged into tomorrow. Christen had not yet moved into anything touching on Rosalind, but there were signs of it coming closer. Krishnaji lay down after lunch and I took Saul in to speak to him before the resumption. Krishnaji was sleeping in his bed like a child—infinitely touching. He motioned Saul to sit down on the end of the bed, and Saul told him that he was doing very well, 85 percent marks, he said, and Krishnaji listened as if he were taking an examination in school.'

'We went back in and it was agreed to try to finish today. As the afternoon wore on, Krishnaji was looking so frail, his body in his jeans and blue shirt and sweater seeming to become smaller. And then he seemed to gain a different strength. He began to speak on his own level of trust and friendship in the early days, which allowed him to leave everything to Rajagopal, of how that trust was eroded by Rajagopal until it was gone and he had to break. Toward the end, Christen was asking if it would meet with Krishnaji's approval, if Krishnaji could accept KWINC doing publishing of the already-published books, not by the TS Press. Krishnaji did not accede to this readily. He continued to speak of lack of confidence in Rajagopal. "Trust once broken is gone," he said. Finally, Christen asked him if the court found that KWINC could do that and if KFA did the rest, would Krishnaji accept it? Krishnaji replied that one must accept the court's decision, and if both organizations shared the work then that would happen, and "God help them both." It was over. They left.'

'Saul stayed on a little while. He had got into the record that Krishnaji repudiated a letter that Krishnaji wrote to Rajagopal years ago as a "will" that Rajagopal should carry on the work and appoint his own successor after Krishnaji is gone. But Saul wants Krishnaji to draw up a separate, more binding document to counteract this before he leaves California.'

'We all felt euphoric that it was over. Saul told Krishnaji that he got 100 percent for the afternoon, and Krishnaji was both shaking and laughing, as the strain was beginning to come out of him. He asked Erna and Theo to stay another night, and after Saul left we locked the gate and all walked around the lawn. All through supper we felt a little giddy, at least I did, that the ordeal was over. Krishnaji watched Ironside on TV and went to bed.'

S: I think you're going to have to explain, Mary, these letters that Rajagopal had intimidated Krishnaji into writing.

M: I asked Krishnaji what was the so-called betrayal; and Krishnaji said that it was an episode in Athens when they were both staying in a hotel and somebody had asked Rajagopal for an interview with Krishnaji, and Rajagopal turned the person down. Later, Krishnaji was in the lobby, or somewhere, and the person came up to him and begged him for an interview, and he agreed. Rajagopal was in a rage, and said this was a betrayal. This is what he dictated so he could use this as something about Rosalind.

S: And so how did Rajagopal get Krishnaji to write a letter apologizing…?

M: Well, bullying him…

S: Right.

M: …being furious so that Krishnaji would try to calm him down.

S: Yes, I know all this, but I'm asking this for the record.

M: I know you are.

S: So, he wrote apologizing for that betrayal…

M: Yes.

S: …but Rajagopal was making it out to be the betrayal as having to do with…

M: Yes.

S: …Krishnaji's relationship with Rosalind.

M: Yes, which it wasn't at all.

S: Right. Okay. I want to keep all this clear.

M: April the fourteenth. 'Several thoughts on awakening. The thing is not over. Much in Krishnaji's testimony can be pulled down in court because he does not remember things, but his evident trust he gave and Rajagopal's abuse is formidable. Erna and Theo left for Ojai and I went to town to fetch things. Krishnaji was very tired and slept all morning and after lunch. Sidney Field went with him on a beach walk.'

The sixteenth April—

S: What happened to fifteenth?

M: I don't know.

S: Well, let's look in the little book.

M: Well, we don't have to have every last thing.

S: Yes, we do. [M laughs.] This is the definitive history. [Laughs.]

M: You're being Rajagopal to me! [Chuckles.]

S: Exactly. Unbelievably.

M: Fifteenth April. I may withhold it. [S laughs.] 'Deskwork. We walked on the beach and Amanda came over to talk.'

S: I think…

M: There's no reason that you or anyone else [S laughs] should dwell on that…

S: Well, we just don't want to miss anything. If we know that there was nothing there that we'd missed, that's okay. [M chuckles.] But just a blank page doesn't do it, you see.

M: We cannot have 365 different entries for x numbers of years.

S: Yes, we can.

M: [Both laugh. M uses playful "stern" voice:] I may balk! You can't tell.

April sixteenth. Do you want the sixteenth?

S: Yes, definitely.

M: Apologize! [In a mocking voice.]

S: [laughs] I'm sorry, very sorry. I'll write you a letter…[Laughing.]

M: [playful voice again] You betrayed me!

S: …that I betrayed you, yes. [Chuckling.]

M: Alright, then. The sixteenth, 'Krishnaji told me I must have a secretary for all the letters, etcetera. He said I spend all my time working when I should be quiet. Think. Read. Write. And keep around him a serene atmosphere. If I get tired, it tires him. I must do everything to be well and stay well. He expects to live many more years and I must be well to help him. If anything happens to me, if I were in a hospital, he could not be with me, etcetera. He joked about, "the Master only speaks once." An old Theosophical saying, so I must pay heed. During the evening, he said something was happening as if someone were in the room watching. Something is happening to him, an energy. He said he understood something about a very, very long prolonged life. He chided me a little about not having noticed anything in the room. I had not been quiet.'

'We watched the sixteenth Apollo take off from Cape Kennedy on television, another moon voyage. In the evening, Phil Dunn called to say to look in the western sky as there was a sickle moon with Venus on its right tip.' I have a little drawing of that. So extraordinary and beautiful; Krishnaji held up his arms at the sight, his face alight.

S: Mm.

M: Now, we're going to make a jump, which you won't like, so I'll go back to the little book.

S: Exactly. [Laughs heartily.]

M: Don't sound so…[Both break into laughter.]

S: I…I feel…deprived. [M laughs.]

M: April seventeenth. 'Desk. Perrines to lunch. Krishnaji and I walked on the beach road, and then he spoke of Kundalini, something that cannot be sought and is not a reward. He asked me if I am writing these things down. It's my job.'

On the eighteenth, 'Erna, Theo, Ruth came at noon. We held a KFA trustee meeting. Krishnaji drew up a statement to prevent Rajagopal or KWINC having anything to do with his work after his death. They left after lunch and we went for a walk.'

On the nineteenth, 'I telephoned Mary Cadogan in London about a list of Foundation things. I went early to town. Took' [chuckle] 'Timosi…'—that was a cat—'to the hotel for cats. Then to see Saul Rosenthal with a copy of Krishnaji's statement about the Krishnamurti Foundations, carrying on the work. Then errands. Krishnaji, when I got back, had rested during the day. He'd seen Mark Lee and the children and walked with Sidney Field.'

April twentieth. 'We packed all day long. Krishnaji saw the Mark Lee children. I went to the Dunnes'. The astronauts landed on the moon while we listened on TV. Malibu was at its loveliest; flowers, sunlight, and a clear, clean wind from the sea.'

'I could have packed for hours but gave it up and went to bed.' [M and S both chuckle.]

The twenty-first. 'Up at 5 a.m., and we were ready to leave at 7:15 a.m. Filomena went by taxi and Amanda drove Krishnaji and me to the airport. We had thirteen bags! to check. Good lord. We flew at 9 a.m. on TWA. Arrived in New York around 5 p.m. Very slow traffic going into town. TWA didn't have Krishnaji's black Anthony bag, but it came on the next flight and was delivered to the Ritz Tower during the night.' Now I forget whether I've mentioned the Ritz Tower before. My father had a very small apartment with two bedrooms and two baths and a little sitting room, and a sort of closet with a cooking thing in it. 'I had a limousine meet us. We are again in Father's flat and Filomena is in a studio room. We had supper and went to bed.'

In the morning, on the twenty-second, 'Narasimhan came to see Krishnaji. After lunch, Filomena and I went to Bloomingdale's for provisions. Then I came back for Krishnaji, and we walked in the rain to a movie done in Amsterdam.' I don't know what that was. 'Very satisfactory. We walked some more and came back. Krishnaji wants me to keep track of current thought, science, etcetera, and tell him. Then we should do dialogues about these things. Huxley used to inform him in this way.' I'm afraid I didn't…

S: So Huxley used to keep track of what was going on in the worlds of thought and sciences.

M: Yes, this is something that Huxley did for him. It wasn't quite as effective to have me do it, but anyway. [S chuckles.]

The twenty-third 'was a quiet day. I worked on letters. We went for a walk up to 72nd Street and back down Madison Avenue. We watched the astronauts working on the moon and their capsule take off.'

The twenty-fourth, 'Narasimhan came to see Krishnaji again and somebody else came. I did errands.'

S: Someone you don't want to mention, or someone you can't…

M: No, it doesn't matter…a woman called Elona Hessey; she lived in New York and did something about getting videotapes onto television.

S: Well, that's important.

M: Alright.

April twenty-fifth. 'I went to Carnegie Hall to speak to a Mr. Warkow, the manager, about the talks, the lights, the chairs, recording, etcetera. Walked back. Doing some errands on the way, and at 4 p.m. Krishnaji saw Joan Gordon'—that's another woman who used to do things about television. 'Mrs. Hesse brought me all the letters she'd done.' Oh, she helped me as a secretary. She was a nice woman who worked as a secretary, and I was able to get some help with the correspondence.

'Krishnaji said, "will is violence." Hughes van der Straten is in this country for a few days on business and he came to see us.'

April twenty-sixth. 'Narasimhan brought his granddaughter to see Krishnaji at 9:30 a.m. After lunch, Krishnaji and I went to The Garden of the Finzi-Continis'—that was an Italian film—'at the Plaza. We had taken a walk before lunch and took another one after the movie.'

The next day, 'we walked in the morning and did errands. The Lilliefelts arrived from Ojai.'

On the twenty-eighth, 'the Lilliefelts came over in the morning. I did errands again.'

S: You're not skipping over anything?

M: No.

S: One of the reasons I ask is because I'm looking for something that is on the archives list that you haven't mentioned yet.

M: What?

S: Well, it might be in the wrong month, that's why. It's Huston Smith, in fact.

M: Huston Smith! That was done in Claremont. We're in New York now.

S: Yes, well, it's misplaced.

M: On April twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji's first talk at Carnegie Hall at 11 a.m. I had a car and driver. Everything went perfectly. Krishnaji spoke exactly one hour and then took questions. He said every form of conditioning is an act of separation. Theo came back with us to pick up the Rajagopal deposition and other papers to show Faria, who was here. After lunch, we each took naps and then went for a short walk. Too much wind and dust, Krishnaji said. He felt faint. We came back and he had a runny nose during the night. He took one Bufferin at 1 a.m.'

The next day 'was Krishnaji's second talk in Carnegie Hall. He felt alright and the cold symptoms stopped. After lunch I went to see a friend. When I came back, Krishnaji wanted to go to a movie, and we went to one called Ten Days. It was nearby. Then at 6 p.m., I went up to see my brother and his wife. Sat and talked till 8:15, and came back to Krishnaji.'

On the first of May. 'Narasimhan and child to see Krishnaji. Then at 11 a.m., Mr. Faria and Lilliefelts came. Faria had read the Rajagopal depositions, etcetera, and we discussed it. After lunch, Krishnaji and I went to 9 East 90th Street, the Cooper-Hewitt Museum offices. In the rooms made available by Lisa'—Lisa is my brother's wife, who was director of the Cooper-Hewitt Museum—'Krishnaji gave interviews…' and then it mentions the names of the people.

S: What were their names?

M: One was 'for the Village Voice magazine'—looks like—'Eve Berliner. Also Gary Wayne Londrin'—or some such name—'Paul Bura, and G. Marcello. Then we walked all the way down to 57th Street.'

On the second of May, 'Krishnaji saw Narasimhan, then Faria. I went to a back specialist, Dr. Hanz Krauss, on the recommendation of Narasimhan. I would have to be in the hospital for three weeks of treatment, so that was out. Then I went to see Mitchell Booth with the legal papers for him to look at. Then more errands and back to lunch.'

'Krishnaji and I went again to 9 East 90th Street and more interviews: Frank McClocklin, teacher and editor of a magazine Media and Methods; Marvin Barrett of Columbia University School of Journalism; Cheryl Wake; and lastly Dr. Broadbeck and his nine followers. We walked back to the Ritz Tower. I have a cold.' [Chuckles.]

The third of May. 'I went to get Krishnaji's visa for France, and miscellaneous errands. Felt poorly after lunch. I have grippe. Rainy day, so Krishnaji didn't go out. He had fever in the night. Paola and John Cohen came for tea'—that's Paola, Vanda's daughter, and her husband.

On the fourth, 'I went to Dr. Wolf, who gave me some quinine tablets for the grippe, and'—something else, some medicine. 'I fetched Krishnaji's passport from the French Consulate. A Mr. D. K. Jha, the Ambassador of India, came to lunch. He was an old friend of Krishnaji's. A nice man. Theo came at 4 p.m. to walk with him and I went as far as the barber in the Lombardy,' which is the hotel around the corner where Krishnaji had his hair cut.

On May fifth, 'I felt better. Krishnaji saw Narasimhan and child and then Faria. Filomena went up to Woodlawn.' That's the cemetery where my aunt[6] is buried. I went on errands to the bank. My cousin came to see me. Krishnaji's third volume of his deposition came from Rosenthal. We read it all morning, afternoon, and evening.'

May sixth. 'Krishnaji gave his third talk in Carnegie Hall. After the usual conference last night on which suit, shirt, and tie to wear; he was in dark blue, his hair a little shorter after the barber visit Thursday. The barber refused to cut it short, long pieces on the side now fly…blow in the wind, like ears, and seem a nuisance to him, but he didn't go as far as to cut them really short. I think it would look very nice and simple, but he must decide. The Carnegie Hall manager, Mr. Warkow, said when we arrived that Mr. Stokowski was in the audience and would like to greet Krishnaji afterward.'

'It was a very good talk, beginning with the need for order; a new dimension must be first in the individual. Unfortunately, we usually try to bring order about from the outside. Order is not to be cultivated, it is not competition, not conformity. Order comes from observation and choiceless awareness. Only the man who perceives without distortion, who will have the energy to change, will then, with others, make a change in the world. Order comes without effort, sweetly. A mind that is completely in order is good. In this order lies our whole problem of living. We must stop the disorder which society accepts. The pattern of society is corrupt. Can you put that aside and bring about order in yourself? Knowing yourself is the ending of sorrow. There is sorrow in each individual and there is a collective sorrow. Fulfillment, changing according to a pattern, is a dissipation of energy because it is an avoidance of what is, and you need complete energy to change what is. Order can come about without any effort. Effort implies division and conflict; order is only possible when we observe what is and go beyond it. So there is an ending of sorrow when there is order, and this comes about when one understands oneself. How do you look without division? No observer, but only observation. The observer is only a fragment, it is the ego, the me, the past, the thinker, and the creator of division and conflict. The understanding of disorder is order. For us, love is a series of disorders. How is it possible to have love without a breath of disorder? Love is never to be in conflict in relationship—relationship means responsibility. Love in which there is total responsibility. Death is part of living. We have to understand that extraordinary thing called death, which means: Can I be free of the fear to look at it? The chaste mind has no image. You must find it. There is something permanent, not at the behest of time. That goes beyond death. Something not the product of time, physically or psychologically, not shaped by the mind, the environment, or experience, and therefore not touched by death.'

'Time, a psychological process we call progress. We need tomorrow because we are lazy. We need to live a complete life without fear of death and with no tomorrow, dying every minute, dying to everything you hold dear, which is memory and to the past, which is the me, the me that says I must be. To die to the past is to die to oneself.'

'Is there such a thing as immortality? Not me becoming immortal, which is such a small thing, which cannot love. There is only love when the me is not. So, is there eternity? That is what concerns man. If there is something beyond death, which is neither the continuity of what has been, nor seeking a heaven; to come upon that, which is not time or put together by thought as true.'

'Immortality is where time doesn't exist, and for this, the mind must be still. You cannot come upon this stillness without order. The really religious life is the life of non-self.'

'After the talk, Krishnaji waited backstage until Stokowski came. They bowed and shook hands with great dignity. They mentioned how long since they had met. Krishnaji says it was first in Ommen, then in Ojai when he brought Garbo with him. Each seemed to give an appraising glance at the other as if noting how the years had touched each one. Stokowski is ninety now, still conducting. He has a concert in Carnegie Hall tomorrow night and Mr. Warkow said he had made a box available to Krishnaji and his friends. Erna and Theo will go.'

'We came back to lunch, and while Krishnaji slept, I went to the Dray Gallery to see a Bourdelle watercolor done of Krishnaji in 1927–28, which is similar to the one at Brockwood given by Mar de Manziarly. The gallery tried to sell it to me for $2,500. Bought some shoes and came back.'

'During supper, the television showed an English curate doing exorcism on people possessed. Krishnaji told of doing it in the past. We watched a documentary on climbing Everest.'

Shall we keep going?

S: No, we should stop.

M: Very well. We finished sixth of May.

[6] Filomena's first employer, for whom Filomena worked for decades.

Issue 23: May 7, 1972 to July 15, 1972

This issue starts with Krishnaji and Mary in New York, where Krishnaji completed a very successful series at Carnegie Hall. They then go to Brockwood (and briefly Paris to get the car) before having a seemingly wonderful road-trip vacation through France on the way to Switzerland and the Saanen talks.

During this time, the health of Mary's father is declining, and though she doesn't talk about it a great deal, it is clearly both moving and significant for her.

On their arrival in Geneva, Mary tears ligaments in her foot, and we see her soldiering on despite the obvious pain, reflecting her commitment to what she felt to be her life's work. Remarkable.

Mary: We're going to start with Sunday, May seventh, 1972.

Scott: Alright.

M: We're in New York, and 'it was Filomena's seventy-fifth birthday, and we celebrated that at breakfast. Then she came with us to Krishnaji's fourth talk at Carnegie Hall. It seemed to me a very great one. He asked, is there anything beyond time, something eternal, incorruptible? To search and investigate demands a mind that is capable of going beyond, if that is possible, a mind that is religious without dogma, belief, theory, a mind that depends on none of these. Search implies searching for something, something you think exists, and you believe in the capacity to recognize the seeker and the thing sought. Recognition is implied in search; the seeker divides himself from the thing he seeks; the thought is projected. Investigation is different; it implies tracing, going through, never accepting, or rejecting.' Do you want to hear all this? It's in the tape. Why should it be read out by me?

S: Well, alright, skip that part, but I don't want anything else skipped.

M: There's an awful lot of this, two pages of this. It goes on and on and on about it. 'After the talk, we came back to the Ritz Tower, and took the contents (mostly wine) of Father's locked closets in the apartment up to my brother's. Krishnaji, Filomena, my brother, Lisa, Daisy, and Laurie all had lunch together, and we had a cake for Filomena's birthday. It was a warm day and Krishnaji and I walked all the way back to 57th Street in the afternoon.' My brother's place is on 92nd, so that was a good long walk.

S: We should just mention for the record that Lisa was Bud's wife, and Daisy is his daughter, and Laurie is his adopted daughter.

M: Yes. The next day, Monday the eighth. 'Narasimhan came by and drove Krishnaji and me to his apartment for lunch with him and his wife. At 3:30 p.m., Erna and Theo came by to discuss KFA matters, and at 5:30 p.m., Mitchell Booth joined us and gave us his evaluation of Rajagopal's deposition.'

S: Do you want to tell us what Mitchell thought of it?

M: Well, it doesn't say, and I don't remember now what he said, just general discussion of where we stood. On the ninth, 'Krishnaji was interested in Dr. Woolf.' Dr. Woolf was an old German doctor to whom my family went, and I'd been to, and I had been to him during this time. Actually, it's the Niehans thing—do you know what the Niehans thing is?

S: Is it in New York?

M: Well, Woolf gave it in New York, but Niehans was a Swiss doctor, who invented the thing about implantation of cells from a fetus of a sheep.

S: Ah, yes.

M: He invented that. I think they—"synthesized" isn't the word, but didn't have to kill the sheep to get it. Niehans's theory was there were certain things that make the embryo grow and develop, and it's not made after the birth of the creature, and those things Niehans felt would keep you healthy and your own body functioning well. A lot of famous people have had it; Winston Churchill had it; the Pope is supposed to have had it; I don't know who all.

S: Alright.

M: So, 'we went to Dr. Woolf and he took specimens from us to examine, and an infrared photo of Krishnaji's lower lip, which is supposed to show the arterial conditions.'

S: Hmmm. [M chuckles.]

M: 'He also gave Krishnaji a nose spray to desensitize his nose from hay fever, and ribonucleic acid tablets (cold pills) for the same. We got back to the hotel with plenty of time to do last-minute things, and say goodbye to Filomena, who is to fly back to Malibu tomorrow. And then we went to the airport, and at 8 p.m. took a TWA flight to London.'

M: The tenth of May. 'We scarcely slept on the 747, but arrived in London on time at 7:40 a.m. We were met by Dorothy in her new Cortina; Doris, Arthur'—remember Arthur?

S: Oh, yes, of course.

M: Doris's friend. 'Arthur was in his car for luggage. The Digbys were there to greet Krishnaji. Krishnaji and I drove with Dorothy to Brockwood. It was a grey day, but the sun came out as we came up the lane. Spring is late this year, and the copper beeches are just unfurling their tiny leaves. Everything looked very well. The new stone path that Guy has made is splendid and looks'—Guy was Dorothy's and Montague's son.

S: And the stone path is the one that runs on the south side of the house—flagstones.

M: 'The path is splendid and looks as if it has always been there. The new serving room with arches into the dining room is an improvement.' That's where the food is laid out in the school. Everyone looked well. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I went for a walk across the fields and back by the lane. Slept nine hours in the marvelous quiet of Brockwood.' [M and S both chuckle.] Now, the next entry is for May twelfth, and you're going to ask me what happened on the eleventh.

S: I am.

M: Oh, I don't think that I'm going to fill all these things in. It was surely to do with laundry, unpacking, and such matters.

S: It's alright. We don't mind hearing about that.

M: Speak for yourself. [M and S both chuckle.] Alright, I'll look it up, but I may not tell you. [S laughs.] It's that—unpacking, long walk, wonderful to be at Brockwood…now you know. [Both laugh.] I'm not going to indulge you this much. [S laughs more.]

The twelfth of May. 'Today, at half after midnight, it was Krishnaji's seventy-seventh birthday, but so totally does he brush the subject aside that nothing is made of it. It is also Dorothy's birthday. We made a little more of that. She, Doris, Krishnaji, and I had to go to Rubinstein's office to sign legal papers in the new arrangement of the Foundation ceasing as is and becoming two new entities—the KF Trust Limited and the Brockwood Park Krishnamurti Educational Centre Limited. A rail strike was on and so we drove to London. Krishnaji and I went, of course, to Huntsman [chuckling] for fittings, to the Burlington Arcade, where we bought a birthday sweater for Dorothy and one for Doris, too. We met them at Fortnum's for lunch and then all went to Rubinstein's to sign papers already signed by Mary Links, George Digby, and Mary Cadogan. I enjoy Rubinstein's office in Gray's Inn—the worn stone steps and iron banisters, the Georgian windows looking out on a great plane tree said to be favored by Francis Bacon.' [Both quietly chuckle.] 'Rubinstein was not there; a female clerk did the needful, and we drove back to Brockwood through stifling traffic.' Now, we're going to jump. So, I'll see if anything happens of interest.

S: What's the next entry in the big book, the fifteenth?

M: The fifteenth, yes. The thirteenth and fourteenth seem to be family matters. 'Continued unpacking and arranging things in order. Krishnaji slept morning and afternoon. And on the fourteenth, it's another quiet day. The Bohms came for lunch. We walked. Krishnaji slept a lot, and after tea, I packed for Paris.' On the fifteenth, 'Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to Heathrow. We had a picnic lunch of nice tomato and cheese sandwiches on the good brown bread from the Donkey Cart.' In those days, we got our bread from the Donkey Cart Bakery in Petersfield.

S: Oh, yes. I'd forgotten about that.

M: 'Krishnaji and I took the 12:40 p.m. Air France plane to Paris, and Michel met us'—that's my father's chauffeur—'with the Rolls in which Krishnaji feels a little self-conscious, but also likes.'

S: [laughs] What color was it?

M: Dark grey and black. It was a very, very old one. It was god-knows-how-many-years-old then.

S: Oh, wonderful. Is that the one that Bud now has?

M: Well, I think by now he's got rid of it, but he inherited it. No, it's not the one in New York. This was father's in Paris, and Bud inherited it, and he kept it for a while.

S: And I thought he brought it to Florida or something?

M: No, that's one he owned in New York, which he bought with a friend, and they shared it. That didn't work very well, so he finally bought out the friend, and that one was forty years old, or fifty, who knows.

S: [chuckles] Wonderful.

M: Anyway, 'we went to the Plaza Athénée, where else, and we unpacked and then we went to Lobb and Charvet, and later I went alone to see my father. Well, there's quite a bit about his health, which we will skip. Came back to the hotel and Krishnaji and I had supper in our rooms. He had walked around the block of the Plaza, while I was gone, promising me not to cross streets.' [Laughs.]

On the sixteenth, 'I had a fitting with Chanel on a brown and beige tweed suit ordered in October. Michel brought Krishnaji to Charvet, where I joined him. We both ordered shirts and went to the Tour. Krishnaji remained in the car, while I went up to see Father. I telephoned his doctor to discuss his condition. Slowly declining but everything is even for the moment.' 'Krishnaji and I lunched at Au Pactole.' Remember that? Did we go there when you and Kathy and I were there? Well, it's up on the Boulevard St. Germain around the corner. 'It was a change for him from the luxe of the Plaza Athénée Restaurant, which is good, but resembles most top restaurants. Pactole, where the food is superb, has dingy walls, good cooking smells in the air, and people seriously eating. The cook is the owner. Maurice, the maître d'hotel, was helpful with our vegetables, and a salad aux champignon, and a cheese flan with a light dusting of truffles. Krishnaji liked it, and his eyes darted about, taking in everything, including the fat priest in a monk's habit who ate and drank interminably. The car took us back to Lobb, then back to the Plaza, dodging the path of Queen Elizabeth, who was here on an official visit. The Champs-Élysées and the Place de la Concorde were swaying with huge Union Jacks. Krishnaji rested while I went back to see Father. I returned at 5 p.m., when Nadia Kossiakof and Marcelle Bondoneau came to tea with Krishnaji and me to discuss the work in France. Krishnaji took a bit of a walk and dined in his room.'

S: Krishnaji talked about that priest or monk.

M: Did he? The man, God knows what he ordered, he ate course after course. Krishnaji was fascinated. How, first of all, how anybody could eat that much, and secondly, a man of the cloth…

S: Yes, a kind of a monk. [Both laugh.] I could be that kind of a monk. Yes, Krishnaji talked about—he remembered that.

M: Krishnaji kept eyeing him, very discreetly. But this restaurant soon fell out of favor partly because they didn't serve salad. Krishnaji couldn't believe that a restaurant, especially in France, a good restaurant, you couldn't have salad. He was quite shocked.

S: [laughs] I wonder if it's any good nowadays?

M: I think it's gone off a bit. Bud told me last year it's either been sold to somebody or it's not what it once was. It was very good. It's the sort of restaurant that I like better than Plaza Athénée, which is, you know, grand luxe, and is fine, but it isn't somehow real.

Anyway, on Wednesday, the seventeenth of May, 'I did errands, and then I saw Father. Michel brought Krishnaji to Au Pactole, where Mar de Manziarly joined us for lunch and brought papers of her mother's for the KF archives. Today, Au Pactole did not find favor with Krishnaji as they had no green salad.' [Chuckles.] 'He was aghast. "How can these people live?" he said, looking around at very copiously fed clientele.' [Both chuckle.] 'Sacha, in pain from a recent car accident, laboriously came with his wooden leg. He joined us for coffee. In the car, we dropped off Mar, and Sacha came back to the hotel for a treatment by Krishnaji. After he left, Krishnaji and I went for a walk. In Givenchy men's boutique, where my brother has bought things, we found some good summer trousers and Krishnaji bought three pairs: a beige linen, a brown linen, and blue silk and wool combination. We walked over to Porthault, where I bought pillowcases for Father, and then…' maybe I shouldn't talk about all this.

S: Yes, you should. This is lovely. It's absolutely lovely…

M: It's lovely for you, but people may snort…

S: Well, let them snort. They're just being stupid if they do.

M: Anyway, 'Krishnaji stayed in the hotel, and I went to see Father, who was more alert. He said repeatedly, "You look so nice." Sometimes, when he is silent and staring, I feel as though I communicate just by thinking with him, as if the word level had faded, and perhaps some simple subconscious perception might be free, but this is probably just my fancy. There is no telling; he gives no sign. I came back to the Plaza Athénée in time to order our supper.'

The next day was Thursday the eighteenth, and 'I had a fitting at Chanel, ordered a blue tweed suit, went to see Father, came back to the hotel, and found the Mercedes there, brought from Thun by Mr. Moser. He, Krishnaji, and I discussed Krishnaji's car, the purchase of which is postponed until next year.' Krishnaji didn't like the current model. 'He left, and Krishnaji and I had a pleasant lunch at the Plaza. At 3:50 p.m. we left in the Mercedes for Le Havre. About an hour out on the autoroute, the car stopped for no reason we could tell. After five minutes, it was alright, and we continued. We found the Normandy Ferry, but instead of boarding immediately, we went looking for a restaurant called Monaco for supper. We found it, had supper, and boarded the ferry. We had the usual neat cabins and a smooth crossing.'

The next morning, 'we debarked in Southampton at 7 a.m., and drove to Brockwood in less than an hour. We had breakfast and unpacked. I put things in order. Frances McCann is here, and I tried to drive her to West Meon, but the car again stalled, and then started up after a few minutes. Walk in the afternoon with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and Whisper.'

On the twentieth, 'the car wouldn't start. I called a mechanic, who found nothing wrong. I drove to Petersfield without mishap, bought plants for the West Wing, and was back in time for the walk.'

On the twenty-first, 'Krishnaji spoke to students, staff, and visitors in the theater workshop. Yves Zlotnicka recorded it. A few parents were there. We walked as usual.'

The next day, 'George Digby and Mary Cadogan came to discuss publications. After lunch, Dorothy joined for financial discussion. Later, Krishnaji, she, and I went for the usual walk.'

Then comes the twenty-third. 'Krishnaji spoke to students most wonderfully on fact and evaluation. Frances came on the walk and talked to Krishnaji. Later, we had tea in the dining room and Krishnaji showed her the plans just received for the Cloisters. Frances is donating $10,000 to it.'

Nothing happened on the twenty-fourth. On the twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji and I took the 10:45 a.m. train from Petersfield, the first time we used that station. Arrived in London at noon, and after leaving trousers for zippers at Huntsman, we went to Mr. Thompson for Krishnaji to have his teeth looked at. A front tooth is fragile and needs capping. We then joined Mary Links at Fortnum's for lunch. We went again to Huntsman to choose materials for a suit Krishnaji won from me in last winter's wager over Rosalind getting to see him. We came back to Petersfield. The Mercedes twice stopped but started up again after a minute.'

The twenty-sixth of May. 'Wind and rain. In afternoon, Krishnaji spoke to the staff. A statement of sanity makes one see what is, and therefore be sane.'

The next day, 'Mary and Joe came for lunch. Krishnaji talked to Mary afterward about the biography. Then, we all had tea, including Frances McCann. The Links went back to town, and Krishnaji, Dorothy, Frances, and I went for a walk.' Ahh…this is when Krishnaji said to me, "Are you my brother? For a moment, I felt you were."' I'd forgotten when that was. '"That's reincarnation," he said. I pointed out I couldn't be, because I was born before Nitya died.'

S: Well, these things are strange. Who knows what could be. [M and S laugh.]

M: I'd forgotten when that was. The twenty-eighth 'was a cold, rainy, and windy day. The high commissioner and Mrs. Pant came for lunch. We walked in the rain.'

The twenty-ninth 'was a holiday; Memorial Day in the U.S. and whatever it is over here. It was still cold and rainy. We walked all the same. Krishnaji talked into the Uher on his own.' The Uher was my tape recorder. 'I talked to the Frys.[1]'

S: I can tell you're not reading me things…

M: Oh, it was about a donation from Father, my brother made on his behalf to KFA. 'Krishnaji said strange things are going on in his head. "Head is burning," he said. He slept in the morning and afternoon, but we walked.'

M: The next day, you'll be thrilled that it says, 'forgot what happened today.' [S chuckles loudly.] And the next day, it says, cryptically, 'Krishnaji talked to school.'

S: These are not your most complete notes here.

M: On June second, 'after lunch I drove to East Dean to see the Frys. I had a lovely afternoon, and happy visit.' Then there's things about their house and new garden, and 'we had tea and a long talk and I came home late.'

For June third, it says 'desk mostly, walk.' So, you know I'm not leaving anything out [S chuckles]. The next day, 'Krishnaji talked to the school. Ian Hammond and Robert Wiffen[2] came about the Cloisters.'

On the fifth of June, 'Krishnaji and I went to London from Petersfield. Huntsman, of course. Then, Mary lunched with us at Fortnum. Krishnaji had a one-and-a-half-hour appointment with Mr. Thompson, while I went to Liberty's for sea island cotton for his nightshirts.' Mrs. Joan Wright, who was a very good sewer, used to make him nightshirts, and so I got the good materials for that. 'Thompson is capping two upper front teeth which are in danger of breaking. Krishnaji had Novocain and stood it very well, but at night, he said "the body feels it has been attacked."'

On the sixth, 'I spoke to Mr. Moser about the Mercedes ignition. It has been stopping briefly. He says it is the transistors. I went to Southampton to meet Sol Rosenthal and his wife Diana. They spent the night at Brockwood and we all discussed where we are in the case. My mother and stepfather arrived in London from Rome.'

The next day, 'At 9 a.m., Krishnaji, Saul, and I talked over the case. I drove the Rosenthals and Patrice, a student and nephew of Suzanne van der Straten, to Petersfield. I was going to London, but the Rosenthals got off at Woking. I took a photo of Krishnaji to be copied, and then met my mother and stepfather for lunch. It was her eighty-first birthday. Krishnaji, during the day, had spoken to the staff at Brockwood, and Anneke arrived to stay for a few days in the West Wing.'

On the eighth of June, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. After lunch, we drove to Southampton, where the Mercedes agency put a new ignition transistor, worth £53 sterling, into the car. Again, we came back and took a long walk. I listened in the evening to the tape of Krishnaji's talk to the staff yesterday, the one I missed.'

On the ninth of June [chuckles], 'we went to London, and we lost my briefcase in the cab.' What happened was Krishnaji was always concerned by what I carried. And when I carried both a handbag and, in this case, a briefcase, he wanted to carry the non-handbag.

S: I completely understand.

M: I always resisted, but I gave in on this occasion. [C*huckling.*] He left it in the backseat of the cab.

S: [laughs] Oh dear!

M: We didn't know it until we got to Huntsman.

S: He must have felt awful.

M: Oh, yes, he was very disturbed by that. 'So, I reported it to the police. Krishnaji fitted at Huntsman, and I went to Mr. Hewitt.' That was another tailor that they recommended down the street. Then, we lunched at Fortnum. We had a time in a queue getting a cab and got to Michael Rubinstein's, where my briefcase was. The taxi driver had taken it to the police, who could see from papers inside that it had to do with Michael, so they called his office, and Michael's clerk collected it.

S: How nice.

M: Isn't that nice? So there it was, just in time to sign papers for Michael. So, it wasn't crisis, but it could've been. 'Dorothy, Doris, David Bohm, the Digbys, and Mary Links were there. The Brockwood Park Krishnamurti Educational Centre Limited was formed, and the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust Limited was set up separately, and both of them replaced the Krishnamurti Foundation of London. Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to Waterloo and we got back to Petersfield by 7 p.m. Krishnaji said the shock of the briefcase loss "put him away for the rest of the day."' [Laughs.] His dismay was touching.

On June eleventh, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school on meditation. Anneke read Rajagopal's deposition, and Krishnaji and I and Dorothy went for a walk.'

On the thirteenth, 'Krishnaji had nausea and a stomach pain, but insisted on going anyway to London. He felt alright in the train. He went to the dentist, while I went for his Swiss visa. Then, we went to John Bell & Croyden and left three water picks for repair. We met Mary L. for lunch at Fortnum, and then Krishnaji went to see Mrs. Bindley while I went in vain to Selfridges about the Sanyo calculator. I rejoined Krishnaji at Mrs. Bindley's, we went back to Brockwood in time for supper.'

The fourteenth is just deskwork for me, but the next day, 'Krishnaji talked to the school. "Is there communication that is neither verbal nor by gesture? When total attention exists at the same moment at the same level, there is communication."'

On the seventeenth, 'Mary and Joe Links brought Sacha de Manziarly to lunch. Sacha is to spend the weekend. The Digbys came to lunch and afterward, Krishnaji, Mary, the Digbys, and I had a meeting and discussed the Publications Committee's wish to make its own deals for publishing and not in the U.S., but there is the possibility that Alan Kishbaugh might act for them. He comes here in July. George questioned the KWINC suit and criticized charging for Krishnaji's talks in the U.S. After tea, the Digbys left and George gave me the text of his position on this matter, and his, to me, unacceptable criticism of Erna.'

June eighteenth. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. There was a cold wind and rain, but we walked anyway in the afternoon. Sacha was helpful with the planning of a motor trip to southern France on the way to Switzerland.' We all got out maps and he advised.

On the nineteenth, 'Krishnaji, Sacha, and I went to London by train. Krishnaji went to Mr. Thompson's, where two upper front teeth were capped. Thompson says a side molar needs to come out on Friday. Krishnaji and I lunched with Mary L. at Fortnum, and went to Huntsman. I fitted my bird's eye slacks. And we came back to Petersfield.'

S: You know, it's nice when I hear you mentioning different garments, because I know a lot of them.

M: [laughs] You do, because fourteen or fifteen years later, I'm still wearing all of that.

S: It's so nice, and Krishnaji's different suits. I wish you told exactly which suits he was fitting at what time. Of course, they all have the dates inside of them, but still…

M: What are you going to do with those suits, as you can clearly not wear them anymore?

S: Well, I still…

M: They belong in the archives.

S: They do belong in the archives, but I intend to lose weight…someday.

M: Someday, that'll be the day, my dear friend…[S laughs]…I don't want to be carping or criticizing or unfriendly, but to lose weight after a certain age—it's very, very difficult.

S: It is very difficult. I know.

M: And what about those beautiful shoes, what's happened to them?

S: I still have them.

M: They belong in the archives.

S: Yes.

M: Where did I hear the other day that somebody…oh, Hans[3]…

S: I know, I lent them the pair.

M: You did? Well, then, they're in the archives.

S: It was for the exhibition. I lent them a pair, but they agreed they have to come back. [Both laugh.]

M: Scott, you're crazy. Oh dear. Well, let me see, where are we?

S: Yes, Hans said people were very interested in the shoes. I was sure they would be, which is why I lent them for the exhibition.

M: I remember Dorothy's statement after the fire, that they had been recovered, and his shoes were gleaming…

S: Yes. [Laughter.]

M: So beautifully polished. On the twenty-first, 'I worked at the desk. I wrote an answer to George Digby's blast at Erna. This was the mid-summer day, and the temperature was in the low fifties.' Noteworthy. [S laughs.]

S: Unhappily written, I can tell. [M laughs.]

M: On June twenty-second, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school about what to do with physical pain—don't fight it, watch it; on the insight of seeing the pain of conflict, etcetera, but not making an insight into a pattern. It was a good talk in spite of a little hay fever, Krishnaji was shining,' it says. 'Narendra and June Minor appeared for the talk and lunch. It seemed they were married yesterday.' Do you remember who Narendra was? Narendra was an Indian boy from Benares and he was the first or second student at Brockwood. Alain Naudé arranged with his father that Narendra should come and study at Brockwood, and Narendra did, and in those days, I think it was even pre-Brockwood, he stayed with the Simmonses, wherever they lived, and by the time Brockwood was started, the Simmonses felt they were in charge of Narendra, but Naudé didn't feel that at all; he felt that it was his responsibility, and that was the start of the trouble between Dorothy and Naudé. Because Naudé, when he arrived, wanted to, oh, I don't know what, take Narendra to art galleries and teach him this and that, and Dorothy said it must have the agreement of the school, he was under the discipline of the school, and Alain couldn't just waltz off with the boy and decide what he was to do. And it became quite a…it never was resolved.

S: But this…Narendra got married?

M: Well, that's the background. Now, this is years later. This is '72; the Naudé-Narendra-Dorothy problem was in 1969. So, by now, Narendra went off and had some schooling in Italy. I forget what happened to him, but he had a girlfriend here called June Minor. This was before your time, and I think she was a little bit older than Narendra, but they were married yesterday. Alain thought that he was going to be a great religious figure, and he turned out to be an accountant, which was hardly what was supposed to happen. Anyway, they were married. 'Krishnaji felt nauseated after supper, and he did not sleep well. His hay fever was bothering him, and probably it wasn't helped by the sun, which came out on the walk.'

On June twenty-third, 'Krishnaji had a quiet morning in bed. Then, we took the 12:45 p.m. from Petersfield. We had a picnic lunch on the train, and were in London at 2 p.m. We went to Huntsman, where Sacha met us, and gave me vouchers for hotel reservations he has kindly made for Krishnaji and me. Krishnaji gave him a treatment'—at Huntsman? Apparently so. 'I fitted black and white tweed skirt at Mr. Hewitt's up the street, went to Hatchards for books, and then to Paul Anstee to look at an armoire; he goes out of business in September.'

S: Paul Anstee was going out of business?

M: Mmm. That was rather a blow. 'Then I went to see a table Mary Links had suggested, and Krishnaji went to Mr. Thompson by taxi, and Mr. Thompson pulled a lower right molar and put in a bridge, all in twenty minutes.'

S: That's quick.

M: 'We went to Waterloo and were home by 4:50 p.m. Krishnaji is relieved to have the tooth out.' Nothing really for the next day. 'Krishnaji was alright after yesterday's dentist visit, and he saw Felix Green. Packing.'

On the twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school, and saw Patrice and brother Ariel'—they were students. More packing. Now, we can switch to the big book.

June twenty-sixth. 'It was packing all day. For once, not too rushed. We both had supper downstairs, and then some of the boys helped me load the car, and as usual, all the school came out to see Krishnaji off. We drove to Southampton and onto the Normandy Ferry. We had comfortable cabins and the crossing was so smooth that I couldn't tell when the ship left the dock.'

On June twenty-seventh. 'We disembarked at 7 a.m. at Le Havre. There was fog on the road. We stopped for breakfast at one of those autoroute places, which have copied all the worst of American coffee shops. Arrived in Paris, and at the Plaza Athénée by 10:30 a.m. I went to see my father. He seems diminished since May. He tires easily, and sleeps most of the time. He seemed glad to see me, but when I described our trip, he couldn't take it in, and said, "But what are you talking about?" Soon, he fell asleep. I rejoined Krishnaji at the Plaza, and we had a fine lunch in the garden. Roland'—that's the maître d'hotel there, and he was also at the Tour d'Argent—'made us welcomed. Later, I had a Chanel fitting, Krishnaji to Lobb and Charvet, but the shirts were not ready. Krishnaji and I went to a Hitchcock movie, Frenzy. Neither of us really liked it. We walked back to the hotel. I went again to see Father, and then Krishnaji and I had supper in our rooms.'

On June twenty-eighth, 'I went back to Charvet, fitted a shirt, and then saw a man at the bank. Marcelle Bondoneau lunched with Krishnaji and me at the Plaza in the garden, and Nadia Kossiakof joined us for coffee at 3 p.m. I went again to see Father. He was sitting in his armchair, and more alert. Did his sad shuffling walk. Back to bed after ten minutes. One foot is twisted; the nurse supports him, and he stops ritually to switch off the light on Olive's portrait'—that's his wife, who was dead—'as he leaves the sitting room. I rejoined Krishnaji at the Plaza and we went for a walk, stopping at Dior for some cologne and Philips for his razor oil.' Razor shopping was always a big thing. [S chuckles.] 'We had supper in our rooms. A crazy woman telephoned from Las Vegas for Krishnaji. I spoke to her. She wants money to make a movie to explain Krishnaji's message.' How did she find us at the Plaza? I suppose Brockwood told her.

The twenty-ninth of June. 'Bud telephoned me from New York at 8:30 a.m. Lisa's baby is in position for birth, the doctor says. So, they wait for it anytime.' This is Lindsay's birth.

S: Oh, yes.

M: 'I reported how Father seemed, and Dr. Thins's expectation, that Father is slowly sinking. They don't expect a sudden change, and Thins will see him on his return from holiday, but predicts Father will not live many months. Thins's predictions have not been notably accurate in matters of time. But that is what he says. Bud talked about business things.' It's all family business.

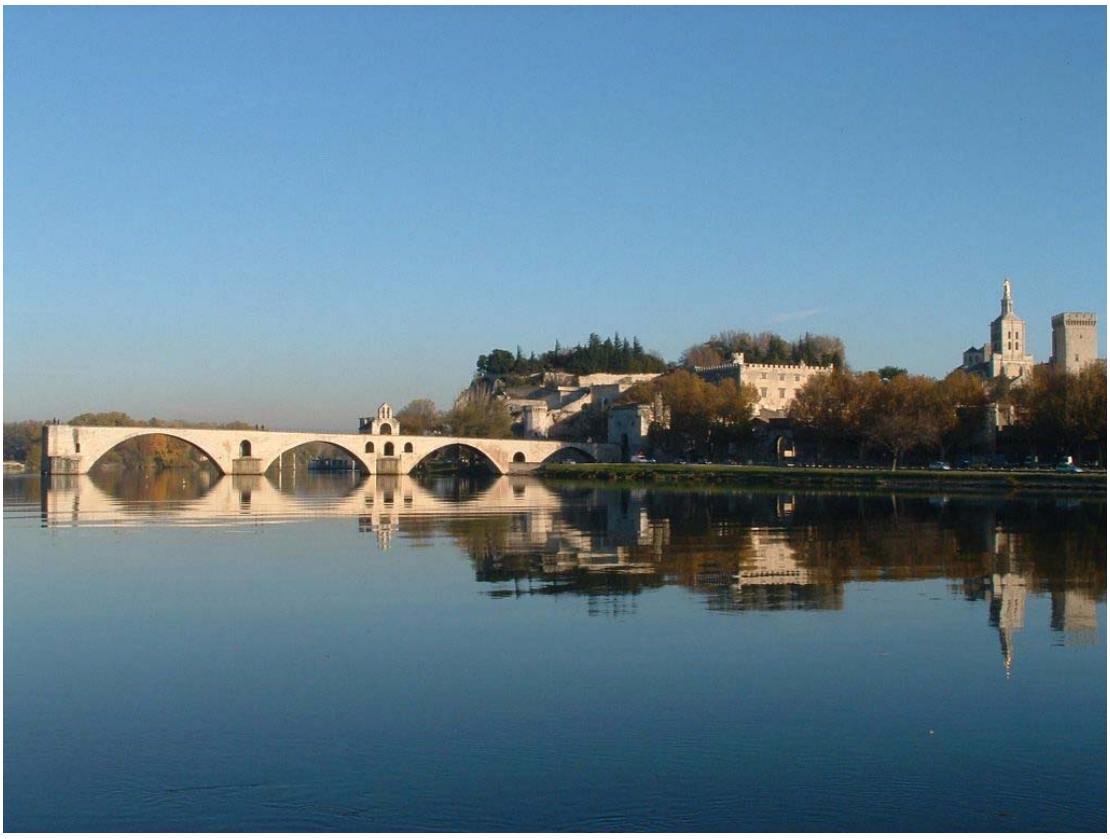
'Mar and Sacha de Manziarly came to see Krishnaji at 10 a.m. We then left the hotel in the Mercedes and stopped at the Tour, where Krishnaji remained in the car.' That's the Tour d'Argent, where Father lived, 'and I had Michel'—that's Father's chauffeur—'supervise the parking while I went up to see Father once more. He looked far away, and it was painful to leave him, though he had fallen asleep before I said goodbye.'

'Krishnaji and I drove from the Tour at noon and found the way to the A6 autoroute beyond Fontainebleau. The country unfurled in great rolling spaces, the beautiful stretches of middle France. Krishnaji was delighted. The Plaza had provided a very expensive and uninteresting picnic. They do not understand sandwiches. [M and S chuckle.] But, we had plenty of fruit and ate it in one of the prettier parking spots off the autoroute. Then on into the afternoon, and rain until we got off the autoroute, and came to Lissieu just north of Lyons by 5:30 p.m. We had rooms at the Réserve, a quiet place. Mine had pink bird wallpaper I had considered for Brockwood. We dined in the dining room. Krishnaji wished to order the normal sequence, not beginning with fruit, as we usually do. So, we had a good meal built around an omelet and haricots verts with a half-bottle of Pouilly-Fuisse, which Krishnaji tasted and then made a wincing face.' [Both laugh.] 'Both slept soundly. No hay fever symptoms for Krishnaji.' [M laughs again.]

The thirtieth of June. 'The rain was gone and it was a lovely summer day with drifting clouds that obligingly made parasols over the car. We left at 10:45 a.m., got off the autoroute at Orange, and found a restaurant for lunch, Le Provençal. Krishnaji was pleased because we had parked the car in a garage, and I was pleased at the restaurant, which was somehow real in the way the various luxurious restaurants aren't. This one could only have been in France. It was rather dark with the bright sun outside and so cool and a refuge. Shabby flowered paper on the walls, and very clean white nappes.

S: Tablecloths.



M: Yes. An ancient, motionless woman at the caisse and the smell of good cooking. We ate melons du pays, so good there was only the rind left. And when the cheese came, we had local ones we had never tasted. Krishnaji chose chevre with rosemary in it. After lunch, we walked to the Roman amphitheater and Krishnaji liked the massive front of it. We drove on to Avignon, but it became very hot and we got caught in traffic jams. We tried to see the Palais des Papes, but within the walls, the city was an ant hive for people and cars, and we escaped after a look out the car window at the Palais. Across the Rhône seeing the bridge, where "l'on y danse, l'on y danse…"' You know? "Sur le Pont d'Avignon, l'on y danse, l'on y danse…"[4]

S: Ah, yes. Yes. [M chuckles.]

Roman Amphitheater in Orange, France

Le Pont d'Avignon

M: 'We got to Villeneuve-lès-Avignon and found our hotel, Le Prieuré.' All these reservations had been made by Sacha through the French tourist office in London. 'Krishnaji had a room on one side of the hotel, and I on the other, but they were cool and comfortable, and a refuge after the traffic. We rested, and I bathed, and we had dinner at 7 p.m. in the garden. Krishnaji elegant in his infinite dignity and grace. I watched all this, diagnosing the other diners' ills from the fact that they ate too much [S laughing], and meat.'

S: Of course.

M: '"Don't they know it's bad for them?" There was a wind that made the leaves swim in the trees, and we slept early.'

Saturday, the first of July. 'It was a bright cloudless morning. We left Le Prieuré at 11 a.m., and drove westward, looking for Pont du Gard. At one point, Krishnaji said "Turn here, turn here," with such vehemence that I felt struck down and shaking. He startled me as though I were about to run over a child, and being so open to him, it was devastating. I could hardly drive for a while, but we came to the Pont—a Roman aqueduct built at the time of Augustus, huge and splendid. Krishnaji liked it. We drove toward Nîmes, the country reminded both of us of California, and so did the bright Provençal light. At Nîmes, we found La Maison Carrée, and found it beautiful, saw the amphitheater, then drove on. Krishnaji navigating by the map to Aigues-Mortes in the Camargue. We left the car outside and walked through the fortress walls into the tiny town…

S: To where?

M: Aigues Mortes…it's in the Camargue, right down at the bottom of France.

S: Yes, I've been to the Camargue several times, but not Aigues Mortes.

M: It's a little old town. It looked as though it were built for very small people, lived in, and defended by them until the sea capriciously withdrew from it, leaving it no longer the port that Saint Louis had built to launch his crusade. The shops where we hoped to buy cheese and fruit were closed for the noon hour, so we had to sit at a café in the square, where a grudging waiter brought us our small orders. It was a bit noisy, and Krishnaji curled in distaste. We ate and left, and his head began to hurt him from such a place. We drove then across the Camargue to Nîmes. Less wild than we had imagined, even the marshes with its rice growing and a couple of horses. But there were des mas…' Do you know what's meant by "mas"? Oh, farmhouses. 'But it was no wilderness.

At Arles, we found the amphitheater, and went on to Les Baux and the hotel, L'Ostraus de Baumaniére, three stars, and luxe. We had rooms in the manoir, quiet, with a terrace and a little pool. We rested, bathed, and went up to the hotel for dinner of elegant excellence. The artichauts came in a purée, and there were fifty cheeses. But there was a vulgarity in some of the clients—tough Americans. Luxury must go with grace, or it becomes vulgarity. We drove up to and looked at the illuminated rocks of Les Baux above, and then came down and went early to bed.'

Church of Cavaillon

The next day was the second of July. It was another cloudless morning and we left the Baumaniére at 10:30 a.m., and drove toward Cavaillon, stopping at a village where a food shop was open. We bought goat cheese, bread, olives, and biscuits, peaches, apricots, and cherries for our lunch. The country was Van Gogh country—rows of black-green cypresses. There was a wind blowing, and when we drove through tunnels of touching trees, the leaves were green-flowing waters over our head. The bright quality of light kept bringing my eye to Van Gogh and Cézanne.

At Cavaillon, we took the autoroute north because we had a good way to go to reach Geneva. The wind was a gale, head on, and the car had to be held like a ship. North of Valence, we left the autoroute gladly and took a road through Romans, Chambéry. Gradually the country changed. Provence was gone, and there was a northern look and quality of the air and light. We drove up a lane and ate our picnic.' [M quietly says "I remember that."] 'It was almost cold. A family parked nearby and also ate. Krishnaji, in order to stretch and not drop crumbs in the car, stood outside to eat, with that far-off child's stance he has, a child absorbed in something. At such times, he has the look of "that boy" that was and always has been the slight figure of grace off in his own perception.' 'We drove on, taking a road that led through Rumilly, past Aix-les-Bains, that reminded me of an absurd Christmas years ago.' We'd gone there—why, god knows—Sam and I and a whole group of people.

S: Oh, really?

M: To Aix-les-Bains for Christmas, which is closed then. [S laughs loudly.] So, we went back to London, as far as I can remember.

S: Well, I've been to Aix-les-Bains when it's been open, and there's not much there then, either.

M: No, no. I went there as a child and remembered a…

S: Yes, well, it has that feeling of kind of Belle Époque—it was grand a long time ago…[Laughs]

M: According to Sacha's excellent planning, on a small road that led to the Swiss border at Saint-Julien-en-Genevois, the Haute Savoie country was utterly unspoiled, fields of farms, trees and hills turning to mountains, the shape of the farmhouses massive against the winters is like the best of the old Swiss. At the border, I put through the papers, for the Chanel tweeds, saving many francs thereby. We came immediately down into Geneva and were once again in the little narrow efficient rooms at the Hotel du Rhône. We went out for a walk, watched the Jet d'Eau, and came back to supper in the rooms.

The historic abreuvoir (fresh water trough) at Place de la Libération square, Saint-Julien-en-Genevois

During the day driving through the Savoie, there were signs "Jesus sauve" [both laugh]. Krishnaji pointed to the first and said, "Oh, Jesus!" Then we came to one that read "Jésus est là" said Krishnaji, "Bons, j'y suis."' [Both M and S laughing.] I didn't know it until later, but today, in New York, at ten minutes to five, Lisa's baby was born, a boy weighing six pounds, at the Presbyterian Hospital.

On July third, 'Narasimhan telephoned, and I telephoned to Vanda at Tannegg. We went out to get a present for Fosca. I turned my foot and fell. I managed to walk back to the hotel, getting an Ace bandage to do my foot and ankle up. Went by taxi with Krishnaji to Patek. We returned to the hotel, when Narasimhan joined us for a short visit. He left and we had lunch at the hotel. Then, in the Mercedes, which I could drive with my right foot, the uninjured one, we went first to Jacquet, where Krishnaji ordered two ties while I drove around the block, and from there to Patek to pick up his Naviquartz. After that, we drove via the lac and through Lausanne to the Oron road that comes down a long straight hill, and at last to Gstaad by 5:30 p.m., and 1,013 miles from Brockwood a week ago.' 'Vanda and Fosca were there, and it was lovely to see them both. Krishnaji unpacked a little and then went to bed. I unpacked, too, in spite of my foot. The good of putting everything away in order is necessary. Then bed, for I am tired physically.'

On July fourth, 'I put everything in place. Krishnaji stayed in bed all day. I did some necessary shopping in the village and some desk necessities. I found some detective novels for Krishnaji, ordered the paper, and magazines, and at 5 p.m. went with Vanda to Dr. Sollberger, who X-rayed the foot, pronounced torn ligaments, and did it up in tight elastic bandage. It felt alright until night when I awoke repeatedly with pain as the blood pressure dropped and the tight bandage prevented circulation.' The next day, 'Frances McCann came to lunch and Krishnaji remained in bed.'

July sixth. 'Krishnaji is still resting in bed. Vanda invited Martha Crego to lunch'—she's a woman who lives in Ojai—'wanting me to give her some of the facts of our side of the Rajagopal case. Martha said she wasn't on Rajagopal's side, but defended him in every instance. She said everything was smooth until newcomers, (i.e., Naudé, Lilliefelts, and Zimbalist) came along, then a lawsuit. I explained ten years' of Krishnaji's effort to get information from Rajagopal before any of us appeared. But he sent money, she said. She has no concept of the roots of all this, except what Mima Porter has told her, and she defends her own opinion. She said Noyes (that's Colonel Noyes) told her that Krishnaji's insistence on the archives killed Rajagopal's 1968 offer. She couldn't see why Krishnaji should have any rights to his own archives. About Rajagopal's refusal to give Krishnaji his manuscript, it was "because Rajagopal didn't want Naudé to have it." Endless resistance to Krishnaji's side of the fence. It was a tiresome waste to talk to her. "I'll tell her," said Krishnaji later. But why should he waste his energies on these ambivalent people who trail around the world after him and yet side with his enemies? "Rajagopal has always been…" etcetera, they say, as if that makes it right.

On July seventh, 'Vanda went to Lausanne for the day. Krishnaji got up for lunch, walked down the hill and had his hair cut, then came to the bank and cosigned a new account at the Banque Cantonale de Bern to be called Teaching Trust account. It replaces the one held in my name for his personal expenditures. The Swiss have just made a restriction on foreign accounts. They are charging 8% a year on deposits made after the thirtieth of June. The pound sterling floating and the dollar speculation are troublesome. Krishnaji was uncomfortable being down in the village. People recognize him right and left and the isolation of this week in his room seemed to have removed some protective layers. He was tired and he came up the hill.

After supper, Krishnaji, Vanda, and I talked till quite late about the early days. Mrs. Besant, Leadbeater's discovery of the boy, and the so-called instructions from Masters reported by Leadbeater on how the boy was to be cared for. Krishnaji was in high form, laughing, told most of it. "Listen to this, signora; when he traveled, there was to be always two initiates, one to have a compartment on one side of him, and one on the other, so if there were an accident, they would be killed."' [Laughter.]

S: I can see Krishnaji enjoying that story. [M laughing.]

M: It was as well we talked so late, as at 10:30, Bud rang from New York. He hadn't heard from me and realized I had not got his cable on Monday. He had tried to telephone and had gotten no answer, so cabled. Well, anyway, I spoke to Lisa, too. They were calling from the Presbyterian Hospital. I never heard happier voices, Bud's with a note of wonder: "There is this little boy,"' [chuckle], 'and Lisa saying for the first time in her life she had done something well; all other times she told herself she should have done better.'

On the ninth of July, 'Krishnaji remained in bed, and I worked at the desk. The carrot beyond my nose is to get caught up. I telephoned Paris and heard from Solange about Father's smile at hearing he had a grandson. Bud and Lisa plan to take the baby to see him in October. Alan Kishbaugh rang this morning. He's in London, as I had asked him to, and I briefed him on the situation with George Digby, about the handling of publications in the U.S. I wanted Kishbaugh to know all this before he meets them. He seemed to understand and should handle it all with tact. He goes with Mary L. and Amanda'—that's Mary's daughter—'to see Brockwood on Tuesday. Will arrive here on Friday.' Now I have to go to the little book.

On the tenth of July, 'the doctor fixed my foot. Errands with Vanda, deskwork. Krishnaji went for a walk. Had some bronchial congestion, but not too bad. Yves Zlotnitska took my Sanyo calculator to Basel and got the recharger, so it works.'

The eleventh of July 'was a cold, wet day. I fetched cough medicine for Krishnaji.' The next day was 'a wintry day. Krishnaji remained in bed except for his walk in afternoon. Cough medicine is making him too sleepy. Vanda and I stopped it for a day. Gave him one Benadryl antihistamine tablet in the evening. I worked at the desk all day, except for going for the newspaper. Moser sent for the Mercedes for repairs, scratches he put on it, coming to Paris in May. He left an orange VW for use until Monday.'

On the thirteenth, 'Krishnaji remained in bed except for his walk. I went to Dr. Sollberger again. The foot is better. Did errands in p.m. Vanda asked me to talk to Guido Franco with his usual request to film Krishnaji, and Vanda told Krishnaji that Martha Crego is all upset. How can a man like Krishnaji be involved in a court case? Krishnaji now feels he must talk to her. Why must the people who bring their hostility and aggressiveness to Krishnaji take up so much of his time?'

S: You know, this is an aside, perhaps, but I often found Vanda insensitive in that way, I must say, to foist this lady on Krishnaji. It's the kind of thing that I didn't see much of, but I felt was often there, that was a great…

M: I think in some ways, and I can't be definite about this, but there was quite a lot of feeling and I think Vanda had some of it, that Krishnaji shouldn't be bothered with all these things. And Rajagopal has done a good enough job in some ways, that Krishnaji shouldn't have had the court case—"leave it all to Rajagopal, that's not your business…"

S: Yes, I know.

M: "… he's doing everything all right. Leave it alone. Don't be involved in it." And when Krishnaji did get involved, she disapproved, I think. There was a flavor of that; I don't want to be too categorical about it. And so, maybe this reflects a bit of that feeling.

So, now we go to July fourteenth. 'Guido Franco'—oh, he…[S chuckling] plagued me. [M chuckles.] Guido, well, let's see what it says here. 'Guido Franco, hippy-ish, Italian, Swiss, was again pushing the film he began two summers ago about the Saanen Gatherings. Last year, he had run-ins with Graf, the Lilliefelts, and me about it. Yesterday, he came to see Vanda, who asked me to talk to him. He more or less repeated the previous conversations. He wishes to own the film and control it, and we fail to see why Krishnaji should be used for Franco's purposes. Krishnaji saw him in the hall and shook hands in greeting, saying again he would have to agree with the Foundation on it if he was to do something. Franco promptly twisted this to be a take-off agreement to do it, and expected agreement from me. So this morning, Krishnaji told him that KF upholds the copyright, etcetera, and to submit a memo of what he intends to do, and we would consider it. On top of this turn and unnecessary effort for Krishnaji, he decided to talk to Martha Crego because Vanda reports Crego is still harping on about Krishnaji's going to court, etcetera. Nothing I explained to her, for two hours the other day, has sunk in at all, as I knew it wouldn't. So, from 1 to 2 p.m., while he should have been eating lunch quietly, he had to talk to her. Why these hostile and aggressive people should be able to claim his attention and energy is something that riles me. Crego said, "all of them, Mima, too," are Theosophists, as though this had some positive significance.

So we had late lunch, and Krishnaji went back to bed. I went to check Chalet Choucas for Alan Kishbaugh's arrival. Visited the tent, which is more spacious and looked very nice. Put supplies in for Alan Kishbaugh, and then met him at the train. He comes from London, where he met for a short time with Mary L. and Mary C., the Digbys, but in spite of an optimistic letter to me by Mary Cadogan that George was about to ask Alan Kishbaugh to do the publishing negotiations, of course, George didn't do it, and Alan Kishbaugh says he doesn't know where he is with the whole thing. I felt the combination of a physical shock from my fall in Geneva and the pressure of contentious people, also angering communications with Vanda, which is a very foggy area. I welcomed her suggestions and advice, and yet they often slide into the impossible. "Why can't you have groups of young people?"—but Krishnaji mustn't do extras. "Why don't you invite Narasimhan to stay?"—he's in the U.S.' Is this making sense, the way I read it?

S: Well, we'll see how it reads.

M: [laughs] 'This is my difficulty communicating about certain things with Vanda. Explaining about the Guido Franco plan not being to Krishnaji's advantage, and the possible harm, she says, she sees no harm. "What does it matter?" she says. "Let him…" Nothing but, "why do you get upset…" Anyhow, all this was a bit much today, mostly because moving has become a constant pain of some damn bone or muscle, and I am tired. Lay down and read for a while, and felt better. Fetched Alan Kishbaugh to Tannegg for supper, and Vanda in some unnecessary assumption that she shouldn't be there, so we could talk business, didn't come to the table.'

Editor's Note: This is about as much as we ever hear of Mary complaining about the constant pain she was in from one thing or another. I once saw her suffering for several days trying to walk with a completely broken leg, because she didn't think it was serious. The surgeon was surprised she could stand the pain.

I don't like putting in something that might seem anti-Vanda, because I never have felt that.

S: It's just the way it was for you then, Mary.

M: I know, but, I was just venting my…exasperation…

S: Well, that's all right, you're allowed to vent.

M: [long sigh] Well, Saturday fifteenth of July. 'During breakfast, Al Blackburn turned up with a letter from Vigeveno to Krishnaji, which Blackburn could only give to Krishnaji personally, lest I destroy it, presumably,' it says here, [laughs], 'so Krishnaji had to get out of bed and come out to Blackburn, and he had to listen to Blackburn tell him how much trouble they were having finding a place to live. When he left, Krishnaji came in the dining room where Vanda and I were, and gave me the letter, asking me to read it, and to tell him what it was. He said he didn't want to touch it. The letter said that he, Vigeveno, had seen the Brockwood film and at the end, when asked why he taught, Krishnaji had replied, "I think out of affection." So, was it affection to attack his lifelong friend Rajagopal, to go to lawyers, etcetera. From At the feet of the Master to the Ventura courthouse.' This is a kind of snide stuff…

S: Jesus!

M: Much belaboring of Krishnaji and his own words on love, affection, truth, etcetera.

S: We're running out of tape, so we'll have to come back and do this entry.

M: Why don't you cut it off at the end of whatever that sentence makes sense?

S: Okay.

M: And I'll mark it here.

Issue 24: July 15, 1972 to August 23, 1972

This issue takes place in Switzerland where Krishnaji is giving his annual Saanen talks and discussions.

As well as descriptions of the talks, Mary describes an outing to a hotel where Krishnaji had stayed with his brother in the 1920s and again in 1957. The poignant details of the second stay illustrate the conflict with Rajagopal which continues as a theme throughout this issue.

Towards the end of this issue Mary's father dies, which she describes with her characteristic quiet dignity. This leads to glimpses of Krishnaji's thoughts on mortality.

Mary: Alright. We left off on July fifteenth, 1972. There was a letter from Vigeveno. And Krishnaji didn't want to read it.

Scott: Yes. He gave it to you.

M: And he gave it to me and asked me to read it, and tell him what was in it. He didn't want to touch it. The letter said that Vigeveno 'had seen the Brockwood film, and at the end of the film, when asked why he taught, Krishnaji had replied, "I think out of affection."'

So, this is typical of Vigeveno's letters: '"So, was it affection to attack" his lifelong friend Rajagopal? To go to lawyers, etcetera. "From the Feet of the Master[1] to the Ventura Courthouse" is the way Vigeveno put it. There was much belaboring of Krishnaji with his own words on love, affection, truth, etcetera. Then, an underlined phrase about "It still being possible to settle out of court." This from the man'—this is obviously Rajagopal talking through Vigeveno—'who refused the attorney general's request to discuss a settlement. The hypocrisy of these people is boundless,' I wrote.

'Krishnaji then wanted to go to see the tent, and so on the way I had the Vigeveno letter photocopied and sent it to Sol Rosenthal for evaluation in case the letter is an oblique, very remote settlement feeler that is keeping Rajagopal outside of things. Krishnaji was pleased to look at the tent and we went to the camping site and saw the Simmonses, who safely arrived last night after a rather limping trip in which the Land Rover had failed repeatedly.'

S: Are you paraphrasing it, or reading it?

M: Both.

S: No [laughing], no. Read it.

M: Why?

S: It's got much more a flavor of authenticity when you read it.

M: Who's to say?

S: Me. I can tell. [Laughs.]

M: I don't like rereading things precisely. I always change them if I'm writing them.

S: Well, I know, but this is different.

M: I'm talking, I'm not writing.

S: But it doesn't…it sounds…

M: Alright, I'll read it. 'We went to the tent; I mean we went to the Simmonses, and then we came back, and I returned to pick up the Biascoecheas at Saanen, at the Saanerhof, and also Alan Kishbaugh for lunch. Before lunch, Krishnaji called Enrique, Isabel, and me to his room. Sitting in a Japanese orange silk kimono, looking suddenly very young and in his extraordinary beauty and speaking very intensely, he said he wanted to apologize for getting Enrique into the spot he was in when he gave his deposition. He said that if he had known what Enrique had been through with Rajagopal back then, he would have told Enrique not to try to protect him. Krishnaji said that he knows now that all that had happened was engineered by Rajagopal and Rosalind in order to hold onto him. Enrique said that that is what he had thought, too. After lunch, the Biascoecheas talked privately to me about Faria, who seems to be going off the deep end. He's suspicious, quarrelsome, inclined to be a dictator, resenting any friendly words in letters written by Enrique to Mary Cadogan, etcetera. No one can work with Faria, Enrique says, and Faria is willing to resign if Krishnaji asks him to, as it was Krishnaji who had appointed him. Enrique also quoted ugly remarks by Faria against the Lilliefelts, in particular against Theo, saying that he is "a Jew" and after the KWINC money for himself, and when he gets it, he will be worse than Rajagopal.' Faria really was a horror.

S: Who was he?

M: He was a tough Puerto Rican lawyer, and Biascoechea brought him into our circle, and, as it says here, I think, Erna wanted the opinion of another tough lawyer about the case. And so, he was consulted, and then he became part of the Fundación. Krishnaji asked him to join it. 'Enrique also said he thought that I realized this, at which I told the Biascoecheas exactly what I had thought of Faria in the very beginning when he behaved so boorishly here at Brockwood in 1970 with remarks about gringos, etcetera, and that when the Lilliefelts wanted his advice, I had said I would not want to be represented by such a man. They felt in need of another hardheaded legal opinion, and I went along with that and agreed to his coming. And when he had tried to be helpful, coming all that way, I'd expressed thanks and appreciation of that as thoroughly as I could. I told them too of his suspicions of me when I spoke alone with Sol after we had met in Sol's office.'

‘I don’t want to make a platform out of my being right on all this, but my distrust of Faria was consistent from the beginning. How far should I push it when I feel sure of something like this?’

Sunday the sixteenth of July. ‘It was a clear day for Krishnaji’s first talk. Vanda went with Mrs. Walsh’—she’s the woman who lived downstairs—‘to the tent. She also took Frau Erkelenz, the owner of the chalet upstairs. Krishnaji and I drove via Saanen. The tent looked dignified, well ordered, and was nearly full. I sat in the last row where Vanda and Doris Pratt had saved me a seat.’

‘Krishnaji began with, “I wonder why you have all come. To be given something? To find something? And who is it that wants to get it?” Later, he said, “Intelligence is energy as application.” A very good opening talk and he stopped on the instant of an hour, saying he would continue Tuesday. He walked out and up the road, pursued by Guido Franco and a movie camera. He hadn’t bothered to wait for our answer or permission to film Krishnaji. I interrupted him with Alan Kishbaugh’s name and number and told him he was a trustee of KFA and to talk to him. Krishnaji had had a slight cough at the beginning, but did not seem too tired. He had lunch in bed. Vanda said he looked smaller on the platform, and she figured out it was his face because of the hair combed over the forehead. Combed back, it looked much better. It meant cutting the long side pieces and Krishnaji said we both agreed it would be done.’ [Chuckles.] ‘He wanted to do it immediately with narrow scissors but was persuaded to wait for a barber.’ [M chuckles again.]

‘He walked with Vanda later and returned to bed. She and I did pranayama before dinner. She is an excellent teacher. Yesterday, she gave me a refund of the deposit I paid last year on the summer rental. That has made us equal on our 1969 agreement to share costs at Tannegg. But each year, she evades my paying. Last year, I put the correct amount in her Gstaad bank account and will have to do it again this year as she has paid the balance for 1972 and the deposit for 1973. She goes to Rome in the morning. Paola, John, and the children arrive there from Sardinia for a few days before going to New Haven and moving to Toronto.’

The seventeenth of July. ‘Vanda left by train. Alan Kishbaugh saw Guido Franco about the filming. Krishnaji meanwhile said Franco had broken the agreement by filming him yesterday, and he doesn’t want him to continue. As Alan Kishbaugh had asked Franco to draw up a more realistic proposal, we will await that before replying. I asked Alan K. to use the room downstairs vacated by Vanda and he will move up tomorrow. The Mercedes refused to start. Krishnaji went down to the village by taxi to have his hair cut short. It looks very nice. No long ear-like pieces to bother him when the wind blows and now the shape of his forehead shows. Proportions are right, and there is a new glimpse of beauty. That beauty referred to in a review by Cyril Connolly in the London Sunday Times yesterday, and Jacob Needleman’s book The New Religions. “People,” he said, “who have seen Krishnaji inevitably speak of his extraordinary beauty to which is now added the fragility of age.” Krishnaji read this and seemed surprised at the rest of it, which speaks highly of him. Krishnaji knows who Connolly is; he says he's a friend of Mary Links.'

S: Hm.

M: Tuesday, the eighteenth. 'Krishnaji had slept little because of congestion in his head, but this day was not lacking in energy. It was clear and warm, and he wore the brown linen Givenchy trousers with a new Charvet shirt that has a tiny pattern of checks that gave it a faint pinkish tone. With the hair, at last, cut, looking more natural and somehow much younger, he was looking marvelously. The Mercedes, which had not started yesterday, had spent the night at a garage, and was delivered at 8 a.m. I drove the garage man back. There was a carrot hazelnut cake for lunch; the village is clean and only a few people were in the shop at that hour. There was the pleasant light of a summer morning. Krishnaji and I drove again via Saanen to the tent. The trees make a shadow on the road, and Krishnaji said, "I like this way." He gave his second talk, a truly great one. Spoke of insight, which is intelligence, seeing without conclusion; the mind without conclusions is without fear. The only security is that of intelligence and insight, a talk with many things in it and tremendous power. Again, he walked rapidly up the road pursued by Franco with his film camera. Kishbaugh is to tell Franco he may not shoot in the tent or otherwise, decided by Krishnaji and the Foundation.'

'We drove to Gstaad slowly. "The body is too excited" to go back to Tannegg immediately. When we did, there were letters from Erna about the Ventura lawyer, Mr. Cohen, who will be the local attorney with Rosenthal, and another letter from my brother,' well, it goes on about my brother.

'After reading the mail, I went down and picked up Alan K., who moved his things into the downstairs apartment and also brought Radha Burnier[2] up for lunch. This was Krishnaji's first meal at the table since our arrival. He told her some of the Rajagopal case events and the background to it. In fact, he took no rest but talked till 4 p.m., when he went for a walk with Alan K., and I drove Radha—as she wishes me to call her—back to her hotel. She's here till Saturday. After the walk, we had tea, and Krishnaji sat and talked with Alan K. and me until 7 o'clock, somewhat on supernatural things: his sense of unease when doctors come and when he is outside at night. Once in Ashdown Forest, he was walking alone and it became dark, and he felt he was being followed, and he reached the house exhausted and had to be put to bed "for several days." Last year in Madras, he came to a temple as the light was fading and felt the threat. He stood and watched, and "said something."'

'Then I asked, "a particular thing?"'

'Krishnaji replied, "Yes, a particular thing. And gradually, it oozed away." I didn't ask him then what it was he said, but he spoke earlier of the Christians making the sign of the cross, the Hindus uttering the word "om" to ward off evil'—he had spoken earlier about those two things. He told too of being asked, when young, to heal a "possessed" woman. He went to see her, and she looked up at him and became quiet and normal. He told of Jayalakshmi going one night alone to a temple felt to be very holy, and feeling great danger there, so that she fled to her car and went home. Krishnaji said it is not supposed to be good to talk of "dark powers," as it somehow gives them energy. He says these things as an "on dit"[3]—gossip, but he says too one mustn't tamper with such things, and he does have his unease about being out at night, and an extra precaution being necessary for those around him, as if we were his protection, in part, and therefore liable to attack by whatever is evil. Evil is attracted to goodness, wanting to destroy it. Alan K. talked of the odd sense of threat when he camped in an Indian burial ground and it ceasing when he put on a Hopi medicine man's bracelet. Alan K. said to me at supper he feels the sense of being there to protect Krishnaji when he is with him.'

July twentieth. 'A letter was sent by Maître Mueller, the notary public and something like a mayor of the area, and Graf to Guido Franco, saying that he was not to film. It seems no one can film, tape, or even be in the tent if the Saanen Gatherings Committee refuses them permission, since it is not a public meeting as we do not charge an entrance fee. Alan K. told Franco that it was decided upon by Krishnaji and the Foundations not to allow his filming, but Franco said he would go ahead anyway as his lawyer told him he could, hence we had to get Maître Mueller to stop Franco.' I remember he kept saying, "I am a Swiss citizen. I can go where I like."

'In addition, Krishnaji began his talk today, number three, by requesting no filming, taping, or taking notes, as it disturbs others. The talk was on thought, what are its uses, and its destructive effect in relationship. He spoke with enormous energy. Afterward, he wanted to drive, and we went to Saanenmöser and back, then picked up Radha Burnier, who lunched with us. Krishnaji asked her various questions on mantra, yoga, Hindu beliefs, immortality, etcetera. Afterward, I took her back to her hotel, did errands, and was back when de Marxov came to tea. Krishnaji walked alone. He came back physically tired but looking well. His haircut is such an improvement, and today's costume, faintly pinkish shirt, the buff-beige linen Givenchy trousers, cream-colored socks and brown Belgian moccasins, made him as well-dressed for summer as he is in all his Huntsman suits. [Chuckles.] There is a glow, a shine, to him. No news yet of the Lilliefelts, who should have arrived today.'

'On the twenty-first, the Lilliefelts arrived and they came for lunch. We talked all afternoon. Isabel Biascoechea brought a Spanish woman who was hysterical to see Krishnaji. He calmed her somewhat by placing his hands on her head and told her husband to take her away from here, to take her to the movies, away from all this. They had been to some meeting before coming here, and people attempted some kind of prolonged meditation.'

The next day, there was nothing interesting. 'Krishnaji went for a walk alone. Yvon Achard and Jean-Pierre Gaillard came to talk to me about French books being too expensive for students, and the need for resumption of the Bulletin. They are for Linssen doing it. I told them to talk to the French committee.'

On the twenty-third was 'Krishnaji's fourth Saanen talk. Extremely good. We drove to Lauenen afterward, taking Alan K. At lunch, there were the Moorheads and Balasundaram, who arrived yesterday and is staying with them. He brought oil, pickles, and almond halva to Krishnaji. Told Krishnaji at lunch of going to Madhavachari, and talking to him about Vasanta Vihar, its ownership by the Stichting, and that this was all complicated by the lawsuit. It seems that for some reason, Vasanta Vihar is owned by the Stichting.'

S: This was all part of Rajagopal's shell game, wasn't it…?

M: Yes. Yes.

S: Where some organization would get ownership of something and then ownership would transfer and…

M: 'KF India could facilitate getting the present caretaker out. KFA would have to bring suit to gain that position, now that the Stichting has given its ownership to KFA. Balasundaram got Madhavachari as far as Pupul's door at Bombay to talk it over, but he wouldn't go in.' See, Madhavachari claimed that he had power of attorney from Rajagopal, therefore, he could only do what Rajagopal said. But, it was proved that Rajagopal didn't have rights to Vasanta Vihar. It was endlessly complicated, but anyway, 'Krishnaji asked Balasundaram why Madhavachari was acting this way. Balasundaram guesses it was his allegiance to Rajagopal. Krishnaji said the loss of his son'—that's Madhavachari's son—'had embittered Madhavachari, but Balasundaram said he was over that. From my view, Madhavachari has been consistently Rajagopal's man all along and has been so well before the son died. But, Krishnaji realizes Madhavachari doesn't tell the truth. Krishnaji brought up the book Tradition and Revolution, edited by Pupul and Sunanda, the 1970–71 discussions with Krishnaji, that Mary couldn't edit, and which Alan K. said was so poorly edited it shouldn't be sold in the West. It is very nice-looking and well put together, but I have not read the text.'

Monday, the twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji had a cable from Pupul Jayakar that her husband died. I sent a reply cable from Krishnaji, Balasundaram, and myself. Alan K. and I drove to Bern, to the U.S. Consulate, to have notarization of our signatures as trustees on escrow papers for the KFA sale of a little house they inherited in Ojai. Then, we drove over to the center of the city and lunched and waited for the shops to reopen at 2 p.m. I bought socks for Krishnaji and material for slacks for me. I drove back to Gstaad in time for Alan to walk with Krishnaji, and me to have an ultrasound treatment on my foot, which continues swollen and sore.'

Tuesday, the twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji's fifth Saanen talk, and it was on suffering, conflict, and finally pleasure and joy. He spoke with almost explosive energy. We drove to Château D'Oex afterward and got back just before a letter from Sol Rosenthal on Vigeveno's letter. Sol says Vigeveno's letter could be a feeler for a settlement, and he advises how to reply if Krishnaji wishes to acknowledge it. Balasundaram and the Moorheads came for lunch. Pupul wants copyrights shared between the Foundations. These things tend to be raised again as soon as they are settled.' [Chuckles.]

S: Don't we know it?

M: Mmm. 'At 4 p.m., Nadia Kossiakof brought Mlle. Delachaux of Delachaux et Niestlé, the French-Swiss publisher, to see Krishnaji. She wants to do a livre de poche[4] and a hardcover and wanted suggestions. We discussed it a little and I referred her to George Digby. Krishnaji came in dressed in jeans and a grey sweater. Mlle. Delachaux asked him if he was a mystic, and Krishnaji recoiled in distaste. "What is a mystic?" Krishnaji said it implied search, and explained the projections of the Catholics having mystical experiences of Jesus, of the Hindus of Krishna, or whatever; all is within conditioning; a religious mind must be outside all that. She asked about intuition, which Krishnaji always finds dangerous as a word. "That may be only a projection," he said. "What is the subconscious?" Krishnaji replied, "the repository of conditioning." He said, "Thought, other than technical thought, divides," and she couldn't see that. He explained about nationalities, religions, etcetera, all products of thought, and so it went. Through all this, he sat with a relaxed grace of a young boy. Once again, I was watching the extraordinary beauty of face, posture, gesture, expression. Because he was tired, he was hesitant in his replies in French, in which the conversation had gone. But he addressed himself with total attention to her questions, and at the same time, he had an informality that enhanced his grace. Apart from all he said, there is an ascetic experience in seeing him that is limitless.'

'I drove the two women down to the Bernerhof, went to get The Economist and some detectives for Krishnaji, and had the surprise of finding him waiting for me at the foot of the hill by the bridge, thumbing a ride with me. [Chuckles, S laughs lightly.] He had started on his walk up the hill toward the woods, felt tired, and so came down hoping to catch me. He had been there a minute when I came by, as if something neatly arranged it. We came back and had verveine tisane[5] and then he went to bed and I had supper alone and also went to bed early.' [Soft chuckle.]

Wednesday, the twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji, before breakfast, dictated a reply to the Vigeveno letter, keeping my and Rosenthal's suggestions. It was on the whole alright, but to me, too long; and as Vigeveno's letter was essentially insulting, it dignified it too much. Once dictated, Krishnaji kept revising it, toning it down, to be discussed with Erna and Theo when he sees them. I went for an ultrasonic treatment for the foot, to the bank for the new restrictions on foreign accounts,' and it goes on about what they are. 'Frances McCann and Cragnolini came for lunch. I took Alan K. to Rougemont about a leather rucksack he wanted. I was tired. Biascoechea came at 4 p.m. to talk to Krishnaji about Faria, Faria's anger against Sendra, and, by now, against Enrique. Faria can't work with the present board. They told Krishnaji, and I've told the Lilliefelts this morning, about his calling Theo a Jew, a Jesuit, and that Theo was after the KWINC money. Krishnaji is to write a letter accepting Faria's resignation and, temporarily, Enrique will be president of the Fundación. It turns out now that Biascoecheas didn't know Faria very well before they vouched for him and promoted him to head their group. Bad judgment on their part, and I should perhaps have voiced my own conviction that he was unsuitable more strongly. Talked later to Erna; they are, of course, shocked by it all.'

The twenty-seventh of July. 'Krishnaji's sixth Saanen talk. Again, a blazing energy. He said later that he had no idea what he was going to say when he sat down. Seeking of security in various ways: "without happiness you cannot learn."' That's a quote. 'Death, insight to examine what it is to live without fear. Learning. He said, "there were some new things."' That's a quote from him. Sometimes after a talk, he would say, "Did you notice there were some new things?"

S: Yes, yes.

M: 'The Digbys arrived last night. The Lilliefelts, Mary Cadogan, Alan K. all came for lunch. Krishnaji said Olga,'—that was a maid we had helping Fosca—'was too slow and he managed the lunch himself, passing plates, etcetera. We then had an all-afternoon rather epic meeting, in which it was decided, at last, that Alan K., now elected to the Publications Committee, should handle all negotiations with U.S. publishers. Digby agreed.' That's underlined because Digby wasn't going to agree initially. [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji pushed for the decision and underlined every step of the procedure so that no misunderstandings could occur. I went on to the story of the realignment of the English Foundation and Brockwood and the financial problems it creates. Until the Smalley case is settled…' What was the Smalley case? I can't remember at the moment.

S: Who was it a case against?

M: Well, there's something to do with, I think, somebody's will, or something.

S: But which foundation, the KFA or the KFT?

M: KFT, I think.

S: Huh, the Smalley Case. I never heard of it.

M: I guess it was. I don't remember this. Then it says, 'Erna explained once again the KFA's position with regard to money sent to England.' That was a problem. The English couldn't get it through their heads that the KFA couldn't just send its money to England, that the money donated to an American charity has to be used for the purposes of that American charity and not in a foreign country. So, that was awkward, for ages. They just couldn't understand it, or didn't want to understand it. 'And it was finally decided to send $10,000 of the Frances McCann money, which will go ultimately to the Cloisters building, but is to be used temporarily for Brockwood school expenses until KF Trust has its assets freed.' I guess the Smalley case, I just don't know, but I guess the Smalley case had to do with KFT.

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘Tapes were discussed and the Indian books were gone into. The revelation that the Tradition and Revolution book being from notes made by Sunanda after the talks and not verbatim tapes increases the unwillingness to use it in the West.’

S: Tradition and Revolution?

M: You see, nobody wanted to just take notes that were written later.

S: Of course.

M: ‘Krishnaji went for a walk with Alan K. after tea, and we finally adjourned. Later, Alan K. and I went to dine with the van der Stratens, as I wanted them to meet him before he leaves. Erna and Theo were also there.’

Now, we get to Friday, the twenty-eighth of July. ‘I had ultrasound foot treatment, and Erna and Theo came and we discussed the Vigeveno letter, amended the draft of Krishnaji’s reply, and it was sent. At 11:45 a.m., there was the annual meeting of the Krishnamurti Foreign committees and foundations. Krishnaji discussed their functions after his death, and mentioned the case with Rajagopal. Dates were set for next year at Saanen. Over my protest about hay fever in July and the number of talks, which was seven, Krishnaji insisted on keeping to seven talks and seven discussions, and the dates are about the same. At lunch were Anneke, Balasundaram, Erna, Theo, and Alan K. We discussed Vasanta Vihar, the Stichting will join KF India in suing Rajagopal for possession, as the gift of Vasanta Vihar has not been registered to KF India’—which didn’t exist at the time. ‘Balasundaram said what India (i.e., Pupul) wants for publications is to share in the copyrights, and rights to publish abroad, just what she pushed for last year, and against the agreement already made. Balasundaram seems to see the necessity of keeping the copyright in one place. Servire, in the person of Verhulst, and a new partner, an Englishman who embraced Sufism and changed his name to Inayat Khan, are here in Gstaad, and have tried to get rights to the Indian books, though they know KF India has an agreement with KFT not to publish outside their territory. And George Digby, after the agreement in the spring that there would be no more contracts with Servire beyond the present contracts, is now suggesting them to do German books. “What”, asked Krishnaji, “is Digby’s attachment to Verhulst?” All this is very tiring, and it went on till 4 p.m., when Krishnaji had to see a doctor and Madame Questiau, so he got no nap and went alone for a short walk.’

Saturday, July twenty-ninth. ‘A long day. The Digbys, the Lilliefelts, Balasundaram came at 10 a.m., and joined Krishnaji, Alan K., and me for a discussion that lasted till 5 p.m. We had a buffet lunch and a late tea. First, was the Servire question. At 2 p.m., Mr. Verhulst and his new partner Fazal Inayat Khan came. The latter is a leading Sufi, and head of the Sufi publishing house. He was questioned by Krishnaji, and he told Krishnaji he could sell Krishnaji’s teachings, and Sufism, etcetera, as all are one, all are searching for truth. “One moment, sir,” said Krishnaji, and proceeded to disabuse him of this. There is no way, no method. Khan, as oily a character as one is likely to find, coolly yessed Krishnaji. No final answer has been given Verhulst on an extension of the old contract.

There were pointed words between Balasundaram and Khan. The latter made it clear he was trying to establish himself in the U.S. through the use of Krishnaji's books. At present, he has an outlet there. Verhulst and Khan left, and it was decided we should not extend the contract, but should consult Michael Rubinstein before giving our final reply. The rest of the day was devoted to the Indian publication problems. Balasundaram said Tradition and Revolution is not based on tapes or shorthand, but on notes made afterward from memory. Everyone is rather appalled by this. Balasundaram made a strong push to have India share the copyright; he didn't succeed, but he was made a member of the Publication Committee. An exhausting day.'

Sunday, July thirtieth. 'Krishnaji's seventh Saanen talk on meditation. Mrs. Travers came to lunch. Meanwhile, a renewed crisis. In spite of the decision yesterday to tell Verhulst we need more time to think over the contract renewal, Digby decided he must be told immediately that we are not going on with it, without our being able to determine our legal position with Rubinstein. Alan K. had a telephone argument with Digby over this. At 3:30 p.m., Digby, Verhulst, Mary C., and Sybil Dobinson arrived. George, Mary C., and Alan K. and I talked in my room. George was angry and defiant. I tried to point that out with all tact I could find.'

Now, we go in the little book from the thirtieth of July to the thirteenth of August.

S: Which won't do.

M: [laughs] You make a terrible face. [S laughs.]

Let's see what happened according to the little book.

The thirty-first starts with 'Alan K. to an early train on his way to California. I went to the doctor for treatment, then to the bank. I did the Faria resignation acceptance letter with Krishnaji. The Biascoecheas came for lunch. Enrique will be president of the Fundación temporarily, on Faria's resignation. After lunch, Mr. Martinaux Mirabet, a Spaniard of Mexican citizenship, came and gave Krishnaji $5,000 in francs and pesos. Krishnaji is giving it to Brockwood.' Mr. Mirabet was this nice old man. Did you ever know him?

S: He's Spanish, yes.

