August thirteenth. 'I talked on the early walk with Dr. Parchure about what pulled Krishnaji down this week. Possibilities: One, it could be the shot for hand tremors that Dr. Lichti prescribed. Parchure is not sure what is in them except that it is not a drug. It's something that acts slowly, and after having them for two weeks, the cumulative effect may not agree with Krishnaji. They have been discontinued. Two, stress. The only stress this week has been Krishnaji's concern about the Bangalore school Shankar matter and KFI not handling it. Also, Sunanda's refusal to join in the interschool journal which Mary Cadogan wrote to her about. He feels it is a "separative" reaction, which Krishnaji deplores.' Meaning separation of the Foundations, pulling away from shared work. 'Other forms of stress lie ahead. Whatever tensions come up at Brockwood between Dorothy and the four, the stress of travel, the stress of the court case in Ojai, etcetera. We will have to see. But for today, the mountains looked benign because Krishnaji looks well, and I have finished all'—underlined—'the wretched letters, and have begun editing some Letters to the Schools, which I will type on the IBM typewriter back at Brockwood. I telephoned Filomena in Rome. Erna rang. Her deposition is postponed to September thirteenth.'

There is nothing of significance on the fourteenth, but on August fifteenth, 'Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I left Vanda, Fosca, and Tannegg at 9:45 a.m., drove to Bulle where we got on a new-to-us autoroute to join the lake one near Vevey. We stopped at 11:30 a.m. at Mr. Grohe's in Buchillon for a slight visit and continued to Cointrin.' That was the Geneva airport. 'Krishnaji agreed to a wheelchair, which worked splendidly.' [Chuckles.] I had to trick him into that.' [Both chuckle.] I will digress for a moment to explain this satisfactory effort. I always had, even when there were three of us like now with Parchure, Krishnaji and me, all passports, tickets, etcetera, and on this occasion, I went up to the young woman behind the counter to check us in. I had previously suggested using a wheelchair to Krishnaji, who said, 'No, no, no, no, everybody will think I'm sick.' So, I said no more, but when I got up to the check-in counter this time, I asked in French to the lady behind the counter if they had a "chaise roulante pour monsieur?" and "Oh, oui madame," she said. Krishnaji heard this, but before he could say anything, she was sending for it. [S laughs.] And then, it will probably be in here, but what happened was extraordinary: A sort of middle-aged man pushing a wheelchair arrived shortly, and when he looked at Krishnaji, he almost fainted, because it seemed he had been going every week to watch videos of Krishnaji's talks, I think at Grohe's place. So, this man was driving from where he lived, presumably in Geneva to Buchillon, where Grohe lived, to watch videos, and here he was to push him. [Both chuckle.] I don't know if that's described in this but…

S: It's good to have it. Yes.

M: It was wonderful. 'Krishnaji agreed to a wheelchair'—so, I don't put in here all the drama—'which worked splendidly. [S laughs.] 'Swissair landed us in Heathrow at 2:30 p.m.' Part of my wanting a wheelchair was because when we get to Heathrow, there is always a long line for immigration and customs.

S: Yes, I know. It can be terrible.

M: And one has to stand, and then move two feet, stand, move two more feet…

S: Yes, it can take hours. I know.

M: And I was trying to avoid this, and it worked beautifully.

S: Yes. You were quite right. One of the small victories in life. [Both chuckle.] There's few enough as it is, yes.

M: 'Rita Zampese was there, and so were Ingrid and Harsh. The wheelchair got Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me past an enormous queue, and we were back at Brockwood soon. The country is in drought. Dorothy and others were there to greet Krishnaji. We are glad to be back. Builders have started today on the house.'

S: It was probably the builders starting that day on repairing the fire damage.

M: Probably. August sixteenth. 'Dr. Parchure and I walked at 6:45 a.m. I asked Dr. Reilly to come and examine Krishnaji as he still has bronchial symptoms. He prescribed Ethromycin and will do blood samples tomorrow. I went to Alresford to fill the prescription and also got a Magimix to make carrot juice. Krishnaji remained in bed. It was a warm day. It was good to see Dorothy looking well. I telephoned to Mary Links.'

The seventeenth of August. 'I walked alone in the early morning. Krishnaji is feeling better but staying in. Dr. Reilly came at noon and took blood samples, which I then took to the Winchester Hospital lab in the afternoon. It was a hot day again. I got Brothers Karamazov and Tergenev's Hunting Sketches for Krishnaji.' I did? I can't imagine Krishnaji reading those books.

S: Brothers Karamazov, no. I can't either.

M: No, and what they call Hunting Sketches, according to writer friends I used to have, is really valued because of its beautiful style, not the stories.

There's nothing the next day but more unpacking. On the nineteenth, 'I went to London with Dr. Parchure to get him a visa for the U.S. at the U.S. embassy, and then to TWA about our tickets. Also, we got Krishnaji a pair of New Balance track shoes. It was hot in London. We got back at 6 p.m. Krishnaji had seen Dr. Reilly, and the blood tests are "normal." The Bohms are here.'

The next day is just 'early walk for me around the lanes. Betsy came down at 1:30 p.m., and spent the afternoon. I talked at length with Dorothy in the morning.'

August twenty-first. 'Another early walk for me, this time across the fields and back on the lane. Krishnaji did the same walk in the afternoon with Scott. I helped put chairs in the marquee.'

August twenty-second. 'Krishnaji and I went by train to London. Joe and Mary met us and dropped us at Huntsman, where they agreed to make two pair of light linen and terylene trousers for Krishnaji to take to Ojai on the seventh. We walked to Hilliard's, where I tried on new trousers.' Hilliard's was another tailor down on Cork Street that I used. 'Then we went to the Linkses, where we both had lunch with both of them. They drove us back to Waterloo. We had to change at Gilford, which entailed a wait. We got back by 6 p.m. Krishnaji has now finished his course of Ethromycin.'

The twenty-third. 'We both went on an early walk across the fields. Krishnaji's voice is hoarse. He rested most of the day. Pupul telephoned, saying that she is not coming to the U.S. in September. She said Krishnaji must not go to Sri Lanka as it is now too dangerous with the conflict there. Krishnaji told her he would like more time to rest before India, so the Delhi talks must be postponed a little, and he will leave for India at the end of October.'

August twenty-fourth. 'We did the early walk. Mary and Joe came to lunch, and Mary stayed the night in the little room in the West Wing. Mary Cadogan was also here during the day. She and Mary Links talked to Krishnaji about the Indian book. Mary C. and Dr. Parchure and I discussed Krishnamurti people in the Asian countries. In the evening, Krishnaji, Mary Links, Dorothy, and I looked at a video cassette of the Paul Newman film called Answering Malice.' I don't remember that.

The twenty-fifth. 'I took an early walk, then talked to Mary most of the morning. Krishnaji slept. Anneke arrived. Joe came for Mary, bringing his sister, and they left. Krishnaji gave an interview to Mr. Vallère-Gille for broadcast on Belgian Radio. Krishnaji watched a videocassette film in the evening.' I write this as though there's only one Belgian radio station [S laughs], but I may be being dismissive of the Belgian possibilities, but that's what it says. [Chuckles.] It never occurred to me…

S: That they would have two.

M: Or more. [Both chuckle.]

August twenty-sixth. 'Didn't walk early, but did exercises. People arrived all day for the Brockwood Gathering. Krishnaji dictated letters. At 4 p.m., he saw the Fundación trustees. Then he, Scott, and I walked. I telephoned Erna about the cancellation of Sri Lanka.' She wanted to put it in the Bulletin.

The next day, 'It was a warm, clear day. Krishnaji has a bit of laryngitis, but gave a fine first Brockwood talk[1]to a large crowd. Afterward, we had salad in our kitchen, and then he went down to the tent for a short while. Dorothy was in the tent before and during the talk. Krishnaji, Scott, and I walked in the late afternoon.'

August twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji gave the second Brockwood talk. His voice was throaty at first but improved as he spoke. There was a huge crowd. Again, after the talk, he had salad upstairs, and then went to the food tent for the hot food. The walk at 5:30 p.m. was with Krishnaji and Scott.'

The next day. 'I sorted questions for tomorrow. Krishnaji saw Felix Greene in afternoon.'

August thirtieth. 'Krishnaji held the first question-and-answer meeting. He answered four questions. Krishnaji, Mary C., and I talked to Donald Ingram Smith about Australia at 4:30 p.m. The afternoon walk was with Krishnaji and Scott.'

The thirty-first of August. 'Krishnaji and I went to London. Mary and Joe met us. Krishnaji fitted his two thin trousers at Huntsman. I fetched mine from Hilliard's. Mary lunched with us at Fortnum's. Krishnaji and I bought cheese, a new one, Lymeswold, and went to Hatchards for books. We caught a taxi to Waterloo and reached Petersfield by 5 p.m. Robert de Pomereaux came at 6:30 p.m. for Krishnaji's treatment.'

September first. 'Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer meeting. Too many young people spoke up.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji went to bed and had lunch on a tray, but he got up later to treat de Pomereaux and Alfonso Colón. Then Krishnaji, Scott, and I walked around the lanes. I talked after supper with Nicole Philippeau.'

September second. ‘I took the car for its required annual inspection. In the afternoon, I met Alan Kishbaugh and Stella Resnick at Petersfield. They are here for the weekend. Krishnaji talked after lunch to Elena Greene.’ That’s Felix’s wife. ‘I went on the walk with Krishnaji and Scott. Krishnaji treated de Pomereaux, and there were gale winds in the night.’

The third of September. ‘Krishnaji gave a very fine third talk[2]at 11:30 a.m. Mary and Joe came. Joe had salad with us after the talk, and then Krishnaji went to the tent for hot food. Mark Edwards photographed Krishnaji and David Bohm. He treated de Pomereaux. I walked with Krishnaji and Scott. It was windy.’

September fourth. ‘It rained. Krishnaji gave the fourth Brockwood talk—one of the greatest ever.[3] We had salad upstairs, and then went back to the tent for the rest of the food. Krishnaji was interviewed by Tim McGrath for the Irish Times. Kishbaugh and Stella left, and so did many others as the talks are over.’

The fifth of September. ‘People are leaving. It is a beautiful day. Krishnaji treated de Pomereaux, then walked with Scott and me. In evening, Krishnaji and I watched a videocassette movie.’

September sixth. ‘I worked to finish up the things on my desk. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji met with Dorothy, the committee of four running the school, and me. Then I walked with him and Scott. Though we are taking only hand luggage tomorrow, I was up until midnight finishing things.’

September seven. ‘Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I left Brockwood; Krishnaji and I going in one car with Stephen, and Dr. Parchure with Scott in another. Those at Brockwood were out on the driveway to see Krishnaji off. Dorothy looked on the edge of tears. She is disturbed and unhappy. I think I understand, as though I could see into her head, and I want to write her. I talked to Stephen on the way to Heathrow—how difficult it is for people, so close to working well together and yet tripping over the quirks in their own natures. Scott was in the backup car in case of a puncture. Krishnaji had said it was necessary. Rita Zampese met us at Heathrow, and helped very much with the ticket counter man as the return portion of Dr. Parchure’s ticket had been lost. Rita brought Krishnaji from London his new, thin Huntsman trousers, which they made for him in ten days. A special favor. Krishnaji used a wheelchair, and it whizzed us through the formalities. We flew to Los Angeles on TWA 761 at 11 a.m. What is ahead in California? We go there forcibly because of Rajagopal’s demand that our depositions be taken in his lawsuit against us by October first. I feel waves of wanting to protect Krishnaji, wanting him to smile, to be well, able as he was on Sunday in the tent at Brockwood to soar in his words, opening the heavens.’ Goodness, I was flowery.