M: Spanish. He lived in—

S: Wasn't he a farmer, or…

M: I don't think so. He was, it says here, he was a Mexican citizen, but he lived in Spain all the year. He came every year to Saanen, and always brought money for Krishnaji personally, and Krishnaji always gave it right away to Brockwood.

S: Yes.

M: Now, August second. 'Krishnaji's first public discussion in—'

S: What happened to August first?

M: Oh, August first 'was a quiet day. A teacher, Bernard Miller, came to see me and inquire about teachers meetings.'

S: Oh, well, that's important. I know Bernard Miller.

M: Did you?

S: Yes. You see, there are all these important things. [Chuckles.]

M: Alright. The second 'was the first public discussion. Krishnaji gave an interview to Tommy Elder and a friend, to the Blackburns, to Robert Zahner and Mark Vance, Ann Hariman, Madame Scherer'—she was a French woman—'came and gave him a package of jerseys.' She was a little French lady, who always brought presents. [Chuckles.]

On August third, 'Krishnaji gave his second public discussion. It rained; it was very cold, fifty degrees. To lunch came Madame Duchet, Marcelle Bondoneau, and Mary Cadogan. Mary saw Krishnaji alone afterwards. Krishnaji gave interviews to Iphegenia Frangos, Peter Racz, Rosemary Sheppard, and Franklin Philip. I met Mr. and Mrs. Santhanam, friends of Narasimhan, and I took them to Hotel Bellevue.'

August fourth, 'the third public discussion. The Narayans and Mr. and Mrs. Santhanam for lunch. I took the latter to the train. Krishnaji gave an interview to Mr. Silvius Rusu.' Your friend?

S: Very much so.

M: And somebody called Janet Overton. And I went back for my foot treatment.

August fifth, 'Krishnaji's fourth public discussion. The Bohms and Peter Racz came for lunch. At 4 p.m., there was a tea for the Ojai people: the Lilliefelts, the Hookers, Maris Lindley, Mr. and Mrs. Mirus, Martha Crego, Essie Bates, and somebody Sherman, the Blackburns, a Doctor Belle, Mr. and Mrs. Bridges, the Chalkers'—I don't remember them—'Verna Krueger, Mrs. Blau and her mother Mrs. Kraft, Mrs. Noyes, and Mrs. Samuel.'

On August sixth, 'there was the fifth public discussion, mostly on observing; images are easier, the lazy way. At lunch were the van der Stratens, the Digbys, and Donald Hoppen. Krishnaji saw Tungki's uncle and an American, John Allen. He is to give no more interviews.'

August seventh. ‘Krishnaji’s sixth public discussion. We drove past Saanenmöser afterward, and came back to lunch with Erna and Theo. It was a hot day. No interviews for Krishnaji. We went for a walk, and I went down to the village on errands.’

On August eighth, ‘Krishnaji gave his seventh and last public discussion, completing the series. It was a hot day. We had a quiet lunch alone. No more activities, except that Krishnaji saw Topazia for her eye treatment.’ Topazia Alliata was an old, old friend from Italy.

The ninth of August. ‘Krishnaji saw Topazia. Then, we lunched alone. Narayan and his child Natasha came up to see Krishnaji. Dorothy and Montague moved up to Tannegg for a rest after being in the Land Rover in the camping. At 6 p.m., Jacob Needleman and the Lilliefelts came. We discussed with Krishnaji meetings for discussions in San Francisco next year, and the hope of meeting interesting people. I took Needleman, the Simmonses, and the Lilliefelts to dinner at the Park Hotel.’

The next day, ‘Needleman and the Digbys, the Bohms, and the Simmonses were at lunch.’

On August eleventh, ‘Krishnaji, Dorothy, Montague, and I drove to Bulle, and then to Jaun Pass.’ Remember that road? ‘We had a picnic lunch in a field near the Pass, came down into the valley, and to Spiez, and then to Thun. Krishnaji and I saw Moser about Krishnaji’s car order. We all had tea by the lake and came back.’

On August twelfth, ‘the Grafs, Doris, and the Simmonses were at lunch. There was a long interrogation from Rajagopal’s lawyers, which was forwarded by Sol. I went with Krishnaji and Dorothy for the first walk that I’d been able to take, and my foot was alright. I went as far as the river. In the evening, I went with Dorothy to a Menuhin concert.’

On the thirteenth, oh, now we jump to the big book.

S: Great.

M: Sunday, thirteenth of August. ‘Nadia Kossiakof, when she was here, told Krishnaji that Suarès is venomous about him, and when I asked her about it, she said it was both about Krishnaji and his teachings. Nevertheless, Krishnaji said we must have them for one meal. I said it was his house, but on my own I wouldn’t. If it were about me, I wouldn’t care, but to be against him puts them beyond the pale, as far as I was concerned. So, they came to lunch today, along with Marcelle Bondoneau, and Dorothy and Montague to dilute things. I fetched Marcelle and the Suarèses up the hill. Everyone was very polite. Krishnaji came in with his eager smile and greeted them so nicely. The conversation ball was always kept in the air throughout lunch. Carlo Suarès, who looks like a grey rat’ [both M and S laugh]—oh dear, well, so he did,—‘nibbled away with gusto at Fosca’s spinach ravioli, etcetera. They were socially busy, but Krishnaji said later that they were not at ease with him. On saying goodbye, Carlo Suarès put his hands on Krishnaji's shoulders as if in friendship, but it was so fake, I felt revulsion. Marcelle stayed on a little with Krishnaji and talked awhile. She, Nadia, and Mar de Manziarly see the Suarèses rarely, but when they do, Krishnaji's name is no longer mentioned, or they could not get on. One wonders why they want to get on, in that case. It is curious how easily people turn against one another, and also how difficult it is to separate. Yo de Manziarly still winters with the Suarèses, and Marcelle said Yo has gone to India to see Sathya Sai Baba with Annalisa Rajagopal. I think this shocked Krishnaji. I felt sick that this dimension of an old friend and betrayal should be seen by him. "What is it with these people?" Krishnaji asks, and I wonder, is it that each one of them wants something from him, or something he is, and not getting a thing they can grasp and hold, they turn on him; cluster together; and reinforce each other's resentment? Rajagopal gets the coalescence of this and most of these people have no real direct liking for Rajagopal, but their anger at Krishnaji drives them to adhere to Rajagopal.'

S: That's exactly what happens. That's such an interesting thing that you identify there, and we've seen it elsewhere. People who have had absolutely no compatibility at all, when there starts to be an antagonism or conflict, people on the different sides become great friends. People, who for years had nothing to do with one another or even couldn't stand one another…

M: [chuckles] Exactly. [Laughs.]

S: And there is this strange thing that when people don't get something that they feel they need, or that they feel deserve, they want to hold someone else responsible, and they held Krishnaji responsible. It's quite an interesting movement to identify, and the Suarèses are a really interesting example. They were so close to Krishnaji, in the sense that they were so supportive, and did, what many French people have told me, are the best translations of Krishnaji's work into French…

M: Yes.

S: …and they were hosts of Krishnaji for so many years, and then they turned against him. Something that must have been so lovely turns into something, or is replaced by something, that's so ugly. It's extraordinary.

M: Yes. Suarès, he became a kind of guru to a lot of young people.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And he also started this thing with the kabbalah, writing books about that. So that became his platform, and what he was giving out to the world, and they turned away from Krishnaji. Suarès felt he was a big man now.

S: It's not just turning away, you see. Turning away, one might understand; it's the turning against which is the thing that's so interesting. You can say, well, someone's very interested in education, and then suddenly, they become interested in politics. They turned away from education. But, when someone turns against it, it's like they need to deny something very important about themselves, or that was themselves.

M: That's what I think it is. I think, as I've said, to you and others, if you come close to Krishnaji, or the teachings, beyond a certain point, if you then turn away, you've turned to evil, as it were.

S: Yes, and it turns into a poison, as Krishnaji himself has repeatedly said.

M: Yes, it turns to poison. And you have to be, not just meandering off somewhere else and forgetting it, you have to be against, you have to take a hostile position.

S: Yes. Very odd.

M: Um, now wait a minute, I have to find where my place was in this. 'I drove Marcelle Bondoneau and the Biascoecheas down to Hotel Bel Air in the car. Marcelle spoke of Martha Crego writing to people in France about the case, people who knew nothing and weren't interested. "Pourquoi fait elle du gossip, comme une concierge?"[6] said Marcelle. [M and S both laugh.] It was repeated to Crego, who astonishingly didn't know what a concierge was, and went around asking. Now, she cuts Marcelle, but she also goes about saying that she has become a great friend of Vanda, and therefore knows much more about things. Why did Vanda put up with Crego's criticisms of Krishnaji? Are the people more neurotic around Krishnaji, or is this the normal level of random humanity?'

S: [laughs] The answer to that is that people are definitely more neurotic.

M: Yes. 'Later in a faint rain, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked up the Turbach way, my second walk. The foot was alright, though I didn't go all the way, but sat by the river and did pranayama while waiting for them to return.'

August fourteenth. 'Krishnaji came into the dining room where Dorothy, Montague, and I were having breakfast, looking very beautiful, there is no other word, in his orange silk kimono. There are no lines in his face, no wrinkles. There are sunken parts and age signs under his eyes, but the surface skin is unwrinkled and glowing. I told him this earlier, and he said, "What am I to do?"'—[both laugh]—'and then, "It is pedigreed cucumber night cream."' [Both laughing more.] He was a great one for using all kinds of oily things, and at one point, there was a kind of cream that was made of pedigreed cucumbers. It was sort of a joke between us.

'In spite of clouds, we decided to go for an expedition, out, at any rate, to give Fosca a rest, and it was too uncertain for a picnic. So, it was decided to take the new road from Diablerets to Villars. As we were leaving, Madame Duchet came by with a photocopy of a note from Jean-Pierre Gaillard to her saying, "Notre travail s'accomplit en parfait accord avec nos Maître Koot Humi et Djwal Khul avec qui nous sommes en contact permanent."[7]

S: Oh, lord. [M laughs.] Who was this guy again?

M: He was a friend of the one who wrote the dissertation on le langage de Krishnamurti.

S: Oh, yes.

M: And Jean-Pierre Gaillard was a friend of his, and both of them lived, I think, in Grenoble, and he used to come to Saanen. [Laughs.] 'Madame de Seydoux was present'—that was Madame Duchet's companion, an elderly lady—'Madame Seydoux was present, and Dorothy and Montague came in while I explained Krishnaji's wish and the necessity that no member of the Foundations or Committees be present members of the TS or any other such group. I also explained the Rajagopal court case. Then, I asked Krishnaji to come in for a few minutes, and he underlined all this.'

'Afterward, Krishnaji, Dorothy, Montague, and I drove to the Diablerets and up the new road to the Col de la Croix, where we got out and walked a little. Then, down to Villars. It was too cloudy to see Mont Blanc, and the Dents-du-Midi, but Krishnaji guided us to Montesano, a hotel where he and his brother stayed in the early '20s, when Nitya had TB. Then, in 1957 also, Rajagopal left him there alone for about two months, giving him just enough money to pay his board plus 50 francs so he could do nothing else. We lunched there in the dining room where Krishnaji used to have a table alone in the corner by the window. It is a family hotel with long tables, children and parents on holiday. The waitress, a lumpy girl in a Swiss costume, was English and uncomfortable, but the food was surprisingly nice—well-cooked carrots, potato puree, salad, cheese, and fruit. Krishnaji told us of Rajagopal having written to Vanda who was, at the time, in Gstaad not to communicate with Krishnaji.' He left him there alone. [Sigh.]

'When Rajagopal left, after several days there, on one of which he was drunk in the dining room and called Krishnaji names in a loud voice, he told Krishnaji,' [in a harsh voice] '"You say you are never lonely, well, now you're going to find out what it's like, what the rest of us feel."' [In a soft voice:] '"But I was never lonely," said Krishnaji.' [Both laugh.] '"I could have just stayed there." He went for walks all day in the hills, never spoke to anyone, even when the hotel manager wanted to introduce him to some guests. He left when it was time to go somewhere he was due. He went by train, changing twice, to Chamonix, where de Vidas met him. I was close to tears at lunch, seeing him there, a place he had been happy with his brother, oh so long ago, and then left alone by the malevolence of Rajagopal.'

'We had taken the table near the door. Unconsciously, I must have felt Krishnaji's reluctance to enter the room of people and he sat turned away from them. There was a quality to his shyness that was different in that room. Little glimpses of recoil from people, the painful shyness of someone much younger. He looked so young, so utterly vulnerable, so very shy. I could see him then, behind a wall of his shyness, his far away-ness, and yet content to spend his days walking in the hills, as in Ojai, in his distant state. Rajagopal's attempt to hurt him didn't work. "But why did I put up with him?" he asked. "I just accepted it. I suppose because there was no one else to turn to."'

S: That's a quote from Krishnaji?

M: Yes. 'I felt heartened by seeing him there, a child, obedient, accepting circumstance and cruelty because there was no other choice, but untouched by it inwardly. It is a thing such as this that makes the case against Rajagopal necessary. Krishnaji must be protected, invincibly, from that man's evil. The money, etcetera, are unimportant. He must never be able to touch Krishnaji again.'

'It was raining when we left and drove down through Bex to Aigle. Krishnaji wanted to see the lake, but halfway there, the traffic was thick, and we turned back and went up the Col du Pillon. An accident happened ahead of us, a driver in a red car in a hurry side-swiped one coming down the hill; no one was hurt. Dorothy struggled with her fear of heights, and I drove very carefully and slowly. We came back in time for a walk in spite of the rain.'

The fifteenth of August. 'Dorothy and Montague left in the Land Rover for England, taking Doris with them. Madame Yvonne Welser came to see Krishnaji. She has to be carried'—this is a crippled woman who used to come and he used to try to cure her. 'She had written at the beginning of Saanen that she thought it served no purpose to see him this year; her health had deteriorated in spite of his treatment; he is incorruptible, but she is not, etcetera. But she left it to him to decide. Krishnaji made no reply, so she telephoned last week asking to speak to him. He told her to telephone yesterday. She is thinking of going to the Philippines for the weird cures they do there. The poor woman wept and Krishnaji had to come in to me for Kleenex. She is obviously emotional about him, as well as her horrendous difficulties. I walked in and talked to her a little bit afterward. There is a boy from South Africa she asked Krishnaji to see; he will come tomorrow. The day was quiet from then on.'

'We lunched alone, and later walked up the Turbach Road. Krishnaji said again, "you must take care of yourself, as you must outlive me. I will live at least another ten years, till I'm ninety, probably. You must live beyond that. You do not belong to yourself anymore."'

I forgot to note that 'Mr. Moser came in the morning about the order for Krishnaji's Mercedes, which was postponed from this year. A car has to be bought; the order is in abeyance. It could be got out of only by paying for it and then selling it immediately at a loss.' Oh, that was the one we ordered that we didn't want. 'Krishnaji wanted to take it to the U.S. to replace the Jaguar, which he says is too old. I will have to buy it from him. Moser is getting the figures for export, and we will go on to Thun on Thursday.'

Wednesday the sixteenth. 'I went on errands and to listen to part of a Menuhin rehearsal in the Saanen Church; the lovely lift of Mozart quartets. The sunlight was lovely on the wooden pew rail. I kept seeing Krishnaji in Villars and now up in his room at Tannegg: the infinite wonder of him; fragile, extraordinary, to be cared for, served, and cherished.'

‘At lunch were Topazia Alliata, Marcelle Bondoneau, and Frances McCann. At lunch they chatted, but he was far away, but he came back to the conversation when they touched on Buddhism, the hierarchy of Masters in Theosophy, over them the Maha Chohan, the Maitreya, then the Buddha. He explained where some of it came from, mostly Tibet. Also at lunch, he kept Olga, the inconstant maid, out of the dining room [laughing], passing out everything himself. He is exasperated by her and worse, she smells. Later, the South African boy, Peter Raggitt, had an interview, and then we went for a walk. We talked of Jesus. I asked what difference did it make whether he lived or not? Wasn’t what he is said to have said to us either true or not? It wasn’t very original, said Krishnaji, just to love one another. [M laughs.] I asked, wasn’t it a way of saying, no self, which seems at the core of all religions in varying words. Krishnaji said yes and that Akhenaten[8] had said it too. He has been reading a book on Egyptian history. I said that the religion that people grasp, like Jesus, gives people symbols to hold onto, whereas he takes them away.’ So he did.

August seventeenth. ‘Vanda telephoned from Florence. Krishnaji had not slept well, and said meditation is so strong that the back of his head felt on fire, not pain, but a flame so strong he had to read to stop it before he could sleep again. Nevertheless, he wanted to come to Bern where I had to get his French visa. So, we went on this grey day. I had difficulty finding the entrance to the autoroute, but did reach Bern and find the French embassy before noon, only to be told he needed a letter from the Indian embassy. Everything closes at noon, so we found a parking garage by the Bellevue and found our way on foot, to a “vegetarian”’—Krishnaji remembered a vegetarian restaurant in a garden. ‘Only after eating downstairs did we learn that the garden was upstairs. [Chuckles.] But we had a nice meal, clean, quiet, and inexpensive. We found the Indian embassy by 2 p.m., got the needed letter, and went back to the French embassy, where they took forty-five minutes, and finally went off to Thun. We saw Moser about the SLC 280 3.5 Mercedes for next year’s delivery. The export price was far less. Krishnaji wishes to take it to the U.S. We ordered it in stone pine green.’

S: Hmmm. The Green Beauty.

M: Yes. ‘And after hesitation between beige and black interior, we settled on beige. We drove back to Tannegg and tried Bambu, a fake coffee we had bought in the Reformhaus in Bern.’

On Monday the twenty-first. ‘I spoke yesterday to my brother.’ Oh dear, it goes on about my father. Sorry, but I have to skip over this. ‘I spoke to Hugh Fullerton’—he was head of the American Hospital in Paris—‘to ask what if Father dies before either Bud or I are there. He said that Doctor Thins would arrange things. I saw that Father was not well. I write this while I’m waiting for the operator to ring again to reach my brother.’

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘It has been the first day of sun after cold, grey ones. The fresh snow against the clear sky makes the world look reborn. We walked all the way on the Turbach Road. In a pause in all my telephoning, Krishnaji came in and said, when I told him what was happening, "Are you worried?" he asked. I said, worry is when there is something that can be done to change things; this, it appears, cannot be altered. Krishnaji: "Do you feel something in this room, the atmosphere, and I don't want this to impinge on you." We went to his room, and he said, "Do you feel a difference?" And then he said, "Perhaps it is because you have been filled with this in here. We are all going." Then I asked, "Tell me, oh Sphinx, when does one stop coming and start going?" [S chuckles.] Krishnaji said, "Oh, I guess, at birth. No, probably at ten to twenty years old. I have never seen someone die. I wasn't there when my brother died. It would have been terrible. In a way, I am gone when I walk, or sometimes when I am reading, I am so far away. Not when I talk. Then, I am all there. But otherwise, I am getting farther away. That is why you mustn't let them give me a general anesthetic; put me out. That would be the end."'

'"What if you are in pain, hurt?" I asked.'

'He replied, "I don't think that will happen like that. But then sedation, but not out"'—meaning unconscious. '"If you died first, but I don't think you will. You must outlive me. I will live another fifteen years, or twenty, I don't know. But I feel that. And when he goes, you must be…you must not commit suicide, as you did, in a way, when your husband died. Should you go to Paris now?"'

'"No," I said, "we will go with our plan to go Wednesday."'

'Krishnaji: "I couldn't drive the car alone; maybe to Bulle or Nyon, but the body couldn't all the way."

My father died the next day.

S: Mm, hm.

M: The next day. 'I spoke to Solange'—who was the housekeeper—'and Dr. Thins had been there, and said that death was very close and nothing more could be done. I rang my brother at the Vineyard and told him. He and Lisa will fly tonight and be in Paris early tomorrow. Krishnaji and I lunched quietly. I didn't tell him the news. At about 3 p.m., Solange telephoned, and said, "C'est fini." Father died in his sleep at 2:10 p.m., having been asleep or in a coma since about 10 in the morning. He was without suffering, she said. Krishnaji came into the room as I was hanging up the telephone. "I felt it had happened," he said, "I felt it from you." I called Bud again and told him. Krishnaji made me rest awhile, and then we went for a walk as far as the river. The packing was finished, and we loaded the car so as to leave early tomorrow. And then I talked to Krishnaji about my father.'

Wednesday, August twenty-third. 'We were in the car waving goodbye to Fosca and off from Tannegg at 4 a.m. We reached the border at Saint-Cergue by 6. In France, at Lons-le-Saunier, we bought croissants, hot from the oven, and had them with fruit for breakfast in the same edge of the road as a year ago. We got onto the autoroute at Chalon-sur-

Saône, and Krishnaji drove for 100 miles or so. We reached Paris by 1 p.m., and ate our picnic lunch in the Bois where we used to take our walks. It was warm and sunny. We went to Plaza Athénée, and I telephoned Father's apartment. My brother and Lisa had arrived at 9:30 a.m.' Well, it goes on about my father.

'I got back to the hotel in time to order Krishnaji's and my supper in our rooms. On the drive this morning, Krishnaji spoke of death. "I don't like to speak of your father," he said, "but what happens to a man like Rajagopal?" He talked of this and late in the evening, he said the following, which I wrote down verbatim. "Take a man like X"—meaning Rajagopal—"who is suspicious, jealous, secretive, concerned with his physical security. He is, after all, a product of his environment, his culture, his pattern of behavior. He may have peculiarities, his temperament, his so-called character. His mind is conditioned by the class he was born in, and so on. And when he dies, and that's what we are talking about, what happens to him? He has not come out of his 'environment.' He has not made anything of life. He is merely reacting within his conditioning, which may be very clever, cunning, artistic, but he has not come out of it. He is part of the whole quivering mass. He may think he will reincarnate, be reborn, or absorbed into something greater, which is his hope and comfort, but basically, he is still a result of his tradition, of his forefathers, his environment. He has not come out of it, so he is absorbed into his basic conditioning. This sounds cruel, but as you observe, he is part of this humanity. As he was in his life, so he is in death. To live with death every day is to deny totally this conditioning. So to die to conditioning every day is to live a life of a different dimension."'

S: Hmm.

M: He really was talking about every…it wasn't Rajagopal when he said X, he meant most people.

S: Very clearly put, though. Very clear.

M: How wasted most lives are.

S: Yes, yes [very quietly said]. It's one of the horrors of existence that it can be so wasted.

M: Yes [almost inaudible.]

S: And the fact is that it's so difficult for it not to be wasted, in the sense that our conditioning, our normal human quivering mass, as he describes it, is so powerful.

M: Yes [still almost inaudible], and yet we're given, we're given not only life, but we're given…the possibility…to go beyond all this.

S: Yes. And certainly, anyone who has had any contact with Krishnaji has no excuse.

M: Yes [as quietly as possible, followed by a long pause]. Let's stop.

S: Yes. Of course.

Issue 25: August 24, 1972 to December 31, 1972

This issue starts just after the death of Mary's father, with Krishnaji and Mary arriving at Brockwood Park from Paris. In addition to speaking to students and staff, Mary records dialogues between Krishnaji and David Bohm.

Mid-October sees a brief visit to Rome by Krishnaji and Mary before they separate for the winter; Mary returns to the US and Krishnaji flies to India.

The series has an interesting reference to Krishnaji's attempt to address Mary's habits of tension through, in his words, "speaking to her unconscious". This is a theme that recurs in diaries and letters.

Mary: So, I have it noted here that we finished our last discussion on the twenty-third of August, 1972.

Scott: Yes, so we're beginning on the twenty-fourth of August.

M: And my notes for that day are entirely about my father's death and what came afterwards.

S: Of course.

M: 'My brother and his wife were there and my father's funeral took place on the twenty-fifth.' I wrote a lot about that. 'We walked back after the funeral, which was in the morning, to the Plaza Athénée and Krishnaji joined us for lunch. My brother and his wife were going to return to the U.S. shortly, and Krishnaji and I left in the car at 4 p.m. for Le Havre, driving without haste. I was glad to be gone from Paris and its sadness. We had supper at a restaurant in Le Havre called Le Monaco, and boarded the Normandy ferry.'

On the twenty-sixth, 'we arrived at Southampton early and were at Brockwood in time for breakfast. We unpacked slowly and walked in the afternoon with Dorothy and Whisper. It was peaceful, beautiful, and quiet there.'

The next day was also quiet, with long naps.

The next several days are just walking, Krishnaji washing the car, and things like that.

On August thirty-first, 'it was another beautiful day. Krishnaji and I took a picnic and drove to Chichester Festival Theatre. We had a picnic lunch in the car, and then saw a matinee performance of The Lady's Not for Burning.[1] Tickets were got for us by Christopher and Phyl Fry. Afterward, we drove back to Brockwood through golden fields that had just been harvested.'

On September first, ‘we worked on the interrogatories’—this is part of a lawsuit, these endless written questions that the opposing force’s lawyers send you, and you have to fill out. ‘We walked in the afternoon.’

S: Do you remember where you were walking in those days?

M: It depended on how long we set out to walk, but we usually walked across the fields and through the grove, then across the next field, then down to the lane and back. Not always. But it varied.

On September second, ‘there was news of a fire at Ojai, and we sent a telegram to the Lilliefelts to make sure they were alright.’

On September fourth, ‘we went to London, from Petersfield. There were Huntsman fittings for both of us. And Mary Links, having just returned from holiday in Asola[2], lunched with us at Fortnum’s. Krishnaji had a dentist appointment with Mr. Thompson, and I bought him a red cashmere throw for his room.’ What happened to that?

S: I don’t have it.

M: It was beautiful. I guess it burned up in the fire. This is pre-fire. Isn’t it?

S: Yes, it’s pre-fire, but it wouldn’t have burned up in the fire.

M: It used to lie on that bench that’s now down in the drawing room.

S: I remember.

M: It used to lie at the foot of his bed. It was a lovely red, cashmere…Anyway…I haven’t seen it in years.

On September fifth, ‘Arab terrorists seized the Israeli Olympic athletes and held them prisoner all day in Munich.’ This was obviously on television. ‘Colonel Noyes arrived suddenly from California, bringing settlement talk from Rajagopal. Krishnaji and I saw him after lunch. Noyes said that Rajagopal would turn over 80 percent of KWINC, keeping 20 percent to carry on publications and the library project. Krishnaji told Noyes that had he known that Rajagopal was a Theosophist all these years, he would never have let him touch his writing and would have asked him to get out of KWINC. We both said that if Rajagopal has a settlement suggestion to make, it must be made through his lawyers to ours. All this upset Krishnaji’s stomach.’

S: Mm, hm.

M: The next day, ‘we learned that the Arabs had shot all the Israeli Olympic hostages. Krishnaji was moved to tears by all this. He sent for Noyes and told him that what Rajagopal is doing is similar—lies and violence. Noyes said he had telephoned Rajagopal last night, and Rajagopal asked him to write to him his suggestions. We told Noyes that Rajagopal must make any settlement suggestion through his lawyers to ours. I telephoned to Fleur[3]. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. My brother telephoned in the evening. Father's burial is tomorrow in New York, Woodlawn Cemetery.'

On September seventh, 'the campers began arriving for the Brockwood talks.'

The eighth 'was, again, preparations for the gathering beginning the next day. The house and cottages were full.'

On Saturday, September ninth, 'Krishnaji gave his first Brockwood talk for that year in the tent. It was a rainy day, but a thousand people came. We had food[4] set up in the adjacent tent. In the late afternoon, we walked.' Then there are some things about the case.

S: You can't say what they are?

M: It's not important.

On the tenth, 'Krishnaji gave his second Brockwood talk. The weather was nicer. Over a thousand people came, and we ate again in the tent.'

S: I came to these talks.

M: Did you? Oh!

S: Yes. I was staying at Alresford.

M: Did you, now?

S: Mm, hm. That was my first time at Brockwood.

M: Mmmm. Now, my first memories of you, as I've told you over and over, is sitting on the floor at Tannegg.

S: That was in 1974.

M: That was '74. So this is '72.

S: Yes. Yes. That was also the first year I went to Saanen.

M: Hmmm.

S: After our last discussion, I was thinking to re-listen to those tapes of that year, as that was the first Saanen I went to, and then I came here, for the Brockwood talks, and my life changed.

M: Where did you stay in Alresford?

S: At the Bell Hotel or whatever it is—the one that's on the right-hand side as you go down.

M: The Bell?

S: The Bell, I think.

M: Hmm. [S chuckles.] What led you to it? How did you hear?

S: Well, I heard about the Saanen talks from a friend of mine in Paris, so I went to Saanen to hear them. And, of course, while I was there, I heard about the Brockwood talks.

M: I see. So you were in Saanen.

S: I was in Saanen for all the Saanen talks.

M: Where did you stay then?

S: I started off sleeping in the old schoolhouse, which they had for young campers without tents, and then I ran into two friends of mine from America who happened to be there. And they were staying in rooms of someone's chalet, and I was invited to stay with them.

M: Hmmm. [S chuckles.]

M: Well, continuing. On September the eleventh, 'I had a cable from the Dunnes that Filomena had had a slight stroke the day before. But luckily it happened when she was with them. She's in the hospital, and there's no paralysis.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji had a discussion in the tent, a very good one on thought and the mind. I finished the interrogatory letter and sent it to Erna.'

My cousin came on the thirteenth.

S: Which cousin was that?

M: The only cousin I have. My mother's sister's daughter. She was like a sister when I was a child. A little bit older than me.

S: Is she the one that I met here at Brockwood who lived in Maryland?

M: No. No, that's a stepsister.

S: Oh, yes.

M: No, my cousin died some years ago. 'I talked to the doctor in Los Angeles. Filomena had hardening of the arteries to both brain and heart; there was a spasm, which immediately relaxed. But she must change her mode of life. She wishes to join her family in Rome. Miranda is going to Italy and will accompany her in about ten days, and I said I would go to Rome to see her.'

S: Is this when Filomena stopped working for you?

M: Yes. On the fourteenth, 'Krishnaji held his second discussion at Brockwood. In the afternoon, after a walk, Dorothy, Elena Greene, Sidney Roth, Martha Longenecker, the Bohms, Yves Zlotnitcka, and I saw the four San Diego talks of 1970 that were videotaped.' Sidney Roth had organized all that and, I think, paid for them, and the titles also showed Krishnaji walking in the garden in Malibu.'

For the fifteenth, there's no entry at all.

On September sixteenth, 'Krishnaji gave his third Brockwood talk. We had lunch in the tent later.'

And on the next day, 'Krishnaji gave the fourth talk,' and see, there's nothing else on the page. [S chuckles.] I have to prove it to you. [M laughing.]

S: [laughs] Yes, I'm such a stickler.

M: On the eighteenth, 'I went to London,' you don't want to hear about that. It was about legal things. 'Shopped for Krishnaji, had lunch with Mary Links at their place. We talked all afternoon. Got back to Brockwood at 7 p.m. Most people who had come for the talks had left. Dorothy said we had enough money to do all the building.' [S chuckles loudly, and M chuckles, too.] I don't know what portion of the building she had in mind at that point. I can't remember.

S: That must have been for finishing the Cloisters.

M: Something like that. On the nineteenth, 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I drove 100 miles to Broadway.' That's in the Cotswolds. 'We lunched at the Lygon Arms,' I've never known how to pronounce it. 'We looked at furniture and we ordered two more tables needed for the dining room when it is enlarged. Drove home via Cheltenham to Newbury, Winchester, etcetera.' That was rather nice.

S: What was the name of the company that you got the tables from?

M: It doesn't say, and I was trying to remember, too.[5] I don't know if it's there anymore. I can go there. It's right next to the place we had lunch.

S: The Lygon Arms? Because that's a famous restaurant.

M: Mmm. Then on the twenty-first, 'we went to London. Huntsman…'

S: What were you doing on the twentieth?

M: Nothing important. 'Bud telephoned from New York about my getting their hotel reservations next week. Desk. Walk,' is all it says.

S: Now, you see, this is why it's important to say all these things.

M: Alright, why?

S: Here[6], it says that a recording was made of Krishnaji chanting with Narayan, and Narayan hasn't even been mentioned once in your diary.

M: No, it doesn't say so here.

S: So, the archives list could have the wrong date.

M: I don't know what to say.

S: Okay.

M: However, the next day we went to London, and the well-worn path to 'Huntsman' [S chuckles] 'and then to Fortnum's. Mary lunched with us, and so did Amanda Pallant[7], and at two, Krishnaji had a session with his dentist, Mr. Thompson.'

S: We should just say for the record that Amanda Pallant is Mary's daughter.

M: Oh yes, so she is. 'I went on errands and met him at the dentist. He is going to have a permanent upper right bridge.' It says, 'drilling preparation. We caught a taxi quickly, then the train to Petersfield. Coming back in the car from Petersfield, Krishnaji fainted, and I was able to catch and hold him. He was unconscious about two minutes, and his face was swollen.'

S: Swollen from all the drilling? Oh, dear.

M: See, that's…it was again the body was shocked by things like that…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …and he didn't faint until he got alone in the car.

S: Yes.

M: He didn't faint on the train. He said he never would faint in front of people.

The next day was the twenty-second and he had slept well and felt better, but his face was still swollen. He attended the first staff meeting of the term. In the afternoon, he, Carlos, and I washed the Mercedes. It was a lovely warm day. We had a walk later.

The next day, 'I went to see friends in Forest Row. Eric Sevareid was there also'…well, anyway, you don't want to hear about that.

S: Yes, I do.

M: Alright, 'Eric Sevareid was interesting on China, but he doesn't know who Krishnaji is, unfortunately.' Do you remember who Eric Sevareid was?

S: Oh, yes. Very well.

M: Yes. Do we have to identify him to the mythical listeners of all this?

S: [laughs] A famous newsman, and news commentator.

M: A famous news commentator, and a very good man, very distinguished.

'I stayed till 4 p.m., and drove back the same way I'd come.' That was mostly the A272.

S: Who are your friends in Forest Row?

M: Fleur Cowles, and her husband Tom Meyer. In London, they live at The Albany, and have this lovely old Elizabethan farmhouse in Forest Row, near East Grinstead.

The next day was the twenty-fourth, and it was the first day of term at Brockwood. Krishnaji's head continued to pain him, more or less at times, at the back and on top.

Then the next day it just says, 'desk.'

S: See, there is another anomaly here with the archives list.

M: What?

S: It says here that on the twenty-fourth, a recording was made of Krishnaji chanting with Mr. Venks.

M: Mr. Venks was the chanting teacher at Rishi Valley.

S: Yes, but don't you think you would have mentioned if it had happened on this day?

M: You'd think so, you'd think so, but I didn't.

S: Well, we'll see, because they might have the wrong date.

M: Then there's nothing of significance until the twenty-sixth, when 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. A'—something like Mr. Wintries—'who'd sent Brockwood £5,000 sterling, came to lunch.' Oh, this is that businessman who gives Krishnaji's books to his staff.

S: He had a clothing store in London?

M: Yes, yes. He had his place on Regent Street.

S: Oh, I know him, and he later on started a publishing house.

M: Yes, he was going to do all kinds of things that never came to pass.

S: Yes, he called me about eight or nine months ago[8]. I haven't seen him or spoken to him for years, [M laughs] and he said he wanted to do something with publishing, but I never heard from him again.

M: Well, he did give the £5,000, though, so we must give him £5,000 worth of credit.

S: Absolutely. [Both laugh.]

M: On the twenty-seventh, it says that 'Dick Richardson came to lunch to discuss a pamphlet on Krishnaji.' Do you remember who that was? I know the name, but I can't for the life of me identify it.

S: No. Sorry, I can't help.

M: On the twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji and I went to London and we met Mary and Alain Naudé at lunch at Fortnum's. Krishnaji had me buy a jersey for myself on Bond Street, and then he went to the dentist, and I went for things for him to take to India. Dentist Thompson had to refit the mold for his bridges, and Krishnaji did it without anesthetic. We came home.'

The next day, 'I went again to London for Krishnaji's Italian visa, and then saw my brother and sister-in-law and their little son for the first time. We ate lunch…' blah, blah, blah. 'I went off for further errands. They go to Paris tomorrow. So I came back to Brockwood about 6:30 p.m. and Krishnaji had talked to the school in the morning. Krishnaji scarcely slept.' I guess that's that night.

On the thirtieth, 'the Digbys came at noon, and after lunch met with Krishnaji and me about a large book on the miscellany they had prepared.' That must be, ah…

S: The Awakening of Intelligence.

M: Yes. 'At lunch, we discussed Verhulst contract mess' [chuckles]. 'George has consulted his own lawyer, who goes contrary to Michael Rubinstein. George said he gave his word on the contract, but that was before Inayat Khan was known to be the director of that company.'

On October first, 'Krishnaji talked to the school at 11:30 a.m. on language and communication.' It says, 'very good. In the afternoon, we went over and watched a cricket game between Brockwood and Mr. Morton's sons and staff team.' [S laughs.] Don't remember any of that. 'Then, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked to the grove, and pulled convolvulus out of the rhododendrons. Found a field mouse nest.'

S: [laughs] Convolvulus, is that the…?

M: It's bind weed.

On October second, 'I telephoned Vanda in Rome about Krishnaji not having too many talks in Rome. She insists on my staying with her. I said I would stay in a hotel. I telephoned Filomena in Rome; she sounded a bit low. Krishnaji has a cold, so he stayed in bed all day. I took the Mercedes to Chichester for a 9,000-mile service, and spent the morning walking about Chichester pleasantly. Bought a pair of China cats,' which you can see right now on the mantelpiece. 'Then, went to East Dean and had tea with Phyl and Christopher, very pleasant. They drove me to the garage and I picked up my car when it was ready, and I drove back to Brockwood in time for supper.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji stayed in bed with a cold all day. I worked at the desk. Mary Cadogan, who has asked me to come to a meeting with Michael Rubinstein with the Digbys, says that Nelly refuses to go if I do [both laugh]. This caused a few sparks. Dorothy and I went to Winchester on errands. Krishnaji's driving license is renewed. I bought the Normandy ferry tickets.'

On October fourth, 'Krishnaji remained in bed, but his cold is better.'

S: Where is Krishnaji's driver's license?

M: In Ojai. I think.

S: His English driver's license?

M: I think so. On October fifth, 'Krishnaji is better. He stayed in bed in the morning, then we took the 12:45 p.m. train to London with a picnic lunch. For, naturally, Huntsman fittings' [S laughs]. Mine was bad. Then Krishnaji had a new permanent right upper bridge put in by dentist Hamish Thompson, while I did errands, after which I picked him up and we went straight to Waterloo and home.'

The next day, 'I fetched Mary Cadogan at Petersfield. Krishnaji talked with the school. The students asked what death is. After lunch, Krishnaji, Mary, and I had a meeting about the Digbys, etcetera. Then, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.'

On the seventh, 'I wrote a letter to the Digbys. The Bohms came for the weekend. Krishnaji has a dialogue with David Bohm. Saral, Dorothy, Doris, and I were present, and George Carnes[9] taped it on the Nagra. They discussed what intelligence is, it is not thought, which is in time, etcetera. At one point, far into the discussion, Krishnaji put the question: "What is its source?" David was silent, and Krishnaji later asked me if I had noticed the change of atmosphere in the room when he asked that question. Then, at the end, he suddenly began to speak of another way to communicate something, to speak not to the conscious mind, but to the unconscious. "That is affection," he said, "that is love." To me, later, he said, "I'm going to speak to you that way about your habits of tension."' [S laughs.]

On October eighth, 'Krishnaji had a marvelous discussion with the school continuing Friday's one on death.' [Pause…M laughs.]

S: What are you laughing at?

M: He's scolding me, and telling me he's going to speak to my unconscious. '"Do you know what it is to be quiet?"' [M laughs again.] 'He said that he has noticed that I have neglected my body, that for reasons he doesn't want to inquire into it, I am highly nervous physically. It shows in an unquiet face, fiddling with fingers, etcetera. I have tried to correct it from the outside, through will, through the conscious mind, and when he has pointed out these mannerisms, I have responded with effort, will, irritation, or depression—'[laughing] 'all of which are superficial responses. He said, "I am now talking to a deeper level, out of affection. It is from this level, from the inside, you must listen and change. If you do, in a few days, you will be different. There will be an awareness of your body." He said that after my husband died, for eight years, I abandoned my body, neglected it. Today, I have greatly changed and am aware in many ways, but still not in the well-being of the body. He will speak at this level to me, to my unconscious during the coming days.' [Laughs.]

S: That's very nice, very nice.

M: 'Sacha de Manziarly telephoned and invited us to lunch in Paris on the sixteenth. Nadia Kossiakof telephoned that the first of Krishnaji's two television interviews in French done last year will be shown on the seventeenth, so we can see it as we will be in Paris then. It's been a warm day.'

On October ninth. 'Last night Krishnaji again said, "I'm speaking to your unconscious mind. I feel it doesn't feel it is important or you would've changed these habits during these five years. Do you know what it is to be quiet?" As he was saying this, I saw that the habits are offshoots of tension; I don't feel tense or nervous, but somehow, to get things done, I build up this steam of energy, which has a quality of tension. It feels like being in high gear. This shouldn't be necessary. It probably wastes the very energy I need. I see that, from the inside, a quietness is necessary, and that the core of these things cannot be done from without. It is a false tension. Quietness inside, I understand that. Later this morning, while doing dishes in the kitchen, Krishnaji said he felt a difference in me. Then late in the evening, he said, "You have taken the first initiation. Do you know why you have taken so long? When you do, it will be the second initiation."' [Laughs.]

'I finished and posted the Digby letter.'

On October tenth, 'I got a reply from Nelly Digby. She puts all the trouble down to a misunderstanding [laughter in voice] created by someone else.' [Laughs again.]

The next day, 'I telephoned Filomena in Rome, who is feeling rested and better. Vanda rang, saying that Krishnaji will give one talk in Rome on the twenty-ninth. Krishnaji and I went to London. He had his last appointment with the dentist for this year. We met Mary L. for lunch at Fortnum's, after which Krishnaji had his hair cut. Then we went to Nelson's for bronchial remedies, and then to see Mrs. Bindley. We caught the 6:20 p.m. train back. I had received a letter from George Digby'—it doesn't say what it said.

For October twelfth, my diary reads, 'desk mostly. Ian Hammond at lunch. He, Dorothy, and I discussed building an assembly hall on the roof.' On the roof?

S: Good grief.

M: An area outside, near the kitchen, was suggested. Krishnaji wants to go ahead. It will cost around £15,000 sterling. Krishnaji's letter to the Digbys reached them.' I don't know what he said. I may have something in my Digby file that would shed light, but I don't remember much. 'They went to see Mary Links in the afternoon.'

On the thirteenth of October, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school and Mark Edwards took photographs of it. Mary and Joe Links brought Gollancz and Peter Day to meet Krishnaji. That was the first time they had met. Donald Hoppen, too, was at lunch. The Digbys sent a letter via Mary to Krishnaji, saying they were resigning from the Publication Committee and the KFT, "as he wished." Krishnaji dictated a letter replying that he had not said that. Then, in the evening, he had me telephone George and say he hoped they would continue editing the talks. George and I spoke in a friendly fashion, and he said they would edit the talks but wished to withdraw from organizations.'

October fourteenth. 'Packed. I telephoned Mary Cadogan about the Digby resignation and visualized the Publication Committee continuing with her handling the business part. David and Saral came to lunch. I took him with me while I put gas in the Mercedes and told him of the Digbys' resignations. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.'

For October fifteenth, it reads, 'packing, packing. In mid-morning, Krishnaji said it would be nice to say goodbye once more to the Digbys. So, I rang and Nelly answered. I said amenities, and her voice was as abrupt as a knife. I put Krishnaji on. He said, "We want you to come back to the work"'—meaning editing. 'George came on, and Krishnaji said the same to him and goodbye. Half an hour later, Doris brought a message from George that, "Things would be as they always were," and that he would ring again in half an hour. I telephoned immediately and George said that as Krishnaji didn't want them to resign, they were staying on. I said that Krishnaji wanted them to continue editing. Had not spoken about whether he was the chairman of the Publications Committee, etcetera. We were back where we were when this began. I telephoned Mary L. She said that unless George does resign, they are unable to rearrange things. We worked out a phrase about Krishnaji accepting and understanding their wish to resign, but wanted them to continue editing the talks, also to tell them that because of leaving today Krishnaji had to tell Mary Cadogan, David Bohm, and Dorothy, and talk to Mary L. about it. So I rang George again and told him all this, and added that in discussing it, Krishnaji had not wished to impose a decision on the Publication Committee, but had wondered if a chairman was necessary. George said he would support a reorganization of the Publications Committee and someone else to be with Mary Cadogan in handling executive matters. So, we breathed easier, and I rang Mary L. again to tell her this, and ask her to inform Mary C. tomorrow as she couldn't be reached today.'

'Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I went for our usual walk across the lovely fields. Krishnaji and I had supper downstairs, and at 8 p.m., everyone collected in the West Wing hall to say goodbye to Krishnaji. He was startled as he went through his bedroom door onto the landing and he saw them all, but then, to laughter, he came down. The Mercedes had been carefully loaded by Carlos. He and Dorothy had washed it yesterday as a surprise, and so, with warm goodbyes and near tears from Dorothy, we drove off to Southampton and boarded the Normandy ferry. It was half-empty. It rolled about in the night, and there wasn't much sleep.'

On Monday the sixteenth of October. 'A clear morning, mist rising. Poplar trees etched their wintry twigs against the pale light. We drove swiftly, effortlessly, across the Tancarville Bridge on the autoroute, stopping for an execrable' [chuckles] 'breakfast at the usual cafeteria place. Next time we will bring our own breakfast. We were in Paris by 10:30 a.m., and true to K's prediction, our rooms were ready. We unpacked, and then went to lunch in the Rue Jacob with Mar and Sacha de Manziarly. Sacha has not been well since a motor accident in the spring. Krishnaji put his hands on him. Mar talked privately to Krishnaji about the journal she and Yo kept when they were young. She will give it to Mary L. for the biography.'

'During this, Sacha talked to me about wanting to die. He hopes the plane he takes to Morocco tomorrow could crash. No thought of others on the plane. His social life of trivialities has left him lost in age and ill health. The conversation at table was at odds and ends, people were not listening to each other.'

'We went to Charvet, and then I put Krishnaji in a taxi to the hotel and walked to Chanel for a fitting of my blue suit. Mr. Moser came to the hotel to take the Mercedes to Thun for winter storage. I gave him back bills for the scratch he put on the car in the spring, as my insurance has a 500 Swiss francs deductible. Moser is to send me the contract for Krishnaji's new Mercedes in December when the new prices are known. We had supper in the rooms.'

S: Can we just go back here for a minute?

M: Yes.

S: Whose diary was it that Mar de Manziarly was talking about?

M: Yo, her sister Yolande, and Marcelle apparently kept a journal when they were young, back in the very early days.

S: Yes. Have you seen that?

M: I don't know. I don't know if she ever gave it. I don't remember seeing it. She gave some letters that Krishnaji had written, which I gave to the archives.

S: I'll ask Mary L. about it. Mar said they were going to send it to Mary L., according to your diary.

M: 'Mar talked privately to Krishnaji about the journal that she and Yo kept when they were young, and she told him she will give it to Mary L. for the biography.'

S: Yes. I'll call Mary about it, because that would be interesting to have.

M: Yes.

Thursday the seventeenth of October. 'Krishnaji is feeling in need of rest. We stayed in all morning. I wrote letters. Mary C. rang from London. Nelly told her, "I never resigned. I simply offered my resignation" as a trustee of KFT. Obviously, she wants to stay on. George will resign as chairman at the beginning of the Publication Committee meeting tomorrow, so it is up to them all to decide on a new system.'

'Marcelle Bondoneau and Nadia Kossiakof lunched with us in the Régence. They had put together a new legal Krishnamurti entity in France, Le Bureau, comprising four members, one of whom must be domiciled and own property in France, not rent. They are Mlle. Isabelle Mallet, who lives in Normandy in a house built by Sir Edwin Lutyens, Mme. Samuel, Mme. Banzet, and Mme. Betsy Debass. The object of the committee is strictly the dissemination of Krishnaji's teachings through him, his books, tapes, and films. Nadia has worked very hard over this, and over publications and TV interviews. When they left, Krishnaji and I went to Charvet. Krishnaji fitted for alterations to some of his sport shirts that aren't right, three new chemises de ville[10]. One older one that has been altered will be sent to Malibu to await his arrival in the spring. We walked along to Lobb, where his new black two-eyelet Norwegians were ready, and he ordered one pair of brown brogues. These will be fetched by him when he's in Paris in the spring. Then, we went to getting chemist supplies for him to take to India and a new electric toothbrush, and came back to the hotel tired. We had supper in the rooms. Krishnaji went to sleep but I sat up to see the broadcast of the half-hour TV interview of Krishnaji conducted by André Voisin a year ago, recorded here in the Plaza Athénée, over two days. It was all in French. It was superb. Krishnaji spoke clearly, eloquently, and his accent was good. The trips in gender or verb tenses didn't matter. Voisin did an excellent job really listening, subtly smoothing words when Krishnaji didn't get the ones he wanted and lightly leading Krishnaji to essential questions in his teachings. It was marvelous to watch Krishnaji in conversation. His face tells so much, so eloquently. I was moved and thrilled. The second part, another half hour, is to be shown on the twenty-fourth. Alas, I will miss that. But, copies go to KFT and we can see it later.' Have we got that?

S: Nope.

M: No?! That's outrageous!

S: I know. I've asked Jean-Michel Maroger to look into it, but we still don't have it. I know it is outrageous.

M: 'The film was in black and white, well and professionally shot. Excellent all around.'

The next day. 'There were enthusiastic telephone calls about the television from Bondoneau, Kossiakof, and Mar de Manziarly, the latter taking credit for her family giving Krishnaji his good French accent years ago' [laughs]. Mar told me she had been to Ojai and seen Rajagopal, but, "we didn't talk about anything, we just laughed." She asked if we couldn't just put in The Bulletin that Rajagopal hadn't stolen anything; he had been doing his work since 1922 and hasn't taken a thing. I explained we had a lawsuit going because Rajagopal refused information about finances, and about the settlement the attorney general offered, and that he and Mima were suing Krishnaji and the rest of us. She said she loved Mima, and didn't feel in the middle.'

'We packed and got to Orly for an Alitalia 10 a.m. flight to Rome, but it was delayed till 3:45 p.m. We lunched at Maxim's at the airport. We were most meticulously searched before boarding the plane. Security has greatly improved since the hijacking. Then we were frisked, and women had metal detectors passed over their bodies. Every lumpy thing in my bag and briefcase was examined.'

'On the plane, Krishnaji said "You must take care of yourself. Eat properly. Walk two miles a day. You must be well. You must outlive me. No unnecessary trips to Arizona." I said I promised to go to see Philippa and Betsy. "Then, go quietly," he said, "You must have no accidents."'

S: Were Philippa and Betsy in Arizona?

M: Yes, Philippa was at school in Arizona. I don't know where Betsy was. Can't think. '"Do everything quietly, then everything will be alright."'

‘Vanda met us at Leonardo da Vinci Airport. Mr. Barabino and his friend Mario Pia Vecchi were also there, and they drove me to the Hotel Rafael. Krishnaji is staying with Vanda. I rang Filomena. Miranda came from Florence later and is staying with Filomena.’

That’s the end of that. Now, we have to go back to the little book. The next entry in the big book is Brockwood on the twentieth of May ’73.

S: Wow. Okay. So, we’re in the little book, then.

M: The nineteenth of October. ‘Filomena and Miranda came with Mario’—that’s Filomena’s son—‘to the hotel. Filomena looked well. We all went to her apartment.’ It then goes on about her family, Katarina, Mystica, Peppino, etcetera…‘and we talked about all her affairs. Then, Miranda and I went to Vanda’s on via Barnaba Oriani. I lunched with Krishnaji, her, Cragnolini, and Barabino. Mary Cadogan telephoned. Yesterday’s Publication Committee went well. George resigned from the chairmanship. Ian Hammond doesn’t want the chairmanship, and suggested Mary C. be the chairman, and she was elected. Nelly remains a trustee in KFT.’

‘Miranda and I walked around Piazza Navonna and surrounding streets. At 7 p.m., we went to dine in Tre Scalini. I took her back to Filomena’s in a taxi.’

The next day, ‘To Vanda’s for lunch. Krishnaji and I went for a walk beforehand in Villa Glori.’ Villa Glori, this is where Vanda had a flat more in the northern part of Rome, and down the hill there’s a big park. ‘Rosalind telephoned Vanda yesterday from Paris to tell Krishnaji she wishes him well. Krishnaji told Vanda of her going around telling others, i.e., Naudé, that Krishnaji is wrong and doing wrong things. I left early in order to get back to the hotel where I met Miranda and Filomena, and the three of us went to St. Peters, to Piazza del Campidoglio, looked at the Forum, the Coliseum, the Trevi Fountain, and Piazza di Spagna. They dropped me at Vanda’s and they went on to Filomena’s. I had supper with Vanda.’

On the twenty-first. ‘I went with Filomena and Miranda to Villa Madama.’ Villa Madama is a house that my aunt once owned in Rome, very beautiful, built by one of the Medici popes for his daughter. The government owns it now.

S: Mmmm.

M: Filomena went to work there when she first worked for my aunt and all the old servants, many of them are still there, and so, they all came out and greeted her and me. ‘It looks well cared for. Then, we went to the Sistine Chapel and then to lunch with Vanda and Krishnaji. It was the first meeting of Filomena with Vanda and Fosca.’ [Laughs.] ‘Krishnaji gave Filomena a treatment. After lunch, Filomena, Miranda, and I came back to the hotel, and then we went driving to Appia Antica, the catacombs, etcetera. I passed our old house’—that’s where Sam and I had housed the last year when he did Ben-Hur. ‘And back to San Giovanni and Laterano.’

The twenty-second, ‘Miranda and Filomena lunched with me in Piazza Navonna. We sat out on the Piazza in lovely sunshine. Miranda and I went to Vanda’s. Topazia was there. Vanda took Miranda on a drive to the Janiculum. Krishnaji and I took a long walk in Villa Glori. Topazia had told of having a feverish talk about the Rajagopal case. Krishnaji answered her on that and on “authority” and of those around him and me. She is critical of me because I had advised against more meetings in Rome.’

‘The moon came up full and enormous through the pines as we walked. Miranda and I had supper there. I took her back to Filomena’s. We sat and talked a while, and then Filomena came along for the ride when a nephew drove me back. Miranda flies tomorrow to New York.’

October the twenty-third. ‘I did letters all morning, and lunched in the hotel. I did some shopping—a Braun shaver for Krishnaji and a steam iron for Filomena’—[laughter in voice]—‘then went and did letters with Krishnaji, followed by a walk with him in Villa Glori. “Is your subconscious working?” he said.’ [M and S both laugh.] ‘I went to see Filomena at 6:30 p.m. and went over her finances. We had a long talk.’

On the twenty-fourth, ‘I went to Vanda’s for lunch. At lunch with Vanda were Giorgio and Margherita Signorini, a man who has talked about the pyramids and earthquakes being triggered by the stars. Went later to Filomena’s for another long talk. Krishnaji suggested she come for a visit when he is in Malibu. I told her, and we would see about this.’

October twenty-fifth. ‘I left the Hotel Rafael with Filomena and Mario, her son, and went to Vanda’s. Reporters came to interview Krishnaji, also some student who monopolized things. After a late lunch, I took the train to Florence. I went up to see a friend in Florence and stayed in a pensione, which was nice.’

The next day, ‘I spent with my friend walking all over Florence.’

And the next day, the twenty-seventh, ‘I spent mostly in the Uffizi. And then I took a train back to Rome. Arrived at Vanda’s in late p.m. Unpacked. I am staying here.’ She invited me to stay in the flat on my return. ‘She and Krishnaji had gone to a movie, African Elephant.’ [Chuckles.]

The next day, ‘I spoke to Filomena, who had been to see a nearby doctor who will look after her. I went to the masseur, Ms. Goody,’ [laughs] ‘on Vanda’s and Krishnaji’s urging. She turned out to be a friend of Filomena who once worked for Dorothy.’ That was my aunt. ‘I had a fine massage and got back in time for lunch. Mr. Graf and Mme. Safra were there. Later Krishnaji and I walked.’

On the twenty-ninth, ‘Vanda drove Krishnaji and me to the Teatro dell’Arte, where Krishnaji gave his first talk in Rome, a very fine one. The place was overflowing. Barabino came to lunch and discussed Krishnaji’s future talks in Rome. Krishnaji may cut India to two months or less another year. Walked with him in the Villa Glori later. Vanda had a young man, Arthur Patterson, to supper.'

October thirtieth, 'Ms. Goody gave Krishnaji a massage and then me. I went with Mario to see Filomena, and saw the whole family. I came back for a lunch for thirty people at Vanda's. Krishnaji and I walked in Villa Glori. He said, "Pay attention to your unconscious. It may want to tell you something now. Do not take too long to change. You are quiet inside now. Do not take so long to change. It will tell you something and you must be alert and quick to respond, otherwise it is harmful." He has touched something that is now different, an interior movement. He talked of what is negotiable or not with Rajagopal. A letter came today from Noyes about Rajagopal talking rapprochement. Krishnaji dictated comments on this to me.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji said he had awakened at 4 a.m., and wished to tell me things. There was a discussion of about fifty people at Vanda's. Krishnaji and I walked in Villa Glori. Had lunch. Filomena came with Mario in the car at 3 p.m. I said my goodbyes, then Filomena and Mario drove me to the airport. I took the 5:30 p.m. Alitalia flight to Paris. Arrived at Plaza Athénée by 8:30 p.m. Telephoned Brockwood, and spoke to Dorothy and Doris.'

The first of November, 'I went to look at paintings at the Grand Palais, then at 5 p.m., Nadia Kossiakof and Marcelle Bondoneau came to have tea with me at the Plaza. We discussed work. They are concerned about the future and want to attend meetings to discuss this next year. I telephoned Mary Cadogan about the Italian publisher Ubaldini. At 7 p.m., I telephoned Rome and spoke to Vanda and Krishnaji.'

November second, 'Krishnaji telephoned just after 7 a.m. Rajagopal had rung him to say that he loves him, and whatever happens, he loves him as he did in the beginning. Krishnaji told him that he could settle things. Rajagopal said, "it is out of my hands." I felt sickened and upset. Krishnaji said, "It's no use being upset. It is done. It may mean something." He is still as quick as ever to hope that this unspeakable hypocrite will behave decently. I was feeling low and went to Charvet with Krishnaji's message. Dropped in to see…' oh, a woman who I haven't mentioned that I know there…'then to Chanel to fit the brown tweed, then went to Orly. The 5:30 p.m. Pan Am flight was two hours late taking off. I finally reached New York. There was a long wait for customs, and then to Bud and Lisa's at 10:30 p.m. We talked till very late.'

So, there's really nothing that involves Krishnaji for the rest of the year, because he's in India.

S: Alright, but if you want to just skip through and just see if there's anything from Krishnaji, and you can just read those things.

M: Alright.

'On the fifth of November, Krishnaji took an Alitalia flight from Rome to Delhi.'

Well, the first letter I had from Krishnaji was on November eighth. It reached me in New York, and it was written right after I left.

On the thirteenth of November, 'I flew from New York to Los Angeles and so home to Malibu. I sent Krishnaji a cable that I'd arrived.'

On the seventeenth of November, 'I got a special delivery letter from Krishnaji, his first from India. His Alitalia flight from Rome was delayed in Athens and the airline made him share a room in a hotel with a man who smelled and snored.'

S: Oh dear.

M: Oh, oh, oh [chuckling]. See, I should have been with him. He wouldn't have objected to something like that, but I would have objected for him.

S: I know, he'd just go along with it.

M: Yes, he went along with it. And I remember his telling me that when the bus took them back to the airport there was some American woman on the bus. They drove past the Acropolis and, he said with numbed voice, he said, "She never even looked up!" [S laughs.] The Acropolis! He couldn't believe it!

On the twenty-ninth of December. 'Letter number six came from Krishnaji, written in Madras. He had been asked questions about Vasanta Vihar by Rajagopal's lawyers. Madhavachari had given all of Krishnaji's private letters to Rajagopal. The thorough betrayal I had suspected,' it says here.

S: That's terrible. All of Krishnaji's letters to Madhavachari?

M: Yes, Krishnaji had been open and honest, and he wrote about the case, and what should be done, and asked his advice, and all the things we were talking about he wrote to Madhavachari, who promptly turned them over to Rajagopal.

So, that ends 1972.

Issue 26: January 1, 1973 to April 27, 1973

Most of this issue takes place in California, in Malibu, and then San Francisco where Krishnaji gave a series of talks.

In addition to the ongoing legal dispute with Rajagopal, Mary refers to Krishnaji dictating the first of what were to become Letters to the Schools which he intended to dictate fortnightly.

On a more quotidian level, nature impinges on Mary's life as she copes with severe rain which results in leaks in the house and structural damage caused by a landslide; she also records an earthquake.

An insight into Krishnaji and Mary's relationship is gained by a chance remark Krishnaji makes about Mary and the Lilliefelts having 'been sent by something to look after him'.

Mary: Krishnaji is in India through part of this period, so when I'm not with him, there's not as much about him as when we're together. I'll try to confine myself to things about Krishnaji and the work.

The first such notation is January fifth, 1973. 'Erna, Theo, and I went to the Ventura County Court for a hearing on various motions in the lawsuit, including ones to examine the KWINC books. Stanley Cohen represented us before a Judge Heaton. Somebody called Gary Gilbert was there for Rajagopal. Mrs. Casselberry and her son Austin Bee were present. The judge rejected Rajagopal's claims for Rosenthal's five-day-late reply on the interrogatories.' Apparently, Rajagopal wanted everything thrown out on the technicality that the interrogatories came in five days late. So that was a slight legal point.

On the ninth, 'Judge Heaton of the Ventura Court granted all our motions, including access to KWINC records. I cabled the news to Krishnaji in Bangalore. And I wrote to him all the details.'

On the tenth, 'a letter came from Frank Noyes about having seen Rajagopal twice. Rajagopal had an accident with a dog knocking him over. Rajagopal doesn't want to make an offer for a settlement. He says that Rajagopal claims that Krishnaji is "destroying him," etcetera.'

'There was a cable from Krishnaji that came on the thirteenth about the cable I sent him on the ninth, and my letter about the court hearing.'

'Krishnaji left Bombay and flew to Rome on January thirty-first.'

On February fifth, 'Krishnaji flew from Rome to Brockwood. At 11 a.m., I met Erna and Theo in the Beverly Hills office of an accountant. Rosenthal and Stanley Cohen were also present. We discussed what to look for in the KWINC accounts. I lunched nearby with Erna and Theo. It kept raining and raining and raining.'

On the ninth of February. It says here, 'the house was put in as the last bit of order. Krishnaji had left Brockwood, and at 1 p.m. English time, he took a TWA flight from London, and I met him at Los Angeles Airport at 4:30 p.m., looking very well in spite of his long flight and all his work this winter. We came back to Malibu, unpacked, and had supper by the fire. Krishnaji was not sleepy and so he talked a lot.'

The next day, 'it rained and we made breakfast together. He rested in bed all morning, but got up for lunch. Amanda came back from the hospital. Krishnaji slept all afternoon and we had supper by the fire and went early to bed. It rained all night.' [Chuckles.] What a litany of rain in this thing!

On the eleventh, 'it rained till mid-morning. There were 5.16 inches of rain for this storm, for a season total so far of 13.37 inches.' These are very vital statistics [S laughs] if you live in California!

Scott: Exactly. [M laughs.] Here in England, it would be nothing.

M: Yes, just another weekend. 'Krishnaji rested in the morning. In the afternoon, I went over to the Dunnes' for a short visit. When Krishnaji finished his nap, we went back to the Dunnes', and Krishnaji put his hands on Amanda for healing. Then, we took a brisk walk on the lower road.'

The twelfth, 'there was more rain. On television, they showed the return of the prisoners of war from Vietnam. I got lunch for Krishnaji and myself. In the afternoon, we went to the Dunnes' for Krishnaji to treat Amanda again. The Jaguar refused to start and so I left it in the Dunnes' driveway, and we came back on foot and walked around the lawn. My bedroom roof leaked in the night right over the bed.' [Both laugh.] Ohhh!

'Erna and Theo came on the fourteenth in the afternoon to see Krishnaji and we talked at length. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji and I walked over to the Dunnes'. Krishnaji treated Amanda, and the Lilliefelts went on to dinner in town.'

On the sixteenth. 'We went to the Dunnes' in the afternoon. Amanda is improving markedly. Krishnaji said that from across the canyon, he felt something continuing to help her. Amanda says she feels it, too.'

The seventeenth, 'was a beautiful day. We left at 9:30 a.m., taking a pot of creole rice…' That was something he liked very much; I used to make it for him.

S: What is it?

M: It was basically rice cooked with tomatoes and onions and things. [Chuckles.] '…and we drove to Ojai. There was snow on Topatopa and the other mountains. We met the other trustees at the Lilliefelts' at 11 a.m. It was a meeting to discuss most everything. Krishnaji wants to give four Ojai talks in April on seventh, eighth, fourteenth, and fifteenth. We took a walk later and then drove home at 6 p.m., had supper and went to bed early. Krishnaji said he felt something happening for Amanda, even from as far away as Ojai.'

The eighteenth 'was a warm, lovely day; a lazy one. We went to the Dunnes' and walked in the hills.'

S: Where would you walk in the hills?

M: We'd go up something called Corral Canyon to the very top, and then you could walk along the ridge on fire roads. Those mountains all have fire roads so the trucks can get in if there's a fire. And you could see vast stretches of ocean. It's quite lovely.

On the twentieth, 'Krishnaji had a 100.3 fever.' No wonder he felt washed out. 'He stayed in bed all day. He had no other symptoms except weakness. He slept almost nine hours.' He had a great ability to sleep.

S: Yes. But Krishnaji's sleep often seems to have been rather active.

M: How do you mean?

S: Well, he would say things like, things came to him in the middle of the night, or that…

M: Oh, yes.

S: So, it wasn't that he was just—

M: Out!

S: Out. His brain was…or something was happening very often.

M: Something was happening.

S: So, I don't know if one should even call it sleep. I mean, he certainly was resting, but…

M: Well…yes.

S: But some of that, certainly, from his descriptions, some of it doesn't seem so restful. [Laughs.]

M: That's all in the large category of "mystery."

S: I know.

M: Now, on the following day, which was the twenty-first, 'we were awakened at 6:45 a.m. by an earthquake.' [Both chuckle.] '5.75 magnitude, centered thirty-four miles west of Santa Monica in the ocean. Not as strong here as in 1970. Krishnaji's temperature was normal, but he felt weak and stayed in bed all day.'

On the twenty-third, 'Krishnaji's fever was gone, and he got up for lunch. At 3 p.m., Sidney Roth, Martha Longenecker, Erna and Theo, Ruth, Albion Patterson, and Alan Kishbaugh came to discuss filming a course with Krishnaji at San Diego; how to do it and with whom. We tentatively planned to do it with all of us asking questions during the week of March sixth.' This, of course, became the Anderson series.

The next day, 'Sidney Field came for lunch. Then, Krishnaji and I went to see a movie, Sleuth, with Laurence Olivier and Michael Caine. Krishnaji fainted gently as we came home along the Pacific Coast Highway, and then he half-fainted again a few minutes later. He said, "I felt far away."'

S: What happened to Martha Longenecker?

M: Oh, she's still around. I saw her last winter. She and Sidney Roth eventually married, and then he died. She still lives in San Diego. She's a potter, and active in the museum there. You've met her. She came here to Brockwood.

S: I can't remember her.

M: Well, she was very kind and twice lent us her house; both times we went. She just moved out and turned it over to us.

S: That was very nice of her.

M: And it was very comfortable, and very nice. A pleasant house; small and comfortable.

On the twenty-fifth, 'we went to the Malibu Cinema for the first time and saw The French Connection. He liked that.'

S: [laughing] Of course.

M: 'Mr. and Mrs. Louis Blau and Mrs. Robert Ellis came to tea to discuss with Krishnaji how they can help the work, and Felix Greene came to supper.'

Oh dear, here starts my trouble with the land. The twenty-sixth of February. 'The county engineer, Mr. Dunning, came to look at new cracks in the earth above the slide place. He recommended that a geologist see it. Krishnaji went over and treated Amanda.' All that rain did harm to the land.

S: Yes.

M: The twenty-seventh, 'I had trouble with the Jaguar, which I had to take in. I got back in time to lunch with Krishnaji. Felix Green came to tea and for Krishnaji to treat him.' He had cancer, too. Everybody had cancer. 'Then we went to see Amanda later, and took a walk down into the canyon.'

On the twenty-eighth, 'Frances McCann arrived in Malibu. She is staying in a motel, and came for lunch. Krishnaji talked at length to her later. I drove her back to her motel, and Krishnaji and I went to see the Dunnes. Krishnaji asked if she'—meaning Amanda—'had noticed anything special. She said only that she felt better. We walked in the canyon, through the Dunnes' gate and along the lower road.'

The first of March. 'Ruth Tettemer and her sister, Monica Phillips, and Frances McCann came for lunch. Krishnaji dictated the first of what he intends to be fortnightly messages to Brockwood and the India schools.' Ah, that's when that began. 'Again, we went to see Amanda. Walked along the canyon, along the lower road and back.'

S: And what were those fortnightly messages called?

M: Well, I think it's what became the Letters to the Schools. It isn't called that here, but says only, 'the first of fortnightly messages to Brockwood and India schools.'

The next day, 'I took the Jaguar to be checked. In a rented car, I took the Nagra to be serviced, and then bought silk nightshirts for Krishnaji and left them at a place to be made. Meanwhile, Krishnaji had had Sidney Field to lunch. We went over to the Dunnes'. Krishnaji treated Amanda, and then Krishnaji walked with Sidney while I sat with Amanda and Phil, and talked.'

The third. 'We had early lunch in the kitchen and picked up Frances McCann and went to a movie, The Getaway, in Santa Monica. When we came back, Krishnaji and I went to the Dunnes'. Amanda was looking suddenly much better. Krishnaji and I went for a walk down the canyon along the beach road.'

The fourth, 'was a beautiful day.' There were family things for me. 'The Mark Lees brought their twins for Krishnaji to treat. Alan Kishbaugh came to lunch and later walked with Krishnaji.'

On the seventh, 'we were ready to leave at 7:45 a.m. The Jaguar was packed and backed out of the garage and then got flooded. The Auto Club got it going and we left at 8:22 a.m. We were to meet the Lilliefelts and Kishbaugh at Wheeler Ridge by 9:30 a.m., but we missed them. Later, while we paused on Route 5, Kishbaugh came by and followed us from then on to San Francisco. Krishnaji and I reached the Huntington Hotel at 3 p.m. Alain Naudé came for tea.'

March eighth. 'Alain Naudé came to the hotel at 12:30 p.m., and with the Lilliefelts, the five of us lunched at Trader Vic's. The' [chuckles] 'head waiter, Hans, spoke of Father.' My father liked Trader Vic's, so he must have been a memorable client, as he usually was in restaurants he liked. [S laughs.] 'We walked up to the Masonic Center right next door to the Huntington. Their handsome hall seats 3,165. Krishnaji liked it. We did microphone and light arrangements while he was there. We came back to the hotel and Krishnaji rested, and I made our supper.' We had a nice flat there with two bedrooms and two bathrooms, a sitting room, and a kitchen. Very convenient.

On March ninth, 'Krishnaji rested quietly. I did letters. We lunched in the sitting room. While Krishnaji napped, I walked down for supplies—the health food store, and came back on a cable car. At 4 p.m., we drove to the Golden Gate Park. We met Naudé at the tennis courts, and went for a walk around the lake. We came back and Alain dined with us in the sitting room.'

The tenth, 'we walked across the street to the Masonic Center Auditorium, where at 11 a.m. Krishnaji gave his first San Francisco talk, which was mostly on relationship. The hall was 90 percent full. Naudé taped it on the Nagra. Kishbaugh came for lunch and stayed to talk after Krishnaji took a long nap. The rain kept us in. Jacob Needleman telephoned wanting to see Krishnaji about interviews. I questioned him on his Esalen connection. I suggested he send Krishnaji an outline of the plan he has in mind.'

On the eleventh of March, 'Krishnaji gave his second San Francisco talk'—this is on a Sunday—'in the Masonic Auditorium. Erna and Theo lunched with us in the apartment. In late p.m., Krishnaji and I drove to the Golden Gate Park and took a good walk.'

On March twelfth, the Monday, 'Krishnaji rested. Frances McCann and Alain Naudé came at 12:30 p.m. Krishnaji, and they, and I went to the Cannery…' It's a complex; it used to be a cannery in San Francisco, but it has been converted into lots of little shops and restaurants and things. '…and lunched in a crêpe restaurant. Then we went to Muir Woods, and took a long walk. We were back by 5 p.m., had a rest and supper.' Muir Woods is across Golden Gate Bridge, and John Muir Woods is full of redwood trees. Very nice.

On the thirteenth, 'I spoke to Amanda, and also Elfriede.' Elfriede was the German housekeeper I had in those days and she said that the hill has slipped a bit more after more rain. Krishnaji saw Mrs. Mathias. Then he, Alain, and I went to Ghirardelli Square to lunch, in a Mexican place.' There's the Cannery and there's Ghirardelli Square, both are old manufacturing places that have been made into shops and restaurants. Very nice. 'Later, we went to see Alain's flat and he played for us on the piano. I drove us back in time for Monica Phillips to tea.' Monica Phillips was Ruth Tettemer's sister, and had known Krishnaji forever.

S: Who was Mrs. Mathias?

M: She was an elderly lady who'd known Krishnaji from way back when. She lived in a very elegant apartment on Nob Hill looking out over Golden Gate Bridge and everything. She was almost blind, and she was a widow by then, and she was also an old close friend of the Rajagopal family.

On the fourteenth, 'A Dr. Rockman of Argentina came to see Krishnaji at noon. Then Donald Ingram Smith came. We lunched in the rooms. Krishnaji dictated a To the Schools'—you see, now the name comes—'the first of a series he wants to do. This one on freedom and responsibility. I went out to market and then we walked in Golden Gate Park.'

On March fifteenth, 'there was a meeting at 11 a.m. of the Lilliefelts, Kishbaugh, and Naudé about taping different discussions. The Lilliefelts, Naudé, Krishnaji, and I went to the Cannery to lunch, at the crêperie again, after which I shopped a little. Krishnaji rested, and then Jacob Needleman came to tea. Later, Krishnaji and I walked in Golden Gate Park.'

The next day, 'I went to a Dr. Cho, a Chinese chiropractor for back pain.' I don't remember that. 'I returned in time to walk. Krishnaji visited Mrs. Mathias again, where he treated her, and then returned to the hotel, where Dr. Rockman lunched with us. Later we went to Golden Gate Park for a walk.' You see, I had my car there so we could drive to all these places.

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji gave his third talk at 11 a.m. in the Masonic Auditorium on suffering and death, a very fine one. The audience was HUGE,' it says. 'We lunched with the Lilliefelts, Naudé, and Kishbaugh at Hong Kong Garden. We had a vegetarian Chinese meal ordered by Naudé and Kishbaugh. Rested till 5 p.m. Walked around the square outside the hotel. Then Monica Phillips came to tea.' Right outside the Huntington, up on Nob Hill, there's a little, very small park. And if we didn't go to a larger park a drive away, we'd just go out the door, across the street, and walk round and around and around.

S: [laughing] Doing laps.

M: Yes, some laps.

Next day, the eighteenth, 'Krishnaji gave his fourth San Francisco talk on the religious life, meditation, and enlightenment. The hall was full. Afterward he saw'…some family, whose name I can't make out. 'Then, we took Ruth McCandless, Frances McCann, and Alan Kishbaugh to lunch at Hong Kong Garden. At 4 p.m., David and Felicity Hall came to tea. We discussed a meeting of scientists at Brockwood. A possible topic is a total view of things, wholeness. I invited them to Malibu. We will have discussions next weekend. When they left, we did ten laps' [laughing] 'around the little park! And then had supper.'

S: Now, who are the Halls?

M: Well, David Hall was a scientist working at Stanford Research and he was doing research on computerizing clouds, [chuckles] I think, either then or at some later point. He was bright, but he had an eccentricity, I guess you'd call it, of liking to wear women's clothes. [Laughing.]

S: [chuckles] Yes, that's one of the things you can call it.

M: He had a wife and several children, and they looked perfectly normal, except that he liked to wear women's clothes.

S: He would show up in women's clothes?

M: Yes.

S: Like what?

M: Long skirts, blouses, women's sweaters. I've forgotten, really.

S: Really?

M: Yes.

S: That's extraordinarily eccentric. [Both chuckle.]

M: He didn't look gay, as it were. He looked perfectly normal, with a square masculine build. But this was part of what he thought of as freedom, or some such notion. [S laughs.] I'd forgotten about him. I have some correspondence with him in Ojai, but I've forgotten what's in it. [Chuckles.]

Now comes the nineteenth. 'It rained, and I went back to Dr. Cho for my back. I photocopied To the Schools. Krishnaji went again to see Mrs. Mathias.' She adored Krishnaji. She's the one who gave me those photographs of Krishnaji by that great photographer, Edward Weston. I have them in Ojai. You've seen them. Mrs. Mathias left them to me in her will. She was a very nice woman, and she was very friendly to me. She was also close to Rosalind and Radha. She felt the legal case was regrettable, but she didn't take sides in the dispute. She's been dead some years now.

On the twentieth, 'we left the Huntington at 9:05 a.m., and drove south. The Big Sur route was closed, so we came down 101 through rain, hail, and sleet. We stopped for a forty-minute picnic lunch at Pismo Beach. Krishnaji drove from the Pleasant Valley bypass to Malibu, arriving at 4:45 p.m. Seven hours and forty minutes, with one hour for stops, equals six hours and forty minutes' [laughter in voice] 'and four hundred and twenty-one miles.' [S laughs.] Now you know everything. 'I looked at the earth slippage. The water pipe is broken below the vegetable garden. I went over to see the Dunnes. Amanda is suffering.'

March the twenty-first. 'A lovely morning. It is good to be home. Krishnaji spent the day in bed resting. He had his lunch on a tray in bed, but had supper in the living room as usual.' We used to eat on trays always, and he'd sit in a chair and I'd sit on that long sofa that you've slept on…

S: I know it well.

M: …and the television was in front of us. Some geologist contacted me about the slide.

On March twenty-third, 'Krishnaji resumed his morning exercises and got up for lunch. I trimmed his hair. Sidney Field came to walk with Krishnaji in the afternoon, and I went to the Dunnes'. Felicity and David Hall came to spend the night.' I didn't remember that.

March twenty-fourth, 'I got up early and cooked. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held a discussion about conditioning with Felicity and David Hall, Erna, Theo, Ruth, Albion, Alan Kishbaugh, and Sidney Field who brought a man named Leslie Stephens. They all stayed to lunch. The Halls stayed on after lunch, and they, Krishnaji, and I walked near Pepperdine. Then Krishnaji had supper in bed.'

Now the next day, which was a Sunday, 'Krishnaji held the second Malibu discussion with the same group as yesterday. It was on education, and he spoke of a school here in California being necessary because we are in a time of violence, a "Dark Age." He also said, there is a residue of both good and evil that exists in itself. Then he said, "I am not speculating. I know this." We must bring up children in goodness, an umbrella of it sheltering them. How are we to have it? We already are in this goodness or we would not be here. Extraordinary turn to this discussion. Sidney Field and Leslie Stephens left. I had asked the Halls only to stay to lunch, but we ended up being nine for lunch, all trustees met and the Halls joined in talking of a school. Erna says the Happy Valley School is rumored to be closing. She wonders if perhaps it can be recuperated for Krishnaji. The Halls are willing to join in running it. Krishnaji asked if we are all willing? Yes. Finally, everyone left. Krishnaji went to bed. I sent Elfriede off and cooked supper.'

The next day, which was the twenty-sixth, 'a geologist came by to look at the slide. He recommended taking core samples of the earth where it is sliding. Krishnaji and I went to the Dunnes'. He placed his hands on Amanda. Then, we walked down the canyon along the road and home to make supper.'

On the twenty-seventh, 'we took the Jaguar to be serviced, and a new' [laughing] 'wire was put in because a pack rat had chewed the old one.' Pack rats were another hazard of life in Malibu. While waiting for the Jaguar to be fixed, we went to Marine Land in a borrowed car, had a picnic afterward in the car, came back and shopped in Westwood—books and a jersey for Krishnaji. Then we went to Lindberg's'—that's the health food store; he liked to go there. 'We returned the borrowed car, picked up the Jaguar, and came home.'

The twenty-ninth, 'was a beautiful day. I did deskwork. We lunched alone. Bill Angelos had an interview with Krishnaji. Sidney Field came and we walked with him, and afterward Krishnaji saw Amanda. I stayed and talked to the Dunnes. In the evening, we played Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and Krishnaji was very moved.' [Chuckles.] 'It is the official end of the war in Vietnam as far as the U.S. is concerned. All our prisoners have been released, and our troops have withdrawn.'

On the thirty-first of March, 'Krishnaji held a discussion with the Lilliefelts, Ruth Tettemer, Albion Patterson, Alan K., Sidney Field, and Leslie Stephens about a school. They all stayed for lunch. At 4 p.m., Eve Siegel came for an interview with Krishnaji.' Eve Siegel was Ruth Tettemer's daughter.

S: Was that group discussion recorded?

M: Oh, yes. It would have been.

S: Let me just write that because that's not listed here in the archives list.

M: I presume it was recorded, but my diary doesn't say so.

The next day was April first and 'we had another discussion with the same group as the day before, and it was on creation. We lunched alone and went to the Dunnes'.'

On the third of April, 'Krishnaji dictated another To the Schools.'

The next day, 'Amanda had to go back into the hospital. After lunch, we packed and drove to Ojai and the Lilliefelts for Krishnaji's weekend talks, arriving at 5 p.m. I made supper and we talked. Krishnaji spoke of a sense he has that the Lilliefelts and I have been sent by something to look after him, and we must be responsible and keep control of the schools and also be prepared to handle whatever this coming tide of energy will bring. We three must keep things in our hands.'

On Saturday the seventh of April, 'Kishbaugh came by for the Nagra as he is doing the recording. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji gave his first Ojai talk for the year in Libbey Park. There was a large crowd. He and I lunched alone. At 3 p.m., all trustees met with Mr. and Mrs. Robert Ellis about the Ellis's suggestion for an expansion plan for the work—a "Friends of the KFA" to be formed. They also suggested a Finance Committee, and an office manager; and they suggested the creation of materials for groups. Later, Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Alan Kishbaugh, and I walked. At supper with Erna and Theo, Krishnaji described the horror of his life with Rosalind Rajagopal and Rajagopal.'

On Sunday, April eighth, 'Krishnaji gave his second Ojai talk in Libbey Park, a special one; the place of knowledge. Frances McCann, Alan K., and Theo were at lunch. Krishnaji wanted to see Sulphur Mountain as a possible place for a school.' Do you remember Sulphur Mountain?

S: Yes, I do.

M: 'So, with Erna too, we all drove up. Agnes Barron, who has held it for the last twenty-five years for Meher Baba, showed us some of it.' She was an elderly little woman who was holding this piece of land. She bought it for Meher Baba, who was going to come and speak…you know he's the one who never spoke. And, of course, he never came and he never spoke [S laughs] anywhere, in India or Sulphur Mountain. She's still there, as far as I know. That afternoon, Krishnaji gave interviews.

On April ninth, 'there was a KFA trustees meeting about the dates for U.S. talks and about a school. "It should start small," Krishnaji said. Krishnaji is back as trustee of KFA.' I wonder what that means?

S: Wasn't he off it for a while because of the law case or something like that?

M: Yes. I think you're right. 'In the afternoon, he gave an interview to Priscilla Teiry, David Young, Mrs. Lee Eldridge, the Blackburns, Jim Dixon, and Jim Wallace.' That's the way he used to just give interviews. 'The Blackburns immediately misinterpreted what Krishnaji said to them to Ruth Tettemer.' [Laughs.]

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the students at Thacher School. Ingram Smith taped it on our Nagra. The Hookers gave a lunch for Krishnaji in the Ranch House Restaurant Garden. Also at the lunch were the Lilliefelts, Frances McCann, Ingram Smith, Albion, Ruth, Robert Ellis, and his daughter. Afterward, Krishnaji and I drove, following Theo, to a Mercedes mechanic named Dieter…' Oh, this is where Dieter comes in! Dieter's the one who's looked after the cars all these years. '…who has a garage in Oxnard. We discussed the logistics of what to do with the Mercedes Krishnaji has to buy from Moser. I am to buy it from Krishnaji. We came home to Malibu. Amanda is still in the hospital.'

S: Why were you buying the Mercedes from Krishnaji?

M: We'd ordered it in Switzerland, and we'd ordered it with, I think, American specifications. Originally, you see, it began with Enrique Biascoechea gift of the little two-seater Mercedes to Krishnaji. Then he wanted one a little bit bigger so four people could sit in it. So we ordered the slightly larger one, but he didn't like the way the next model looked of that year. So, Mr. Moser in Thun, Switzerland persuaded Mercedes in Stuttgart to postpone the order.

S: Yes. I remember all this, but I was just interested to know why you ended up buying it from Krishnaji.

M: Well, somebody had to pay the rest of it.

S: And for some reason it was better in your name than in his?

M: I don't really remember, to tell you the truth. So, it was technically mine, [S laughs] but spiritually and otherwise it was Krishnaji's.

S: I know, I know.

M: Krishnaji only had two cars since, I don't know, the '20s: one was the original Biascoechea little silver one, and then this one, the Green Beauty.

On April eleventh, 'Krishnaji gave an interview to a Los Angeles Times reporter, Bela Stumbo. We lunched alone.' As I recall, the resulting article was not interesting.

'Krishnaji slept all afternoon. Miranda Dunne came over briefly. And then Krishnaji and I walked around the lawn and weeded a bit.'

The next day, 'I went to town for Krishnaji's French visa and income tax things, but was home in time for lunch. Then we drove to Ojai and the Lilliefelts to spend a second weekend for Krishnaji's public talks. All four of us took a long walk around by Thacher Road.' Well, I took ill from pain in esophagus, well, anyway, I was…cured.

On the thirteenth, 'Krishnaji saw Roger Wrather'—that's Gaby Blackburn's son by her first marriage to an Indian man—'and he also saw Mark Lee's children. Rested in the afternoon. We read the interrogatory put together by lawyer Cohen and sent to Rajagopal, and met with Ruth and Albion about the school. Afterward, we walked in the late afternoon. Krishnaji now is talking about a cottage we could build in Ojai, pull down Arya Vihara[1] and build a new one on that land.'

S: Mm, hm. [Laughs.]

M: [laughs] Goodness, that's heresy. Good heavens. Couldn't do that. But…

Editor's Note:* For Krishnaji to have thought of building on the land of Arya Vihara, there must have been a strong sense that the KFA was going to recover at least some of the vast acreage in Ojai that had been given for Krishnaji's work, but which had been transformed into property that Rajagopal controlled.

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave his third Ojai public talk of that year in Libbey Park. Alan Kishbaugh came to lunch. In the afternoon, I talked to Robert Logan, a "cinematographer" who wants to do a documentary on Krishnaji. His plan is expensive. Krishnaji came in on the end of it. Later, Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Alan K., and I went for a walk.' Nothing came of that expensive documentary plan, obviously.

On April fifteenth, 'Krishnaji gave his fourth and final Ojai talk. In the afternoon, Krishnaji held a meeting about a school. Present were Erna and Theo, Ruth, Albion, Alan K., Felicity and David Hall, and Robert Ellis. There was a great deal of discussion. It finally ended after 6:30 p.m., and Krishnaji and I drove home to Malibu, followed by Alan K., who stayed for supper.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji's head was hurting. He stayed in quietly all day. The David Halls came by at 4 p.m. to discuss a school brochure, and a scientist meeting at Brockwood. I went over to see Amanda.'

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji dictated another To the Schools. There was endless back and forth with Robert Ellis about the Bela Stumbo article. She insists on mentioning the lawsuit.'

The next day, 'I went to town on visa matters and such. Mr. and Mrs. Blau and Mr. and Mrs. Pollock to tea, and we talked about a school.' This is complicated, but this is worth explaining for posterity. Dr. Pollock was married to Mrs. Pollock [both chuckle], now let me get this right, Mrs. Pollock was the daughter of Louis and Erma Zalk, and Erma Zalk was the sister of Rosalind Rajagopal. And the Pollocks were friends of the Blaus.

S: Right.

M: And Dr. Pollock was on the Happy Valley School board, and he was trying to get Krishnaji back into Happy Valley, so that was being endlessly discussed. I mistrusted the whole affair, and nothing came of it, but there was a lot of talk about it.

On the nineteenth, 'Dr. Allan Anderson from San Diego State, Albion Patterson and his son Phillip, and Alan Kishbaugh came to lunch to discuss Krishnaji doing videotaped conversation with Anderson next February. Krishnaji and Alan K. walked. And I went over to the Dunnes'.'

On Saturday, April twenty-first, 'I started packing. We lunched alone. At 3 p.m., Erna, Theo, Ruth, Albion, and Kishbaugh came. The Stumbo article is in tomorrow's Times, and it's rather trashy. We discussed the school and fundraising, etcetera. Evelyne and Lou Blau joined us at 4:15 p.m. and we continued the discussion of work until almost 7 p.m.'

On April twenty-third, 'We got up at 5 a.m. At 7 a.m., Alan K. came. Krishnaji rode with him, and I went with Miranda in the VW to the airport. We took a TWA flight, which was delayed an hour for a tire, but finally took off a little after 10 a.m. We got to New York, where a car met us, and we reached the Ritz Tower by 8 a.m.' The Ritz Tower, as I think I said before, was where my father owned a small flat that he used when he came to the United States. In the meantime, the Ritz Tower would rent it, like a semi-hotel, so that when he wasn't there, he got rental for it. It was alright, with a sitting room, a tiny kitchenette that was a about a yard wide, and two bedrooms each with its own bathroom.

The next day, the twenty-fourth, 'Narasimhan came to see Krishnaji at 9 a.m. Krishnaji and I both went to see Dr. Wolf at 11:30 a.m.' He's the old German doctor who did all that business with the cells that Bud talks about.

'We lunched at Lafayette.' That was a very good restaurant, French restaurant, then. It lost business because it made a terrible mistake. It wouldn't let women come in trousers, and it turned away Jacqueline Kennedy.

S: Oh, mistake. [Laughs.]

M: And pretty soon, Lafayette was no more. [Both laugh.] But it was nice. It was small and very good food. I bought Krishnaji a Vuitton bag to carry on the plane. Krishnaji had his hair cut.

‘We went back the next day to Dr. Wolf and both got good reports from the tests he took yesterday. And I had an implantation.’ That was the cells. ‘We shopped a little and lunched at Giovanni’s.’ That was another nice restaurant.

S: Did Krishnaji have any implants?

M: No, I did.

S: But he later did, didn’t he?

M: Later, yes.

S: Did you feel any effect from it?

M: No. [Chuckles.] Not discernible. Well, it was supposed to give you energy or something. It was also supposed to head off illnesses, you know, what you’re ailing in, or deficient in, it’s supposed to supply.

‘We had lunch at Giovanni’s, which is an Italian restaurant and is nice. Erna telephoned that Rajagopal has sent us a fifty-four-question interrogatory. Erna will send it to Brockwood. At 7 p.m., we took an Air France flight to Paris.’

S: To Paris?

M: Yes.

S: Why did he go to Paris?

M: I don’t know, don’t remember. [Laughing.] We’ll see.

On the twenty-sixth, ‘We landed at Orly at 8:30 a.m. Took a taxi to the Plaza Athénée, where we had our usual rooms. As we’d had no sleep on the plane, Krishnaji rested all day. Bud and Lisa’—that’s my brother and sister-in-law—‘are at Father’s apartment on Cardinal Lemoine[2], which is not yet finished remodeling, but they can stay there. They lunched with me in the Régence. Krishnaji has severe cramps in his right lower leg muscle, so severe that he had almost fainted. I put hot wet towels on it, and it subsided. We had supper in the rooms.’

The next day, the twenty-seventh of April, ‘I went with Krishnaji to Lobb and Charvet. In the Régence, we had Marcelle Bondoneau and Mar de Manziarly to lunch. There was much talk of the early days with Mar’s family. Krishnaji was asking what the young Krishnamurti was like. Sacha has been taken to the American Hospital, so we went there in the afternoon with Mar. Sacha looked grey and seemed unaware of how ill he is.’ Krishnaji was alone with him for about ten minutes, while Mar and I talked to the nurse. The results of the test won’t be known till Monday. Krishnaji and I left. Krishnaji said to me “Never let me be in a hospital. I would rather die quietly at home.” This was the first time he has been in a hospital in many years. The atmosphere disturbed him. We met Nadia Kossiakof at the hotel and talked awhile. Then Krishnaji and I dined in our rooms.'

S: Shall we end here?

M: Yes.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Arya Vihara is a house next to Pine Cottage, Krishnaji's first little cottage in Ojai. Krishnaji's brother died in Arya Vihara in 1925, and the Rajagopals lived there for many years. Today it provides guest accommodations to those wishing to visit and study Krishnaji's teachings.

[2] La Tour d'Argent restaurant is on the top floor of a building on the corner of Quai de la Tournelle and Rue du Cardinal Lemoine. Mary's father's apartment was the floor beneath the restaurant, and the entrance for the apartments in that building is on Rue du Cardinal Lemoine. The entrance for the restaurant is only for the restaurant, and is directly on the corner, but claims the address of 15 Quai de la Tournelle. Mary and her brother Bud both inherited the apartment when their father died, but Mary didn't want it, so Bud bought her out.

Issue 27: April 28, 1973 to July 14, 1973

This issue starts in Paris with Mary describing difficulties with her new car that breaks down several times in Paris and on the ferry to England. The incident prompts an extended discussion about the unique and subtle challenges that Mary faces in travelling with Krishnaji which provides insight both into Krishnaji's character and Mary's sense of responsibility for his wellbeing.

The issue ends with an editor's note to include a loose note found in Mary's large diary for this period in which Krishnaji describes to her one of the strange phenomena that he periodically undergoes.

Scott: Okay. We're starting on April twenty-eight, 1973.

Mary: Well, we open this session with Krishnaji and myself in Paris, and we were staying at the Plaza Athénée briefly, having flown from the U.S. It says here, 'At 1 p.m., Mr. Moser delivered the Mercedes to us from Thun. We discussed Krishnaji getting his new one, which must be taken this year in July. So, after he left, we joined my brother Bud and his wife Lisa at Chez Conti, the Italian restaurant that Krishnaji liked. We talked about the proposed new Krishnamurti school in Ojai, raising money, etcetera. Back at the hotel, we put all the luggage in the Mercedes, and then it wouldn't start.' [S laughs heartily.] 'It had come all the way from Switzerland but it wouldn't start' [laughter in voice] 'and the man had gone. So, the doorman got a cable and got it going.'

'I bought the cable to take along in case we had this adventure along the way, and we set off for Le Havre at 5 p.m. We stopped for petrol en route, and it started up. At Le Havre, we put it in a queue for the Thoresen Ferry, and we walked to a restaurant called Monico, where we have had dinner before. Luckily, the car started when we got back and we were able to get it onto the ferry. The Plaza Athénée had managed to get us both a state room on the new ferry, and Krishnaji had one with a bath. We got to Southampton in the morning, but' [chuckles] 'the car wouldn't start!'

S: Oh, no.

M: 'And it humiliatingly had to be pushed off by hand, while I jumpstarted it. Then we motored off from Southampton, on a lovely misty morning, and got to Brockwood by 8:30 a.m. We had breakfast and talked all morning with Dorothy, and then Krishnaji slept all the rest of the day.' [Chuckles.]

S: Now, if we could just stop here, because this might be a good place to unfold a nightmare that I know you had, which is when you're traveling with Krishnaji [M quietly chuckles, followed S laughing] and something doesn't go well…

M: You're desperate!

S: …you're desperate, and you don't know what to do—how to give attention to that thing that hasn't gone well, and to simultaneously take care of Krishnaji. You can't just leave him beside the road.

M: Yes.

S: So, explain all that you would feel and all about that.

M: Well, it happened to me on a similar…I'm mixed up in what year anything happened; but when I'd taken a brand-new Mercedes—mine not his—in Paris; Moser delivered it. I don't think this is the year because this wasn't a new one. Everything was marvelous and off we went, and on the highway to Le Havre, I was coasting along and suddenly the motor went off and the momentum was keeping us going but there was no motor. Terror! [Chuckles.] So, we're in the middle of god knows where, no villages, nothing in sight but highway, and I naturally pulled over and the car rolled to a stop.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And there we were. What was I going to do? [Laughter.]

S: The prospect of something like that must've been a nightmare always!

M: It was because it's not any fun if it happens to you when you're alone, but if it happens to you, with him in the car, it is the worst thing that could happen. I can go back to my first experience of driving with him in traffic, which I've described previously when I hired a car and took him to Wisley Gardens, in England; and I had to come back through very heavy traffic in a great hurry because Doris had said he must be back at 6 p.m., and 6 p.m. was approaching rapidly, and the traffic was thickening, and I was driving on the left, which I was not used to it, and I had him in the car…

S: I know…

M: Alain Naudé too, but that didn't matter.

S: But the whole sense of taking care of him…

M: The responsibility! And what if I had an accident…

S: Exactly.

M: It was just too awful.

S: That whole sense of being responsible and also how vulnerable Krishnaji was. I mean, Krishnaji wasn't exactly what you would call street smart. [Both laugh heartily.]

M: That's the farthest thing from whatever he was. And it was my job to get him to where he was going safely, comfortably, and pleasantly, if possible.

S: Yes. I want to put this on the record, because people are liable to think, "Oh, how very pleasant, how very nice for Mary to just, you know, drive him around all the time."

M: I know.

S: But the heavy responsibility of it, they don't think about.

M: And also where he stayed. I spent hours doing research, mostly in the Michelin guide, for what would be a proper place for him to spend the night.

S: Yes.

M: And I'd never seen these places before. I had to guess. So all the computing of whether this was good or not, it took a lot of anxiety.

S: Yes, yes. And where you eat and whether the kitchens were clean and whether…

M: …there was vegetarian food, and would it be quiet…

S: Exactly!

M: And would it be not crowded and…it was endless!

S: Yes, the atmosphere…

M: The atmosphere, all those things. And coping with it when we got there, you know, I was in charge and he just stood there gracefully.

S: Yes.

M: All the logistics, in other words.

S: Yes. You see, if this is going to be a record of what it was like for you to be with Krishnaji, it needs to be understood that you are just happily sailing through different…

M: Yes. Yes, wasn't she lucky to…

S: Yes, nice restaurants and nice hotels…

M: …all over these wonderful places.

S: Yes. [M chuckles.] It was full of travail!

M: Yes.

S: And challenge, yes.

M: When we stayed at Barbizon for a short rest, just outside Paris, I think we've already passed that time, I went out ahead of time and cased the place on a previous visit; lunched, looked at the rooms, talked to the management, all that way beforehand, before I ever engaged the rooms.

S: Yes. And also, it needs to be said, that this wasn't just out of some manic spoiling of Krishnaji.

M: No, I think…

S: But there was a sense that for his finest sensitivities and qualities to flower, or to…

M: Yes.

S: He needed that kind of support.

M: That's what I mean. A lot of carping people, I think, who don't understand or just like to criticize, think, "Why was he always surrounded by luxury?" But, in fact, for a lot of his life, he was in the opposite: he was in awful places. But that wasn't right for him, not just because one wants him to have nice things, but because his energy was supposed to go into the teachings.

S: Exactly.

M: His health had to be maintained. He was physically fragile in the sense of he wasn't tough and rough…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …and made to endure difficulties. He was much more aware of things, if the food was wrong or if…

S: Yes.

M: And it wasn't that he was fussy.

S: No.

M: It was that those were the conditions of his being able to constantly travel and talk into his ninety-first year.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And I hope anybody who listens to this down the way will try to understand that.

S: Well, exactly; that's why this is a good point to make. This was clear to me, I saw this clearly. Krishnaji was the least demanding, the least grasping, the least self-centered or self-concerned person I have ever come across, but these things were like infrastructure, support, and alright, he would and could endure the things Rajagopal and Rosalind put him through, you know, he could deal with all that…

M: Well, he never complained.

S: …and he never complained, and he'd just get on with things. But it took his time and his energy and did not support the thing which he cared most about, and which we care the most about, which was his speaking.

M: Well, that was…it was more than that he cared about it…it was his…

S: Everything…

M: …it was his job…because…

S: That's right, that's right. Yes, yes.

M: He said that he lived for that…that was his thing he had to do. But it was his lack of being grasping and demanding that was being abused by people…

S: Absolutely, absolutely.

M: I mean in Ojai, in the Rajagopal days, he would do all the dishwashing to get rid of the others [chuckle]. Rajagopal would always get out of doing it, making a great fuss and he'd say "No, no," and Krishnaji would say "Let me do it." It was less trouble for him to do it than to put up with the fuss, and he did it. And he would clean up after the dog messes of Rosalind's poodle. He was a person who never expected to be given anything or to be waited on. In fact, he was fussy about people going to trouble for him; he would try to prevent that…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …he would try to do it himself. So, one had to sort of do it kind of invisibly, not…

S: Mm, hm, mm, hm. Yes, he didn't like being waited on.

M: No. And all that I described about clearing up the dishes with me…

S: Well, he didn't feel it was…he didn't feel it was right somehow, that you do it.

M: No.

S: …he had extraordinary humility.

M: Yes. So, all of the fun with the fuss we made over…

M/S: [said together] doing dishes.

S: I know, I know [laughing].

M: And [chuckles], but he was very firm about that. And I used to, I think I've said this, but if I haven't, I'll say it again; when it was in my house in Malibu or Ojai or elsewhere, people were there and I'd cook the meal and so forth, I implored him not to get up and clear the dishes. "Let me do it invisibly. You stay at the table and keep the conversation going," I would say. "No, no, no, no!" he'd reply, he couldn't do that. [Both chuckle.] So I would get up and try to take the plates away because he would jump up, and then everybody in the room would jump up and utter chaos would follow, which made it much harder for me [S laughing]. It ruined the whole way the luncheon should've gone. But, I think he also didn't want it to be seen that he was being waited on.

S: Yes.

M: He also felt that, "No, ladies shouldn't do that." A wonderful old-fashioned thing.

S: [laughing] I know. Ladies shouldn't wait on gentlemen, yes.

M: No! He accepted it in India because that's the sort of structure that is there…

S: Yes.

M: …you let servants be servants.

S: Yes.

M: There's actually no way you can do things for yourself there, anyway. But once in the Western world, when servants disappeared, as indeed they did, it wasn't right for your friends to wait on you.

S: Yes.

M: He had a wonderfully old-fashioned courteous thing about ladies.

S: Oh, very much! Yes, he was very much the old world gentleman.

M: Yes. And of course his manners would baffle some people; opening the door for me to go through first and things like that. That shocked people. But, I wouldn't have interfered with that because it would've been like asking him to be rude.

S: Yes, yes.

M: I couldn't ask him to be rude.

S: And this same thing of my waiting on him; a couple of times I can remember his saying to me, "Sir, you mustn't wait on me." And I would say to Krishnaji, "But, I'm having fun," and then it was alright.

M: Yes, yes.

S: If I was doing it just for fun, then it was okay…

M: Yes, because then it accrued to you more than him.

S: [laughing heartily] Exactly, then it was alright.

M: Yes. And the same for me. I mean it was…

S: Of course.

M: It was a delight to do things for him.

S: Of course.

M: I'm sure that many people will criticize the fact that he was staying at the Plaza Athénée. Well, to me, nothing was too good for him.

S: Absolutely.

M: And it gave me fun…

S: Of course it did.

M: …to be able to make that happen.

S: Yes, yes. And it's lovely, you see, that Krishnaji didn't block that because of appearances or fear of what some people might think, or something else. It's lovely that that…

M: Yes. And it, in a way, I mean, we did go to that one place, I can't remember which year it was. We went down into Touraine; we stopped at a very opulent place, the Michelin over-rated it; it was just pretentious…

S: Yes.

M: It was a wealthy industrialist's château. He had built it and then he died, and they turned it into a hotel. And it was opulent and vulgar and pretentious, and we couldn't wait to leave in the morning.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, he was sensitive to that kind of thing. But because a place like the Plaza Athénée gives excellence, it was different.

S: Yes. See that's the other thing which is interesting to think of, that because Krishnaji was so sensitive to all these things, the fact that the atmosphere was correct or the place was correct, or the food was correct, it was more obvious, at least to my seeing, the importance of these things is more obvious. For someone who was of a more general insensitivity, if they stayed in a place with excellence or they stayed in a place that was mediocre, they had a bed—what does it matter? But in fact, it does matter, and the more sensitive a person is, the more it matters, and because Krishnaji was so sensitive, you could see that it really mattered…

M: Yes.

S: …and it wasn't just superfluous…

M: No!

S: …to care about the atmosphere, to care about the excellence, to care about the beauty of things and the quality of the food; it wasn't superfluous. It actually had a real discernible impact. And that's why these things were important.

M: Yes. He valued excellence in all things, but he didn't depend on anything.

S: No. Quite right. So, he could benefit from it, but without being dependent on it.

M: Yes. Yes.

Anyway, 'we got to Brockwood. We had a telegram waiting for us from Mar de Manziarly saying that Sacha had died the day before when we were motoring.' If you recall from our last discussion, Krishnaji had gone to see Sacha in the American hospital…

S: Yes.

M: …those few days we were in Paris. And I had a long talk with him.

S: What did Sacha die of?

M: I don't remember. I think something like a stroke, something like that. I'm not sure.

S: This is also a side track, but it seems that most of the people who were, I want to say close to him, or who were real friends of Krishnaji's, were female.

M: Yes.

S: And Sacha was one of the few male friends that he had from his youth.

M: Yes, yes. He had…

S: …he was the only male friend he had from his youth.

M: Well, he had, of course, what is his name…oh, really, my memory…there was someone who should've done the job that Rajagopal fell into, but who died very suddenly years before, who was a friend…

S: Yes.

M: Oh, the names…I can hear it in my head and I can't say it…anyway, he had friends in those early days, but as you point out…

S: They died.

M: …they disappeared.

S: Exactly.

M: People were taken away from him that were…

S: Yes, it's like Nitya.

M: Aldous Huxley.

S: Huxley, exactly. There were friends that he had, but they died.

M: Yes. That's true. But it might be interesting, thinking of this, Sacha dying and Krishnaji went to the hospital and saw him, because it was coincidence that we came to Paris at that moment and that Sacha had just gone into hospital, I think. And then later, or maybe it's before this, when Mrs. Bindley died; she'd fallen down stairs. He went to the hospital, and saw her, and she died very soon after that, a few days later, I think. It was somewhere south of London in a hospital. When we went in, she was asleep. Krishnaji stood at the door, and I went over to the bed and very quietly sat down, and said quietly, "Mrs. Bindley, Krishnaji is here and has come to see you." In her sleep almost, or just as she was coming to, she said, "Oh, lovely, lovely, lovely." [Chuckles.]

S: Mm, how nice.

M: It was so touching. And then I went out of the room, and he talked with her, and she died quite soon.

It says here, 'I went to the garage because of my car sometimes not starting, and they found that one cell of the battery was gone, which is why it was happening. So then there was unpacking' and all of that.

On the second of May, 'we took the train from Petersfield and lunched with Mary at Fortnum's after a Huntsman fitting for Krishnaji. Mary and Joe were about to leave for Canada and California, a business trip for Joe.' Then something 'with Alain, they will spend the last weekend of the month in the house in Malibu.' I wasn't going to be there, but I offered them to stay there.

S: So the Linkses and Alain were going to be in your house?

M: Yes. On the third, 'Krishnaji resumed dictating To the Schools.' Then there's written '"Nitya!"' with an exclamation point. 'The way Krishnaji said the name gave me the sense of a brother's relationship.'

On May fourth, 'Saral and David Bohm came for lunch, and spent the night in the West Wing. We talked to them about a scientist meeting at Brockwood, and David Bohm said he would write to David Hall,' who seemed to be in on all this, although I don't know if he came.

S: I don't think he did come.

M: On the sixth, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school.'

On the seventh, 'Mary Cadogan came down and talked to Krishnaji and me before and after lunch, catching up on all the Foundation affairs.'

On the eleventh, 'Krishnaji saw Yves Zlotnitska, who wants to film Krishnaji in India, and he was told that it was being done by KF India.'

On the twelfth, 'it was Krishnaji's seventy-eighth birthday, but we don't mention those things around him.' [S laughs.] 'Krishnaji dictated a letter to Dr. Pollock about the Happy Valley land for use as a KFA school.' That was when we were casting about for a place. I've gone into that with you.

'The Digbys came to lunch, also Georgio Barabino of whom we will hear more later.' [Chuckles.] 'After lunch, Krishnaji talked for a while to the Digbys and I joined them. It was our first meeting since the fracas in October'—that was when Nelly wouldn't go to talk to Michael Rubinstein if I went. 'Things went fairly smoothly. As trustees, Nelly, Dorothy, and I discussed the conveyance of Brockwood from the old Foundation to the KFT.'

On the thirteenth, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school in the dining hall. And he gave an interview to Alex Cadogan. I sent a letter to Dr. Pollock from Krishnaji formally asking the board of the Happy Valley Foundation to make land available in Ojai for a school.'

On the sixteenth, Krishnaji, Dorothy, Doris, and I drove in the Mercedes to the New Forest and had a picnic there, and went on to Buckler's Hard.' Have you ever been to Buckler's Hard?

S: Yes.

M: It's a tiny fifteenth-century village where…

S: Ship building.

M: …these amazing ships were built. 'We drove on to Christ Church and then back through Lyndhurst. Krishnaji was tired; the drive was too long.'

S: What did Krishnaji think of going to a place like Buckler's Hard, which was really only of historical interest?

M: I don't know. He didn't say. He liked the driving, looking at the country, and we got out and walked around.

S: But he wasn't particularly interested in historical things.

M: Not really, I wouldn't say. I don't say that he wasn't, but it wasn't something he enthused over. He was not a museum man at all.

S: No.

M: In fact, when we went the first time to Chenonceau, we got out and walked around but he didn't want to go into the château. Later, we did—he went in later when we were staying with the Marogers. We went to Amboise and Chambord, and I forget where else, and he did go in because everyone was going in.

S: Yes.

M: But he didn't comment much upon it.

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji decided to stay at home and rest, so Dorothy and I went by train to London. We did errands, and I went to the Digby's for a meeting of the KFT trustees and members of the Publication Committee, which lasted till 6:30 p.m. What we decided is subject to a further meeting with Krishnaji, Mary Links, and Alan Kishbaugh. The KFT is to be kept informed via minutes of the Publication Committee meetings, and in case of disagreements in the Publication Committee, the Foundation is to decide. George resents not being consulted before the suit was brought against KWINC.'

S: Ah, ha.

M: Well, nobody outside of the KFA was consulted. 'I didn't get back till 9 p.m., and was tired,' it says.

On the eighteenth, 'Krishnaji held a staff meeting.'

On the twentieth, it starts with a quote from Krishnaji: '"I had an odd dream last night. There was a certificate that the mother, probably our mother, was dead. And I sat down on the bed and put my hands on her, and gradually I felt the warmth return to her and she sat up. Then I woke up. Probably it is symbolic." Then, Krishnaji talked to the school in the dining room. He questioned why the students are so silent in meetings with him, and don't discuss, also why there isn't a fire and energy in them. Are they bored, listless? Some said because there is no pressure, i.e., grades, and other demands of study, there isn't a prod to do things. One must supply one's own interests, energy. There was then a discussion of authority: "If X doesn't come to the morning meetings, how does a staff member deal with him?"' [Chuckles.] That's the sample problem. '"I would describe to him the reasons for the morning meetings, the coming together quietly in the sense of unity. And if he refuses, what do I do? I tell him twenty times; but he still doesn't come. I leave him alone on this subject but talk to him at meals here and there. I give him the sense that I care about him. I point things out. Then I go back and ask him to come to the morning meetings again. I have talked this way for fifty years. Do you know why? Because I love you. You are my son or my daughter."' [In a very quiet tone:] That's what he said.

S: Mm.

M: The next day, 'Krishnaji held a staff meeting and I worked on things for Erna and the case.'

On the twenty-second. 'Krishnaji again talked to the school, but without visitors. The students spoke up more,' it says. 'Peters Racz visited, lunched, and spoke to Krishnaji after.' Remember Peter Racz? A Brazilian boy. He was also very friendly with David Bohm.

S: Yes.

M: [chuckles] 'Doris lent me her little mini-car, and I went to Winchester for more bedding for the guests, while Krishnaji cleaned the engine of the Mercedes.' [Laughing.]

On the twenty-fourth 'we both went to London and had an early lunch at Fortnum's, and then he went to the dentist, Hamish Thompson, and I did errands while he was there. Then, we went to Huntsman where Krishnaji ordered a light-ish grey suit and to Sulka, where we both ordered shirts made of Indian silks that Krishnaji brought back from India. Krishnaji inspected Maxwell, whose shoe shop is on Bond Street and is now owned by Huntsman. We looked at picnic baskets at Asprey's and bought one at Fortnum's'

[laughs]. ‘Then we went to a craft center gallery to look at Peter Collingwood rugs and caught the 4:20 p.m. back to Petersfield.’

On the twenty-fifth, ‘Krishnaji held a staff meeting at 11:30 a.m. Dr. Pollock is not coming to Brockwood.’

‘It was a warm summer day’ on the twenty-sixth, ‘and the start of midterm holiday for the school, also a bank holiday. Krishnaji washed the car in the afternoon while I weeded’ [chuckles] ‘a section of the rose garden. It was too hot for the usual walk, so we sat and wandered about in the grove.’

On the twenty-seventh, ‘we planned a picnic, but for fear of Krishnaji’s hay fever this season, we didn’t have it. We had a nice quiet day.’

May twenty-ninth. ‘A letter from Erna saying the pre-trial court meeting was on the twenty-fifth, and resulted in postponement to June fifteenth. Other postponements on both sides’ interrogatories. The Lilliefelts postponed their departure till after the fifteenth.’

The next few days, it just says ‘desk, walk, desk, walk…’ Um…

On the first of June, ‘Krishnaji met with the staff. At 6 p.m., I met Mar de Manziarly at Petersfield train station. She is here for the weekend, staying in the West Wing. I spoke to Mary Links, who arrived last night from Malibu. They stayed in the house three days.’ I’d forgotten that.

On June second, ‘Krishnaji dictated another Letters to the Schools. Mar came on the walk with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me.’

On the third, ‘Krishnaji spoke to the school, and again we had walks,’ the same kind of walks. Then there’s a lot about my family…

On June fourth, ‘Mar showed Krishnaji and me letters written by Nitya to her in the early ’20s. Very moving. They seem so alive, and there was such humor and irony, and somehow sad, as though much of that world they occupied was tiresome to him. “Theosophy is the most boring thing of all.”’ That’s what Nitya wrote. ‘Krishnaji was moved by the letters, and said, “I saw what it was like, but he was much more mature than I was.”’

S: Where do you suppose those letters are, Mary?

M: I have no idea. I don’t know. She gave me them, and I put them in the archives, some letters that Krishnaji had written to her, but I don’t remember being given letters written by Nitya.

S: Where could we begin looking for these letters, do you think?

M: There's nowhere to look. Mar is dead; her sisters are both dead; Sacha's dead.

S: They did not have any children?

M: Nope. Except for Mima, none of them ever married. And all of them are now dead.

S: Are there any uncles, aunts, cousins?

M: Nobody.

S: No family that we can think of?

M: They had no relatives that I know of, never heard of any. Mar died in Ojai. Mima died…they all died in Ojai, except Sacha, who died, as we just saw, in Paris. Mima had a house in Ojai, and a bee garden. She moved there early on. She married this man from Chicago and he committed suicide not long afterward. And she then moved to Ojai, bought a house and land, and lived there for the rest of her life. She had inherited from her husband, who was very wealthy, and I know that the sisters were financially dependent on her, but I don't know about Sacha. He may have had a pension or something. Mar and Sacha shared a flat in Paris, on the Rue Jacob, and lived there till Sacha died. Not long after that, I think Mar gave it up.

S: And moved to Ojai.

M: She had an old maid who looked after her for some time. But then the old maid either died or retired, and she couldn't cope on her own. Yo had in the meantime a friend with whom she shared a place, somewhere in New England, and when the friend died, Yo went to live in Ojai at first with Mima, and then she had a little flat in upper Ojai, and Mar joined her there and had a little flat next door. Then, I don't know what happened to Yo, but Mima found Mar a flat in Ojai. I visited her there, so I know that. And Mar died there, after Krishnaji's death. I don't know what happened to Yo, except that I've been told she's dead; where she died or what happened, I don't know. The house that Mima had has been sold. So, the de Manziarlys vanished from the earth.

S: It is tragic that those letters are lost.

M: Yes. What will happen to all of Krishnaji's letters to Vanda, of course, is also unknown.

S: I know. I do wish we could get those letters from Vanda.

M: Well, I can't do it.

S: No.

M: I can't ask for them. I said to her, and I know I'll say it again, that I do think the preservation of those letters is important. And I've asked her what she wants done with them, and things like that, but I can't say what I think she should do with them.

S: Mm, hm. No. Of course not.

M: The fifth of June. 'I drove Mar to Petersfield station, where she got the train to London, and she spent the day in London with Mary Links on material for the biography Mary is writing before returning to Paris. It was a marvelously lovely day. I drove back slowly through East Meon. The countryside ravishing—totally beautiful. Krishnaji talked to the school about what is distraction. He then said how he would teach mathematics. "I will show you." Begin by asking the students if they have habits, any habits. So you see that if you have a habit, you are unaware of it, and that will lead to habits of mind? Discuss that. Then with that mind discuss mathematics, he said.'

The next day, 'I went to Winchester with Dorothy for more sheets, blankets, etcetera for guests. It was a most beautiful day. I was back in time for lunch. Krishnaji, with Carlos's help, had Simonized the Mercedes. We went for only a short walk. I did the first dictation of letters using a small IBM recording device and then sending the tape to Cadogan's office, where I have left an IBM transcribing unit.'

S: Hold on, because the archives list says there's another Letters to the Schools.

M: Well, I don't know.

M: Yes, if you can read that, here.

S: Oh lord!

M: Yes. [Both laugh.]

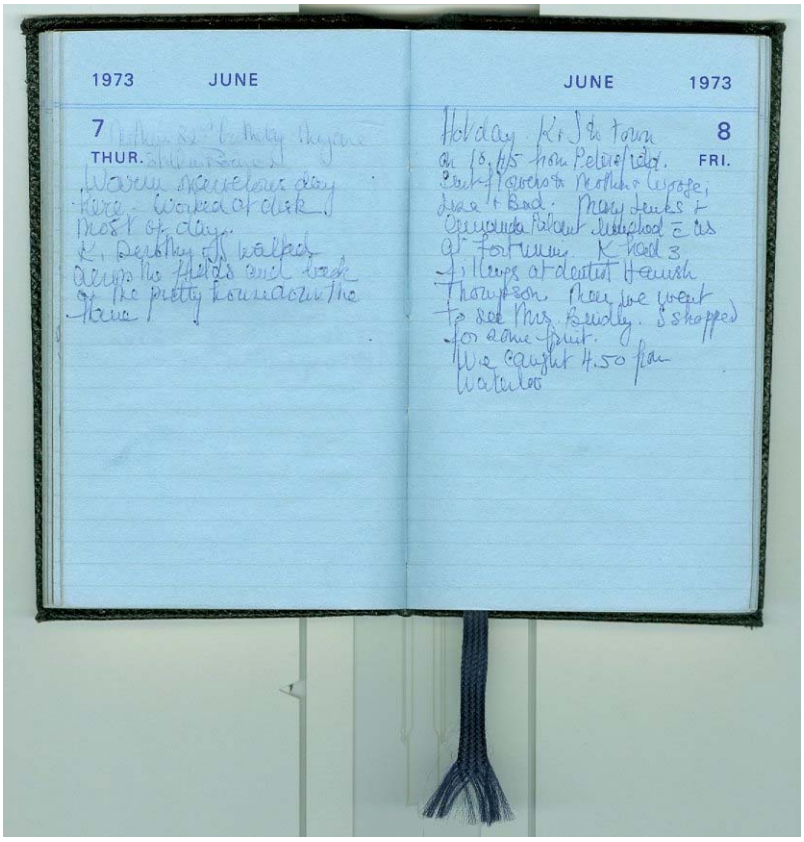
S: I think you were writing with water!



M: I know.

S: [long pause] You're right, it doesn't say anything about another Letters to the Schools. Boy, this is hard to read.

M: [laughs] I know. Pale blue ink on pale blue paper! [Laughing.] Not a good plan.

Well, the next day's just as pale. It says, 'it's a warm, marvelous day here. Worked at the desk most of the day. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked across the fields and in the back of the pretty house on the lane.' That's that half-timbered house[1] that I had a great fancy for in those days. I used to think, "Why don't I buy that?" [Chuckles.]

S: Yes, quite right.

Mary's small diary (almost the actual physical size) for June 7th & 8th

M: The eighth of June. 'It was a hot day. Krishnaji and I went to town on the 10:45 a.m. from Petersfield. I sent flowers to my mother, who was there. Mary Links and Amanda Pallant had lunch with us at Fortnum's. Krishnaji had three fillings at the dentist, Hamish Thompson. Then we went to see Mrs. Bindley. I stopped for some fruit. We caught the 4:50 p.m. back.'

On June tenth, 'Krishnaji talked to the school.' [Laughs.] 'Egyptian dancers in afternoon then Swami Venkatesananda and his admirers dropped by to see Krishnaji.' [Chuckles.] 'Eventually we got out for a walk.' That reminds me [chuckling] of the scene in the doorway here in the West Wing when the swami was arriving. Krishnaji was with me at the door, and the swami insisted on prostrating himself in the doorway, a most awkward spot to have chosen, and Krishnaji didn't want him to do it, and sort of tried to get him up, and it was kind of a humorous struggle. [Laughing.]

S: Yes. Insisting on prostrating toward this man who never wanted that kind of thing. Yes. [Both laugh again.]

M: Oh, the next few days is all about going to buy things for the Cloisters and meeting my brother and sister-in-law at Claridge's, and talking business. Mother was there. Bud and Lisa came with me to Mallett's, where I bought two eighteenth-century Chinese bird paintings, which are on the wall behind you. I got some more later.'

June twelfth, ‘we walked as usual. Krishnaji has hay fever, but the tulip extract from Dr. Wolf seems to be helping.’

On the thirteenth, ‘Krishnaji talked to the students and staff in the morning and finished by 1:10 p.m. I went to London in the afternoon about my family and errands. I went to Victorian Albert Museum where the Cooper Hewitt had an exhibition.’ Lisa, Bud’s wife, was head of the Cooper Hewitt. There were all sorts of people we met, the director of the Tate, blah, blah. Eventually I got home.

June fourteenth ‘was a marvelously lovely day, but not good for Krishnaji’s hay fever. He began taking Acktang, a German allergy medicine from Dr. Wolf, which helps. Krishnaji came with me to Petersfield on errands. I bought plants for the house and then I worked with Edna Cleeve’—that was the cleaning lady we had for the West Wing—‘in the afternoon on beds, etcetera for the dining room now converted to a bedroom to house Pupul and family. Walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy.’

June fifteenth. ‘A warm day. Krishnaji and I took the train to London and went to Mallett’s, where we chose four more Chinese bird paintings. Then, Krishnaji had a tooth filled at Hamish Thompson’s. Then, we lunched with Mary Links at Fortnum’s. Krishnaji and I went to Huntsman, after which Krishnaji had a haircut at Truefitt. We bought sweaters for Vanda, Fosca, and Dorothy. Then Krishnaji and I went to the Vigo Street rug place, and chose a Persian rug for the drawing room,’ which you can see over my left shoulder. We then caught the 5:14 p.m. to Petersfield and back to Brockwood. Amanda Pallant is staying at Brockwood to help with the coming guests. She brought a couple of vases as a gift from Mary and Joe.’ That’s the one in the hall.

S: Ah, yes.

M: The next day, ‘there was work everywhere getting ready for visitors. Enormous cleanup in the Cloisters. I have a sore throat. I changed beds around in the West Wing. I didn’t walk, and had a fever at night.’

On the seventeenth, ‘Krishnaji spoke to the school. My fever is gone, and I feel better. I went on fixing rooms. Walked with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and Amanda Pallant. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave interviews to Jamie Thompson, son of dentist Hamish Thompson. The work done on the Cloisters is not finished, but they are ready for visitors.’

Now, we jump to the big book, and the eighteenth. ‘Intense work all weekend to ready the Cloisters. The builders’ men went off on Friday, leaving piles of debris in the courtyard and no way to remove it except by hand and barrow. Ian Hammond and Robert Wiffen just looked helpless, but when Dorothy sent out word that she would pay a pound an hour for anyone who would work on the cleanup, by this morning, after drudgery by older boy students, and Billy Bud…’

S: Billy Bud, oh yes. I remember him. He was the forester for the estate surrounding us.

M: Yes. '…and his family and friends, four tons had been removed. The courtyard was smooth and Amanda Pallant '—here to help out—'had borrowed green shrubs in tubs to catch the eye here and there. Each little room was neat, clean, bright, and ready. Three quarters of the quadrangle is complete. The work continues on the fourth side and sitting room, but the deadline was met. Similarly, in the West Wing, things came down to the wire. The man from Heal's came for a third time, and with the necessary parts, installed a wardrobe in my upstairs office'—temporarily another bedroom—'bought five weeks ago. It was finished an hour before the Indians arrived [quiet chuckle]. The Chinese bird paintings Krishnaji and I bought at Mallett's on Friday were hung this morning and the Persian rug we bought the same day is in front of the drawing room fireplace. It does look pretty. Suddenly the school group is alive and pulled together, and Krishnaji is really pleased, which is my fun. Ruth Tettemer and Albion Patterson arrived from Ojai this morning. Ruth was last in England in 1928. I met them at Petersfield. They are in the Cloisters. The Indians, Pupul, her daughter, Radhika and her children, Sunanda and Mia'—that's the names of Radhika's children—'arrived with Balasundaram, and Sunanda and Achyut Patwardhan. Pupul is in the West Wing dining room, where I moved the big bed; the others are in the Cloisters.'

'Albion and I discussed the agenda for the meetings. He has written a good letter of suggestions, which Krishnaji wants distributed. It is strong on the need for archives kept at professional standards. The standards of authenticity for future scholars.' Good for Albion.

Tuesday, June nineteenth, 'Krishnaji talked to Pupul alone and then with the other Indians. He then held a school discussion in which a question was asked about what love is. He explored it, in part drawing it out of the students. He again repeated the fact mentioned by David Bohm that in the Eskimo language, "thought" and "outside" are the same words. [Chuckles.] Alan Kishbaugh arrived at Petersfield at 1 p.m. I met him. Then, at 3:30 p.m., Krishnaji held a meeting to discuss the agenda with the trustees present. Krishnaji, Ruth, Albion, Alan, Dorothy, Pupul, Balasundaram, Sunanda, and Achyut Patwardhan.'

So we now go to June twentieth in the little book again. 'Krishnaji talked to the Lilliefelts and me. The Digbys arrived for the opening meeting, but Mary Links and Mary Cadogan were late. We agreed with the agenda discussion before lunch, and then at 4 p.m. with both Marys there, Krishnaji opened the meeting with moving words on trust and working together. Then we discussed whether the Foundations should continue and in what form. He spoke for two hours. Later, Mary Links, Alan K., and I talked about the Verhulst-Servire mess, which will be gone into tomorrow.'

On June twenty-first, 'We met all morning on the agenda. After lunch, the Publication Committee and the KFT met with Krishnaji on the new structure, i.e., the Foundation is to call annual meetings and be ultimately responsible and we came to an agreement on proceedings with the Verhulst matter. Krishnaji then went out with Ian Hammond and decided on wooden benches instead of a wall for the Cloisters. At 4 p.m, the Foundation meetings resumed. Hughes arrived and with the Publication Committee Members present, we went into the thorny matter of world publications. India, again, made a play for sharing the copyright. It was exhausting, but tentative agreements were made. I talked to Hughes about a French gift for a French Bulletin.'

On the twenty-second, 'there was a morning meeting of the Krishnamurti Foundation's Publications Committee and Doris. Mary C. and Balasundaram had hammered out statements that we had agreed on yesterday, and it was gone over sentence by sentence, giving definitions. India accepts the copyright situation as is, solely England's, but the KFI has new and permanent publishing rights for its own territories. There is a much better feeling today, more trust and cooperation. In the afternoon, we went on with the agenda and made progress. There was a late walk. The weather is turning lovely.'

On June twenty-third, 'Krishnaji held a discussion in the morning for trustees and Mary L. The meeting in the afternoon completed the agenda.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. The trustees met again in the afternoon and finished the agreements. Mary L. urged that all of Krishnaji's ashes be given to the Indians. The Americans thought this to be sectarian, but didn't speak up. Krishnaji says Indians have told him they will scatter his ashes in the Ganga. Mary L. left with Joe.'

June twenty-fifth 'was a day off. The Indians cooked the lunch. Saris were worn by many students. I took time to go to Petersfield on errands, and felt poorly in the afternoon Sinus problems.'

On the twenty-sixth, 'Krishnaji held a discussion in the morning with the trustees. We all signed the agreements that had been reached. Balasundaram, Achyut Patwardhan, and Alan Kishbaugh left. I felt worse with sinus problems and slept poorly.' I don't know why we put that in, but that's what it says.

S: Leave it in.

M: The next day, 'Pupul's daughter, Radhika, and her children left with Sunanda. I still felt sick. I worked at the desk all afternoon. Krishnaji suggested saltwater douches in the nose, which helped. I had a liquid diet all day.'

On June twenty-eighth, 'I went to the doctor. Then I met Evelyne and Lou Blau at Petersfield. They talked to Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Ruth, and me before and after lunch and I showed them the place. Lou gave lawyer's advice on the case. Erna and I drove them back to Petersfield station. Later, Krishnaji called KFA members together to speak of being open and letting things develop with the school and center in Ojai.'

The next day, 'I still have a cold. Erna and Theo left to go to see Anneke in Holland about papers for both the Ojai and the Vasanta Vihar cases.' This, by now, to remind whoever it may concern, that the case had developed in Madras because Madhavachari was holding Vasanta Vihar for Rajagopal, but it developed that for legal reasons I can't explain, that Vasanta Vihar belonged to Holland.

S: Through all the shell games of Rajagopal.

M: That's right. So, the KFI had to have papers from the Holland Stichting to present in Madras to the court, etcetera. So that's what they did. 'I went to fill a prescription in Alresford and took Ruth, Albion, and Verna Krueger along for the drive. We met Krishnaji, Dorothy, and Whisper walking along the lane as we came back.'

On the first of July, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school, and I began packing.'

The next day, 'When I woke up and I realized that I needed to get Krishnaji's Swiss visa, so I rushed up to London and got it. Came right back.'

The third was 'more packing. Then I discovered that the British dockers are striking for the week against French boats because of the French atomic bomb tests in the Pacific. So our Normandy ferry for tonight had been canceled. I quickly called Thoresen Townsend, which has accepted our car reservations. We walked in the afternoon. Krishnaji and I had supper downstairs. The car was loaded, we said goodbye to everyone, and left at 9 p.m. We drove to Southampton and onto the Thoresen Ferry. After the ship sailed, I got the purser to provide a cabin for Krishnaji.'

'We arrived in Le Havre the next morning, and disembarked at 7:15 a.m. We stopped in Bourg-Achard for croissants, and had a picnic breakfast using the new hamper, and reached Paris and the Plaza Athénée at 11 a.m. It was very hot in Paris. I bathed, changed, and lunched nicely in the hotel garden. Krishnaji was very splendid in a brown birds-eye suit. He took a nap afterward, after which we went and bought a new Phillips razor. I had a fitting at Chanel and met him at 5 p.m at Charvet, where four new shirts were ordered. Came back, hot and tired, to the hotel. Bathed again. Supper in rooms and early to bed.'

The next day, 'we left the Plaza Athénée at 9:30 a.m. on another hot day and drove south on the autoroute to Chalon, which took four hours. Krishnaji drove for one of those hours. At Chalon, we took Route National 78 through Louhans and Lons-le-Saunier. We finally found a shady quiet lane and had a late picnic lunch, then drove on through Morez and over the Col de la Faucille into Switzerland. We arrived at Geneva and the Hotel du Rhône at 6:30 p.m., hot and tired. I telephoned Vanda, who had just arrived at Tannegg. We had supper in the rooms and Krishnaji said, "No more of these long motor trips. It's too much!"' [Laughs.]

On July sixth, 'we went to Patek and to Jacquet. Krishnaji ordered seven ties and some socks. It is not as hot as yesterday. Narasimhan lunched with us at the hotel, then we drove along the lake to Lausanne and over the hill, stopping for gâteau at Bulle.'

S: Oh, yes, of course. [M laughs.] The famous Gâteau Bullois. Krishnaji loved that! They were good, from that one particular bakery.

M: Yes, on the left. [S laughs.] 'We drove through streaming rain up the valley. Arrived at Tannegg, 568 miles from Brockwood. Vanda and Fosca had everything in order. We also have Madame Walsh's apartment downstairs this year. The other apartment'—I guess that's the one in the middle—'is being remodeled. I unpacked, had supper, and went to bed. Amanda is being operated on again that day. Krishnaji said in the car, "I will be thinking of it at night. One is quieter then." Today too was to be a day of the court hearings on the case.'

S: Before we go on to the next day, didn't you always have the same rooms at the Plaza Athénée?

M: Yes. At the Plaza Athénée we did.

S: Which room numbers were they?

M: Who knows? I can't remember that.

S: [laughs] No detail is too small. Do you remember what floor they were on?

M: No. [Laughs.] But what I can tell you, which was important to us, is that the rooms didn't look out on the courtyard, because noise would rise up. In the summer, people ate in the courtyard as it was pretty with flowers all around. But there's another courtyard on the other side which I guess goes down to nothing. It has a grill separating it from another building opposite. So, there was no noise, and it was protected from the street.

On the seventh of July, 'there was a cable from the Dunnes saying that Amanda's operation was successful. Krishnaji said, "I woke up feeling happy."'

S: Mm. In reference to Amanda?

M: Yes. 'I cabled back from Krishnaji and myself. No news from Erna on what should have been yesterday's court hearing in Ventura. Did errands in the village. Rested. Wrote letters.'

July ninth, 'No special mail, no news. Krishnaji rested. I did letters. After lunch, Vanda and I drove to Château d'Oex to find some miso for Krishnaji. Meanwhile, he had his hair cut by the good barber Nicola now in the new barber shop. We picked him up on the way back.'

On July eleventh, 'There was a letter from Erna written on the fifth. The court meeting was again postponed until the twentieth. Christensen,' that's Rajagopal's lawyer, 'is to have submitted a settlement offer okayed by Rajagopal on sixth. Krishnaji worked on a statement for the Bulletin about the international foundation agreements made at Brockwood. I bought a new Hermes typewriter at Madame Cadonau's and typed up Krishnaji's statement and sent it to Erna, Mary C., and Balasundaram for comments.'

The next day, ‘Krishnaji dictated To the Schools number 8 on freedom and order. Edgar Graf came to lunch.’

On the thirteenth, ‘I worked on a revision with Krishnaji of the number 8 To the Schools. Barabino came to lunch, after which I took Vanda down to the village for errands. I got a silk jersey for Amanda, and met Krishnaji on his walk.’

The next day, ‘the Simmonses and Doris arrived in Saanen in the Land Rover.’ Now we can jump to the big book for the fifteenth, but it’s getting late. I suggest that we call a halt.

S: Alright. So, we’ll start next time on the fifteenth in the big book.

Editor’s Note: The following is on a separate piece of paper that was folded into Mary’s large diary that covers the dates of July 13, 1970 through October 14, 1974. The piece of paper is undated, so there is no way to know where the right place would be to insert this, but Mary was clearly taking down what Krishnaji was saying, and it seems right to include it somewhere. So, it is here.

“I woke up yesterday morning. I don’t know how to describe it—I never had it in my life before. I had it all day. It is there now.

“A sense of tremendous brain power—not to do something—just pure brain power. It went on. I got a little nervous of it, watching. Yes, it is in the head. Entirely different—never had it before.

“Woke up with it.

“Woke up and there it was. Then I got a little nervous—it was so strong, as though tremendous power was there—limitless, vast. I don’t know how to describe it.”

Issue 28: July 15, 1973 to October 22, 1973

The recorded discussions with Mary which provide the material for these memoirs began on June eleventh, 1994. The discussion for this issue occurred on August fourth, 1996; so it has taken us over two years to get this far in her diaries. By this date, I am at Oxford, and only able to visit Mary at Brockwood to continue our discussions on the occasional week-end during the months she is in England. As we continue, I remember Mary saying often that she feels we're never going to get out of the '70s; and indeed, it is another thirty one discussions and almost nine years before we get to the 1980s.

So, it may be right to bring up at this point a sense that I have from these discussions: There are extraordinary, relentless, unremitting demands made on Krishnaji; and Mary, in trying to take care of him and facilitate all that he does, is just as persevering and sedulous as he.

In this issue, Krishnaji goes through all the events of Saanen (the public talks and discussions, the private interviews, the small group meetings, the requests for healing, the demands of organizations, etcetera) only to get to Brockwood and start it all again, then on to Italy…and so it goes.

Living this persistence, gracefully meeting this unending challenge was part of Mary's experience of being in the presence of Krishnaji; and she always conveyed the impression that she felt she was living a benediction.

So, the reader of these memoirs, I imagine, experiences something dogged and unrelenting; and as the editor, I am sorry about that as it places demands on the reader's own perseverance. But these are Mary's memoirs, and it is not my place to change the nature of what she recalled and recorded.

Despite the demands on Krishnaji, and the often unpleasant and unfortunate behavior of some around him, I am also struck (as I was in life) by Krishnaji's ability to be outside of all that and to generate his teachings.

Scott: We're beginning on July fifteenth, 1973.

Mary: Yes, well, we're in Gstaad, and it was a grey day and cool, and Krishnaji was giving his first talk in Saanen. In the morning, I drove Vanda down as far as the bakery and she wished to walk the rest of the way. Then I went back and picked up Krishnaji at 10:15 a.m., and driving slowly, we arrived exactly on the dot' [S chuckles] 'of when he was due, which was 10:30 a.m. The tent was almost full, and there seemed to be a lot of new faces. Krishnaji did his usual thing of sitting and looking at everyone very slowly, which makes some people nervous, I discovered, that he might not know what he's going to say!' [M chuckles with S.] 'They're soon disabused, and on that day, he asked, "Can knowledge bring about a psychological change?" My impression was that he put a lot into the first talk, to really get people going, and perhaps bewilder the newcomers. In the middle of it all, it began to rain, but after the talk Krishnaji, as usual, walked rapidly up the road. And people kept trying to offer him umbrellas, but he kept going' [humor in voice]. Um, 'I caught up with him as quickly as I could in the car, and we went up to Tannegg.'

And Elena and Felix Greene came for lunch that day.

S: Mm, hm. Can I interrupt here for a minute…?

M: Yes.

S: …just to say (and this really is just a silly historical detail here), but I remember in that year and in '72, that the arrangement in the tent was different than in subsequent years. I think it changed to its final format in '75 or '76. But before that, the seats had been arranged in tiers rising the length of the tent, so that Krishnaji sat at one end…

M: Yes.

S: …and the seats tiered up, from some possibly third of the length of the tent.

M: Yes, yes.

S: But after 1976, there was no more tiering. Krishnaji sat on the side of the tent.

M: Yes, after that, it was the side of the tent, and everybody was sitting on ground level. The tiering was a holdover from the geodesic dome one, the Buckminster Fuller one, which we had for some years until it wore out, and they couldn't replace it. So then we got the one that was the shape that you remember…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …which was sort of rectangular, really. Rectangular, but domed, like a portable airplane hangar.

Anyway, 'the Greenes came for lunch and there was a lot of talk about India and Nehru and the Dalai Lama and the difference in China today.' Felix Greene, you remember, had been to China…

S: I remember well.

M: …had written lots of very enthusiastic things about China. 'He said that there is the only government today where it was said "Do it yourself," and change is participated in by the people. Mao saw danger in the hardening of bureaucracy and invited people to make change." I suppose that really brought about the uh…Red…

S: The Cultural Revolution.

M: The Cultural Revolution, and the Red whatever they were called.

S: The Red Guards, yes.

M: There were really awful goings-on. Krishnaji listened to all this, and spoke of the thousands of Indians together building a dam against the next monsoon. And they did it because they would have perished otherwise. That was the impetus behind it.

S: Was Krishnaji saying that they only cooperated because their lives depended on it?

M: Yes, that's right. And he said, '"If I were one of them, a Chinese, etcetera. I would ask 'Why? What is the meaning of all this? Why should I build a dam or anything else?' The government has taken away the meaning of life. Give me meaning. I am a savage about all this," he said. He spoke intensely, and sweeping his hand across the table, vehemently. The Greenes left and he went to lie down and Vanda said that she thought that Krishnaji was over-tired and nervous and needs to stop talking for a while. "Why must he go to India?" she said. She pounces at me rather exhaustively,' [chuckle in voice] 'and I agree, but it's up to him. Yesterday she raised it at lunch to Krishnaji, and he said, "I want to go," which ended it for the moment. There is a degree of constant telling what should be done that goes around. It's meant well, but it's like being hammered at. "Why don't you ask some interesting people from Geneva to lunch?"' [S laughs heartily, and M chuckles some too; aside:] What interesting people?

S: [laughing, joking voice:] Advertise in the paper.

M: [still laughing] '"Why don't you tell the Indians to make a film showing India, the Taj Mahal, the Elephanta Statue? Put this in a Krishnaji movie, not just him."' [Laughs.] '"That is boring," she said.' [M laughs.] I'd forgotten all this.

S: So, these were things Vanda said should be done?

M: Yes, unfortunately.

S: Ah, ha.

M: 'But then it turns out that Krishnaji does his own hammering.' This is to me: '"You don't walk enough. You stay up all the time doing letters." In the evening, we got caught up in watching a French version of Electra on TV.'

Now, that is the last entry I have in this big notebook, so we have to switch to the small one, which, as you know, is less informative.

Well, the next day, the sixteenth of July, was 'a quiet day, and I did letters and errands and Krishnaji stayed in bed until walk time.'

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji gave his second talk. It was on the subject of time, and it was a wonderful one. On seeing the action of thought. I was exhausted at the end. He put enormous energy into it, and there was just ourselves at lunch.' That's Krishnaji, Vanda, and me. 'We discussed the school that Barabino'—that was that Italian who came into the picture in Italy's Krishnamurti world—he 'wanted to start a school, and so we talked about that.' That's about all that day.

The next day was the eighteenth, and 'Vanda left for Florence.'

S: What did Krishnaji think about the school?

M: Well, he sort of went along with it. It turned out badly in the end.

S: Yes.

M: Barabino, the whole Barabino thing turned out poorly. He absconded with the mailing list and started his own organization, which was rather, um…well, never mind describing it, but it had nothing to do with Krishnaji. 'So, Vanda went to Florence on the eighteenth, and Felix Greene came and saw Krishnaji. Also Pascaline Mallet came, whom Krishnaji had not seen in years, and I met her for the first time that day. She came to lunch with Marcelle Bondoneau, and now Pascaline at that point was the head of the French Committee. Then, Gisela Elmenhorst came in the afternoon, and talked about German teachers.'

On the nineteenth was 'the third Saanen talk, another great one, in my view. The Bennetts, Mavis and Reg, came for lunch. A letter came at last from Erna. It was incomplete so we telephoned her.' This was about the case. 'Christensen (Rajagopal's lawyer) had sent a draft of a settlement. There had been notes of a meeting on the eighteenth of June with Rosenthal/Cohen/Christensen, and we were fairly okay for substance, but Christensen came back with an agreement that was entirely different from what was expected.' Those things just never came to anything at that point.

'Krishnaji invited Montague and Dorothy to use the downstairs flat when they pleased. They moved in the next day for a short time in that downstairs apartment. And Krishnaji saw various people, including Felix Greene again. He felt tired and stayed in bed for lunch. I spent the day typing comments on the Christensen settlement draft, and got Krishnaji's approval to what I'd written. He concurred with what I had said and also what Erna had said. He got up in the afternoon for a walk, and the Simmonses came along.'

Next day was 'a quiet day. Krishnaji on that day said, "One day I will see Rajagopal and tell him what he has done. It will be good for him."

The twenty-second was 'the fourth talk on what is the meaning of life? The Simmonses and Anneke Korndorffer came for lunch and Krishnaji put his hands on Anneke to help her with her ailments. He gave an interview to the Mexican representative of the Fundación and the Biascoecheas. He saw Mr. Mirabet and Mr. Salvador Morales-Franco,

Mrs. Colvera. Mrs. Arane came to tea.' These were all people in the Fundación in those days.

On the twenty-third, 'there was an hour's discussion with some students of Grenoble, and then that day, a letter came from Dr. Pollock.' He was also on the board of the Happy Valley School, and so he offered something that I say is an insult both to Krishnaji and the rest of us. He offered, I think, one hill, and we wanted the whole place.

S: Of course.

M: And, you know, it should've been Krishnaji's anyway…

S: Exactly.

M: And when he said maybe one hill, it was insulting.

Krishnaji gave 'his fifth talk on July twenty-fourth, and again it was a superb one. "What is the action that is not of will, ideals, etcetera? Non-action is the expression of the non-me. Wisdom is the daughter of truth, and intelligence is the daughter of wisdom."' It was a wonderful statement.

Then various people came; it's not interesting.

'Krishnaji and I went for a nice quiet lunch at the Park Hotel. We walked in the rain as usual.'

On the twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji dictated a reply to Dr. Pollock about the Happy Valley land, and to Erna about Rajagopal. A Mr. Alfredo Calles, interested in starting a school in Mexico, came to see me at 11 a.m. Barabino came at noon, and we talked about the Italian school plan, and the necessity of a legal Italian committee. He stayed to lunch with Krishnaji. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave interviews. It was raining, but we walked up nevertheless the Turbach road.'

'Krishnaji began taking that day, Prednisolon, five milligrams, instead of Actad, as prescribed by Dr. Wolf. It's a hay fever thing.'

July twenty-sixth. 'It was very cold and with fresh snow on the mountains. Krishnaji gave his sixth Saanen talk on sorrow, love, and death. It ended without any questions. Anneke came for a treatment. Rosalind is in Paris. Anneke wants to see her to give us Arya Vihara. Biascoecheas came to lunch. They met with Mr. Calles and have high hopes' [chuckles] 'for a school. Krishnaji rested before people came for tea. Dreadful drilling noise from downstairs.' [Chuckles.] This is very spotty stuff. Do you want all of it?

S: Absolutely all of it!

M: The next day was the twenty-seventh, and 'it was still cold and grey. Fearful drilling continues. Complained to the owners, Madame Matti and the Palace.' The Palace was the agent for renting the chalet. 'Jane Hammond and Sybil Dobinson came for lunch. Then at 3:30, all the foreign committee members, over fifty of them, came for the annual meeting with Krishnaji.'

'Later we walked and Dorothy, who had been sick but got up today, was at the meeting.'

On the twenty-eighth, Krishnaji saw Anneke in the morning, and told her that it was not the moment for her to see Rosalind regarding her documentation center.

Krishnaji was tired, so he slept the rest of the morning. We lunched quietly alone. At 4 p.m., the Biascoecheas, Mr. Morales-Franco and the lady president of the Mexican delegation and Mr. Calles came to see Krishnaji. Calles discusses school project in Guernica. At 6:30 p.m., Swami Venkatesananda came to call, and, with some woman,' I don't know who she was. 'And then,' it says here that 'Mary Links sent Krishnaji letters that Jamnadas[1] wrote about the King John bet by him and Nitya in 1919.' Do you remember that story?

S: Yes. And Annie Besant was upset by this…

M: Yes, and the car they bought with the money they won, Annie Besant made them give it back. And this was a letter about that [laughter in voice]. Poor Jamnadas; and Nitya was also crushed.

S: [laughs heartily] I wonder where this letter is.

M: Who knows? I think it was a copy…I don't think it was the real one.

S: Sent to Krishnaji?

M: Yes. She sent Krishnaji the letter from Jamnadas about the King John bet he and Nitya made in 1919! [Chuckles.]

S: Okay.

M: Well, the next day was the twenty-ninth. It says here, 'I dreamt vividly of Nitya. He had been allowed to come back once, and I held onto him lest he vanish for Krishnaji to see him.' I don't remember that I had such a dream. 'Krishnaji had been struck by Jamnadas's letter as well.'

S: Hm.

M: How strange. Krishnaji gave his seventh and last of these Saanen talks on meditation, on looking without thought, without any reaction.' Then a lot of people came for lunch.

The next day, Anneke and Felix Greene both came to see Krishnaji.' I think that was for treatment, because Felix was sick then, too; he had cancer, I think.

We lunched quietly alone, and I did errands. Krishnaji gave interviews to Madame Baud, your friend, Mr. Russu, and Mr. Sendra. Then, we walked. Then something about trouble with some students at Brockwood. We don't have to memorialize that for history.

On July thirty-first, 'Krishnaji again saw Felix Greene and Anneke, and then Anneke and I discussed Happy Valley and Rosalind and Rajagopal. A Mrs. Saharaf came to see me about an Ojai school. Krishnaji saw her briefly at the end. He and I lunched at the Park Hotel.'

'A letter came from Erna about the settlement meeting on July twentieth in Judge Heaton's chambers between Christensen, Rosenthal, Cohen, and also Erna. And the meeting on July twenty-fifth with Sol Rosenthal, Cohen, and Reynolds (Cohen's junior lawyer). Also there was a letter from Erna about Tapper,' that's the attorney general man, 'and an inquiry from Sol about the proposed Krishnamurti school in Ojai for his son.' It didn't come to pass. I've forgotten why; but he was interested, and we were [chuckles] glad he was.

The next day was the first of August and 'the first of the Saanen public discussions, questions mostly on the observer and observed. Frances McCann just arrived from Holland, came to lunch. Krishnaji spoke with her afterwards. Afterward, I made a twenty-eight minute,' and it says here, 'a 280 Swiss franc telephone call' [both laugh] 'to Erna in Ojai about her letters and the settlement points. Also about omitting mention of the copyright agreement in Krishnaji's report in the Bulletin. Then I did errands.'

On August second 'was the second public discussion. It was hard work. Afterwards, Krishnaji saw Felix Greene and Anneke. Madame Duchet and Marcelle came to lunch. Elmenhorst was invited but was sick. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview for a Lausanne newspaper, Vingt-Quatre Heures, it's called, the newspaper with a reporter called Francine Brunschwig.'

On the third 'was the third Saanen discussion on loneliness and relationship, and ambition and wanting to change what is. Afterward, Krishnaji again saw Felix Greene. Mrs. Pamela Travers, and Dorothy and Montague came for lunch. Afterward, he saw Ruth Swartz.' That was a woman who used to come to the talks. 'We walked in steady rain.'

The next day was the fourth discussion, 'a profoundly moving one. Edgar Graf and Doris Pratt came for lunch, after which we had the annual Saanen Gathering Committee meeting. We had received enough donations, about 50,000 Swiss francs, to cover next year.'

S: Would Krishnaji have been in that meeting?

M: Oh, yes, he would have been.

Now, the next day the fifth 'was the fifth discussion, and it was a hot day. Walking along the road after the meeting, Krishnaji met a young German couple, Renata and Rudiger Wolff, and he asked them up to Tannegg. They want to come to Brockwood.' They were quite nice. 'There was lunch and there was a meeting with Barabino and his group in Zweisimmen. Krishnaji was uncomfortable with so many people. We walked in spite of the heat. I did some photos.' And then it says in different writing: 'Mr. and Mrs. Sloss to tea.'

S: It's interesting to note that Krishnaji enjoyed his walks whether the weather was nice or not.

M: He would have gone out even if it had snowed.

S: Yes, because it was exercise and it was good for the body.

M: Yes, "It's good for you," he'd say. [Both chuckle.]

'The sixth Saanen discussion was the next day, and it was on death. "If you really know life, you will understand death," he said, "and love. They are one; not separate." It had a profound effect. Very hot day. Took a few more photos. Bill Burmeister'—he was a nice young man, who used to come to the talks—'and the Wolffs, Renata and Rudiger, came for lunch. They brought me kefir milk.' I was making kefir from then on for ages. They brought little, like, little cauliflower pieces and you kept them in water and then when you wanted them to work, you put them in milk, and they made kefir. It was rather good, a little culture thing. [Chuckles.] Don Hopper came to see me at 3 p.m., and at 4 p.m., Krishnaji saw Madame Baud and her husband. She was that woman who had a Swiss school, called Shangri-La, and she wanted it to be a Krishnamurti school.

S: Where was it?

M: I don't know…somewhere in the French part of Switzerland.

S: I did hear of that school.

M: On the seventh, 'Krishnaji he gave his seventh talk and that was the end of them for the year. Afterward he talked privately to Barabino about the Italian school, and then he saw Felix Greene. Elena is leaving Brockwood.' She was working at Brockwood in those days. 'We lunched alone. Brian Jenkins came by to talk to me about whether he should go to the Barabino school. Krishnaji walked down to have his hair cut by Mr. Nicola, the coiffeur, and I picked him up afterwards in the car. Krishnaji talked with Dorothy about Brockwood and made considerable demands on Dorothy. Talked on the telephone to Madame Duperex. Mr. Moser called and said that Krishnaji's new car had arrived.'

So, the next day, 'there were no more talks or discussions, it was a lovely day, and accompanied by Montague and Dorothy, we drove to Thun. In the little park by the lake we picnicked, after which we drove to Merligen, then back to Thun to Moser's when it was time to take delivery of Krishnaji's new Mercedes 450SLC that we ordered two years ago. He drove it back to Tannegg with Moser. The Simmonses and I came back in my car, and then Moser drove back to Thun, taking my car for winter storage. Krishnaji is pleased in every way with the new car and the way it drives. The look on his face delights me,' it says here. [Chuckles.]

The next day, August ninth, 'Krishnaji saw Felix Greene in the morning, and Felix called Brockwood a "disaster." He was critical of everything. The Simmonses and Doris Pratt came to lunch. In the afternoon, Krishnaji and I drove to beyond Château D'Oex in the new Mercedes to put mileage on it. We came back and walked as usual. Krishnaji told Dorothy about Greene and thought she should talk to him. She and Montague talked to Felix and Elena all evening.' That was the big split with Felix Greene. He was so snide about Brockwood.

'The tenth was a hot and clear, beautiful day, and Krishnaji, the Simmonses, and I drove to Thun in the new Mercedes. We discussed last night's meeting with the Greenes, and the car had its first service at 336 miles. While the car was being serviced, we took a cab to Merligen, lunched at Beatus, and took the lake steamer to Interlaken and then back to Thun by 5:30 p.m. We walked back to Moser's garage, where the new car had had its service, and then we drove back to Tannegg. The Eiger, the Jungfrau, and the Mönch were clear all day.'

On the next day, 'of the car, Krishnaji said, "It's like a crouching tiger."' [S chuckles, and then M does, too.] 'I did errands in the morning, and then we washed the crouching tiger.'

S: [laughing] This is the Green Beauty?

M: Yes. 'Ortolani and his friend came for lunch. Dorothy, Montague had supper upstairs, and then Dorothy and I went to the opening of the Menuhin concerts.'

August twelfth 'was a warm, lovely day. The Simmonses left in the Land Rover for Brockwood, taking one of our bags. We lunched alone. I worked at the desk, and later we took our usual walk. Krishnaji is feeling remote—"off."'

The next day 'was a hot day. I went to the village for final errands, bank, etcetera. We had lunch alone, finished packing and loaded the car. We took our last Swiss mountain walk of the summer, the usual way to the river. The car was all ready to go before bedtime.'

Now, we jump to the other book.

This is Tuesday, the fourteenth of August, 1973. 'Krishnaji and I left Tannegg at 4 a.m. in the new Mercedes, 450SLC. There was a golden moon lighting the valley, and then an orange ball of sun took its place as we drove along the Lausanne autoroute. Krishnaji drove that part. He said, "Now, I know I can drive this car." We stopped to rest in a wooded area for a while, and Krishnaji said, "I could have wandered off in the forest. The body is off. I've never felt it quite like this." There was a delay at the border because we couldn't find the chassis number on the car for the Swiss customs.' It had to be checked out of Switzerland. 'We finally did'—it was on the windshield—'and we bought croissants in the same village in the Jura and ate our picnic breakfast at the little side road where we have done the last several years.' Krishnaji would always remember where it was. He said, "We're coming to it now." This man who had no memory.

S: Yes, yes, I know.

M: So, we had our picnic. 'Then we went through Lons-le-Saunier to Chalons and joined the autoroute to Paris. I had slept less than two hours, so when Krishnaji wished to drive, I dozed. There was a heat wave all over Europe and the air conditioning in the new car meant a comfortable drive. We had a picnic lunch, but didn't care for the parking spots as we neared Paris, so wound up, as last year, eating our lunch in the Bois de Boulogne, near to where we used to walk. There were prettier places, but Krishnaji wanted a familiar one. We sat a long time under a tree. Paris is very hot, ninety degrees. We reached the Plaza Athénée by 5 p.m. A long, cool bath, delicious supper of fruit and soup made, the waiter said, of puréed rice and carrots. By 8 p.m., I had fallen asleep.'

Wednesday, the fifteenth of August, in Paris. 'It was a holiday in France, and I woke up after almost eleven hours of sleep to a delicious sense of nothing to do. Krishnaji slept well too, and we floated through the morning in complete relaxation. The weather was hot but not uncomfortable, and that added to the floating feeling. We lunched in the garden under umbrellas in the hotel, luxuriously and quietly. There were very few guests here. At 4 p.m., we walked to the Champs Elysées, where a Burt Lancaster Western was playing.' [S laughs.] 'The usual nonsense, but Krishnaji observed the southwest desert mountains and his head pains stopped. "I didn't know what was happening. I just watched." We walked back to the Plaza. Each did some breathing exercises. Had supper, and went early to sleep. This is the day that the U.S. bombing stopped in Cambodia.'

The next day was the sixteenth of August. 'Krishnaji, about his head pains, and that faraway feeling, said, "These people usually remain in one place surrounded by their disciples. The Buddha walked eighty miles, but that wasn't very far. This body was made sensitive and it rebels at being pushed around in strange places."'

'I said, "Shouldn't it stay in one place?"'

'Krishnaji said, "If you mean Brockwood, no. It may come to that, but not now."'

'It was another hot day. Krishnaji stayed in while I went to the bank and to Lobbs, now moved to Hermès, for shoe polish for Krishnaji. Then to Courrèges to get some jerseys. When I got to the hotel, Krishnaji said he wanted to go to Givenchy, so I could get some trousers that I could have copied in London, but they had none. We went to Phillip's for a razor. We lunched again in the Plaza's garden, and at 4 p.m., left in the Mercedes to drive slowly to Le Havre, Krishnaji doing about half the driving. It lessened the pain in his head. He kept the car's temperature low by slow driving, and varying the speed. Inside the car, we were cool with the air conditioner. We reached Le Havre at 7:30 p.m. It was cool there. We dined at Le Monaco, and I checked a new Chanel suit through customs before boarding the Normandy Ferry, the Dragon, on which we had a smooth crossing.'

The next day, 'we debarked from Southampton at 7 a.m., and drove to Brockwood. The Simmonses had not yet arrived. Annette and Richard Cooke and Jim Fowler have been the caretakers all summer. It was a cool and misty morning. We unpacked quietly most of the day. Krishnaji cleaned the Mercedes engine and worried at it standing outside because Dorothy's Cortina is stored in the Mercedes garage. "It will rust. We must cover it!"' [S chuckles at M's playful mimicking of K's worried tone of voice.] 'But Dorothy and Montague and Doris arrived in the Land Rover at 8 a.m. The Cortina was moved and the Mercedes was saved from the night's dew.' [Laughter.] 'Krishnaji's head was hurting him; his face looked drawn.'

Now, we must go back to the little diary.

The eighteenth of August 'was a day of unpacking and sorting out and putting things in order in all of Krishnaji's cupboards. His head continues bad. He, Dorothy, and I walked in the p.m. Krishnaji has decided to increase the walk: go to the grove, across the two big fields, along the footpath, behind and around the half-timbered house to the lane, and back along the lane.'

The nineteenth 'was another warm day, and I went on with cupboard straightening and we together washed the Mercedes and the floor of the garage all in the p.m. Dorothy brought Whisper the dog back from Wales, where she had been while we were all away.'

On the twentieth, 'Krishnaji came with me to Petersfield to inquire about floor mats for the car. After lunch, Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I went on the new walk. Krishnaji's head was bad, except when doing something or watching TV. "I wonder how long it will last?"'

On the next day, 'we went over the draft of the settlement done by Stanley Cohen.' That's all it says.

On the twenty-second, 'Mavis and Reg Bennett arrived to stay through the gathering. I put them in the West Wing guestroom.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I went for a drive. The tent went up for the gathering. Ian Hammond and Robert Wiffen came in the afternoon to inspect the work on the Cloisters and the dining room addition. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I met with them and talked about an assembly hall. On a short walk later, I told Krishnaji that the Alzina money…' Do you remember the Alzina account? This was an account in Switzerland for Krishnaji. 'I told him that the Alzina account money to pay for the Mercedes was still there, as I had paid the balance due. Krishnaji said to give it for the Assembly Hall.' He gave £3,500 sterling for the Assembly Hall.'

He and I discussed his headaches, as if the tremendous energy of the talks, when it subsides, the body protests, fatigue comes later when he is on a more superficial level.' He thought that's why he had the headaches.

S: Okay, can we just mention it a little bit fuller here? So he is saying that the tremendous energy that goes through his body during the talks…

M: Yes.

S: …and when the talks are over…

M: Yes.

S: …the body kind of protests at having all this gone through it…

M: Yes.

S: …and the protest takes a form of headaches.

M: Yes. And he would never have a headache while he was talking.

S: Right.

M: All his physical symptoms were his—they're odd.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Krishnaji gave interviews the next day, and we took a short walk and picked blackberries.

On the twenty-sixth, 'in the afternoon, Krishnaji and Carlos washed the car. Then, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I cleaned bracken and dead branches in the grove. After supper, I drove Bill Angelos, who has spent the day at Brockwood, to Petersfield.'

The next day, 'I did housekeeping, and we pruned trees in the grove until a rainstorm drove us in.'

On August twenty-eighth, 'Saral and David Bohm came to lunch and discussed plans for a scientist discussion meeting next year. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I worked hard at the tree pruning in the grove.'

The next day, 'Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to Petersfield and we took the train to London. We lunched at Fortnum. Krishnaji went to the dentist and had a tooth extracted.

We went to Huntsman, Asprey, and Mr. Hewitt the tailor at Rowe's for slacks for me. Then back to the dentist for altered denture. Then to Waterloo train and back to Brockwood.'

On the thirtieth of August, 'Krishnaji's mouth was sore. I prepared rooms for guests, and there was maximum preparation in the house and the tent for the coming talks. Dorothy was not too well, but she was on her feet and came for a short walk. Krishnaji in the night fell briefly sick; sweating, feeling faint, followed by trembling. It lasted only briefly.'

On the thirty-first of August. 'A letter from Erna saying that Mrs. Blau had seen the Happy Valley land with the Pollocks and later saw Rosalind. The feeling of the Blaus, Lilliefelts, Ruth, and now Krishnaji, is that we should drop any idea of the Happy Valley land for our school. Rosalind and Beatrice Wood are building houses there.'

'People were arriving for the gathering. Amanda Pallant is spending a weekend with us in the West Wing. Marcelle Bondoneau arrived with Pascaline Mallet. Madame Samuel also came. Marcelle is in the West Wing dining room. Krishnaji gave a brief interview to a Barry Groves from Canada. Heal's furniture finally arrived for the Cloisters sitting room which was set up. The young German couple Renata and Rudiger Wolff arrived.

On the first of September, 'Krishnaji gave his first Brockwood talk of the year. Afterward, I gave him lunch upstairs and then he went back to the tent where lunch was being served. The weather was fine; we had about 920 people at meals.'

The next day 'was the second Brockwood talk. Amanda Pallant left after the talk.'

On September fourth, 'Krishnaji held a discussion in the tent, after which he had lunch upstairs, and then went back to the tent.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I took the Wolffs for a drive to Exton through the lanes in the morning, and there was a walk in the p.m.'

On Thursday the sixth of September, 'Krishnaji held the second public discussion.'

The next day, 'the Wolffs left. I went to Petersfield to post sixty-eight Gstaad tapes to Erna and references for Alain Naudé to UC Berkeley Extension, where he is being considered as a music and piano teacher.'

The eighth was the third talk, and on the ninth was the fourth talk. 'There were easily 1,500 people at the last talk. It was a warm, beautiful day, and Krishnaji feels that there's too much of a holiday atmosphere at these talks, and not enough seriousness. Next year, it should be more austere. The pool will be empty, and there will be no entertainment. The camp is disliked around the community as they disturb pheasants and pick mushrooms. The guests began to leave.'

On the tenth, 'the Bennetts left. Almost all the campers and Cloisters guests have left. The house is becoming quiet. One can feel it happening. There was a good letter from Ruth and Albion Patterson about teachers for the Ojai center. I had deskwork and much laundry. Krishnaji spoke to Calles, who was booming with criticisms and later Krishnaji gave an interview to Ted Cartee, a serious young American who has been through much Zen.'

On the eleventh, 'Marcelle Bondoneau left, so did a few remaining guests. At noon, Krishnaji, Dorothy, Montague, Doris, and I took a picnic lunch and ate it by the mill in Alresford. It was a lovely day. There was an exquisite garden by the mill. Then we went to Winchester to the see the movie Day of the Jackal. Krishnaji enjoyed it.'

On September thirteenth, 'We went to London by train. Doris lent us her Mini as Krishnaji does not want the new Mercedes to sit in the Petersfield station parking lot.'

S: Quite right.

M: 'Mary Links met us at Fortnum's for an early lunch. She is working on the second draft of the biography. I brought in the dummy of photographs of Krishnaji, some of them bad, of the Indian book put together by Pupul and Sunanda of Krishnaji's Rishi Valley talks to students and teachers. I also brought the text, which Mary had asked me to read. Should it be printed in the West, too? Questionable. On the train, I read to Krishnaji parts of the book that Mary questions. Krishnaji was impatient at Pupul's and Sunanda's editing and dictated revisions to me. He said the book can't be published as it is. We discussed it at lunch, and Krishnaji decided that I should go through it and consult him on parts I think need editing, or elucidating. He will correct them, and when we get it done, it will go to Mary for her editing. This will irritate India, who wants to rush it out as-is, but Krishnaji said he will deal with that. How do I do this before Krishnaji goes to India? The book is 200 pages. I don't know but I will get on it.'

'At the end of lunch, Mary spoke of the beauty of Krishnaji's letters, their originality, and asked him if he would keep a notebook in which he would write a word, a line, anything each day. Krishnaji told her of the curious thing that happened before the first Brockwood talk two weeks ago, August thirty-first. He woke in the night feeling as if a ball of light were being placed in his head. He stayed awake observing it for about an hour. Krishnaji said he would write each day.'

Mary dropped Krishnaji at the dentist, and I walked to a fitting at Rowe's, stopping to buy Krishnaji avocado oil at Jackson's and some blueberries from the U.S., and then a notebook for the writing. I met him at Mr. Thompson's (the dentist), and he went to Huntsman for his fitting, then to Sulka, where they are making those shirts with Indian silk that Krishnaji brought on his last trip. Then we went to Asprey's for our watches, and bought two Lamay pencils for the writing. Krishnaji wanted one with thick lead and one with fine lead, and was pleased with what we found. Putting down our shopping bag was a self-conscious act; it isn't a bomb, said Krishnaji to the clerk. London and other cities have been harassed by the IRA with bombs, usually left in shopping bags. We went on down Bond Street to Maxwell's new shop. Huntsman has bought Maxwell's, and Krishnaji ordered a trial pair of shoes, which went so well and so quickly he had time to have a haircut at Truefitt across the street. And so to Waterloo and back to Brockwood by 6:30.'

On the fourteenth, 'Krishnaji wrote a whole page in his new notebook with his new pencil. A description of the grove and the feeling of silence and something holy there.[2] Frances McCann, who has been staying in the Cloisters, was invited to stay in the West Wing guestroom, where the Reg Bennetts were. Krishnaji is putting hands on Frances to try to help her; she is hearing voices. I talk to her and sometimes can persuade her that it is subjective, but then she lapses back into delusions; otherwise, she is quiet and pleasantly herself. Krishnaji has forbidden her to do any yoga or pranayama and will not hear of her delusions. I felt she would feel more secure and cared for here in the West Wing rather than in the Cloisters, which is almost empty now.'

'Krishnaji wanted to drive before lunch, so we took the Mercedes to West Meon, East Meon, and around through Privett. Another marvelously lovely day; warm, but not too hot; delicious air.'

'Barabino telephoned from Rome about confirmation of the date October twenty-eighth for Krishnaji's talk there, and wanted to know if we were still coming in spite of the recent cholera outbreak in Italy? Krishnaji hopes it will be over by then. What we are wondering is whether to go first to Venice with the Linkses. Salviamo Venezia, as Krishnaji said, when he saw that on an Italian stamp in June.' That means, "Let's save Venice"; Venice was crumbling at that point. 'He thinks it would be fun to go, and Mary and Joe are eager. I must check on cholera shots requirements with various embassies. At 4 p.m., a Polish professor' whose name I can't pronounce, 'a professor of Oriental philosophy and psychology came with his father and two people to see Krishnaji. He was a very emotional man who asked no questions, but kept repeating, "We are one, we are one" over and over. Krishnaji found it tiring. We walked around the grove later, waiting for a fitter to come to measure the Mercedes for brush mats.' [Both chuckle.]

On September sixteenth, 'I left at 10:45 a.m. after many admonitions on careful driving from Krishnaji and drove sixty-nine miles' to have lunch with a friend.

S: Which one?

M: The Meyers—Fleur and Tom and their guest the Brazilian ambassador and his wife and son.' You don't want to hear about all that, but I came back. [Laughter.]

S: Thankfully.

M: Yes, I got back at 6:15 p.m. Krishnaji had seen the Bohms about the proposed scientist discussion meeting next year. A letter came from David Hall. Krishnaji also had done his now daily notebook writing, descriptions of leaving Gstaad in the silent dark. And criticisms of a visitor.

And now we're back to the little diary.

S: Oh, dear.

M: I know.

So, the seventeenth of September, what happened? Oh, nothing. Krishnaji saw Carlos and Claire.

And the next day, Krishnaji gave an interview to Mr. Calles in the afternoon. There was a cold windstorm in the night.

On the nineteenth, 'Krishnaji wrote and I worked at the desk. In the afternoon, Krishnaji held a staff meeting. Later, he, Dorothy, and I walked and cleared fallen branches in the grove.'

On the twenty-first, 'Krishnaji wrote all morning and held a staff meeting in the afternoon. Then, he, Dorothy, and I walked. The weather is getting cold.'

On the twenty-second, 'Many of the students have arrived. I went to Petersfield to pick up Mrs. Prima Srinivasan from Madras, who lunched at Brockwood, talked to Krishnaji, and later I drove her back to the station. We walked as usual.'

The next day, 'All the students have arrived.' You notice that the school began at the end of September.

S: Yes. I remember it well.

M: 'There were forty-eight students in all who arrived. Krishnaji wrote and I typed, almost all day. Frances McCann is much better with Krishnaji's treatment and may go to India to continue. She is quieter and very helpful here. I tried unsuccessfully to telephone Vanda. On a walk, Dorothy suddenly had an odd feeling in her head. It happened again later. Krishnaji put his hands on her before retiring. She is overworked.'

On the twenty-fourth, 'the school term began. Krishnaji spoke to the school in the afternoon, and we telephoned Vanda about the dates.' He was going to go to speak in Italy.

S: Mm, hm.

M: On the twenty-fifth, 'I worked all day on typing Krishnaji's notebook. He does two-and-a-half pages a day. In the afternoon, he gave an interview to Jean-Loup Lopez. Dorothy saw her doctor because her blood pressure is up a bit. Krishnaji gave her treatments and Wobenzym.'

S: Wobenzym?

M: Yes, that's a remedy he was taking.

On the twenty-sixth, 'Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to the train station. There was heavy traffic in London. We went to Huntsman, then lunched with Mary L. at Fortnum's. I gave her the first ten pages of Krishnaji's new writing. There was a lot of discussion about the biography. Krishnaji and I worked on the Indian educational book on the train, and I am to concentrate on it. I am also to photocopy Krishnaji's daily writing and type them later so that Mary can have it more quickly. Krishnaji then went to see Mrs. Bindley while I had a fitting at Rowe's. I had difficulty getting a taxi, but eventually fetched Krishnaji at Mrs. Bindley's, and then went with Krishnaji to the dentist. We were lucky and caught the 5:45 p.m. train back from Waterloo. Dorothy and Doris were at the station in Petersfield to meet us.'

'New turf had been laid around the Cloisters.'

On the twenty-eighth, 'it was cold and showery. After lunch, I drove to East Dean to tea with Christopher and Phil. They have added another room on the top of their cottage. The garden is looking lovely. I was back at Brockwood by 6:30 p.m.'

'Amanda Pallant arrived for the weekend. She and a friend are going to start planting shrubs, etcetera around the Cloisters.'

On September twenty-ninth, 'Krishnaji wrote in the morning, and in the afternoon held a discussion for guests invited for the weekend, as well as students and staff. We held it in the West Wing hall using folding chairs and the stairs to sit on.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held another discussion in afternoon.'

October first 'was a most lovely day. Krishnaji began to write, but felt like a drive. So we wandered in the car through the lanes south of Brockwood. The sunlight coming through the leaves, and lovely places we haven't seen. Then back to deskwork and a walk.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji wrote, and then held a school meeting in the afternoon. One of the staff members spoke idiotically: "History is all lies, etcetera," he said. Later, I had a talk with him.'

On October fourth, 'at 3:30 p.m., Krishnaji spoke to the school in the West Wing hall again, during which I took some photos. Afterwards, Krishnaji spoke to some staff members who were troubled. Frances McCann and I went to the Alresford Group Surgery for cholera shots for Italy.'

On the fifth, 'Dorothy drove us to the Petersfield station, where we caught a train to London. On the train, we worked on the correction of the Indian educational book. Krishnaji went to Huntsman and I to Rowe's, where we had fittings. Mary L. met Krishnaji at Huntsman, and they met me at Fortnum's for lunch. I picked up my watch and Krishnaji's Naviquartz clock at Asprey's. Then Krishnaji and I went to John Bell and Croydon, and then to Mr. Thompson. Krishnaji had a tooth with an abscess, which was drained. We caught the 4:50 p.m. train back to Petersfield. A nice man gave us a seat. We worked some more on the book on the train.'

October sixth, 'Krishnaji wrote in the morning. His tooth is better. He held a discussion at 3:30 p.m. Afterward, we went for a walk, and on our return, we learned that serious fighting has broken out at the Suez Canal where Egyptians have crossed into Israel. Israel held the East Bank. Also, Syria attacked from the Golan Heights. Today is Yom Kippur.'

S: Who did Krishnaji hold a discussion with?

M: The school, I presume, unless it says otherwise.

For the seventh, I have, 'The Israel/Egypt/Syria fighting continues. Krishnaji wrote in the morning and held another discussion with the school at 3:30 p.m. He said, "To say, 'I do not know,' and really mean it, is to be out of thought."'

'Krishnaji and everyone at Brockwood planted a cedar of Lebanon, given by Joan Wright and her husband, on the front lawn…'—that's the one down next to the big cedar—'and also an English oak near the driveway, supplied by me.'

S: Which one is it?

M: There's a little oak between the handkerchief tree and the other big tree.

S: Ah, ha. Oh, yes.

M: On October eighth, 'Fighting between Israel and Egypt and Syria continues. Krishnaji wrote in the morning. I went in the afternoon to Winchester to have his notebook'—that's the journal—'photocopied and then post the package of photocopies and letters. Krishnaji, with Carlos's help, washed and waxed the Mercedes. Then, we walked.' See, we didn't have a photocopy machine in those days.

S: I know, I remember. We had a Roneo machine. I remember it well. [M chuckles.]

M: The next day, I drove Krishnaji's Mercedes to London, got Krishnaji's Italian visa, and then took the car to the Fisher Shipping Company, for shipping to Los Angeles. I walked to the Royal Academy and saw the Chinese exhibition.' That was wonderful; it was all those horses—do you remember? That were discovered somewhere…

S: Oh yes, in Xi'an.

M: They were marvelous!

S: Yes, yes.

M: ‘I bought a sweater present for Vanda and then to Waterloo and the train to Petersfield. Doris had left her car there for me. Krishnaji had spoken to the school.’

October tenth, ‘Fighting continues around Israel. Krishnaji wrote in the morning. Mary Cadogan came to lunch, after which she discussed miscellaneous things with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I went for the usual walk. Vice President Agnew resigns, pleading no contest to tax evasion so that other charges are dropped.’ Outside world comes in occasionally. [S chuckles.]

On the eleventh, ‘Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to the Petersfield train station for a train to London. We had lunch at Fortnum’s. Then, to Mr. Thompson for Krishnaji’s teeth. Afterward, Krishnaji had a Huntsman fitting on his rust-colored tweed suit and light gray one. We bought a cardigan for Vanda and some detective stories at Hatchard’s, and caught the 4:50 p.m. from Waterloo. Dorothy met us at Petersfield.’

On the twelfth, ‘Frances and I went to Alresford Surgery, then to Winchester to have the vaccine signature certified. Mary L. and Amanda Pallant came to lunch and to spend the night. Mary talked to Krishnaji in the afternoon about the biography. Later, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. It was a cold day. Fighting continues in Israel.’

The next day, ‘Mary and Amanda left. I packed. Krishnaji spoke to the school in afternoon, and then we walked.’

The fourteenth is packing, and packing. ‘Krishnaji spoke very briefly to Carol Algood in the afternoon. He, Dorothy, Whisper, and I walked in the late afternoon along the usual path.’

On the fifteenth, ‘We left Brockwood at 10:45 a.m. The whole school came out to say farewell. Dorothy and Doris in the Land Rover drove Krishnaji, Frances McCann, and me to the airport. We had a picnic lunch in the car at Runnymede, then on to the airport, where Krishnaji, Frances, and I took a BEA flight to Rome. Vanda and Barabino met us. Somehow, Vanda, Krishnaji, Barabino, I, and eight bags all got into Vanda’s Lancia and to Via Barnaba Oriani.’ That’s the street where Vanda had an apartment. ‘Filomena had left flowers and grapes from her garden. I spoke to her on the telephone. In the morning there had been a letter at Brockwood from Erna about the responsibility of the Zalk house and thirty-eight acres for a KFA school. Christensen’—that’s Rajagopal’s lawyer—‘is avoiding Stanley Cohen’—that’s our lawyer—‘on the telephone and hence on any settlement.’

The next day, ‘Filomena came looking very well and we talked about things about her. Vanda asked her to stay for lunch, after which we talked some more. We did some errands together, and in Piazza Euclide we met her grandson Lelo, who works in a porcelain store, and then she went home.’

‘Krishnaji spent the day in bed resting and reading. We listened to the news of the war in Israel. Much fighting continues.’

On the seventeenth, 'I went with Vanda to Via Veneto. Giorgio and Margarita Signorini and Frances came to lunch. Frances's delusions are bad again. The Signorinis are keeping her with them. Krishnaji talked to her, and said she must not go to India, and she agreed. We all discussed with her about going to a psychiatrist. I tried to telephone Phyllis Lutyens to ask for advice on psychiatric care in New York, but the telephone didn't answer. Frances would prefer San Francisco. Krishnaji and I went for a late walk in Villa Glori. He spoke of returning to Malibu after the New York talks in April, and spending the month of May in total rest.'

On the eighteenth, 'I went with Filomena and bought socks for Krishnaji to take to India. When I came back, I went over this morning's writing by Krishnaji. In it, a Sanskrit prayer, which he said he mostly made up.' [S laughs] 'Barabino and the Signorinis came for lunch. Krishnaji and I walked in Villa Glori after his nap. War in Israel continues heavy.'

October nineteenth. 'Frances came to see Krishnaji, then she, Vanda, and I took a bus to the Corso and went to Veruska pant store, where I bought three pairs. To Hausmann with Krishnaji's Patek and fetched mine, then to the Daily American to put in an ad about Krishnaji's upcoming talk. I bought him some books and notebook paper, and came back by bus. Vanda and I, Cragnolini, and Topazia for lunch. Krishnaji said Italy must have a committee, not just Barabino. They didn't want that. Shrill resistance. They don't listen. Krishnaji had to battle to get them to understand. Later, we went for a walk as usual.'

The next day, 'I spent the morning with Filomena but came back in time for lunch. Signore Varvesi' it looks like, 'and wife were there. He does television news special services. She teaches. Also, there was an ecologist, Vittorio somebody, Barabino and Silvia Gianatta, a friend of Barabino who was at Saanen to help him. She lives in Torino and studies psychology. There was a discussion between Krishnaji and Varvesi later. The latter pro-Jesus. It was a tiring effort for Krishnaji. We walked together later.'

October twenty-first. [Laughs.] 'At 8:30 a.m., Ms. Goody came and gave me a massage.' Wonderful masseuse. She gave us wonderful Swedish massage. 'Krishnaji, Vanda, and I lunched at Villa Medici with Comte de Roland and his Japanese wife. Also, there was a Madame Cassadó, also Japanese, the widow of the cellist Cassadó.' Cassadó used to play in the Menuhin concerts and I've heard him play quite a number of times in Saanen. He had died. 'They discussed Krishnaji's possibly being in Japan in November 1974. Madame Cassadó goes there tomorrow and will write to me about it. We came back and rested. Krishnaji went for a walk by himself.'

On the twenty-second, 'Israel and Egypt accept a ceasefire. Syria, Jordan refuse. Fighting continues, but less. Barabino and friend Mr. Rivella came for lunch. He owns Lima products and has lent Bisla Villa for a school. Krishnaji and I talked privately with Barabino, saying there must be a committee to do the Bulletin, etcetera, in Italy, and also to run any school. Also the school is not to use Krishnaji's name. Barabino not to claim he is a Krishnamurti Foundation in his announcement, as he now does. After lunch, I went by taxi to see Filomena. She doesn't want to go to Malibu for a visit. She may come instead to Brockwood in the spring. I got back in time to go for a walk with Krishnaji. Electricity cut out in the evening, so we couldn't hear the news.'

[2] The first entry in Krishnamurti's Journal (1982).

Issue 29: October 23, 1973 to March 30, 1974

For much of the time covered in this issue, Krishnaji is in India and Mary is in California, so we can't turn to Mary's memoirs for this history.

What we do see is the tantalizing prospect of a settlement in the KWINC case which seems possible, but just doesn't materialize. But one positive development in the case is that Krishnaji's 1961 manuscript of what will become known as Krishnamurti's Notebook is finally returned to him.