S: Good, yes.

M: [chuckles] ‘He has just come by where I am sitting in this airplane, moving with a spring; stopping intensely, and asking, “You are alright?” and going forward to his single seat, the one he always has…' We were lucky in that TWA had, in first class, two single seats opposite each other…

S: Yes, in the very front.

M: And in the bulkhead, so you could close off the rest of the world, and put your feet up on the bulkhead. At least I did. He didn't. [Both chuckle.] '…the one he always has was possible on these flights. I could not get the one next to him this time. A little boy has it, and he is reading music instead of comic books. I asked if we could trade, but his large mother in the row behind spoke up protectively, like the cow and the little calf we passed at Brockwood yesterday on the afternoon walk.' [Both chuckle.]

S: That's not very complimentary! [Laughter.]

M: No, but I think you have the flavor of what I was feeling. [Laughs.]

S: Yes, that's right, and that's what we want.

M: 'This morning I felt the surprise of my feet on English soil, knowing that this afternoon I would be in California. Krishnaji, who wanted to give me his forward seat, is pleased because the one I have is the next best: a single seat, in the middle, three rows back, an aisle on either side of it. To have space from one's fellows is the luxury.' [Chuckles.]

S: Yes. Now, only because there's nothing too trivial for me, when you two had the two front seats—who would sit on the left, and who would sit on the right?

M: Oh, Krishnaji on the left, and I on the right. He always instinctively…

M: Yes. Well, when we were together, it was that way. But I think when he was alone on these flights, I think he sat on the right because—and I found this hard to believe, but I will tell you—passing over Greenland, there's a place he recognized from previous trips that is on the right. How anyone could…over the expanse of Greenland…

S: Which is all white.

M: Yes. Which is all snowy. [S chuckles.] But he would not only recognize this place, but he could tell it was just ahead—he would say, "We're coming to it." I don't know. You can interpret it as you like. [S chuckles.] 'I see his blessed head there, and all is well. We are moving toward who knows what in California, but this is all that fills life for me. He is there. Later we reached Los Angeles at 2 p.m. Again, a wheelchair made it less tiring. Mark Lee and Michael Krohnen were there with a school van, and we drove in the van to Ojai. The garden and house are beautiful. Dennis had opened the house.' Dennis Gottschalk was doing wonderful cleaning in those days. 'Dr. Parchure has never been in the U.S. before. He is over at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji is pleased to be here. In spite of the reason for this trip, I am, too.'

September eighth. 'It is a marvelous morning. Krishnaji and I walked about the garden looking at every flourishing plant; everything looking beautiful. Alasdair has it freshly and beautifully planted. I talked at length to Amanda, then took Dr. Parchure to the village on errands. We all lunched at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji and I talked over everything with Erna and Theo.'

The ninth. 'I spoke to my brother at the Vineyard, and to one of his daughters in New York. At 10 a.m., Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I went over to the Oak Grove School, and saw the upper school buildings going up. They are quite large. I took the green Mercedes to Dieter, the garage man, and brought back the gray one, which had been serviced.'

September tenth. 'I woke up early, and so did Krishnaji, but he is getting adjusted to the time change and said he had a good meditation. I left at 8 a.m., and drove to Malibu, where I spent the morning with Amanda and Phil. I then went to have my hair cut, bought cheese, etcetera, and came back. It is very hot. I got back by 5:15 p.m., made our supper, and slept early.'

We can skip the next couple of days as there is nothing much. But on September thirteenth, 'I went in the morning with Erna and Theo to our lawyer Cohen's office, where Erna's deposition was taken by Rajagopal's lawyer, Avsham. Annie Vigeveno and Austin Bee were present. Another of our lawyers, Stuart Comis, was with us. We broke for lunch, which we had in a coffee shop. Erna resumed her deposition by Avsham, but he called it off after an hour, reserving the right to have a court hearing later on whether Erna must answer certain questions. I came back and reported everything to Krishnaji.'