This is also the period in which the dialogues with Dr. Allan Anderson are videotaped at an extraordinary pace.

Finally, the plans for some kind of education center in Ojai seem to pick up some momentum.

Scott: So, we're beginning on October twenty-third, 1973. You ended our last discussion by saying that Krishnaji had an interview with Silvio Ceccato on that day.

Mary: Yes, and it was videotaped.

S: Oh, really?

M: My diary reads, 'A partially videotaped discussion between Krishnaji and Silvio Ceccato, director of the Center for Cybernetics at the University of Milan. About thirty people were present. It was also taped on the Nagra by Yves Zlotnicka. There was confusion and non-listening by Ceccato. It took terrific effort on Krishnaji's part to talk to him because Ceccato didn't listen. He was superficial and interested mostly in repeating his own views over and over. After this, it was a stand-up lunch for everyone. That was about it. I went off and did some errands and I got back in time for the walk. A Miss Basile who wanted to question Krishnaji came along and chatted.' [M laughs.]

The next day, the twenty-fourth, 'the truce between Israel and the Arabs seems to be holding. Worked on the education book in the morning. Krishnaji wrote in his notebook. The Indian ambassador Mrs. Pandt came to lunch, also a Ms. Rosa Talamonti, who gave me useful lore on Japan.' That was when we were thinking of maybe having Krishnaji speak in Japan. 'It was a cold day. Krishnaji and I walked in Villa Glori. I asked him about meditation at night. He said that it's less at Brockwood because so many people are in the house.'

S: Hm.

M: The twenty-fifth. 'Very cold in the Rome apartment.' You know the Romans and maybe other Italians put on the heat on a certain date…

S: That's the way it was all over Europe, in France and English boarding schools.

M: Yes, and you could get chilblains, but no, it doesn't go on till the right date. [S chuckles.] And also the Rome apartments feel twice as cold because of the dampness in Rome; the walls get cold and damp. 'Another cyberneticist called Grazia Marchiano came to lunch, and various people came to talk to Krishnaji. Krishnaji had supper after 8 p.m. because of all this. He spoke briefly to Yves Zlotnicka about a message Yves had passed along from Guido Franco, who is still after Krishnaji to do the film which he wants to put on French television.' This went on all summer, this fuss with Guido Franco.

S: It went on for years, in fact.

M: Yes! [Chuckle in voice.] Every summer!

S: Yes.

M: 'It seems that Franco's film shows Sai Baba and U.G. Krishnamurti, but has little of Krishnaji, so he wants to film some more. And Krishnaji gave a firm "No"'—he didn't want to be mixed up with all those things. 'During the day, unbeknownst to us, Russia started to move troops to Israeli-Arab sectors. The U.S. alerted forces and the UN voted to send observers from smaller nations. The crisis was averted.'

The next day, the twenty-sixth, 'we learned more of last night's Arab/Israeli crisis. Now all is quiet. Worked all morning on the educational book. Krishnaji rested in bed all day. Went with Vanda to see Frances McCann, who was in a clinic, and having tests there.'

Next day I did errands.

S: Tell us what the errands were.

M: 'I went to Piazza di Spagna for books for Krishnaji, and miscellaneous things like that. Krishnaji and I lunched alone. Krishnaji slept all morning and all afternoon, but we walked later.'

On the twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji gave a talk at 11 a.m. at the Teatro Eliseo on Via Nazionale. There were about 900 people, 600 of whom used translation devices. Vanda had asked people for lunch afterwards. Krishnaji put a great deal into this talk, his one public talk here. In the afternoon, I finished going through the education book. Later Krishnaji and I walked in Villa Glori.'

The twenty-ninth of October. 'At Krishnaji's suggestion, Filomena and I went shopping for more undershirts from Schostal.' [M chuckles.] 'I also got more books for Krishnaji. We had lunch with Pontecorvo, the film director, and Fausta Leoni, a journalist who had had that Philippine cure by,' you know…

S: Oh, yes, the surgery without cutting.

M: Yes.

'Krishnaji asked Pontecorvo why he was making a movie about Jesus. He suggested that it would be much more interesting to show why the mind falls into superstition.' [Both M and S laugh.] 'Later, Krishnaji and I walked in Villa Glori, and he again cautioned me not to do unnecessary things and not to take chances, to not go on unnecessary travels, to drive with care, also to train my body as I would a dog.'

On the thirtieth, 'Krishnaji held his first discussion at Vanda's. It was on the difference between recognition and seeing. In the latter, there is only seeing, no center, no self. Filomena was there and stayed to lunch. Krishnaji and I walked in Villa Glori. Krishnaji didn't like the last chapter of the education book and wouldn't correct it, so my work on it is finished, and he will take it to India. Krishnaji made me buy flannel slacks that we saw in a shop window in Piazze Euclide.'

S: For yourself?

M: For me, yes.

S: Now, did this book turn out to be the book On Education?

M: I guess so. Yes.

October thirty-first, 'Krishnaji held a second discussion at Vanda's. Also a good one. At lunch were Barabino, and a niece of Vanda and her husband. Krishnaji and I went for our usual walk. A small moon was in the sky.'

November first. 'Filomena came with Mario, her son, in a new car to take me to the airport. Krishnaji was very dear at saying goodbye. He leaves tonight on Alitalia for Bombay. He waved to me from the hall windows. I took the 1:30 p.m. TWA flight to New York.'

Now we jump…

[Tape cuts out.]

S: I'll just say that we're going to skip through things, so the tape will keep stopping and starting, so that you can just read the things relevant to Krishnaji while he was away.

M: That's good.

Well, on the first of November, 'I flew to New York, and telephoned Erna when I got there. She told me that there's a meeting for the following day of Mr. Cohen, Christensen'—that's Rajagopal's lawyer—'and the judge about a settlement. The Lilliefelts feel that Rajagopal is moving toward agreement. Krishnaji must have been taking off for India as I was landing in New York.'

The fourth of November, I'm at Vineyard Haven, and I simply noted that on that day, Krishnaji should have flown from Bombay to Rishi Valley.

On November fifth, 'I spoke to Erna and she feels that progress was made Friday toward a settlement in the meeting between Cohen, Christensen, and the judge. If Christensen can get Rajagopal to agree we could have a settlement.'

On November thirteenth, I flew to Los Angeles and went directly to the hospital to see Amanda; she was in the hospital. 'Called Erna; Balasundaram telephoned today from Rishi Valley about a cable received by Krishnamurti from Rajagopal. It said, "I can forgive." Cohen counseled us to make no reply. The telephone communication is interrupted, but I telephoned Sunanda to relay a message, and called Krishnaji of my arrival with the lawyer's advice.' To let him know I was in Malibu.

S: Yes, and so you called Sunanda to have her tell Krishnaji what the lawyer's advice was and that you'd arrived.

M: Correct.

The eighteenth of November, 'Krishnaji went from Rishi Valley to Bangalore. And on the next day, Krishnaji goes from Bangalore to Delhi. I met Alan Kishbaugh, and we went to Ojai, and Theo took us to look at two places as possibilities for a school. One near the Ojai Valley Inn and then…'

S: Oh, yes, a beautiful place.

M: Yes…and also 'the Bower place that was on the same street as the Lilliefelts. There was a trustees meeting, then lunch. Mr. Jennings of Harper and Row came in the afternoon. I drove Kishbaugh back, and I came home to find the first letter from Krishnaji, written from Rishi Valley on November fifth through the twelfth.'

On the twenty-third, I got letter number two from Krishnaji, written from November thirteenth to the sixteenth, when he was in Rishi Valley.

On the twenty-ninth of November, I received letter number three from Krishnaji, sent from Delhi.

December first, 'We received a draft of a settlement agreement from Mr. Cohen.'

The next day, 'the Lilliefelts and I went over the settlement draft again and talked at length. We want to see Cohen about it. I wrote to Krishnaji, telling him what had happened.'

This is December sixth. 'A cable from Balasundaram: All activities at Rajghat have been canceled. Krishnaji will go to Madras tomorrow. He will be at Jayalakshmi's house through December.'

S: Why was it canceled?

M: I don't remember. 'There was a 2 p.m. meeting at Stanley Cohen's office with him, Erna, Theo, Ruth Tettemer, Albion Patterson, and me. We went over the draft of the settlement agreement, finishing at 5 p.m. When I got home, I found letter number four from Krishnaji waiting. It had been written from November twenty-fourth through December first, and sent from Delhi.'

On December seventh, it says, 'today Krishnaji should've gone from Delhi to Madras, staying at Jayalakshmi's.'

On the ninth of December, 'Sidney Field came to listen to the January twenty-fourth, 1972 taped discussion between Krishnaji, Alain Naudé, and me about what happens after death, a discussion that grew out of Sidney's questions to Krishnaji after his brother John had died.'

December thirteenth, 'Letter number five from Krishnaji arrived, written from December second through the fifth, from Delhi. In it he said that the Rajghat visit was canceled because not only were the airlines on strike, but there was uncertainty with the trains, and he had a cold. He told the Indian trustees that he cannot speak in so many places.'

'Ruth and Albion came to see me, and we discussed a KFA school and the Anderson videos. Erna received the amended draft settlement agreement from Cohen, and it is satisfactory.' Well, then there's a bit of medical stuff about my leg.

On the sixteenth of December, 'letter number six came from Krishnaji, written in Delhi and Madras between December sixth and tenth.' [Chuckles.] 'Amanda and Phil came over early and we did the Audubon Christmas count.' Do you know about the Christmas count? Every year around Christmas, all the Audubon people go out and see how many different kinds of birds are in their neighborhood and it's a fun, momentous day or event in the life of bird watchers.

S: Ah.

M: So, we did it on the sixteenth, and we found a barn owl in the eucalyptus trees by the garage.

S: Ah, yes. He gets many mentions.

M: Yes. On the seventeenth, 'Erna sent the settlement draft to Krishnaji, and I sent a letter about it from here, from me. And I also sent a settlement draft to Mary Cadogan for KF Trust to accept.' Then there's things about all through this, I'm having trouble with my hill falling down, but I won't go on about that.

S: Why don't you just say for the record, that the hill is what your house was perched on, [laughter in voice] and when the hill fell, the house fell?

M: Yes, it was rather important. [Laughing.] It was on my mind a bit. It says here for the eighteenth, 'Evelyne Blau telephoned to say that the Pollocks visited Brockwood and enthused. Spoke of renting the Zalk house to KFA for school use.'

On the nineteenth, 'Letter number seven arrived from Krishnaji in Madras.' Doesn't say anything about what it said.

December twenty-seventh, 'Alain Naudé, who had spent Christmas with me, flew back to San Francisco, and I came home from dropping him at the airport to find letter number eight of December thirteenth to the twentieth from Krishnaji, written in Madras. Erna telephoned about receiving a cable from him and Balasundaram concerning the text of the agreement clarification. Also, Cohen says that Christensen has not seen Rajagopal and therefore wants tomorrow's meeting with the judge postponed.'

We now come to 1974, and on New Year's Day, I didn't do much. [Chuckles.] So, there's nothing of interest to report.

S: I think you should just say again what you told me before.

M: No, I won't.

S: You're not? Okay.

M: No. Some things are private.

S: Alright. I accept that. [Chuckles.]

M: So, we jump to the third of January, 1974. 'Mary Cadogan telephoned from London. The English Foundation trustees agree to the settlement with minor suggestions. The KFT office has heat and light for only three days a week. Brockwood is alright because of its being a school.' Whatever that means.

S: Ah, yes. These are the famous strikes, where they were cutting off electricity and things in that winter. I think it was called the 'winter of discontent.'

M: Oh my. Were you around then?

S: No, I came in '74, but not until the end of August.

M: Yes, you started with the Brockwood Public Talks. Well, Brockwood apparently gets electricity because it's a school. 'Erna received a letter from Balasundaram with Indian lawyers' text of what is necessary for Rajagopal to give a quit claim to Vasanta Vihar. They have given power of attorney to me to sign for KF India.' See, I was a trustee of KF India in those days.

S: I remember.

M: On the fourth of January, 'a letter from Krishnaji, written in Madras, after he had received the settlement draft. Then, I received a cable from Anneke authorizing me to sign the settlement on behalf of the Stichting. There was a big mud slide in Topanga and snow in Newhall.' That's over the hill [chuckles].

On the tenth, 'letter number ten came from Krishnaji, written in Madras, Rishi Valley, and Bangalore, giving his travel plans. He goes to Rome on the thirty-first, to Brockwood on February second, and then on the fifth, he had arranged a ticket from London to here. He has sent letter to Cadogan to arrange for his U.S. visa. I had to supply letters inviting him,' so that was done.

On January sixteenth, 'there was a meeting between Stanley Cohen and Christensen in the judge's chamber in Ventura. Cohen rejected "picayune demands" by Rajagopal. Cohen wants to see us at the Lilliefelts' on Saturday to go over that. I cabled Krishnaji in Bombay, telling him what had taken place. Nothing decisive.'

On the nineteenth, 'I met Erna and Albion Patterson at Stanley Cohen's office in Oxnard at 9:30 a.m. We were there till noon going over Christensen's demands for changes in the settlement draft. Some are minor, etcetera, others we rejected.'

On the twenty-second, 'Erna telephoned. The meeting scheduled for February first with Judge Heaton, Tapper, Christensen, Rosenthal, Cohen, and us is postponed because of Tapper, to the sixth, just as Krishnaji is due to arrive. I rang Cohen to try to change it. Letter number eleven from Krishnaji in Bangalore arrived, saying that the acreage and guest house there pleases him. A cable from Joe Links said that the Mercedes Green Beauty will be shipped next week.' [Chuckles.]

January twenty-third reads, 'I did an inventory of Krishnaji's clothing here and sent it to Brockwood to help him decide what to bring from Brockwood. Erna telephoned that Christensen is not going to Ojai today to make the KWINC asset list and to receive Krishnaji's manuscript because Rajagopal says he's sick. Another stall.' He stalled and stalled and stalled.

S: That really comes through in this account you've given, when one hears the full picture like this, with all the details.

M: Yes. Everything was constantly postponed, always at Rajagopal's maneuvering.

S: It was really a kind of a war of attrition, wasn't it?

M: Yes, it was.

S: He was just hoping to frustrate people and wear them out and eventually have compromises made just to get it settled and…

M: And then, he would renege or be sick, or something…

S: Yes, mm, hm.

M: The twenty-ninth of January. 'Erna telephoned Cohen. His assistant, Mr. Reynolds, had gone to Rajagopal's house and was given by Christensen, who was there for the purpose, 363 pages of what is supposed to be the manuscript Krishnaji wrote in and around 1961, and that Rajagopal had Vanda bring him; the one that Rajagopal refused to give Naudé and me back in 1966. Erna saw the manuscript, but Cohen has custody of it until we, in turn, turned over the "Blackburn tapes" made in '68 in Gstaad.' Now, I'll explain about these tapes again. Albert Blackburn lived in Ojai and was a Krishnamurti admirer for years and years. When Krishnaji in 1968 broke off from KWINC, it was announced at the Saanen talks. Krishnaji had people from Ojai, who were close to all this, come up to the Chalet Tannegg, and he explained why he had to disassociate himself from Krishnamurti Writings. On his own initiative, Al Blackburn brought a tape recorder to that meeting and taped it. It wasn't Krishnaji's idea, and I wasn't present, so I didn't witness this, but anyway, he did. And Rajagopal was wild about this thing. The recording didn't say anything that wasn't already known, but Rajagopal just didn't like it to be taped and for people to hear it. So, one of the backwards and forwards in this settlement agreement was that he finally agreed to swap the manuscript of what was to become Krishnamurti's Notebook…

S: Yes.

M: …in order to get the tape, and as it says here: 'Cohen keeps the custody of it until the settlement was made. He couldn't give it to us, and eventually, it will come out in all this that we agreed to destroy all copies of it that we knew of…

S: Mm, hm.

M: And we acted in good faith. But, as it turned out much later, Blackburn kept a copy for himself.

S: Good.

M: …so we now have the thing.

S: Oh, do we have the thing?

M: Mm, hm.

S: Great.

M: Gaby Blackburn, Al's wife, I think, gave it to KFA.

S: Great.

M: But, we acted in good faith.

S: Yes.

M: On the thirtieth, on the California calendar, 'Krishnaji left Bombay early in the morning, which was the thirty-first on the Bombay calendar.' My diary says that he should have arrived in Rome at 10:30 p.m., California time.

On the thirty-first, I say, 'Krishnaji should be in Rome. I finished typing his notebook chapters.'

S: Which are not the Notebook. It's the journal, which Mary L. asked him to start writing.

M: Right. And he had left them with me to type while I was in Ojai. 'It totals thirty-five chapters, up to October twenty-eighth,' which is when he left.

On February second, 'Krishnaji flies from Rome to Brockwood. I came home from doing some errands to find two letters from Krishnaji written in Bombay.'

Now to the big diary. Tuesday, the fifth of February, 1974. 'The day began with a telephone call as I stepped out of the shower from Dorothy at Brockwood. She had a worried voice because Krishnaji had been refused a visa by the U.S. consulate in London. It was a poor connection, and I couldn't quite understand why, but it seemed to be something to do with my letter of responsibility for him being on official KFA paper. Would I ring the legal people? I did and got someone other than the head of the department. I explained etcetera, and was told suddenly that the visa was being granted at that very moment. I telephoned Dorothy the news. Ingrid[1] had gone to the consulate. The Indian embassy should have vouched for Krishnaji, but people at Brockwood didn't know the present high commissioner. Krishnaji had tried to reach Mr. Pandt, the former high commissioner in London and who is now in Rome, but he was in Canada on a trip. Dorothy called back in a half an hour and said Ingrid had the visa. Great relief. I did housecleaning, etcetera.'

'At 12:15 p.m., I drove to Ventura, and met Erna at the courthouse. We went over points of the latest draft drawn up by Stanley Cohen, which only reached me, Rosenthal, and the deputy attorney general, Laurence Tapper, yesterday. At 2 p.m., we saw Rosenthal; Cohen and Tapper arrived. Tapper had telephoned Erna out of the blue this morning; his son, whom he wants to go to Brockwood, has turned up among the Jesus freaks, but is now getting interested in Krishnaji. Erna brought some books, and some tickets to the Santa Monica talk for him. But all this has given us an opportunity for her to talk to Tapper. Annie Vigeveno came to the courthouse and sat on the far side, away from Erna and me. Then, Judge Richard Heaton took Rosenthal, Cohen, Tapper, and Rajagopal's lawyer, Christensen, into his chambers, where they remained for three hours.'

'Sol came out first and told Erna and me that he thought a settlement is going to occur. The judge insists that, if this went to court, it would be a long four-month case. Tapper was very helpful; he called Rajagopal "a crook" [chuckles], said Sol, and Tapper is only willing to consider a settlement because the length and expense of the case might outweigh the monies Rajagopal has taken by "self-serving." Tapper is going to insist on yearly audits of K & R Foundation. Cohen came out with a draft of a statement announcing the settlement, which would be given to the press and published in the Bulletin.' Rajagopal was very fussy about what we said about it, so that he wouldn't look as though he were in the wrong.

S: Right.

M: So, there were always fusses about how we announce things. So, 'Cohen came out with a draft of a statement announcing the settlement, which would be given to the press and published in the Bulletin. Erna and I edited it, removing references to "working together in friendship and cooperation." We kept it direct, plain, and factual. Christensen and Vigeveno left. Sol, Cohen, Tapper, Erna, and I talked for a while. Tapper as relater (that's some legal term) is rarely in such a position and made it clear to Christensen that he was such with us because we're trying to right the wrongs that Rajagopal has committed. He will insist on things like the audit, which Rajagopal would never accept from us. There is talk of making Rajagopal personally pay for the $40,000 vault built for K & R (in other words, with K & R money) in his own house.'

'By 6 p.m., everyone was too tired to go into things further and wanted it finalized with another meeting, which will occur on the twentieth and again on the twenty-second. Sol is leaving the Kaplan firm and becoming a partner in another Los Angeles firm, to open a special entertainment branch in Century City, which he will be the boss of. But, he will continue on our case as long as we want him.' He was the Los Angeles lawyer we went to; that Mitchell Booth sent us to…

S: Yes.

M: …and Sol was a very nice, youngish man who was in charge of our case. But, it was thought that because all this was going on in Ventura County, that we should have a Ventura County lawyer, and that was Stanley Cohen. So, Cohen carried everything, but Sol was always in the background, knowing what was happening.

'I drove home with care, feeling that extra length of responsibility to Krishnaji in handling these matters and as his arrival is tomorrow.'

The sixth of February. 'The wind stopped. Krishnaji left Brockwood and then Heathrow at 1 p.m. London time on TWA, a twelve-hour flight to Los Angeles. I finished putting the house in order, fetched fresh fruit and vegetables at the Brentwood Market, had the car washed, and went to the airport. A thankful, smiling feeling as the white aircraft wheeled up. I saw Krishnaji's head as he was second out and down the steps to the customs entrance. There was quite a wait, and then he stepped out, carrying his Vuitton bag, elegant, tired but wonderful. "Travel is hell,"' [chuckle in voice] 'he said.'

'We came home, talked, unpacked, and talked some more. He had supper in bed on a tray and I on a chair in his room. He wanted to hear Walter Cronkite' [chuckles]. 'We telephoned the Lilliefelts. It was a clear, brilliant night, a full moon, the wind blessedly gone. Krishnaji was too mixed up in time to sleep well. "Things have been going on, exploding in my head. Something is going on." He told me of the plans for the Bangalore headquarters for KFI, and the school plans there. Mary Links has finished the biography. She says it is good. Krishnaji is too tired to sleep, but he is here and wants to rest here for the month of May. Very happy.'

The seventh of February. 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed resting. Still disoriented in time. He has difficulty sleeping, but it was a lovely, quiet day.'

The next day, 'we drove to Beverly Hills, had lunch in a crêperie, the Magic Pan, which Krishnaji liked, but their fare of spinach crêpes, etcetera, was not a proper lunch for him, and he felt slightly sick later on. We went to Phil's barber, Sid Steinberg in the Beverly Wilshire, and had a satisfactory haircut. During this, I had his passport photocopied to send to Mitchell Booth, with whom I have discussed finding a way for Krishnaji to have some status as a resident in this country, avoiding visa difficulties. Krishnaji went to Dr. Christensen'—that's the dentist—'at 2 p.m., and had two fillings replaced, and a temporary root canal filling put in by Hamish Thompson removed. Slight decay. It will be fixed next week. Krishnaji likes my Earth shoes' [chuckles], 'so we went and got him a pair and came home. The trip tired him. Too much wear and tear from people and moving about. We had supper, and he went early to bed.'

On the ninth, 'Krishnaji slept better and spent all the day in bed sleeping on and off. He taught me new pranayama and a back exercise and gave me Aryuvedic medicine prescribed for me by Dr. Parchure; a purpley-black powder to be taken with ghee' [chuckles, and S chuckles softly too], 'also some oils and herbs to rub on my sore leg, etcetera. I am to put eight drops of milk in Krishnaji's nose each morning and oil at night.' [Laughs.] He always came back with these…these things…

S: I know, funny cures [laughter]. Was this for hay fever probably?

M: Probably, I don't know.

February tenth. 'Another quiet, lovely day, warm, beautiful, and restful. Krishnaji slept and read out of a string of new detective novels waiting for him, including a new Nero Woolf, which he is saving.' [Chuckles.]

The next day, 'Krishnaji rested. I did housekeeping, and took the car after lunch to have the exhaust pipe repaired. Sidney Field fetched me back to Malibu. He and Krishnaji went for a walk.'

On the twelfth, 'Krishnaji rested till 4 p.m. We drove the Dunnes' Volkswagen to the Jaguar place, and left it there for them to fetch tomorrow, and we picked up the Jaguar. Then we went to the dentist, Dr. Christensen, where Krishnaji's root canal…'

S: You're still driving a Jaguar at this time?

M: Yes.

S: Oh, shame on you. [Both chuckle.]

M: '…where Krishnaji's root canal was treated for a slight infection. Root packed temporarily until we return from San Diego.'

February thirteenth. 'I forgot it was my birthday until Alain Naudé telephoned with wishes. Krishnaji spoke to him. I invited him down during Krishnaji's Santa Monica talks. Krishnaji dictated letters, but remained in bed all day except in the afternoon when, in his blue jeans and Earth shoes, he did twenty laps around the garden.' [Both chuckle.] 'Then we walked over to the Dunnes'. Walking in their driveway, the red-tailed hawk was high and utterly motionless over the canyon. Three quick wing flaps and they mathematically stay in one spot. The clear, clean ocean air came across the canyon. The lovely afternoon light and small blue sight of Krishnaji briskly walking on the lawn was the sum of happiness to me.'

The next day. 'Another lovely day. We drove to Dieter's Import Cars in Oxnard, and signed all the papers for the Green Beauty, which is due in San Pedro from England next week. Dieter will fetch it for us, and we arranged it all with him. Dieter asked Krishnaji about a special license plate, one you can pay extra for, with the money going to ecology and the plates being permanent, what to put on it? Krishnaji said "KMN" for Krishnamurti, Mary, and Nitya.

S: Do you want to say any more about that?

M: He used to, when Nitya was alive and they were in London or in Paris even, they were very elegant and had things made with their initials on it.

S: I know, I know…

M: And…

S: …both of their initials.

M: Yes, it was always both their initials. So it would be…uh…

S: I have some of those things.

M: Yes, you do. The K would be, no the J…

S: The J is the middle.

M: …middle, and K on one side and N on the other.

S: Exactly.

M: So, he must have, I suppose, remembered that. I don't know, but he said "KMN." So that's what it had.

'We went to the Ranch House and bought bread and a casserole of nut-loaf and took it to the Lilliefelts' for lunch and a trustee meeting with Erna, Theo, Ruth, and Albion. Krishnaji reported on Indian activities, Brockwood, and the Assembly Hall building going ahead. Then we talked about the Anderson dialogues that were coming up, then the educational center plans, and then the case. Krishnaji asked if Barbara Lama can handle being the principal of the proposed school.' Barbara Lama was Albion's stepdaughter, I think, and she was a teacher. She worked at Happy Valley, but she didn't get on with Rosalind, and the thought was that she should be the principal. And then Krishnaji asked, "How will you judge a student? Will it be because of your prejudices, likes, dislikes? Will you be aware of these; of choosing with your own ego? It is a sin to turn down a child who comes to you, who may be the right one. It is a tremendous responsibility. If you feel that responsibility deeply, you will act rightly." It was 6 p.m. when we left. All gas stations were closed on the way back. We will need a full tank to get to La Jolla Saturday. Krishnaji said the body was tired from all this. He must get to bed early. Last night he slept almost nine hours.'

February fifteenth. 'I was able to fill the gas tank. Then I sent the papers to clear the Mercedes Green Beauty. Krishnaji rested. I did house and garden things. Later, Krishnaji packed, but mostly slept. "I don't know what is the matter with me," he said, "I'm sleeping so much." He is relaxed and needs it.'

On the sixteenth. 'It was a less sunny day, therefore more comfortable for Krishnaji to motor. We had planned to leave at noon, but watering the garden, laundry, and putting the house in condition to leave…' I didn't have Elfrieda, the maid, at that point. She'd gone off to Germany because her father died, so I was the housekeeper. '…and Krishnaji wanting to nap after the morning packing made it better to leave at 3 p.m. Miranda and David Nelson, who were spending the weekend at the Dunnes', came over and efficiently put all our luggage in the car, helped me do the dishes, and disappeared. So, Krishnaji and I left relaxed at 3 p.m. and drove at fifty-five miles sedately' [S chuckles] 'to not use up more gas than necessary. We drove 141 miles to La Jolla, arriving exactly at 6 at Martha Longenecker's house. Sidney Roth was there. Martha checked me out on how the house works. Tibbet, her cat, welcomed us. Then, Martha and Sidney left. Krishnaji and I had supper and went early to bed.'

Sunday, the seventeenth. 'It was a quiet morning getting settled. By careful driving, we came here on only one of Jaguar's gas tanks.' I didn't know it had two.

S: It has a reserve.

M: If it holds twelve gallons, we drove 160 miles on it. So, I drove to the market using one more [humor in voice] mile and laid in a supply of food. 'Came back and made lunch. Krishnaji rested all day until we took a walk around La Jolla at 5 p.m. We had supper entrées by the television. A program came on, Religion in America, showing Baba

Ram Dass (Richard Alpert and Timothy Leary's old partner in LSD at Harvard University) at the Baba Ram Dass ashram; scenes of pompous, beaded turban types doing what was billed as kundalini yoga' [laughs]. '"God bless America," said Krishnaji, "They embrace anything." Later we watched a little of Upstairs/Downstairs, and was hoping Sara the scullery maid would disrupt the dinner for King Edward the seventh' [laughs]. 'Bedtime intervened.' [Chuckles.]

The next day, I was up at 6 a.m. I did breakfast, laundry, and prepared lunch while Krishnaji did his exercises, etcetera, and we were ready to leave at 9 a.m. Martha and Sidney guided us to San Diego University and where the TV department is. We met Paul Steen, who was in charge, Paul Hartman, the director, and Professor Allan Anderson, with whom Krishnaji did the first of the ten days of dialogues, generally on what is the place of knowledge and the transformation of man. There were three color cameras. A girl, Doris Bently, who had written asking to see Krishnaji and saying she had permission from Anderson to sit in on the discussions was there. Anderson doesn't know her.' [Laughs.] 'Steen said no one could get in, but my dim view of being excluded amended that decision for me. The girl sat in a viewing room.' I suppose Steen didn't want me there.

'Krishnaji spoke of fragmentation causing division of man and nations, etcetera, sorrow, conflict, and violence. Revolution isn't revolution, he said, because it is gradual. This was all in the first hour. Then, there was a half-hour break and they resumed for a second hour. They went on, on freedom and knowledge. At one point, Krishnaji said, "Religion is a gathering together of all energy to be attentive" and "Freedom means complete austerity and total negation of the observer." We came back at 1 p.m., and lunch was ready fairly soon. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon and at around 5 p.m. we went for a mild walk, then supper on trays by the television. Early to bed.'

February nineteenth, 'At 7:30 a.m. it was still dark. I queued up in the Jaguar behind over a dozen cars to get gas. It took a half hour, but I got a full tank.'

S: Oh, we should just say that this is the oil embargo days…

M: Yes, yes.

S: …so it wasn't easy to get petrol.

M: No, it was very, very hard. You had to be very careful. 'I got a full tank and was back as Krishnaji was starting breakfast, which I'd left ready for him. Here, we eat breakfast at the table, as he says he will get woolly' [chuckles] 'and be late if he stays in bed. "Art is to place what is in order," he said suddenly' [chuckles]. 'We were about to leave when the dishwasher overflowed, so I threw towels on the floor to mop it up. Martha and Sidney had car trouble on the way to the university, but a patrol car got them there. Krishnaji told me Anderson is not challenging enough and said, "I will have to do it myself." But he had a word with Anderson and today's dialogue numbers 3 and 4 were more intense and went well. I am bothered by the gold background color, so I watched it all on a monitor, where I couldn't take notes but was absorbed by the dialogue and the way it was coming over in this medium. These may turn out to be unique and effective, our most important record so far. The color of the background is too green a yellow; they called it gold. It's not a becoming background to Krishnaji's skin. We came back to a quiet lunch and a small walk in the rain. We carried some shopping, each holding a handle of the shopping bag.'

On the twentieth, 'Krishnaji slept less well and efforts to try other background colors delayed the start of the recording for an hour, which tired and upset him, but once launched into the dialogue, he didn't want to stop after one hour, and they did full two hours. It went very well.'

'In the end it was decided to stay in the gold background rather than experiment. They discussed freedom and responsibility, what is order and freedom. On the way in, in the car, Krishnaji said to me, "Energy is not thought. Remember to remind me."'

S: Hmm, hmm. I had no idea that they were doing two of these tapes a day.

M: Oh, yes.

S: That's interesting.

M: Yes. 'He went into what is disorder…' and then it goes on again about all the things he said. 'We came back after 1 p.m. but soon had lunch, and Krishnaji slept all afternoon. A very short little walk. I spoke to Erna; she hadn't heard whether the lawyers met today as they were supposed to.'

On February twenty-first. 'Krishnaji is more rested and as I have accepted the gold background, they were able to start dialogues immediately on arrival, and 7 and 8 were done. Pleasure and fears, desire—what is it, control, pleasure.' And then again it goes on about all the things. 'So we were back earlier and stopped for eggs and a few things at Safeway. Krishnaji wanted an omelet. He has been off eggs for some months. He slept in the afternoon; we walked up the hill, saw a shepherd puppy. Erna telephoned. Cohen and Christensen met for three hours yesterday. Cohen walked out twice, but was persuaded to return and continue. Two major sticking points: the archives—where they should be kept. Christensen says they should remain at K & R; Cohen says they are an asset of KWINC and should go to KFA. Possible compromise might be in the attorney general's custody. And Rajagopal wants the rights to republish all material published by KWINC and its predecessor entities (i.e., the Star Publishing, etcetera) up to 1968. Erna says that would give him early rather Theosophical-sounding works in the Star Bulletin. She, Theo, Ruth, and Albion went over a total list of KWINC publications, and thought a possible compromise might be post-1933 materials with the exception of the '47–'48 Indian talks, which are recorded from Madhavachari's notes of recollection. She is sending a résumé of all this to us to consider before she has a meeting with Cohen on Tuesday. The judge, the attorney general, and lawyer meeting is postponed from tomorrow to March eighth. Cohen says Christensen accepts more difficult things like a yearly audit of K & R because they are insisted upon by Tapper, the deputy attorney general. Erna has the so-called Scaravelli manuscript that Krishnaji has sought for so long.' That's the Notebook.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'She read lines from it to me, and I repeated it to Krishnaji. He won't speak directly on the telephone as it rattles him. Erna says she will transcribe it herself.' So, it was Erna who transcribed it. I thought I did. [Chuckles.] And yet it's right that she did it, because it would've taken me a long time. Hmm. Good. Glad to know.

February twenty-second. Dialogues 9 and 10 at San Diego State on beauty, passion, understanding of suffering.' And then again, I review all the things that were said. 'We came back to lunch, and telephoned the shipper. The Mercedes Green Beauty ship docked today. It should clear customs Monday or Tuesday. We got Erna's letter about the lawyer's sticking points, that is, where to keep the archives, and Rajagopal's demand to republish anything pre-'68. We walked in the village later, bought a book on sharks by Peter Benchley for Krishnaji and a new Helen MacInnes for me.'

The next day was 'a day of rest with a late breakfast. I walked to the health food store, inquired about oil at the Shell station and wound up being able to fill the Jaguar with gas, too. After lunch, we walked to a movie, Chariot of the Gods. Krishnaji felt tired before dinner, said "We mustn't go to Japan, it's too much, I'm 79." We agreed again not to motor any more to Saanen; the long drives are now too much for him.'

Sunday, the twenty-fourth. 'It was a hot day, with Santa Ana winds[2] in Malibu. Spoke to Amanda, who said that gas was very tight there. Krishnaji stayed in all day. I marketed in the late afternoon. We watched an appalling Guru Maharaj Ji film. "People are crazy," said Krishnaji.'

The next day, 'On way to San Diego State, Krishnaji said, "I think I will take charge of the discussion." Both dialogues 11 and 12 went very well. It began with religion. Krishnaji was very tired after all this. He slept and we walked a few blocks, and for the first time he said his head hurt as we came back in the car. He has definitely decided not to go to Japan in the autumn.'

On February twenty-sixth, 'Krishnaji spoke in the car of immortality as a subject. Then Krishnaji held dialogues 13 and 14 on consciousness, living, love, death, immortality, and reincarnation. Alan Kishbaugh came to the taping, and then lunched with us. Krishnaji slept and then he and I went for a short walk. Bought some presents for Martha Longenecker. Telephoned the shipper; the Mercedes cleared customs. Then spoke to Erna about her meeting with Cohen. Rajagopal in return for the letters he has of Krishnaji's wants Krishnaji to revoke his statement that Rajagopal is not to represent him. Cohen and Erna think we should forget the letters.'

Now, there's a jump, so we have to turn to the little book and see what February twenty-seventh says.

S: What does it jump to?

M: April twelfth.

S: Oh, lord.

M: February twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji wants to finish the dialogues tomorrow. We will decide after tomorrow's taping. He did video tapes 15 and 16 today on education, death, religion, experience, authority, obedience, teaching. After lunch, I went hunting for gas and a car wash. Kishbaugh came for a walk with Krishnaji and me along the cove. Elfriede telephoned. She returned from Germany last night.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji did dialogues 17 and 18 mostly on meditation and decided not to do anymore. So we went back to the house, had lunch, loaded the car, said goodbye to Martha Longenecker, and left at 2:45 p.m. to drive all the way back to Malibu, part of the way in a light rain. We arrived at 6 p.m. Elfriede had the house clean and neat. It was good to be home. Both Krishnaji and I are tired, but especially Krishnaji. The dialogues are more tiring than talks.'

March the first. 'I went early to get gas. Elfriede has a cold so I sent her to rest. Asit Chandmal, nephew of Pupul, a new KFI member, came by the house on arrival from India, with a Mr. Cook,' it looks like, 'from Burroughs Corporation. Krishnaji saw him. The rest of the day was quiet.'

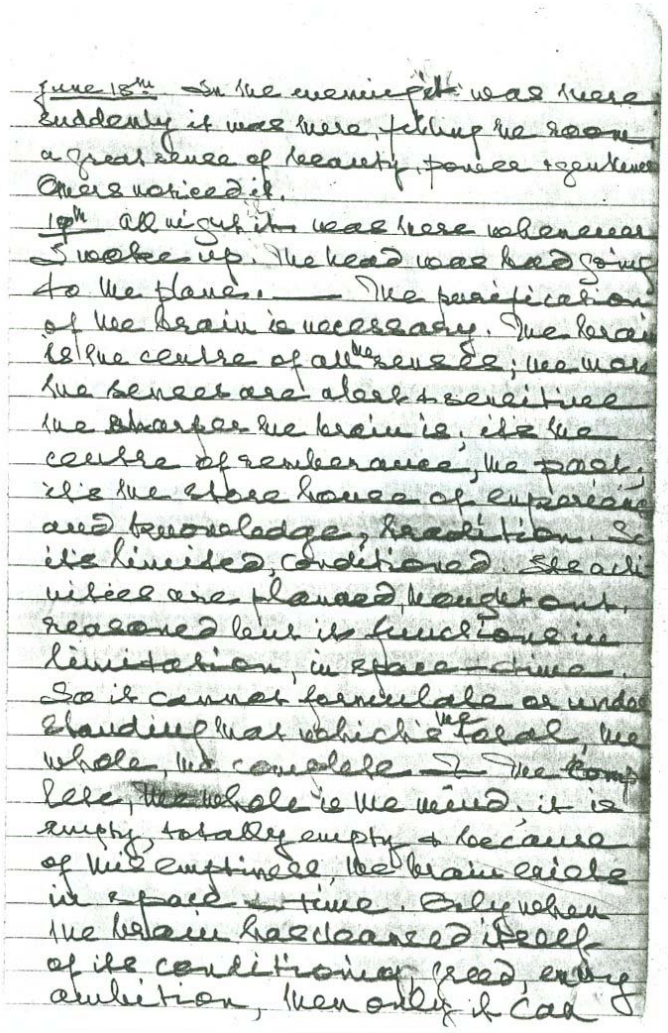
The next day, 'Krishnaji and I fasted, taking only fruit juice all day. I worked at the desk and Krishnaji stayed in bed. There was heavy rain in the night. The newly fixed roof leaked right over my bed.'

March third. 'Asit Chandmal and Mr. Cook came to lunch. The rain stopped after two inches.'

The next day, 'Dieter fetches Mercedes from the shippers and takes it to his garage in Oxnard for a checkup. There is no damage.'

The fifth of March 'was a beautiful day. Krishnaji and I drove to Oxnard and saw the Green Beauty. We asked Dieter to get some special personalized license plates for it—KMN. We then went on to Ojai and met at the KFA office with Asit Chandmal, and an Indian friend, Shree Bedaker. We took them, the Lilliefelts, Ruth, and Albion to the Hooker's Ranch House Restaurant for lunch in the garden. Afterward, we walked up on the land adjacent to the Oak Grove. It was beautiful, but too close to Meiners Oaks and the proposed highway for a school, in Krishnaji's view.'

S: Hm.



M: 'Went to see the McCaskey forty acres on McNell Road. Krishnaji likes that. After the Indians left, we had a long talk about where the educational center should be and Krishnaji pushed strongly for buying the McCaskey piece. They are asking…' looks like $700,000. 'It was decided to go into it. We drove home.'

On the sixth, 'Krishnaji dictated letters, which I dictated onto tape and later took the tapes to the secretarial service for typing. I am swamped by mail.'

The seventh of March. 'After lunch, we went to town. Krishnaji had his root canal, which was begun by Thompson in October, filled by Dr. Christensen. Then he had a haircut, then we came home.'

March eighth. 'At 11 a.m. Ruth, Albion, the Lilliefelts, and Kishbaugh came with about ten possible teachers who might be involved in the school, and Krishnaji discussed what it would be about. Two doctor Siddoos, sisters, who are starting a similar school in Vancouver, Canada, were also there, and Asit Chandmal. The latter and Kishbaugh stayed to lunch.'

June 18th In the evening it was there suddenly it was here, filling the room a great sense of beauty, power, quietness. Others noticed it.

19th All night it was there whenever I woke up. The head was heavy going to the floor. — The purification of the brain is necessary. The brain is the centre of all the senses; when the senses are alert, sensitive the chamber the brain is, is the centre of remembrance, the past, it is the store house of experience and knowledge, tradition. It is limited, conditioned. Its activities are planned, worked out, reasoned but its function is in limitation, in space-time. So it cannot formulate or understand that which is total, the whole, the complete. The complete, the whole is the mind. It is empty, totally empty & because of this emptiness, the brain exists in space & time. Only when the brain has denuded itself of its conditioning (read, enjoy audition, when only it can

First page of Krishnaji's notebook (Image copyright, Krishnamurti Foundation Trust)

‘Erna and Theo brought Krishnaji his manuscript written in 1961, brought by Vanda to Rajagopal and held by him refusing to give it back to Krishnaji except in exchange for the Blackburn tape. It was given to our lawyer Cohen. Krishnaji asked me to read it. It is in pencil in Krishnaji’s hand, a daily journal of process within him, pains, pressing, and strange action of whatever it is. Immensely beautiful and moving.

The next day, ‘At 11 a.m., there was a similar meeting on the school. The two Siddoos and Asit Chandmal stayed to lunch. I read more of the manuscript in the afternoon.’

On March tenth, ‘there was a third meeting, and more people came. Kishbaugh lunched with us, and Krishnaji let him see the manuscript. Then all three of us went to see a movie, The Poseidon Adventure. Krishnaji said he had a sudden feeling that he would live another ten to fifteen years. “The body must last,” he said, “and I must outlive him.”’ [3]

The next day, ‘Erna heard from Cohen. Rajagopal asks for Krishnaji’s personal reasons for control of the republication of pre-1933 books, so she gave a substantive draft of a letter on the telephone.’

‘Krishnaji rewrote the letter about the pre-1933 material republication, and we had it ready by 11 a.m., when other trustees came for a KFA trustee meeting. We went over Christensen’s draft of the settlement. We all had a quick lunch, and then Erna and Theo drove Krishnaji and me to Cohen’s office in Oxnard. We went over the settlement draft with him. It is the first time Krishnaji had met Cohen, and he liked his spirit of getting things done.’ [Chuckles.] ‘The next meeting is in Judge Heaton’s chambers tomorrow. Then Erna and Theo drove us to Dieter’s car place, where the Green Beauty was ready and shining! We drove it home at last to Malibu, Krishnaji at the wheel half the way. We showed it to the Dunnes. “We accomplished a lot today,” he said.’

The thirteenth of March. ‘I began dictating Krishnaji’s 1961 manuscript into cassettes to be transcribed by the local secretarial service.’

‘There was a meeting of Cohen and Sol Rosenthal, Christensen, and Judge Heaton in Ventura, but we didn’t hear the results. Krishnaji and I listened to a TV broadcast of the Bill Moyer’s interview of Marcuse.’ Who’s Marcuse?

S: That’s a philosopher, Marcuse.

M: Oh, yes. ‘At the end, Krishnaji said, “I know what I will talk about on Saturday.”’ [M chuckles.]

March fourteenth. ‘Krishnaji and I drove the Green Beauty to the auto club to be registered and get the license plates. We also took some film to have some prints made, and shopped for car soap and went to Lindberg’s.’ Lindberg’s is the health food store. Krishnaji liked to go there. ‘Erna spoke to Cohen regarding Rajagopal’s balking at the pre-1933 publication control by Krishnaji, and Cohen is holding firm. The archives are to be housed in the K & R office, not Rajagopal's vault. We get a lean on the $40,000 vault value if Rajagopal sells his house, or on his death. Cohen is putting the agreement into legal form as soon as possible.'

On the sixteenth of March, 'Krishnaji gave the first talk at the Santa Monica Civic Auditorium. An unserious audience.'

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji gave the second at Santa Monica. The audience was larger, quieter, more attentive. We returned to Malibu and had lunch alone. Then at 4 p.m. came the Lilliefelts, Kishbaugh, Ruth, Albion, Evelyne and Louis Blau, and Mr. and Mrs. MacQuiddy. The latter brought a Mrs. Styles, but she and Mrs. MacQuiddy sat outside while the rest of us discussed the forty-acre piece in Ojai for an educational center. Krishnaji is determined to buy it, so we proceed to see how we can. The Lilliefelts decided against the Yosemite trip in May that Alain Naudé had investigated for us.'

On the eighteenth, 'we washed the Green Beauty.'

The next day, 'I called some people I knew to suggest an architect, which we would need if we are to build a school. They suggested a man called John Rex, so I made an appointment with him for Thursday. Krishnaji gave an interview to Alfredo Calles. I felt a sense of something present in the evening while we were talking about the school. Krishnaji felt it for a while, and then when it was gone, he said that feeling means something—they—it is right to do what we are doing.'

S: Mm.

M: On the twentieth of March, 'at 6 a.m., I did an hour of reading Krishnaji's 1961 manuscript onto a cassette. A lovely way to start the day. I went to town alone…'

S: You were reading Krishnaji's manuscript on …

M: …onto cassette tape. I was dictating it onto a tape.

S: This is the Krishnamurti's Notebook.

M: Yes.

S: But I thought Erna had transcribed it.

M: Well, you missed when I said that it was decided that I would read it, and the secretarial service…

S: Oh, okay, alright.

M: 'I went into town for errands, and was back at 1 p.m., as Krishnaji came up the driveway to meet me. He could tell, he said, "I knew you were coming."'

S: And so he would walk up the driveway to meet you?

M: Yes. I'd been gone all morning, but he sensed it. 'In the afternoon, Krishnaji gave an interview to an Italian girl…something Jemma, her companion Barry Gordon, and Ava Berner. Then to Joe Liggette'…all those people. 'We walked around the garden as usual.'

On the twenty-first, 'I worked on manuscript dictation and other desk things. As it was such a lovely day, Krishnaji and I drove the Green Beauty up to Cabrillo Park and back. At 2 p.m., John Rex came and we discussed an Ojai education center most usefully. He knows the region, people there, etcetera and made a satisfactory impression on Krishnaji. In the evening, we played records: Krishnaji's Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.'

The next day for me started with typing. 'Frances McCann came to lunch, after which I drove her back to Santa Monica and did errands. Again, as I came back, Krishnaji was walking up the driveway to meet me.' [Chuckling.]

On the twenty-third, 'Krishnaji gave the third Santa Monica talk. I had lunch alone afterward while Krishnaji slept.'

On the twenty-fourth, 'Krishnaji gave his fourth talk, completing the Santa Monica series. Erna gave me a copy of the letter to KFA from Mima Porter and the Vigevenos, Weidemans, and Austin Bee refusing the settlement. Christensen has told Cohen they were in a furor over Krishnaji's wanting control of the publishing of the pre-1933 materials.' Can you imagine? [Chuckles] Furor over control of his own writing. 'Kishbaugh came back after the talk, lunched with us and Erna and Theo. We discussed the case, and also the offer we are about to make on the forty acres of the McCaskey land for the educational center. Evelyne Blau came at 4 p.m., but first Krishnaji gave us a blinding challenge on whether to go ahead with the offer in spite of the settlement blowing up. "If it is right, it will come right," he said. But we had each to feel that it was right, apart from any other consideration. Erna and I signed the offer for $250,000 for the land.'

The twenty-sixth, 'there's a light rain. We drove the Green Beauty to Ojai, lunched with the Lilliefelts, Ruth, and Albion, and spent the afternoon discussing the pre-1933 publication rights for K & R in the settlement, and the architect's suggestion for the educational center. We came home in time for supper.'

On the twenty-seventh, 'there's something about an aunt of mine who died. She left me about $150,000, the exact amount we would need for the rest of the purchase of the forty acres if we get them.'

S: Mm, great. [Chuckles.]

M: David Young had an interview with Krishnaji.

March twenty-eighth. ‘I did mostly deskwork. I put together biographical notes and book reviews of Krishnaji for Mitchell Booth to use in trying to get Krishnaji some special status with regards to visas for this country. We found pack rats had gnawed wiring in the new Mercedes and were nesting in the Jaguar.’ [Both chuckle.]

Next day, ‘I worked on dictating the book, and answers to letters, etcetera. I posted material I had assembled to Mitchell Booth. Later, Krishnaji and I washed the Mercedes.’

On the thirtieth, ‘Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai in a light rain, bringing food for the weekend. We spent the night there.’ This was at the Lilliefelts’. ‘We took a walk and peered at the forty-acre piece.

S: We’re running out of tape.

M: Alright.

S: That will give you a chance to read it tomorrow.

Issue 30: March 31, 1974 to May 9, 1974

This issue is only about half the size of most of the issues because Mary and I made a mistake in our discussion. As has been explained several times, Mary kept two diaries: one a daily diary which she would write in every night before going to bed (and which she called 'the little book'), and the second diary was a much larger loose leaf binder she would use whenever she felt there was much more that needed to be recorded than she could fit into her 'little book.' This she called her 'big book.'

As this discussion proceeded Mary was just reading out of her 'little book' assuming that these days were not covered in her 'big book,' and I did not think to ask her to check. However, as we discovered, this assumption was wrong. When we discovered this, she wanted to go back over all the dates we had covered in only 'the little book' and read out material for those dates from 'the big book,' as this material is much more complete.

These two versions of the dates, which were recorded in our discussion, have been edited together in this issue to give the reader the fullest possible account of what it was like for Mary to be in the presence of Krishnaji for those dates, but this resulted in discarding all the repetitions, and therefore, about half the material.

Mary: Well, March thirty-first, 1974 'was a clear and beautiful day. Krishnaji gave a public discussion in Libbey Park in Ojai. We were staying at the Lilliefelts'.'

'The Vigevenos and Casselberrys were in the audience. Afterward, Krishnaji saw Blackburn briefly and then the Mark Lees. Then Krishnaji, Kishbaugh, and I lunched. At 2:30 p.m., the Blaus, Ruth Tettemer, with Albion and Russell MacQuiddy came and we discussed the McCaskie land purchase and what to ask for in zoning change. It was decided that John Rex be the architect. The Blaus and MacQuiddy left, and the trustees discussed the school. Krishnaji brought up Mark Lee to head the school, and Ruth and Albion were rather hostile. They are committed to Barbara Lama and have perhaps gone too far in an unauthorized way of committing to her.'

'In the early morning, seeing the beauty of the valley, I told Krishnaji that perhaps he put up with Rosalind and Rajagopal all those years because, in a way, they were minor to the other quality of life for him in a valley which he loved and found beautiful.' It was his relationship with the hills, the mountains, and the look of the land. And, of course, in those years he spent so much time by himself climbing in the mountains and being alone…

Scott: Yes.

M: …and it was as though that's where he lived, and all the sordid quarreling and bickering and pettiness…

S: …and ugliness, yes…

M: …of it that went on in relation to and between the Rajagopals and both of them toward him, he just endured it. But what was real to him was whatever he experienced by himself in the mountains. If you remember what he said at the last in Ojai when he was too sick to see Pupul, he said to tell her he was off in the mountains. Well, I think that must have been what he did in those days. He went off in the mountains.

S: Yes.

M: I remember that morning and the beauty of it, and the light and his total absorption in it, the sort of ecstatic delight he took in it.

When we got back to Malibu, Krishnaji said I was right.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, the next day, April first, 'we telephoned Mary about color photos in Brockwood. Too expensive, it says. But yes on expenses in Saanen for the Simmonses…' it must have been a financial discussion '…and an increase for Yves Zlotnicka's film. I was told by Mary Links about the photo in Sybille Bedford's biography of Huxley.' Sybille Bedford is an English writer, and she wrote a massive biography of Huxley, and there's a photograph in it.

S: Of Krishnaji?

M: Of Krishnaji. 'I spoke to Mitchell Booth in New York about material for Krishnaji's visa status. Spoke to Alain Naudé about not going to Yosemite.' Then I write in my diary about the awful mess, [chuckles] I guess we'll have to reveal to posterity that a pack rat died in the wall in my bedroom [S chuckles], and the rest of the entry is about having to pull out the wall to get the dead pack rat out, so we don't need to hear about that, but that's what happened on that day. [Both chuckle.] 'We got air tickets for New York and then London.'

The next day was the second of April, and 'Erna said that Albion had written to Barbara Lama giving her the total directorship of the school.' [Laughter.] That was a bit much. I'd forgotten that. 'Krishnaji hit the roof, and we go to Ojai tomorrow to discuss all this.'

S: Was that his daughter, did you say, or…?

M: I think it was a stepdaughter, something like that. It wasn't his own daughter. 'Swami Venkatesananda and five followers came to see Krishnaji at 4 p.m.' [much chuckling]. That always produced a sort of battle of Indian manners because the Swami would hurl himself at Krishnaji's feet, and [with laughter in voice] Krishnaji would try to prevent it. And it always happened in doorways and awkward places [more laughter]. It caused quite a sort of confusion. Don't remember what else happened, but I do remember that. It would happen to him at Brockwood, too.

On the third, 'we drove in the Green Beauty to Ojai, on a most marvelous day. The country never looked lovelier. We lunched at the Lilliefelts' and then with Ruth and Albion. Krishnaji went into the school matters, and he wants others to talk to Mark Lee, and possibly he and Barbara Lama could share the responsibilities. It turned out to be, in the end, a good meeting. We left at 4 p.m. and drove by Lake Casitas, came out on Highway 101 near Carpinteria and had to drive less than forty-five miles per hour all the way home' [humor in voice] 'to get there on a tank of gas.' [S chuckles.]

The fourth 'was a warm day. Sidney Field came to walk with Krishnaji, but Krishnaji had a sore calf from his jumping exercise.' I don't remember what his jumping exercise was for, but he was inclined to overdue his exercises. Dr. Parchure wasn't there to control, so he had a sore calf.

The sixth seems to be concerned first with family matters. 'Then the geologist came to evaluate the property slide. I cooked two pots of food, and Krishnaji and I drove in the Mercedes to Ojai and the Lilliefelts', taking the hot food. When we arrived, Krishnaji took a nap, and at 4:30 p.m. gave an interview to George Shedow. The Lilliefelts, Ruth, Albion saw Mark Lee and his wife yesterday and liked him. It was agreed that he should be the director of the school. We will discuss it tomorrow. We went for a walk up McAndrew Road and saw Ms. McGarrity.' Ms. McGarrity was a little wisp of a woman who was obsessed with Krishnaji and she used to come out and stand endlessly by the bridge on McAndrew Road hoping that she'd catch sight of him going for a walk.

S: Good lord!

M: She was in her dotage by this time, and a little bit mad. Anyway, we saw Ms. McGarrity, who told Erna that Rosalind Rajagopal is moving out of Arya Vihara on May first.

On April seventh, a Sunday, Palm Sunday, it says here, 'Krishnaji held the second public discussion in Libbey Park on a lovely day. He spoke of intelligence, awareness, and then took questions. Kishbaugh taped it and lunched with Krishnaji and me. Ruth and Albion came afterwards and it was agreed by all that Mark Lee would be offered the directorship of the school, and Barbara Lama would be the assistant director. Mark and his wife Asha came at 3:30 p.m., and Krishnaji made the offer, which Mark accepted. David somebody, math teacher, who was at Malibu educational meeting…'

S: Would that be David Moody?

M: No, it said L-A…long word.

S: Hm.

M: Anyway, '…who was at the Malibu educational meeting last month is coming too. And Krishnaji went into what the school should be about, and we'll continue this on Tuesday and Thursday. We drove back to Malibu in time for supper.'

On the ninth, ‘we went back to Ojai in the Green Beauty, and there was a meeting about the school at the Lilliefelts’. They, Ruth, Albion, Kishbaugh, Evelyne Blau, Mark and Asha Lee, David…’ whose last name begins with an L ‘…were there. Krishnaji said, “If the school is your baby, then you will make something of it.” He applied his irresistible force again. Most of the afternoon was taken up with the education center. We got home by 7 p.m. Each drove about halfway.’

On the tenth, ‘we were back in Malibu. We went to Kishbaugh’s shirt maker’ [chuckles], ‘using the Jaguar. Krishnaji was impressed by the care of the shirt maker and ordered four, using silks that Krishnaji brought from India. We came back along Mulholland Drive. Krishnaji was pleased with the outing.’

On April eleventh, ‘I telephoned Filomena in Rome for Easter, and invited her to Brockwood in June. She sounded well. I cooked till 11 a.m., when the same group as Tuesday came to discuss the school and have lunch. “The education center is to be a place where we are not a part of any idea, theory, or image,” said Krishnaji.’

On the twelfth, ‘Erna phoned to say that our offer on the forty acres in Ojai was rejected by the owner Mr. McCaskie. We offered $250,000 and they want $300,000. Louis Blau, our lawyer friend, and Russell MacQuiddy, a real estate man, are to consult on what to do next. I went over to see the Dunnes for an hour in the late afternoon. Krishnaji walked twelve times around the garden; his sore calf muscle is still tender. We had supper as usual on trays and watched “Washington Week in Review.” Then Krishnaji watched Ben-Hur on television. I came in several times to remind him it was getting late, and when I came in at 9:45 p.m., he was sitting with the sound turned off and a far-off look. He said, “Sit down quietly.” He looked as though something were happening—intent, listening, aware of something. I was unable to feel it, distracted by deskwork I had been doing away in my room, in avoidance of Ben-Hur.’ I didn’t want to see it. ‘Soon he left the living room and told me it had been extremely intense, a “precipitation,” something so strong in the room he had been prepared for it to become “manifest” in some further way “visible—I don’t know how. I’ve never felt it like this. Something is happening.” He said later that it continued when he was in bed so that he stayed wide awake and had to sit up. His head was bad.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji got up later than usual. The “thing” continues. He said to me, “You mustn’t be attached to me or anything.” He thought I had been upset by Ben-Hur last night. I said, “No, but that inevitably the picture was different for me to see” than for him, a story, a diversion for him; but to me, it is something that was too costly to Sam.[1] It is not worth what it helped to do. I do not suffer seeing the movie, but there is nothing to make me want to watch it. I had finished the attachment in pain before coming to this life with Krishnaji. I am not “attached” anymore.’

Now, we jump to Tuesday, April sixteenth. ‘It was a lovely, clear morning. I was up early to wash my hair and finish packing. For once, I was all ready and relaxed at departure. Alan Kishbaugh drove us to the airport. Krishnaji and I took the noon TWA flight to New York, arriving at 8 p.m. We took a limousine that the porter rustled up into town and the Ritz Tower. There were yellow tulips from Bud and Lisa. I spoke to them, then made supper with a few things I had asked Joan Gordon to send ahead of time. We unpacked and went to bed.'

The next day was April seventeenth. 'Krishnaji stayed in and rested all day. I went out to market, and had a room service lunch that was adequate.' Well, then it lists all the things that I found: food. We don't want to go on with that.

'In the afternoon, I was back for a meeting with Mitchell Booth. He came to discuss Krishnaji's visa for the United States. It got complicated this year because of my letter guaranteeing financial responsibility for him in which I also mentioned his public talks. This put him in the B-1 category of a businessman, and hence the fuss. Booth explained that an H-1 status, which is for people of special distinction and unique abilities, might be had. Actors, dancers, etcetera coming to the U.S. to work for a short time and indispensable to whatever is being done, get it. With that status, no consul can refuse a visa. But it means cabling immigration each time, etcetera. As Krishnaji earns nothing here, Booth advised asking for an ordinary tourist visa each time and when announcing his talks in the Bulletin to phrase it "the KFA has requested Krishnamurti to speak in the U.S. He has graciously accepted to do so, etcetera."'

The eighteenth. 'Bud lent us his car for a drive so that Krishnaji and I could see Dr. Wolf in White Plains. As the trees are flowering and shrubs and new leaves are appearing, Krishnaji's face lit up in that clear-as-a-child's-delight look that is my own delight. Wolf examined him with care and says the spot in his throat is a thickening on the vocal chord and is not a tumor. His blood pressure is 110 over 69. His weepy eyes of blocked tear ducts are very common. Swelling in the ankles indicate a lessened circulation, as happens after flying, but he will know more after blood and urine test results. The tremor in his hands is not Parkinson's, and he will know more after the tests. He is to continue to take two Wobenzym tablets twice a month, take 600 to 1000 units of vitamin E emulsion. He found Krishnaji generally very well. There is a small hemorrhage in the right eye but nothing serious, and a slight hardening of arteries.'

Friday, April nineteenth, 'Krishnaji was quiet and stayed in all day. Erna and Theo arrived last night and came over this morning. The red tape of getting a school, etcetera, use permit for the forty acres in Ojai is endless. The uses we would make of the land may have to be restricted to a small school of young and mostly day students, plus an educational center where adults do not live but assemble in small groups. Krishnaji questioned each of us on whether we should proceed nevertheless, and Erna, Theo, and I said "yes." Then only Krishnaji said he thought we must try to get it anyway. Erna had spoken of some attempt to get Arya Vihara land, but Krishnaji said Rosalind Rajagopal's hostility to him and to all of us make it highly unlikely. "I cannot do it. I will not talk to Rosalind Rajagopal." I then said I felt very much that we must start clean and create what Krishnaji wants without any strings, any beholdenest us to anything or anyone. It is contaminated by the Rajagopals. Theo agreed eagerly.'

Saturday, April twentieth. 'It was Krishnaji's first Carnegie Hall talk. We went in a car with a driver. The stage entrance had three police cars in front, and the entrance was full of police. A telephoned bomb threat had been made by a "man with an Indian accent" who said something—a bomb—was to go off when Krishnaji began to speak. All people with packages were being stopped. Krishnaji was unaware of all this. Gave an excellent talk. The only difficulty was the inadequacy of the sound system. It wasn't until afterward that Erna told me what had happened, though the sight of the police made me guess. I didn't speak of it to Krishnaji. I am often uneasy when he is in front of a large, unknown audience. But as I thought about it all day and at night, there was a curious sense of hovering protection and reassurance. We had lunch in the apartment and later Krishnaji saw Mr. Riesco, who is to be the secretary of the Fundación, and then Louis Biascoechea, the son of Enrique.'

On the twenty-first, 'the second Carnegie Hall talk went smoothly except for feeble sound system and many complaints. Afterward, while Krishnaji napped, at Ruth and Albion's request I saw George Arden and his wife, would-be teachers, and well-meaning. Erna and Theo came in before they left, and Krishnaji popped up prematurely so they met him for one minute. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I met John McGreevy of Canada Broadcasting Corporation and a Miss Pancher about Krishnaji doing a half hour for a series called In Person about serious people talking on matters of concern to them. It is tentatively set for the first week in October at Brockwood. Krishnaji talked to me about, "The necessity of living without shock and strain." Erna told him about the bomb threat, but he brushed it aside and said "I must live at least another ten years."

When Krishnaji woke up the next morning he said, '"marvelous meditation last night."

I asked if it were the "new process" he was so full of in Malibu before we left. Yes, it was different. "I must find out what to do to live ten to fifteen years, there is so much to do." Dr. Wolf gave a report of the tests. There is weakness; his adrenal is a little low in energy. The larynx is hard, healthy but a little weak. He also talked about the possible cause of Krishnaji's swollen ankles. Prostate slightly enlarged. His enzyme level is 2.3, which is good. Wolf suggested a cellular implantation and Krishnaji agreed. In the afternoon, we went to a movie, Conversation about Surveillance.' I don't know what that was. 'I felt shivery in the night.'

On the twenty-third, 'I felt very weak, and could hardly stand in the shower. Narasimhan came at 8 a.m. to see Krishnaji. Then at 11:30 a.m., the Indian Don Moraes came with his young son and Leela Naidu for a taped question and answer meeting that will result in something printed in a UN publication, a book edited by Moraes. Mrs. Naidu spoke to Krishnaji afterward. After lunch, my cousin Lorna came to see me for an hour. I felt very weak but alright, with no other symptoms. I hope Krishnaji won't catch anything from me. My cousin left and Krishnaji gave an interview to a young African-American man, Charles Steel. I slept after supper so hard all night that it was like being out cold.'

April twenty-fourth. 'I felt better, though I had waves of weakness. We went to the Cooper-Hewitt, where Lisa lent a room in which Krishnaji met a group led by Adam

Crane. Twelve of them asked questions. They taped it and are to give a copy of the tape transcript and a donation, plus they're using the tape only for their own listening. This lasted one and three-quarter hours, and then we walked to my brother and Lisa's for lunch. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji saw David Barry, who turned out to be not the man Krishnaji thought he knew, who also brought along his niece, a nineteen-year-old who wants to go to Brockwood.'

April twenty-fifth, 'Krishnaji and I drove in Bud's car to Dr. Wolf in White Plains. Both had implantations, Krishnaji for the first time. Wolf swore it could have no adverse effect. We also received Wobenzym tablets for Krishnaji to use two or three per day for three weeks to remove the larynx thickening which, though benign, should be eliminated. After returning to the city, at 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji saw Frank McLaughlin, who taped a question and answer session for a magazine article, then Leela Naidu came for a second time.'

April twenty-sixth, 'Krishnaji rested in the morning. I did errands, made lunch. At 4 p.m., we went to the movie Day of the Dolphin, which had an absurd plot but the dolphins were very winning, and Krishnaji, carried away, cried out in alarm for them. Then to me, "Oh, it's a cinema!" as if he'd just remembered it.

The twenty-seventh of April. 'Krishnaji's third Carnegie Hall talk. They gave him a new microphone. It was better, but not good enough, or the hall is simply not suited to speech. After lunch I saw Mr. and Mrs. David Nortebaert, who want to move to Ojai to put their seven-year-old son in our school: nice, serious, and earnest. Krishnaji and I went for a short walk, bought books at Doubleday, including Mary L.'s novel Cleo.

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave a fourth talk at Carnegie Hall on meditation and very fine. We took the Lilliefelts to lunch at Sun Luck East, the only restaurant we know of open on Sunday. Later, Bud brought Daisy, Lori, and Lindsay to see us.' Those are his children. 'Krishnaji was sweet to the children, but looked far away and sat quietly reading while Bud and Daisy hung a Japanese screen over the sofa.'

The twenty-ninth. 'A hot day. I did some errands. Narasimhan came and drove us to his place for lunch with him and his wife. She watches silently without a smile or word. Narasimhan dropped us at Caswell-Massey where we laid in a supply of pedigreed cucumbers!' [M and S laugh.] I'd forgotten about pedigree cucumbers.

S: Tell us about it.

M: It's a cream that supposed to be good for the skin, and they advertise that it's only made from pedigreed cucumbers. [S laughs.] It was sort of a joke for us, but he always said we should have some pedigreed cucumbers. [S laughs.] Then, 'we walked to the Belgian shoe store, where it was verified that the brown suede moccasins that Krishnaji wears are a size 7 AA. Then across the street to a barber, where Krishnaji had another excellent haircut. Al Bruku, the barber, is the best he has been to. To the hotel and packing. My brother came while we were having supper and sat with us for a while and said goodbye. Later we watched Nixon on television announce he was releasing some transcriptions of some tapes tomorrow.'

Tuesday, the thirtieth. 'A car that was to fetch the Lilliefelts then us to go to the airport together never turned up in time. So, they and we went separately to our separate noon flights. We took American Airlines, and Krishnaji was pleased by a quieter atmosphere and space in front in the new first class seats. He didn't care to watch the movie, The Way We Were, Barbara Streisand and Robert Redford. We landed at 2:40 p.m. in Los Angeles, a lovely afternoon. We both felt immediately better away from New York, back in California, and home in Malibu. Everything looked green and beautiful, clean and peaceful. Elfriede had done the rose garden as a present, with Lori's help.' Lori was the gardener. 'It looks very nice. It is wonderful to be here. We kept feeling it. The pains and swelling in my foot and leg disappeared on arrival. Krishnaji said he had felt "far away" on Sunday, and cautioned me about using a personal term in speaking to him at such times. We went to bed early, and each slept deeply and well.'

S: Explain that a little bit.

M: I'm trying to remember.

S: Your using a personal term to him?

M: I don't know what personal term to him. I didn't speak differently to him.

S: But, for instance, if he was far away, and you said "Krishnaji"…

M: It may be.

S: …would that have been like a shock to him.

M: It could be because, yes, it could be, because when he was far away, anything…

S: He doesn't exist in that sense…

M: Yes.

S: …and maybe calling attention to the fact that…

M: Something like that. I don't remember.

S: Okay.

M: May first. 'It was lovely to wake up at home. In the evening Krishnaji and I watched a CBS program on the Nixon tape transcripts with Cronkite, Sevareid, Dan Rather; the utter sordidness of the Nixon world.'

On May second, 'I did letters in the morning. In afternoon, we went to fetch special license places, KMN1—Krishna, Maria[2], Nitya—for the Mercedes, and to Lindberg's. I spoke to Alain Naudé in San Francisco; he hopes to get a job in Stanford research. Today there is supposed to be a meeting between Christensen and what Krishnaji calls the "mafiosi," Rajagopal and company, on their response to the settlement draft.'

On the fourth of May, 'Krishnaji said, "I think I will live another ten years. There is so much to be done." We spoke of perhaps less travel and talk and more time in centers. Erna telephoned. No news from the lawyers, and the McCaskey forty acres we offered to buy went to someone else, who offered $285,000 cash and no conditions. They want it for agriculture. The Lilliefelts are very disappointed. I told Krishnaji, who said, "That's too bad. Well, that is that." He had me ask all trustees here Tuesday to discuss what we should do. He kept saying to me as we walked around the garden "You mustn't be disappointed or depressed." So we went to a movie, The Sting. "What is it about?" Krishnaji kept saying, and I really couldn't make out much of it much of the time.' [Laughter.] He was quite funny in movie houses. He would speak up and ask me questions, not realizing there were people around. [S laughs, then M chuckles.]

On May seventh, 'All KFA trustees met here at 11 a.m., and stayed for lunch. Krishnaji asked, "What is it that is blocking us, losing us the forty acres, etcetera? Everywhere else—Brockwood Park, India, etcetera, it is going ahead, but here we seem to be blocked." He said we have put too much dependence and hence strings to Rajagopal and Rosalind, the outcome of the case, getting KWINC or Happy Valley land. We must go ahead without that. The Lilliefelts will comb Ojai for other land. He went into why Ojai. The pro reasons are his affection for it, the feeling that it was meant to be, the trustees are living there. Erna pointed to my feeling about the Happy Valley land, an area poisoned by the Rajagopals and that we should start anew and clean on our own. Krishnaji spoke of a center where he would spend more time. Also, we've had no response from Christensen. I telephoned Cohen for all of us and said that we are all together and felt that if there was not some response in the next few days that he should sum up these events to Judge Heaton, ask for a hearing to set a trial date. I said the same to Sol Rosenthal.

S: Alright. It should be said that nothing; not the biographies, not Erna's account of the trial, nothing has really given a sense of the Rajagopal mess as much as these interviews with you have—the attrition, the wearing away, the back and forth, the continual changing of his mind, the very irrational behavior on his part, and the way it must have been affecting everybody—the weighing down of everybody. And here Krishnaji is saying, look, you're focusing too much on this; put this aside. Let the lawyers deal with it…we're not giving proper attention and functioning effectively in the other things that we have to do.

M: He said at one point, "Do we want to go on forever with this thing? Aren't you sick of it?" I forget when it was, but it was at some time.

S: In a way, it's interesting, because in a way, Rajagopal's war of attrition worked.

M: It worked. He was crazy like a fox, as they say.

S: Yes, yes.

M: It suited his purpose to wear everybody down, and it didn't matter how mad…

S: And it didn't matter the cost either, because it was all being paid for out of the money he had stolen anyway from Krishnaji, so whatever money he spent is just money he wouldn't have to give back.

M: Yes, yes. Exactly.

S: So, it worked.

M: Yes. It worked, it worked.

S: That's incredible.

M: Yes.

S: There just isn't anything that gives the feeling of this unfortunate "thing" like this account does.

M: Yes, it goes on in the little book, which is like shorthand without completed sentences, and it's like a shorthand in which the symptom of this attrition keep coming up and up and up.

S: Yes, I think it's important that everybody gets a feeling of the way this thing was going.

M: Yes, if you listed the events over a period of what seventeen years, this damn thing went on, it would be…

S: That's extraordinary.

M: Or, if you made it a little like a temperature graph, you know: hopes there will be a settlement, then BANG! It, ah…

S: Yes, yes, it crashes.

M: …or you're going to have a meeting…

S: …and he doesn't show up.

M: …and he doesn't show up, or he's sick, or he can't leave Ojai. Nobody ever said why he can't leave Ojai, but he can't leave Ojai. It's always something. Nobody else would think of making such excuses. They were so petty, but that's the way he was adamant about…

S: Like Bleak House…Do you know that novel? [Both chuckle.]

Okay, so where are we?

M: Well, also on May seventh, 'I tried to reach Dr. Allan Anderson, who hasn't signed the release for the videotapes. We suggest Sidney Roth has muddled it in his fussy way.' Do I have to explain that?

S: Yes.

M: I have explained about Sidney Roth.

S: A little.

M: Well, he was the man from Chicago who suddenly learned about Krishnamurti's teachings and was interested, and he had joined us in the suit against Rajagopal.

S: I remember that part now.

M: …yes, because he had donated.

S: Yes, that's right.

M: And we needed a…

S: A donor whose donations were misappropriated.

M: Exactly. That was Sidney Roth. He also agreed to pay for the taping of the Anderson tapes. He subsidized that.

S: But what was his fussy way?

M: He was a fussy sort of man. 'I couldn't reach Anderson.'

'The trustees went off determined to find better land than the forty acres. Krishnaji filled them with resolve and energy as he always does.'

May eighth, 'Mrs. Allan Anderson telephoned on her husband's behalf about the release of the videotapes. I spoke later to Rosenthal about it.' I don't remember what was said, but anyway, it turned out alright.

On the ninth, ‘we did some shopping in Beverly Hills. He needed a bathrobe, and then we went to the shirt maker in the valley, where Krishnaji had a first fitting on the shirts that we mentioned earlier.’

S: Okay, I think we have to end it there because we’re running out of tape.

M: Yes.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Sam, Mary’s husband, had a heart attack almost immediately after finishing production on Ben-Hur.

[2] At some point, Krishnaji started calling Mary, “Maria.” He tended to call Mary Cadogan “Mrs. Cadogan,” and Mary Links (Lutyens) “Mary.”

Issue 31: May 10, 1974 to July 15, 1974

This issue covers the usual places for this time of year in Krishnaji's and Mary's lives: California, then Brockwood with trips to London, then Paris and onto Gstaad for the Saanen talks. But there is something that feels more private or intimate or personal in this issue, and it isn't at all clear what that is. Perhaps there is more of a sense of the compatibility between Mary and Krishnaji, or Mary's life being in such synchronism with Krishnaji's. Mary's dedication to Krishnaji is absolute. Krishnaji's appreciation of Mary is touching. The extraordinary and esoteric aspects of Krishnaji's life mix with ordinary everyday living, and they unfold as a seamless whole in front of Mary, with Krishnaji talking with her about them.

It feels like a privilege to witness this, even if it is only in writing.

Mary: Alright, we're beginning on May tenth, 1974, and Krishnaji and I are in Malibu. 'Krishnaji came into my room while I was at the desk, and as we talked, there was that remote look on his face, and very suddenly I felt that curious sense of something else. It was as though there were an inaudible sound that one was listening to or for. His face had that look of listening inwardly, infinitely austere and away. He said, "It is strange. Do you feel it?" And then he said, "Do you write down when these things happen? You should." A little later he said that he can sense that the Rs'—that's Rajagopal and Rosalind— 'don't know where he is, but when they know he is here, it is as if they "beamed hate" at him. I asked if he feels it at Brockwood and does it reach that far, and he said "No." I then asked if it would not be worse if we lived in Ojai. "No," he said, "I can turn it away. They will try to prevent us being there. Could they?"' He asked that.

Scott: He asked "Could they?"

M: Yes. 'I said "No. Anybody can buy land, and we could buy land like anybody else." I asked why he doesn't turn away any emanations from them if he can? He said he didn't try to. They might change. That people do change.'

S: Hm. Just to stop for a minute there.

M: Yes.

S: It's interesting, your description of this process as almost a kind of listening to something, a straining to hear something. When I've explained it to myself—the first time Krishnaji asked that of me, and you were there, it was in the old kitchen up here in the West Wing—when Krishnaji asked me, "Can you feel it?" For me it was like trying to hear something that was just outside of my hearing range…

M: Yes.

S: …there was a sense that something was there, but my hearing was too unrefined, too coarse, too…

M: That's right.

S: …gross to pick it up.

M: And he had that look…well, you see it sometimes on people who are listening to music, or wrapped up in something…you know that it's listening, it's not seeing…it's listening.

S: Yes. And they're not in their head, they're outside of…

M: They're hearing something.

S: Yes.

M: And the sense of something, for me, has always been like a kind of very high-pitched, too high to hear, trembling in the ear, a kind of intensity, a kind of…like an electrical something…that you just sense.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Now, I must point out that the big book doesn't have something every day, and you're so fussy about every day…

S: Absolutely.

M: [laughs] Alright, for May eleventh, we go to the little diary. 'We went to a movie called Serpico'—that is a detective one. 'Came home and I went over to the Dunnes'. We played records in the evening.'

Then back to the big book for May twelfth. 'It was Krishnaji's seventy-ninth birthday.' [Both chuckle lightly.] 'To my words and messages from Narasimhan, Naudé, and Kishbaugh, who all telephoned, he waved away any utterance. "It's not my birthday," he said.' They had broken the taboo. [Chuckles.] 'Naudé is hopeful of getting a job at Stanford Research. Krishnaji making a face with his eyebrows up and his upper lip pulled down he said that he had an ailment.' Turn that off and I'll tell you what he said! [Tape cuts out, then back on, and Mary and Scott are still laughing.]

S: You can go on from that point.

M: Now we go to the fourteenth in the big diary. I don't think anything happened on the thirteenth, and if it did, never mind. 'Krishnaji and I and Lori Smith'—that's our gardener—'cut our way through the bushes to try to find out how' [laughter in voice]

‘rabbits are getting in the garden in spite of a wire fence. We filled in some holes, but in the evening, there were four of them on the lawn.’ Rabbits are hard to control.

On the fifteenth, ‘Krishnaji and I drove in the Mercedes to lunch with Erna and Theo. Beforehand, I had telephoned Cohen who said that Christensen is stalling on a reply to the draft of the settlement and doesn’t return his calls. In view of this, he is to go ahead and sum up where we stand to Judge Heaton and ask for a hearing to set a trial date. At lunch, Krishnaji asked Erna, Theo, and me what it is that is blocking us.’ We have discussed this…

S: Yes.

M: …but I think it’s more fully gone into in this large diary.

‘…what it is that is blocking us in Ojai. We could not answer. He suggested that by hanging up plans of our settlement of the case, we were dependent on Rajagopal and that is wrong. We also discussed whether we should try to get zoning for a center primarily without a school, a place where Krishnaji would spend three months a year and discuss with people who were able to absorb his teachings. Ruth and Albion came after lunch and we all went to see a place on McNell Road near the mountain. It was a tacky house, really messy place. Both Krishnaji and I disliked it. He said to me, “You have spoiled me. I couldn’t live in a place like that.” Then we went to the other side of the valley, behind the town, off the back road, climbed a hill, and looked down on a beautiful, untouched valley with rolling golden fields, oak trees, and wooded mountain. Everything that is loveliest in southern California as it was a hundred years ago. It would be perfection for us.’

‘On the drive back to Malibu, Krishnaji spoke of the insults he had received constantly from both the Rs. Her first calling him “a swine” in Sequoia…his shock. He told Rajagopal, who shrugged. Their forcing him to go to drive-in movies and eat in tacky restaurants, which he hated. And again, the story in India of Rosalind going at him with an empty bottle, trying to hit his head. Sunanda was a partial witness to this. Krishnaji said he put up with all of this because there was nothing he could do. There was no one he could go to. He spoke of a sense of helplessness, and said he wondered if, when I go out, if something happened to me, what would he do? I said he would be able to call the Dunnes. He said he wouldn’t know how and would be too shy. I realize I must never go out unless there is someone there to protect him. I felt like weeping at his helplessness and the sense that he must put up with whatever is done to him. Then, is this total vulnerability part of what makes his face light up with delight at flowers on a hill as we pass, or the blue of the sea?’

On the sixteenth, ‘Cohen sent letters to Judge Heaton and Christensen saying that due to no reply by Christensen, an agreement was not possible, and his clients had run out of patience. He requested a hearing at which a trial date should be set. Krishnaji cleaned the Mercedes engine. We walked and weeded the lawn.’

The next day, 'Carlson'—that's the builder—'and the roofer discussed ways to foil the pack rats. Krishnaji and I went to town to Lindberg's. We lunched at the farmer's market, where we had cheese enchiladas, but Krishnaji was appalled by the sloppy people everywhere. We went to the shirt place for his second sitting, but it was such a mess that we canceled the order. In the evening there was a horrendous television coverage of the Symbionese shootout with the police in South Los Angeles and the burning of a house they were in. Patricia Hearst may have been in it.'

On the eighteenth, 'India exploded its first atomic device and the Hearst girl was not killed.'

On May twentieth, 'Krishnaji and I met Erna at Cohen's office at 2 o'clock. He has heard from Christensen with revisions of the draft agreement. Some are the replacing of points only to please Rajagopal's vanity. One of them was about making thirteen acres of land permanently empty around his house even after his death, thereby enhancing the value of his place. We agreed to a few things, not to others. Krishnaji signed the successor trustee document by which he names successors to himself as trustees of K& R Foundation as specified in the settlement if it goes through. In order, they are myself, Erna, Theo, Kishbaugh, and Ruth.' And it doesn't say here, but each one when appointed was to appoint the others to the board. So, I would have appointed the others immediately to a board, and if I was gone, Erna would've done the same.

S: Right.

M: And by that time, there'd be enough of a board so it would be ongoing.

S: Mm, hm.

M: That was the twentieth, the next entry is the twenty-eighth.

S: Okay, so we have to go to the little book. And could you just read the nineteenth in case there was something on the nineteenth we missed?

M: Oh, on the nineteenth, I spoke to my mother, things about my family, and nothing I could mention. 'The Dunne children came over. It was a beautiful day, bright with the air from the ocean, cloudless and sparkling. A barn owl flew out of the pine beside the wall as we walked.'

The twenty-first, 'we drove to the Lilliefelts', had lunch and a trustee meeting. After lunch we went to see the beautiful thousand acres owned by a Mrs. Anderson. We drove and walked on it. It was marvelous, untouched, Southern California at its best. It would be a perfect place for a center, school, and house for Krishnaji.'

S: Where was it?

M: It was south of the town. If you go down Creek Road and then you go off that. There's a gate, and somehow we got through the gate, and then you drive into this beautiful valley, rolling hills.

S: Is it still there, or has it been bought up and built on?

M: I don't know. I've never been back. I couldn't bear to see it, if it were.

S: Mm.

M: Oddly enough, it had belonged to the man who was a cameraman for the first movie I was in.

S: Mm.

M: He had bought it as an investment, and it didn't mean anything to him, I guess.

S: What movie was that?

M: It was called Soak the Rich…

S: Mm.

M: …and I hope it has disappeared [S laughs] never to be seen again.

On the twenty-third, oh, this is a wonderful thing that happened! How could I not have written that up? 'I woke up in the morning and I'd pulled the curtain back in my room that looked out at the lawn and then a flower bed and a big brick wall across the lawn, and after I had, suddenly I looked up and there was a beautiful doe, a female deer…'

S: Hm…

M: '…on the terrace, and I stood absolutely still, and apparently she couldn't see through…there must've been some reflection…she didn't see into the room and she came up and she breathed on the window, so I knew it was not an hallucination…'

S: Mm.

M: '…and then she turned around and I crept out of my room, went down to Krishnaji's room, because I knew he'd be up, it was getting-up time, and got him to come in, and we saw this lovely, lovely creature.'

S: Mmmm.

M: How she got in, I don't know, because there was this eight or nine-foot brick wall between the end of the lawn and the flower bed and the canyon beyond, but she was there.

S: She couldn't have come across the highway, could she?

M: No, no, they don't go across the highway. They go through the culvert. There's a big culvert, big enough for a person to walk through it. It takes the rain water for the hill behind us, into canyon, and wild creatures came through that way. Unless she came from the place next door, but she'd have had to cross the highway to get to that, which is hard to believe. So, we stood there, and then she started to walk around to the wide part of the terrace, around the house, so we went through the house to the dining room, which was the other side of the house. She came around, and then she went over to the fence that separates us from the next door neighbor's place, and disappeared. Nobody was living in the house next door…the woman who owned it wasn't living there; it was empty. So she must've jumped the fence. It was an extraordinary sight. Beautiful. And it thrilled both of us.

'Later, Krishnaji and I did tree pruning with Mr. Chapman.' Mr. Chapman was the sort of handyman, a funny man. He didn't know he was funny, but the Dunnes and I collected the sayings of Mr. Chapman [S laughs] and I have them written somewhere. I'll send you a copy one day. They were sort of malapropisms.

'I went to town alone to do errands, and went to the doctor. Judge Heaton has set the meeting for a trial date hearing for next Tuesday the twenty-eighth.'

On the twenty-fourth, 'we went to a 12:15 p.m. movie, The Black Windmill, at the Chinese Theater in Hollywood. Then, we had a picnic lunch under a shady tree in the car in Beverly Hills.' We used to do that because neither one of us liked to go to restaurants much in Beverly Hills. So, we would take a picnic and there were lots of trees in Beverly Hills back roads, and we'd find a nice shady street, park under a tree, and have our picnic.

S: Hm.

M: 'We then each had our teeth cleaned. Then I fetched some things being made at Van Cleef, and then we returned to Malibu.'

The twenty-fifth 'was a hot and beautiful day and Philippa Dunne and David did pruning work all along the driveway. I spoke to Alain in San Francisco; he has been for two days with Mary and Joe in New York. He is optimistic about a job offered at Stanford Research, or San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Krishnaji spoke to him. We went over to the Dunnes' at 5 p.m., then came back for supper.'

On the twenty-sixth, 'I worked on papers most of the day. Krishnaji washed the Mercedes. Philippa and David worked some more on pruning. Then I worked on the manuscript[1] in the evening.'

For the twenty-eighth, we can go back to the big book. 'I telephoned Mr. Cohen to say from Krishnaji and all of us that he should make it clear to Christensen at today's meeting in court that if there is no settlement now, we will not accept a settlement on these same terms later. Among other things we are willing to agree to now, but not after further delays and effort and expense of preparing for trial, is the matter of letting Rajagopal's legal expenses be paid out of settlement funds. I packed, and dictated more of Krishnaji's manuscript onto cassettes all afternoon and finished it with a hoarse voice at 5:08 p.m.' [Chuckles.] My voice gave out as it is doing now.

'At 5:12 p.m., the typist came with everything she had typed to date, and I gave her five more cassettes to do. So the whole book is done, and will be transcribed as Krishnaji urged me to do before leaving. At 6 p.m., Cohen telephoned saying, "I think we have a settlement." Christensen was acquiescent except for some minor word changes, none unacceptable. Next week, Cohen will send in the exhibits which accompany the settlement. It is likely there will be a battle over their wording. I relayed all this to Erna. Krishnaji and I walked in the garden. Malibu was beautiful, cool, clear air and sunlight with birds flying. We went to bed early but it was hard to sleep. After 3 a.m. the subconscious kept serving up questions: "Have you packed the Swiss checkbooks?" Etcetera.' [S chuckles.]

The twenty-ninth. 'Up early. Finished putting things away and packing. Erna spoke to Cohen and then telephoned. It sounds alright to her. Amanda and Phil Dunne came at 10 a.m., Phil to say goodbye, and then Alan Kishbaugh came, and Krishnaji went with him, and I went with Amanda to the airport. Amanda went on after dropping me off, but Kishbaugh came in with us to TWA where, at noon, Krishnaji and I took a nonstop London flight. As usual, we had front seats, poor food. There was a movie we had seen, The Sting, but Krishnaji liked to watch it without sound' [chuckles], 'seeming to enjoy it more because he knew what was coming.' [S laughs.] 'On this flight, it never got dark, and we didn't sleep.'

On Tuesday, the thirtieth of May. 'We landed at Heathrow at 7 a.m. Dorothy, Doris, and Ingrid and two cars were there. Krishnaji and I drove back with Dorothy. When we got to Brockwood, all the school was on the driveway to meet Krishnaji. Brockwood was in bloom. The green of England, the May trees, the blossoms and the chestnut trees, joined all the loveliness of Malibu in a blessed continuity. Krishnaji wanted to see immediately the addition in the dining room, the Cloisters plantings, and the look of the assembly hall now twelve feet high and of octagonal splendor. It will be handsome. In a surprising ration of energy, I kept going and unpacked all morning. Slept after lunch, and at 5 p.m., Krishnaji came and said, "We must walk."' [Both M then S chuckle lightly.] 'So, with Dorothy and Whisper, we went gently through the grove. The azaleas, rhododendrons, and the handkerchief tree are still in flower. How marvelously lovely it is. How good to be here. How fortunate I am.'

Friday the thirty-first of May. 'With misgivings, because of Mary Links's pessimism over our position, I roused enough energy to take Doris's little Mini to Petersfield and the train to London in time for a meeting in Michael Rubenstein's office of Mary Links, Mary Cadogan, George and Nelly Digby, Mr. Verhulst, and Mr. Gellman of Servire. The purpose was the settling one way or another of the interminable two-year dispute over the Servire contract refused by Krishnaji in Gstaad because of Sufi affiliations and general shifty and unsatisfactory behavior by Servire. It had been impossible to get out of some renewal of the expired contract because George had compromised the situation by withdrawing The Impossible Question after proofreading by Servire, and giving it to Harper. Fuss over this led to taut attitudes by the Digbys towards me in the autumn of 1972. Verhulst and Gellman have rejected our scaled-down offer of a five-year contract on the old books and have demanded new titles utterly unacceptable to us. The outlook was not promising but two things went well. Michael Rubenstein handled it very well and when told in response to their question about what Krishnaji wanted, that he wanted to end the contract. They accepted an ending of the six old titles, the ones with talks and dates.' It doesn't say what…

S: Yes, they did a series of Saanen talks and talks with American students and Indian talks.

M: Ah, yes. 'Later, they said they would agree if we bought up the existing stock.' That was the quid pro quo. 'This was according to the terms of the original contract and will cost us about £930 sterling, which we should, in time, recoup through sales of these books ourselves. Then, they want their costs, and an indemnity for profits not realized on The Impossible Question. Altogether, both things will cost The Krishnaji Foundation £2500 sterling, less than we feared. They are to keep You Are the World until present stocks are exhausted, when the rights revert to us. All in all, it is acceptable and is being ended, and that is a boon. The Digbys took their host, Mary C., and me to lunch at 2:15 at a nearby Italian restaurant, The Forum. Then I caught a cab to Waterloo, and so back to Brockwood with the good news for Krishnaji. Then, it says…sleeeeeeeep.' [S and M chuckle.]

Then we go to the fourth of June.

S: So, will you go to your little book? We don't want to miss anything.

M: We don't want to miss a thing. Well, there's not going to be much. [S chuckles.]

On June first, 'I put things in order. Krishnaji slept all yesterday. And we both took long naps today and a walk. It is cold woolly weather…' that means sweaters. 'Frances McCann arrived. She's staying in the Cloisters.'

On the second, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school on the softness, at Brockwood. I slept in the afternoon. Then a lovely walk. The weather is warmer, a little.'

On June third, ‘I made reservations for us at the Plaza Athénée in July and arranged for our travel tickets. After lunch, I took Frances on errands. In Petersfield, we met Joan Wright at the train station, came back to Brockwood, and I walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy. A very warm day.’

June fourth, ‘Doris lent her Mini, and Krishnaji and I drove to Petersfield and the train to London. There was something festive and warmly familiar about coming up to London with Krishnaji, especially the first time of the season. Waterloo is so exactly the same. Krishnaji’s immaculate elegance making his way toward the taxi rank, pigeons scuttling, people cutting straight lines to various gates, the satisfaction of seeing there are enough cabs, neat, clean, spare, and deft London cabs.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘We get in. Krishnaji says “Saville Road, I’ll show you where.”’ [Both chuckle] ‘And off we go across Westminster or Waterloo Bridge. We began, of course, at Huntsman’s where Krishnaji had a fitting. And then walked through the Burlington arcade to Fortnum, where Mary L. lunched with us. She told us about the biography. Murray is to publish it here, and by now Roger Strauss should have the manuscript in New York to read. Krishnaji says he wants to read the beginning part of it about the childhood, the early days. After lunch, Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt’s, and I went to the U.S. Embassy to have papers about Father’s estate notarized. Walked back and met Krishnaji at Huntsman. We went off to Waterloo and home.’

On June fifth, ‘I got through to Vanda in Rome and told her we would arrive on the fourth of July. It was a quiet day. Krishnaji said “I’d like to talk to someone who can discuss the brain with me, who can challenge me. I’ll have to do it myself.”’

The next day, ‘I telephoned Filomena in Rome. She is well, but Mistica’—that’s her niece—‘is in the hospital for diagnosis. I couldn’t make out what is wrong. Krishnaji spoke to the school on being hurt, and is there a part of the mind that is empty.’

‘The balance of Krishnaji’s manuscript arrived from the secretarial service in Malibu, typed from the cassettes that I did. It runs to 309 pages double-spaced in total. Ian Hammond, who has been ill with rheumatic fever, and is now retired, came with Robert Wiffen, and we went over the Assembly Hall, which has handsomely risen to over the twelve-foot windows. Krishnaji wants to go ahead with the garage and pave the driveway properly and to finish it all up. We will need £13,000 sterling more.’

The seventh of June. ‘The Digbys and Mary C. came for lunch, and to discuss books. One book is provisionally titled Beginnings of Learning, which they put together from Brockwood discussions of Krishnaji with the school. They asked me to read the manuscript and comment. Also, we discussed Edgar Graf’s wish to resign from Saanen Gathering. I gave a report of the case against Rajagopal. Krishnaji asked George to become chairman of the publication committee. Mary L. and Mary C. are very much for this. Ian Hammond agreed and as George is now retired from the Victoria & Albert Museum, and Servire is at last settled, it was felt by all that it would be nice if he were offered the chairmanship again. George turned peony-colored [chuckles] and said he would like to think about it. Later, he left a little note with Krishnaji saying of course he accepted. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. It was cold; woolies were worn against the wind.'

June eighth. 'Krishnaji dictated a letter and I began checking the transcripts of his manuscript, so it can go to Mary L. My brother telephoned from Paris. He's been in Tunisia and goes back to New York.'

On the ninth, 'Krishnaji talked to the school. I repeated the history of the case against Rajagopal to David Bohm. Then I continued work on proofreading the transcription of Krishnaji's manuscript.'

On June tenth, 'Doris lent her Mini, in which Krishnaji and I drove to Petersfield, and then London by train in time for a 12:30 p.m. lunch with Mary at her place. I gave her the rest of the pages of the manuscript. She showed us the many photographs she has collated for Krishnaji's biography. One is supposed to be of his mother, which can't be, or else it is in line with my notion that exceptional people don't derive from their parents.' [S laughs, M chuckles.] 'Krishnaji had an appointment with the dentist Hamish Thompson for a filling. Thompson said that three of Krishnaji's teeth have a little pus under them, but because Krishnaji is so healthy they may give him no trouble, but if they do, he will need dentures. Said Krishnaji, "The body must be deteriorating slowly." We went to Huntsman for a fitting and then Maxwell for the experimental pair of shoes they're making for him. "I'll wear them traveling." Then to Sulka, where he was able to order some socks in his size. We stopped in at Mallet on Davis street, but saw nothing we wanted.' That's the antiquaire where I bought a lot of the furniture down in the drawing room, including the tree embroidery. 'Stopped too at an exhibition of Andrew Wyeth, and Krishnaji liked his things. One we would have liked, but it was too expensive. $85,000.' [Chuckles.]

June twelfth: 'Pipe ailments in the scullery prevented lunch from being made, so we took a picnic to old Winchester Hill near West Meon. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Doris, Frances McCann, Joan Wright, Whisper, and me. It was hot in the sun and we sat looking out at the rolling green land. It emptied everything from my head. I could've remained there till it was dark without thinking. We took a short walk, but it was too warm, and we came back and took long naps. The usual walk later.'

Thursday, the thirteenth of June. 'Mary L. and her daughter Amanda came for Krishnaji's talk to the school and to lunch. Mary, Krishnaji, and I discussed the manuscript and its publication. Mary at first thought of bringing it out privately printed by the K Foundation, but is veering toward a wider field.' I wonder why she wanted that? 'If the K Foundation published it, it would be offered only to the mailing list, but from my point, that would result in devious booksellers managing to bootleg copies and selling those to the general public.' That used to happen. Some booksellers used to get Indian printed books. They're not supposed to be sold in the West, and they would just buy them and sell them.

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘In the midst of this conversation, which took place in the West Wing kitchen, Krishnaji started asking Mary things about the biography, and then suddenly asked her if she would write the second volume.’

S: Hm.

M: ‘She said she would, but that if she did, she wanted to do it differently, with the personal part only as a background, and the main part, a chronology of his teachings told in his own words. It would be an enormous work starting with the reading of everything he has said all these years. “But will you do it?” said Krishnaji. “Yes, I will,” she said. “Good,” said Krishnaji. “That’s settled, because if you didn’t, the Indians would want to do it, and they would make a mess of it.”’ [M with humor in voice, and S laughs.] ‘“I will tell them you have undertaken it.” Pleased, he went off for his nap, and Mary and I talked all afternoon. I felt a wave of all is well at this decision. Mary’s way of working is scholarly, no interpretation, using the original text to tell the tale, which is the way to report on Krishnaji. The point of this second part of his life is his teachings, and not the personal events, and the focus on it will be well handled by Mary, I feel sure, even without having read a word of Volume 1. She wants Krishnaji to read that only when it is in galleys[2], so we must wait.

On June fifteenth, ‘Krishnaji saw the younger children of the school alone[3], and then the next day, he spoke to the whole school.’

The eighteenth of June, ‘Krishnaji and I went to London, met Mary L. for lunch at Fortnum’s. I gave her pages, so far checked, of the manuscript and returned to her an album of photographs of Adyar published in 1911. They are photos by Alcyone[4]. The text is by Leadbeater. Krishnaji and Mary fell to talking of Leadbeater and said Leadbeater must have done something bad that made the young Krishnaji dislike him. He can’t remember what it was. He was a rather brutal man, apparently. Krishnaji doubts it was anything homosexual. He would’ve been afraid to make any advance towards Krishnaji, but something must have caused the aversion. Perhaps reading Mary’s biography will bring it back.’ I think, I don’t know whether reading it brought it back, but at some point, Krishnaji said that when he was quite young he used to stare out the window with his mouth open.

S: Yes, Krishnaji told me that, too.

M: And it irritated Leadbeater, who kept telling him not to do it, but Krishnaji did it in a sort of a dreamy way. At one point, Leadbeater came up behind him and banged his mouth closed.

S: Right, by slapping him under the chin.

M: Yes, under the chin.

S: Yes.

M: And as Krishnaji said to me, that was the end of Leadbeater as far as he was concerned.

S: Krishnaji said that to me, too. It was a decisive moment for him where it…

M: It broke…

S: …it broke something. Something about Leadbeater clicked, and he knew that…

M: Yes, and although he continued to say to Leadbeater, who would tell him what to do, "Whatever you say" obediently, but he was completely turned away from him as a human being.

S: Yes. The ambivalent feelings were no longer ambivalent. They were somehow…

M: He was just out, dead, for Krishnaji.

'Krishnaji said Leadbeater was a rather brutal man.' Oh, I read that part. 'After lunch, Krishnaji went alone by taxi to see Mrs. Bindley. I had a fitting on a pair of rust-colored slacks at Rowe and then joined him at Mrs. Bindley's. She is frail and more tottery than ever, but still wishes to live alone and her mind is as sharp as ever.'

The nineteenth of June. 'Krishnaji said, "I will live at least another ten years. After that, the door will close." I wondered what door. Is it a door for us to another dimension, which he opens for us?'

For the next two days, I worked on the manuscript, and on the twentieth, Krishnaji spoke to the school.

June twenty-first. 'Krishnaji, coming out of his room to where a Western was playing on his TV, said, "I'm going to Missour'uh to be a dirt farmer."' [S laughs.] '"Like everybody else."' [Both chuckle.] 'In the morning, an IBM salesman came and I got their new typewriter'—we don't have to go on about that. 'I continued to work on the manuscript, checking the transcription. Krishnaji gave an interview to Don Schmidt, an ex-student who has come back and wants to be on the staff. Frances came on the walk. A warm lovely day.'

On the next day, 'Doris and I finished checking the 309 pages of the transcription of Krishnaji's extraordinary manuscript. It seems to grow and grow evermore like him. The "Other" permeates it, and it is at the same time his own very personal eye on the world, his delicacy of perception. His most personal human side comes through to me in every line and yet he has entered a realm in this writing that he has only alluded to fleetingly, briefly before. It is a sacred writing in the utmost use of that word. At times, reading it rapidly in this checking, I felt overwhelmed and wanting to be silent, almost blown away by his words. When he got up this morning, he said, "I'm off to Tibet with Mistinguett."' [Both laugh.]

S: Who's Mistinguett?

M: You don't know Mistinguett?

S: No.

M: This younger generation doesn't know anything! [S laughs.] Mistinguett was a famous nightclub performer in Paris, the toast of Paris. She sang with Maurice Chevalier—you've heard Maurice Chevalier?

S: Ah, yes. I know Maurice Chevalier.

M: Well, she was the female counterpart of Maurice Chevalier.

S: Ah, ha.

M: [laughing] "I'm off to Tibet with Mistinguett." Oh, goodness.

S: Hm.

M: June twenty-third, 'Krishnaji held an absorbing discussion with the school. After lunch Krishnaji had an interview with Frances, who asked to be allowed to stay for September, October, and November. She works well here in the kitchen, efficiently, quietly, fitting in, and is liked by all. I suggested she stay in the West Wing during that time.'

'Then he talked to David Bohm about the scientists' meeting in October. He told David and me all this on the walk, and then about getting Indian musicians to play here each year, a Brockwood Festival, he said. "We must make Brockwood self-sufficient. Britain is going to pieces, and we must try to be self-supporting. We should find out if we can have our own chickens, goats for milk, plant more fruit trees." He was happily full of these ideas.'

'A few days ago he said he had had a good meditation in the night. I asked him about the distinction he appears to make in the book between meditation and "that otherness," that immensity. Krishnaji asked, "What does it say?" I said that it seemed to me as if there were something in him, a state of perception of which he was capable, whereas "the otherness" appeared to come to him and enter into his consciousness. He replied, "That sounds right, but they are not entirely separate."'

S: What would you take to be the "they" that aren't separate? The otherness and his consciousness?

M: The one is the perception that he is capable of, and then there is something that comes to him, and enters into him when he is talking. And he said, "That's right, but they're not entirely separate."

‘This evening when I said how good his talk was this morning, he said, “I knew something was going on in the brain the last few days.” When I spoke of the manuscript he wrote, he said, “It’s not my book. I didn’t write it.”’ [Long pause.]

The twenty-fourth of June. ‘I took the train to London for Krishnaji’s Swiss and French visas.’ Well, I did errands; you don’t want to hear about all this. ‘There was a letter from Erna Lilliefelt to Krishnaji and me reporting on the state of the case. The attorney general is working out wording of a settlement with Christensen. Balasundaram has sent the necessary explanations of what is required to end the Vasanta Vihar suit in Madras. The main news was of someone coming to Erna and explaining that Happy Valley will lose educational use of its funds unless it gets such uses going and therefore we should again try to get some of it for our school and center.’ The money that was left to support Happy Valley School, if they don’t use it, they lose it. ‘Erna said that she decided to take the bull by the horns and went to see Rosalind Rajagopal. The letter confirms the land must be used for educational use or it will be rezoned for agriculture.’ Oh, I see, it’s that, it’s the zoning law, not money.

S: Right.

M: So, when she means get some of it, she doesn’t mean money, she means the land.

S: Right.

M: ‘They would consider an application to use some of it, at their July meeting. They wouldn’t sell it, but would make a ninety-nine-year lease for a dollar a year. She gave permission for Erna and Theo and whomever they wish to look at the land available. Rosalind gave a long justification of her contention that Mrs. Besant hadn’t intended the Happy Valley land for Krishnaji. Erna kept her temper and didn’t debate, but stuck to the future use of the land, etcetera. Since then, she, Theo, and Ruth walked over the land and said, “It is more beautiful than the thousand-acre piece. There is a part from where we could even see the School of Avastology or Rosalind and Rajagopal’s house, and she and Theo and Ruth think we should apply for that acreage if Krishnaji and I agree. I read the whole letter to Krishnaji. We talked it over a bit. But he seemed rather distracted. We’ll go into it again tomorrow.’

S: Now which piece of land…is that the land that is now the present Oak Grove School?

M: Oh, no. No, no. This is Happy Valley land, up the hill. I walked on part of it. It’s not that attractive. I never wanted to have it.

On the twenty-fifth of June, ‘on the train going up to London, Krishnaji asked me to tell him again what Erna’s letter had said. One obvious advantage is the land is suitable and the cost is nil. Rosalind Rajagopal had said we were “greedy” last year and “had asked for all of it,”’ which isn’t true, ‘but the impending settlement must be a factor. Erna Lilliefelt talked to Louis Blau and asked him to ask George Uribe, the ex-student, and present lawyer for Happy Valley, who once came with Dr. Pollock to talk to Krishnaji in Malibu. Krishnaji dictated a cable to be signed by us both and sent to Erna. “Please gladly proceed with what you propose in matter of land.” Krishnaji then said, “It is strange. Four days ago when I was going down to lunch, the thought came. I said, ‘Nitya, do something about Arya Vihara. They are such silly people. See that something happens about this.”’

S: Hm.

M: ‘We went to Sulka to have Indian silk shirts made and then to Fortnum’s, where Mary and Joe lunched with us. I gave the remaining pages of Krishnaji’s manuscript to Mary. She will now edit it. We will consider how it will be published. Krishnaji and I then went to the bookshop, and then to Waterloo and back to Brockwood.’

June twenty-sixth: ‘A while back, in a conversation with Krishnaji about interviews, he said, “When they are open, they want you to read their letter. Other times, they have a mask on, and I am deceived.”’ What?

S: Krishnaji used to say that reading someone else’s mind was like reading their letters, an impolite and incorrect thing to do.

M: Yes. He always said that he never looked into people if they didn’t ask him to.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And if people don’t want to be looked into, he said, “It is not my business.” ‘And he said, “You come to see me, and you are serious. You ask me to look. I never offer my opinion. Then it is simple and clear. I can go ahead. Others say, ‘Look, but not too deeply.’ I go as deeply as they want me to. If they want me to go a mile, I go a mile.”’

‘“Naudé never did. I wish he had. That is what makes me uncomfortable.”’

S: So, Naudé never asked him to look deeply?

M: No.

‘Krishnaji also said, “If you are able to perceive me, you must be in a meditative mind.”’

‘Paul Anstee and David Saxby’—those are the decorators—‘drove down to help with curtains for the new Assembly Room and stayed to lunch. They brought samples which Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I looked at. Anstee is looking for a job, not in decorating.’

The next day, ‘Ginny Travers came for Krishnaji’s talk to the school and to lunch. It was quite a good discussion. If one really followed it, there was everything there. In the evening, we watched a TV program of Walter Cronkite interviewing Solzhenitsyn.’

On June twenty-ninth, 'I went to Winchester to fetch a repaired lamp in time for the Digbys coming to spend the night. Krishnaji had me tell them about the manuscript and let them read what they could of it. The sample of curtain fabric came. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I were unanimous in the choice. The Digbys chose the same. There were school games all afternoon on the lawn, which I only observed from the window while packing. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked, but it made my cold heavier. There was a school party in the evening. Everyone dressed very nicely. Krishnaji did not attend.'

The next day, 'I packed and did laundry all day. Krishnaji didn't talk to the students as he normally would have on a Sunday, but packed, too.'

Monday, the first of July. 'A windy, clear day. Finished the laundry, fed and watered the house plants, and for once was unhurried and ready a little ahead of departure time. Dorothy drove us to Heathrow. We left at 11:30 a.m. and stopped for a nice picnic lunch in the car at Runnymede by the edge of the river. Ducks and wind in the willows. Krishnaji watched too the aircraft in the sky. A busload of children came with food, one a Sikh boy in a pink turban. "Nonsense" said Krishnaji. "It's a smelly, awful thing. They should pull it off him."' He had some experience of turbans in his youth.

S: Mm.

M: 'We got to Heathrow by 2 p.m. Dorothy, Montague, and Doris leave for Saanen tomorrow in the Land Rover. Krishnaji and I took the 3 p.m. BEA plane to Paris, loaded with the worst of American tourists; fat, hideously and unsuitably dressed, and talking loudly to each other about buying things. Krishnaji stood observing, remote, in an aristocracy of centuries about him. On the plane, he declined the champagne'—one is proffered champagne in first class—'and had a tonic instead. Earlier at Runnymede, he was merrier. Dorothy offered him Ribena. "I only drink champagne", he said.' [Laughter.] 'We were soon over Paris, and Krishnaji by the window picked out Longchamps, Le Bois. Too sadly, many tall ugly buildings mar the skyline of Paris now. We came by taxi to the Plaza Athénée and to our usual comfortable rooms. It is pleasant and I feel a sense of having brought Krishnaji safely to a shelter in the sense of a necessary shell around him, clean, quiet, adequate food, and something he is used to. The luxury is what one must take to have all those other essentials. "Without you, I wouldn't be here," he said. Then he said, "Thank you for looking after me." It is warm in Paris, and nice to be here. We went for a little walk to a pharmacy for toothpaste and came back to supper in the rooms. Krishnaji had stopped twice at windows of a patisserie. "It makes me hungry," he said. So we had tarte aux pommes for supper. But it didn't agree with him. On French TV, there was the idiotic Tour de France, and little else.'

On the second of July. 'We had a leisurely breakfast, then we went shopping. Krishnaji, immaculate elegance, first to Charvet, where I left him briefly looking at shirtings while I walked down a few doors to Morgan Bank. Krishnaji ordered four shirts, and I ordered two. One of pale green, like one of his, and one with tiny orange lines on white.' That was the nicest shirt, and something awful happened to it, I've forgotten what. 'From even a few feet, it gives an effect of gleaming cream, an Indian color. We walked to Lobb and saw a Mr. Ellis, in place of ailing Mr. Dickinson, who took Krishnaji's order for a pair of black brogues and a brown pair. We went back to the Plaza, where Marcelle Bondoneau met us for lunch in the garden. Nadia Kossiakof came for coffee. She has negotiated publication of The Awakening of Intelligence by Stock, translated by Madame Duchet. Krishnaji had me tell them of the manuscript and left while I was describing it. Both were very moved. Krishnaji rested and we went out later for a small walk, stopping at rue François 1er at Courrège, where we bought Krishnaji a navy pullover and then on to Givenchy Gentlemen's store where our credit was finally put into another pair of trousers for Krishnaji, thin summer ones, cream-colored silk.' It's awful to report all this.

S: No it's not, it's not at all, Mary.

M: It's rather private.

S: No, it's not. [Laughs.] Well, it is, but it's still nice to know!

M: You're a demon archivist!

'We came back to supper in the rooms, and watched a TV documentary of the 1939 Nazi war, and then the Nixon/Brezhnev meeting in Moscow. "People are mad," said Krishnaji. This morning he said, "There is something even in this room, a marvelous meditation, that thing is going on. It started here last night. It was good to get away from Brockwood. The atmosphere was too infantile."'

The third of July. 'After weeks of trying and unable to get through by telephone to Filomena in Rome, I succeeded and learned that Mistica had an operation but came home yesterday. Krishnaji's throat is slightly sore, so he spent the morning in bed. I went to Vuitton for a handbag replacement and then to Vase Etrusque for more of our Brockwood china. Mar de Manziarly lunched with us at the Plaza. She asked Krishnaji about Sai Baba whom Yo'—Yo is her sister, Yo de Manziarly—'thinks is marvelous. Krishnaji gave a vivid picture. Mar justifies it by saying that most people can't do what Krishnaji says. They need to be told and given something. This argument always puzzles me; as if a false medicine is better than none. While this went on, we had the best tarte aux framboise ever eaten.'

'Krishnaji then rested for an hour while I walked over to Dior and bought something for Fosca, a scarf and some eau de cologne. Then Krishnaji and I walked to a movie on the Champs-Elysées, Scorpio, with Burt Lancaster and Alain Delon. Nonsense but done with style and suspense. Krishnaji was pleased.'

The fourth of July. 'We packed and with all the valises went to the Gare de Lyon, where Mar came to see Krishnaji off. Krishnaji said that the last time he was at that railroad station was with his brother. My last time was June 1, 1965, when I made the same train trip to Lausanne, and had, on the train, my last non-vegetarian meal. We were in the last wagon and Krishnaji quickly found a window at the end where he could watch all the scenery. We went to the first serving and had an interminable lunch, only a bit of which we could eat. Krishnaji sat opposite me next to an old woman with bright rouge cheeks. He and I watched the fields of France go by. Again, the barley was beautiful; green stalks, golden to orange heads, poppies coming through, and the wind twirling it all into moving colors. Krishnaji stood all the way to Lausanne looking out. The train is very smooth, and he was pleased by this way of going to Switzerland.'

'Moser, with the gray Mercedes freshly waxed and very splendid, was waiting for us at the Lausanne station. We put the bags in and drove up through the city, toujours direction Berne, until we took the Oron-Bulle road. It was a marvelous afternoon; the rolling green of the fields and mountains. "We are back in our country," said Krishnaji, pleased with it all and with the car. He remembered the Gâteau Bullois we bought last year on arrival, but the shop was closed. Coming into Gstaad, Krishnaji spied two women walking ahead. "It's Ms. McCann and Tapas" he said.'

Do you know who Tapas was?

S: Yes, I knew Tapas.

M: Tiny, tiny!

S: Yes, I know. Lovely Tapas.

M: And little old, I don't know, four-feet-something high, little brown face and little brown eyes and hair. She was a sannyasini.

Anyway, 'it was Tapas. Never before in all her many years was she ever out of India and, here she was, brought by the Doctors Siddoo. We stopped and Krishnaji walked back with them, Tapas prostrating herself to touch his feet, startling a passing Swiss person.' [S and M laugh.]

'Up on the hill to Tannegg were Vanda and Fosca, who had arrived yesterday. The apartment downstairs is now a narrow, rather dark room with an interior bath and no kitchen.' They'd remodeled it. 'Krishnaji went to bed, and Vanda and I talked long after supper, bringing her all the news.'

The fifth of July. 'Krishnaji remained in bed. I unpacked. Went down for supplies. I took a nap. It is marvelous weather, cool air, hot sun, very relaxed.'

The next day, 'I did some letters. Brought Krishnaji's travel fund up-to-date. I slept long after lunch. Krishnaji remained in bed. I walked down to the train station for the Herald Tribune, up the hill, puffing a bit. I never was any good at climbing.'

July eighth. 'I finished work on the travel fund…'

S: Travel fund?

M: Oh, I kept a record of all his travel expenses. 'A long letter came from Erna saying that Rajan, via Christensen has so embroiled Vasanta Vihar…' Rajan was the lawyer in Madras. Rajagopal was hanging onto Vasanta Vihar with the help of Madhavachari, and Rajan was Rajagopal's lawyer. 'Rajan has so embroiled the Vasanta Vihar situation that Cohen wants to make the KFA settlement without signing for the other foundations or the Stichting[5]. She enclosed a letter to Balasundaram saying this. Christensen claims that Rajagopal and KWINC shouldn't be defendants in the Vasanta Vihar case. Who then? Krishnaji remained in bed till 4 p.m. when the Sufi leader Pir Vilayat Khan, who has asked to see him, was due. He didn't turn up till 5. "Typical of these people."' That's a quote from Krishnaji. 'He came with a young woman who remained outside, and Krishnaji and he talked alone for one-and-a-half hours. Tea was then given. The Sufi left. Long black robe, gray beard, speaks excellent French, lectures in it, and German. He told Vanda and me that he was for subduing the self, control, etcetera. Krishnaji said, "How rigid these fellows are."'

The ninth of July, in the morning was deskwork for me. 'Frances McCann and Tapas came for lunch. Krishnaji came out to greet them, but had lunch in bed. This kind of rest is doing him good. After lunch, I drove Vanda, Frances, and Tapas to Chateau d'Oex, and I did some errands. Krishnaji was ready for his first walk of the year when I got back, and we went a little way up the Turbach Road.'

Wednesday, the tenth of July. 'Krishnaji had a cable yesterday from Balasundaram at Rishi Valley and received a letter from Erna about being unable to make an agreement on Vasanta Vihar part of the KFA settlement. Part of the cable asked if Krishnaji wanted them to continue their case in Madras. This morning Krishnaji dictated a cable saying "yes" most strongly, and then dictated a letter going into it more fully. I sent both. At 11 a.m. he saw Edgar Graf alone about his reasons for wanting to give up the Saanen work. It seems his wife is demanding it. Krishnaji had lunch in bed. Graf lunched with Vanda and me. There was a telephone call for Krishnaji from Madras. Balasundaram was calling from the lawyer's office there. Krishnaji spoke, and I spoke. They fear that if we settle without an agreement about Vasanta Vihar, and KWINC is dissolved, it will be much harder for them to get Vasanta Vihar. They also said that Rajagopal has claimed to the high court that Vasanta Vihar belongs to KWINC Ojai, which Christensen (Rajagopal's lawyer), quoting Rajan, denies. I asked Balasundaram to send evidence of Rajagopal's taking this position to Erna as quickly as possible and said I would telephone her. The international number here in Gstaad was busy until after 9 p.m. and it wasn't until 10:30 p.m. that I was able to read her the message and said to wait for papers from Balasundaram. She said rather guardedly that the "meeting" of the Happy Valley Foundation was on the sixth, and she was hopeful we may get land. She was waiting for conditions to be set forth by Uribe, the Happy Valley lawyer. He thinks if we get this that eventually we will be able to have all of Happy Valley. He was always the optimist.'

'We walked up the river way in the late afternoon. Earlier, Yves Zlotnicka came by, and we talked a bit politely till Dorothy gets here about the Brockwood film he wants to do. Seems he wants it as a start on a film of Krishnaji all over the world. Guido Franco, the other filmmaker who has plagued our summers for three years, is not coming this year, happily.' [Chuckles] 'Vanda says he shot footage on Sai Baba in India and when he got it back and looked at it, he could see how Sai Baba was faking the miracles he claimed he was doing. It was all a sleight of hand thing.'

S: I heard that from Guido Franco myself.

M: Yes.

S: He slowed the film down, and it was all just the sleight of hand of stuff, pulling things out of his sleeve, and things like that.

M: Yes, that's right.

The eleventh 'was a beautiful day, but Krishnaji is feeling his hay fever and is rather weak. He stayed in bed all day and did no exercises.'

The next day, 'I woke up and worried about Krishnaji's weakness yesterday. Until almost 8 a.m. his door was closed. He then appeared almost shaking with energy. "Fine, fine," he said. He said he had been thinking of a center in Ojai and everywhere else.

He had me write it down. "Must produce people so intelligent they will be basically religious, and with that intelligence will function in every field, politics, art, business, and every form of social relationship."'

'A letter came special delivery from Erna telling us of the Happy Valley situation. Rosalind Rajagopal drafted a letter before their meeting was even held, not to say a " no" to us but a "yes" that was in effect a "no." Erna got Alan Hooker to speak to Dr. Rudd'—he's another trustee of that foundation, I think—'urging support of the KFA application. Evelyne Blau spoke to Dr. Pollock, and Mark Lee to a Mrs. Iyer on the board, and Erna telephoned Rosalind asking if members of KFA should be available on the day of the meeting, the sixth. Rosalind said "no," and brushed her off. The meeting, however, went in our direction and will wait for Uribe's letter of conditions.'

'Krishnaji, blazing with energy, told me to write about the essentials of the center: keep the school in a corner, separate from the center. But he wants also a school for older children. The center is to have a meeting room to hold 200 people, kitchen and dining room for 100, and housing for thirty to forty people there on invitation to discuss, etcetera. He wants to keep the Oak Grove for talks, including half the land to the west of it. "In case we want to build something there," and sell the rest.' Huh! [S chuckles.] 'He said that if we got the use of the Happy Valley land, he should fly to Ojai and meet everyone interested, including all the Valley people to ask for their support. This somehow in September. We would start building immediately. I pointed out we had no funds yet to even pay Mark Lee's salary. "You're always talking about money," he said impatiently.' [Both laugh at this.] 'I said I would never speak of it again.' [Both laugh heartily now.] Oh, goodness.

‘I wrote all of this to Erna, and Krishnaji got dressed and came with me to post it and to visit the tent. A young boy was sitting behind the bushes as we came out, watching the chalet. His face shone shyly when he saw Krishnaji, and he stared until we drove off. We went into the tent. This year the space in front of Krishnaji where those who sit on the ground has been extended all the way to the sides of the tents on the shady space. Krishnaji was pleased at that.’

‘We went to the camping to see Dorothy and Montague, and they’d just arrived in the Land Rover. Doris came with them and is in her flat.’ She took a flat that year.

‘Krishnaji had lunch in bed. I went on some errands for him and bought Swiss hiking boots and wore them on the walk. In the woods, Krishnaji said suddenly, “I woke up early and something extraordinary happened. It was as though this”’ [wide gesture] “‘were enormous, spreading out to take the universe.” I asked, “This being consciousness?” Krishnaji replied, “More than consciousness. It went on for more than an hour.” I asked, “Did it fade then?” Krishnaji answered, “No, you know how this is. It is there somewhere.” We walked to the river only. He climbed up the masonry bank to look at it, and then we turned back. He asked me to walk ahead and leave him alone to walk more slowly. He said, “I must work.” In the wood, by the small stream, he called ahead to me, saying he would sit there awhile. I went on to where the road ends and the open hillside begins, and one sees the splendor of the two valleys and the glaciers. I sat on the bench there for about twenty minutes, and he then passed me and went on to Tannegg. When I returned, he was coming out with rubber gloves to clean the Mercedes engine.’ [S chuckles] ‘Full of energy! I had been wondering and when I mentioned it to Vanda whether there is something in the fact that just about every summer before his talks here, he has a low period, a sick week, and then zooms up for the talks, as if some unknown something puts the body into low gear in order that some other force gathers in him. I may be spinning fancies.’

On July thirteenth, ‘Edgar Graf came to see Krishnaji for a personal interview, and Mr. Mirabet came to greet Krishnaji and make his annual donation. Graf came back to lunch with Vanda and me. I got car washing equipment and started washing the Mercedes while Krishnaji was on the walk with Peter Racz. Vanda brought a young American boy, a sculptor home, and after Krishnaji was finished washing the car, he went with him for a short walk. Frances and Tapas came for a short visit.’

On July fourteenth, ‘the mountains were invisible in cloud, a light steady rain. Breakfast at 8 a.m., and there was that slight tension before a first talk. Vanda went to the tent with Mrs. Walsh…’ she’s the woman who rented the flat downstairs. ‘I got out the Mercedes, which I began to wash yesterday, while Krishnaji was walking, and which Krishnaji finished with the help of Ted Cartee and Terry Saunders, and I had it by the door ahead of time. In spite of rain on the first day, the tent was surprisingly almost full, and Krishnaji began with full energy and impact. The need for clear action in all fields, not born of thought, to give “your energy and your years.” Again he said, “God didn’t make man in his image; man has made god in his image.” At the end, he raised the question, “Is there action of mind that is not of thought?” but left it to go into it in another meeting.

Ted came for lunch and Terry Saunders, too. Krishnaji questioned Ted about his seven years of Zen discipline. Ted answers well and factually. Krishnaji had his lunch in bed.'

Monday, July fifteenth, 'I went down to the town for various things Krishnaji wanted, including twenty-four boxes of the plant calcium for himself and me, measuring it out on a spoon twice a day. I think it does something; my nails are hard, and I think osteoporosis is less. At lunch there were Frances, Barabino, and Ortolani and his lady whose name I never know.' Her name was Ulca.' [Chuckles] 'Krishnaji was with them before lunch and after for coffee'—Pionier, a coffee substitute. 'Part of the talk was about where Krishnaji should speak in Rome. Vanda feels the talk would be a target for bombs if it is announced publicly too far in advance. Today a bomb blew up a part of the Stazione Termini in Rome. The talk was light. Una bombezza, said Vanda' [M laughs], 'but then there was an endless talk about it, and nothing was settled. Krishnaji ate in his room. Later, we went to Saanen for a pair of walking shoes for him like the ones I had just bought. We wore them on a walk to the river. On the way, I speculated what would happen if people really said no fighting, no wars. The aggressor nations would take over. Krishnaji said you couldn't let them do that. You would speak up, get people to not cooperate. Do no work. Russians or anyone else couldn't control the world if everyone refused to work. "You'd have to talk, organize it ahead of time. At the last minute, it's too late." I said, "Isn't it already too late?" and he said, "Maybe. Now I must get woolly. I have to talk tomorrow."'

S: I must get woolly?

M: Yes. Sort of, you know…

S: Ah-ha, yes, okay[6].

M: 'I said no more, but walked ahead so he could be alone. In the woods, he called to me, "Maria, remind me of these words: idea creates conflicting energy." After, when I went to put the usual eight drops of milk in each of his nostrils…' [chuckles], the anti-hay fever treatment prescribed by Dr. Parchure in India, '…he said, "If there is a bomb in Rome, I must tell you what must be done." At my recoiled shock, he said, "Shall I write it down, or tell you?" Then, his tray was brought in, and he said it wasn't the moment to discuss it. At supper with Vanda, I asked how real the talk was of bombs. "It's always possible now in Italy," she said. And on the TV news came pictures of the damage in the Termini in Rome.' That's the station.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Then, why have him talk there? One talk, she thinks, would be alright. It is his mentioning it that makes me worry. In New York, he brushed aside the scare. "Something looks after things."'

Issue 32: July 16, 1974 to September 19, 1974

A careful reader wrote to us a few days ago saying, "the project seems to be 'deepening' and I am enjoying Mary's growing closeness to Krishnaji." Part of my response to the reader was as follows:

Yes, for me also, the project, as you say, is "deepening" and in a way I don't really understand. Despite the tedium of reading the daily details of anyone's life (probably even one's own) something else is being conveyed. We are seven years into Mary's story of being with Krishnaji, and Mary is now so completely dedicated to him; so single-mindedly devoted to his teachings, and all he wants to do; so totally immersed in his world, that it feels like she is recording and, therefore, passing on a deeper and more complete sense of what it was for her to be in his presence. To me, and it might only be to me, unlike the earlier issues of these memoirs in which Mary was describing something that was at some distance to herself and her life, she is now describing something that is pressed hard up against her nose—she sees it, smells it, feels it viscerally in her body. And Mary has changed from her experiences; rather than disappearing, she seems somehow to be distilling into the essence of herself. This is what I read. This is what I hope others read.

Mary: We start on July sixteenth, 1974, in Gstaad. 'Krishnaji gave his second Saanen talk. He spoke of seeing the whole. Vanda and I lunched alone, and then went into Krishnaji's bedroom for coffee with Krishnaji, who had finished his tray and was reading le Carré's spy story, Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy. We spoke a little about the talk, and Krishnaji's reply to questions he had been asked about "how are you going to change people who are only interested in getting enough to eat?" etcetera. Krishnaji had said that he was talking, "to you here in this tent. If you change, it will change other ways, old ways; of war, reform, systems, etcetera, which have resulted in the present chaos. Only change in the psyche can alter the world."'

'"But I'm thinking about Thursday's talk," he said. He had again spoken of thought being matter this morning and, now sitting on the bed, he said the following: "When there is a cause, the energy created by that cause is the energy of thought as matter. Meditation is without cause, without past, time, or form. Why is thought divisive? Because it is the past. It must be fragmented. Cause, as long as there is a cause, there is the past. If there is no cause, there is no past, no time. The Greeks were concerned with form and the manipulations of matter. They made a prototype of beauty, etcetera. They never went into the question of form being matter. Prototype is result of mentation. Form is the cause, the cause is a result of time, etcetera. Everything is in terms of matter: gods, Jesus, etcetera. The symbol is created by thought. In the West, matter is the most important material and then there is God, which is considered to be non-material, but it is an idea and hence matter."'

‘Then he said, “You cannot organize the world unless there is the ‘Other.’ There must be the whole. There must be energy, which is of intelligence, which is not of matter. For it, you must negate.”’

‘“Form and matter are considered two different things. We need form to build a house. It is dictated by culture, economy, etcetera.”’

‘He spoke about food: “Starvation is not a concept. Food produced needs no form, but it needs distribution. If the distributor has a concept (nationalism, for instance) there is chaos. It must be done not according to idea, concept. Organization should not be according to politics, but according to physical facts.”’

‘“One may ask, what that has to do with my little life, but daily life brings in implications of all this.”’

‘He spoke about matter. Is there anything beyond matter? “One sees this as on this side of the river, which is suffering and misery, and what is one to do? The ordinary man living in this world, oppressed and suffering, wants to break it. But he doesn’t see the whole thing is wrong. When I see it, passion makes the break.”’

‘“Life and death are always close together. Don’t put it all over there.”’

‘Later we walked to the river. The reply to the KF application for Happy Valley land had come in the morning mail, a copy of it forwarded by Erna Lilliefelt of a letter signed by Rosalind and Rajagopal, saying the offer would be considered. Krishnaji asked me to report what it said. They may ask why we want this land when we are going to get KWINC land in settlement. Then he tentatively wondered if, since Radha Sloss had made an overture toward him by asking to see him in Bombay, he might write to her to push the land thing. I felt perfectly sick at this. The haunting notion that in his eagerness for the center, he would ignore the ugliness of these people, and again admit them to his life. I said little, as he calls it, “a reaction,” which it is, a retching one. It began to rain and we came back soaked. Vanda had made a tea party. Graf, Terry Saunders, Frances, and Simonetta—once a couturière and for the past four years a follower of Chidananda living at the Divine Life Society ashram in Rishikesh, where she worked with lepers and organized weaving for them. Krishnaji questioned her about the place. It is heavenly, devotional, full of…bak-bakta’—what is it?

Scott: Bhakti[1], or something like that.

M: Yes. ‘He talked quite a long time about India, the people who come to him, the heavily traditionalism, the very few who are real, all the circus that goes on, the disintegration of the country. She gave the impression of not knowing where to go after four years; a life of being out of her old ways, but not knowing where to go. She seemed to have accepted traditional ways through her devotion to Chidananda. For him, she did the leper thing. It was 7 p.m. when they left. Vanda had Terry stay to supper. He wants to know about teaching art at Brockwood. Vanda is leaving for Florence tomorrow.’

July seventeenth. ‘Vanda left in the morning. I saw her off at the train, then did errands. We had lunch alone, Krishnaji on his tray in his room. Four young people came tapping on the front door wanting to see him. I tried to say the inevitable as nicely as I can. I did letters. There was a cable from Balasundaram that the KFI lawyer, Ramaswami, had telephoned from Madras to Stanley Cohen in Oxnard. Balasundaram hoped that the opposing lawyers in the KFA suit agreed on something for Vasanta Vihar. Balasundaram said further that it was rumored Rajagopal’s man, Rajam, was planning a long, drawn-out litigation over Vasanta Vihar, and the KFI wanted an extra push in their anxiety to have it settled by us in our case. Erna writes that Rosenthal or Cohen (our lawyers) call Christensen (Rajagopal’s lawyer) every other day.’

Thursday, eighteenth of July. ‘It was a marvelous third Saanen talk by Krishnaji. I thought he was tattooing it on my brain. It was cold, raining. Dorothy and Montague came for lunch. Krishnaji ate in his room but came in before and after, which is a good system; it rests him, yet he can see people, too. We showed them the narrowed quarters downstairs and invited them, if they would prefer it to camping in the Land Rover. We walked in the rain and chamois-ed the car dry. Krishnaji was pleased that we would keep the Mercedes with us now and take it back to England. In the evening, I was finally able to reach Erna in Ojai. The letters about Vasanta Vihar only reached there today, so there is no news. She sounded weary.’

July nineteenth. ‘There was a cold, light rain, but Krishnaji wanted to go ahead with the day in Geneva. We left at 10 a.m., picked up Dorothy and Montague, and reached Geneva by 12:20 p.m. The car drove beautifully. We lunched at the Hotel du Rhône in the corner by the window. Krishnaji was pleased with lunch, and ate a lot for him. “I will have ice cream,” he said’ [chuckles]. ‘Fraise[2] ice cream has become a favorite dessert in restaurants. He ate it all.’

‘Dorothy and Montague went off on their own, and Krishnaji and I hurried across the Rhône to Jacquet. Going to Geneva is a ritual, and somehow the repetition each year is part of the enjoyment. Old, nice ways. Jacquet: “Bonjour, Monsieur Krishnamurti” from a plump saleswoman as he came in.’ [S chuckles.] ‘The order book appears, and his orders from the past years are there, snippets of the tie material pasted on the page. The new ones chosen as possibilities pile upward in a heap until all are seen, and then we go through them and select. Today seven were chosen. I seem to have reliable taste to him, for my advice is sought and followed. So, can they make them by next week? Of course,’ [chuckles] ‘and they will send them to Gstaad. We leave. He is very pleased. We hurried back across the bridge, pass Vacheron Constantin, and go in to find a travel clock for Krishnaji, one with batteries, and it must show in the dark. It is found, a Looping, and I buy it for him. We skitter across to the hotel to meet Narasimhan, who has some Nixon stories, and who is also pessimistic about the problems of the world.’ Narasimhan used to hear all these funny stories. Apparently, at least from my point of view, the UN has become what the New York Stock Exchange was for my father, because of all the funny stories that would emanate in the old days from there.

M: And, as I'm no longer in touch with the New York Stock Exchange, I found the same phenomenon going on in the UN…

S: I'm glad it's serving some purpose. [Laughs again.]

M: Yes…and so he used to pass them on to Krishnaji. That's where he got a lot of those stories, the religious stories about Saint Peter, and all the heaven and hell stories.

S: Yes, yes. [M and S laugh.]

M: Um, let's see, where was I? 'The UN is becoming too big, and it's close to being out of hand. May 1975 will see improvements. But his manner is cheerful and lighter than usual. Krishnaji has me tell about the application for British citizenship, that it looks as if Krishnaji can only get it at the discretion of the Home Secretary, now Roy Jenkins. Narasimhan says that Roy Jenkins is his friend and he will go especially to London in September to ask him to act on it. Very good news. We go out to see his new Mercedes. He is coming to Gstaad to spend the night and hear Krishnaji's talk on the twenty-eighth.'

'We left, and we walked back to look at a Uher cassette recorder. They haven't got the new model. We passed a health food store and bought some cereals, olives, and fruit sticks that Krishnaji likes. Then, irresistibly, he thought of a reason to go to Patek, the ritual. Krishnaji is very'—it says 'feathery'—what?—'intently offhand, while talking to the man who is checking his watch. It is the gold one Mr. Logan gave him, which he seldom uses, but the steel one has gone to Hausmann in Rome with Vanda to be cleaned because Patek here cannot do it in July. The world is getting too unwieldy for expensive possessions, but the tie choosing, and Patek, and Mercedes rituals are Krishnaji's fun, and I enjoy it vicariously. Also, the repetition of our yearly sallies, retracing our path, deepens the groove in something dear, something light and fun and very much a part of him. "Those are very nice ties," he said, as we whisked along past the rushing Rhône. He was buoyant and pleased and not tired when we met Dorothy and Montague at the hotel, and didn't tire on the drive back. "Have her go 100," he said on the autoroute. I did, and the car did—briefly. We stopped for the newspaper at the Gare in Gstaad, and were back in the house by 7 p.m. Going to bed, he said, "Those are very nice ties. I will give the others away."' [M and S both chuckle.]

On the twentieth, there seems to be nothing much that happened, but I'll read it because I know you want it anyway [chuckles]. 'I marketed. Jane Hammond came to lunch. At 3:30 p.m., a Mr. Cochet came to see me. At 4:30 p.m., Terry Saunders came and went on the walk with Krishnaji and me.'

On the twenty-first, 'Krishnaji gave the fourth talk, more on materialism, and it was a magnificent one. The tent was overflowing. Suzanne and Hughes, and Marcelle Bondoneau to lunch. Terry came by to wash the car, but went for a walk with Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me. Dorothy, Montague will move up here from the camping tomorrow.'

S: Who is Terry Saunders?

M: I can't put a face to him. He wanted to become the art teacher at Brockwood, but I can't remember anything about him. It says, 'Terry stayed for supper with me.'

On Monday, the twenty-second of July. The Grafs, Edgar and Allema, saw Krishnaji. Also in the afternoon, he saw Axel Ferrand and his brother Patrice, nephews of Suzanne van der Straten. During this, Terry Saunders and I washed the car, and Krishnaji came out to finish it. Dorothy and Montague moved downstairs. I spoke to Mary Links in London about questions in the citizenship application, which Krishnaji must fill out; the dates of the parents' births and deaths, his mother's name, etcetera. Mary said Roger Straus'—that's the publisher in New York—'wrote about publishing her biography, but not clearly. She has revised and tightened it. The fighting is going on in Cyprus. Makarios fled; the Greeks and Turks forces have invaded.'

Tuesday, the twenty-third. 'Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen talk; very fine. In the afternoon, he held a Brockwood educational meeting. Shrinivas, Philip, Joe and Carol, Doris, Carol Allwell, Sofia and Carlos, Verna Krueger, Kathy, the two Doctor Siddoos, Tapas, Rudi Melnicker…'

S: I remember him.

M: Who was he?

S: He was just a boy that Bohm was enthusiastic about, but he never actually joined in anything.

M: '…Terry Saunders, Scott!' appears for the first time in the record…

S: Oh. Ha!

M: '…and a Dutch woman named Bep.' She was that friend of Dorothy who died in Alaska and…

S: Yes, yes, yes.

M: …left all the money to the school. 'Krishnaji was almost scathing about Brockwood Park, spoke of the need to bring about "another" quality in the school. "How will you do it? It is your responsibility." Dorothy was hard hit, defensive about the school, and said she didn't know how to meet it. She is very obviously depressed.'

The next day. 'The U.S. Supreme Court votes eight to zero that Nixon must give over the subpoenaed tapes. The Greek military regime is deposed and Karamanlis is called from exile to form a democratic government.'

'Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, and I met Yves Zlotnicka and discussed the film he wants to make of Brockwood. He has raised £1,000 toward it, but £3,000 minimum is needed, and the Krishnamurti Foundation can't afford it. We explained this to him. Also, Dorothy said after yesterday's meeting with Krishnaji, which Yves taped, she wouldn't know how to go about the Brockwood film. Yves accepted the decision, but not easily. Whether he will be resentful remains to be seen.'

'There was no one for lunch, and it is blissfully quiet.'

'Krishnaji saw Mr. Tavacca of the Argentine committee in the afternoon. Then Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked the Turbach road. They are digging in the river to move its course from where it broke the retaining wall.'

On the twenty-fifth, Krishnaji gave his sixth Saanen talk on death, but it was more on living. Frances McCann, and Reneta Wolff came to lunch. Reneta and her husband Rudiger have separated. Later, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked by the river, and afterward, Krishnaji questioned me on whether Dorothy really understands what he's talking about. Her incomprehension of his manuscript at Brockwood Park, her defensiveness when he speaks of Brockwood, which makes her unable to respond or go forward. He was severe. "All of you will just go along this way if I die tomorrow." He is disturbed and quite withering about it. He wants me to talk to Dorothy.'

Editor's Note: Dorothy was so hostile to Krishnamurti's Notebook, which, at this point, existed only in manuscript form, that she spoke vehemently to me about it, even though I was very new to Brockwood. She felt that it was so mystical that it made the goal of Krishnaji's teachings beyond the reach of most people. This clearly went against what she had previously felt to be the case—that the goal was simpler, easier, and more attainable.

The twenty-sixth. 'There was the annual meeting of the International Committees. Krishnaji put Dorothy rather on a carpet about Brockwood, questioning her about it. "They wanted to know these things," he said later, but all the time knowing Dorothy's difficulty, his speaking in front of a group, it seemed too forced, and his criticism of Brockwood may have come across to some as too much about schools; the history of the Indian ones, etcetera. I gave a vague, brief, but slightly optimistic report of the Rajagopal/KWINC case. Anneke just arrived. Doris, Mary Cadogan, and Sybil Dobinson stayed to lunch.'

'At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji had a haircut by barber Nicola in the village. We ran into Terry, and he came along. He has been hearing all sorts of criticisms of Brockwood, the Krishnamurti Foundation, Dorothy, the trustees, etcetera. At Tannegg, he told this to Krishnaji and me and Dorothy. Terry named who he thought was the principal critic, and Krishnaji said he would deal with it. Krishnaji told Terry to tell this critic to bring everyone who is critical to meet him on Monday.'

'On the walk, I talked a little to Dorothy about her reactions to Krishnaji's Brockwood meeting on Tuesday. Her defensive reaction prevents the flow forward of what he is saying. Brockwood has achieved a certain level and now it should concern itself more deeply with its original concerns, the more esoteric ones. She listened, and said she saw something in what I said, and thanked me.'

Saturday, the twenty-seventh. 'A young Los Angeles couple, Bob and Trish Duggan, who introduced themselves to Krishnaji on the street yesterday and want to help with the work, came to talk to me in the afternoon. He is in three companies that he helped build up and has become successful, and he wonders how his abilities could help. I told him the outlines of the Foundation's history, where we stand, and the plans for an Ojai school. The wife designs weaving, etcetera, and has two small children. They heard Krishnaji for the first time at Santa Monica and Ojai this year. I suggested they see Erna.'

'On the walk, I was able to talk further to Dorothy.'

The twenty-eighth of July. 'Krishnaji gave his seventh talk, which completed this year's talks in Saanen. It was on fear and meditation.'

'Narasimhan had come from Geneva last night and stayed with Simonetta di Cesaro and attended the talk. He came back to Tannegg with Krishnaji and me. He showed the forms for Krishnaji to apply for British citizenship. He will make an appointment to see the home secretary, Roy Jenkins, on the thirteenth of September, and will present the application. He is sure it will be granted.'

'Simonetta di Cesaro, her son Bardo Visconti, and a friend Gary Granville, an American, joined us for lunch.'

'At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a second Brockwood meeting with the same people.' My diary says in parentheses that 'Carlos and Sophia were not there as they decided to leave Brockwood. Tapas, Terry S., and the Dutch woman Bep were there. Krishnaji was less condemning. He spoke of good and evil, which we all know and which emanate from man's actions, which are the field we generally live in and act from. He spoke of something outside of these, something not growing out of them or a progression, but from "the other side." Can we act and educate in that? I saw it clearly and felt deeply moved. I saw my own crouching in everyday busy-ness, seeing that one cannot seek out the "Other," but rather using this non-demand to allow too much energy on this side of things, and hence not looking in Krishnaji's sense for the "Other." I learned. It was hard then to have to listen to Terry afterward on the people who are so critical. They are getting cold feet about the Monday meeting. Yves, who taped the meeting, confessed to Mary Cadogan earlier and to me that he had told Madame Duchet about the dissidents meeting and invited her to come and didn't know why. He now doesn't want to criticize and won't be there. I took both tapes, today's and last Tuesday's, from him. Later I dined with the van der Stratens, and their lovely children, who are interested in everything, articulate, intelligent, and graceful. It was a pleasure to be with them all. Little toddly grandchildren are bundled off to faire dodo[3]' [both M and S chuckle]. 'Patrice and Axel Ferrand and their father, Suzanne's father, were there. I talked apart with Hughes, and brought him up-to-date on the case.'

The twenty-ninth of July. 'There was the Saanen Gathering Committee meeting, attended by Krishnaji, Edgar and Allema Graf, Mary Cadogan, Doris Pratt, and me. Krishnaji gave us a talking to on the need for leisure. We all are too busy. We need leisure to listen, to be aware, less work, more time to be quiet. They and Anneke stayed to lunch'.

Editor's Note: It has been a stated intention of this memoir to not hurt people's feelings. This has usually been accomplished by taking things out. However, the story of dissent at Brockwood, which has repeated itself in various guises is important to tell, and the story can't be told without the role of one of the principal dissenters. Nevertheless, the identity of this dissenter is not important, so this dissenter will simply be named Person X. Person X is the same person throughout this issue. Of course, the identity of Person X will be known to those who already know the story, but they will probably learn little that is new to them from this account.

'At 4:30 p.m., the "dissidents" meeting was held. Only Person X and Terry Saunders' [laughter in voice] 'turned up!' [Both laugh.] 'Person X objected to my being present. I asked him if he wanted to talk to Krishnaji alone. No. So, I said if Terry, who had nothing at all to do with Brockwood, were to be there, then I, as I did have responsibility for it, should stay. And if it concerned criticizing of me, if it were valid, I should know what it was. And if not, I would answer it. So, two hours of Krishnaji's time and energy were wasted on Person X. He said people had been fired by Krishnaji. Who? Naudé, was the response. Both Krishnaji and I jumped at that and denied it thoroughly. Then, Person X himself felt he was fired. But that was not so. We couldn't remember all the details at the time, but Mary Cadogan later filled me in. And what happened was that the year 1972, Person X was absent from Brockwood for nine months. It had been agreed, he could go to California to get some sort of architect's credit he needed to be able to practice there, but he stayed far longer than anticipated, leaving Dorothy to cope with the builders, the estimations on redoing the pavilion according to a plan Person X had made. These bids came in at twice the figure Person X had predicted. Person X suggested part of the cost be avoided by the students and Dorothy cutting down trees, etcetera. In view of the bid and having to abandon the pavilion plan, and in view of Person X having seen Krishnaji twice in interviews in Ojai that spring, and having said he disagreed with certain things at Brockwood, and therefore didn't choose to return there unless things were changed. When Krishnaji investigated, and didn't wish for Person X's suggestions to be followed, it was apparent that there was no further function for Person X at Brockwood. Mary Cadogan wrote him a letter to this effect on behalf of the trustees. In today's meeting, Person X said that Dorothy had fired him by letter, etcetera, etcetera. Finally, Krishnaji said he would hold one more meeting with Person X and anyone else who was critical, and that would be that. Person X said he would collect them. His excuse for no one turning up today was that some were up a mountain in Saanen. It was too short notice. Four days?!' [Chuckles.]

On the thirtieth. 'I met Nadia Kossiakof and Mary Cadogan at Belle Air. Nadia wants to publish Tradition and Revolution in French. Sybil Dobinson, who is here, agrees to re-edit it into proper English before the French translation.'

‘Krishnaji held the third meeting about Brockwood, with the Siddoos, Tapas, Bep, Terry Saunders, Scott Forbes, etcetera. It was less withering than the first meeting. He spoke of good and evil, morality and violence, A and B, both areas we know and live in, both emanate from man’s thinking and action. Both are “on this side of the river.” Any striving to reach the other side, another quality, is still an action from A and B. This he spoke of before, but today he spoke of seeing, looking at the A and B, and in really, really seeing it, one is out of it, and across the river. Then, as people, as teachers, in that “Other,” we create an atmosphere the student feels, and will be changed by it. Krishnaji was putting it dizzyingly. “How will you communicate this to the student so that he is immediately out of conditioning?”’ I hope you…[S laughs over her words]…you simply know!

S: Oh, yes, we have the answer to that one, certainly [M laughs]—because we don’t know have that problem ourselves. [M laughs.]

M: The thirty-first. ‘Krishnaji commenced the first public discussion in the tent. Nadia and Nicolas Kossiakof came for lunch. Krishnaji saw Mr. Sendra at 4:30 p.m. We walked.’

Now, the first of August. ‘Krishnaji held the second public discussion in Saanen. Topazia came to lunch.’ Do I have to identify Topazia?

S: I think you have before, but you can do it again if you’d like.

M: Alright. Topazia was an Italian, well, actually, a Sicilian noblewoman. She was a duchess in Sicily, and she was a friend of Vanda’s, and had listened to Krishnaji for ages. She had a curious history: She was married to a man who was a diplomat, I think, an Italian called…what was his name? Anyway, they were in Tokyo when the war broke out, and when Italy eventually capitulated, they were interned in a camp with their two children—daughters. And they almost starved to death. Finally the husband kept going to the camp authorities demanding to have a cow or a goat or something to get milk for the children, and they wouldn’t listen, and he finally did something quite horrifying. He convinced them of his sincerity by chopping off his finger in front of them, and this appealed to something in the Japanese psyche of a Samurai attitude or something. So they gave him the cow or the goat, whatever it was. And they survived. They then divorced later on after they came out. The daughters grew up; one of them was married to…oh, god, here and I forget again…a famous Italian author…when I need it, I can’t think of the name. You would know it, anybody would know it. Anyway, Topazia was quite poor by this time. Anyway, she came to Saanen. She also came to Brockwood. You’ve met her.

S: Yes. Yes, I have.

M: Yes. And she was always apt to be critical of everything.

S: Yes. I remember her.

M: It says here: 'Ring of criticism of Brockwood is in her, too, although she bewails the disorder in the world. "One must allow the ones who want to go counter to have their way, too," she said. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held the fourth discussion about Brockwood. Terry Saunders (who had wanted to be an art teacher at Brockwood) was contemptuous of Brockwood.'

So, now we have to go to the little book.

S: Okay.

M: On August second, 'Krishnaji held the third Saanen discussion. He spoke of the inner and the outer responsibility in relation to action in the world. When one sees the harm images have done, one feels totally responsible.'

'I brought the two Siddoo sisters and Tapas back for lunch. Krishnaji talked at length to them about their school in Vancouver. He gave them permission to use his name, but they must work closely with KFA.'

'After lunch, Person X came to talk to me alone. All of the dissidents have cold feet' [chuckle in voice] 'about the meeting with Krishnaji.' [Both M and S laugh.]

S: Yes.

M: 'At 4 p.m., a German group who wants to start a school in Switzerland came. David Rodriguez…' Do you remember him? '…and among them Terry Saunders came and left a note for Krishnaji.' Do you remember David Rodriguez?

S: I remember the group, the German group…there was an Austrian in there…and some others.

M: Yes. They were also U.G. Krishnamurti[4] people.

S: Oh, were they?

M: Rodriguez is the one who said the famous remark, when he told me that U.G. Krishnamurti was becoming enlightened, and I asked, "How can you tell?" He said "his feet are getting cold." [Both laugh.]

S: Oh dear. [Laughs more.]

M: Yes. He was American by birth, but a German by habitat, as it were. He taught something; English, I guess, or maybe it was art—I forget—in a German school. But he used to come occasionally. I think he mended his ways a bit later on, by getting less confrontational. [S chuckles, then M chuckles.]

On the third, there was the fourth Saanen discussion. 'It was about attention, why the mind functions in tradition.' Well, there's no point in going on about what he said, we've got the text on this.

S: Right.

M: So I'll skip that.

S: Okay.

M: 'Reneta Wolff and a painter friend, Hilloo Sanke, a German girl, came to lunch. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji saw Alan Nichols, and then he saw Peter Racz.' Do you remember Peter Racz?

S: No.

M: Oh, yes you do. He was a friend and admirer of David Bohm's, and he's was from a Hungarian family living in Brazil.

S: Ah, yes, yes.

M: He used to come to Brockwood now and again.

S: Yes, I remember him.

M: Yes. He was in Saanen several times.

'Mr. Sendra came to discuss with Krishnaji the Fundación Latinoamericana doing a film' [chuckle in voice] 'of Krishnamurti answering questions from South American students. Sacchet, the radio man, delivered the UR 210 cassette recorder that I had ordered.'

The fourth of August. 'Krishnaji held the fifth and final Saanen discussion for this year. Rudiger Wolff came to lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held the fifth Brockwood discussion, with eight from the German group attending; also Hughes van der Straten.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji rested all morning, and I did letters. No one came to lunch. At 4:30 p.m., Person X came to talk to Dorothy, and Krishnaji. Krishnaji had me there, too. Another two hours of criticism and rancor, and sitting in judgment, which went on till almost 7 p.m. Frances and Tapas, who had come up, were kept waiting through all this. Tapas is staying here, and then coming to Brockwood with Frances. Frances brought lovely photographs of Brockwood. Ted Cartee had supper with Dorothy, Montague, and me, and spent the night here in his sleeping bag.'

The sixth of August. 'A lovely, clear, warm day. I went up Diablerets in the cable car for the first time in all these years, with Dorothy and Doris. The mountain is majestic and silent. We came back after lunch. Krishnaji had stayed in bed, except for seeing Mr.

Sendra, and then Barabino in the morning. Nixon surrenders the tapes on the order of the Supreme Court and admits they contradict his statements.'

The seventh of August. 'I did more letters.'

'Topazia came for lunch. She told us of her experiences in the Japanese internment camp during the war.'

'The impeachment of Nixon is now a certainty unless he resigns. The revelation of the tapes have swept members of Congress and Senate against his remaining.' You don't mind my putting in these sort of historic markers?

S: No, no. They locate your experiences in the world's experiences.

M: The next day. 'I was up early to listen to the Voice of America news broadcast. Goldwater and Senator Hugh Scott saw Nixon yesterday. There are rumors of imminent resignation.'

'Gisele Elmenhorst and Marcelle Bondoneau came to lunch with me at the Park Hotel. She is trying to help Graf get a professional translator for the German books.'

'At 3:45 p.m., Ortolani came to see me about the status of the Barabino school, which uses Krishnaji's name. Then at 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji saw Nadia Kossiakof.'

'On the evening news, we learned that Nixon is to speak on television at 9 p.m. Washington time and announce his resignation. Dorothy, Montague, and I got up at 2 a.m. to watch it live on television here. The resignation becomes effective at noon Friday, when Vice President Gerald Ford takes the oath of office as president.'

On August ninth, 'at noon, Ford became U.S. president. Nixon goes to San Clemente. We saw the swearing in of Ford on television.'

'Tapas and Frances came to lunch.'

'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji saw Peter Racz.'

'At 7 p.m., I telephoned Erna in Ojai. The settlement still hangs on the Indian Vasanta Vihar resolution. Cohen and Christensen are in agreement on everything else. Blau insists we must go ahead with the settlement without a Vasanta Vihar quit claim, and let it come to KFA in the remainder of the settling things where it is named. It unlikely anything will be signed before Cohen and Lilliefelt return from holidays on September third.'

On the tenth, 'I went to Rougemont about Kishbaugh's rucksack.' [M chuckles.] 'Then I got an extra pair of walking shoes for Krishnaji to use in California. I met Nadia and brought her up to lunch at Tannegg. Rested in the afternoon. Krishnaji saw Tapas. In the evening, Dorothy and I went to the Menuhin concert in Saanen. He and Alberto Lysy and others played an all-Vivaldi program.'

We're back to the big book for August eleventh. 'It was a gray morning. Snow fell in the night on the top of the Wasserngrat.'[5]

'Krishnaji slept well. After breakfast he wanted the Leonore Overture and the Fifth Symphony on the new Uher cassette player. Then he said, "There are two things you must do. First, you must talk to Dorothy and make her realize she mustn't let Brockwood just go on as it has. There must be the "Other." She must give herself time and attention to be open to that; otherwise, I won't go on talking to these people. They must be ready for it. If not, I will withdraw; not suddenly. But instead of three months, I will stay there two months, then one. You follow? Second, you must look after the whole, then everything will come right. It looks as if we will get the Happy Valley 100 acres. We must live in Ojai, not Malibu. As long as I live, you will be with me, and you must think of that and probably you will outlive me. You would live there and Brockwood as long as you live, but you must have someone to look after you. You will have no one; the Lilliefelts and the Simmonses have each other; the Dunnes, the same. Ruth has her children; Patterson, a son, but you have no one. So you must think of that, and have someone.'

I don't know [S chuckles] where I was to find that person, but anyway…Nor did I want anyone. 'Then he said, "Elfriede's husband can get work near Ojai, maybe, but you must think of it all."' Elfriede was my housekeeper. He meant that I must have someone living in the house.

S: Yes.

M: 'I said that my life and activity to the degree I can help goes to him, in his lifetime and to his work, and that is the determining thing for me. I have no desire to live personally in Ojai, but Krishnaji and his work are my life, so we will build a proper house there for him, which I will pay for, and it will belong to KFA when I am gone. He spoke of precision, watching how one lives, watching one's memory, writing down, avoiding carelessness, letting faculties slip. One must train the mind now. Mrs. Besant didn't. She wore out her mind. She used to breakfast on coffee and bits of orange. He doesn't think I would be ill, but he watches over me when we are apart. "I see to it, but you must be very attentive."'

Monday, the twelfth of August. 'I spent most of the day at deskwork, and walked in the afternoon with Krishnaji, and Dorothy. Dorothy and I went to another Menuhin concert. I was able to talk to Dorothy as Krishnaji wished me to. I asked her if she minded my being a sort of telephone wire to her from Krishnaji; not giving her my views, but his. I told her he suggested she take more time to go into things he had been talking about in these discussions here on Brockwood. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw Topazia, who tried to get him to let Guido Franco film him. Krishnaji said "no." Later, he told me that on the walk that he "felt like almost disappearing." He is physically hypersensitive at present, almost sore, his head is bad.'

S: Before we go on, I think it's just worth noting that the kind of criticisms Krishnaji had of Dorothy…

M: Yes.

S: …and that, in a way, he had extraordinary patience, because this stayed like this and just got worse and worse and worse over the years.

M: I know.

S: I mean, it's twelve years later that Dorothy is finally relieved of her responsibilities.

M: She couldn't stop being defensive.

S: I know all that only too well, but what I'm amazed at is Krishnaji's patience and his working with her…

M: Yes.

S: …and what this required of him, the number of times he talked with all of us…

M: Yes.

S: …it's just mind-boggling. And the reason I mention all this is just because, in a way, it's similar to, of course, what happened with the Rajagopals, but also what happened in India. His tolerance of resistance, of mediocrity, of hostility…

M: Hostility.

S: …it's staggering. It is just staggering. And, he just goes on talking, trying, expecting people will listen, or…

M: He said that people can change. You see…

S: Yes.

M: …he thought, or he always left the door open for change, in his relationship with people, which is…I mean, until he finally had to act…

S: Yes.

M: …for some reason…

S: He had to avoid absolute total crisis.

M: Yes.

S: Yes.

M: He would put up with anything himself if he could get the thing to be right…

S: Yes, yes. But it is interesting. Here this is 1974, and he's already…you know, this is five years into the school beginning, four, really…

M: Yes.

S: …and he's already fuming at the kind of things that…

M: Yes, the mediocrity.

S: The mediocrity, and all the things that were the problem all along. It's quite something. Also, the common myth in those days was that Brockwood was really doing "it," what Krishnaji was talking about in education, and we were really all…

M: I know.

S: …happily living together.

M: That's right.

S: That's why it's so interesting listening to the way Krishnaji was dealing with the criticism. Even though he was very critical, when those people who were criticizing everything joined in, he listens to it, but he puts an end to it. Which, of course, when this happens later, he's not there to do that.

M: He eventually does, but, as you say, so much energy and so much time would be expended by him before he really said, "Enough."

S: Yes. It's quite remarkable.

M: Yes, it is.

S: I think this is, amongst all the extraordinarily unusual things about Krishnaji, this is one of them…

M: Yes.

S: …that's not really appreciated, I think. It's not commented on very often.

M: Well, in a way, if we can look at it, he talked for his whole lifetime to people, and if you say, "What's the result?" in terms of those people who were listening…

S: Yes.

M: …you think, my god, I'd go mad, or give up, or something would happen. But no. He kept on till the very end. [Sigh.]

S: Yes, yes. Anyway, I just felt it was worth commenting on this now.

M: It is.

On the thirteenth of August, 'Dorothy and Montague left in the Land Rover to pick up Doris and set off for Brockwood via Holland. Topazia came to lunch. She brought her load of others' and her own criticisms. Krishnaji explained that he doesn't intend to give interviews and talk in various places anymore, but she doesn't listen, keeps talking and thinks of things from everyone's point of view except Krishnaji's. She is nice, I think, but it is wearing. Krishnaji and I went to Saanen to the good shoemaker, Mr. E. Kohli…' Do you remember him?

S: Yes, I do indeed.

M: '…for walking shoes. Came back and walked as usual and talked of the house we may build in Ojai.' This was before we got Arya Vihara[6].

S: I know.

M: The fourteenth of August. 'It was a warm, clear day. We drove to Thun. Krishnaji wanted the Mercedes gone over by Mr. Bill at Moser's before we take it to England. In Thun, we walked to the ferry steamer, but it had just pulled off. So I suggested we take a taxi to Merligen, where we were to lunch at the Hotel Beatus. Krishnaji countered with, "Let's take a bus." So we did. A new transportation.' [M and S chuckle.] 'Krishnaji's narrow ankles in beige socks in his Swiss walking shoes were propped on the side of the bus. In his total grace and dignity, he has the stance of a young boy. We lunched on the hotel terrace and Krishnaji observed the people. Two sparrows alit on a yellow cotton chair cover. Krishnaji surreptitiously, delicately threw them crumbs' [chuckles]. As we finished lunch, the steamer came by and we went across to Spiez on it and back to Thun. The Eiger, Mönch, and Jungfrau were clear and splendid. "Goodbye till next year," said Krishnaji to them. The car had been found in good order and we drove back through the valley. After he got back, Krishnaji's head began to hurt. "This has been going on since 1922."' He meant the events in Ojai.[7]

Thursday, the fifteenth. 'It was a hot day. I fetched Tapas up to lunch and took her back. Krishnaji and I walked in spite of the heat. "I feel far away, as if I didn't want to speak or touch anything."'

Friday, August sixteenth. 'It was a very hot day. Krishnaji saw Guido Franco, who hit his head on an electric cattle wire. I was reading Castaneda's Journey to Ixtlan'—however you pronounce that—'and Krishnaji asked me about it. I told him the part about "entities" in the wilderness and at night, which are dangerous in the book. Krishnaji nodded. He told of the sense of antagonism in the park in Madras when he went there at twilight, and at Ashdown Forest years ago, and Jayalakshmi's going to an ancient temple at night and the sense of evil there. I asked if darkness opens the mind to such perceptions because the limited senses make one feel more vulnerable and also because of the recognition of known things fills the perception and one doesn't see other things. Partly, he said, but there is more than that. He said he wouldn't walk on the path we take every afternoon if it was night. Many forests have a menace at night. I asked about Sequoia, where he lived alone in a cabin. He said he never felt it there. It was a friendly place. "But I never went out at night. I was always back by six," he said.'

'Krishnaji had a haircut in the afternoon. Madame Duperex came to see me. Krishnaji went for a walk in spite of the heat, but I didn't. In the evening, he said that the story of Rajagopal should be written down, all that he has done. Perhaps he will do it a bit at a time. He said earlier that if we do the house in Ojai, he wants to make a document "as chairman," insuring my being able to live there for my lifetime. Also at Brockwood.'

On the seventeenth, 'the heat wave continues, slightly less, but it is hot all over Europe. I posted packages to the Dunnes, cassettes of the Brockwood discussions to KFA, and a pair of hiking boots to Malibu. Then I fetched Krishnaji's new walking shoes, and filled the car with gas, etcetera. Tapas walked up the hill with little delicate handkerchiefs for me and Fosca. Krishnaji persuaded her to stay to lunch. Talked of magic in India, which is not religious to me. She was in the Ramakrishna movement when she was young. She is a Bengali, and walked 500 miles as a sannyasi, so she doesn't wear saffron. Suzanne and Hughes came by in the afternoon. Guido Franco had Krishnaji put his hand on his head for the electric shock he got, and Topazia's daughter saw Krishnaji, bringing two friends. None of them had anything to say.'

'Krishnaji and I walked to the river. I asked him if he had seen psychological changes in me? Did he think I was caught in conditioning? "No," he said, "you're not attached, not to me, not to your house, or any ideas. You were attached to your husband, but not now. That is why I must consider carefully this matter of building in Ojai."'

'I asked why it was important. What was of sole importance was what was needed for him.'

'"Because there is no one to look after you," he said. "You must carefully consider. I shall write a letter to Mrs. Lilliefelt, as chairman, about your having the house." This morning he had me send a letter to Evelyne Blau, asking her to keep in confidence what I had written yesterday about our thinking of building a house in Ojai for Krishnaji's use. Until we are sure of getting the land, it might cause added antagonism and prevent the settlement.'

‘Further on the walk, he said, “If one is not attached, one cannot be hurt.” I pressed him for some psychological noticings about me. He said sometimes my mind is slow to see things,’ [chuckles] and to think about that. Then he said that when he dies there must be someone to see that all this continues, not the organizational part, but the spirit.’

‘Later in the evening, he looked far off and said, when I asked, that his head was “going.” It is somehow not restful for him here after the talks. I will be glad to go to Brockwood. We hope the weather cools. We both got quite a bit of packing done.’

The eighteenth of August. ‘We packed in the morning. Krishnaji again treated Guido Franco. Tapas came for lunch. She will come to Brockwood in a week with Frances McCann. We loaded the Mercedes with all the luggage before going for a walk, ready for the departure early tomorrow. The weather broke as we were coming back from the river. Rain began, thunder and lightning. It should be cool, luckily, for our drive. Krishnaji spoke of the intense physical sensitivity he is having. He is overly sensitive to touch, his head especially. “Something is happening,” since intense meditation about three weeks ago. We had supper, and went early to bed.’

Monday, the nineteenth. ‘The alarm clock rang at 3:15 a.m. Krishnaji was already awake. Fosca made me a cup of her good strong Italian coffee. She stays to clean and close the chalet before returning to Florence on Friday.’

‘We were winding down the hill in the car, in the clear night air by 4 a.m. The storm had changed the weather, but all day there was a cloud cover shielding the sun and keeping it cool, which was luck. We were on the autoroute when Krishnaji, who lately is nervous in the car, said he would drive to settle down. He did until we started to climb to Saint-Cergues and the La Cure border crossing…’

S: Yes, that’s it.

M: ‘…and his driving made his body calm down. We stopped for croissants in Lons-le-Saunier and had a picnic breakfast on the roadside place of the last years, but it was rather cold, and Krishnaji had seen an inn a mile back. So, we went there for something hot—verveine tea for him, and café au lait for me with pain grillés. Felt better and drove on through Chalon-sur-Soâne, where we took the autoroute. We reached Paris by 1:30 p.m. and ate our picnic lunch, once again, in the Bois near where we used to walk. A woman who appeared to be a prostitute stood on the corner, and when we left and drove past her, we were both shocked to see she had a misshapen face. Krishnaji said, “I feel as though she were my sister. What would I do if she were my sister?” His compassion seemed to be that thing he described in the 1961 manuscript of being undivided from the person. By 2:30 p.m., we were at Plaza Athénée. Krishnaji went to bed. At his urging, and before fatigue closed in, I went around to Courrèges on the Rue Francois 1ere for winter woolen slacks, and luckily was able to get three pairs hemmed in time to take them tomorrow. Krishnaji bought some toothpaste, etcetera, and came back to rest. We had supper in the rooms, and went early to bed.’

August twentieth. ‘We spent a quiet morning in the hotel. We then walked before lunch over to the Champs-Elysées looking for a place that sold thin jeans. Krishnaji liked some worn by two people he interviewed in Gstaad, but the place they had recommended was for women and rather junky; there were crowds in the arcade, people eating standing up at counters; all made Krishnaji feel queasy and we fled. It is not good for him to be in these places. It is like blaring noise to his senses. We went back to that bastion of another style’ [humor in voice], ‘the Plaza Athénée. I had a slow, relaxed, and delicious lunch in the garden. The weather was pleasant: between warm and cool. We had a leisurely departure at 3:40 p.m. for Le Havre. Krishnaji was again somewhat nervous in the car, but he drove for a little, which relaxed him. Near the Tancarville Bridge, we passed a bad accident of a car that had rushed passed us earlier. The police were in charge. We arrived at Monaco, the usual restaurant we go to, at 6:30 p.m. and had to wait till 7:15 p.m. to dine. Krishnaji kept saying, “This is the last time here. After this, we fly, no more driving.” We took the Normandy ferry at 9 p.m. It was not as crowded as on other crossings. We went right to bed and had a quiet voyage.’ We had cabins for the crossing, which made a difference.

August twenty-first. ‘We were off the ferry and driving through Southampton by 7:15 a.m. It was a gentle, summer morning, cloudless with mist rising from the hollows. “You are back in your England again,” said Krishnaji, and so I felt, smiling and full of affection for this lovely countryside. As we drove up to the front door of the West Wing, Dorothy was opening it. She, Montague, and Doris got there Monday. The Assembly Hall seems hardly advanced since we left, and Dorothy’s office and Ingrid’s and Doris’s rooms are all torn up. Dorothy joined us for breakfast in the West Wing kitchen. Then, slowly unpacking, rest, and a walk with Dorothy and Whisper in the late afternoon. To the beauty of this place, there is the added sense of return to a place one loves.’

S: We should just say that the reason that you were driving this time, because Krishnaji had already said he didn’t want to, was to bring the Mercedes back here.

M: Yes, yes.

Tuesday, August twenty-second. ‘Krishnaji’s eyes tear and there is swelling around his nose. We made an appointment for Doctor Riley at the Alresford Clinic to come to see him tomorrow. I went to Winchester for a chest of drawers to be used in the West Wing dining room when we use it as a guestroom during the Brockwood Gathering. I finished unpacking. Krishnaji stayed in bed instead of going for a walk. The new IBM typewriter, which corrects, like the one in Malibu, was delivered in July, and what a difference it makes.’ [S chuckles.]

On the twenty-third. ‘Dr. Riley saw Krishnaji for the first time and thinks Krishnaji’s symptoms are allergic and maybe he has a slight sinus infection. He recommended Krishnaji recommencing Dr. Wolf’s Actar pills, since they have helped him, and he added some eye and nose drops. He also said to discontinue milk in the nose, which Krishnaji had been doing so carefully and faithfully since Dr. Parchure prescribed it in India last winter.’ [Both chuckle.] He was the best patient!

S: I know, I know.

M: 'Dorothy and I walked to the field and back, and did some pruning in the grove. Krishnaji sat up to see the program Kojak on television.'

So, for the twenty-fourth we need to go back to the little book. 'I went to West Meon and Petersfield on errands. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I pruned some more in the grove. The medicine is helping Krishnaji.'

August twenty-fifth. 'I fixed flowers in the West Wing and finished changing the dining room into another guestroom. Frances McCann and Tapas arrived in the afternoon. Frances is in the spare room. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. Pruning is too tiring for him. We went the whole walk.' That means all around the grove and down by the lane. 'The tents were partly up in the field. Ted and others have erected very nice wooden lavatories and also a cooking tent for the campers. We watched the movie The Quiet Man on television.' That was a lovely movie.

S: Let's just say something about this dining room up here in the West Wing: I never knew either of you to ever eat in that dining room.

M: We did, but not much. It was originally, when we first got Brockwood, it was supposed to be a room for Vanda, but Vanda never came, so I made it into a dining room. The theory when we bought Brockwood was that perhaps one day, who knows, Krishnaji would have to stay here for long periods of time, and the school might not be in session. Who knows what would happen to the school, but I could function and take care of him, and cook for him and do everything in the West Wing, independently of the school. That was the original intention with the West Wing. And originally, the library downstairs was Alain Naudé's work room. There's a counter and bookshelves that were not there when we bought the house. Those were put in for Alain to use. And Alain's room is the room you're now in.

S: Yes.

M: And then, when he left, Krishnaji decided to give Alain's work room to the school as a library. Krishnaji kept the little blue room to…

S: A small interview room.

M: …give interviews. But eventually, as you know, he gave it to the school, too.

S: Yes, yes.

M: That was the evolution of things.

The twenty-sixth of August. 'Krishnaji said there had been "a marvelous meditation." He looked happy and well. There was much work in the tent preparations. A walk. No more pruning until after the talks, but we had done really quite a lot.' And my diary says, 'Charles Lindbergh died in Maui, Hawaii of cancer.'

On the twenty-eighth of August, 'Mary Links came down by train and I met her at Petersfield at noon. We talked before and after lunch with Krishnaji. She had questions on his occult powers not dealt with in the biography. Krishnaji described it as a faculty he could have but doesn't choose to use. "Like reading other people's private letters." We went over with Mary questions on his citizenship application form; his mother's name was Jiddu.' That means maiden name. 'She was a first cousin of his father.'

S: Hm…

M: I'd forgotten that.

'I took Mary to the 5:45 p.m. train back to London. Krishnaji walked with Dorothy. I took a walk after supper, and stopped to see Jim Fowler[8], who is in one of the cottages and who had a heart attack three weeks ago and is just out of hospital. There was a letter from my brother in New York, and the newest draft of the settlement agreement from Mr. Cohen.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji said again there had been "a marvelous meditation." He dictated several pages on Rajagopal and their relationship through the years. I typed it and some letters. He and I walked in the afternoon, as usual. Whisper was stung by something, and Krishnaji rubbed her. We luckily had her on a tight leash when we ran into Mr. Morton. I asked him if I could rent space in his garages for the Mercedes during the winter.'

S: What happened to those notes of Krishnaji's on Rajagopal?

M: We have it.

S: We do?

M: Yes. I have it in my file. In fact, it's published in a book.

On the thirtieth, 'I telephoned Mr. Popavic of the UN about Narasimhan coming to see the home secretary about Krishnaji's citizenship. People have arrived for the talks, and the house is full.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave the first Brockwood talk. We ate in the tent. The weather was medium good, but the tent was filled. We walked in the afternoon.'

On the first of September, 'Krishnaji gave the second Brockwood talk. Afterward, I gave him salad and fruit in the kitchen in the West Wing, and then he went back to the tent for the rest of lunch with everybody. There was rain and wind. We walked in the afternoon.'

The next day, 'there was heavy rain and gale winds. We walked all the same.' [Both chuckle.] 'We had a meeting of the Bohms, Dorothy, Ted Cartee, Joe Zorski, and Harsh Tankha about the scientific meeting in October. George Digby signed Krishnaji's application for citizenship. Mary L. sent me suggested wording for some replies on Krishnaji's citizenship application.'

September third. 'Krishnaji held a public discussion in the tent in spite of heavy showers and gales. We again had the beginning of lunch in our kitchen, and then finished the meal in the tent. Krishnaji said it was a good discussion.'

The next day, 'I went to Winchester on errands and to buy a cardigan for Krishnaji. The weather is still raining. We walked as always in the late afternoon.'

S: I don't know if this is worth putting in here, but the rain and the wind were so bad…

M: Yes, yes…

S: …that Ted Cartee and I, throughout the whole of the talks…

M: Had to keep hammering.

S: …had to keep hammering the stakes holding down the tent back into the ground. The stakes were over three feet long.

M: Yes.

S: …and they were being pulled out of the sodden ground by the wind. We eventually replaced them with five-foot fence posts that we were hammering totally into the ground, and they, too, were still being pulled out.

M: Well, I remember from inside that the canvas of the tent, it reminded me of a sail on a ship…

S: Yes.

M: It would rise up and then it would come wooooosh down, and each time I thought, will it come all the way down this time?

S: Well, that's just it. There was a very genuine concern that the tent would collapse…

M: …would collapse on everybody.

S: Yes. Every morning I'd wake up and I wasn't sure the tent would still be there. It was quite phenomenal.

M: I remember it from inside, and the feeling that…here it goes.

S: Yes. And literally, by the time we got all the way around the tent hammering the stakes back in, the stake that we'd started with was already out.

M: My lord.

S: It was phenomenal. We had no business being in a tent on the top of a hill in that weather. Really, it was dangerous.

M: I think there was some year when the tent people were averse to putting up the tent on top of the hill.

S: Well, why they didn't come and do something dramatic that year, I just don't understand, unless they had other tents they had to contend with, because…

M: Yes.

S: …it was ridiculous.

M: And that heavy a canvas would've hurt people if it had fallen.

S: Oh, yes, it could have killed someone.

M: And the tent had big central posts and all that stuff.

S: And of course, the person who was most vulnerable of all was Krishnaji because he was sitting on the platform, so he was the highest point.

M: Highest point, yes.

S: So he would've borne most of the weight.

M: Ugh!

S: Anyway.

M: There was a time when Lakshmi Shankar, the Indian singer, came, and I remember her singing through things like that. She just kept going. I thought it was quite a performance with this woosh…

S: Yes.

M: On the fifth of September, 'it continued to rain steadily. We filled the tents with straw to sop up the mud. Krishnaji held the second public discussion. It was very good. He and I had salad upstairs and the balance of lunch in the tent. I spoke to Burt Greenberger, who wants Krishnaji in a film on aspects of death he is making for Columbia Presbyterian Hospital in New York. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji and I went to Winchester where, before a commissioner for oaths, Krishnaji signed his application for British citizenship. We came back and walked in the rain. Ian Hammond says the cost of pushing the Assembly Hall to use for the scientists' meeting is prohibitive. He also says he will help financially with the cost of rewiring found to be necessary in the house. Krishnaji is tired after all the day's activities.'

The next day, 'I worked mostly at my desk and went to Petersfield on errands. Terrible weather continues. Alternately heavy showers and some sun. We walked in the driving rain.'

The seventh of September. 'Violent winds uprooted two large beach trees. Krishnaji gave his third Brockwood talk in spite of gales. Lakshmi Shankar, her daughter, and a drummer gave a recital in honor of Krishnaji in the tent. There was rain and mud and wind, and we walked in spite of it all.'

The next day, 'Sun at last. Krishnaji gave the fourth talk in the tent. Jane and Ian Hammond had a picnic lunch with us in the kitchen, after which Krishnaji and I went back to the tent. As this was the last talk, people began to leave.'

The ninth of September. 'I took the 9:50 a.m. to London. After some errands, I lunched with Mary L. We went over photographs for the biography. Then I went to the health food store for Molat for Krishnaji.'

S: What's that?

M: I've forgotten what it was exactly; something nutritious that tasted horrid. [S laughs, M chuckles.] 'Then I went to where I could give Mr. Popovic Krishnaji's Indian passport and the application to the home secretary for British citizenship, which Narasimhan is coming to London about on Friday. Then I went back by bus to get a mohair cover for Krishnaji's bed. Eventually, I got to Waterloo and was at Brockwood at 5 p.m.'

There is really nothing significant for the next few days until September twelfth, when 'Krishnaji and I went to London by train. The usual Huntsman, where he chose some tweeds for two trousers for him and one skirt to be made at Rowe's for me. Krishnaji had a haircut; then we met Mary L. at Fortnum's for lunch. Krishnaji questioned Mary about what Nitya was like. We got back to Petersfield by 6 p.m. Krishnaji told me to watch him, as "I am very far off." Krishnaji had a letter from Nandini who stayed with Amru at Vanda's in Rome and met there Rosalind Rajagopal at lunch.'

Then, in the big book, there is what appears to be two partial conversations between Krishnaji and me.

Krishnaji: "I'm interested to see what the brother was like because the last few days it's been haunting me. Am I very polite? The last few nights I dreamt of him, a peculiar dream. He and I were talking. Rajagopal came in, and we pushed him. A deep rooted distress, or pain, or suffering…or a sense of fun?"

Mary: “Were the dreams painful?”

Krishnaji: “Sometimes he’s on a train, and I try to catch it and can’t. Or, he’s falling into a river, and I try to catch him and can’t.”

Mary: “What about fun?”

Krishnaji: “Sometimes we’re laughing.”

Mary: “When did this physical sensitivity come about?”

Krishnaji: “Before Gstaad.”

Mary: “All of a sudden?”

Krishnaji: “Slowly. It began with the head, of course. When we came back to Brockwood, sometimes the sensitivity precedes the head pain; sometimes they go together.”

Mary: “Did you have it today in London?”

Krishnaji: “I was lost.”

Mary: “And at lunch?”

Krishnaji: “A little bit.”

Mary: “Did the haircut bother you?”

Krishnaji: “A little bit. I told the barber to go slow.”

S: Now, what was this sensitivity that he’s referring to?

M: Well, he’d been talking with me about increased sensitivity.

On September thirteenth. ‘Narasimhan flew over from Paris. He wrote a letter to the home secretary, Roy Jenkins, and spoke to a Mr. Herman in the home office about Krishnaji’s application for British citizenship. He telephoned from the airport at noon, as he was catching a plane to New York. It was a poor connection, and hard to hear, but I spoke later to Mr. Popovic at the UN office about it.’

‘I worked at my desk all morning. Both Drs. Siddoo, Jackie and Sarjit, arrived from Vancouver for a continuation of Tannegg/Brockwood discussions on schools. Also four people from the German-speaking would-be school group, Dr. Neusiedler, Rudiger Wolff, Mudler, and David Rodriguez.’

On the fourteenth, 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a follow on Tannegg/Brockwood discussion on schools. He saw the German-speaking school group alone after lunch.'

S: We were all present in those, weren't we? It wasn't just that group?

M: No, no, that's right.

S: I think it was plus the whole staff, wasn't it?

M: I think so.

'The German-speaking school group plan to have their school in Austria. At lunch, Krishnaji told the Siddoos I should be on their committee. This without telling me in advance!' [Laughing.] I didn't want to be on their committee! 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.'

'The next two days Krishnaji held two more of the educational meetings.'

Also on the sixteenth, 'Krishnaji and I met the two Siddoos with Tapas present about their schools in Vancouver, to be called The Krishnaji Educational Center, with Krishnaji as honorary chairman. Jackie Siddoo as president, and Sarjit Siddoo as vice president, and a Mr. Smith as secretary/treasurer. I was asked to be on the board, but suggested Erna instead.' [Both laugh.]

S: How generous of you!

M: Yes! [Laughs.] Well, it made sense. 'Krishnaji and I with Whisper went for a walk. Dorothy is not feeling well. In the evening, Krishnaji talked to a Brockwood teacher who was having problems.'

On the seventeenth, 'Krishnaji held the fourth discussion on education with the same group. "Action of listening." Right after lunch, I went to Petersfield on errands, and then drove to East Dean to see my friends'—Phil and Christopher Fry. 'We talked, and had tea. It was very pleasant. I was home in time to get Krishnaji his supper. Krishnaji had walked with Whisper. Krishnaji gave an interview to Dr. Neusiedler, the head of the German school group.'