September fourteenth: 'There was an early walk with Krishnaji, Erna, and Dr. Parchure to McNell Road and back. Erna and I continued around the block. There was a meeting at 10 a.m. at Zelma Wilson's office about a study center.' She was an architect. 'It was another hot day.'

The fifteenth of September: 'Erna and I had an early walk. At 11 a.m. in the gray car, Krishnaji and I drove to Dieter's, exchanged it for the green one, and drove on via Malibu to Beverly Hills for an appointment with Helen for Krishnaji to have a haircut. The air conditioning in the car made it more comfortable, but it is slightly less hot today anyway. We had a picnic lunch on a shady Beverly Hills street, and drove home.'

September sixteenth: 'The early walk was with Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, Erna, and me. She and I went around the block, but Krishnaji and Parchure only to McNell and back. At 10 a.m., there was a tea at the Oak Grove School for the staff. We lunched at Arya Vihara, and slept in the afternoon. It is still hot weather.' I'm surprised that I took all these naps because I'm not good at naps.

S: Well, maybe you were better then.

M: I was better then.

S: [chuckles] I think it's a skill you should re-acquire.

M: Yes, I really would rather like to have it. My brother keeps telling me how he had a nap, but I don't seem to be able to do that.

Then there's really nothing until September twentieth. 'At 8 a.m., Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to Mr. Cohen's office in Oxnard. We talked to him from 9 a.m. for an hour, and then Mr. Avsham, Rajagopal's lawyer, began the taking of Krishnaji's deposition. Mima Porter, Annie Vigeveno, and Austin Bee were present. We stopped at noon for lunch, which we had in the office, then resumed the deposition at 1:10 p.m. and continued till 2:30 p.m. when Krishnaji was tired, and it was ended for the day.'

September twenty-first. 'Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to Cohen's office for a 10 o'clock continuation of Krishnaji's deposition by Avsham. Vigeveno and Bee were present. We had a sandwich lunch between 1 p.m. and 2 p.m., and continued afterward until 4 p.m. Dorothy rang in the morning from Brockwood, and Pupul from Delhi.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I were at Cohen's office for a 10 a.m. continuation of Krishnaji's deposition. Porter, Vigeveno, and Bee were present. Krishnaji met nastiness head-on and dealt with it very well. Questions ended suddenly at 11:20 a.m., and we were out of there. We came back and had our sandwich lunches at the Lilliefelts'.'

September twenty-third. 'I went with Erna and Theo to Cohen's office for my deposition. Stuart Comis was with me, though Cohen came in briefly. I testified till noon when Avsham broke it off for his own schedule elsewhere. We came back to lunch at Arya Vihara. My deposition is to continue Monday.' That was a Friday.

September twenty-fourth: 'It is the first day of autumn, and the weather has cooled. I went on the early walk with Erna. Krishnaji spent the day in bed resting, except at 11 a.m., when he and Dr. Parchure discussed Indian matters with Erna, Theo, and me. He had lunch in bed. I ate with the others at Arya Vihara, had a nap, did marketing, and a quiet rest of day.'

The next day is uneventful, but on September twenty-sixth, 'I went with Erna and Theo to Cohen's office. My deposition continued from 9:30 a.m. until about 10:45 a.m., when Avsham had no more questions. Vigeveno and Bee were there. I came back to lunch at Arya Vihara, then did errands in the village in the afternoon. Philippa called from Connecticut.'