On the next day, 'Krishnaji held the fifth and final discussion on education with the same group. I did deskwork after that and then went for a walk with Krishnaji in the afternoon. It was a sunny day. I talked to the Siddoos regarding the constitution of their educational center. Anneke left for Holland.'

On the nineteenth, 'Vicky and Ankil, who have been at Brockwood for some months, are leaving.' Does that mean anything to you?

S: No.

M: ‘They were married in Winchester, and Dorothy was the witness. I did more deskwork. Krishnaji gave an interview to Tapas.’

S: We’ve run out of tape, Mary.

[1] Sanskrit for ‘devotion.’

[2] Strawberry.

[3] A French expression, usually for children, meaning to go to bed.

[4] A man unrelated in any way to Krishnaji, who claimed to be enlightened, and who, every year, “just happened” to be in Saanen when Krishnaji held his annual talks. He openly garnered an audience for his small-scale talks from those who came to hear Krishnaji.

[5] A small local mountain.

[6] Pine Cottage, where Krishnaji had lived as a young man, and Arya Vihara, where Nitya died, were eventually acquired as part of the settlement agreement. Mary built a house for Krishnaji and herself on Pine Cottage.

Issue 33: September 20, 1974 to December 31, 1974

After reading this issue, the proofreader for this project said that it feels like the end of one era and the start of another; and she is right.

The long lawsuit against Rajagopal is finally settled, and the property that the Krishnamurti Foundation of America acquires in that settlement is the basis for the current Krishnamurti Foundation offices, the archives building, the Krishnamurti study center, and some staff housing (all in the east end of the valley); and the Krishnamurti school in the west end. The settlement also returned Pine Cottage to Krishnaji, which I believe is the only place Krishnaji ever felt was his home. Not only did he spend the years of World War II there, but he lived there as a boy with his brother Nitya. In front of Pine Cottage is the famous Pepper Tree, under which he first experienced "the process" that has been discussed in so many biographies of Krishnaji. Less than 100 yards from Pine Cottage is Arya Vihara, the old houses in which Nitya died. Pine Cottage would eventually be extended and built onto, and would become the home of Krishnaji and Mary; and the place where both Krishnaji and Mary died.

Another sense in which this is the start of a new era is the explicitness with which Krishnaji made Mary his representative; something he continued to feel for the rest of his life—a contention I can support with many anecdotes to which I was a party. This is a role she filled in a remarkably exemplary way.

This may be the place to state something so obvious that it may have escaped many people's attention: Krishnaji's life and the presentation of his work changed dramatically because of Mary. Not only did Mary make it possible for Krishnaji to have a much more comfortable lifestyle, but because of Mary, Krishnaji could finally escape the clutches of Rajagopal and company (as Krishnaji called them). In the first instance, this resulted in Krishnaji recovering his copyright and the formation of the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust in England to look after new publications. Soon after, Mary helped start the Krishnamurti Foundation of America. With Mary's support, Krishnaji's talks and discussions expanded enormously and his contacts with universities and special interest groups (e.g., psychologist, scientists, etcetera) developed. Mary also carried most of the costs of the legal case against Rajagopal, which resulted in the developments discussed above, but also in the return of Vasanta Vihar to what would become the Krishnamurti Foundation of India, and which became their headquarters. In fact, the "before Mary" and "after Mary" pictures of Krishnaji's life and the reach of his work are so dramatically different that in many ways they seem like the lives and works of two different people.

Mary: We're at Brockwood, and it's September twentieth, 1974. Not much happened for Krishnaji other than an interview with a woman and her daughter. Their names are in the diary and I remember them. The mother was supposed to be "possessed."

Scott: Tell me about it.

M: The mother felt she was possessed, and the daughter brought her to Krishnaji. As nearly as I can remember, Krishnaji talked to her, and then told her to send him something that belonged to her, like a ring or a piece of jewelry or something that was hers. And she did; she sent some sort of a silver something. I forget—it was a pin or a ring; and he kept it with him for a few days, kept it on his bedside table, and periodically touched it. Then he sent it back.

S: Was there any word from her afterwards?

M: I'm trying to remember. Maybe, we'll come upon it.

S: Okay.

M: The next day, 'it is still cold and rainy, and Krishnaji talked to the Siddoo sisters and Tapas in the afternoon about their center and its constitution.'

On the twenty-second, 'I drove to see friends in Sussex, Fleur and Tom Meyer. I was back at Brockwood by six. Tapas and the Siddoos left for Canada.'

On September twenty-third, 'More gales,' [S laughs] 'and more rain. Krishnaji and I took the 10:30 a.m. train to London. The traffic in town was so slow that I couldn't get to Rowe's for my scheduled fitting. We went instead to Huntsman, Krishnaji just touching base there, and then we walked to Hatchard's, where we bought some detective novels.'

'We lunched with Mary at Fortnum's, and discussed subtitles for the first volume of the biography. At present it is Krishnamurti: The Years of Unfolding, which Krishnaji doesn't like. He doesn't like the word unfolding.'

'Mary and Joe go to the south of France this week for a holiday. Krishnaji had a strawberry ice cream for dessert' [S chuckles], 'and the scoops were rather small so he had another serving' [S chuckles, M chuckles]. 'He was pleased as a child. We chose some cheeses and coffee downstairs, and I got him a recording of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that he has asked for. It can be played on the portable player that has been sitting in a cupboard.'

'We then went to Mr. Thompson'—that's the dentist—'who warned that Krishnaji might have more tooth troubles, needing extractions. I was worried, but he was prepared, he said later, to have them out all at one terrible swoop today. I waited outside and then was called in to help decide to pull one upper left molar next to the eye tooth. It is infected. Yes, said Krishnaji. Thompson said it would come out fairly easily, so Novocain and x-rays and then a firm pull, a horrid noise, and it was out. One infected root and one healthy one. I was again awed by Krishnaji's hands, his fingers open through it all, not clenched.' You know, he sat with his hands relaxed.

S: Okay, so not tense?

M: No, no. His fingers were just out and relaxed. Not holding onto the arms of the chair for dear life.

S: Yes, which I do even when I'm just having my teeth cleaned. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'Thompson commented on the rarity of this, and how it makes the muscles relax. Then Krishnaji had to lie down for ten minutes. He said he felt fine. One more tooth may have to go at the next appointment on the tenth of October. The Thompsons were asked to come to Brockwood on Sunday.' That's he and his wife.

'It was raining, and I got a nice secretary to help me snare a cab to get Krishnaji quickly to Waterloo. She succeeded, and he didn't have to wait. He said in the cab that he had told the body what it must prepare for, possibly all the teeth coming out.'

S: Uoish.

M: '"I have trained it," he said, (referring to his body). We got quickly to Waterloo and were able to get right into an empty carriage on the 5:14 p.m. train. Krishnaji looked perfectly well, and opened one of the six new detective novels. I was glad when he was safely into bed and had his supper tray. I was suddenly very tired by 9 p.m. He said I had suffered for him.' [Both chuckle.] 'Maybe, maybe, but I went to bed thankful.' [Chuckles again.]

The twenty-fourth for me was 'deskwork and laundry. The students are all here for the start of the new term. Krishnaji says he has no pain from the tooth that was pulled. I had a book subtitle conversation with Mary L. on the telephone. Krishnaji is thinking about it.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji had a subtitle for the biography: Krishnamurti: The Years of Awakening.'

S: Mm. [Both chuckle.]

M: It came into his mind in the night. He is pleased. So is Mary, and luckily, as it turned out, so is John Murray.' That's the publisher. 'The new title had arrived just in time to be printed instead of The Years of Unfolding. Krishnaji also said he had awakened at 4 a.m., "As though I was completely purged of everything. The mind was washed out clean and healthy. Much more than that, a tremendous sense of joy, ecstasy it was."'

S: Hm.

M: On September twenty-sixth, 'Mary and Joe left for their holiday in St. Paul de Vence and Venice, but sent word via Amanda that John Murray had accepted the change of the subtitle The Years of Awakening. Amanda also said that Naudé had telephoned Mary that his father is dying in South Africa, and he may go there, stopping in London.'

The twenty-seventh of September. ‘I took an early train alone to London on errands. Bought records for Krishnaji and shoes that lace for my hurting left foot at Ferragamo. Got back to Krishnaji, who had given an interview to two of Brockwood’s staff members.’

On the twenty-eighth, ‘I discussed a good hi-fi for Krishnaji’s room with Harsh Tankha [1]. He will get it and install it. I went over the details of the scientists’ meeting with the Bohms.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji gave his first talk of the term to the students and staff. The Hamish Thompsons came and stayed to lunch.’ That’s the dentist and his wife. ‘Harsh is to go ahead with the hi-fi in Krishnaji’s room.’

Monday, September thirtieth. There are family things. Then, ‘John McGreevy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation arrived to do the film for television of Krishnaji for the series People of Our Time program. Discussed it with Krishnaji. I telephoned the home office for any news of Krishnaji’s citizenship application. They said it has gone higher up.’

Tuesday, the first of October. ‘At 11:30 a.m., and then again in the afternoon, Krishnaji did filming for the Canadian Broadcasting in the drawing room and walking on the lawn. It was very disturbing to talk on a subject for three and half minutes or four, exactly. He did a voice-over audio recording of Krishnaji reading from the Krishnamurti Penguin Reader. Krishnaji said he had never done that, but he tried it and, as he seemed to think his own words, which he had never read, were rather apt, he found it easier.’ [Both M and S laugh.] ‘When he talked to the camera, it was necessary to explain how close and intimate it is; there is no need to project as if he were talking to a person. Krishnaji said he doesn’t look at people when he talks. It might be an intrusion. He doesn’t want to read their minds. After the day’s shooting was done, we went for a walk, and it was a release for him.’

That’s interesting that he doesn’t look at people because, if he does, he reads their minds. [Both chuckle, then laugh.] I always assumed that he could read my mind.

S: Oh, he showed me he could read mine.

M: [chuckles] He showed you?

S: Yes, he showed me.

M: How do you mean he showed you?

S: He showed me once. It was verrrry interesting.

M: Tell, tell.

S: Well [sigh], it must have been…I think it was ’75 or ’76, and I was having my first private interview with Krishnaji. We were sitting downstairs here in the West Wing. It must’ve been just before he went out for a walk, because I remember he was dressed to go out for his walk. We were sitting on the white couch, which is no longer there in the sitting room, not in the drawing room, but which used to be at the bottom of the steps. We were sitting side by side; I was sitting on Krishnaji’s right—I can still see it all very clearly. I had internally said to myself from the beginning of things that I didn’t want to hide anything from Krishnaji; he can know anything he wants to know. Anyway, I had just been telling myself this internally again, and he began saying some things to me that I was thinking. And as I looked up at him, he was looking at me and smiling at me as if to say, “Is this enough of a demonstration for you?” and he seemed to be showing me that he understood I wasn’t trying to hide anything.

M: Mm, hm.

S: It took my breath away, but it also made the whole thing I wanted to talk with him about easier, because then I didn’t have to explain it. He already knew it.

M: [chuckling] Yyyeeesss.

S: And then he just went on talking about the whole thing I wanted to ask him about but which I hadn’t found a way to yet present—he just went on and he talked with me about the whole thing. I can’t now remember what it was I wanted to talk to him about, but this funny little demonstration at the beginning is something I will never forget.

M: That’s very interesting.

Well, from the first time, when I did go and try to tell him things, and also from the interview that I had in Rishi Valley where…I know we’ve covered this…but to go back to it just briefly. I said to him that as I seem to be becoming a fixture [chuckle] around him, that I felt that it was only right that he should know anything he wanted to know about the people around him, and…you know, “here I am.” And he said something about he was shy about doing that, and I said “well, I’m shy too.” Well, anyway, I’ve already told the story about this, but I was asking him, and I also said, “If you notice things about me that I ought to know, please tell me.” And that’s when he said, well, “I’m shy, I’m shy about that.” I said, “well, I’m shy too, but I would be grateful.” And I always assumed, from the very beginning, that he could read my mind.

S: Yes. Perhaps I should put in here also the small…because it happened about this time, but it is a silly little anecdote for myself, about the first time Krishnaji personally addressed me.

M: How do you mean personally addressed you? Called you by name?

S: No. He just came up and spoke to me, and this was about a year before the first private interview I just recounted.

M: Oh.

S: I was doing dishes in the school scullery.

M: Oh.

S: I was just doing rota[2] and Krishnaji came in from lunch and put his plate down, and he came up to me and said, "Why don't you wear gloves?"

M: Oh yes! I remember that. [Laughing.]

S: Well, I was absolutely dumbstruck that here was this man asking me this question. [Both laugh.] And as I remember it, I just stood with my mouth open, and then Krishnaji, eventually just turned around and walked away. And I imagined he was thinking to himself, something like, "Oh, no, another idiot here who can't respond to a simple question." [Both are laughing.]

M: He was very fussy about wearing kitchen gloves while doing dishes, as you well know.

S: Yes, I did eventually come to know this. But at that time, with my mouth hanging open, and Krishnaji just standing there, racing though my brain were things like, 'Well, why aren't I wearing gloves?" and 'You don't actually have a reason for not wearing gloves, do you?' And a whole dialogue was occurring in my head but not a word came out.

M: Oh, that's funny.

I think I've told you that he called me Mrs. Zimbalist for the first seven years [with laughter in voice] that he was my house guest.

S: Yes. At least he called me Scott right from the beginning.

M: Yes, well, you were a man.

S: Yes.

M: Yes.

S: But there was something about the way he said my name. It was absolutely lovely. It was the way it formed in his mouth. I'd never paid attention to how my name sounds from different people.

M: Yes.

S: But somehow from Krishnaji's mouth it sounded…

M: …different.

S: Yes, it sounded different…it had a richness to it.

M: Yes.

S: It wasn't the American Scott, or an English one, it was all his own. No one has ever quite said it…

M: Yes, yes.

S: …it's a simple word, but no one quite said it like that.

M: With me, he went from Mrs. Zimbalist to Maria. I don't ever remember his calling me Mary. I don't think he did. If he did, I don't remember it and it would only have been brief. But because there was so many Marys…Mary Lutyens, Mary Cadogan…

S: Yes.

M: …so he called me Maria.

S: I should also say at this time, as I seem to be intruding some of my own remembrances in this, that I can't remember how long it was before I spoke to Krishnaji in public meetings and staff meetings. And when I did, I was forcing myself.

M: Yes.

S: I had to force myself for a long time, before it felt right. And I can still remember now the overwhelming shame.

M: Shame? Why shame?

S: That I was only what I was…

M: Hm, hm.

S: …and that I would talk with Krishnaji. It just seemed so wrong that I should have the gall to say something to him. [M chuckles.] But I knew that that's not what he wanted.

M: Yes.

S: But it was very hard for a long time.

M: It's funny. A woman in the center earlier today came up to me in the kitchen when I was washing up, said to me that she'd looked at a tape that I was on, and she asked, "Did you really not understand what he was saying, or were you asking questions to him to try to get him to explain more?" And I said, "Well, I don't know because I don't know what is of different tapes, and I can't remember." But, I used to not speak up in meetings deliberately, because I thought that I had the extraordinary opportunity to be able to talk to him at any time, and in the meetings, I must let everybody else have a chance. So, I held back in a lot of those meetings.

So…where are we? Ah, yes, October second.

So, on that day, 'Krishnaji did more filming for CBC (Canadian Broadcasting Corporation), some in The Blue Room and some in The Rose Garden. He walks without self-consciousness and does spontaneous things that occur to him—picking up a leaf, examining a flower, as though he were totally alone. He is getting bored with it, though. We walked when it was done.'

On the third of October, 'Krishnaji finished the CBC filming by lunchtime in the drawing room. It seems to have gone very well, so says John McGreevy. Krishnaji slept long in the afternoon and then we walked.'

October fourth. 'The hi-fi is installed in Krishnaji's room. He is pleased. He asked me what I thought the difference was between the piano playing of Michelangeli and of Richter. I asked him, "What is it to you?" Krishnaji, after a pause, said, "One has sun, the other snow."' [S chuckles.] Isn't that nice?

S: It is nice.

M: That's really wonderful. I remember that…

S: Yes, yes. It would have to be Michelangeli has the sun, and Richter the snow.

M: Yes, yes.

On the fifth, 'I went to Winchester on errands, and to get more records for Krishnaji. The usual walk.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. It was cold and rainy, but we walked nonetheless.'

On the eighth, my diary says, 'Krishnaji talked to school. Walk.' This is really not very informative.

Finally for October tenth we move to back to the big book.

'Krishnaji and I went to London for fittings at Huntsman and Rowe. We lunched at Fortnum, where we had ice cream for dessert. His face lights up when we order it. We had strawberry. We bought cheeses at Jackson, and then went to Mr. Thompson who said Krishnaji's canine teeth have slight pus but can wait till the spring for extraction. He is to use salt water meanwhile to wash his mouth out. We went to HMV' —that's the record store—'and bought twelve records, and came home by train in time for supper. A cable came from Erna saying the agreement to settle the case is on the way to Krishnaji and me for our signatures. I feel nothing about this until we know the other side has also signed. Krishnaji said today, "I don't know why I've been dreaming for the last two days. Long ago and far away."'

Nothing much on the eleventh except that we moved all the furniture around in the drawing room to set it up for the scientists' conference; long tables, etcetera. We walked.

On October twelfth, 'the settlement papers arrived. Erna telephoned from Ojai that Sidney Roth is holding out for changes.' That was exasperating. Sidney Roth was a fussy man, but as he was one of the plaintiffs, he had the right. 'The scientists began to arrive for the next week's meetings. Dr. Shainberg was the first one. Krishnaji has a slight cold.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. We telephoned Sidney Roth. He ranted on to both Krishnaji and me. He will send a letter with his views, but he agreed to sign. Impossible man, he doesn't listen. Thank god I held out against his being a KFA trustee years ago when the Lilliefelts suggested it.'

'Mr. Morton showed me the garage space I can rent at $5 a month for the Mercedes storage.'

'The rest of the scientists arrived. The drawing room is set up with long tables for the meeting. The first meeting, a preliminary one without Krishnaji, was held after supper. David Bohm as chairman went over the agenda, but they all fell to discussing then and there.'

'Krishnaji still has a slight cold, and we didn't walk.'

Monday, the fourteenth of October. 'There was the first formal meeting between the scientists and Krishnaji, with David Bohm as chairman. Present were: Krishnaji; Dr. David Brett, physician; Dr. F.J. Capra, physicist; Dr. Elisabeth Ferris, alternative medicine; Dr. Gordon Globis, psychiatry: Dr. Brian Goodwin, biological sciences; Dr. Basil Hiley, theoretical physics; Dr. Julian Melzack, philosophy of science; Robin Monroe, bio-physics; David Peat, theoretical physics, and a representative of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and who is reporting the conference for it; Dr. Karl Pribram, researcher in brain structure; Dr. David Shainberg, psychiatry; George Sudarshan, physicist; Harsh Tanka, Brockwood teacher of math; Dr. Montague Ullman, psychiatry; Professor Maurice Wilkins, bio-physics, DNA, Nobel prize laureate; Dr. Joe Zorski, Brockwood teacher of physics and chemistry; and Professor David Bohm, theoretical physics. Observers were Dorothy Simmons, Ted Cartee, George Carnes, Saral Bohm, and me.' Why weren't you there?

S: I was brand-new to Brockwood.

M: Oh. On the fifteenth of October 'was the second day of the in the morning and afternoon. Drs. Pribram, Shainberg, and Sudarshan gave their talks. There was a letter to Krishnaji from Enrique Biascoechea who said he has lung cancer and is having chemotherapy. Erna telephoned me about what Roth said.'

On the sixteenth was 'the third day of scientists' meeting. In the afternoon, the scientists and some Brockwood people went to Stonehenge. Krishnaji wrote to Biascoechea. Krishnaji did a taped conversation primarily with Dr. Sudarshan. Dr. Shainberg and Joe Zorsky were there, too.'

'There was a cable from Erna. Louis Blau convinced Roth to sign. Dr. Pribram discussed the brain with the school in the evening.'

On the seventeenth, 'at the meeting, Krishnaji asked Dr. Pribram if the brain is ever still. Pribram said no, even in deep sleep, the neurons are in motion, but quieted. Pribram said hypnosis is the opposite of meditation. The brain is very active. A discussion of meditation followed. Scientists asking Krishnaji questions.' Well, this will be on tape so I don't need to report all this.

October eighteenth, 'David Bohm spoke briefly in the morning. There was considerable discussion between Krishnaji and Dr. Melzack. Krishnaji, at last, gave his talk in the afternoon. Some part of it was autobiographical. Then, he spoke about what he saw that caused him to break with the Theosophical Society, etcetera. The discussion that followed led to their wanting him to discuss what death is.'

'In the evening, the students invited the scientists to meet them and told them there is fear in the school. I heard about it late in the evening from Nicolas Besnier.' Do you remember him?

S: Yes, I do. So the students had that conversation with the scientists…

M: Yes.

S: …telling them there was fear in the school? [S laughs, then Mary does too.] That must've thrilled Dorothy no end.

M: Yes.

On the nineteenth, 'the meeting began with Krishnaji wanting to talk about meditation before talking about death. He brought in extrasensory perception, levitation, siddhis, and called them childish toys to a real religious person. Then after that discussion, Krishnaji spoke on death. The afternoon session discussion ended the meetings. Dorothy is depressed by students claiming there is fear!' Oh goodness.

The next day. 'Most of the scientists departed, but some, including Professor Wilkins and his family, came to Krishnaji's talk with the school in which he went deeply into the question of fear. They stayed for lunch, but by evening all were gone. There was a walk, with Dorothy still feeling low.'

The twenty-first, 'Mary Cadogan came to lunch. I did deskwork, and there was a walk. Krishnaji asked Dorothy to come to Rome and talked her into it. I made reservations for her to fly with us on Friday, and Frances McCann arranged a room in Pensione Svizzera for her to stay in.'

October twenty-second. Krishnaji and I to London by train. We went first to John Bell and Croyden, then to lunch with Mary L. at Fortnum's. Then to the U.S. consulate to have notarization of signatures of both of us on all the settlement papers. I mailed them to Erna while Krishnaji visited Mrs. Bindley. We got back to Brockwood at 7:15 p.m. Krishnaji on the train told me of Annie Besant telling him he had two angels to protect him, but don't be over-demanding of them.'

S: [chuckling]. So, Annie Besant told Krishnaji…

M: Yes.

S: …that he had two angels protecting him…but he mustn't…

M: …make them work too hard! [S laughs.] Yes, and that's what he used to tell me.

S: Yes. I know.

M: 'He also said that the body must live much longer because the brain is untouched. "I see the body must be much more protected and more alone."'

The twenty-third of October. 'Krishnaji held a meeting with the staff, after which I did deskwork. I put the Mercedes into winter storage in Mr. Morton's garage. The West Meon garage man saw to it, and Ted Cartee helped. We walked.'

The next day, 'I started the day packing. Krishnaji talked to the school, which I naturally attended, then I did more packing. I found Anneke's 1939 letter needed for the Vasanta Vihar trial in Madras. I packed till very late and got it all done.' You see, Vasanta Vihar turned out ultimately to belong to the Stichting for reasons that are too obscure now to go into.[3]

S: Yes.

On October twenty-fifth, 'For once I was not hurried.' I seem to be saying this a lot at this time in my diaries. [S laughs.] 'All was in order' [M chuckles.] 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, Frances McCann, and I are leaving; Ted and Ingrid to drive the cars. We had a picnic lunch near Heathrow, and then Krishnaji, Dorothy, Frances, and I flew BEA at 1:35 p.m. to Rome. Vanda and Barabino met Krishnaji and me, and Dorothy went with Frances to the Pensione Svizzera on via Gregoriana. Krishnaji and I with Vanda went to Via Barnaba Oriani'—that's where she had a flat—'and I telephoned Filomena. She and Arturo have colds. There was no heat in the house yet, so it's damp and cold in Rome. Slept more or less.'

The twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji dictated a memoranda to me about living and building in Ojai, to look at the whole matter. Krishnaji stayed in bed all day resting. Frances and Dorothy to lunch, also Topazia. I walked down for the newspapers and went early to bed.' God, it was cold in that place.

On October twenty-seventh, 'It was cold but there was some sun. Krishnaji got up for lunch. The Indian ambassador Pant and his wife were there, and their daughter, and Dorothy and Frances. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Frances, and I walked in Villa Glori. Alberto appeared in the evening.' That's Vanda's son.

The next day, 'Filomena still has a cold, so I went into Rome alone by bus. Cashed some lire, did errands for Krishnaji, and came back by bus in time for lunch. Emilio Villa and the lady (wife?) were there. We talked all afternoon. Krishnaji and I walked late.'

S: Who was that?

M: Emilio Villa. He was a friend of Vanda's and was often there. The name is very familiar to me, but I can't remember much about him, though.

October twenty-ninth, 'Mario'—that's Filomena's son—'came to drive me to see Filomena. We talked all morning. She had two heart pains this summer and her arthritis is a rack, but her spirit is the same—clear and courageous. It was a joy and sadness, both at once, to see her as though we were in Malibu. Mario drove me back. Dorothy, Frances, and Bill Burmeister and Barabino came to lunch. Bill is involved in Barabino's school—The Biella School.' Biella, that's the town where it is. 'Dorothy and Frances stayed to go on the walk. They have done enormous sightseeing. Letter from Erna written Saturday. Sidney Roth has signed. No news of Rajagopal and company doing so, but Christensen'—that's Rajagopal's lawyer—'says he will be "ready" by the fourth.'

The thirtieth. 'For me, deskwork in the morning. Ambassador Pant came at noon to take Krishnaji and me to the Indian embassy north of Rome to lunch with his wife and daughter. It is a large sixteenth-century house. When we got back, Krishnaji said he had a sore throat.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji's throat is sore. He stayed in bed. At lunch, there was Dorothy, Frances, and the actor Terrance Stamp. In the evening Krishnaji had a ninety-nine-degree fever. Barabino brought in Dr. Filipo and his assistant, and they roughly examined Krishnaji's throat and said he has a laryngitis virus. The doctor prescribed a cortisone inhalation and aspirin. Krishnaji is supposed to give his first talk tomorrow. He looks ill and touchy.'

The first of November. I took Krishnaji's temperature at 7 a.m. It was 100 degrees. His throat is very sore. He had pain in his right ear in the night and felt too ill to talk. I told Vanda. We didn't go on with the inhalator, but stuck to homeopathic remedies and Lycopodium and Apis prescribed by the said-to-be-leading homeopath here, Casella. The talk was called off only for today. Dorothy, Frances were here most of the day. Krishnaji's ear pain has disappeared and his throat is slightly less sore, but by 5 p.m. his temperature was 101. Still, Krishnaji looked a little better. He is less debilitated by the fever than usual for him. Cragnolini was here at lunch, too. Everyone wants to cancel the remaining talks, but Krishnaji forbade it.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji's temperature is ninety-eight. He looks and feels better, much better, but he has hardly any voice. He is determined to talk tomorrow, though Vanda and I are strongly against it. He said, "The body is getting ready. I've my job." I went to see Filomena in the morning. Mario taking me to and fro. Barabino lunched with Vanda and me. Mary Cadogan telephoned from London. Erna had telephoned her about a quit claim to the pre-'68 copyright by KF Trust. Erna said others had not yet signed but all is "going well" with settlement.'

November third. 'Krishnaji's temperature was ninety-eight degrees, but he still had hardly any voice. He got up, washed, tried the voice, and with Vanda and I silent to not influence him (though we were strongly against his speaking), he made his decision not to speak either today or tomorrow. He went back to bed. Vanda and I went to Eliseo, where a cassette of the July twenty-fifth third Saanen talk was played on my Uher cassette recorder hooked up by Yves to the Teatro amplifiers and speakers. Afterward, a translation of it was made from the tape. It was the usual restless Roman audience; walking about, chatting, smoking. Dorothy and Frances were there, and they came back for lunch.'

The fourth of November. 'Dorothy heard from Montague that Enrique Biascoechea is dead.' Poor Enrique. 'Krishnaji recoiled when I told him. He was surprised at how soon it came. He said later he kept thinking of him all day. I went to Ms. Goody for a massage, but was back for lunch. Filomena came, also Dorothy and Frances. Dorothy returns tomorrow morning to Brockwood. Filomena and I sat and talked, and afterward I walked her down to a taxi. Krishnaji decided to do a filmed interview for Italian television tomorrow.'

November fifth. 'A cable to Krishnaji from Erna that "Christensen's clients have all signed."' That means Rajagopal and company. 'As soon as the quit claim by Mary Cadogan for the KF Trust arrives about the pre-'68 copyright, the settlement will be formalized before the court in Ventura. So, at last this long case is over. Krishnaji discussed what to do with the land, Arya Vihara, etcetera, at length with me, so I can bring his views back to the other trustees. He did filmed answers to questions put by Dr. Modugno. The questions were in Italian, and Krishnaji answered in English. At lunch were Barabino, Topazia, Yves, Bill Burmeister, Terry Saunders, and a Brazilian man whose name I never got. Later, Krishnaji and I took a twenty-minute walk up and down the hall. Dorothy went back to Brockwood.'

On the sixth, 'Krishnaji had a very serious talk with me. I go to Ojai as his representative. I must keep this in mind without any personal opinions. I must be in relation to Krishnaji a thousand miles away. A feeling for it. There are decisions to be made. Be very non-personal. I must have an alert, very quiet body, capable of reception. Krishnaji cannot decide from India. I must decide about what is right, then telegraph him. The whole body must be quiet and take time to know what is right. If I represent Krishnaji, I cannot allow other elements to enter my consciousness. I must telegraph him of my New York and Malibu arrivals. Krishnaji is watching over everything. I must train the body to be still. Sit for one half-hour without moving, for a feeling of quiet. This is very serious.'

'Filomena came. Mario drove me to the town center. I bought bath mats for Vanda and miscellaneous things for Krishnaji and for the Renzi family. Filomena lunched with Vanda and me, and I drove her home.'

The next day, 'I packed Krishnaji's one bag. We left for Fiumicino at 12:30 p.m. Krishnaji with Vanda and Barabino, and I with Bill Burmeister in his Indian car. Frances met us there and we lunched in the airport restaurant. Krishnaji and Frances left on Flight 106. At the last moment, Maharishi Mahesh bordered the flight smiling coyly over a bouquet.' Well, that was very funny.

S: I know. Continue reading and then we'll talk about it.

M: Alright [laughs]. 'Vanda and I came back and had supper. I was unable to reach Narasimhan by telephone. He was due in Rome today, and Krishnaji wanted me to discuss the British citizenship request with him. There is a possible strike at the airport tomorrow.'

S: Okay. So now let's go back to the Maharishi story.

M: What happened was that we saw Krishnaji off. He walked across the tarmac all by himself carrying a little bag of personal things, and climbed up the steps. It was a big plane, a 747, I think, or the equivalent in size, and he turned and waved and disappeared inside. Then, suddenly, down the middle of the airport came a procession. First of all there was a carabiniere, you know, with those hats…

S: [laughs] Yes.

M: …those sort of Napoleonic hats and a staff with a gold top. And he walked like a majordomo down the center, followed by this tiny, coy figure carrying a rose, which is the Maharishi. And after him came very devout disciples, and he was sort of smiling as though to the public. And out he went and across the tarmac and up into the plane. Whereupon, we were laughing [laughing as she speaks] that they were going to meet, obviously, and what would happen. [S laughs.] So what did happen, and this we found out later, I guess it's been discussed here and there. Krishnaji had, as usual, the most forward seat, which, as you know, is on its own—one on the right side of the aisle and one on the left side of the aisle. I always got him one of those, so nobody was next to him or in front of him. The Mahesh Yogi was several rows back sitting by the window on a lion skin or a tiger skin or something like that, with a demurely devout disciple beside him. Soon after takeoff, a stewardess appeared holding the rose, and said to Krishnaji, "The gentleman in row so-and-so wishes you to have this." So, Krishnaji took it, and then he gave it right back to her [S laughing], giving it to her [M chuckles]. So, somehow he knew what it was all about, but he didn't do anything, but eventually he had to go to the toilet, which meant walking down the aisle past…

S: Yes.

M: …the Maharishi. He got past apparently, but on his way back, a disciple had been primed to leap up and said, "Please, have my seat," and Krishnaji found himself sitting next to a man on the lion skin or tiger skin, or whatever it was, and who engaged him in conversation saying that he had changed the consciousness of Europe, and he was now going to change the consciousness of India, I think. He went on to say that Krishnaji should come with him and they'd do it together. Krishnaji replied that no, he was sorry, that he had appointments that he had to keep, [S laughs] and he had other things to do; talks to give and so forth. Maharishi dismissed that as unimportant because "together we will change the consciousness of…" Somehow, Krishnaji wangled his way out of that, and got back to his seat, where he stayed [chuckles] until the plane made one of those landings that they did in some Arab country in those days to refuel. Krishnaji, as usual, got up and walked, you know, exercising vigorously in the airport, which he reported astonished the Maharishi people. Then, of course, they landed in Delhi, and there Krishnaji was met with the usual car at the foot of the steps down from the plane, and wafted away. Well, that's the end of the story. Vanda and I found it hilariously funny that the two of them would obviously be in first class, and what would happen; because everything about them were at such polar opposites. [S laughs again.]

Now we go to the eighth. 'Krishnaji should have arrived in Delhi early this morning. The Fiumicino strike was over by noon. I left Vanda and Rome. Filomena and Mario took me to the airport, and I took a TWA flight to New York at 5:45 p.m.' Well, then it goes on about what I did when I arrived, and we don't want to hear all this.

'I cabled Krishnaji at Pupul's in Delhi after speaking to Erna. Tapper, the attorney general, has not yet signed the agreement, but when he has, the court hearing will formalize it all. I went to bed at 1 a.m.—I've been up 20 hours!'

Then there's nothing about Krishnaji except I met someone from Pegasus Magazine about an interview with Krishnaji set for February twenty-fourth.

I flew to California on November twentieth. 'There were no letters yet from Krishnaji, but I cabled him that I had arrived in Malibu. I spoke to Erna Lilliefelt. There's no word yet on whether the attorney general, Tapper, has signed the agreement.'

On the twenty-fifth of November. 'I got a cable from Krishnaji in Benares. All is well. A letter is on the way. He will be in Madras on the second of December.'

The next day, ‘Alan Kishbaugh came with me to Ojai for a trustees’ meeting and lunch at the Lilliefelts’. With Theo and Ruth, we went to look at the Happy Valley land we want to lease. Also, we saw one of the video cassettes of the Krishnaji-Anderson series made at San Diego State University last February. It was very good.’

On November twenty-seventh, ‘Krishnaji’s first letter arrived. It was written from November ninth through the seventeenth, and posted on the eighteenth in Benares, arriving in nine days.’

The first of December. ‘I left at 8:30 a.m., and drove in Krishnaji’s Mercedes to Ojai and the Lilliefelts’. Balasundaram had telephoned from Rajghat before Krishnaji and he left for Madras inquiring about news of the attorney general signing the settlement. With Erna and Theo, I walked over to the Happy Valley acreage east of the 100 acres we want to lease. The land is said to be for sale. Is this a possible site for Krishnaji’s house? Lunched with Erna and Theo, talking at length, then drove home.’

December ninth. ‘Erna says that the court meeting of tomorrow before Judge Heaton with Tapper, Christensen, and Cohen is canceled as “necessary.” A date of a formal hearing to end the case will be set.’

Eleventh of December. ‘Letter number three from Krishnaji in Rajghat and Madras. He saw Madhavachari and told Madhavachari what he had done without mincing words. “Madhavachari cannot wash his hands of the business. It is immoral, non-Brahmanical. One has to do penance to wipe all this before one dies, etcetera.” That was because, it turned out, and this was discovered by KFI members, that through all this legal business when Krishnaji had been confiding in Madhavachari about what was happening with Rajagopal, Madhavachari was relaying it to Rajagopal.’

S: It’s terrible really.

M: Isn’t that disgusting?

S: Yes, and really extraordinary.

M: It’s hard to understand now. That people do such things.

S: I know.

M: On December eighteenth, ‘Erna rang in the afternoon. Cohen says the final court hearing to end the case is set for December twenty-sixth. I cabled the news to Krishnaji in Rishi Valley, where he went today from Madras.’

On the twenty-sixth of December, ‘Evelyne Blau came at 9:30 a.m., and drove with me to the Ventura County Courthouse, where we met Erna and Theo. We sat in Judge Heaton’s court, while he went into chambers with Rosenthal, Cohen, the deputy attorney general Tapper, and Christensen. Then, in open court, the judge announced the approval of an agreement and the closing of the case. Mrs. Porter, Mrs. Vigeveno, and both Casselberrys were there. Christensen told us the keys would be at the real estate office in Ojai after he had spoken to Rajagopal.'

S: The keys for Arya Vihara?

M: Yes.

'We went to the real estate office. There were no keys, and no telephone call had come. Lunch with the Lilliefelts. Ruth, Albion, and we went to Pine Cottage, Arya Vihara, etcetera. The caretaker knew nothing and telephoned Rajagopal, who refused us entry without speaking to one of us. We telephoned him and left. Later, after I was home, Erna said that the real estate woman gave the keys, and Rajagopal telephoned her that we could have them.'

The next day, I wrote in full to Krishnaji about all this.

December twenty-ninth. 'I left at 8 a.m. for Ojai, and with Erna and Theo went through all three houses; Arya Vihara, Pine Cottage, and the office, emptied of all furniture except one table, one day bed, and one leather suitcase with the initials KJN[4] and the address Adyar, Madras, India. It was a cold, clear, marvelous day. There was snow on Topa Topa and all the mountain range. We walked around the Arya Vihara land and found higher up, among the avocado trees, a majestic oak tree and possible place to build a house for Krishnaji. After lunch, we went to the Oak Grove. Talked at length, and I drove home.' That was the day we finally got the property.

On December thirty-first, 'There were violent winds all day. I worked at the desk, had an early supper, then read and listened to Krishnaji tapes. So ended 1974.'

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Harsh Tankha was a mathematics teacher at Brockwood, but he also had an electronics background, so was called in on all technical things.

[2] "Rota" is a Brockwoodism, short for "rotation" or your turn to do the dishes for the school in the scullery.

[3] This was the result of Rajagopal's shell game in which money and property was moved from one entity to another.

[4] Krishnaji and his brother Nitya monogrammed most of their things together. Jiddu was the family name, then Krishnaji's initial was on the left, and Nitya's was on the right.

Issue 34: January 1, 1975 to April 5, 1975

After a difficult sojourn in India, during which Krishnaji was sick most of the time, we see two major occurrences in this issue: Krishnaji and Mary slowly beginning to move back to Ojai, and the Oak Grove School in Ojai gradually taking shape.

Mary: We start at the beginning of 1975. Krishnaji was in India, and I was in Malibu, and nothing seems to have happened of note for our purpose here. I'll just scan through until we get to things worth noting which pertain to Krishnaji.

From the little book we have something for January tenth. 'Erna received a letter from Krishnaji, who said he had received consent from Cohen and Christensen to send a copy of the case agreement to be used in regards to the Vasanta Vihar litigation. She tried unsuccessfully to telephone Balasundaram and find out where to send it. I wrote to Krishnaji this morning.'

I got a letter from Krishnaji on January thirteenth. 'Pupul, Achyut, Sunanda, and Balasundaram wrote to Rajagopal about "working together" and asking for a quit-claim to Vasanta Vihar. Also, KF India wants the right to sell Indian books in English outside of India. Evelyne Blau telephoned. Dr. Pollock was dropped from the Happy Valley school board during his absence. Rosalind Rajagopal says he is on the KFA board, representing KFA.'

The next day, 'I drove to Ojai, and spent the morning repainting Krishnaji's room and other things to Pine Cottage and seeing the contractor, Mr. Ojacks. I also did some work in the office building. I spent the evening with the Lilliefelts discussing money things.'

S: Wait a minute. Where was this place that you painted?

M: Pine Cottage. We got Pine Cottage in the settlement, you see.

On the fifteenth, 'Alan Kishbaugh came to my house in Malibu, and at 8 a.m., we drove to Ojai. We looked at the Oak Grove and the land adjoining it. I then showed him the Arya Vihara houses. At 11 a.m., we had a KFA trustee meeting at Erna and Theo's and then lunch. In the afternoon, Mark Lee came about the school.' Then I seem to have done some more things with the cottage.

S: What things did you do?

M: Well, 'I drove to Ventura and bought a cooking range and a refrigerator for the cottage. And then I met Theo about paint at the cottage. Talked to him and Erna until dark, then drove home.'

On the twentieth, 'there was a cable from Krishnaji about tickets to fly to London and here on the eighth instead of the first.' Then I did some more errands about the cottage.

S: What errands?

M: Oh, furniture. Don't be so…[laughs]…picky!

S: This is all very important historically. [Laughs.]

M: It is not. Alright, so, I had curtains made, and some other things.

S: Well, that's great, you see, because it shows how it's being prepared and…

M: Alright, 'a table with four chairs.'

Then, 'I talked to Mary Cadogan about the tickets, and I went out about the curtains again. Alan Hooker had azaleas and camellias planted next to the cottage,' which was nice of him.

'I came home to find two letters from Krishnaji sent from Bangalore on the eighth and ninth. He went for three weeks without any of mine reaching him. My letters numbers fourteen and sixteen have not arrived.'

On January twenty-second, 'Balasundaram telephoned Erna from Bombay about the legal papers. He said to tell me Krishnaji has had fever for three days, but is over it.'

I drove to Ojai on the twenty-fifth. 'I met Erna, Theo, and Evelyne Blau. We walked all over the land near the Oak Grove and down to the main road. It is beautiful land. We showed Evelyne the Arya Vihara houses, and at 4 p.m. in Arya Vihara we ran the Canadian film of Krishnaji for a few people. There was a letter from Dr. Parchure, written on the seventeenth, in which he says that Krishnaji had a fever on the fifteenth and his Bombay talks on the eighteenth and nineteenth had to be canceled.' Then I have more about the cottage; putting in the refrigerator, etcetera.

S: Now, where would you have put those, Mary?

M: The refrigerator?

S: Yes.

M: In the kitchen [laughs].

S: But as I know Pine Cottage now, there is no…

M: Well, it had a kitchen before, which is now my bathroom.

S: And what was your bedroom?

M: A little dining room.

S: And what was eventually Krishnaji's bedroom was his old bedroom?

M: Yes, that was his bedroom, and his sitting room was his original sitting room, but his bedroom was smaller. I enlarged it by pushing out the eastern wall.

S: Toward the office?

M: No, toward my bedroom.

S: Oh, I see. These are interesting historical facts.

M: [laughs…then both laugh.] Oh, heavens.

S: So, then, your bedroom door that goes outside would've been a back dining room door.

M: Yes. If I remember correctly, I pushed the whole porch out a little bit. I know that Krishnaji's room was much narrower, from the closet to the wall.

S: Mm, hm.

M: So, I enlarged it, made it a better shape. It was dark, also.

S: Yes.

M: It was horrid, actually.

On February second, 'Krishnaji left Bombay after midnight and arrived in Rome. I telephoned Vanda's and spoke to him at 9:30 a.m. local time here, but late in the evening there. He says he is over the flu and bronchitis. His voice sounded himself.'

On the fourth, 'Krishnaji flew Rome to Brockwood.'

S: Why didn't Krishnaji fly across the Pacific in those days?

M: Because he wanted to go to Brockwood to pick up his clothes, and to look in on Brockwood.

S: Yes, but Bombay to Rome, Rome to London, London to LA, that seems…

M: But remember, it wasn't so easy or quick to fly those distances in those days. When we flew to Australia in 1970, it took twenty-four hours.

S: From LA?

M: Yes.

S: Wow.

M: …and then he went on from there to India later; he had to go via Singapore.

S: Ah, yes.

M: There was none of the direct flights in those days. Or, they were long.

S: Yes.

M: On the sixth, 'I took all the furniture to Ojai. Cleaned the cottage and put things in order all day. Curtains were installed in Krishnaji's three rooms. I was there till after 8 p.m., then drove home. Mark Lee says the fire department and the building inspector will not allow Arya Vihara to be either a school or a center.'

The next day 'was a quiet day at home putting Krishnaji's room in Malibu in readiness,' …and something about the Dunnes.

From the big book: On the eighth of February, 'Krishnaji, after four days at Brockwood, left Heathrow at 12:30 p.m. on TWA and arrived at Los Angeles at 3:20 p.m. His one bag took a long time to appear and so it was an hour till he emerged, looking better than I had feared after the fever in Bombay and all the traveling since. He came home to Malibu and had supper in bed, but, though tired and half-falling asleep, he wanted to go on talking and staying up. He slept wakefully. I have an enormous sense of relief at his being here. I had an intense feeling of his coming all day long.' I could feel him…'He brought his letters to date, and one written on the plane.' He always brought his letters right up to date, including the day on the plane. [S laughs.] It was lovely.

S: Yes, it is lovely.

M: February ninth. 'Krishnaji was in bed all day, having his meals on a tray. He slept most of the morning, but after lunch he gave an account of the events in India. He has not felt well all the time there. He never really was over the flu from Rome in October. He said he felt "sick" most of the time. He found much deterioration in India. Rajghat is full of conflict and indifference between the students and teachers. The students walked out in the middle of one of his talks as a demonstration, not against him, but against the teachers. Krishnaji met both sides later and both said they were antagonistic. He has hope that Ahalya Chari and Upasini will pull the place together. Rishi Valley has a strong sense of deterioration. Balasundaram is running it as an autocracy, and also spending too much time on other matters. Krishnaji talked to him, and Balasundaram was silent, afraid of him. Krishnaji insisted the school be run by a group of teachers working together. The principal and Foundation secretary shouldn't be the same person. He told Balasundaram to take six months to go into himself. Sunanda and Achyut are to spend more time at Vasanta Vihar to see to things, and probably Sunanda will do more of the secretary of the Foundation work. Pupul…' Let's not let this out while everybody's alive.

S: No, that's right. No, we won't.

M: 'He said Pupul has deteriorated too, intellectually, etcetera. She is to leave government work and will do more work for the Foundation. Socially, politically, India is in a greater mess. He spent two hours talking to Mrs. Gandhi[1], and felt sorry for her, the enormity of her problems. He has told Pupul, Sunanda, Achyut, and Balasundaram that unless there is change in the schools, they will "not see my face." This had a bomb-like effect.'

Tuesday, the eleventh of February. 'It was a lovely, clear day. In the Green Beauty Mercedes, with Krishnaji driving, we left at 9:30 a.m. for Ojai. We met Erna and Theo by the Ranch House Restaurant, and then went around and walked in the Oak Grove and in the adjoining land. Krishnaji had forgotten how beautiful it is. He was surprised and very pleased. He walked across the field to the other side of Besant Road and up around Rajagopal's place to the top of the hill where we could see down to Ventura Road, the part we will sell.' It says here [laughter]. Alas!

S: [laughing] It's still for sale!

M: And it's still for sale! 'Then we drove to Arya Vihara. For the first time since 1966, Krishnaji entered the house. The Lees, Ruth, and Albion were there. Krishnaji went through the house except for upstairs where the Lees are living. On the ground floor west bedroom, Krishnaji said, "My brother must've died here," and, "Dr. Besant used this room." In the hall, he said to me, "What quarrels there were here." We walked through the orange trees to Pine Cottage, and Krishnaji went through it and through the office rapidly as though wanting to get away from something repellant. "I couldn't spend a night here." Too small, too closed in. "I have been spoiled by Brockwood and your house. I need space." We went to the Lilliefelts' with Ruth and Albion. Later, with Mark Lee, we discussed at length. Krishnaji now thinks the west end is good for the school. He asked, though, if any of us wish him to try to get the Happy Valley land. None of us did. So, it is to be the west end. Krishnaji will speak in the Oak Grove on April twelve, thirteen, nineteen, and twenty. We left at 6 p.m. Coming home in the car, he said he felt the houses were contaminated and had an idea that, if he lived in the cottage, it would be for good. I said it was fixed up only for use for a few nights this year. We were home in time for supper.'

S: Tell me, just for the record, which room is it in Arya Vihara that, that Nitya died in?

M: It's the one on the road, of the two bedrooms…

S: Alright, so, when you come in the front door, you turn right…

M: Yes.

S: …you go through the living room.

M: And it's the one on the right. It's not the one looking out on the back garden. It's the one that looks out toward the road, McAndrew Road.

S: Okay.

M: Wednesday, February twelfth. 'Krishnaji slept in the morning. After an early lunch, we drove to Lailee Bakhtiar's office, where Krishnaji had his first appointment and checkup.' She was then our doctor.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'She said his blood pressure was 130 over 80, and had excellent circulation in his extremities. We will get blood chemistry results next week. He had a cardiogram. While this was happening, I told her of his wishing never to be in a hospital. She said she understood and respected that, and if ever he is ill, we will manage at home. Later he told me he must never be given anesthesia that would make him unconscious, only local anesthesia. "I might not come back," he said with a small laugh. Lailee wanted a chest X-ray, so we went to Dr. Jafer's office, and Krishnaji had that. Then, in Westwood, we found two pairs of loafers, size 6D, just what he wanted. Then we saw Winkey'—Winkey was a friend who worked in a bookstore—'and ordered a book, bought some ice cream, and came home. Accomplishing day. Krishnaji had me cable the Drs. Siddoo in India that he cannot visit Vancouver after San Francisco.'

The thirteenth. [Laughs.] 'I am sixty. Don't feel sixty. Feel well and rather young.' [Both laugh.] 'Krishnaji doesn't heed birthdays and didn't know it was the day until he asked me how Naudé happened to telephone.' [Both laugh.] 'A white azalea plant came from the Simmonses and Brockwood. My family telephoned. Krishnaji rested, and we had a pleasant, quiet day at home, which is everything wonderful a birthday could be for me.'

Friday the fourteenth of February. 'We drove to Ojai. Met John Rex'—that's the architect—'Erna and Theo, and walked again over the Oak Grove area. Rex is enthusiastic about it for the school. It is the best place we could find in California, he said. We showed him the three houses on McAndrew Road. The Lees had lunch for us all, including Ruth and Albion. We then went to the Lilliefelts' and discussed what is needed for Rex to make a tentative master plan to be able to show people at the April talks. After Rex left, Krishnaji spoke of concentrating everything in the west end, keeping McAndrew property private. He said he didn't like the cottage or office building, and if he were to use Arya Vihara, it would have to be pulled down and begun all over again. But later, in the car going home, he spoke of trying the cottage and using it part of the time, spending the rest of the time in Malibu, i.e., keeping Malibu as our main place.'

On the fifteenth. 'I made lunch in the kitchen. Krishnaji said he felt like saying something and he didn't know how to tell me, it was about a feeling he has had the last few weeks, which he once had years ago before his brother had died. At Adyar[2], standing outside of the building in which they lived, looking up at their chambers, a feeling of emptiness, of no association at all.'

‘We unpacked two suitcases found at Arya Vihara; one a magnificent crocodile, one with his initials. We found some kurtas[3] and lots of socks. Some socks had JK woven in them, and one pair had JKN. It was as if they had been left there years ago by his brother when they shared their clothing. The cupboard was cedar and all the things now cedar-y. Krishnaji was interested in the clothes but wants to give most of it away. We went to town and saw a movie Chinatown.’ Did you see that?

S: I can’t remember.

The nineteenth of February. ‘I spoke to Erna. She just discovered an easement made by Rajagopal and the Vigevenos last summer that runs through the land between Rajagopal and Krotona[4], making it more or less un-saleable by us.’ [Laughs.] ‘No end to crookedness. Krishnaji stayed in bed all morning. After lunch, I went to town and saw Lailee Bakhtiar about Krishnaji’s tests. All are excellent. The lung X-rays show all is clear. There are some old scars which she surmised are probably from TB in his youth. His cardiogram is normal, liver/kidneys normal, blood count normal, cholesterol 200, blood sugar normal. There is nothing wrong. She thinks his only difficulty is his allergy, the hay fever. She gave me an antihistamine cough syrup, similar to Benadryl, to take during hay fever season. Also Dimetapp, tablets which are a little stronger. In spite of these, if he develops bronchitis and fever, or green sputum, he must take Tetracycline—which has the least side effect of antibiotics and reduce fever with aspirin, ten grains, and put baggies with ice under his armpits and at the back of the neck.’ That’s how she felt one should reduce fever.

S: Hm.

M: ‘I reiterated my admonition that if ever I am seriously ailing, I expect her to tell me all underlying facts and the decisions are mine. I do not wish to be kept alive at all costs. She agreed. I got back and found that Krishnaji had dusted in and out of the Mercedes and walked sixteen turns around the lawn.’

The twentieth. ‘The Lilliefelts, Ruth, Albion, and Alan Kishbaugh and Mark Lee and Evelyne Blau came at 3 p.m. to discuss the scope of the school for John Rex to use in the plan. Later, Lou Blau joined us and discussed the Rajagopal and Vigeveno easements that snake around KFA land, and also to discuss fundraising. Blau described vividly the amounts of funds we will need as beyond what we can raise from the present mailing list. Krishnaji listened and said to Blau, “Should we not have a school?” Blau said that we should and we will, but we will need professional fundraising help.’ Well, he was right.

S: Yes.

M: The twenty-sixth of February. ‘We left at 9:30 a.m. for Ojai. Elfriede’—that was my housekeeper—‘followed in a truck with rugs for different rooms in the cottage; the dining room, the porch, and part of the sitting room. The Lilliefelts, Ruth, Albion, and both Lees came to the cottage, and at 11 a.m., we went over articles on the meaning and function of the school, which Krishnaji wrote yesterday. Erna stayed to lunch with Krishnaji and me.

It is our first meal in the cottage. I had cooked a pot of Spanish rice and vegetables at 6 a.m. and brought it along. During lunch, Krishnaji asked Erna and then Theo, "What is the right thing for Maria about a place to live in Ojai?" I was a listener, not a participant in this; Krishnaji silencing any comments.' [Chuckle in M's voice; S laughs.] 'His feelings about the cottage are quite different today. When we arrived, he went in and out, walked off among the trees, and during the meeting he kept looking at the room and exclaimed at the comfort of the director chairs, for the first time noticed the curtains, etcetera. The feeling is changing, he said. The building inspector says we could start the school temporarily if it's very small, using Arya Vihara for no more than five resident children, and maximum ten in classrooms, using the annex to the cottage and ground floor of the office. This would rule out Krishnaji's using the cottage until the school could move to Oak Grove. Krishnaji seemed to be saying that the McAndrew property be kept for KF use, and if I move to Ojai, it should be a new piece of land at the east end.'

S: If you move?

M: Yes. 'The others were not part of this discussion, but when they came back, we went on with the meeting. Albion made some suggestions to alter Krishnaji's article which would only replace Krishnaji's style and language with clichés.'

S: Which article is this?

M: It was what the school was about.

S: Ah, ha.

M: 'Rajagopal's name came up, regarding the zoning—the easements he, the Vigevenos, and Zalk got last July that run through the land KFA now has, east of Rajagopal's house.' They apparently put it in at the last minute when they knew they'd have to give it up. 'Cohen has written a stiff letter about it to Christensen. Albion said that Rajagopal had been "behaving better lately," and I said, "How? By keeping $3,000 interest due KFA but sent by error to KWINC when Erna telephoned about it?"' That's true—the bank got mixed up. [Both chuckle.]

Editor's Note: In keeping with our policy of trying not to hurt people's feelings, we have another Person X in this issue. Person X in this issue is a different person to the Person X who appeared in a previous issue. Person X in this issue had no function in either the proposed school or any of the foundations, but was invited to some of the meetings as a courtesy.

'Person X came out with platitudes'—oh, lord, this is awful [S chuckles]—'knowing nothing of what has happened, Person X would like to talk to Rajagopal and tell him to be friendly.' [S laughs heartily.] 'This sort of sentimental effrontery makes me tired.' [M laughs and seems to say aside to S:] We'll have to disguise this…

S: Yes, yes, yes, we will, we will, but it's good to have it for the record.

M: [chuckles] 'Krishnaji found it necessary to dissociate himself from Rajagopal and we found it necessary to wage a lawsuit to regain things for Krishnaji, and yet the sentimentalists tend to want to smooth Rajagopal. I find it an incredible phenomenon. Krishnaji rather silenced Person X, and other people in the room looked as if they would like to do the same. Krishnaji, Erna, and I walked up to the oak tree at the edge of the property. There was a discussion of my buying adjacent Topa Topa[5] land, but I don't warm to the idea' [voice cracks with humor in reading]. 'On the way home, Krishnaji kept exclaiming over the curtains, which he finds very pretty. The atmosphere there is changing, he said. It was after 7 p.m. when we reached Malibu, but he wasn't too tired. He said the body is now feeling relaxed. He's sleeping better. Meditation again. It didn't come in India, his body was too tired.'

S: Hm.

M: For the next several days there is nothing of significance. I did lots of deskwork, we went to see a movie (Godfather 2, which he liked), walked, etcetera.

On the third of March, 'we drove up to Ojai in the afternoon and moved into Pine Cottage for the first time. I made supper, but first we took a walk up toward Thacher School. People passing in cars recognized Krishnaji and smiled to see him here again. After supper, Krishnaji seemed disoriented, and had that "listening to something" look. It had begun in the car, though he was driving, but by bedtime he looked as if he didn't know where he was, which is always strange, and he wanted me at hand. I slept on the couch I bought and put in his sitting room so that it could be used to sleep on,' because he had his room, naturally, but there was nowhere for me.

On the fourth of March, 'I gave Krishnaji breakfast as usual on a tray. Yesterday on the way up, Krishnaji said he felt suddenly like writing. The sight of the wild, bright yellow flowers that grow on the slopes by the beach sent him off. We stopped in Ventura to get a notebook and also a nightshirt and bathrobe, which we forgot to bring. I went for an eraser and marketed at Bayliss and made lunch for Krishnaji and Erna and Theo. Person X is a bit of a problem' [chuckles]. 'Person X expects to be included and consulted on everything. Krishnaji said he would handle it, and so he did.'

'Mark Lee came after lunch, and first, Krishnaji told him the outline of Rajagopal's history and then went into the question of wives interfering; the responsibility of the director's position, vis-à-vis the Foundation, etcetera.'

'Krishnaji and I went for a walk up Horn Canyon to the river. It's wild and lovely, but Krishnaji came back with sneezes and allergy. One more weight in the scale of where we should live.'

The fifth of March. 'Krishnaji slept better last night. It rained all day. I interviewed a seventeen-year-old girl who had wanted to go to Brockwood because, "People are friendly." Then, she was kicked out after one term for smoking. Empty, not very bright impression. Krishnaji and I lunched at Arya Vihara with the Lees, Lilliefelts, and Bruce and somebody Meyer, a couple, who will join the school venture with their two small children. Krishnaji and I redid the announcement of the school plans for The Bulletin. Krishnaji slept all afternoon.'

The sixth of March. 'It rained lightly in Ojai, one inch in Malibu. Theo came over to tell me that he and Erna wanted to lend Krishnaji their house if the cottage is not right. Mark came to speak to Krishnaji. I made lunch, and Erna and Theo joined Krishnaji and me. We had a useful discussion about a center. I suggested it have several purposes rather than just having a constant program; that we have as well a retreat in which we offer quiet and a chance for people to go into themselves and Krishnaji's teachings on their own, with an absence of outside influence.' I seem to have had the idea early, didn't I? [S laughs.] That's news to me! 'There should be tapes and books available if they seek them, but not served up in a program.' Oh, how smart of me! [Laughs.]

S: It took a long time to come about, but…[laughs]

M: Well, this is a surprise to me. 'At 4 p.m., Krishnaji and I drove to Malibu and Krishnaji discussed our redoing the cottage completely into a proper house for us. If the cottage is to be used partly for a school next year, we will have to wait till the west end school is built.'

Saturday, the eighth of March. I suppose there was a seventh, but it's not worth reporting.

S: I'm sure it was.

M: Alright. Here goes. 'Rained most of the day.'

S: You see! [Laughter.] We never would've known.

M: [laughs] March eighth. 'We went to choose ten dwarf navel orange trees, and also various shrubs to plant along the large wall in Malibu. Elfriede and Fred'—Fred is her husband—'came in their truck and brought them to Malibu. Krishnaji and I had a picnic in the Jaguar and went to a 2 p.m. movie, The Towering Inferno. When it got harrowing, I asked Krishnaji if we shouldn't leave, but he shook his head and we stuck it out. Later at home, he said, "The temple does me good."' [S laughs.] Going to the movies was one of his temples. [More laughter.]

S: I understand that.

M: I thought you would. [S chuckles more.]

Monday, March tenth. 'A gentle rain commenced the day. Cooking at 6 a.m. as Elfriede is off. The Lilliefelts, Ruth, Albion, and Kishbaugh and Mark Lee came at 11 a.m. for a day-long discussion with Krishnaji about the center, school, arrangement of buildings on the land, etcetera. There was much on the center's activities. The need for a place where people can come to explore Krishnaji's meetings and the teachings. To begin with, trustees should be available for this; not as interpreters, but to explore and discuss. This and retreats should be available during the nine months that Krishnaji is away. We went over what would be the best arrangement of buildings. Krishnaji was stressing the sense of security and freedom necessary for children. We are all to meet with John Rex and his people on Wednesday. Later, I asked Krishnaji if he thought the trustees are capable of the necessary discussion when he isn't there. "That's what I was trying to find out!"' [Both laugh heartily.]

On the twelfth of March. 'In the morning, he said three words to me. "But it is much more, something tremendous, and it has to do with that."

S: What three words?

M: That was more than three words…I don't know. His mathematics was a little off. 'In p.m., the…

S: But it's much more than that?

M: Something tremendous…well…it is much more, something tremendous. It has to do with That." That is always the Other…the, you know…

'In the afternoon, the Lilliefelts, Ruth, Albion, and Mark Lee, John Rex, Reibsamen, and Nichols of the Rex firm came to talk all afternoon about the master plan for the center and the school on the Oak Grove land. Krishnaji dictated an earlier memo on "protection, security, affection in buildings and space, freedom." The quality of a monastery he has seen outside Florence. You do not see it till you come close, it is so much a part of the land. Quiet, dignity, a sacred place. Decided on two students maximum to a room. Later Krishnaji warned Erna that he felt Rajagopal would try to prevent KFA getting the balance of the KWINC's funds through K&R.'

The thirteenth of March. 'Krishnaji didn't sleep too well. So, he spent the day in bed. I went to town on errands. We had supper, as usual, on trays in his room, while a noisy western with Burt Lancaster shot it out as The Law Man.' That's the name of the film. 'Krishnaji's face changed. His eyes were heavy-lidded. He was far off. I felt the change, motioned to turn off the TV, but he shook his head. He asked, "Do you feel it?" There was a something electric close at hand. He didn't want to speak of it.'

The fourteenth of March. 'Krishnaji has slept well. "Something had continued." At lunch he had asked me if I was keeping a record of these things. "You should keep a complete diary." I asked what relation there was between what happened last night and the noisy television. He said that the movie rests and relaxes the mind, then the other comes. He used to go to the movies for rest. Later, he washed both cars. In the evening, he said, "It is still going on. I wonder why. Maybe because of the talks. I don't know, and I don't ask."'

Alright, now we'll go to the little book for the fifteenth, which is doubtless uninteresting.

S: [chuckles] You shouldn't be so positive.

M: On the fifteenth, 'Krishnaji and I had an early lunch, then went to the movies in Pacific Palisades and saw The Odessa File. We came back and watered the new bushes.'

The next day, 'We both packed. It was a quiet, beautiful day.'

The seventeenth of March. 'A lovely, clear morning. People came to plant some things. Krishnaji and I finished packing. Amanda and Phil came over briefly to say goodbye and see the plantings. Krishnaji and I had lunch, and then Elfriede drove us to the airport. We took a United flight to San Francisco. Alain Naudé met us at the airport, and drove us to the Huntington Hotel. We had the nice suite we had on two previous visits. It's a very nice hotel; quiet and dignified. We went for a walk, bought some fruit, etcetera, and came back. Alain had supper with us. Krishnaji told Indian stories. Alain suggested that so much yoga makes Krishnaji oversensitive and hence he has hay fever.'

On the eighteenth of March, 'there was a telephone call from a William Stanijer, a cultish type who wants Krishnaji to meet his foundation, and then have an interview with them on KQED. I said no to it all, and added that, as his letter referred to Vimala Thakar and the Happy Valley Foundation, he should know there was no connection between Krishnaji or KFA and them. It seemed to leave him speechless.' [Chuckles.] 'I have learned to say such things quietly, briefly, and then stop, no elaborations. If there is a silence, let it be. Naudé came at 1 p.m. and we all went to Ghirardelli Square, decided on Chinese food, and lunched at the Mandarin Inn looking out over the bay. We had an excellent vegetarian version of Chinese spinach broth and bean curd, pea pods, and water chestnuts, bean sprouts, rice, almost raw asparagus sliced bias lengthwise.' I hope you're appreciating the details.

S: I am, completely. [Laughter by both.] You neglect to mention the menu number, but…

M: You're right. [Laughs.] 'Krishnaji liked it. We bought an Aubrey Menen book. Then, Alain took Krishnaji back to the hotel to rest while I walked to the Cannery for some groceries and returned by taxi. Walked with Krishnaji to Mrs. Mathias and did some more marketing while he visited her.' Shall I identify Mrs. Mathias or have we done that already?

S: We've already done that.

M: 'Mrs. Mathias is almost blind, and Krishnaji put his hands on her. He was walking up the block when I went to meet him. It is extraordinary to see him walking toward one, the whole meaning of the world seems to be centered in that advancing grace. We walked six times around the small square gardens across from the hotel and came in. At supper there was a call from Dorothy and Montague, who had arrived at Kathy Harris's[6] from London and staying in Atherton with Kathy's family. There was another call, this from Frances McCann, saying Carol Allwell[7] came on the same plane with her. Krishnaji said in the evening that there is a great deal of evil in the world. He said he didn't like to use the word evil—discord and it is caused by organized belief. For instance, Christians say Jesus is the only one, our god is the only one. It excludes everything else. Krishnaji had a stomachache before going to bed. Took Nux Vomica and it stopped.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji at breakfast said, "Dogma always makes for division and therefore it is evil." We spoke of killing and he said organized killing results from dogma. Christianity has resulted in organized killing. I spoke of the human response to things that intrude—killing pack rats, flies, ants in the kitchen. Krishnaji said there was a difference.' [M chuckles] 'It's not organized killing, because they come into a place that is not theirs. I said they consider it theirs. I said that if an intruder, for example, with a knife came to attack him, I would do anything to protect him. He said that is different in that it is a spontaneous reflex to protect, but killing a human being is still wrong, and the destructive animal, the pack rat, the gopher, etcetera must not be allowed to destroy what it wants—coyotes, sheep, etcetera. Krishnaji told of the fox he saw stalking chickens in Ojai. He watched it come slowly close, then let out a great shout' [M chuckles], 'and the fox disappeared and never came again.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji walked alone to Mrs. Mathias'—that was just across the street—'to help her eyes. I waited for Dorothy, Montague, Kathy Harris, Erna, and Theo. Dorothy and Montague are looking very pleased to be here. We went downstairs and Krishnaji came along, carefully crossing with the light as he said he would when alone. When with me, he wants to cross anywhere.'

S: Cross the street?

M: Yes. 'We all went to Ghirardelli Square and had lunch again at the Mandarin. The Lilliefelts brought Krishnaji and me back, and we looked at the Masonic Hall. Krishnaji very struck by the one chair in the center of the hall.' It was a curious hall which I don't think shows on video. It was a big hall and it had seats in a horseshoe shape, and the stage came out into the middle of the audience. 'We came back and rested and later walked down and up a hill. At supper there was a curious Otherness in the room, or something I felt, like clear invisible water running in the air. Krishnaji noticed something in me and asked if I were upset about something. I didn't try to describe but said I was fine, because it is the night before the talk and silence is best.'

On March twentieth, 'Krishnaji stayed in and rested all day. I marketed in the morning. We lunched in the rooms. I walked down in the afternoon and stopped at the Regent Hotel and saw Frances McCann and Carol Allwell. Then, went back to the health food store, bought two shirts at Brooks Brothers, and a book at a bookstore, and came back on the cable car. At 6 p.m., we walked next door to the Masonic Hall and Krishnaji gave his first talk. It was a good audience. Krishnaji used a new word, the "scaffold" of the self. He also spoke of learning, freedom, and the observer and the observed. Afterward, he had to wait backstage a little to recover, and then we left.' It was most convenient as the hall was across the side street, just thirty feet away from the hotel. We just walked across the street.

S: Oh, great.

M: March twenty-first. '"Knowledge is always the outer," Krishnaji said. We lunched with Mrs. Mathias. She is almost totally blind, but knows where everything is in her apartment, and she moves naturally, talking as she looks at you as if she could see. The conversation went eventually to the Rajagopal case. She said that many were hurt by Krishnaji. Krishnaji asked who. She said, "Well, I was." Krishnaji explained that what he considered in this, as when he dissolved the Order of the Star[8], was what is the right thing to do. Mrs. Besant had been hurt when he dissolved the Order, though she came to say, "If the World Teacher is doing this, it is right." Krishnaji said he had tried for years to get Rajagopal to inform him, consult him, etcetera and got either nothing or abuse. "Are people hurt or is it their image of how things should be?" Krishnaji had me tell my conversation with Rajagopal in 1971 when he said that working together was a plot against him.' He did! I was trying to say, look Rajagopal, this is so simple. We could work together and so forth, and in an angry voice he said, "That is a plot against me!" 'Mrs. Mathias has two extraordinary photographs of Krishnaji taken in 1934, ones I have never seen and which should be in the biography. She says she has many letters from Krishnaji, which she is thinking of giving to Yale for a "Blanche Mathias Collection."'

One of two photos of Krishnaji taken in 1934 that Mrs. Mathias had and which Mary had never seen

One of two photos of Krishnaji taken in 1934 that Mrs. Mathias had and which Mary had never seen

S: I wonder if she did.

M: I don't know. 'I also told her about our conversation with Judge Kenny, who told us to go to the attorney general and how he eventually said that Rajagopal was to be pursued because of "grave impropriety with regard to a charitable trust" and directed us to commence litigation in which he was co-plaintiff. I told her that Krishnaji was not involved in this, but was brought in when Rajagopal and company countersued and served papers on Krishnaji as he was about to give his first talk in Santa Monica.'

'When we left, there was a tearing gale and rain. Krishnaji was almost swept off his feet. We clung together and managed to go the two blocks back to the Huntington, our umbrella inside out and half-drenched.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Alain came in for tea later and stayed to supper. We talked about homeopathy and astrology. I took him to task, not in front of Krishnaji, for withholding information. He said he had only looked at certain aspects of Krishnaji's chart, which indicated not commencing a project to do with his personal life, such as building a house, etcetera during the second half of this year. By December it would be okay, Alain said. He also said that Krishnaji must've been born at 12:25 a.m., not 12:30.' Oosh. That astrological stuff leaves me nowhere.

S: I know, I know.

M: Saturday the twenty-second of March. 'Krishnaji gave the second talk in the Masonic Hall. Very good, intense, well-shaped, a vivid and splendid one of tremendous vitality. We lunched in the rooms. I cooked. Krishnaji slept all afternoon, and walked around for forty-five minutes in lieu of going out.' We had a nice flat there, with a good kitchen, a sitting room, and two bedrooms with two baths. Very nice.

S: Mm.

M: On the twenty-third, 'Krishnaji gave his third talk in the Masonic Hall on suffering and death. Some hysterical woman named Solange again got backstage afterwards, grabbing his hand and sobbing that she loves him. At the hotel, Naudé, the Simmonses, Kathy Harris, Kishbaugh, and the Lilliefelts came and then we all went to lunch at Señor Pico Restaurant in Ghirardelli Square. Naudé and the Simmonses had not met' [chuckles] 'since the terrible to-do in Gstaad in 1969 when Alain left. No surface scars remain. Came back and Krishnaji had practically no rest before he saw Dr. Feldman from Argentina, who is becoming a psychiatrist and might head the Fundación. He is thirty-four and enthusiastic. He has been reading Krishnaji since he was seventeen, but never heard him speak until today. We went for a short walk around the square and came back to watch TV of Mike Wallace interviewing Haldeman. Supper and Kojak. Kissinger says there is failure in the Israel/Egypt negotiations.'

March twenty-fourth. 'Dr. Feldman and the Lilliefelts came to talk to Krishnaji at 11 a.m. The Lilliefelts stayed to lunch with us in the rooms. Later, they, Krishnaji, and I went to tea with Mrs. Mathias. She "now knows" us. I wonder if it has made any difference.'

Editor's Note: Mrs. Mathias, like so many people who had a contact with the Rajagopals, had had her views of "the new people" (i.e., Mary, the Lilliefelts, Alain Naudé, etcetera) shaped by a public relations onslaught from the Rajagopals. The unpleasantness from this continued long after the lawsuits were settled.

Mary seems to have won over Mrs. Mathias, which she usually did, as evidenced by Mrs. Mathias leaving Mary in her will the two photos of Krishnaji taken in 1934 that Mary had never seen but so admired.

Tuesday, March twenty-fifth. At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji saw Narayan's brother, G. Krishnamurti[9], who came here for the talks and is an electrical technician. There is no resemblance to Krishnaji but the thin build and certain delicacy of bone. I went down the hill to cash some checks for Dorothy and Montague's trip to Yosemite, Carmel, and air tickets for LA in a week. When I came back, I made our lunch. A Mrs. Sally Richardson came to see me at 3:15 p.m.; southern, sentimental, nice, well-meaning, and who just lost her husband. She was at Happy Valley and couldn't take Rosalind Rajagopal. She might be helpful in the school when it really gets going. She said she would do anything for Krishnaji, "to be near him. I would be his servant," she said. At 6 p.m., Krishnaji gave the fourth talk, completing this series at the Masonic Hall. It was on meditation, a very fine one. The Solange woman cut up again. Alain Naudé joined us for supper. Krishnaji gave him the Dodge income as he has since he left.[10]

March twenty-sixth 'was a bright, clear day. We packed. Krishnaji went to give Mrs. Mathias one more eye treatment. I walked over to accompany him back as I fret at his crossing streets alone. I made lunch with the remainder of our larder and then Alain Naudé came at 1:15 p.m. and drove us to the airport. Elfriede met us in Los Angeles. The garden is looking lovely. The lawn sections that were replaced look very handsome. New planting, shrubs, and oranges look at home, and Elfriede had planted a row of yellow and orange marigolds as a border. Krishnaji said, "This is a nice house," and was eager both to see the barn owl, who looked down on us owlishly on our arrival, and the garden.' [Chuckles.] 'He seems to like being here, more now than in the past. Talk of selling and moving to Ojai has disappeared for me. We had supper on trays. I have a sore throat, and the beginning of a thorough cold. I suppose this is as good a time as any to have it, but worry about Krishnaji. Erna may have given him hers at lunch, or I may be the villain.'

Friday the twenty-eighth. 'My cold is heavy. I worked at the desk all morning. At lunch time, Erna telephoned that Cohen says he doubts Rajagopal will listen to Christensen about the easements, and he wants a meeting of all of us to discuss the matter. Erna wants Blau to be there. At lunch, Krishnaji said suddenly, "I realize how they deliberately forced me to go to cheap places to try to break my dignity. I had to go to…what are those places when you sit in a car…"' He means drive-ins! [Laughs.] '"…ride on buses, I didn't care. But that is what they tried." Then he said, "It is extraordinary that I feel such an energy. It must be having good food." We went to town at 3 p.m., bought some beautiful houseplants and a hose, and other things. Krishnaji had some more dental work done. Coming home, when we turned up the coast, the mountains were clear against the blue sky and he said, "Look at those mountains. That is god!"'

The twenty-ninth of March. 'Krishnaji, after breakfast, had a pain in his stomach, and vomited a very little, so I put a hot pad on his stomach. He took Nux Vomica and it subsided. He felt well enough for ice cream!—his idea for lunch, but that came up. We spent a quiet day but found the new St. Augustine grass under-watered and so watered it by hand and felt the better for it.'

Sunday the thirtieth is Easter. 'A lovely morning. I ran the sprinklers, then telephoned Filomena in Rome and urged her to come to visit us in Brockwood around May twelfth. She said she would. Krishnaji and I took off in the Mercedes by 10 a.m. for Ojai, Krishnaji driving most of the way. The cottage has had an exterior coat of new paint, not cream, not pink, not white, rather like the magnolia colors at Brockwood. It looks improved. I left things for the Simmonses to use in the office upstairs where they will stay. I have had the sitting room where they will stay and the bath painted white and natural-color curtains made. We went to Arya Vihara where the Lilliefelts, Ruth, and Albion were and where the Lees had a Professor Rush, who is an accredited ecologist and who has listened to Krishnaji and is willing to give advice on building the school. We talked of "patterns" of living, relationships in various kinds of buildings. He said we should study the land for a year before deciding where and how to build. We are always in a hurry.'

'At lunch on the patio, Rush said he has a school of his own for ten to fourteen-year-olds, about forty of them. Krishnaji listened to what he had to say about it, and later spoke to Erna and Theo and me about Rush being someone for our school. "It will work out," said Krishnaji. At 2:30 p.m., we all went to the Oak Grove. Met John Rex, his wife, and his partner, Reibsamen. They presented a tentative plan for various buildings on the land. We walked about and discussed. Krishnaji wanted the large open space in the center left open. They will rethink it and present a new suggestion to us on Wednesday. We drove back to the cottage to leave some things. Mark had Bruce and somebody Meyers leave yesterday because he said they were too occupied with themselves and their own two children, and too messy in their habits. The new iron gate at Arya Vihara is handsome. Rosalind Rajagopal is already objecting, and claims she has an easement. None is recorded. Krishnaji had tea with Erna and Theo. We're waiting for Louis Blau to return on the second before discussing with Cohen the Rajagopal easement "fraud" as Cohen has called it. We now find easements to Rajagopal and his wife all over the west valley land. Krishnaji and I got home after 7 p.m. Krishnaji in the car said, "Why was 'the boy'[11] sensitive to taste? Brahmins aren't. Why did he know about such things?" I said he had obviously had it from the beginning, as in other things, he was not the product of something as others are. He was born with certain faculties, had the greatest taste in everything, save one. "You mean those two?" he asked. I said, [chuckling] "How you would put up with them is beyond comprehension."' [Both chuckle.]

S: Mary, just for posterity and other cultures, explain what easements are.

M: Well, for instance, if I own some land beyond your piece of land, I can get an easement to go through your land to get to my land. A person has to apply for it, to be given the right. And you can have an easement to run a pipe through a land, or run a telephone wire or something. It's a right of way for some useful, necessary purpose, through someone else's land.

S: So, when Rajagopal put these easements…

M: He had easements put on the land that he controlled before he gave it to us.

S: Right. So these easements were to go through the property.

M: Yes. [Chuckles.]

The thirty-first of March, 1975. 'Tree pruners came to do the pepper tree and three stone pines and the coral tree. Krishnaji observed, with great interest and approval, through the windows. It rained faintly in the morning. After lunch we went to Beverly Hills and Krishnaji had his hair cut and Dr. Christensen took a little more off his dental bridge where it made a sore. I went for special lined paper for the notebook. He wants to start writing again. He has been wanting to start but the first notebook was too narrow!' [Laughs.] 'He asked, "Must I write every day?" I replied, "Of course not, just when you feel like it." "But I like to do it in an orderly way," he said. He seemed satisfied with the present new notebook and some lined paper. When we were home, Erna telephoned. Sir Edmond Hillary's[12] wife and daughter were killed in a plane crash near Katmandu and Barbara Lama and her husband Angali were with them in the plane and also killed.' That was, if you remember, Albion Patterson's stepdaughter…

S: Ah, yes.

M: …who was considered to be a director of the school…

S: Yes, yes.

M: …or Albion wanted it to be.

S: Yes.

M: …and she was married to, I think, a Tibetan.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'I told the news to Krishnaji, and he listened. A few moments later, he asked me to repeat it. A little later he said, "One shouldn't die violently, suddenly. It is too much of a shock."'

'"A shock to the one who dies?" I asked.'

'"Yes. It should be willingly, healthily."'

'"Few people die willingly," I said.'

'"I'll talk to you about that another time."'

'He told of the time some years ago when Kitty Shiva Rao was with him on a flight from Delhi to Benares and the plane came into thick fog. Kitty, sitting beside him, got panicky, and Krishnaji took hold of her hand and said, "If we are going to die, we are going to die. Let's do it happily." She calmed down, but pretty soon as the plane lost altitude, she began to get hysterical. Krishnaji spoke to her again and then the pilot got below the fog and was able to land.' There's another…I thought it was in that anecdote, but there's another anecdote with Kitty, too, when he said, "Nothing will happen because you're with me." He always thought that if he was in a plane, it would be safe.'

April first. 'Today Krishnaji began to write again. The first one is in pencil, and he wasn't comfortable at the desk. I have arranged a folding table for him in front of the window. He gave it to me to read and wants me to "correct" it without consulting him. There are only bits of syntax that go wrong because he probably doesn't read what has gone before when he pauses. I doubt he rereads any of it as he goes along or when he is through. It is again in the form of a nature description and then what he has to say about something. Today on space and division.'

It's true, you know. He was so turned toward the present that he didn't reread something he'd written.

S: Yes. Even in the middle of writing it.

M: Exactly. It was strange. It's hard to imagine.

S: Mm, hm.

M: And he didn't like to hear about it afterward. Often, after he'd written something or dictated, I would have to ask him something, and he never wanted to hear it. He'd say, "Oh, do whatever you want," or "fix it" or something, but I'd persevere because I wanted it to be just what he intended, and if I did that, he would want to change it completely.

S: Yes, I know. I had that experience with him as well.

M: Yes, he would say, "There's no sense reading it to me because I'll change it." [S chuckles.] It's silly to compare, but if I write a letter and have to rewrite it for some reason, I have to begin all over again. I just don't want to amend what I wrote.

S: Well, I know one's never satisfied with what one has done, but Krishnaji was just more so.

M: Yes, he would come to the thing anew! [S chuckles.] But it's not surprising when you imagine how his mind worked.

S: Of course, of course.

M: And of course, the Notebook and all that, as Mary said, it's without erasures. It's just written.

So, we're still on April first. 'I got up early this morning, around 5 a.m. and put replies to seventeen letters on the dictating machine. I took them to the secretarial service to be typed, marketed, and got back in time to put together pasta baked in tomato sauce, cheese, etc. Evelyne Blau came to lunch. I tried to nap after lunch but the telephone interrupted. So, I pruned the bushes in the tubs, hosed the terrace, and finished at 6:50 p.m.—a full day. The TV news is anguish. The suffering of the refugees in Vietnam. Krishnaji stopped me from watching as I wept so much the other night.'

April second. 'Krishnaji wrote again, this time in ink. "The skill of intelligence is to put knowledge in its right place." Intelligence "comes out of the understanding of the whole consciousness of man; yourself." And "freedom from the known every minute is the essence of intelligence." He did this before a meeting at 11 a.m., and later said he wanted to keep on. I cooked beans and rice. Architects Reibsamen and Nichols came with the new placing of the buildings on the plot plan. It is well done. Erna and Theo were there; Ruth and Albion, Kishbaugh, Mark Lee, Evelyne Blau, and Professor Rush. Krishnaji took the latter aside and, after the architects had left, he asked Rush if he would like to join in creating the school. We only met this man on Sunday!' [S chuckles.] 'But there is something about him that leads one to think of him for the school. He seems to really want the thing that we do, and is willing to go right at that. He has a certain maturity and yet is quite young. There will have to be much talk, but Krishnaji has seized the situation. We had a buffet lunch. I left at 2 p.m. for town and errands, then to the airport to meet Dorothy and Montague, and bring them back to stay here till Sunday. After getting home, Erna telephoned and read a letter of Christensen to Cohen about my letter saying that Krishnaji and some of us wish to see the archives. The response was "yes" to seeing the books and manuscripts, but the letters and archive material are not yet in order, he said.' That was Christensen.

The third of April. 'Krishnaji said, "Something has been happening since that day in San Francisco. The head is almost to the point of bursting. It's full. All last night it went on and the night before. There is tremendous attention inside the head, a physical feeling. It's going on now." He had a far-off look on his face. Then he said, "All energy is concentrated there inside, in the eyes and head." Krishnaji stayed in bed all morning and read a book about whales and dolphins after he had written his number three notebook piece. He got up for lunch with the Simmonses. We listened to a recording of the humpback whales. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked around the lawn. I watered the new turf.'

April fourth. 'Krishnaji wrote in the morning. Dorothy and I went to the Dunnes' in the afternoon.'

The next day. 'Surprisingly, it rained. We took Dorothy and Montague to Ojai. Krishnaji driving partway, first to the apartment they will use above the office, and then to Erna and Theo's to lunch. Erna telephoned Rajagopal to confirm the appointment to see the archives Wednesday. Rajagopal had replied to my letter saying Krishnaji wished to see the archive by having Christensen write to Cohen: "As Mrs. Zimbalist is represented by council…"' [M laughs.] You see, the suit was in my name, and Krishnaji wasn't one of the plaintiffs.

S: Mm, hm.

M: …so he could correctly say the letter from me should go through council. [Both chuckle.] 'Rajagopal was unable to speak immediately and had to call back…after fixing up a tape recorder? We inevitably wonder. He wanted to know who was coming. Erna said she hadn't asked Krishnaji exactly but he and I and probably herself. Afterward, we speculated about Rajagopal setting up to try to upset Krishnaji before his talks. I suggested he go after the talks, and only Erna and I and possibly Theo go on Wednesday. Krishnaji is to decide later. Came home in time for supper.'

S: Okay, so let's end there because we're running out of tape.

M: Okay, so we end on the fourth of April.

Issue 35: April 6, 1975 to June 3, 1975

In this issue, the first volume of Mary Lutyens' biography of Krishnaji finally comes into print. Krishnaji only dips into it, reading small sections; but it raises a question in Krishnaji's mind that remained with him for many years; why was "the boy" (meaning himself) not conditioned, even by the very deliberate and heavy-handed attempts to condition him by the theosophists? Krishnaji frequently said that if an answer to this question could be found, then the schools he founded might be better able to accomplish their mission of helping the students be unconditioned.

Krishnaji's answers to Mary's questions about his mysterious childhood only deepen the mystery.

Mary: So, we are starting on the sixth of April, 1975. I know you're finicky, so I'll read it although there is nothing. 'It rained!' [M chuckles, then S chuckles.] 'Krishnaji wrote in the morning, and in the afternoon we washed the car.' Big day.

April seventh. 'We packed in the morning, had an early lunch, and left for Ojai at 1:45 p.m. in the Green Beauty, with luggage, etcetera. Krishnaji drove as far as Dieter's[1] in Oxnard, where we picked up a brochure on a Volvo. The latest notion is for us to get a station wagon to replace the Jaguar. We met at the Oak Grove[2] with the architects, Reibsamen and Nichols, as well as the Lilliefelts, the Simmonses, the Lees, Ruth, Albion, Alan Kishbaugh, Evelyne Blau, and her daughter Eloise and grandson Aaron, and also Professor Rush. Krishnaji spoke apart to Professor Rush, who hadn't understood Krishnaji's proposal to join us in creating the school, and is committed to his present setup for at least two years. The architects showed a revised plot plan. It was an arctic cold day. Krishnaji and I moved into Pine Cottage, and I made our supper. The Simmonses are in the office upstairs flat. Krishnaji again wanted me nearby, and so I used the sofa in the sitting room.'

April eighth. 'This is another cold day with rain, this time in Ojai. After breakfast, I went with Erna and Theo to see Cohen about legal matters on the easements that Rajagopal gave himself and the Vigevenos in 1974 over the land by his house. These easements would stay in effect indefinitely and prevent use of the land. Cohen and we do not want, as we could, to reopen the case on the basis of fraud, but will first put it to Tapper as this is a dissipation of charitable assets to private persons, and is self-serving. No one has confidence in Tapper's bestirring himself, but we must start with that. If there's no result, we can start a separate motion to right an illegality. Cohen agreed it is good that we should exercise our rights under the settlement about the archives tomorrow, and keep records of any non-compliance by Rajagopal. Erna is far better informed on our case than Cohen' [laughter]. 'Cohen was too quick to defend a fellow lawyer, Christensen, when I said that Christensen's assurance to Cohen that his client wouldn't transfer any KWINC assets during negotiations meant nothing.' [Chuckles.] 'Cohen said Christensen didn't have "client control."' That's what Christensen said. 'Christensen must have known he didn't have control of Rajagopal and hence should not have made such assurance. I got back in time to go with Krishnaji to Arya Vihara, where we lunched with the Lees and the Simmonses. I marketed later, and met Krishnaji on Grand Avenue; he had walked two-and-a-half miles. He wants to go tomorrow to the archives. This morning he wrote again in his notebook.'

The ninth of April, 'Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to the K&R office to see the archives. Rajagopal met us. We sat at a table in a greenish office, empty as a prison. Krishnaji was sitting behind and slightly apart, not looking at Rajagopal after the initial greeting, Indian fashion.' That means the Namaste.

S: Mm, hm. Yes.

M: 'Rajagopal looked more than ever like an angry simian with the glare of disturbed, dark-ringed eyes. He talked resentfully for forty minutes: Why did we want to see certain things? "The case is over." He interpreted the settlement as being over and past, but he had been held up to vilification all over the world. He was friendly, but we were not. I had refused to talk to him on the telephone. He couldn't say when the archives would be ready. He was very busy. Why did we "want to see discussions edited by Mima Porter?"' These were things that Krishnaji had specifically asked for.

S: I see.

M: 'He said there were no manuscripts left over from the *Commentaries[3]. He said the archives are all turned over to the K&R Foundation. He also said there are no other manuscripts. Rajagopal claimed that large shipments of archive material were shipped from Holland by Folkersma at the start of the war and was lost, that Jinarajadasa[4] had agreed to send him letters, etcetera, that were in the Theosophical Society, but never did. He wanted the rights to go into our archives since we wanted to go into his. He went on and mentioned the Indian case still pending[5]. Neither Erna nor I said the obvious, as the purpose of all this seemed to be to talk endlessly and show us nothing. He kept making references to Krishnaji, who spoke not a word until Rajagopal said he had once had friendly relations with Krishnaji "but he now won't speak."'

'Then Krishnaji stood up, looking very tall and rather tense and aloof and said, "I will speak. If you want that friendship, you will resign from everything and do penance. That is all I have to say." He then crossed the room and went out the door. Somehow, everyone was standing. Erna, Theo, and I stayed.'

'"What did he mean?" asked Rajagopal angrily. We said we had heard what Krishnaji had said; we weren't there to explain or interpret; we were there to see the archives. He started to say something like. "It's all off." So, I said, "Are you refusing to show us the archives? We are here for a very simple physical thing—to begin to see the archives."'

'Angrily, reluctantly, hit by what Krishnaji had said, he then opened a couple of file drawers. They were thorough, well-kept files, transcripts of discussions. He seemed to turn to showing things as an escape from Krishnaji's statement, and, as if dealing with a sick person, we showed admiration for the way things were kept. We then were led into a back room of book stacks from all over the world in various languages. We asked for what Krishnaji had requested, namely, Mrs. Besant's letters to Krishnaji as a boy, and he even offered to photocopy them for us. Then, albums of Krishnaji, tiny, wonderful pictures of Krishnaji and Nitya as they were when they were found. Rajagopal denies having letters between Mrs. Besant and Leadbeater about Krishnaji as a boy.'

'Erna, during this, was laying the basis for future visits. Earlier, Rajagopal claimed archive material was given to him personally, which may result in much being in his own vault. He claimed today that all archives are in K&R office.'

'We left and met Krishnaji down the road. He had been in the Grove. His first comments were that Rajagopal is a sick personality. Theo felt sorry for him, and later, at lunch, said that he wanted to go back and see him, and point out what resigning would do. Krishnaji enlarged to me that Rajagopal's resignation would be the penance. Theo rang a number of times, got only the busy signal, and finally got Rajagopal and went to see him. Theo got only a diatribe and left. Krishnaji now wants Erna to tell Rajagopal that he, Krishnaji, wishes to come to see certain things without Rajagopal being there.'

'In the afternoon, Krishnaji did a videotaped interview on the school plans and education for a local station. Dorothy came with us on a three-mile walk.'

S: And that was a videotaped discussion?

M: Yes, interview on the school plans and education for a local station.

S: Was that with Fred Hall by any chance?

M: It might have been. I would think so. He was a nice man.

'Mark Lee said that Rosalind had telephoned and when asked about the rugs that Krishnaji says should be in Arya Vihara, as they were given to him, she said they had been stolen and she was sorry that Krishnaji thinks she is a thief.' What a family. 'She said they were stolen from Arya Vihara. Theo says the reporting of the theft in the newspapers gave the place as upper-Ojai, which would mean she took them with her when she moved.' [Chuckles.]

The tenth of April. 'Krishnaji called a meeting about the announcements of the school to the public, and about the announcements of it at the upcoming public talks. He, Erna and Theo, Ruth, Albion, and Mark, and both Simmonses came to the cottage. Erna had walked over the land with Cohen and Ashton, a surveyor, to look at easements. Cohen says there is no basis for them. Krishnaji talked about the center, what it is or will be. It doesn't exist now, as Patterson claimed when he and Ruth discussed it as being in their own homes with various people. I brought up the matter of Verna Krueger[6], who Mark asked to join the Ojai school, to Dorothy's distress, swiping her from Brockwood to another school. Krishnaji also alluded to David Bohm, whom, it is said, Albion wants to live over here. Later we walked down McAndrew Road and back.'

April eleven. 'Another snide letter came to Krishnaji from James Vigeveno. Krishnaji wants it answered, and I drafted a reply, though I'm not sure it is worth replying to those despicable people. Krishnaji also wants Erna to telephone Rajagopal that Krishnaji wishes to see the archives without Rajagopal being there. He doesn't want to even see or speak to Rajagopal. Erna wants to delay the call until after this weekend's talks.'

'Reg and Mavis Bennett arrived from Australia. They are nice as ever. Reg had a coronary eighteen months ago. Such kindly people they are.'

The twelfth of April. 'The weather changed, a cloudless sky, warm sun, but still a frosting of snow on Topa Topa. In the Green Beauty, we drove to the Oak Grove, where at 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave his first talk there since the autumn of 1966. Many people, many children, many dogs, but it seemed well arranged, and Mr. Nichols, the architect, had brought drawings to put on an easel; a very handsome rendition of the plot planned for the school. Mark Lee made the announcement about it. Casselberry was there, but none of the other mafia. Krishnaji walked down the road a little after the talk, until I caught up with him in the car. He said he liked talking in the Grove, but had no familiar feeling about it. We had lunch in the cottage. He has agreed with Erna and me to ignore the Vigeveno letter, not dignifying it. Later we walked down Grand Avenue, saw the Lilliefelts, and walked with them to see Monica Phillips at Ruth's.' Monica Phillips was Ruth Tettemer's sister.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'We came back to the Lilliefelts' while Erna telephoned Rajagopal to say Krishnaji wanted to come to see the archives. We saw the Besant letters, photographs, and also Pupul Jayakar's account of what happened to Krishnaji around 1947 and 1948 in Ootacamund[7]. This is something she wrote as a report for Rajagopal, and he made her not keep a copy. At first he said he didn't have that, and then, well, he couldn't remember; then he said that Tuesday was not convenient for him, and he hung up.'

'Erna rang back and said, "We must have been cut off," and that it wasn't necessary for him to be there. He got very angry, and said it was a personal thing with him—he had to be there.'

'"Supervision is not required," said Erna.'

'"I will be the judge of that," said Rajagopal. "You must write and give me the time, and I will think about it."'

'Erna said, "We are giving you notice now."'

'Rajagopal replied, "You can't come Tuesday."'

‘Erna: “You are refusing?”’

‘Rajagopal: “You can bring a sheriff and break down the door.” And then he hung up.’

‘So Monday we get Cohen to act legally. Unless we exercise the settlement rights, we are setting a precedent and giving in to the demented, scoundrel behavior of Rajagopal. Blackburn says, “They”—meaning the Vigevenos, etcetera—“are more antagonistic than ever.”’

Sunday, the thirteenth of April. ‘A fog and overcast sky again. Krishnaji gave a magnificent and powerful talk in the Grove, number two. Among others, he spoke of the difference between reality and truth. Reality is of the mind and thought; truth cannot be touched by either. I sat closer, away from children and dogs, and listened only. Krishnaji came back to the car, saying, “That talk exhausted me,” as well it might. Later, joking, he said that in the old days they would’ve said, “The Lord spoke today.” Krishnaji had said he wanted to eat on the hill where Hooker, at Krishnaji’s request, was putting on an inexpensive vegetarian lunch for people who had attended the talk. He sat a long time in the car before we walked over there. It was cold and windy. We sat at a table with the Simmonses, Kishbaugh, and Theo. But when I moved over to the adjoining table with the Blau family and Erna, three perfectly strange, staring young people, uninvited, sat down at Krishnaji’s table. No sense of intrusion, politeness, nothing. Just themselves. Krishnaji had a longish nap at 4:30 p.m. He saw the two Siddoos, Sarjit and Jackie, and the latter brought me from Tapas seven copies of Ananda—the Indian version of the Star Bulletin, of 1929; also a pair of gray silk trousers copied in India at Krishnaji’s orders from a pair of Courrèges trousers. The Siddoos are planning to open their school in Vancouver, on Vancouver Island, in the autumn of ’76. Krishnaji and I walked to Erna and Theo’s for tea. Erna sent to Rajagopal a letter via Casselberry, saying we are coming Tuesday to see the archives and do not want “supervision.” We discussed what to do if he refuses or tries to harass Krishnaji.’

The fourteenth of April. ‘Gray skies and drippy rain. Krishnaji rested in the morning. He then gave a taped interview to Donald Ingram Smith for Australia Broadcasting. Mr. and Mrs. Kornfeld saw Krishnaji afterward, and while waiting, talked to me about Krishnaji films. Mark played five of the Krishnaji and Anderson dialogues on videotape, and the Kornfelds were among those who watched. I left before the end because Krishnaji said this morning that it was perhaps healthier to eat supper at 6 p.m. instead of 7 p.m. We made it by 6:30 p.m. At supper he asked about the Ananda magazine that Tapas had sent. I read him part of an article by E. A. Wodehouse withering Arundale for carrying on ceremonies in Benares in 1928 when Mrs. Besant asked Krishnaji to preside at a TS congress in her absence, and out of politeness to Krishnaji and his views decreed there should be no ceremonies. Krishnaji remembered it vaguely and smiled. He said E. A. Wodehouse wrote very well, but gradually died of laziness.’ [Both laugh.] ‘He looked at the magazines. “We were all very young then.” He said some of all this should be put together in a book. There is a chapter on the Hindu version of the Lord Maitreya in their sacred books. I read it to Krishnaji. Maitreya foretold by Gautama, it said, did not become a Buddha himself, but refused it until humanity is rescued, hence he returns to human life.' That's why the Maitreya returns.

'I asked Krishnaji, "Will you become a Buddha?"'

'"You mustn't ask that," he said. "It doesn't work that way. These people made it all into a hierarchical affair."'

'I spoke to Erna. Cohen says we must enforce our right to the archives and not compromise it.'

Tuesday, the fifteenth. Here comes the fateful day. 'Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to the K&R office at 11 a.m. Rajagopal was there with Austin Bee, who was seated at a desk and never rose or gave more than a glance. We went into the back office. The safe was open and the things we had asked to see were there. Rajagopal stood there, and Erna said we wished to look at things in private. He bristled. "This is my office," but finally went out, refusing to close the door. He said he probably didn't have to mention it, but things couldn't be taken out. Erna and I just looked at him, and he went away. Krishnaji felt pain in the stomach from the violence of Rajagopal. I got him to sit down and went through the photo albums with the pictures in 1913 and '14 in Taormina, and Cornwall, and one early one in 1909. There were many more which Krishnaji looked at, but Erna handed me to read the five-page account, handwritten by Pupul Jayakar of events in June 1948 in Ootacamund when Krishnaji was "off," in great pain, spoke of "they have burnt me so there can be more emptiness. They want to see how much of him can come."' I don't know what that means.

S: Are these quotes?

M: It's quotes from the account, Pupul's account.

S: Yes. Did we get that account?

M: Yes. But what developed was, when I eventually got it photocopied and brought it to Pupul, she said but that was just one day; and the "process" went on for eight days. Of course, he'd just given us a sop.

S: Yes.

M: Anyway, then it goes on about 'something to being close to death but not wishing it "as there is so much to be done" and of something happening on the walk (when he was alone) and not being able to remember it, of fearing pieces of him were left on the road, of a great power filling him. Reading it, I felt drained, as happens when there is something deeply moving to do with Krishnaji.' This is me when I read this.

S: Mm, hm.

M: ‘We were to ask Rajagopal for a photocopy, but to be sure of having the text, I read it quietly to Erna, who took it down in shorthand. Krishnaji, by this time, had looked at the many photos and wanted to leave. He did so, and walked down the road while Erna and I gave Rajagopal the list of things we would like copied. There was a back and forth on his copying them, versus our taking them to be copied. He suggested Erna and Byron Casselberry go together to the photocopier, but apparently Rajagopal doesn’t trust Casselberry either, as he prefers to copy them himself. He questioned me on when we were leaving’—that means Krishnaji and I leaving—‘and was Erna going then, too? We left. Being firm was the effective move today. We came back to the cottage for lunch. Krishnaji asked how those people’s minds possibly worked. Bee, for instance, with his rudeness. Bee is a thorough Theosophist, the Lilliefelts say.’ He just sat there. He never got up or spoke, but just gave a surly glance at Krishnaji and the rest of us.

‘At 3:30 p.m. there was a meeting on the school; Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, Ruth, Albion, the Lees, the Simmonses, and the Siddoos. Krishnaji went into the relation with parents, the participation of trustees, etcetera. It lasted till after 6 p.m. His stomach was still hurting from the morning. I made a very simple soup, and it felt better. At Arya Vihara I saw the TV interview that Krishnaji gave the other day for the local broadcast.’

S: Just before you go on, did we ever get the rest of the pages of Pupul’s account?

M: No. There is the Rajagopal Historical Collection, as it came to be known.

S: At the Huntington?

M: No, it’s not, at least it wasn’t when we last went there.

S: So who would have it?

M: Well, it’s whatever he’s done with all that stuff. Maybe it’s in Huntington by now. I don’t know. You see, he didn’t leave a will, and we don’t know what happened to things that were in his vault.

S: It would all go to his second wife, Annalisa, no?

M: But Annalisa died, so presumably it’s with Rajagopal’s daughter, Radha, but I don’t know. We haven’t any way of finding out, and Pupul, unfortunately, didn’t keep a copy.

The sixteenth. ‘The weather had cleared in time for Krishnaji’s 11 o’clock public discussion on education. It was cold in the Grove. Krishnaji wore a heavy cardigan, and I was glad of my brown coat and gloves. People were not asking questions to the point; voicing their own theories. Krishnaji, as always, drew it into a whole. He wanted to sit quietly in the car and have me do marketing, so we had a fairly late lunch in the cottage. Dorothy came by and joined us for fruit. Krishnaji slept deeply for an hour. I napped, too, and then we took a long walk with Erna and Theo around Grand, McNell, Thacher Roads. At supper, Krishnaji looked back at the years here. He said he could’ve been killed or injured on his long climbs in the mountains, and they didn't think of it or care. He said he used to like to drive around Santa Paula, Ventura, and back, fifty miles. He said he used to go alone to places like Cleveland, Toledo, and Seattle to talk. Somebody must've bought the ticket, but then he went on his own. He said maybe Jadu was there.' Do you remember Jadu? Jadu was a nice man.

S: Mm.

M: Unfortunately he died, and he was in the U.S. and was with Krishnaji…

S: Yes.

M: …and then he suddenly died, which was a great sadness.

S: Yes.

M: 'Krishnaji told of staying with the Theosophists in New Zealand, who washed all the dishes in the pan and didn't rinse them. This so appalled Krishnaji, he told them he was good at washing up and asked if he could do it?' [S chuckles.] '"If you want," they said. "So I got two pans. They were nice people and caught on."'

Thursday, the seventeenth. 'Another cold day. Krishnaji wrote in his notebook. I typed. We lunched at Arya Vihara with the Lees, the Bennetts, the Simmonses, Ursula…' something '… a difficult name…' it says here. 'She is a woman who worked in the World Bank in Delhi, and may work in our office here. There was a trustees meeting at 3 p.m. There was a decision to go ahead with one building on the Oak Grove land without waiting for the donation drive. Krishnaji wants to get it going there, and wants to redo this cottage here. I have agreed to do it. He speaks of staying in California through May next year. We walked with Erna, Theo, and Alan Kishbaugh down Grand Avenue, and it was after 7 p.m. when we got back.'

The eighteenth of April. 'Warmer with sunshine. A letter came from Nelly Digby, which says that Mrs. Bindley, alone in her house, fell on the stairs, broke her femur and was discovered only the next morning lying at the foot of the stairs. She was taken to the hospital.' Poor lady. 'Krishnaji rested all morning. I went to fetch our air tickets. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw the Blackburns with their annual complaints. Then we went for a walk down McAndrew Road, and came up again for an early supper. We talked of how to redo this cottage, make two bedrooms, two baths, and keep the front sitting room where Krishnaji is now writing and said is a good place for that. On the north side, we could make a good living room and kitchen, also a guest toilet and a very small office where I can type and keep papers. Early to bed and early to sofa.' [Both chuckle and M explains:] That was my bed.

Saturday, the nineteenth of April. 'A lovely day, driving through the valley to the Oak Grove, the beauty of the morning, of the earth and all its faces, of all other mornings, and driving with Krishnaji was an inner radiance. It is a spring morning in Ojai, Malibu,

Hampshire, France, and Switzerland, and the shine of beauty is everywhere. Krishnaji's third talk in the Grove was on time, suffering, and death, and I felt emptied of everything by it. That curious, drained feeling that leaves me somewhere else or perhaps without a me at all. There were many people and those immediately around him appeared hypnotized. We sat in the car about ten minutes before Krishnaji felt like moving. Alan Kishbaugh had lunch with us and sat and talked with me afterward. He was born in 1938. He told Krishnaji how the Gurdjieff group in New York is run. He was part of it for a few years in the early '60s. I had about a five-minute rest and then Krishnaji, who had had a nap, came in, and it was walk time. We stopped for the Lilliefelts and went around the block. All kinds of people are coming forward to help with the school. Mark is deluged with people responding to the appeal. The architects have given us approximate figures; to shoot for $3 million would do nicely as a beginning.' [M and S chuckle.]

Sunday, the twentieth of April. 'A beautiful morning, cloudless, the smell of orange blossoms, the warmth of beginning. Krishnaji gave his fourth talk in the Grove on the religious life: "You must be nothing." Something opens in me to this; it is like the resonance of a bell of truth, the sound empties me—to be psychologically nothing. He stood for a while by the car, Alan Kishbaugh standing guard and walking him through the crowd. Blackburn distinguished himself. He sits behind Krishnaji, supposedly seeing to the PA system, but as we have a professional, he does nothing. Krishnaji doesn't want him there, and says he is getting delusions that he should be talking. So, he was asked at Krishnaji's suggestion by Theo to help keep people away from the area behind Krishnaji. He refused. He complains incessantly of wanting to help and being given nothing, so he was asked to do something, and refuses. Most of us feel he shouldn't be asked to do anything.'

'We had lunch alone. Krishnaji rested a little and saw Olaf Campbell and his son Eric, who has leukemia. Krishnaji had me give him the name of the enzyme clinic in Bonn. Krishnaji also saw Hank and Jean Bassion, a young couple who wrote a nice letter. There was a tea party at Arya Vihara, and Krishnaji came. Later, we went for a walk, but only a hundred yards down the hill; he said the body is tired, so we came back. After supper, he went over to Arya Vihara in his dressing gown to say goodbye to Mavis and Reg Bennett, who return tomorrow to Australia. Dorothy and Montague came in to the cottage on their way back to next door.'

April twenty-first. 'Packed. Put the cottage in order. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to the K&R office at 11 a.m. Krishnaji remained in the car. Erna, Theo, and I went in as Rajagopal opened the door. Austin Bee was at the typewriter and looked up, and this time I made him reply by saying "Good morning, Mr. Bee." Erna did the same, so he muttered a good morning without rising.'

'Rajagopal said, "Isn't Krishnaji with you?"'

'I said that Krishnaji would remain in the car and would like to see the manuscript of the Commentaries there.'

‘“I haven’t got them. I think they were destroyed,” said Rajagopal. We stared at him in shock.’

‘I asked, did he mean that he had destroyed Krishnaji’s original manuscripts written in his own hand?’

‘He said it had been published, and that was their custom, and he wasn’t sure what had happened.’

‘I said that he kept very orderly records, how could he not be sure what had happened to such an important archive?’

‘He didn’t wish to answer questions. He said that he hadn’t come to answer questions. We had come without friendly spirits and all sorts of interpretations of the agreement. The court would have to settle it, or we could bring the sheriff. There were things that had to be settled about Harper & Row, a reference to their putting KFA as the party to be written to in the new edition of a KWINC book. He implied that Krishnaji had broken the agreement in telling him to resign.’

‘I said that we had shown considerable politeness and forbearance in the face of his tirades which he offered instead of our seeing anything. The word forbearance registered.’

‘We said that he had repeatedly jibed at Krishnaji for not speaking to him, and that finally when he did it again, Krishnaji had said “I will speak” and said that if Rajagopal really wanted to be in their old state of friendship he must resign from everything and do penance. I said that Krishnaji now wished me to tell him that until he renounces everything and establishes a relationship with Krishnaji that is not based only on the legal settlement, that Krishnaji didn’t wish to see him and that, if he had anything to say to Krishnaji, to write to him directly and not through other people “like Mr. Vigeveno.”’

‘By this time Rajagopal was so angry that I couldn’t tell what he took in. He started to say “This is my house.”’

‘“House?” said Erna.’

‘“Office,” he caught himself.’

‘We said it is the K&R office, and under the agreement, we have a right to come here to see archives.’

‘He implied we have seen the archives. He decides what are archived material.’

‘Erna said that we had not seen so far one thing in Krishnaji’s handwriting. Where were the other manuscripts?’

‘He said, “You have the manuscripts.” He means the so-called Scaravelli manuscript.’ That’s the Notebook.

‘We asked, did that mean he had nothing else?’

‘He said he would say nothing more and wouldn’t answer questions.’

I said he was both refusing to show us things or to answer questions. Erna turned to Bee and said, “You’re a trustee. Do you concur in this?”’

‘Bee said, “Whatever Mr. Rajogopal says, I agree to.”’

‘Erna: “And the other trustees?”’

‘Bee: “They agree with Mr. Rajagopal.”’

‘Rajagopal had transcripts of the Commentaries, typewritten which, of course, are not an authentic archive source. He also had photocopies of Mrs. Besant’s letters to Krishnaji, 1915 to 1930, Pupul’s report of 1948 and reports of Krishnaji, Nitya, and A.P. Warrington, August seventeen to twenty-one in 1922. Further, he wanted signed acknowledgements from Erna and Krishnaji. We refused for Krishnaji, but Erna signed. He said his lawyer had told him to make these available and he was doing so as a favor to Krishnaji. We took these and said we should leave, he would not speak further to us. Somehow, in it all, I said that we had no wish to discuss anything with him and had wished to see various things without his supervision. On this, he said angrily that he would not allow it. We left in a blast of his anger and semi-hysteria. His rages have the uncontrol of weakness, a tantrum quality. We were in there probably no more than fifteen minutes. There was probably more, but as I write this in the evening, I cannot think of it now.’

‘We found Krishnaji down the hill a ways, and went back to the cottage to try collectively to remember all that was said. Erna made notes. We telephoned Cohen, and told him what had happened. He wants to go with a photocopy machine and copy everything, but that would be endless and not include things we want. What is required is that he account for missing things and produce them. This business of his deciding what constitute archives is untenable. Cohen will begin by telephoning Christensen.’

‘Dorothy and Montague left for Los Angeles and a flight to London. We lunched at Arya Vihara with the Lees, Ruth, and Albion Patterson. We had packed the car and drove to Dieter’s place, where we tried out a Volvo station wagon and didn’t like it. Krishnaji talked at length to Dieter apart from me and came back to me saying I should get a diesel Mercedes. Another Mercedes!’ [Both chuckle.] ‘I am tired of car preoccupations. All that is needed is an economical small car that can carry things the Green Beauty won’t hold. But Krishnaji is sold on Mercedes excellence and of it being unsafe for him or me to go about in too small a car. We put off further talk about cars.’

‘He took the wheel on the coast road to Malibu. Driving, he asked me if I was too tired for a question. I said I was tired only of the car subject.’ [M chuckles; S laughs.] ‘He then asked me if anything had happened to me in these two weeks, was I changed in some way? I asked what he meant. What was he asking about? And I went over various things in these two weeks from my point of view. First, that the Rajagopal thing, though unpleasant’—and in parentheses I have that Krishnaji apologizes for my being subjected to it—‘didn’t really bother me. He said, “I could see something must have happened when you came out of Rajagopal’s, but you hadn’t reacted.” The Blackburn inimical behavior wasn’t worth talking about to me.’ That’s why he hadn’t mentioned it. Another parenthesis saying that there had been a discussion of it at lunch. ‘But the talks had an extra stretch of something in the Grove, something about it seems to open one to his words, and I felt that. The school seems to be rising, and things are beginning to happen. Staying in the cottage, I had liked, and explained that I react to a place, to beauty and character, more than to the people around. He listened to all this, but said he felt that there was more, something had happened to him. “I haven’t been tired,” an added vitality, and he felt something I was perhaps not aware of, was happening to me. Nothing was to my mind, but I said that what had meant most to me in his talks was his speaking of nothingness. “That is it,” he said. “Now we won’t talk about it for the moment,” but he went on that we must make a change, have more leisure, we must do it at Brockwood. We will take a picnic and go off, have leisure and quiet. I do feel a curious emptiness that I feel I must not examine now; let it be. It is something good. So, we came home to Malibu. The grass has taken root, and the flowers are bright. It looks lovely. This is a very dear house. The ocean murmurs.’

April twenty-second. ‘Krishnaji rested. He was reading the book on whales and their enormous brains’ [M chuckles], ‘and the fact that until man, they were menaced by nothing, which Krishnaji said made him “see something.” He called me in and asked me to remember to have him tell the others at tomorrow’s meeting that “the school must provide complete security to the students, a vast protection in depth.” Then he added, “That is what they did with me until those monsters came along.”’ Meaning the Rajagopals.

S: Yes, yes.

M: ‘There is a letter from Anneke in which she encloses a copy of one she sent to Rosalind Rajagopal. It is full of friendship and warmth to Rosalind but also puts a few truths home. Krishnaji thought it good, though, he said, Anneke doesn’t realize it will be ignored. To me, though I understand Anneke’s fondness for the past and her wish to find good in old friends, all that is washed away by the evil that this pair has done to Krishnaji. So, we came to what affection is: I saying that though I do not hate, or wish ill to them, there could never be a question of affection. I would be hypocritical to say otherwise. So, we got out the Oxford dictionary and looked up affection. In the end, he said, “what he meant was compassion,” and with that I could go along.’

‘I went to see Amanda and Phil for an hour in the afternoon, came back and did three miles on the bicycle and one mile’s walk around the lawn, which means fourteen laps. Krishnaji did twenty.’ [Both chuckle.]

April twenty-third. ‘To town on errands. Back by 2 p.m. At 3 p.m., Ruth, Albion, Kishbaugh, the Lees, and Professor Rush came to talk with Krishnaji about the school. I taped it on a Uher cassette player. Erna and Theo couldn’t come. Theo has hurt his eye in the garden.’

The twenty-fourth of April. ‘Desk, etcetera. Sidney Field came to see Krishnaji in the afternoon. The gossip is that Rajagopal is saying in Ojai that he offered the present settlement to Krishnaji five years ago, that he could’ve ruined Krishnaji, but he didn’t want to, etcetera.’

April twenty-fifth. ‘Began packing. Erna and Theo came to lunch, and we discussed the making of a resume of the case. First by fact, then by event as a record. Rajagopal is already spreading falsehoods, and we should have the factual record. Albion, Ruth, Mark, and Charles Rush, and Alan came. We discussed “patterns of architecture” for the school. Then John Rex, Reibsamen, and Nichols came and asked us their questions about the school buildings. Krishnaji had the idea that there should be no classroom building, but that each house should have an extra room for study. They showed us a sample of bricks, and Krishnaji liked a beige one. They all left after 6 p.m. The Dunnes gave a donation to the Foundation.’

The twenty-sixth of April. ‘Packing, packing. Such a beautiful day. Betsy[8] came to see me while Krishnaji was asleep. She and I went to the Dunnes’.’

April twenty-seventh. ‘A beautiful morning in Malibu. We finished packing, and satisfyingly, two bags less this year. Krishnaji drove with Alan Kishbaugh and I with Amanda to the airport. Krishnaji and I flew at noon on TWA to New York. My brother had arranged a car to meet us, and put the makings of supper and breakfast in the Ritz Tower apartment.’

The twenty-eighth of April. ‘I spoke to my family at the Vineyard. My brother lent us his car and engaged a chauffeur to drive us to see Dr. Wolf in White Plains. The usual blood and other tests for both of us. We came back to my brother’s apartment; Lindsey, his son, met us at the door.’ He was a little boy then.

‘Krishnaji, my brother, Lisa, and I had lunch at the Lafayette restaurant. We talked of the Cooper-Hewitt museum where Lisa works, and of our intended school. Lisa suggested to try to get Mobile Oil to fund a public broadcast of Krishnaji’s, which in turn would generate donations for the school. Krishnaji and I went to see an Antonioni movie, The Passenger.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji and I went to the Carnegie Endowment Institute, where Dr. David Shainberg had assembled about two dozen psychiatrists, psychotherapists, and social workers to meet and talk to Krishnaji. No formal talk, just questions and answers. The questions were mostly on fear. Krishnaji immediately went past theories and specific fears to examine and ask, what is fear itself, its central root? Is thinking the central cause? One questioner said thinking is how we master fear, cope with it. Krishnaji said, "Without understanding the nature of thought, one cannot understand fear." Some of them thought that fear is helpful, i.e., about danger. Krishnaji asked if that was fear, also asked can we be totally free of fear. He said self-preservation in the face of danger is not fear. Someone brought up the fear of the atom bomb. Krishnaji said, what can I do as an individual against a monstrous system, and what is the good of being frightened? What is a human being to do?' We don't want all this, do we, because it's all on the tape?

'After the meeting ended, we taxied back to the apartment and had a room service lunch with some beans I had cooked earlier. I went quickly to the place where my Patek was fixed, fetched it, and had a new crystal put on Krishnaji's. Back in time to walk with him to Caswell-Massey for a few things. Then, to the good barber in the Hotel Lombardy. The best of Krishnaji's haircuts are done there. At 5 p.m., my brother Bud came to see us and discuss business things with me. After he left, Krishnaji and I had supper, and on television watched the final ending of the Vietnam War, as the U.S. completed its evacuation of a circled Saigon. The North has won, and the long, wretched U.S. involvement is over.'

Thirtieth of April. 'Krishnaji slept only fairly well. He had a feeling of "ecstatic energy in my head." He spoke of it in the evening, that he had never had it before, ecstatic energy. He certainly gave outward signs of extraordinary energy in the second session with the psychiatrists and psychotherapists. It was a continuation of yesterday's meeting and again the question came: Can thinking decide when thinking is relevant?' And then again, I have much description of what was said, which we don't need.

May first. 'Krishnaji rested in the morning and I did errands with my brother accompanying me so we could talk. He left me at 1 p.m., and Krishnaji and I had a quiet lunch in the hotel, and then we went out for a little walk and two errands. After the most relaxed day of a departure ever, we left the Ritz Tower at 6:20 p.m., in my brother's car with a driver, and went to the airport and took the 8:45 p.m. Air India flight to London, a very nice plane, attractively done, with excellent service, and a quiet atmosphere. There were vacant seats so each of us could have two and lie down.'

The second of May. 'We landed at 8:45 a.m. in London. Dorothy, Doris, and Ingrid met us and all drove to Brockwood. The school was out front to greet Krishnaji. The completed Assembly Room is very handsome. The lack of tile in the Long Hall and its new floor is a considerable improvement. There's new electric wiring in the West Wing. Dorothy said all was chaos when she arrived and only this morning was everything in place. I unpacked almost all of our bags. Krishnaji went right to bed. I slept ten hours and spoke to Mary L.'

The third of May. 'Finished unpacking, and put things in order. Ted Cartee fixed the garbage disposal unit which had two nails in it! Probably from careless electricians who fixed the pipe carrying the run-off water from the clothes washer, which had been pulled apart, also by the electricians. Water leaked through the ceiling to the lower hall. Krishnaji got up for lunch. Later he, Dorothy, Whisper, and I walked across the fields, through the grove, around by the lane. With a pedometer, it comes to two miles. We discovered that today. Krishnaji now has his supper tray at 6 p.m. A lovely day and a happy sense of being in this beautiful place again.'

The fourth of May. 'Telephoned Filomena in Rome. She's uncertain when she can come here. We walked in the afternoon. In the evening watched Shane on television, Krishnaji's favorite, and it looks as good as ever.' [Chuckles.]

The next day, 'I went over to Morton's garage with a garage man to awaken the gray Mercedes. It looked alright after its winter hibernation. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji spoke to the school in the new Assembly Room. It was used for the first time. It looked and sounded well. Mary Cadogan was there and stayed for lunch. She and I talked all afternoon until it was walk time. Afterward, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I drove the Mercedes to see how it was and to see a field of yellow in West Meon.' That must be the beginning of the rape crop.

S: Yes.

M: 'It looks like thick mustard but is rape. Mark Edwards took photos of Krishnaji and some of the students. In the evening, Krishnaji was delighted to find Kojak on the BBC, and it didn't matter that it was one we had already seen.' [Both chuckle.] 'We sat up till after 10.'

The sixth of May. 'Dr. Parchure was to arrive today, but Dorothy received a telephone call from Balasundaram that his exit permit was not forthcoming. Maybe next week. Krishnaji was sorting clothes for Parchure, and I found him in our kitchen in his toweling bathrobe and the black woolen cap Fosca had crocheted for him, modeled on his fur one. "This is my lifestyle," he said, laughing.' [Both M and S laugh.] 'Later in Dorothy's office he said, "Look. The spirits are after it." Outside the window, the head of a broom was waving back and forth rather eerily in the wind. He laughed as no one else can laugh, all laughter and merriment. We walked at 4:30 p.m. Very windy and cold. Whisper on the rope nearly pulled Krishnaji down in the field. She spotted a dog in the tractor and was all for murder. Krishnaji had supper at 6 p.m. each night.'

Going to the eighth, as there was nothing on the seventh worth recording, but I'll humor you.

S: Thank you [chuckles]. I was about to ask.

M: The seventh of May. 'A quiet day. Did work putting the West Wing in order, and Krishnaji, Whisper, and I walked in the rain.'

The eighth, 'I did errands in Petersfield, and met Mary L. at the train. Krishnaji, she, and I talked before and after lunch about Ojai, and she also went over certain things in Krishnaji's Scaravelli manuscript and the introduction she is writing to it. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked later.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school in the library. It was a good discussion on authority, are we influenced, etcetera. During lunch, Mary and Joe came in on their way to stay the weekend with her sister Barbara Agar, and Mary gave Krishnaji the first and only copy so far of the biography Krishnamurti: The Years of Awakening. On the dust jacket there is part of one of the photos of Krishnaji taken in 1926 in Indian clothing standing in front of the Gobelin tapestries at Castle Eerde. I read the biography all afternoon while Krishnaji slept. Then, he and I went for a walk and talked about the book. He asked if it would really interest people, what they could make of it.'

'I said that the first part, which is all that I have so far read, may bring up the inevitable questions about Theosophy, Masters, etcetera—if the Masters exist, why all those communications reported with them then and nothing since?'

'Krishnaji said, "It is simple. The Lord is here."'

'I said, "You mean those communications were necessary to prepare for that?"'

'Krishnaji replied, "Obviously." And then he added, "I just thought of it [with humor in voice]."' [S chuckles.]

'I asked one of those don't-answer-me-if-it's-a-wrong-question questions, and it was. "Am I being dense or insensitive not to perceive such things, or am I simply not being spoken to?"'

'Krishnaji said, "You're doing what you should, looking after K. There may be no need to communicate. You have been with me how long? You are perhaps used to certain things."'

'I began to tell him of the curiously full reporting by the young Krishnamurti of his "initiation," so unlike his present-day way of describing, so detailed, etcetera. But Dorothy came along the lane and joined us, and we couldn't go on with the conversation. Krishnaji wants me to attend the school meetings, which I never have, because of Dorothy's reluctance—embarrassment, she calls it. But he told her today that I should, and she, of course, accepted it nicely with a bit of humor. Later, I sat up till midnight reading the biography.'

Editor's Note: The reluctance to have Mary in staff meetings seems odd in retrospect, as everything negative the staff had to say about Brockwood certainly came to Mary and Krishnaji, but most of the very good working together and seriousness that was often evident in the staff meetings would have been, at least partly, invisible. Certainly, when Mary did start attending the meetings, it felt right—as if "Krishnaji's eyes and ears" were there, which most of us wanted.

The tenth of May. 'I put the biography on Krishnaji's bed beside the breakfast tray. He said he wasn't going to read it' [chuckle in voice], 'but I thought he might read parts, and so he did, starting with the discovery of the boy. He asked how far I had read in the night, which was up to page 120, and what it seemed to me.'

'I said, so far, the mystery of his becoming what he is, is deepened by the book. Working from Krishnaji's letters to Mary L.'s mother and the latter's diary gives a picture of an entirely immature, partly Victorian child, surrounded by jealous and competing friends, much talk of love that is childish and unreal.'

'Krishnaji said the boy was not conditioned, that he was fed all the TS stories, but that it was superficial, and it went into his head and out. If he were conditioned, he said, he would've gone on in the TS way. I pointed out that many people have changed belief or views, but he said this was different. He was simply empty, moronic, dull. What made him awake? He thinks that slowly, drop by drop, he was awakening, changing. There was no real conditioning there. He was untouched and the very slow maturing was important. "Care of the body was and is important. I have right food and all that. I may live to be 100. We'll celebrate that instead of eighty." (Next Monday is his birthday.)' [Both chuckle.]

'I attended, for the first time, a staff meeting.'

On May eleventh, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school in the Assembly Room. He asked what is the most important question in life? He was critical later of their lack of response. On the walk, he said to Dorothy, "They are dead…It's no use to ask what Brockwood can give to them or they to Brockwood." And in the evening, to me he said, "What is the use of all this? In five years, there is not one student who has understood something."

'This of course is what he has said of the Indian schools. One wonders if the teachings can be understood by those only with a certain capability, a quality of mind and intelligence. Krishnaji thinks Dorothy is too sentimental about the students here. There is an Indian boy here now whom Krishnaji thinks should be sent away, and his parents are simply using this place.'

'I read until midnight and finished the biography, moved to tears by what he went through; the extraordinary fact of his enduring all that early time, the chicanery and pretentiousness of most of those people and coming to be what he is. Or, was it then always dormant, slowly growing like a delicate plant in him, until he was ripe? It was midnight when I finished, and I realized it was almost exactly eighty years since that child was born in the puja room of the small house in Madanapalle. The story, or perhaps Mary's telling of it all, makes it very close, not long ago. Nitya seems someone I know, not then, but now. It's an odd sense of knowing him, as if from very deep in the subconscious. What moves me as I write this is "that boy's," Krishnaji's tremendous optimism, enthusiasm. At eighty now, he shines with it, even more than when he was quite young, but then he has always been and is, more than ever, younger than anyone; young in a radiant way.'

May twelfth. 'At thirty minutes into the morning, Krishnaji reached eighty years of age. He waved aside all greetings, but said, "I think I will live another twenty years, and then you can celebrate." I said I would hold him to that, but who will push my wheelchair to the celebration? He said the body should last because it is looked after, because there is someone who cares, who looks after him, someone who doesn't want something. It rained a bit, and I slept after lunch. Dr. T. K. Parchure arrived from India, his first trip here. A small, bald man with bright ferret eyes' [S chuckles], 'a nice ferret' [M chuckles]. 'Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. The students wanted to but didn't sing "Happy Birthday" to Krishnaji at lunch. Dorothy got singing and cake at supper. It's her birthday, too. I telephoned Mary L. about the book.'

Tuesday, the thirteenth. 'Krishnaji and I took the Petersfield train to London. In our pleasant groove' [chuckles], 'we went right to Huntsman, where everything was pleasantly just the same. Krishnaji disappeared into the fitting room. I read Country Life, then Mr. Lintott brought out patterns[9]—a lightweight tweedish material for a suit and trousers for Krishnaji, and trouser material for me. Mary lunched with us at Fortnum's. We talked all the way through about the book. Krishnaji is reading it in pickings at breakfast. He reads a page here and there. He is pleased about it and showed that he was to Mary. I gave her a copy of the notes Erna Lilliefelt took as I read Pupul Jayakar's account in the K&R archives of the 1948 events at Ootacamund. I also gave her an envelope for Filomena in Rome that Amanda Dunne gave me. Amanda Pallant is going there to spend a week with Vanda. Krishnaji and I went to Hatchard's and then came back on the 4:20 p.m. train.'

The fourteenth of May. 'We had a medical review between Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me of Krishnaji's health matters. In the afternoon, I took Dr. P. to Winchester to get him some warm clothes. Doris, having read the biography, heatedly asked Krishnaji why he had to suffer so. Do we all have to go through that? Krishnaji replied that to come upon something new, to discover, one person had to go through it in order to be able to point it out to others.'

The fifteenth of May. 'Krishnaji talked to the school. I telephoned Filomena about her present of a pretty centrini[10] for Krishnaji's chest of drawers. I told her also of Amanda's envelope. All the Dunnes had joined in smiling photos for her, which Amanda Pallant took to Rome. At 6 p.m., I went for the first time to the school meeting.'

May sixteenth was 'cold and rainy. I dictated letters. Dr. P. examined my leg and my exercise regime and taught me ways of relieving muscle spasms and freeing circulation in the leg, a gentle tapping with fingers and tightening of muscles in the knee cap, pinching a pillow held between my knees.'

The seventeenth of May. ‘More rain and cold, and more deskwork for me. I attended another staff meeting. There were questions by Carol Smith and Joe Zorski[11] about the West Wing and all its space not being used for the school. I replied giving the early history of Brockwood Park and its initial intentions: school, center, and home for Krishnaji. Krishnaji spoke to the school in the afternoon, and did a taped conversation with David Bohm on what is reality and what is truth. Krishnaji is enthusiastic about it and wants to go on discussing with David each weekend.’

The nineteenth of May. ‘Krishnaji reads parts of Mary’s biography each morning. His liking for it grows. “She must’ve worked very hard,” he said. In response to questions of Mary’s, Doris found an old book of records she kept in 1961 showing when Krishnaji went for three weeks between the London talks and Saanen to Ojai. Mary, meticulous in background details, wanted to discover where he was and what were the references in the beginning of the Notebook manuscript. He spoke of going to an airport, others noticing something, etcetera. The airport was London, the others mentioned were Mrs. Bindley, Doris herself, who had forgotten, and Anneke. Krishnaji remembers nothing of it.’

The twenty-first of May. ‘It was a lovely summer day. I made the Creole rice he likes and packed our picnic hamper. We took two passengers, Dr. Parchure, whom we dropped in Hindhead at Dr. Carl Upman’s, and Dorothy, whom we took to a garage east of Haslemere, where she fetched her Land Rover.’

‘We drove on through lovely country, warm and smelling of spring, fertilizer, and growing things. How beautiful it is. I am floating in delight to drive through such loveliness with Krishnaji. It was less lovely near Esher, where road building is going on. Then we came to Wimbledon Common, where we had our picnic lunch sitting on a bench under trees. Krishnaji looked as young as when he walked there fifty years ago, and lived at West Side House with Ms. Dodge. We went on to the Putney Hospital. Mrs. Bindley has been there. She had fallen on the stairs, broke her hip, and lay there all night until the woman who cleans came in the morning. That was a month ago. They have operated on her hip and said she is convalescent. She was asleep when we came in. I took her hand and said that Krishnaji had come to see her. In her sleep, she said “lovely, lovely, lovely, lovely,” [light chuckles] touchingly responding to the words, she must have understood subconsciously. Krishnaji took her other hand and looked at me with distress, wondering if she were perhaps only half-conscious now, but then she woke up and was her old bright self, delighted to see him, eager with questions and banging her hearing aid to make it work. We told her a little about the Ojai school plans, the visits to the archives, and the meetings with Rajagopal. She said she will be able to go home as soon as her son Jack returns from Spain and gets someone to live-in and take care of her. We left, Krishnaji saying we would come to see her at home. “I would rather die quietly than be put in a hospital,” he said when we were outside. It was a considerable thing for him to visit her in the hospital, as he normally will not go to one. This is a convalescent hospital, and relatively less distressing, but one can see his repugnance.’

‘The A3 had been too torn up around Esher and Krishnaji said let’s go back some other way. I hadn’t brought maps, but we headed toward the sun, westward along the south bank of the Thames, and with luck found the M3, which took us to the road to Alton and so home to Brockwood.'

May twenty-second. 'Krishnaji has told Dr. Parchure that I must outlive him. When, in the kitchen, I asked Krishnaji why, he dismissed it with a "you know very well why." Parchure told Krishnaji what he is doing to my leg with massage as being able to unblock it. But Krishnaji has treated his ears and told him not to think of his hands or a cure, not to want something, just be quiet and open, then perhaps something can get through. Krishnaji told him that his own energy is not depleted when it goes to someone in this way. Krishnaji spoke to the school today—fact is doing in the instant. "Something new," he said. I talked at supper to a man about the Ojai school where he would like to teach. He didn't seem suitable, but was pleasant.'

May twenty-fourth. 'We learned from Amanda Pallant, who is back from Rome, that Vanda was struck by a car in Florence, bruised on the legs, and her head was cut, but is alright and was able to come to Rome to receive Amanda. I telephoned Vanda, who said it is nothing, characteristically, and Krishnaji spoke to her, getting almost no information. In the afternoon, Krishnaji did a two-hour taped dialogue with David Bohm, continuing last Sunday's on reality and truth. Dr. Parchure participated very slightly. Dorothy, Saral, and I were present.'

The twenty-fifth of May. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school, over their heads, I think, but very interesting on thought. Is there thought without word or image? To see something as true is an action outside of thought. There were many things in this discussion. Jane and Ian Hammond were at lunch. At 4 p.m., Dorothy, Krishnaji, and I talked to Tungki about his being able to continue to live at Brockwood without compulsion to study. Then Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked and got back in time for Dorothy and me to go to the staff meeting.'

The next day. 'I got up at 5 a.m. Did exercises, etcetera, and went to a 6:30 a.m. staff meeting. Carol Allwell raised the question of the gulf between verbal understanding and what we are trying to do in the schools, and insensitive behavior in some. She expressed it clearly, but there was much staring at the floor in responses. Dorothy is depressed, feels under attack at these meetings. I talked to her. Mary and Joe are going to Canada for four days. I took a nap after lunch, and walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy. When I brought Krishnaji his supper, he said he had a message from "the Great White Brotherhood thanking me for looking after him, but I mustn't spoil him."' [Both M and S chuckle and then M laughs.] Great White Brotherhood! Oh, dear. [More laughter.]

The twenty-seventh of May. My diary says, 'Tired!' [Chuckles.] 'I did quite a few letters. After lunch I went with Dorothy and Doris to Winchester for trousers for Krishnaji and other errands. Back in time for the walk. Telephoned the Frys, and spoke to Kit.'

On the twenty-ninth, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. Tidiness and untidiness. Mrs. Shrinivasan was at the meeting and to lunch. I drove her to the train. A walk and another school meeting.'

May thirtieth. 'I went to London alone. I did errands, had a fitting, came back at 4 p.m. Did some errands in Petersfield, and then back to Brockwood.'

The next day, another dialogue between Krishnaji and David Bohm.

Monday, June second. 'It snowed in London for first time on record. Mary L. and her daughter Amanda came to lunch. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked later, bundled up like Eskimos. The day had begun with a 6:30 staff meeting, I got fairly sleepy watching Kojak with Krishnaji in the evening on TV. Dr. Parchure is teaching me to massage Krishnaji.'

June third, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school and said, "I will teach them in spite of themselves."'

S: Is that it?

M: Yes.

S: Just before we run out of tape. Good!

M: Good. I'll have another cookie.

S: You deserve it.

Issue 36: June 1, 1975 to August 18, 1975

In this issue we see the first volume of Mary Lutyens' biography being read by different people and their very different responses to that very strange early life that Krishnaji led. We also see Krishnaji wondering with others about that early life.

There is also in this issue the transcription of two of four small sheets of loose paper that were in Mary's large diary for this period. These small sheets of paper do not have the careful handwriting that is usually evident in Mary's diary, but they are hurriedly scribbled, as if she was trying to just get down in writing some things that Krishnaji said.

Mary: Well, we begin in the little book on the first of June 1975 as I didn't record anything in the big book, and from the little book it seems to be one of those non-days to report.

Scott: Well, let's have it anyway.

M: 'Krishnaji spoke to the school in the morning on silence and seeing, and then I spoke to a man from Leeds, a transcendental-meditation type, and told him that it has nothing to do with Krishnaji's teachings. At 6 p.m. there was a staff meeting. David Bohm was there. It was proposed and accepted that Saral attend.' I presume for the scientists' conference that is coming up.

On the second of June, 'it was cold, and snowed in London for the first time in June since records were kept.' [S chuckles.] 'I did letters in the morning. Mary Links and Amanda Pallant came for lunch, and we all walked very bundled up. They began a staff meeting at 6:30 a.m.' Why would that be? 'I' [chuckles], 'got fairly sleepy watching Kojak with Krishnaji on television at night. Dr. Parchure is teaching me how to massage Krishnaji.' [Chuckles.] Nothing came of that, but that's what happened on the second of June.

On the third of June, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school, and he said again to me, "I will teach them in spite of themselves." Dr. P. gave me another lesson in giving Krishnaji a massage. I gave Dr. P. a copy of the biography to read.'

The next day, 'It is a little bit warmer. I typed letters all morning, and after lunch went to Winchester for errands, taking Frances McCann and Carol Allwell. I was back in time for the walk.'

The fifth of June, Krishnaji and I went to London, and he came with me to Rowe's, where I had ordered some trousers, because he wished to supervise the fitting!' [S laughs heartily.] 'Which he did. And he thinks that I should have them cut a bit longer. This was a slight contention between us. He won, naturally.' [S chuckling more.] 'He said that the trousers should break[1] at the bottom.' I'm sure you know what I mean.

S: I know exactly, yes.

M: ‘Only then, according to Krishnaji, were they proper.’ So, that’s what happened.

S: Yes, quite right.

M: ‘We walked to Fortnum’s and lunched with Mary and Joe. Joe asked Krishnaji’ [chuckles] ‘about the philosophical belief in the Masters, and he wanted to know about that Scots one.’ He meant the Maha Chohan!’ [Both laugh heartily.] A Scottish name, clearly! [Both laugh more.] ‘It is difficult listening to Krishnaji not to think he puts credence in their existence, though he doesn’t say so. Krishnaji went to the dentist, Mr. Thompson, while I fetched remedies at Nelson’s. We caught the 4:20 p.m. train back. Today is the first referendum ever held in Britain on remaining in the common market. They say it is a heavy vote. Results will be counted tomorrow. The scientists are arriving at Brockwood for the second session of the discussion with Krishnaji.’

Friday, the sixth of June. ‘Krishnaji and the scientists met in the Assembly Room. Wilkins, Bohm, Shainberg, Ullman, Goodwin, Butt, Peat, Monroe, and Parchure, Harsh, and Zorski. Students chosen by Harsh and Joe Zorski came as observers. In the afternoon, the same meeting continued. No papers were read this time. They went straight into discussion.’

On the seventh, ‘there was more of the scientific conference in the morning and the afternoon. In the afternoon, late, we walked. It was a hot and lovely day. There was a staff meeting.’

The next day, with the scientist conference. ‘Dr. Julian Melzack and his wife Dr. Elisabeth Ferris joined the group, and once again, Melzack slowed it all down. Michael Rubinstein came as an observer.’ I remember Mr. Melzack, who I think was something to do with logic, disrupted the meeting, as far as I can remember, over and over. He was difficult.

On the ninth of June. ‘The scientist conference concluded in the afternoon. Krishnaji gave a private interview to Dr. Ferris’—that’s Mrs. Melzack—‘on the reasons she and Melzack were late joining. Her father is hopelessly ill with cancer and they just learned of it. So, he very nicely talked to her.’

On the tenth, ‘Krishnaji rested all day. Krishnaji had hay fever again after his walk. Dr. Parchure gave him Actad. Earlier he had had lacto-something, which is to work on the probable milk allergy, which Parchure thinks Krishnaji may have had since childhood. By treating this allergy homeopathically, Parchure hopes to affect his hay fever.’ Sorry to say, it didn’t work.

S: I know.

M: Now, we go back to the little book for the eleventh. ‘It was another warm day. Nothing happened. Krishnaji stayed in bed.’ And he stayed there for the next day as well.

On the thirteenth, my diary says, 'Krishnaji in bed all morning. I came in before going to Winchester on errands, and Krishnaji said, "I was playing the Beethoven Ninth Symphony, that loud part, that demonic energy part, and not reading, lying here like this…" he was on his back with his legs slightly bent at right angles, "…and I felt this odd feeling as if death came. Everything was going through a little hole, and I realized it mustn't happen, and so it came back. I have felt a little of it for a couple of days, as if death were like that."'

'Me: "So near?"'

'Krishnaji: "Like that, through this little hole."'

'Me: "Was it different from when certain things happen in your head?"'

'Krishnaji: "Maybe."'

'Me: "What was it made you realize it shouldn't happen?"'

'Krishnaji: "Oh, you know, I have to try on that suit." Laughs.' [M and S laugh.]

S: Huntsman saves the day! [Laughs.]

M: Yes. 'Then Krishnaji said, "I remember Sacha had a fitting, and he died without getting it finished, and that mustn't happen. You must go now to Winchester, and drive carefully because I have to live." Dr. Parchure gave Krishnaji a second dose of homeopathic lacto-something this morning, and said that Krishnaji's feeling tired is a reaction to it. After breakfast, Krishnaji said, "I am tired. I must be getting old. Of course, I am old. But I feel tired." I went off to Winchester, with all this and the day, which was actually bright, had gone gray in that odd way as if the light had gone out of it. It shook me. Not yet, he has too much to do. He is more alive than anyone.'

On the fourteenth, 'Krishnaji did a taped dialogue in the afternoon with David Bohm about animal energy. Are the energy of thought and the energy outside of thought the same? Or, is the one outside totally different? Krishnaji finally came to see that they are totally different. There was a Brockwood garden party for Bramdean[2] neighbors.'

On the fifteenth, 'Krishnaji talked to the school in the morning. I asked about a verbal, superficial level of seeing things. Why does one not go deeper? "One must look," he said. At 4 p.m. Krishnaji came to a staff meeting and lit hard on the subject of respect, its meaning and how to bring it about.'

On the sixteenth, 'there was a school meeting at 6:30 a.m.' Why did we have it that early? Well, anyway. 'We told the students of the meeting yesterday about respect. There was a fairly good discussion. Krishnaji gave an interview to Carol Allwell, at Frances McCann's request. Krishnaji didn't go for a walk to avoid the hay fever. It rained, and I walked with Whisper.'

The seventeenth. ‘Krishnaji again stayed in, though he walked down to see a “communist creeper,” a Russian vine planted to hide the lavatories in the field. He isn’t sleeping too well.’ We had lavatories down in the field for the campers who were here during the public talks. It’s a vine that grows terribly quickly, a Russian vine, and he called it a “communist vine.” [laughter] It was planted in June, so that by September it would hide the lavatories!

S: See, these are important, these things. Krishnaji’s little sense of humor.

M: Well, there you are. Now, you know.

On the eighteenth, ‘I went to London, for visas, French and Swiss visas, but was back in time for his supper. I also got a book on elephants for Krishnaji.’ He wanted a book on elephants.

Now, we’re up to the nineteenth. ‘Krishnaji talked to the school in the morning. He is still not going out. Dr. Parchure checked my exercises at 5 a.m. At 6 a.m., there was a school meeting that lasted till 7:30 a.m.’ Why were we meeting at that hour?

S: God knows.

M: Oh, ‘we listened to a Richter concert on the radio.’

S: Mm.

On the twentieth, ‘I went with Krishnaji to London. Krishnaji had a Huntsman fitting, while I bought a cardigan for Vanda and Lobb shoe brushes. We lunched at Fortnum’s. I bought two records of Segovia. Then, went to Krishnaji’s dentist where a broken crown was replaced. Pupul Jayakar met us there, and we caught the 4:20 p.m. from Waterloo. Pupul and Mary Links are staying in the West Wing. George Digby’s mother died. The Digbys are uncertain if they can come to the Foundation meeting and the publications meeting tomorrow.’

June twenty-first. ‘There was a morning meeting of Krishnaji, Pupul Jayakar, Mary Links, Mary Cadogan, Ian and Jane Hammond, Sybil Dobinson, Dorothy, Doris, David Bohm, and me. We discussed the publication rights of KF India. Tentative agreement on Western publication, alternate years, Indian and Western books. The Digbys came to the afternoon session. They concur with the draft agreements.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji spoke to the school in the morning, and then taped a dialogue with David Bohm in the afternoon. Narayan and Dr. Parchure were part of that, but contributed little. It was the most far-reaching on the relationship of truth to reality—there seemed to be none as Krishnaji explored it.’

‘Mary Links, Amanda Pallant, Pupul Jayakar, and I went to see the gardens at Hinton Ampner house, which are open to the public one day a year. It was lovely.’

‘Krishnaji’s energy lately is astounding. He talked, in all today, over four hours.’

The next day is the twenty-third. ‘Dr. Parchure and Frances McCann left. Dr. P. to India. I went to Alresford for groceries, etcetera. There was a staff meeting at 6:30 a.m., another warm day. Krishnaji watched the opening matches of Wimbledon on TV.’

On the twenty-fourth, ‘There was a letter from Erna about a hearing at which Dr. Kelly of the Radix Institute got a permit to have the Institute in the Zalk house on the hill. Rosalind and Rajagopal testified for them, and against our protests. There was also a letter from Mark Lee about a Happy Valley meeting. It sickened Krishnaji, literally. He vomited. Later, he said the explanation of her hatred’—this is Rosalind—‘is an old one, “the fury of a woman scorned,” and that goes for Rajagopal, too. Erna says the stories circulating are that Rajagopal feels he was harassed by us during the archives visit, and had to be looked after by Austin Bee and his wife.’

‘Krishnaji stayed in all day. The pollen count was high.’

June twenty-fifth. ‘It is hot and clear. We washed the car, then Krishnaji dictated letters. After lunch, I drove to East Dean, and had tea with my friends, the Frys.’

I spend most of the next day at my desk. ‘Krishnaji spoke to the school. Dorothy and Montague went to see…’ someone ‘…about Krishnaji’s citizenship.’

S: Must be a lawyer.

M: I guess so. ‘George Digby telephoned to say that Mrs. Bindley had died yesterday morning in a hospital.’ Hm.

June twenty-seventh, ‘At 6:30 a.m. there was another staff meeting. After that, I started to pack. Mrs. Gandhi has arrested her political opponents, 700 of them, and declared an emergency with tight censorship of news.’

The twenty-eighth, ‘I continue packing. Krishnaji did another dialogue with David Bohm, more on truth this time. David has just read the biography, and questioned Krishnaji about whether there had been a particular moment of change for him. Krishnaji said no. The physical suffering of the process made him more sensitive, and so did the psychological suffering of his brother’s death. But meeting both fully left no marks.’

The next day it just says, ‘packing.’

June thirtieth. ‘Up as usual at 6 a.m. I did the final packing, laundry, etcetera, tidied the kitchen, and typed letters up to the last half-minute before leaving. I wish I could take the IBM typewriter with me—the right arm of my life!’ [Both chuckle.] ‘The school were all out in the driveway to say goodbye to Krishnaji. I quickly got in the backseat, but he refused to get in the front!' He wouldn't sit in the front seat.

S: Not if you were in the back.

M: That's right.

S: I know, ungentlemanly.

M: 'And so, to the laughter of the students, I gave in. Dorothy drove us. Beyond Alton, I remembered the kefir packed in the travel jar sitting on the kitchen table!' Oh dear. [Both chuckle.] 'But we went on.' I was making kefir for him then; that German couple gave us little pieces that looked like bits of cauliflower.

S: Yes, yes.

M: Making it was one of my dairy chores, and of course, I left it. 'Carol Allwell will bring it by train. We had a nice picnic lunch in the car at Runnymede, and got to Heathrow by 2:30 p.m. We flew to Paris on British-European Airline, coming in by taxi from Orly and passed all the old familiar sites: Port Orléan, Port de St Cloud, etcetera, that remind us both of our arrivals in the car, and Krishnaji said, "I'm glad we aren't going to drive." It was fun when we did it, and those long drives across the wide summer spaces of France are deep in my affection, but they are too much effort today, for both of us, really. I feel very well, and have much energy, but I tire more than I did, and the long drives are too much. At the Plaza Athénée, we have our usual rooms, au deuxieme this time. I unpacked one bag, and then Krishnaji wanted to walk, his first in over three weeks. There is no pollen in Paris, just good whiffs of benzine.' [S laughs.] 'We found the place on the Rue Marbeuf where we could again get fluid to clean his shaver, and an enlarging mirror also, then came back. That is enough, he said. We had supper in my room with cherries, apricots, and peaches; and listened to President Giscard d'Estaing give a talk to the French people before their summer holidays.' [Mimics a stern French voice:] '"La France est solide!" he said.' [Laughter.] I can still hear him! 'In this chaotic world, it was amazing to hear someone reassure everyone, and make the assertions he did.' [S laughs and M has laughter in her voice as she comments:] I remember that evening!

Tuesday, the first of July in Paris. 'I did a few errands on foot while Krishnaji rested in bed. What is it in the air of Paris that makes everything smell good? The boulangerie, women's perfume, the latter sickened me usually in other places; here, it is softer and pleasant. I met Nadia Kossiakof downstairs at 12:30 p.m., and then Krishnaji joined us. She has worked with Madame Duchet on the translation of The Awakening of Intelligence, L'Éveil de l'Intelligence, and done huge work on its publication. She wanted to tell me this, and gave information on the journalists meeting Krishnaji in the afternoon. Nadia looked older; she has been ill, and now she has worry over her mother trapped in the civil fighting in Beirut. I gave her a copy of the biography. Krishnaji appeared and was warmly considerate to her, inviting her to Brockwood to stay and rest. She didn't want to lunch, so left, and Marcelle Bondonneau joined us for lunch in the garden; melon, gazpacho, tagliatelle au gratin, and crème caramel for him, and fraises des bois for me.'

S: And we should just mention here that the biography that you've mentioned now, and you mentioned it before in talking about David Bohm, that was the first volume of Mary's three volumes.

M: Yes, right.

S: Which was called The Years of Awakening.

M: That's right, quite right. 'Krishnaji napped, then went to Mar de Manziarly's in Rue Jacob for a meeting with journalists arranged and chosen by Nadia. Also, the head of Stock, publishers of the L'Éveil de l'Intelligence, and a Mr. Christian de Bertillat, and André Bay, director of Librairie Stock. A youngish man Bernard Chevalier, who does a radio program, Après-midi de France, came first and wanted 20 minutes of radio interview with Krishnaji. I ran interference. A François de Closets, a science writer, did most of the questioning. Krishnaji's reading of L'Éveil de l'Intelligence, to improve his French for his meeting, worked well at first. In the taxi going over, he said, "I'm going to talk in English." I suggested that he start in French, as that appeals to the French, even if one makes mistakes. But as Krishnaji began to feel tired, he had more trouble and spoke less readily than usually in French. I was relieved when he explained in English, things that, to me, are complicated things. He spoke of a conference theme: What is the role of knowledge and transformation in a new society, and what will change man since knowledge hasn't done it? Much on la pensée. It was hard for them to see its limitations. Krishnaji then came to "time must have a stop" and another energy when it does. He left them with just that hint' [chuckles]. 'We walked to the rue de Beaune, and taxied back.'

S: Was this interview recorded?

M: Well, it must've been. I don't know. I don't remember.

The second of July. 'It was a warm, sunny day. We went to Lobb, now in Hermès, where Mr. Dickinson tried on two new pairs of shoes.'

S: Where was Lobb before? I thought it was always at Hermès.

M: No. It was on the same street, oh…you know.

S: Faubourg St. Honoré?

M: Yes. It was in its own building.

S: Ah, ha.

M: It was there for several years. And then it moved to Hermès.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'So, the shoes were pronounced perfect. Dickinson said, "We can continue three or four more years. After that, it is over." No young people know the craft. Though, these shoes today cost $496 with the shoe trees, they are worth it to Krishnaji for their fit, their excellence, and because they are, in a way, a vanishing work of art. Dickinson and Mr. Ellis'—that's another man there—'accompanied Krishnaji downstairs. Hermès tried to find him a ready-made pair of moccasins, but they were all too big. We then walked to Charvet, and Mr. Wilmot'—he was the man there—'tore up an erroneous bill for 970 French francs. We chatted a bit, but ordered nothing. We taxied to the Tour d'Argent, where we lunched with my brother and his wife, Lisa. Krishnaji sat facing Notre Dame, and watched barge life on the Seine while family conversation went on. Bud and Lisa seemed to have enjoyed their five days at Malibu.' They stayed at my house when I wasn't there for awhile, about a fortnight ago. 'They are here on museum matters and return to New York. We went downstairs afterward.' That means to the flat. 'It's the first time that I've been in the apartment since just after Father's death.' Well, you don't want to hear all that.

S: Yes I do.

M: Well, my brother had made changes and improvements and so forth. 'Krishnaji and I did a couple of errands. Looked for a movie, but none appealed, and it was hot and tiring, so we came back to the hotel where we both were content to be quiet and read. Then, I rang a friend…' It has nothing to do with all this.

Thursday, the third of July. 'I was able to get through by telephone to speak to Filomena in Rome. Her knee is better. The weather is warmer, making her feel better. We left the Plaza at 10 a.m., and taxied to Orly. There were no porters in the West Terminal, so I struggled with the baggage and a baggage cart. We flew Swiss Air to Geneva. Narasimhan met us at the airport with a Hertz Taunus station wagon in which we went with him to the Palais des Nations for lunch. He was rather noncommittal on Mrs. Gandhi's seizure of dictatorial powers. Bureaucratic faces, and a grey monster building—rather depressing. After lunch, Krishnaji and I took the station wagon into the center of town, parked underground, and walked to Patek for the annual watch regulation. And then to Jacquet, where about eight handsome silks were chosen to be made into ties. Krishnaji was very pleased. One more old grace and skill that is still possible to enjoy. We drove via the Route du Lac and then up around Lausanne on the familiar road to Oron, Bulle, and through the valley.'

S: Hm, hm.

M: 'A lovely day, with the sun warm but not too hot. It was the warm, extra pleasure, and recognition of seeing again the landscape so woven into the years of this life that has meant so very much. It was sunny all the way, and we both kept exclaiming at the brightness of colors. Many greens, greener than anywhere, and the blaze of flowers, geraniums in window boxes seem on fire with color. We reached Tannegg after 7 p.m.

Vanda and Fosca were there. All is in order, ready and welcoming. Krishnaji has a new shower in his extra room. The kitchen has been redone, ugly tile, dark, pretentious and wood, but there is a dishwasher and a better refrigerator. We had supper, talked to Vanda, unpacked, and went to bed.' Hm, hm. Is that nostalgic?

S: Yes, it is. Yes, it is. Very.

M: The next day, the fourth of July, 'I took the station wagon to Kubli, which is Hertz, and got instead a small Peugeot 104. I stopped in the village for various necessities, and spent the rest of the day getting settled. Krishnaji stayed in bed. It rained, and cleared the air and his hay fever symptoms.'

The fifth of July. I finished errands. Frances McCann and Carol Allwell came in the afternoon. Carol brought the kefir which I forgot in West Wing kitchen.'

On the sixth, nothing happened—'rested, read, Krishnaji stayed in bed.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji continues to rest. Mar de Manziarly, here for the talks, came to lunch. Krishnaji takes all his meals in his rooms, but he "put his hands" on Mar. She had a heart attack during the winter. Krishnaji walked down to the barber for a haircut, and we drove back. Mar feels that too much is put in the biography.'

Editor's Note: The criticism of the first biography, and Mary L. for writing it, was very memorable. And it has continued, to a lesser extent, with her two subsequent volumes, and all the biographies from other authors that have followed. It continues with these memoirs. On reflection, this seems inevitable. People, quite rightly, hold Krishnaji's teaching to be very dear, and they, less wisely, hold their picture or image of Krishnaji just as dearly. Evidence that the reality of Krishnaji was larger, more complex, more nuanced, or just different to their image is understandably unwelcome.

The eighth is another quiet day. 'The Siddoo sisters brought mangoes to Krishnaji.'

The following day, 'the two Siddoo sisters, Jackie and Sarjit, came to lunch, and brought architect's drawings for their school on Vancouver Island. Krishnaji was very interested and examined it all. He reiterated that the architecture should not be Canadian, not American, not European, Japanese, etcetera, but totally new.' [M chuckles.] That's what he wanted! [S chuckles.] 'Sarjit, having just come from India, brought mangoes, and saw Mrs. Gandhi a few days ago. She is in total control, and all is outwardly calm.' That's Mrs. Gandhi. 'The prices of food staples have been lowered.'

July tenth. 'It was a lovely day. I went up the mountain by the new cable car in Schonried with Frances and Carol A. We walked and lunched up there. The whole range of high mountains to the south was white with snow. There was the mountain stillness, only occasionally the hushed sound of gliders overhead. Carol gave me a letter for Krishnaji, enclosing a copy of one she had written to the Brockwood Park staff about Brockwood's ills. The letter to Krishnaji says she is leaving. I suggest she not circulate her letter until after talking to Dorothy. Krishnaji didn't want to read it. He says she is criticizing from a position of feeling support for others on the staff. She should change, and she should make a difference in the school. He seems irritable, as before, about this. Graf had been at lunch, and Vanda was very critical of Barabino. Krishnaji heard it all, and as a result, ate his lunch one-and-a-half hours late. All these details shouldn't be flung at him when he was tired.'

S: These problems were just always there, weren't they?

M: Yes. They were always inviting at Brockwood.

July eleventh. 'Ted and Scott brought a typewriter, etcetera. Krishnaji and I went to see the tent in the afternoon, and then to see the Simmonses just arrived in the Land Rover. Krishnaji said, "Do you feel a different atmosphere in the house? It is because I'm about to talk."'

The next day, 'I did were errands and letters. Vanda and I lunched alone, and Krishnaji and I went for a small walk.'

The thirteenth. 'It was a perfect summer day. Krishnaji gave his first talk on energy and the difference between reality and truth. The tent is set up in a new way, without wooden risers. All the benches are on the ground, and Krishnaji on a platform on the south side.'

'Isabel Biascoechea came to lunch. It is the first time we have seen her since Enrique's death in November. I took a nap in the afternoon, and later Krishnaji and I walked to the river and back.'

July fourteenth, 'I felt swollen glands under one of my ears…' Oh, this is when I got mumps, I think!

S: Oh, dear.

M: '…on awakening. Deskwork through the day. Krishnaji and I walked to the river. There was a letter from Erna about a $100,000 donation obtained by Evelyne for the school. The court ordered Cohen, Christensen, and the trustees of each side to meet July thirtieth to iron out the remaining difficulties about the easements with Rajagopal and the Vigevenos, archives, and certain changes in the K&R charter. Krishnaji wants Ojai Educational Center activities to be decided upon by himself, plus David Bohm and me.'

Editor's Note: This is curious, and should have elicited more questions from me when Mary read this out. We know that Krishnaji had a special trust in Mary, but having David as a decision maker for the Educational Center in Ojai invites questions. David didn't live in Ojai, wasn't a trustee of the KF of America, and was not envisaged as playing any role in the running of anything in Ojai, but other people were.

On July fifteenth, 'I had a fever of 99.6 on awakening. My glands are still swollen. Krishnaji gave his second Saanen talk. I sit in the outer area to avoid people. I have the mumps!' [Both chuckle.] Luckily, Krishnaji has had them, so I wasn't worried, but I was a leper for a while. 'I worked on a reply to Erna in the afternoon. Isabel B. brought Enrique's daughter and husband, too, Dr. and Mrs. Colón. The latter saw Krishnaji alone and agreed to stay on as president of the K Foundation for the Spanish-speaking countries. After Krishnaji left, he talked to me about various problems.'

On the sixteenth, 'the Siddoo sisters brought more Indian mangoes to Krishnaji, and diagnosed my swelling as mumps. Prescribed vitamin C. My left side is also affected, but not as severely as the right. Krishnaji talked to the Siddoos about the architecture of the school, while Mary Cadogan and I went in another room and discussed Foundation matters. Madame Suad al Radi and G. Barabino to lunch.'

July seventeenth, 'Krishnaji gave a tremendous third talk in the tent. More on suffering and love; a very special talk; blazing energy. Vanda's brother and sister-in-law, Passigli and David Bohm to lunch. Krishnaji talked briefly to David about our settling policy and direction for the Educational Center. I took Vanda to the village on errands, and deposited half the Tannegg rent for this summer to her account. In the evening, we watched briefly on TV the Russian and U.S. astronauts docking. Soyuz and Apollo capsules joining each other in space.'

On the eighteenth, 'there was the annual meeting of the various countries' committees at Tannegg with Krishnaji.' I had the Siddoos warn everybody coming in the house that it was a house of…'

S: [laughs] Contagion!

M: …contagion. Yes. [Laughs.] 'And I stayed away from everybody.'

'Mr. Calles was rude and aggressive. He wants the Foundation and committees to give him $50,000 to make a half-hour film in which Krishnaji is more or less an actor, saying nothing, but the soundtrack talks about him, and shows visual images of poverty, war, etcetera.'

'In the afternoon, Krishnaji and David Bohm did a dialogue. Dorothy, Vanda, Saral, and I were present. George Carnes taped it. Krishnaji again talked about the early days, the mystery. He said he feels he could know what was happening, but doesn't wish to.'

S: Hm.

M: Saturday the nineteenth of July. 'I felt larger mump on the left side, but no loss of energy. I went to Mrs. Cadogan's where the KF members, the Simmonses, Bohm, van der Straten, Radha Burnier, met Calles, Colón, Isabel Biascoechea, Sendra, and Riesco. We made Calles be specific about what he wants to do. The enormous changes he wants turned out to be routine in most other foundations and committees: getting the mailing list of those who came to the film showings, sending out bulletins, and collecting funds. He kept talking about "necessary tools." These turned out to be the obvious: the books, tapes, films. They want and will probably get the right to make cassettes'—this is all for the Fundación—'of Krishnaji's talks using a Spanish voice. I questioned him and Sendra about what happens at their meetings. Is there a talk, or are questions answered? They were both pious, but they stress they have no authority, and don't interpret, none of which I believe. I asked Calles if there was any other "tool" he had in mind, and what else he might mean by "expanded work." He said nothing. That left out the film, which I said Krishnaji had told me to point out had been a chief concern of KFA since it began and was not a new idea. We have constant such suggestions in mind, but lack fund. Mentioned sums confronting KFA in the school building. Finally time ran out.'

'I took Radha Burnier up to Tannegg for lunch. Vanda had also asked Simonetta di Cesaro and Frances McCann. Krishnaji had a private talk alone with Radha before lunch, and asked about conditions in India, saying he needed advice he could trust before October on whether it would be safe for him to go there and to speak, speaking freely as he would. He would trust Achyutji[3]. Krishnaji ate in his room, but came in and joined the other five of us. He questioned Simonetta and Radha on the reactions to the biography, and particularly to what reasons "he" had remained untouched by conditioning etcetera. Krishnaji put forth various alternatives: ill health, malaria, etcetera, keeping the boy too weak in impressionable, conditioning years, reincarnation, evolution through lives, Maitreya keeping "the boy" uncontaminated, vague, backward until later. Simonetta said, with a definite voice, that she believed in reincarnation. Radha asked, "If so, what reincarnates?" Krishnaji took it up, and wove as follows: Self is thought, memory, conditioning, etcetera. When the body dies, a strong ego is part of the stream of selfishness, a manifestation of that. That manifestation may occur again "but why call it Krishnaji?" i.e., a particular individual. It is that stream manifesting. Also, genetics, social conditioning, all sorts of other factors can be in it. When CWL[4] found Krishnaji, he saw no selfishness. How was that? If selfishness can manifest, so can unselfishness, but then what kept him that way, untouched? A protection? Protected by whom? Krishnaji left it there. He said later he didn't like to discuss these things in front of Frances McCann. He rather jumped at her for commenting, "Oh yes!" But apart from her, he seems intent on pursuing these matters, to enjoy examining the mysteries surrounding those early years. He also said that within the "selfishness" stream or manifestation, an awareness of that state can occur, and there is no longer the selfishness. This can happen at any time, to anyone, he said, if they truly look.'

S: Hm.

M: That's interesting, huh?

S: Yes, yes. That is interesting.

M: Now, the twentieth of July. 'Krishnaji gave his fourth Saanen talk, again very fine, on nothingness. Dr. Liechty came briefly to greet him at Tannegg. In the afternoon, Vanda had a young German physicist, Dr. Fritz Wilhelm, to the house, and Krishnaji saw him briefly with a friend, an American picture director, Maranelli. I had a slight fever.'

July twenty-first. 'Vanda left at 8:30 a.m., Mrs. Walsh driving her'—that was the woman who rented the flat downstairs—'to Spiez, where she catches the train for Florence. It was a quiet day. No one at the house.'

Tuesday, July twenty-second. 'Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen talk, this one on pleasure and joy. He slept before lunch. At 4 p.m., he saw Dr. Colón and Sendra. He had summoned them to find out about Sendra's guru behavior when he toured South America. I put the cassette recorder on and left. Sendra says he described his "meditation." "So, you become the little guru," said Krishnaji. When they left, Krishnaji walked alone while I went down to fetch him a fresh detective story, some castor oil for his hair, and bring Fosca up with fruit and vegetables. When Krishnaji got back, he said that the conversation with Sendra tired him. That man, Sendra, is not straight, he said.'

July twenty-third. 'Radha Burnier came to lunch. Krishnaji talked at length about his going or not going to India. He will not go if he cannot speak freely, or if an exception is made specifically for him. He will not speak "with permission" of Mrs. Gandhi. He looks to Achyut's advice on whether to go. Pupul and Sunanda perhaps take it too lightly, or impulsively. He had Radha write down his questions. Dorothy and Montague moved up from the camping to Vanda's room in Tannegg.' That was downstairs.

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'Krishnaji had me tell them that he doesn't intend to talk twice a week to students who don't understand and don't care. He will talk to the staff and to serious students who will treat it as a privilege. He may hold discussions at Brockwood with the Brockwood staff here in Gstaad after the public meetings end.'

The twenty-fourth of July. 'Krishnaji gave the sixth Saanen talk on death and authority, and the stream of selfishness. Rain beat on the tent at times. It cleared. I telephoned Radha Burnier after the talk and fetched her up to lunch. Krishnaji talked further on India and conditions there that would prevent his going. He said he would not talk if others are not also free to talk. I took Radha to the train. She flies to India tonight. Mrs. Sloss and Mrs. Duke'—that is the mother-in-law of Radha Sloss, a nice woman—'came to tea. Krishnaji made a short, vague appearance and went for his walk. When the two left, I went up the hill to join him. To walk alone and in silence is good for him at present.'

July twenty-fifth, 'Mary Cadogan came for lunch, and I added the young German teacher Fritz Wilhelm, who Krishnaji noticed as looking "serious" in the tent. Later, I stayed to listen while at 3:30 p.m., Krishnaji and David Bohm did a taped dialogue. Yves Zlotnicka taped it. Dorothy and Saral were present.'

The next day, 'Mr. Mirabet of Spain came to give Krishnaji the annual donation of $4,000 for the work. He reviewed with me the list of funds to go to Krishnaji on Mirabet's death.' He was such a nice old man. Every year, he brought cash to go to Krishnaji, and ever since Brockwood was founded, Krishnaji turned it over to Brockwood.

S: I remember, yes. Yes.

M: 'Pascaline Mallet, Bondonneau, Elmenhorst, Mary C. came to lunch. There was a useful discussion between the latter two on German publications.'

July twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji gave the seventh talk in Saanen. The Simmonses were in to lunch. I slept in the afternoon. I feel undissolved fatigue at times. Krishnaji walked, and I joined him a little later. He goes twice through the woods, as far as the barn. I forgot to say that Krishnaji had made me go to Jackie Siddoo to show her the ulcerated spot on my thigh that is still oozing after more than six weeks. She gave a cortisone neomycin cream to use, after gentian violet.'

The next day, 'to give Fosca a rest, Krishnaji and I took Anneke to lunch at the Park Hotel. We told her some of the Rajagopal story since the settlement, and she was appalled. She never had a reply from Rosalind Rajagopal after that letter in which Anneke told her to give back Happy Valley to Krishnaji. In the only resemblance to an interview this summer, Krishnaji saw Madame Questiau. He came in from saying, "Is the whole world mad?" I felt it was, having run into a clinically mad person yesterday who handed me thirty-some pages of typewritten craziness.'

Editor's Note: Stuck in Mary's diary are four little sheets of paper—three of them from a little notepad from the Plaza Athénée, and one a little index card. They seem to be notes from a conversation with Krishnaji, but she doesn't say that, and she doesn't put anything in quotes. Still, they seemed worth noting as Mary felt they were worth recording. Two of these little sheets seem to go together and are dated 28 July, so the contents of these notes are placed in Mary's memoirs here.

2 fields – goodness – traditional, + holiness.

There exist hate, war. It exists.

Also there is a field of goodness. That exists too.

Another field which goes beyond the 2.

Man spends most of his capacity in hate and less in goodness.

There is an energy which doesn't belong to either.

Both these belong to man.

War has created an atmosphere. So has goodness. Both are in man's capacities. To move within these is still traditional.

There is another area where if we can touch it gives an energy that doesn't belong to either.

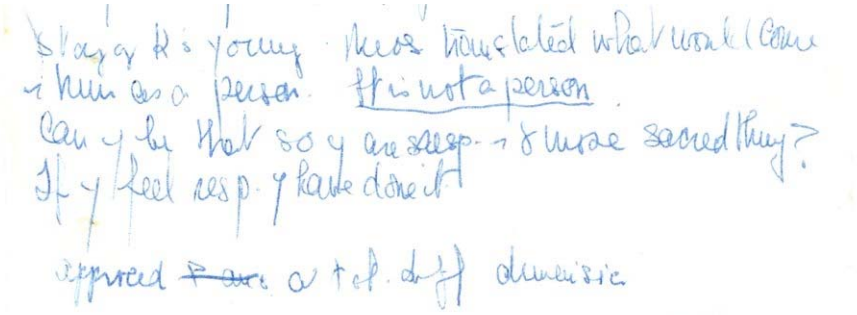
I believe we can touch it + when we do that will transform what we are doing. If we can open a door to it, it will operate. It is as real as these

There is an energy which is not man-made

You can't get it by man-made ways—vows, chastity, poverty, etc. But man has asked if there is an area where man-made things do not exist. Can we as a group discern that?

Recognizing these 2 as man-made + incomplete is there something that is totally complete + can my mind capture it.

…an area where miracles happen, where something new exists



a state from which all life flows, the beginning of everything

Can we come to that? Otherwise we are treading in this (a traditional) field. It is my responsibility to come to that.

I will not have my roots there. I may have no roots + therefore be open to the width of heaven

---

Even knowing some of the shorthand that Mary used, the rest of Mary's note is too difficult for me to transcribe with absolute confidence. Consequently, the rest of the note is scanned for each reader to try their own hand at reading it. My guess at what her note is saying is in the following editor's note.

Editor's Note: Story of Krishnaji as young. Theosophy translated what would come to him as a person. It is not a person.

Can you be that so you are responsible to the most sacred thing?

If you feel responsible you have done it.

Appeared a totally different dimension.

The twenty-ninth of July. 'I got on the 8:45 train in Gstaad, and was joined by Isabel Biascoechea in Saanen, and accompanied her to the National City Bank in Geneva. Enrique had set up a $25,000 Investment in Euro dollars in her name. She gets the income from that for life. Krishnaji has the power of attorney of it and, on her death, it is his. She wants me to have similar powers, and it was executed today. If Krishnaji dies, it goes to his work. This way Isabel finds handling of it easier without Enrique. She doesn't want the Colóns to know about it, so she asked me to come with her. She understands very little. I was able to help her sort it out. We lunched quickly in the Café Au Quai and came back by train.'

What eventually happened to that, which won't be in here, I don't think, was that she got ill and needed the money, so Krishnaji turned it all over to her.

S: Mm, hm.

M: Krishnaji's work never got any of it. 'As we came back by train, the jet d'eau was a very tall feather. I have such affection for these familiar places and things shared with Krishnaji.'

'He had rested all day and gone for his walk. After supper, he came in and talked very seriously and with a sort of irritation he has been showing here in Gstaad about Brockwood. "Why should I go there and talk to these empty-headed students? What is the point of it? It's going to become a second-rate, a third-rate school. You're a trustee, what are you going to do about it? It is not my job." I asked how I could change what he hadn't. "Find out," he said.'

S: [chuckles] Comforting!

M: 'He was critical of Dorothy Simmons. "What am I doing there? Not one student after three years." I said that I had never been optimistic about schools. He says schools were right. Then said, "What will I do? I may never go to India again. I like Brockwood. It's a nice place. But I'm not going to talk to uncaring students who don't know what it's about. I'm not going to stay there three months. It's your responsibility. If I'm gone, what would you do? This afternoon I felt like going off. I can't talk to you unless you're objective." I said I would call the other two trustees who are here, and Dorothy and David and talk to them. "There's no creativity," he said, then tried to change the subject by asking about my leg. I am to think this over calmly.' [S chuckles.] My instructions.

‘I kept waking in the night thinking of what Krishnaji had said.’

The next morning, ‘when he came in to do my leg, he was in bright, changed humor. Had I got over his tirade, he asked.’ [Chuckles.] ‘At breakfast, I told Dorothy that Krishnaji wanted three trustees here, she, David, and I, to meet about the policy of choosing students, what to do to bring them closer to the teachings. I telephoned Graf early and said Krishnaji wished me to announce the KF school in Ojai and that I would be in the tent to answer questions tomorrow. When I told this to Krishnaji , his face lit up, pleased. He had that look that makes anything doable. “Does it make you nervous?” he asked in the car. I said I don’t look forward to it, but I don’t mind. The look earlier was my talisman.’

‘I went into the tent on arrival, spoke briefly to the audience before he came in, and then went around and sat inside the tent, so I am today out of mump quarantine. This was the first public discussion, and there were no questions about the biography. Krishnaji talked briefly, then took mainly one question on the stream of selfishness. “When you see, really see, that you are that stream, that there is no self apart from it, the impact does something to the brain cells, and one is out of the stream.” I brought Mar de Manziarly back for lunch. Marcelle Bondonneau’s anxiety state deepens. Krishnaji ate in his room, and Mar asked me a little about Rajagopal. I told her of the disagreeable archive encounters, easements on the land, withholding part of the papers, saying he had burnt Krishnaji’s manuscripts, etcetera. Mar is still in the middle, close to her sisters. I took her down the hill, and met a woman who had written to me and Krishnaji at length, and I sat and talked to her in the car for about forty-five minutes. She is mentally ill. I tried to suggest she lead a quiet life, get psychological help. She has been with a psychoanalyst but can’t afford it anymore. She has fantasies of being a Brockwood Park librarian, going on safari in Africa with Krishnaji. I tried to make her feel concern for her own well-being, but it is as if the mad world is preferred. I fetched Fosca, with the fruit and vegetables up the hill. Another more mildly mad woman came by with her annual hopeless gifts: Avon toiletries, hideous pajamas. Krishnaji shuddered on opening it, and gave them to Fosca.’ [Both chuckle.] Oh dear.

On July thirty-first, ‘Krishnaji held the second Saanen public discussion. The Siddoos and Krishnaji talked before lunch. At 5 p.m., I went to the tent and talked about the Ojai School to about fifty people.’

The first of August. ‘Krishnaji held the third public dialogue in the tent. A mad English woman, named’—oh, she really was mad—‘was argumentative, and Krishnaji refused to discuss with her.’ She’s now calmed down. She used to live in a trailer, and she used to write him letters at Brockwood. She lived in, I don’t know, Dorset, or somewhere. Now she lives in Ventura and donates to the school every year.

S: Hm.

M: She gave to the Archive Committee this year, through her lawyer.

The second of August. Krishnaji held a fourth dialogue in the tent. Very fine. Narasimhan came for lunch briefly with a Dutch girl, Simonetta di Cesaro, and Fritz Wilhelm. Narasimhan is to give Krishnaji his opinion on whether he should go to India on Narasimhan's return from there early in October. After supper, Krishnaji dictated a letter to Pupul. I typed it, and Dorothy and I took it to Padma Madholkar in Schonried. She will give it to Pupul in Delhi.' I think Krishnaji wanted it to go through somebody, not through the mail.

August third. 'Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen dialogue, completing this year's. The need for space—a superb unfolding. This whole series was marvelous. We had lunch together in the dining room. Mr. and Mrs. Nathan Shainberg to tea. I drove them back to their hotel in the rain that lightened the heat a little.' That's the parents of David Shainberg.

S: Mm, hm.

M: The fourth of August. 'There was a letter from Erna about her meeting with Cohen and Christensen on July twenty-fourth. Madame Duchet and Marcelle Bondonneau to lunch. Krishnaji talked to Madame Duchet alone afterward. At 3:30 p.m., Dorothy, David, and I had a KF trustee meeting about the interest in the teachings among students and staff at Brockwood. Krishnaji joined us later.'

The fifth of August. 'I went to the Cantonal Bank about the Alzina account.' That's the account of holding funds that had been donated for Krishnaji. 'We went to pick up Nadia and Nicolas Kossiakof and took them to lunch at the Park Hotel in a quiet bar. Krishnaji and I to Mr. Kohli, the shoemaker, in Saanen. Naps and walk.'

On the sixth of August, 'Krishnaji did a taped dialogue with David Bohm. Saral, Dorothy, Montague, Yves Zlotnicka and I were present. The Bohms and the Simmonses stayed to lunch. I walked with Krishnaji. On our return, one of the mad women was sitting by the house. Krishnaji told me to talk to her, which I did. At 10 at night, she came back with a letter for Krishnaji, which turned out to be a proposal of marriage!' [Laughs and makes an aside:] She was that year's crazy lady.

S: Mm, hm.

M: I wasted so much time with that woman. [Laughs.]

August seventh. 'Krishnaji laughed on reading the letter, but said it was scandalous, and I shouldn't have talked to her so long!' [M and S both laugh.] He made me talk to her. 'Torrential hailstorm in the afternoon. Krishnaji stayed in bed all day.' [Both still laughing.] Oh, dear.

The next day. 'I went again to the Cantonal Bank about the Alzina investments. I took a letter for Dr. Globus to the Bohms to address on arrival in England.' Dr. Globus, I forget, when we had the meeting of scientists in Ojai, but Dr. Globus was one of the psychiatrists who attended, and he came wearing his hat of power…

S: Oh, yes!

M: Which had a feather in it.

S: Yes, I think you mentioned that before.

M: …and he wore it all through the conference. 'Bill Burmeister to lunch. Krishnaji had a haircut in the afternoon, and we walked.'

The next morning, 'At 7 a.m., this year's mad woman was outside the chalet. Krishnaji sent me outside to send her away, which I did, firmly and briefly. Rain. The weather is changing. Suzanne and Hughes van der Straten, Doris, and Dorothy and Montague were at lunch. Krishnaji and I walked. The proprietor…' What was his name? '…gave a party upstairs until 4 a.m. Noise.'

S: Oh, dear.

M: Yes, that was bad.

The tenth of August, was 'a very quiet day. I slept all afternoon until the walk with Krishnaji. In evening, Dorothy and I went to a Menuhin Percival concert in the Saanen Church.'

The eleventh 'was desk for me. Doris, Dorothy, and Montague at lunch. Krishnaji and I to Kohli, the shoe man in Saanen. My space shoes were re-soled. Krishnaji bought a pair of Wellingtons. We came back and walked.'

The twelfth 'was a rainy day. Krishnaji and I took Mar de Manziarly to lunch at the Park Hotel. At 4:30 p.m., I went to see Marcelle Bondonneau at Bel Air. Came back and walked with Krishnaji.'

August thirteenth, 'Edgar Graf and the Simmonses were at lunch. Krishnaji spoke alone to Graf later, and I went up the Eggli[5] with Carol Allwell. She is leaving Brockwood, and going to Florence. I said to Krishnaji that I would give the Mercedes at Brockwood to Brockwood as a donation, and they can dispose of it. Krishnaji told this to Dorothy and Montague.' It seemed to Krishnaji and me that it was too much to keep such a large expensive car just to run errands around Brockwood.

S: [chuckles] No, it's perfect! I'm glad that didn't happen! [Both chuckle.]

The next day 'was a quiet day. I worked at my desk all morning. Krishnaji rested. Dorothy and Montague in to lunch, then they packed the Land Rover. A Brockwood staff member in Doris's mini took some of Krishnaji's and my things. I fetched Nadia up to talk to Krishnaji. We walked later.'

The fifteenth. ‘Dorothy, Montague, and Doris leave for Brockwood. It was a quiet day filled mostly with deskwork for me. I brought Marcelle Bondonneau to see Krishnaji before her leaving. There was a rainstorm.’

Nothing really happened the next day.

August seventeenth. ‘It is lovely to wake up and not look at the clock. I realized the day is empty and quiet. Krishnaji looks rested and young. I did some letters in the morning. Krishnaji slept and read. At lunch, I asked him about things he said in the sixth talk. The stream of selfishness; when the person dies, he says, the stream goes on. I asked if that meant that the stream was outside and independent of the human mind, it having been created by thought. He seemed to be saying yes, but I wasn’t putting the question properly. He’ll go into it with Bohm. He said you can talk to a consciousness, and then unexpectedly, he said, “I talked to the tiger.”’ [Chuckles.] ‘There is a large color photo of a tiger that I pinned up on his wall in his second room in Ojai.’ That’s the room where he used to do exercise…

S: Mm, hm.

M: …where he does yoga. ‘“I think you can talk to consciousness. I talk to tiger consciousness: “Be careful. Avoid man. Kill discretely.”’

S: [laughing] These are the things he told the tiger?

M: Yes! It was beautiful, I saw it down in the store in the village. Great big marvelous poster about four feet high of a tiger. He was very pleased with it.

S: Yes, he would be.

M: “Kill discretely!” [Laughs.] ‘We each read detective stories and slept in the afternoon, then went for a walk. I dined with Suzanne and Hughes van der Straten and Marjolaine, who’s coming as a student to Brockwood in September. I brought Hughes up-to-date on general KFA matters, including the situation with Rajagopal.’

‘They both liked the biography. Hughes inevitably felt curious, he said, about Krishnaji’s accounts of Masters, initiations, etcetera. Suzanne is not curious. Very nice as always to spend an evening with them. Nice, sane people who live in that spirit.’ Well, that was then.

S: Yes. [Laughs heartily.]

M: August eighteenth. ‘There was a letter from Amanda about Dunne news. At lunch, Krishnaji asked me what the van der Stratens had said about the biography. Hughes’s question, see above, is one that will inevitably arise. We began to talk about it, and Krishnaji let me fetch the Uher cassette recorder to tape the rest of the conversation as we sat at table.’ I wonder where that is?

S: Yes, it's listed here in the archives list.

M: Is it?

S: Mm, hm.

M: Good. 'He said about events in the book, he literally has no memory. Much of the time his brain is empty. The recording of thought is not there, or is only superficial. He said "the boy's" recording system was deficient, and he questioned whether there had been an imprint in his brain cells. There were peculiar phenomena, and one must go back and question, not so much what "the boy" experienced, but why "that boy" was not conditioned. He said that today something similar is happening with regard to his going to India this year. He is not going to make a choice. That would be wrong. "What will happen will be right." The starting point of examination is that "the boy" was untouched as an actual fact, then we can start examining. About the initiation description, he can't see how "the boy" could stay in the room three days. He wasn't drugged. Peculiar things were going on. The whole starts from a mind that was not conditioned, not "diseased." He said that the rest is all minor, like going to a cinema and repeating what he saw or dreamed. But though it must have been extraordinary, it left no mark.'

'I said it must have left a faint mark deep in his mind.'

'"I doubt it," said Krishnaji. "I've tried. I can't get it."'

'I said that the important things he seems to have forgotten, and yet trivial things remain. He recognizes people in photos of that era.'

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: 'I asked if there's an inhibitory action, not suppression, but because, unlike other people, he looks without memory acting?'

Krishnaji said again, that from the beginning, "the boy" was never conditioned. It was a whole phenomenon from birth. And he asked why hadn't he wanted power and money when he was surrounded by it? None of it, apparently, touched him, right from the beginning. He said, unless you answer that, the rest is meaningless. He spoke of his brother's death. He cannot remember it. Why was he not conditioned when everything around him worked to condition him, the Order of the Star, adoration, candles, etcetera. "That is what I would like to investigate." No imprint on "the boy," ill, malaria, up to age thirteen, all the happenings—the "peculiar head all the time." Later on the walk we spoke a little more.'

'I said his lack of interest in power, money, etcetera, is not so mysterious. It could be not his nature, as it isn't in many people, though they are exposed to it. But no conditioning at all is more mysterious. It is as if his mind never took the stain that experience leaves on other minds. He agreed with this simile.'

S: Hm. I think we'll have to end there, because we've run out of tape.

M: Yes, yes.

Issue 37: August 19, 1975 to September 30, 1975

This is a short issue as there was only time for a one hour discussion that day (November tenth 1996). Nevertheless, it seems quite full as yet another esoteric or strange aspect of Krishnaji's existence is discussed by Mary.

Mary: Well, we begin on Tuesday the nineteenth of August, 1975, and we're in Gstaad. 'Krishnaji dictated a letter to Pupul, questioning, apart from the present political climate there, his coming to India that winter. For what purpose or what value did it have? He had the same physical organism, now over 80, and he should consider how best to spend the next 10 or 15 years. He said he had the right to ask, and should ask why, in all these years, not one person in India has been totally completely involved, dedicated to living the teachings. He said he, those in India, and those in America, and England must consider how he can spend the rest of his life most usefully for the teachings. He also asked if they had read Mary's book. She sent copies to several of them in India, and in a letter from Mary this morning, she said she had not heard a word of acknowledgement or comment.'

Scott: Mary Links had not?

M: Yes. 'Mary had not received any word, not from Pupul, to whom she gave a copy in June. Only Shiva Rao wrote. Krishnaji says this is Indian; they don't thank, they take for granted, feel themselves superior. Pupul looks on the Lilliefelts and Brockwood people as middle class and Madhavachari looked down on all non-Indians. Krishnaji said that Shiva Rao was distrusted by Pupul and her crowd, who thought him to be an American spy.' [Both laugh.]

S: Well, the CIA has stooped pretty low, but…[chuckles].

M: 'She and others never would answer political questions in front of him, and when Pupul had Mrs. Gandhi to dine with Krishnaji at her house, she never included Kitty and Shiva Rao. Krishnaji was feeling pretty severe toward all this. Krishnaji read to me from the Herald Tribune that India has cut off Telex and telephone to the New York Times correspondent in India for not self-censoring, and also refused entry to an Israel member to a textile convention that was to be held in India in November. The other members counseled holding it in India. Krishnaji said with vehemence, "I would like to start a political party, not left, not right, a global party." He repeated it watching the television news. We looked at each other, and then more quietly he added, "God forbid!"' [S chuckles.]

On the twentieth of August. 'It was a grey day. A woman telephoned twice on behalf of a woman named Swami Hidrayananda of the Divine Life Society, about seeing Krishnaji. I explained 'No' the first time. She rang again during lunch, and Krishnaji said, "Okay, for five minutes." She came, a middle-aged Indian, an eye doctor, orange robe, hair flowing.

Krishnaji saw her for almost an hour. He said afterward, he had told her, "If you listen to me, you will be lost" meaning her present life.'

S: Mm, hm.

M: 'She has begun to doubt and is frightened, had given up her doctoring work, and husband, and children to join the Divine Life Society, is perpetually on lecture tours explaining the Gita, yoga, etcetera. Krishnaji was compassionate toward her predicament. We went for a walk.'

The next day, 'there was a letter from Mary L. with a good review of the biography in the Irish Times. We walked again.'

Friday, the twenty-second. 'It rained. I went to the Bank Cantonal about the Alzina investments. I switched from Danish to Norwegian bonds and added a little from a cash balance in the Teaching Trust account. The bonds paid 9 or 8.25 percent. Krishnaji will have $3,200 per year income from them. Bill Burmeister came to lunch with Krishnaji and me, then we went to where Krishnaji had a haircut. After that we went for shoes to Mr. Kohli in Saanen. Nadia Kossiakof telephoned from Paris. Marcelle Bondonneau, who left here Monday morning, is in the intensive care ward of a Paris hospital with gall bladder trouble. Mar de Manziarly also telephoned. The outlook is grave.'

On the twenty-third, 'Krishnaji's queasy stomach from last night has continued. He stayed in bed all day. It rained and was rather cold. News of Marcelle is not good. She is on an artificial kidney machine.'

On the twenty-fourth, 'It rained. I packed. Krishnaji was feeling well again. I exchanged the Hertz Peugeot for Taunus to have room for the luggage tomorrow. We went on the usual walk through the woods. On our return, Nadia telephoned to say that Marcelle had died this afternoon. Krishnaji said he had not foreseen it, when I asked, during his conversation with her a week ago. He said, "I couldn't get through to her. She was too nervous."' She'd been in Gstaad the week before. She'd just left.

Monday, the twenty-fifth of August. 'Another cold wet day when we left Gstaad. We said goodbye to Fosca, who leaves for Italy Wednesday. It was warm in Geneva. We were early, and so drove around a little without stopping and then gave Hertz its car at the airport and flew on Swiss Air to London. Dorothy met us. It was a lovely, warm, and sunny day in England. Brockwood was beautiful and quiet. Only a few of us are here. The quiet is extraordinary. Krishnaji said how noisy Gstaad has become, and it was good to be back in our own rooms here.'

The next day. 'We unpacked, put things in order. There was a long cassette letter from my brother reporting on their lives since we last saw them, in Paris. Krishnaji hadn't slept too well, but we walked in the afternoon. It was very warm.'

Wednesday, the twenty-seventh, 'the Mercedes started up immediately. I took it to West Meon for gas, and errands. And again, we walked in the afternoon.'

The next day, 'I took the Mercedes to be washed at West Meon Motors, and walked back to Brockwood. It was a hot day, so warm in the afternoon that Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I walked only in the grove.'

On August twenty-ninth, 'Krishnaji and I went to London. We lunched at Fortnum's, then shopped for books. Krishnaji had a dental appointment with Hamish Thompson and had two fillings. I am getting a cold.' Which might explain why there is no entry at all for the thirtieth, and for the thirty-first it simply says, 'Krishnaji talked to staff.' Then another two blank pages for the first two days of September.

For September third, my diary says, 'I met Mary L. at the train station, and she lunched with us and we spent the afternoon together. Anneke Korndorffer arrived.'

On the fourth, 'I met a Mrs. Davinia Hughes at Petersfield, showed her Brockwood Park, and discussed a possible television interview with Krishnaji on German television by George Stefan Troler. Earlier, Krishnaji talked to Balasundaram about his being responsible for all the work in India. Krishnaji was doubtful about his going there this winter. All advice from Radha Burnier, Achyut, and even Pupul is to wait until things are clearer. I spoke to Fleur Cowles, who arrived from Spain yesterday, on advice about pursuing Krishnaji's British citizenship. She has no pull with the home office. She approved a plan to ask the member of Parliment for this constituency to help. Ian Hammond and Robert Wiffen gave us doleful news. We owe Hants…'

S: Contractors.

M: …yes, Hants Contractors '£8,000 to £10,000 sterling for extras, which Dorothy hasn't got. And the Sweeton family has just arrived: father, mother, three sons, a wife, an infant, to build garages and wash rooms. They donate all labor, but we must pay for material. I offered the Mercedes to Brockwood to be sold. Later, Ian offered to buy it, but Krishnaji and Dorothy say wait and see where we stand after the Gathering.'

The fifth of September. 'I mostly worked at the desk. Fixed flowers. People are arriving for the Gathering. One of the crazy women who was troublesome at Saanen arrived in her van, but Dorothy said she couldn't stay. By suppertime, the house was jammed full. Anneke was here. Pascaline Mallet, Madrisa Samuel, and Madame Banzet, who brought £1,000 donation. Also, Giselle Elmenhorst. The Digbys are in the West Wing.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji gave the first Brockwood talk in the marquee, which was overflowing. The weather was good. Krishnaji asked, "What is correct action for survival with freedom in a disintegrating world?" This is the question he and David Bohm have been discussing as a topic for the Ojai conference next spring. Krishnaji ate in the marquee afterward. Dorothy says we took in £1,300 sterling on the sale of food alone today. There was a meeting in the afternoon of the German publications committee with the Digbys, Cadogan, Edgar Graf, Giselle Elmenhorst, and Fritz Wilhelm. It was constructive. Graf and Wilhelm said that George Stefan Troler does excellent TV work, and urged that Krishnaji give him an interview.'

On the seventh, 'Krishnaji gave his second talk on fear, pleasure. It was one of those talks that takes one apart. I sensed that it was the most complete one ever on these matters. We ate in the tent. People overflowed it. A girl who wrote to Krishnaji after an awful experience in France arrived; and we were able to get her a room. Her name was Michaela Morgan.'

On the eighth, 'Krishnaji discussed the affairs in India with Balasundaram and said it was up to him to create something at Rishi Valley and in all the rest of the work in India. As he talked, he decided not to go to India this year. I made notes on all that was said. We walked a new way across the fields in the evening. Lina Reddy, a former Rishi Valley student, danced.' You were there. Do you remember any of that?

S: I have seen so many Indian dancers, it's hard to…[Both chuckle.]

M: September ninth. 'Krishnaji held a discussion in the marquee. Many came in spite of the rain. It was on awareness. Anneke asked questions about the biography. Krishnaji gave excellent answers. Dorothy had trouble with her eye during the meeting and could hardly see by the end. She went to the doctor. Krishnaji put his hands on a four-year-old child, Emma Jenkins.' Do you remember that little girl?

S: Ah, yes, I do.

M: Peter Jenkins' daughter, who has leukemia. 'A letter from Dr. Wolf in New York. Krishnaji and I will see him there. Krishnaji wants to leave here October fifteenth. We walked across the fields the new way again. Balasundaram came with us.'

On the tenth, 'Krishnaji and Balasundaram talked of Rishi Valley, etcetera, and I took notes. Krishnaji decided definitely not to go to India, and will fly to the U.S. on October fifteenth. In the afternoon, he gave a short interview to Michaela Morgan. We walked across the fields.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji held the second public discussion in the marquee and had his usual lunch there. I worked at the desk, and then a walk.'

On the twelfth, 'Krishnaji had a third, long discussion with Balasundaram on India and also wrote a letter about it all to Pupul. Balasundaram has put forth a constructive plan for Rishi Valley, and the rest of the work, which Krishnaji approved, and added to.'

S: Hm. You don't have a copy of that letter, do you?

M: No. I don't think I do. I'd have to look it up in the, uh…I have a whole file of letters.

S: Yes.

M: September thirteenth, 'Krishnaji gave the third Brockwood talk in the marquee. I talked to three young women interested in Ojai and in the Ojai school, and to a young man, it says, "Hannen?" about the same thing.'

September fourteenth 'was rainy and cold. Krishnaji gave his fourth Brockwood talk. In spite of the weather, the tent was crowded! At 1 p.m., Terrence Stamp brought Ravi Shankar and Alla Rakha and a group. All had lunch with Krishnaji in the tent. A 3 p.m., Ravi Shankar and Alla Rakha gave a benefit concert in the tent. He was enthusiastically received, but the cold and rain kept the audience small. Finally, by suppertime, it was all accomplished. Krishnaji poured out energy, had no rest, no walk, but was nonetheless very well. Balasundaram left, taking all the notes on what was discussed and approved by Krishnaji.' I suppose I have copies of that. I should really go through those.

S: I would like to see that, because if Krishnaji is saying anything about a plan for education, or the organization of schools, it would be interesting.

M: Well, you can see it tomorrow.

S: Yes. Okay.

M: The fifteenth. 'The weather is clear again. The Sweeton family began work on the garages. The Mercedes moves to the barn. The house begins to empty of its guests. I did letters all day. Krishnaji and Dorothy and I walked across the fields.'

The next day, 'I went to London about Krishnaji's visa. Fleur lunched with me at the Berkley. And I went to the opening of Paul Anstee's shop in the Prince's Arcade.'

The next couple of days are just deskwork for me, with walks in the afternoon. Then on the eighteenth, 'I attended a staff meeting at 9 a.m. and students start to arrive. Whisper ran off during the walk, and was back at the house when we gave up searching for her.' [S chuckles.]

On the nineteenth of September, 'Krishnaji and I took the train to London. While he had a Huntsman fitting, I went to the U.S. embassy for his visa. I just got through the queue in time. They will mail the passport. Mary L. met Krishnaji at Huntsman, and they and Amanda and I all lunched at Fortnum's. Krishnaji had his teeth seen to by Hamish Thompson at 2:30 p.m. All was done quite quickly, and we got an earlier-than-usual train back. There was a staff meeting in the evening during which my brother rang from New York. He got my letter about our travel plans.' Well, it goes on about him, and things about my mother. Hmmm, interesting. [S chuckles heartily.] I'm not going to record it!

S: No, no. I know you're not. But, it's just…

M: I'll tell you later.

S: Okay.

M: 'I told Krishnaji about it. "What wasted lives people allow themselves," he said! "Society is sick. Western society has ruined the world!" I asked, where or when was it any better?' [Both chuckle.]

'Everyone is very busy. The students were arriving. Krishnaji dictated letters, and I did desk and desk! Walked across the fields. Whisper got away again, and walked home on her own.'

By the twenty-first, 'all the students have arrived. Suzanne and Hugues brought their daughter, Marjolaine, who was a student here this year. They spent the night in the West Wing. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked. Krishnaji's head was bad. I spoke to Vanda in Florence. She will be in Rome Saturday.'

September twenty-second, 'was the first day of school. The school meeting was at 9 a.m. We had about twenty new students. I talked on the telephone to Mr. Troler of the German television, and also to the BBC documentary department about Krishnaji's appearances. I worked at my desk, did laundry, etcetera. Krishnaji put his hands on the Jenkins child again.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school. Topazia Alliata and a friend from Winchester came to talk and to lunch. Topazia stayed in the West Wing. I went to Winchester to renew Krishnaji's driving license, but got back in time to meet him and Dorothy for a walk.'

For the next day my diary just says, 'desk.' That's all.

On September twenty-fifth, 'it rained. Topazia came with Krishnaji and me in the train to London. Krishnaji had eaten breakfast too quickly and got a stomachache. He was walking bent over as he went to dress. He said, "I may not be able to go," but it passed, and he did. The deadline of catching the 10:45 a.m. seems to get him tense, and he hurries and worries, while having plenty of time. Having Topazia, the nonstop talker along, guaranteed further wear and tear. All the way to Waterloo, it was about the Italian "committee" and Barabino, who goes his own way appointing people who no one knows to head Krishnaji groups all over Italy, at which god knows what goes on. A Mr. Letteri, an old-fashioned type, is on the committee, and was shaken to his roots to attend a Barabino meeting at Biella, where Barabino sat guru-like in a lotus position and discoursed on Krishnaji to a group of eye-shadowed gay men.' [Both chuckle.] 'Barabino collects money, and no one on the supposed committee sees any accounts, or knows anything about it, nor apparently wants to take any responsibility. Krishnaji said, "You are all irresponsible," and that it was preferable to have nothing going on rather than all this. He wants the Bulletin discontinued in Italy; Barabino forbidden to use his name; the mailing list turned over to Cragnolini.' It never was, you know. They never got the mailing list back.

S: Yes, I know. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'Cragnolini, who is the titular president, is to send out any necessary notice of meetings, etcetera. Letteri can help him. Cragnolini's name is to appear for Italy in all of the Bulletins. With most of this, Topazia agreed, but then we got on the subject of Rajagopal and Topazia voiced the opinion that he shouldn't have been pursued by the law. Both Krishnaji and I pointed out, as strongly as possible, that the common thread in these matters is responsibility, legally and otherwise, for charitable funds, etcetera, and not having the right to let the Rajagopals and Barabinos act loosely with such funds; the position of the trust, etcetera. If someone steals from one personally, one may not choose to call the taker into account, but there is no such personal decision permissible as a trustee of funds, other people's donations, etcetera. We talked it all out, but Topazia, as with Vanda, never seems to get it. They don't listen. They only voice their own opinions. The trouble with Rajagopal makes people "unhappy" says Topazia, at which I blew, and said that I did not give a good damn if it makes people unhappy. I care about what is done to Krishnaji. If she saw him in trouble, wouldn't she go to help him? Yes, she replied. Well, that was what one had found out, outrageously, etcetera. We finally arrived at Waterloo, and got her a taxi. When we got into a separate taxi, Krishnaji bumped the top of his head on the door frame. He sat down looking dazed, rubbing his head. It passed, and we got to Huntsman and its soothing atmosphere' [both chuckle] 'for him.'

'We walked through the rain to Fortnum's. Krishnaji had preferred not to wear a raincoat. We lunched with Mary and Joe. We told Mary about Topazia's saying that Vanda was distressed at thinking Mary wanted Krishnaji's letters for the second volume of the biography. Mary was distressed at this interpretation, and wouldn't ask for letters, but wanted only memories of events in Krishnaji's life. Krishnaji mentioned the time "the face" changed and the voice asked Vanda if she would look after him. Mary said these things might be collected and kept for an account to be released only after a stated time. Meanwhile, the second volume could be about the development of the teachings.'

Editor's Note: "The face" and "the face changing" is one of the most intriguing and esoteric aspects of Krishnaji that I knew. Mary and I discuss it at length in at least two later discussions, so there is no point in pre-empting that by discussing it now. However, it seems right to highlight this, and remind readers of the only entry Mary made earlier about this, which was in her diary for December twenty-seventh, 1969 (Issue number 10): 'On seeing the face, I should by now.' It seems clear to me that this was something Krishnaji had said to her.

'Mary told, jokingly, of a sentence she had censored in Krishnaji's letters to her mother. He had written from Ojai, "I am going to Santa Barbara, where I will cook a millionaire."' [Both laugh heartily.] 'To our amazement and hilarity, Krishnaji said, "Yes, and she only gave a hundred dollars!"' [Laughter.] 'It was a Mrs. Bliss. For a man who cannot remember so many things' [chuckles], 'he suddenly remembered this!' [More laughing.] 'We left the Linkses, paused to buy cheese, and in hopeless rain were able to catch a cab to John Bell and Croyden. Krishnaji asked the cab if he would wait and take us to Waterloo. Oh yes, was the reply. "I'm leaving a package in the cab," said Krishnaji.

"It isn't a bomb, is it?" said the cabbie.' [Laughs.] '"No, it's only a Stilton cheese." Smiles. Krishnaji brought his things in record time, and we got to Waterloo in time to sink into an empty carriage, and read all about the capture of Patty Hearst all the way back to Petersfield. It was pouring rain there. After a strenuous day I was relieved when he was back in a warm bed.'

Editor's Note: This was the period of extensive bombing in England by Irish separatists. The cabby's comment was not completely in jest.

So, the next day, the twenty-sixth, it says, 'Packed.'

S: Packed?

M: Yes. I was going to Rome.

S: Ah, ha.

M: 'I did exercises. Made our breakfast. Spoke to Mr. Morton about the garage space for the Mercedes again. Krishnaji obviously wants to keep it, and my offer to donate it to Brockwood dissolved. I spoke also to Phyl Fry, and made arrangement to go to tea with her next Thursday. Yesterday, Krishnaji saw Mary's mother's turquoise ring on Mary's hand, and remembered his wearing it for her. They believed he "magnetized" things.'

S: Hold on. Let me unpack this a bit. Krishnaji saw Emily Lutyens's ring on Mary's hand?

M: Yes.

S: And Krishnaji used to wear it for Emily Lutyens because…

M: …he magnetized…

S: …because she believed that Krishnaji magnetized it. Okay.

M: Sorry.

S: It's alright. I understand; it's just for the record. I knew exactly what it was. [Chuckles.]

Editor's Note: This "magnetizing" of things, especially precious stones, will continue to appear. To my knowledge, we have nothing from Krishnaji explaining it, and explanations from other sources, some of which are traditional, vary too much to provide a consensus, and seem to me to be unreliable. Yet another subject I wish I had asked Krishnaji about when I had a chance.

M: 'So this morning, he wore my four rings.' That's these four [M shows them to S]. 'And, when he told me to be careful, to come back safely, he put them back on my finger, and I felt that they were indeed a talisman, his protection. Dorothy and Doris kindly insisted on taking me to the airport. We stopped for sandwiches at Runnymede. I took British Airways to Rome to see and stay with Filomena. By 7 p.m. I was in her car. She was smiling, dear, and unchanged. A lovely welcome from her and all the family. We talked and had supper that included Fior di Latte.' That's a kind of mozzarella that I like. 'She remembered how I liked it. Her arthritis in the shoulder is better, but it pains her now. We spoke of Malibu. It is as if the years there with us, the peace, calm, the respect for each other has made her an alien to her own family and friends, and they resent her unspoken sense of difference.'

S: Hm, hm, hm.

M: Well, then, I was in Rome, but you don't want to hear about that.

S: Sure, you might as well tell us.

M: 'Well, Vanda, who was to have come to Rome and with whom Filomena and I would have had lunch, is in Florence because of a train strike. So, we talked by telephone. I told her of Mary Lutyens's not wanting her private letters from Krishnaji, etcetera, but only records of things about Krishnaji for posterity. Vanda said she would "do whatever you say"—meaning Krishnaji, and will talk about it in Gstaad next summer.'

On Sunday, the eighth, that's the next day. 'Filomena and her son Mario drove me to the airport. When I left, I said to Filomena that we would see each other next year, whether she feels like Brockwood in the spring, or possibly Malibu in the fall.'

I flew British Air back to Heathrow. It was a warm sunny day in Rome, and the same in England too. After an hour's wait for the bag, I got a taxi to Woking, and from there the train to Petersfield. Doris met me. Krishnaji spoke to the school this morning on fear, and did a dialogue, number ten, with David Bohm yesterday. I got back to Brockwood in time to have Krishnaji's tray with supper ready for him when he returned from the walk. It feels so good to be back, but worth it, as he asks, to have gone to see Filomena.' He always asked, "Was it worth it?" He didn't like me going.

S: I know.

M: On Monday the twenty-ninth, 'Mary L.[1] rang. I told her that Vanda is willing to do whatever about the second volume of the biography. Mary told of her mother's turquoise ring and discussed the ring dazzling both her and Joe the day after Krishnaji had worn it through lunch last Friday. Joe, who doesn't imagine such things, says it was the first time he had known firsthand of such a thing. I told Krishnaji, who nodded. He says it works better with precious stones than gold. He asked for my ring, a diamond that is in the bank in Malibu. I gave him a star sapphire one instead. He put it on his little finger during the morning, but to wear it all night, he said, was better. I did the laundry, housekeeping, and desk. He and I walked with Whisper. The countryside is so beautiful. The smell of autumn in the leaves, adds to such a sense of love for being in this landscape. I am deeply grateful to be here. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw briefly a Mr. Rothman from Argentina. In the evening, I played the tape of the dialogue Krishnaji had with David Bohm last Saturday, number ten in the series. David had asked about "the process," etcetera.'

S: May I just stop for a minute, because I think it's worth going over this: Krishnaji put on Mary's turquoise ring from her mother. And then both she and Joe, and he doesn't have any inclination towards anything esoteric, or…

M: He said it was the first time he had experienced…

S: …experienced something a bit unusual.

M: Yes, yes.

S: …because it was dazzling afterward.

M: Yes.

S: Yes, we recorded it. But I just want to clarify this. It's also worth noting, here, that as I remember it, whenever Krishnaji would go to lunch at Fortnum's with you and Mary, she would bring her ring, and he would…

M: Not every time, but occasionally.

S: Well, every time I was there, he would put it on.

M: Maybe. Yes, and then it would be different. Mary's granddaughter once said, "Oh, you've had it cleaned!" spontaneously, without knowing what had happened.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And these are the rings that he was talking about.

S: I know. Yes. Hmmm. Okay.

M: Tuesday, the thirtieth of September. 'Krishnaji came in saying he had such a strange feeling that he couldn't describe it. Later, he said he woke up at 5 a.m. feeling "something strange." Then, he felt it much more when he got up at 6:30 a.m. "A tremendous energy" flowing inside. Part of it "might have been" a premonition of a cable that arrived this morning signed by Pupul, saying Achyut, Sunanda, Balasundaram, and she agree "under present circumstances" that it would be better that Krishnaji go to California this year. Krishnaji said he was glad of their agreement. He would've gone anyway, but preferred not to go against people. A letter from Nandini told of dreaming twice that she asked Krishnaji, “Are you through with India?” and his reply was “I think so.”’

‘I wrote fourteen letters. We walked across the lovely fields. There has been no frost, and the summer leaves are still on the trees and hedgerows in this lovely land.’

Now, it’s time to stop. It’s ten after 6 p.m.

S: Okay. So, we’ll just call it quits. We won’t do a second side today.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Luckily, Mary Links’ maiden name and her pen name (Lutyens) begin with the same letter. Just to remind the readers that they are the same person.

Issue 38: October 1, 1975 to December 31, 1975

In this issue there is an interesting discussion of Krishnaji's views of organ donation and blood transfusions for him. We also see some of the early teething trouble of the school in Ojai, and the start of Mary working to get Krishnaji a Green Card so that he had automatic entry to the United States. Krishnaji was spending months in California and New York every year, and it was becoming increasingly difficult for him, with his Indian passport, to come in on a tourist visa as he always had. At the same time, he wasn't qualified to come on a business visa, and the hopes of getting him British citizenship had come to nothing.

An observant reader of these memoirs recently commented that he believes this is the first day-by-day record we have of anyone significant in history. After some initial investigation, this seems to be true. Whether such a record is the most appropriate for our generation of readers with their short attention spans is an open question; but for all the people of whom we could have such a record, it is gratifying that it is Krishnaji.

Mary: So, we begin on October first, 1975, and my diary says, 'that a Mr. Malcolm Feuerstein of the BBC came to lunch, and he and Krishnaji and I talked afterwards. They want him to do something on television, a segment of a program on world religions. It is too much associated with gurus for Krishnaji, he said. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I went for a walk, and picked mushrooms and nettles for tea.'

Scott: I remember those first years that I was here, the number of field mushrooms…

M: Mmm.

S: And you and Dorothy and Krishnaji used to come back with baskets of them!

M: Yes, we did.

S: Enough for the whole school!

M: Oh, no. Not that…

S: Oh, yes.

M: Couldn't have.

S: Well, three baskets.

M: Really?

S: Yes, of mushrooms. I remember it.

M: I didn't think it was that much. I remember being rather nervous about them, because of the story [S chuckles] of a little French boy who was naughty, so the parents wouldn't let him have mushrooms for dinner…

S: Oh, I remember, he poisoned the family.

M: …and the whole family died. And there was the picture of the little boy following about seven coffins [S laughs] all by himself. [M chuckles.] That stuck in my memory. [S still laughing.] Don't eat mushrooms you don't know about. And, I wasn't sure that we knew about them.

S: Well, it was perfectly alright.

M: You survived.

The next day, the second, 'Krishnaji talked to the school. And Nadia Kossiakof came for a visit and stayed in the West Wing. I went to tea with Phil Fry; Kit was away, but he returned before I left.'

The third, 'Packing, etcetera. They took the Mercedes to be washed and prepared for storage in the West Meon garage.' That was where we prepared it for storage in the Morton Garage. Not that posterity cares where the car is stored.

S: Yes, we do. It's an important car.

M: Well, there it is. 'Dorothy and I went part of the way on the walk with Krishnaji, then came back for a school meeting.'

On the fourth, 'Packing, tidying, etcetera. At 12:30 p.m., Krishnaji, the Bohms, and I discussed the spring conference in Ojai, and the role of Globus'—that was the psychiatrist with the hat. 'In the afternoon, Krishnaji and David did a taped dialogue on wisdom, intelligence, and truth. Krishnaji and I took a brief walk around the grove. Krishnaji put his hands on the little girl, Emma Jenkins, who has leukemia. I got everything packed and in order, etcetera, before going to bed. Krishnaji and I watched Kojak on television.'

So, now we come to the fifth of October. 'Krishnaji had kept one of my rings for several days. I am to wear it until he arrives. It shines.' [Both chuckle.] 'Krishnaji will be speaking to the school later. I took a taxi to Heathrow. All the school was out in the driveway to say goodbye. Krishnaji was upstairs at the kitchen window.'

S: You were leaving early…

M: I was leaving earlier.

S: …because you were going to stop and see your mother?

M: Yes. It says here, 'Krishnaji was in his dressing gown, so he didn't come down.'

S: Yes.

M: So, the school was down below on the driveway, and Krishnaji was in what was then the kitchen window.

S: Yes, yes.

M: I can remember. I can still see him. 'I took an Air India flight to New York. Instead of an overweight allowance…' [Laughing.] Oh, this is when they had assured me that I wouldn't have to pay anything for overweight, but when I got there some surly young clerk made me pay for everything. [S laughs.] 'He charged me £88 sterling, the worst ever! We were an hour late leaving. There was a long wait in New York for baggage and customs.' Well, you don't want to hear about all that. That's me. I got there anyway. Now, we'll skip my time in…

S: Well, read through it, as we did before…

M: Alright, turn it off.

<Tape cuts out, then resumes.>

M: We now pick up on October fifteenth in New York. 'I moved from my brother's apartment, where I was staying, to a flat in the Ritz Tower, which was on Park Avenue and 57th Street, which…'

S: Had been your father's place.

M: …was my father's.

S: Yes, we know about that.

M: So, 'I put in some food for supper and went to the airport to meet Krishnaji. He came on TWA, and it was on time. After many passengers had come out of customs, suddenly he was there, glancing about for me, all grace and shine in a new tweed jacket…'

S: Hm, hm.

M: Hm, hm. '…flannels, and a jersey shirt. He was elegance and youth. He had asked for the visa to last until May fifteenth, longer than they generally allow for a tourist. So, he had had to see a special immigration man who questioned him. "Would the hostess"—that's me—"be responsible all that time if he should fall ill, etcetera?"' [Both chuckle.] "Where would he be staying in New York? And with whom?" He had to answer all that. And "did he have any friends?"' [Both laugh heartily.]

S: People were so ignorant, weren't they?

M: Absolutely ridiculous. 'Luckily, I had urged him to carry his traveler's checks.'

Editor's Note: Before Mary came on the scene, Krishnaji traveled, often by himself, with absolutely no money; which rightly horrified Mary. So, Mary bought him some traveler's checks, which he dutifully carried for the next more than twenty years—never cashing any, but he had some money for emergencies.

Krishnaji never really handled money. As a boy, Annie Besant wouldn't allow him to carry any because if Krishnaji was approached by a beggar, Krishnaji just gave him/her whatever he had. It was felt that this could lead to something unsafe. Rajagopal continued this, but for less benevolent reasons. The first time I saw Krishnaji pay for something was the first time I met him at his barber in London. Mary had given him a folded £10 or £5 note, and it was very clear that, at the end, he was just giving his barber a piece of paper. He didn't unfold it, or even look at it. He just reached into his pocket and gave the barber the piece of paper he had, and said that it included a tip for the barber as well as a tip for the man who brushed his shirt before putting his suit jacket back on, and brushed down his jacket. When I went with Krishnaji to his barber on subsequent visits, Mary always gave me the money for the barber and anything else we needed to do (e.g., taxies, trains, etc.).

'Krishnaji apparently won the immigration man over, as he gave him the time he requested until May fifteenth. We took a taxi into town. New York is hot, in the eighties. We went out for a slight walk to get him a bottle of Listerine and went to the health store, where he picked up various things. We had an early supper, and he went to bed early. He woke up very early at Brockwood this morning, and it was cold there, and the difference is taxing. I feel very tired too! The ten days away from him, with its quiet and order, and then the atmosphere at Vineyard Haven, and the way that life is there, has been exhausting. And now life is back in order, with peace with Krishnaji.'

Thursday, the sixteenth. 'Bud lent us his car, driven by Les Lewis.' Les Lewis was a friend of my brother who does miscellaneous jobs for him. 'Krishnaji and I went to White Plains to see Dr. Wolf. The autumn leaves are still on the trees—marvelous to see. Krishnaji kept exclaiming as he saw them. We talked about the possible film dialogues being pushed by Mrs. Kornfeld[1]. I reported a feeling from listening to audio tapes that David Bohm was rather flat-sounding. Krishnaji agreed he may come over rather professorially. Who else could do it? Shainberg, but for only a couple, not the whole series. Krishnaji finally thought that Naudé would be good if he would "pull his socks up." [S and M laugh.] He has the capability. "He's our man." I must tell him to be controlled, not over-talkative. Krishnaji, as always, wants to jump ahead. I lean to seeing what develops with backing—we have none at present—and talking it over with Erna.'

'Dr. Wolf and Krishnaji got off on meditation rather than medicine.' [Laughter in voice.] 'Dr. Wolf had a transcendental meditation booklet from a patient. Krishnaji said, "Throw it out!"' [both laugh] '…and told him of the process of desire on brain cells. He also showed him healthy breathing exercises. Wolf said Krishnaji's heart was very strong; blood pressure 120 over 62. Good span between systolic and diastolic. He said Krishnaji's arteries in the eye are those of a thirty-year-old. Said Krishnaji's heart is in the proper position; it used to be slightly pushed to the center. Krishnaji showed him a stomach muscles exercise, and control. He gave Krishnaji an implantation for liver, pancreas, prostrate, seminal vesicle, thalamus, hair roots! Triglyceride count was 209. Enzyme level was 2.2. The Alderhalden test'—that's some mysterious German test. I've forgotten what it's for now, but I used to know—'showed that the April implantation was 75% successful. He should take more protein, also zinc-sulphate, 200 milligrams a day. I had an implantation, too. When we came back, we felt tired and had had enough of New York.'

'Krishnaji suggested we do everything necessary and then stay in all afternoon and evening. So, we sent a plant to Bud and Lisa, visited the just-opened first Woman's National Bank.' [Laughter in voice.] That was downstairs; it was the first bank that was run only by women.

S: Oh, really?

M: I don't think it lasted, to tell you the truth. It was right down on the street level, next to the Papillon Restaurant. [Both laugh.] We went there, I guess, to cash a check. I don't know what. Ah, yes, 'next to the Papillon Restaurant to cash a check, and because I am a stockholder!' Oh, that's right. I got talked into that by Lisa. [S laughs.] Feminist propaganda. Naturally, I lost money. [S laughs more.] I think I gave them a hundred dollars; it wasn't a big investment. Anyway, 'Krishnaji's suggestion was to look in while I cashed a check. A woman bumped into Krishnaji. "I beg your pardon," he said. "Why should you beg my pardon?" was the belligerent reply.' [Laughs.] She's a feminist [S laughing], too. She was offended that he was polite to her! [Both laughing.] I'd forgotten all this. Oh, dear. So many funny things used to happen. 'We had lunch and a rest, feeling the relief at being through with New York. "The body is galloping to Malibu," said Krishnaji.' [Both chuckle.]

On the seventeenth, 'we went back to Dr. Wolf for the test results and implantations. We were back in the apartment for lunch. My brother came by at 5:30 p.m. He and Krishnaji discussed the state of the world, including New York City. The city came to within half an hour of defaulting on its bonds this afternoon, and was saved by the teachers' union pension fund buying a 150 million or so of the municipal assistance corporation bond!' This is what they talked about! Unbelievable. [Laughter.] 'Bud left, and Krishnaji and I had supper and went early to bed. I feel tired.' [Laughs more.] What in the world was my brother doing explaining all that to Krishnaji?! He would listen, you know.

S: Yes. He would have listened completely politely…

M: He used to listen to everything!

S: Oh, yes! [Laughs.]

M: I don't think he knew what it meant, but the fact that the city was about to go broke.

S: Yes.

M: That…

S: …was fascinating.

M: That was imaginable. [Chuckles.]

So, the next day, the eighteenth, 'we were packed and ready before breakfast. Narasimhan just in from India came by to see Krishnaji at 9:30 a.m. We got the bureaucrats' rationalization of Mrs. Gandhi's actions in India. At 10:15 a.m., in a heavy rain, we left for the airport, car with chauffeur driving; and took a TWA noon flight to Los Angeles. At the airport, we discovered Krishnaji didn't have his ticket! We had to report it lost and get another one at the airport. After a smooth flight, we arrived on a gentle, sunny, pleasant California afternoon.'

'I'd asked the Dunnes not to meet us because of my cold. But Alan Kishbaugh was there, and remarkably got all our seven bags into his BMW. We stopped to see Amanda and Phil on the way home. Greetings were exchanged outside.' Phil got a cold if he looked at someone with a cold, so I didn't go in. 'Then went home. The gardens looked beautiful, and were in perfect order. Elfriede kept them well. Kishbaugh stayed to tea. Then, we had supper on trays, and so to bed in the blessed quiet and peace of this house. Only the ocean making its murmur. Enormous relief and thankfulness to be here.'

The nineteenth, 'I woke up wondering where I was, and the ocean telling me. I had a long telephone talk with Amanda, and appreciated the fun and luxury of being able to call easily. I am still deaf from the flight, but feel better because of being here. I unpacked. Krishnaji rested. He is glad, too, to be here.' Then, it goes on about the Dunnes. 'The children came over. Krishnaji came out and talked to them for a bit. And then they left, and Krishnaji and I drove the beautiful Green Beauty down to the market for a few things.'

S: Mm. What market would you have been going to?

M: Well, in Malibu, the one down the road. It kept changing. First, it was Safeway, and then it was something, and then it was something else again.

S: Yes. On the Pacific Highway?

M: Yes. It's right down in Malibu.

S: Yes, I know which one.

M: On the twentieth, 'I put things in order. The Lilliefelts arrived back in Ojai from a holiday motor trip to Vancouver and northern California. I listened to the tape of the Krishnaji and David Bohm dialogue made after I left, on October eleventh, on being without desire.' This is one he did after I'd gone, you see, and he brought it with him. 'I discussed with Krishnaji his being, as he says, unable to visualize or imagine with a picture in the mind. It is as if, in him, memory communicates with the conscious mind, and without images.' I don't quite know what that means, but anyway.

On October twenty-first, 'We went to town to the health food store. And we watched the World Series on television.' It was Boston versus Cincinnati, in case you wanted to know. [S chuckles.]

And on the twenty-second, 'I went to town to do errands, but returned in time for lunch. We walked in the garden and watched the World Series again.'

Now, we go to the twenty-third. 'It is a clear, beautiful day. We went to Ojai, Krishnaji driving most of the way. We left the Mercedes for work at Dieter's and continued to Ojai in a borrowed car, a loaner. Krishnaji is happy with the beauty of the day and exclaimed on the coloring of the rocks and hills. We lunched with Erna and Theo, and discussed the situation in the school.' Um, well, I don't want to go on about this, but somebody was interfering with everything.

S: Mary, don't censor these things at this point.

M: Well, these people are alive and some of them…

S: I know, but they won't be forever, and this is for posterity. This is like hearing about the Buddha's life when all the people are dead. It doesn't make any difference.

[tape cuts out then back on]

M: 'We discussed with Erna the situation of Person X continuing to interfere with the school, that those in the school were not coping with it, and the atmosphere in the school was almost destroyed with not handling the situation. Then Ruth and Albion joined after lunch, and there was more discussion. We went over to the cottage, met Mark and the teachers, Elaine Needham and David Moody. The apartment attached to the cottage is set up as a school. We drove home in time for supper. I had a headache all day.'

S: Apartments attached to the cottage? What does that mean?

M: The ones that were destroyed when I redid the cottage.

S: Right.

M: The twenty-fourth 'was a quiet day. I spent it mostly at the desk. Amanda came over in the afternoon. Helen Hooker brought our bread order, which I forgot to pick up yesterday.' This is back in Malibu.

S: Mm, hm.

M: October twenty-fifth, 'Mark Lee came and spoke alone to Krishnaji. Krishnaji put the situation to him very clearly. He must solve the problem with Person X or he will have "no capacity" for the school.'

On October twenty-sixth, 'Erna and Theo came at 11 a.m. to discuss various things, and stayed for lunch. We all talked all afternoon.'

The next day, 'we went to town to get flats of flowers to plant in the garden.' That was fun. 'We invited Evelyne Blau to become a trustee of KFA, and she accepted.'

The twenty-eighth, just says, 'home all day.'

On the twenty-ninth, 'we went to Ojai. At the cottage, Krishnaji talked alone to Mark who seems to have found a way of dealing with Person X.'

'Krishnaji and I lunched with Erna and Theo at their house. Then, we were joined by Ruth and Albion and went back to the cottage. Krishnaji had met three children, seeing changes in Arya Vihara. Krishnaji saw Michael Krohnen, who was cooking there, Asha, Nandini'—that's Mark and Asha's child—'and others. At the cottage, he talked with three teachers, and trustees about the school, how he would cope with a child such as'—well, the child is named—'who is aged ten, who when introduced to Krishnaji and to me, didn't get up.' [S chuckles.] Not that children get up today when an adult is introduced to them. 'How to bring about consideration, not by coercion, example, etcetera. Moody, Mark, and Needham had no answers. Krishnaji said mostly to get to know the child, get him to reveal his interests, etcetera, and through a relationship with the child to be able to encourage these other qualities. In the car, coming home, I pointed out the need to review our plans for building in view of the difficulty in finding people, etcetera. Present plan calls for house parents in each house. How to find two suitable people. The plans call for the duplication of kitchens, for living rooms, etc. Krishnaji drove home, even though it was dark, slowly and with great control.'

On the thirtieth, my diary reads, 'planted snap dragons and stock and daffodils. Interrupted by rain.'

October thirty-first. I went to see Lailee'—that's the doctor we went to, a woman doctor, Lailee Bakhtiar—'about my leg ulceration. She referred me to Dr. Wylie Barker.' He was the vascular person, doctor. 'Then I met Alain Naudé at the airport. He is spending the weekend with us.'

On November first, 'I went to see the Dunnes after lunch. Alain and Krishnaji joined us there at 4 o'clock. Betsy Drake came too. Then, Krishnaji, Alain, and I went for a beach walk.'

Sunday, November the second. 'Krishnaji and I drove Alain to catch his flight back to San Francisco. We were home in time for lunch. At the table, we discussed that Alain, to both of us, seems to be outside the work, no longer interested, and not really at ease with us. There were too many polite protestations of being glad to see us. Krishnaji has given up the idea that Alain should do the discussions with him. He is too far from it all now. Then, I asked Krishnaji about his remark against giving a part of the body to someone else, i.e., a kidney or an eye after death. Krishnaji is very much against it for himself, or "anyone around me." It was hard to get his reasons. It seemed to be that giving part of one's body, especially if one had been concerned with sacred things, would give some sort of power to the donee, to affect a residue in consciousness. Equally, accepting something, such as a blood transfusion, is to be avoided. One would have to know a lot about the donor. Krishnaji would not take a transfusion. He spoke of the responsibility for the body, and especially the brain. He feels remiss if he cuts himself, for instance. And, the time in September in London when he hit his head in the taxi, he checked himself carefully. "Have I hurt it?" He spoke of the ring he held and had me wear from the time I left Brockwood till he came. Now, he wants me to wear it if I go to town without him. It has a quality of protection.'

S: Hm.

M: 'In the evening, we watched two Kojak films.'

That's interesting about not giving a part of your body away.

S: [Sigh.] Yes. That's why all this stuff, you see [sigh], I don't want to go on about this censoring business, but you know you could want to leave that out because it sounds weird or like he's not being generous or something…

M: No, I wouldn't do that.

S: It seems very important. He's saying something…

M: Yes. He's speaking of this perspective we haven't got.

S: Yes. And he's saying something about…that somehow, being in touch with the sacred effects even the organs, to the extent that if those organs are placed in someone else, it gives that other person some kind of power, or some kind of…something… because of the residue of it, and that they can then use that in some wrong way, which is a very…

M: It's a very…

S: …it's a very special thing to say.

M: Yes. And his not accepting a transfusion, I understand. And in view of the fact that he ultimately did accept, but he did it in order to survive a few days at the end of his life, and he wouldn't have done it if he hadn't been dying…

S: Yes.

M: …and he wouldn't have done it if he hadn't wanted to tell the people from India…

S: Yes, I know.

M: …what they should do.

S: But that is…that's a very different thing.

M: Yes.

S: You see, that's saying that here is a man who, for want of a better term, is a holy man, who can be disturbed by the blood of someone who's, let's say, awful.

M: Yes.

S: That's very different to saying that the organs of people who are around Krishnaji should not be given to someone else because the donee…You know, it's very special.

M: But it makes me think…that, remember, he donated blood for his own operations before his operation. And, then, he didn't need the blood. So, obviously the hospital didn't throw it away. They must've given it to somebody else.

S: But, I don't know if Krishnaji thought about that.

M: I don't think he did. He certainly didn't mention it. I've always thought some lucky person got it!

S: Exactly.

M: Well. We can't know certain things.

Let's see that happened on November third. 'It was a quiet day. I spent it mostly cooking. Gardening, watering, laundry. Krishnaji was sick to his stomach after taking zinc tablets in the morning. And he slept all morning. He was better and up for lunch.'

On the fourth, 'Erna and Theo came at 11 a.m. and stayed to lunch.'

Now, we got to the fifth. 'Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai. At 11 a.m. there was a trustee meeting in the cottage. At 12 p.m., Alan Hooker came to tell us about a Mrs. Barbara De Noon, a possible administrator. Erna and Theo badly want somebody to just take over.

There's too much of a burden on Erna now in the office. Hooker gave De Noon praise. Radha Burnier, who was here on a TS visit at Krotona, joined us for lunch at Arya Vihara. Mark Lee attended the afternoon session about the school. Krishnaji and I left at 4 p.m.'

S: I have here in the archives list that there's an Ojai trustees' recording, and it says here "not for public."

M: Oh, well, that was probably was some school difficulties.

S: Yes.

M: 'Krishnaji and I left at 4 p.m. In spite of it getting dark, he drove the beach part of the way. A tiny silver new moon made his face light up with its beauty.'

The sixth. 'Radha Burnier came to lunch with Krishnaji and me. We discussed the TS, and then KF India, and then more on the social and political conditions in India. Theo brought her and later fetched her. A letter from Balasundaram. Rajan'—Rajan was the, I think, the lawyer for Rajagopal in the case in which KF India was trying to get Vasanta Vihar—'Rajan was willing to turn over Vasanta Vihar to Krishnaji personally in a separate trust.'

November seventh. 'Miranda Dunne came to see me in the morning. Krishnaji and I had lunch slightly early so that he could rest a little before 2:30 p.m., when all the trustees met, plus Mark Lee, David Moody, Elaine Needham, Mrs. De Noon, Professor Donald Davis, Charles Rusch, and David Greene.' I don't remember David Greene. Oh, here, 'David Greene is a young, well-dressed, impressively qualified teacher, Ph.D., from Claremont, who did a dissertation on Krishnaji's philosophy vis-à-vis the psychiatry of Carl Rogers and A. Maslow.' That was his dissertation.

S: Oh, I think I have that one.

M: Do you?

S: I believe so.

M: 'The meeting was rather confused between the problems of what we intend in the school, i.e., psychological change, about which Krishnaji spoke so eloquently; and the how to go about it, therefore, what sort of school buildings we need. We served tea and juices in the dining room, which worked well. We should always have it there when there are so many people. The trustees stayed on and disagreed about De Noon as a co-director of the school. Theo in his eagerness to relieve the burden on Erna had gone ahead and mentioned it to De Noon, whom we have barely met. Ursula, who has relieved Erna of all bookkeeping burdens and things, gave notice today because she wasn't asked to these meetings!' What? 'Things are rather in confusion.'

‘The board wants to end the business with the Rex office.’ John Rex, was an architect whom we’d made tentative movements toward. He had designed a house for the Dunnes, and he also redid the Malibu house after it burned down, because the original architect was no longer available, so I asked John Rex to make plans to rebuild it. And we’d asked him to consider doing the school building, and he did a little bit of work, but the board wanted to end the business with his office, and get another architect. Who?’ I ask in my diary.

‘Krishnaji cabled his approval of a separate trust for Vasanta Vihar, urging Padma Santhanam as one of its trustees.’

S: You don’t think that that would’ve been recorded? That meeting?

M: I don’t know. We didn’t record trustee meetings.

S: Because that would’ve been remarkable, looking at the requirements of the teachings and education and therefore, the kind of buildings.

M: Yes, you’d think so. But it wasn’t the habit to, uh…

S: Because there were other people who weren’t trustees who were there, you see, so it was more like a discussion.

M: Yes, but I don’t remember.

S: Well, it’s not here in the archives list.

M: I don’t ever remember anything being recorded at a trustee meeting, no matter what was going on. It was done in minutes.

On the eighth, ‘Dr. Globus and his wife, Maria, came to lunch.’ That’s all it says. And there is almost nothing for the next two days.

On November eleventh, ‘Mrs. Gita Sarabhai and a daughter, Palevi, and a friend, Mrs. Lee Mullican, came to tea.’ She wrote that book that’s down in the…she knew Krishnaji way, way, way back, the Sarabhai family.

S: Yes, I know of that family. Yes.

M: She’s the one who came with her daughter for tea. And Mrs. Lee Mullican is the wife of a painter, a well-known American artist called Lee Mullican.

Now we come to the twelfth. ‘There was a fire in Chatsworth. It was worrisome at 6 a.m., but then it was contained. And so, in spite of the Santa Ana wind blowing, we drove to Ojai, and met Mark Lee for a talk in the cottage. Then, Radha Burnier came and lunched with Krishnaji and me. We showed her the text of the articles of trust to be formed in Madras to have Vasanta Vihar. Balasundaram sent the text. Radha is named one of the trustees. We drove home rather fast as young Palevi Sarabhai came at 5 p.m. for Krishnaji's healing.' That's the daughter. 'Driving fast tired Krishnaji, so he gave me the wheel the last few miles. In the morning in the car, I asked him about what level in the brain does the ordering up of "duty." What wakes one up, says this and this must be done now, or today, and do it. It can't only be memory and conditioning? Part of the brain's notion of order, survival, but the bad of it is to let it have too much activity. It should be quick, seen, then emptiness. The fire this morning is an example. The mind sorted out the possibilities, priorities. Krishnaji came first, what is best for him, etcetera? But one can over-plan and it becomes imagination, fantasy, and this saps energy that should have space for something else. I had an insight into this today, and also saw that it is this level of thought that is tedious, not things done. The mind free and empty is not weighted by activity on this level.'

The thirteenth of November 'was a hot day in the eighties. Krishnaji again saw Palevi Sarabhai at 4 o'clock for a treatment. Then, we walked on the beach. There were many pelicans.'

Now, the fourteenth, 'Krishnaji again saw Palevi Sarabhai briefly for healing. I had desk things all morning. We had a long beach walk. Monet-scene sky. Not as warm as yesterday. When I went barefoot and felt the fun of the waves and the sand, I also felt how numb my left foot has become. But the feel of the ocean, even in this tiny way, was good. Evelyne Blau telephoned about my asking yesterday if Lou could do anything about Krishnaji's status in this country and citizenship. She says that Lou thinks it is not impossible and will talk to Senator Alan Cranston. Krishnaji is pleased and optimistic.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji again did healing of Palevi, as she came with her mother and Lee Mullican, the painter, whom I met at Betsy's years ago. Krishnaji told me that I am sometimes too slow to drop conclusions. He observed that, when I do see something, that I am quick to get to it. He cited the citizenship and architects.' He meant that I point out difficulties, rather than let things unfold. That's the truth. I've done that always. [M and S laugh.] Sometimes, I thought it was necessary! [S chuckles more.] But sometimes, I clearly overdid it. [M chuckles, too.] '"You are dealing with something different here."' And then I have parenthesis, '(meaning him and what surrounds him). Also said he would like with David Bohm to go totally into one subject and not "jump from thing to thing."'

'At lunch, he said, after listening to a bit of a tape with Bohm on October fourth, "I wondered if, when I talk, I think? I don't." And then another quote: "No memory. Language is memory. You have to use it. You see the tree; you describe it. You use the word, but perception has no thought. There is no thought operating except that of language."' That's nice.

S: Yes, it is.

M: 'We spoke about imagination and he said, "When there is total detachment, that is not imagination. It is a picture without any content, any distortion."' Hmm. 'He said he had woken up this morning at 2 a.m. and couldn't sleep, then meditation began. "Feeling of exultation, elation, exultation."

S: Mm, hm.

M: At 2:30 p.m., he started a possible series of discussions of education. Present were Erna, Theo, Ruth, Albion, Evelyne who brought a Mary Lou Gordon, Mark, Elaine Needham, David Moody, David Greene, Donald Dain, Barbara De Noon, and a young woman, Beverly Sher, just arrived at Ojai for an interview about the school. There was tea afterward. In the evening, Krishnaji turned on the television of the movie Judgment at Nuremburg. I had to leave at the scenes of the camps. Krishnaji watched it and then came into me, and said, "What is the matter with humanity? This is monstrous, people are this way everywhere." He was very shocked.'

On the sixteenth of November, 'Krishnaji and I drove to Canoga Park, merrily off' [chuckles] 'on a favored expedition in the Mercedes. I had bought the new grey 240 diesel Mercedes. We ordered it in the spring to replace the Jaguar. Krishnaji was very pleased. It's neat and nice-looking, a sedan. Dieter met us there.' Dieter's the…

S: Mm, hm. We know.

M: We know Dieter…but for posterity…

S: No, he's in this record posterity too; we've talked about him.

M: Yes, with the cars! [Laughs]. He's the Mercedes car man. 'Dieter met us there, and explained its ways. Then, he took the Green Beauty for its 6,000-mile service, and Krishnaji and I drove off in the grey diesel. Filled it at a diesel station in the valley; they are not too easy to find. We came back slowly. "It's a new car!"' [Both chuckle.] What he was saying was…he made you creep in a new car…

S: I know, I know.

M: …for the first 100 miles at least.

S: Oh, more! When I bought the first Mercedes van for the school, the first run for that after buying it was taking it to Saanen. And I had very strict instructions from Krishnaji that I had to go so many miles at only such and such a speed, and then so many more miles at such and such (slightly higher speed)…But I had asked (knowing Krishnaji's penchant for breaking in a new car) the Mercedes dealer about this, and he had said, no, no, it's been bench-run in. But Krishnaji wouldn't have…[laughter]…any of that.

M: No. It had to be done.

S: So, it took days, it seemed, to get to Saanen! [Both laugh.]

M: We took the new diesel back to Malibu and showed it to Amanda and Phil before going home for lunch. "We must take care of these two cars and make them last for years."'

S: Hm, hm. You have.[2]

M: 'Krishnaji and I walked on the gleaming beach. Watched Kojak. He gave me healing. He is pleased, full of laughter, and so this day shines.' [Chuckles.] His car is about to outlast me, clearly.

S: I want them to outlast me!

M: I'm sure they will.

The next day was the seventeenth. 'Krishnaji saw Palevi and Mrs. Sarabhai at 9:30 a.m. A professional tree pruner began work on the big eucalyptus trees along the driveway. After lunch, Krishnaji and I went to town in the new diesel Mercedes to order mats for it. It drove very nicely, and we were both pleased.'

On the eighteenth, 'Krishnaji again saw Palevi briefly. I was at my desk all morning. Tree pruning continues. We walked on the beach.' See, there's nothing on these days.

S: Well, it's still nice to have it.

M: You don't think the boredom has long since paralyzed [S laughing] the listeners to this saga?!

S: It's an endurance test.

M: Alright. The nineteenth. The large diary starts again. 'Krishnaji saw Palevi briefly for healing at 9:30 a.m. Then, we left in the diesel for Ojai. "I am a little shy of it," said Krishnaji. But, then at Zuma Beach, he took the wheel and, looking very pleased, drove slowly, not over forty, laughing at our pace. "One sees everything this way."' [S chuckles.] 'We talked about American people being "taught to be selfish and to need pleasure" by the movies. We had seen old movies on TV last night, MGM musicals. Out of this, Krishnaji mentioned our schools, and I questioned teaching doing anything except minimizing mistakes. But what Krishnaji is cannot be taught, obviously, the most that can be done is to point out and remove impediments, mistakes, i.e., thought, conditioning, ambition, ego, etcetera. It seems to me that that way, at its widest reach, may make a better human being. But for a Krishnamurti or a Buddha, there must be something inherent in the child, something like, but beyond, genius. Nothing in Krishnaji's education or surroundings influenced what he is. Krishnaji then said that it is like oil in the earth; it is there, waiting to be reached. The children we teach cannot be taught to reach it, but there are young people capable of this. He implied we must find them, or the ones we can teach may have such children. They may be turned in that direction. He seemed to agree, or at least not disagree, with my saying that even if a person were able to shed all the "mistakes," the errors, it would not bring about the "Other."'

'He spoke of an extraordinary meditation last night. I asked if he could describe it a little, and he said it is not describable. I asked him if there is a quality of light in it, that so many people of religious experience speak of light…"en*light*enment." He said it does not seem light, but the closest description would be emptiness. As he said that, it seemed to me that the light—which I have experienced somewhat—is just that—still in the realm of experience. And there is no experience in what Krishnaji speaks of.'

'Krishnaji talked to Mark alone for a while in the cottage. And then we walked down to Erna and Theo's, where we lunched. I took a role of black and white film of him at the table.' I've got those in the other room. 'We had to leave before 3 p.m. because of our slow driving' [chuckles] 'and Krishnaji not wanting to drive in the dark. We stopped at Dieter's to pick up the Green Beauty, which had had its 6,000-mile service, and Krishnaji drove it home while I followed at forty miles per hour.' [S laughs.]

So we have to go back to the small diary for the twentieth. 'I drove Mrs. Sarabhai's daughter back to the Mullicans' after she came to see Krishnaji. Krishnaji and I walked on the beach.'

The next day 'I cooked, then Lee and Luchita Mullican, Mrs. Sarabhai and Palevi came to lunch.'

On the twenty-second, 'At 2:30 p.m., Krishnaji discussed with the Lilliefelts, Ruth, Albion, Evelyne, Rusch, Moody, Needham, De Noon, and Dame. They stayed to tea afterward.'

The twenty-third, 'was a windy day, and we stayed home all day and washed the new Mercedes.'

November twenty-fourth. 'I went to see Dr. Wylie Barker at UCLA Medical Center about my leg. Then I did errands and came back in time for lunch. Evelyne Blau brought an architect, Carey Smoot, to meet Krishnaji and talk architecture. There was a huge fire in Tujunga Canyon, burning over 40,000 acres. The sky was dark with ashes everywhere. It was hot, and there was Santa Ana winds. Mother and Wooge telephoned, worried about the fire.' Wooge is my stepfather.

The next day. 'The winds stopped here. The fire into Tujunga is fifty percent contained. I went to the doctor's, fasting for blood chemistry.'

On the twenty-sixth, 'we drove to Ojai in the green car. Krishnaji saw Ralph Edsel for a few minutes, a young man who is doing yard work for Arya Vihara. Then, in the cottage, we met with five architects plus Charles Rusch, the Lilliefelts, Evelyne, Patterson, and Mark Lee, about the Oak Grove buildings. We lunched and resumed our meeting afterward. All architects agree to meet in Ojai with us on the seventh and eighth, and explore the territory and the immediate building to start the project.'

The next day, 'I cooked and worked at the desk. Spoke to my mother. Krishnaji and I walked. And then at 5 p.m., we went to the Dunnes' for an hour before their Thanksgiving dinner. We came back to our own supper. No turkey.' [Chuckles.]

On the twenty-eighth, 'Evelyne Blau brought Cynthia Wood to meet Krishnaji at tea.' She's a woman who Evelyne happened, by chance, to sit next to at one of the talks, and they fell to chatting, and she wound up, shortly, you'll see, Krishnaji asked her to become a trustee.

S: Mm, hm. Mm, hm.

M: 'She lives in Santa Barbara, and is an unexpected and very generous donor,' it says here.

The next day 'I worked at the desk all morning. Krishnaji held an educational discussion on learning in the afternoon with the trustees, Mark, Moody, Monica Ross'—she was a new person. She died last year[3], and was a very nice woman who ran a school for little nursery children down the road from the Lilliefelts—'Donald Dame, David Greene, Barbara De Noon.'

On the thirtieth, 'We planted poppies and daisies, and the Dunne children came over. Krishnaji and I walked on the beach.'

On Monday, the first of December. 'I fixed our lunch, etcetera. And then I went to UCLA Medical Center to see Dr. Timothy Miller, plastic surgeon about my leg ulcer. He strongly urges a skin graft,' which I did eventually.

On the second, 'I went to see Lailee Bakhtiar'—that's the general doctor that we went to—'at 10 a.m. for the usual checkup, and to discuss the skin graft. She thinks it's a good idea and will talk to Dr. Miller. Did errands all day in town and got home by 6 p.m. Krishnaji says he will be alright here while I'm in the hospital in January. The probable stay is five days?!' That's ridiculous. Anyway.

The next day, 'I spent all morning working at the desk. We walked at low tide, the lowest of the year. Lailee rang about talking to Dr. Miller.'

On the fifth, 'I prepared for the weekend at Ojai.'

The sixth…

S: The sixth is in the big book now.

M: No, it isn't. Yes, it is! God, you read upside down.

S: [laughs] We've been doing this for so long, this may be now the only way I can read. [Both laugh.]

M: 'A beautiful day! Up early to cook the final part of the Spanish rice.' He liked this dish I made called Spanish rice. 'We packed the Green Beauty; at 10 a.m. Krishnaji drove it, while I followed in the grey diesel to Dieter's. We left the diesel with Dieter to have its first 500-mile service and went on in the green one to Ojai. Krishnaji said he woke up in the night with an intense feeling and the sentence, "Suffering and the remembrance of suffering are still in the field of the self." We unpacked at the cottage, and then walked to the Lilliefelts' for lunch. At 2:30 p.m., in the school room of the cottage, Krishnaji held a discussion for parents and teachers. It went well. We took a late walk as the sun set and came back by moonlight. Early to bed.'

Then, we go back to the little book for December seventh. 'We went up at 10 a.m. to the Oak Grove and met architects, trustees, Mark, and Cynthia Wood. We walked all over and discussed the school building. Philippa Dunne and her husband had joined us and came back to the cottage. Krishnaji showed them the place. They and Alan Kishbaugh lunched with us. At 2 o'clock, there was a trustees meeting. At 3:45 p.m., we went back to the Oak Grove for more with the architects.' We had teams of architects!

December eighth. 'Architects and trustees met in the cottage. They showed us revised plans, and the suggested shape of a classroom building. Then, the architects left saying they will send us their plan for the business arrangement with the Foundation. Erna, Theo, and Evelyne lunched with us in the cottage. Krishnaji, Evelyne, Theo, and I walked in the late afternoon.'

The next day, 'Mrs. Kate Mark's two young sons were introduced to Krishnaji. They have moved here from Michigan for the boys to go to our school. Krishnaji and I left Ojai, stopped for the grey diesel, and drove both cars home in time for lunch.'

December tenth. 'Krishnaji and I went to the airport with Elfriede driving us. We flew on PSA to San Francisco and lunched with Mrs. Mathias at her apartment on Nob Hill. Then we took the 4:30 p.m. PSA back' [chuckles] 'to Los Angeles and taxied home, arriving at 6:45. A nine-hour expedition, and Krishnaji was not too tired.'

On December eleventh. 'We were home all day. I did letters; some Krishnaji dictation; spoke to my mother at Vineyard Haven; and had a beach walk.'

The next day, 'I worked hard at the desk all day. I did post office, bank, marketing while Krishnaji walked. In the evening, I telephoned Filomena in Rome about a trust I made for her. Balasundaram telephoned Erna about a compromise for Vasanta Vihar.'

On the thirteenth, 'Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai in the grey car. At the cottage, Krishnaji saw a twelve-year-old girl who was said to have musical and psychic gifts, Belita Adair. We walked to lunch with Erna and Theo. Then, at 2:30, Krishnaji held a discussion at Arya Vihara. We composed a cable reply to Balasundaram and Pupul about their deciding the matter of Rajagopal's lawyers on the Vasanta Vihar trust. We walked with Erna and Theo, and then Krishnaji and I had supper and spent the night in the cottage. We had trouble with a noisy heater. At 2 a.m., we had to go to wake Mark to turn it off.' Mark was living in Arya Vihara.

The next morning, 'there was a meeting in the cottage of Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and Mark and me. Erna and Theo lunched with us, and then Krishnaji and I drove back to Malibu.'

The fifteenth of December. 'Jackie and Sarjit Siddoo came at noon to see Krishnaji and to talk about their proposed school. During lunch, a cable came from Kitty and Balasundaram that Shiva Rao had died today in New Delhi of a heart attack.'

The sixteenth. 'Krishnaji had his hair cut here in Malibu, not too good. I did a bit.' [Chuckles.] 'A cable came from Balasundaram, saying Subarao died today in India. Krishnaji felt it more, he said, than Shiva Rao because "Subarao has always been with us. Shiva Rao was a politician." We walked on the beach. David Nelson did town errands for us.' David Nelson was Philippa's husband.

On December seventeenth, 'I was up at 5 a.m. to finish notes on Krishnaji for Evelyne to give to lawyers about immigration. At 11 a.m., the trustees met, except for Alan Kishbaugh, plus Mark, the Siddoos, and Cynthia Wood and Krishnaji discussed the future of the schools and adult centers. We had a buffet lunch and further discussions till 3:40, when they left, and Krishnaji and I went for a beach walk.'

December eighteenth. 'I talked to Erna, Jackie Kornfeld, and Evelyne, and it was decided to have a David Hoffman do the video taping of the dialogue with Krishnaji and David Bohm, and possibly Shainberg, too. I worked at the desk. In the afternoon, we washed the green Mercedes and walked on the lawn. Balasundaram telephoned Erna that the Vasanta Vihar case is settled.'

Now from the big diary for December twenty-first, because it includes everything from the nineteenth. 'This has been a weekend of many Krishnaji things. We drove up to Ojai after lunch on Friday.' This is written on the Sunday.

'On the road'—driving to Ojai on the nineteenth—'Krishnaji said to me, "Watch and have the mind empty," and then "it is beginning, the head, pressure from the back of the head in the brain." We went to the Oak Grove. Met Erna, Theo, and Mark there, and walked about to look for sites for the assembly building. Krishnaji is not satisfied with the architect's suggestion of putting it up the hill among the trees. We liked one place near the grove itself, at the edge of the meadow. We walked across Besant Road and around Rajagopal's place. "That crook," said Krishnaji'—that's a quote [both chuckle]—'in a resonate voice. At the cottage, Mark, in the school room, ran a newly made copy of a film made in 1925, which we found in the cottage basement, hidden away; probably only the dryness of Ojai preserved it. The lab Erna and Evelyne took it to said they hadn't seen such an old film, and that it was dangerous.' It was a nitrate film.

S: Yes. It's remarkable it didn't burn the house down.

M: Yes, exactly. 'They said it was too dangerous to keep. They copied it well. It was several short reels taken in Ommen in 1925 by a Swedish man. Krishnaji, Mrs. Besant, Rajagopal, Jadu, Lady Emily, and many familiar people that Krishnaji recognized. The film is amateurish and shot in such brief length, it was hard to see well. The young Krishnaji was very much a boy, though he was all of thirty years old. Krishnaji said later, "He must have been developing slowly. The mind wasn't mature yet." He asked afterward how it seemed to us. Mostly, rather childish. The Liberal Catholic Church processions looked rather shocking in a Krishnaji film. Mrs. Besant seemed old, feeble, and not at ease. Krishnaji seemed more curious about our impressions than having any of his own.' [Laughs.]

'Saturday, we slept late, till 8 a.m.!' [Laughter.] '"Eleven hours in bed. That's good," said Krishnaji. I felt the good of it, too. I felt distracted in the morning yesterday, trying to finish things before leaving Malibu, and it was a rest to be in the quiet here, to fix our simple supper, no TV, and then the ease of sleep. I did some marketing, then we lunched with Erna and Theo. At 2:30 p.m., we held a discussion at Arya Vihara that didn't get going, really. There were too many people who aren't versed in Krishnaji's teachings, and don't know how to discuss. We walked afterward.'

'Today I made lunch for Krishnaji, Erna, and Theo. At 2 p.m., an architect, Michael Head, who has built the office building, came to see what could be done about enlarging the apartment upstairs, and pushing both bedroom and sitting room out to include the porch.' That's the flat you've stayed in so often. 'It seems simple. Then, two Italian boys who turned up last night at Arya Vihara having flown here from Turin, wanting to see Krishnaji, saw him for a few minutes.' [Both chuckle.] 'At 3 p.m., there was a tea party at Arya Vihara for old Ojai fans. Krishnaji soon slid out and went for a walk. On our return, Mark showed a second batch of the old films, these done in 1925 at Adyar. Leadbeater, Arundale, Wedgwood, Jinarajadasa in miters and robes.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji was beautiful in Indian clothes. Then, a short film in 1924 with Nitya, briefly. Watching all these, there were "oh's" of surprise and recognition from Krishnaji and "slowly, slowly" when the film was too quick and abrupt. He sat and talked afterward to Erna and Theo, Mark, and me. He hadn't wanted to watch the film with anyone else present. I felt the young Krishnaji, though eager and smiling, was being polite rather than a part of it all. The short glimpses of Nitya moved me very much, and during the meeting at Arya Vihara, I kept thinking of him there, the sadness of his dying there without his brother, and I kept wanting to say to him, "See how this turned out. Krishnaji has become everything. Listen to him."'

'Before lunch today, Krishnaji had a very far-off look, while sitting with Erna and Theo. At lunch, he said to Erna, "You asked about the process. It began here. Pains, fainting. It's probably Kundalini. I am very skeptical about those things. I doubt most who say they have had it."'

December twenty-second and we're back to the little diary. 'Krishnaji and I drove back to Malibu in time for lunch. Fritz Wilhelm was due in the afternoon from London, but his flight was delayed.'

The next day. 'Fritz Wilhelm arrived to stay. David fetched him for me. We had a beach walk in the afternoon; otherwise, I cooked most of the day, making Christmas mousse.'

December twenty-fourth, 'I cooked all day. Spoke to my mother and Wooge. My cousin is in a hospital in Boston. The Christmas Eve party was at 5:30 p.m. and supper at 6, then present opening. Amanda, Phil, Miranda, Philippa, David, Jessica, Mark Renneker, Bill Kirby, Fritz Wilhelm. Krishnaji came to the table and sat up the whole evening, which ended at 9:30 p.m.'

S: Hm.

M: I forgot he was there for one Christmas!

On Christmas day, 'I spoke on the phone to my sick cousin. We had a beach walk in afternoon.'

On December twenty-sixth, 'Ted Cartee arrives for lunch, and to stay. Krishnaji held a discussion at 3 p.m. with the Lilliefelts, Evelyne, Kishbaugh, Ruth, Albion, Fritz, Ted, and Philippa and David. We had tea afterward.'

December twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji, Fritz, and Ted lunched and later, a beach walk.'

The next day, 'Fritz and Ted left for Ojai after lunch. Krishnaji and I walked on the beach.'

The twenty-ninth, 'We were home all the lovely, quiet day. It is as warm as summer. We watched pelicans fishing on our beach walk.'

On December thirtieth, 'Krishnaji said the day is "to do something extravagant." So, we went to the movies, the first time since last spring. In the car going to town, Krishnaji said yesterday's feeling in his head left it "feeling more powerful." I asked, "Do you mean more energy?" Krishnaji replied, "That's it, much more energy. I never felt this before." We stopped at Lindberg's for a few things'—that's the health food store—'then met Alan Kishbaugh at a Mexican restaurant near Lindberg's, El Capote. We had enchiladas and tostadas, and it all seemed to agree with Krishnaji. He had suggested Mexican food. This morning, he resumed with an egg for breakfast and had more kefir. He reported the added protein was good for him. We then went to Westwood, bought a supply of thrillers from Winky'—Margret Winkler, a friend of mine who worked in the Westwood Book Store. 'Then we saw the movie The Man Who Would Be King. Almost good. Krishnaji vouched for the authentic look of Indian trains during the British Raj days. We came home to a long letter from Balasundaram about the settling of the Vasanta Vihar case, and the K Trust Madras.'

Wednesday, the thirty-first of December. 'A quiet day at home. We walked on the beach at sunset. The sand shone with reflections of the sky. One walks in the slanting sun light. I feel "lost" and floating in the light of such days. We had supper on trays as usual and heard a TV broadcast of Krishnaji's favorite, The Ninth Symphony, with Von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Krishnaji watched carefully the way Von Karajan directed, eyes closed, an inward look, and gestures that seemed to shape the music. So, this year ended with a blessing in peace of Krishnaji's presence here.'

S: Mmm, how nice. It's coming to the end of the tape, too. So, it's perfect.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Jackie Kornfeld was the prime mover for the eventual video recording of the series of discussions between Krishnaji, Professor David Bohm, and Dr. David Shainberg, which became titled The Transformation of Man.

[2] Mary kept both of them running beautifully until her death in 2008.

[3] This was recorded in 1996.

Issue 39: January 1, 1976 to February 27, 1976

In this issue, Krishnaji sees the good of his spending more time in Ojai, which necessitates the expansion of Pine Cottage; the planning for which begins.

We also see the plans for an adult center at Ojai becoming firmer, and although it turns out to be a false start, it is interesting as much of the thinking about it would find expression in the first adult center at Brockwood a decade later.

In this issue we also have another small addition to the discussions about "the face."

There is also the intriguing interest that Krishnaji has in "redeeming" the two people who most wronged him in his life.

Mary: January first, 1976. Krishnaji was in Malibu, not having gone to India that year. 'A new year, a new diary. It began in the quiet joy of Krishnaji's presence. His face was the first thing I saw; and his voice spoke the first words of the new year. Then, we each did exercises separately, as usual, but made breakfast together, and played a new record of Gregorian chants. It was a quiet clear morning. One of the Dunne girls lunched with us. In the afternoon, on awakening from his nap, he and I washed the grey Mercedes. It is cold today. My fingers grew numb inside the rubber gloves. We walked over to Amanda and Phil Dunne to wish them a Happy New Year. All their three daughters were there, and also David—a friend of theirs. Krishnaji thought that Amanda looked unwell, withdrawn. Was she in pain? I asked her later. She said, "No, only a bit tired."'

S: Now, just to ask a question here that others may have, as I've done throughout these interviews: the grey Mercedes is the one…

M: That's the one I considered my car.

S: Right. And the Green Beauty…

M: I considered that Krishnaji's car.

S: Krishnaji's, yes.

M: 'The next day, in the grey Mercedes, we went to Ojai in the afternoon and settled into the cottage. It was very cold there. The temperature had gone down to nineteen degrees[1] this week, but it was snug in the cottage. We walked a little. I made supper, and after some TV, bedtime came early.'

On January third, 'we went to and then walked on the Oak Grove land, meeting Charles Rusch and Carey Smoot.' They were architects involved with the plans that we had to build more buildings for the school, and ultimately to do something about Pine Cottage.

S: Right.

M: But we'll come to that. 'We were thinking about a possible place for an assembly hall.' Well, we never could build that. We didn't have the money, so that didn't happen. 'Carol Smith, Joe Zorski, and Eirena Gregory on holiday from Brockwood were there. Krishnaji and I lunched with Erna and Theo and then went to Arya Vihara, where Krishnaji held a discussion with teachers, parents, and Philippa Dunne and David, her friend, came too. Also present were Fritz Wilhelm, Ted Cartee, Joe and Carol. Afterward, Krishnaji walked with Fritz Wilhelm and asked if he would like to join the KFA as head of an educational center in Ojai.[2] He said, yes. He would leave Germany and his teaching job there and move his mother to Ojai, some day.'

Sunday, the fourth of January. 'Krishnaji saw David Moody at 12:30 p.m. Erna, Theo, and Fritz lunched with Krishnaji and me in the cottage and discussed his coming here and what was involved. At 2:30 p.m., there was a private discussion with Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Ruth, Albion, Alan Kishbaugh, Mark, David Moody, Fritz, and Ted Cartee. Krishnaji came to a new expression of what there is when conditioning is understood and "chopped,"' it says here. '"Then, there is a special something original," he said.' And I underlined "original."

'Afterward, Krishnaji spoke alone with trustees only, regarding Fritz heading the center. All agreed to it. Krishnaji then fetched Fritz and talked together. He is to think it over carefully, discuss the move with his mother and brother, a U.S. citizen living in Chicago, and when he returns here in April for the public talks, he will make it all definite and concrete. Krishnaji walked with Erna, Theo, Alan K., and me. And then we had tea. Fritz flies back to Germany tonight.'

January fifth. 'Krishnaji had eleven hours of rest, he told me, happily feeling the good of it on waking up. Over breakfast, he talked at length about seeing what his presence had done here and the need to spend extended time in Ojai. That points to a need to expand the cottage to be a proper house. And we talked about this, and which architect to use. He said, too, that Ojai, Brockwood, and India must be brought together. He puts his faith in Sunanda and Balasundaram. "Pupul is diminishing," he said. He said that Bohm, Fritz, the Lilliefelts, and I must talk in the spring about what the center ought to be. He said Brockwood has reached a level as a school, but that it is not enough. It's too limited. It must "flower as a European oasis."'

S: Mm.

M: 'He said, "I must do this, the center, before I die." He wants to stay alone in the cottage on the weekend that I am in hospital'—I was about to have a skin graft on my bad leg, so I had to go into the hospital, and I was concerned about his being alone—'…instead of staying with the Lilliefelts.'

'"Something is happening here."…"I feel safe here now."…"I don't want to interrupt it." He doesn't want any strange person to stay in the cottage with him. He will take lunch and supper with the Lilliefelts. We left in the usual rush. The presence of too little time again. And then I say to myself, "Am I too inefficient, or is it all really too rushed?" Practical things have to be done, and they take time. I do not seem to be able to do three things at once. But the ride back was quiet and unhurried. Krishnaji drove the second half. We looked for signs of rain over the ocean. Ojai has had only a half an inch of rain. We got home for lunch. I telephoned the hospital regarding my admission next Monday, and about material for curtains in the expanded apartment over the office—we are pushing the bedroom and sitting room walls out to include the porch area'—that's upstairs—'almost doubling its size. Krishnaji is very pleased, and chose the chintz for curtains, rather like the ones in his cottage sitting room, which he still exclaims over each time we arrive. After lunch, he said his head was "beginning" again. We walked on the beach and gave persimmons from Ojai to the Dunnes.'

Now, we go to the sixth. 'After lunch we went to town to see a movie, but it wasn't playing, so we came home.'

S: By town, you mean LA?

M: LA, yes, or it could be Santa Monica. In other words, not Malibu.

There's nothing really for the seventh.

On the eighth, 'Joe Zorski and Carol Smith, here on holiday from Brockwood, came to lunch with us in Malibu. Krishnaji and I washed the car.' [Both chuckle.] That often happened.

S: Yes. It had been a whole three days since you washed it last time!

M: That's right. [Laughter.] And somewhere in here, we apparently waxed it. I don't remember that, but it says so. [Chuckles.]

On January ninth, 'We left at 2:30 p.m. for Ojai, Krishnaji driving the Green Beauty. Another cloudless day, though, rain was predicted. One is impatient for clouds. Singing Frère Jacques,' [chuckles], 'Krishnaji smiled in recognition.'

S: You were singing Frère Jacques?

M: Apparently. 'After, we traded seats at the usual stopping place…' There was a place, with some big trees, where we would switch because he didn't like to drive in town traffic. He liked to drive on the open road. '…I drove and Krishnaji sang, as he always does, in Sanskrit, a chant.' [Both chuckle.] You've heard that.

S: Yes, yes. I've heard it many times.

M: 'We stopped to get cheese and special coffee. Erna came for a walk. She says that they will stay above the office next weekend if Krishnaji stays alone in the cottage.'

That's so they'd be near by, the office being right next to the cottage. 'At supper, Krishnaji said I was slipping into habits. I don't control my body. Why? Am I worried about my cousin?' My cousin was terribly sick. 'Or about my own operation? No. Only fatigue at times. I feel well, have plenty of energy mostly, but it runs out sooner. Krishnaji said I was much more energetic at Brockwood. He said that with him, I should have the most energy. "What will you do if I die?" he asked. "Will you stay with it?"'

'"Yes," I replied.'

'"No, I am asking it wrongly," he said. Then, he said, "Do you feel something in the room?" I had and did. And strangely, the tiredness I had felt disappeared as if a transfusion of strength had been given.'

On January tenth. 'At breakfast Krishnaji said, "I once saw 'a face.' I've been feeling 'that face' all night. Something happens to me here."'

'I asked, "Something curious happened to me last night when you were talking to me. Did you know that?"'

'He replied, "Yes. I will tell you sometime, not now." He went on talking about being here. It was important. He may return here on Wednesday, while I am in the hospital. We talked about living here all the time without Malibu. Would I mind giving up Malibu? I said I loved it, but was not attached to it. My home is where it is best for him and the teachings.'

Then, there's a thing about Mr. Schwartz—that's the man with the curtains.

S: Read it.

M: Oh, no.

S: Yes, go on.

M: It's nothing to do with Krishnaji.

S: I know, but it was part of your life with Krishnaji.

M: 'Mr. Schwartz, the decorating man came with samples of corduroy for the office apartment sofa and to measure for curtains. Krishnaji had asked Mark to send over lunch as Theo is sick, and we are not lunching with Erna and Theo. Michael Krohnen brought over some delicious things. Krishnaji and I ate alone, washed up, and I went to pick up Mar de Manziarly at the lumber place.' The lumber place is on the road, and her sister's house was back in the hills. As we weren't very friendly with Mima (who was an ardent supporter of Rajagopal), I didn't want to go to her house. So, Mar walked down to the road to the lumber place and I picked her up there. 'She is staying with her sister, Mima Porter. I brought her to the cottage, and then with Krishnaji, we walked to Arya Vihara for Krishnaji's discussion with teachers and parents. I spoke to Rusch afterward. It points to Charles Moore being the architect for the cottage. I arranged for a drawing plan of the cottage, as it is, to be made right away. I drove Mar back to Porter's gate. Krishnaji, Kishbaugh, and I walked in the dark. Krishnaji told Kishbaugh that we need more young trustees. "I want to involve you more," he told Alan. At supper, Krishnaji said, "I will live another fifteen years, and you another twenty."' I've already outlived my twenty.

S: Good. But it's another twenty we're talking about now.

M: 'He looked intently at me. I asked what it was. "I feel that other thing." For me, it is interesting that I haven't felt tired at all today.'

January eleventh. 'Krishnaji had Erna in to talk about my rebuilding the cottage and perhaps living in it for good; how to handle it.[3] Erna felt that Louis Blau could advise. I somehow got lunch cooked and fetched Mar de Manziarly at her sister's. She lunched with Krishnaji, Erna, Alan K., and me. Then, she stayed for the discussion with Krishnaji, Erna, Alan, Ruth, Albion, Mark, David Moody, Ted Cartee, and me. Krishnaji continued on the subject: Is there something original and not in the realm of knowledge and self? Do we see that we live in conditioned thought? How do we drop concepts to see the false and remaining only with the question? I questioned not accepting answers, "Even from God himself." To truly ask is not to know, and from this, something different can be. It takes great energy and attention to remain in the question.'

'In the car coming home, I asked about "the face." He has seen it often, "out there like that bush there." A face only, not a body.'

'I asked, "Does it move or speak?"'

'"No. I have been seeing it since that night"'—I put in parentheses—'(Friday).' That was Friday; this is Sunday.

M: So, that's two days ago…'"not outside, but inside. It usually means it is moving into this body."'

S: So "the face" moves into the body?

M: Yes. 'I asked if it could presage his "going off," and, if so, should he stay alone in the cottage while I am in the hospital?'

'"That will not happen when I am alone," he said. "The body must be looked after."'

'I am still feeling this absence of fatigue. We talked more about the cottage, living there. David and Philippa were waiting for us in Malibu. They will stay there with Krishnaji till he goes to Ojai while I am in hospital.' I wanted somebody in the house.

S: Of course.

M: Now, Monday, oh, this is when I go to the hospital. You don't want to hear all about my hospital stay, surely.

S: It would be good for the record if we knew briefly what it was about.

M: Well, alright. What I was having done was a skin graft to fix the ulceration where I had had radiation on my leg as a girl. Briefly, what happened was that 'Amanda drove me into the UCLA Medical Center, stopping on the way for me to glance at a Charles Moore designed house in Santa Monica Canyon. I checked into the hospital, and a private room on the ninth floor. I spent the rest of the day and evening on various pre-surgery tests. Dr. Bakhtiar'—that's Lailee, she was our doctor—'came by. Dr. Miller'—that was the surgeon—'and a Dr. Reynolds, an anesthesiologist, came by to discuss. There's to be a spinal, I don't want any general sedation, and only a mild dose of valium intravenously. I talked on the phone to Krishnaji, and gave him the news. Krishnaji stays at Malibu for a few days. Philippa and David are staying in Filomena's old room so as to be on hand. My surgery is to be at 7:45 a.m. I slept well without any unease. I have had no resistance to all this. No worrying or sense of tension.'

S: May I stop for a minute and ask about something?

M: Sure.

S: I mentioned to Krishnaji [pause] I don't know how many times, but that when he was giving a talk, on several occasions, I saw his face change. And in fact, I even saw it on one videotape.

M: So you told me, which seemed remarkable.

S: But, in your mind, is that related to "the face" that Krishnaji was talking about? Or, is it…

M: I didn't see it change in those days.

S: Right.

M: I've since seen it change when he's talking.

S: Right. So, do you think it's related, or is this just silly speculation, or what? Krishnaji never said anything about it?

M: Well, he said what we just recorded.

S: Right. But the relationship between that face and…

M: And he once said to me, "Did you see 'the face?' I wish I could see it," as though…

S: He hadn't seen it. But, he'd seen it, apart.

M: He'd seen "the face," and according to this, it seemed to move into him, but he didn't say, as I'm looking at you, of course, with several feet of space. He hadn't seen it that way. At least, that's my understanding.

S: Right. Can you read that bit again?

M: 'In the car coming home, I asked Krishnaji about "the face." He has seen it often, "out there, like that bush there."'

S: Yes, so he saw it externally.

M: Yes. He has seen it often. '"A face only, not a body."'

Then I ask, '"Does it move or speak?"'

He replies, '"No. I have been seeing it since that night"'—I put in parenthesis '(Friday),'—and this was on Sunday, two days ago—'"not outside but inside."' So he seems to be saying two different things: He has seen it outside and inside.

S: Okay. That's the end of it, right?[4]

M: Mm.

S: Alright, so anyway, let's go on.

M: So, we now go to the thirteenth. Well, it's just about my surgery.

The next day, I'm still in the hospital. 'Krishnaji telephoned. He went to Ojai with Theo. He's staying in the cottage alone. The meals are sent over from Arya Vihara.'

'Philippa's David brought me'—they don't let you have jewelry in surgery—'brought me my rings from Krishnaji.' Krishnaji used to take, as he did with Mary Links, he would take my rings and he would either put them on his finger or put them at night by his bed, and he would magnetize them, whatever that means.

On January fifteenth, 'I'm still in the hospital. Krishnaji telephoned from the cottage, and said that all is well. Dr. Miller said I could go home soon. He said the scar tissue was very deep, more than he expected.'

January sixteenth. 'I'm still in the hospital. Krishnaji telephoned again. I waited all day for Dr. Miller's visit.' Oh, just medical stuff.

The next day, 'Krishnaji telephoned. I was able to take a sponge bath and wash my hair.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji held a teacher-parent discussion at Arya Vihara.' But as I wasn't there, so there's no record of it in my diary.

On the eighteenth, 'I'm still in the hospital. Krishnaji telephoned. My mother and stepfather telephoned. Dr. Miller said I could go home the next day, in an ambulance. I must be quiet another week, I reported this to Krishnaji.'

Now, the nineteenth. 'They took out the rest of the stitches. The operation is over, the graft took. There was no malignancy. The surgery went as planned. I dressed. An ambulance took me to Malibu by 1 o'clock. Home, blessedly, home again. I bathed and got into my own bed!' I have an exclamation point. 'Elfriede gave me a tray with lunch. Krishnaji arrived with Theo in the afternoon. Such peace and blessed feeling. I am truly blessed. Happiness,' it says.

January twentieth. 'Krishnaji, after breakfast, talked of remodeling the cottage. Rusch has asked Charles Moore, who is eager to do the design. Krishnaji was concerned about my finances. "You must live as you do now, be able to travel," he said. We agreed that "my job is to look after K." He then said that at Ojai, he had a feeling'—this is interesting—'he must offer a chance to Rajagopal and RR'—that's Rosalind—'to redeem themselves, expiate their sins before they die. Must do it, so they cannot refuse, for if they do, it will be worse.'

'"Greater damnation?" I asked.'

'"Yes," said Krishnaji.'

Editor's Note: This is such a singular expression or sentiment in the record of Krishnaji's life that it is worth noting. The two Rajagopals were, to my recollection, the only people he ever referred to as "evil," and he did so on more than one occasion. That Krishnaji felt they, for their own sakes, should "redeem themselves," and "expiate their sins," says not only volumes about how he understood them, but also about his understanding of the nature of death that he did not express elsewhere. If, as Krishnaji frequently described death, a person's consciousness simply returns to "the stream of human consciousness," then there would seem to be no consequences to them of non-redemption and non-expiation that reach beyond death, but that doesn't seem to be what is implied. Even if we dismiss the notion of "damnation" as one that Mary introduced, Krishnaji seems concerned, for the Rajagopals' sakes, to mitigate some effect of their lives and actions; a mitigation that Krishnaji holds to be important and that is no longer possible after death.

'He talked to the Lilliefelts yesterday, who must've been shaken by this. I listened without comment. Then he said, "Rajagopal was a Brahmin. I want to tell him that." I thought to myself that Rajagopal was and remains a crook and a miserable human being.'