The twenty-seventh: 'Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I left at 7 a.m. for Lailee's office, where Krishnaji had a fasting blood sugar test, 117. Then we breakfasted at Lindberg's.' That was the health food place. He liked going there. 'We returned at 11 a.m. for an exam by Lailee, and the postprandial blood sugar test. On the way back, we stopped in Malibu at Winky's new bookshop'—she'd moved from her previous location in Westwood—'for some thrillers; then drove on to Sycamore Park where we ate our picnic lunch quite late.' Sycamore Park is a little park on the coast highway. 'Krishnaji had driven the green car on the way down very happily. "I didn't think I could anymore, that I would be too old," he said.' [Both chuckle.] 'We got back at 5 p.m. Took a bit of a nap, as we were both tired.'

September twenty-eighth: 'I went on the early walk, but spent most of the day being quiet. In the afternoon, Krishnaji and I walked in light rain to the dip and back. Doctors think he must exercise each day.'

The next day there isn't much except that Krishnaji was invited to speak at Los Angeles.

September thirtieth. 'It rained quite heavily. There was a trustees meeting at 10 a.m. All were present, and Dr. Parchure joined later. Everyone lunched at Arya Vihara and continued with Mark, and David Moody in the afternoon. Krishnaji and I walked in the rain to the dip and back.'

The first of October. 'Ojai had three-and-a-half inches of rain, but it cleared today.' That's remarkable for September, it doesn't usually rain. 'Krishnaji dictated letters, and I typed them. I walked down McAndrew Road with Krishnaji at 5 p.m.'

There's nothing much the next day, but on October third, 'I went on the early walk with Erna, and Krishnaji began his jumping exercises in the morning. It was a warm day. After lunch, Krishnaji and I went to foot treatments by Dr. Hara in Santa Paula, stopping on the way to pick up Mar de Manziarly, who is living with her sister Yo. We dropped her off on the way back. Krishnaji walked down McAndrew with Dr. Parchure, and ate very well for supper. He says the exercise is doing him good.' I presume that's Krishnaji who says that.

The next day, 'I went for the early walk with Erna. It was a hot day, and I spent most of it working at my desk. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I, with Alan Hooker, went to look at the former Zalk house, which is now being offered for sale. It is a mess, and not suitable for a study center.' It's above the Oak Grove, up on that ridge.

Then there's nothing until October sixth. 'I went on the early walk with Erna, and made picnic lunches when I got back. At 10 a.m., Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I left for Beverly Hills. They bought books, walked, and ate their picnics in the car while I had my hair cut. Then we went to the UCLA Medical Center, where Dr. Paul Ward examined Krishnaji's larynx. There's nothing wrong, he said, but there is the normal diminishment of the vocal cords by age and usage, common in opera singers.' [Both chuckle.] 'We were out of there by 4 p.m., and drove back along the beach.'

Again, nothing much on the seventh, but on October eighth, 'At 5 p.m., Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, Theo, Erna, and I met Evelyne and we all went to Burbank.' We must have had at least two cars. 'On a side street, we ate a picnic dinner, then went to the NBC studio where, at 8 p.m., a fifty-two minute interview of Krishnaji was done by Keith Berwick for broadcast. Krishnaji was splendid. We got back to Ojai by 11 p.m. Patricia Hunt-Perry says Krishnaji is invited to speak at the UN on April seventeenth.'

October ninth. 'I spent most of the day working at my desk and doing house things. Krishnaji slept poorly last night because last night's upset in the house put him off, but he slept most of morning.' What was the upset in the house? And, of course, I've nothing for that date in the big diary. I don't know. We'll have to go on.

The tenth of October: 'I did the early walk with Erna. It is a lovely day. I came back, did laundry, and tidied the house. We had a slightly earlier lunch, then Alan Kishbaugh drove Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and me to the Los Angeles airport. Evelyne came there too to see Krishnaji off. He, Dr. Parchure, and I left at six on TWA 760 for London. Krishnaji and I had the good seats, one and nine in first class, and were able to sleep a bit. Krishnaji was quite exhausted when we got on board, but the flight was less tiring than at other times.'

The eleventh: 'We landed at Heathrow just before noon. Rita Zampese met us, and Krishnaji had a wheelchair, so we went quickly through everything. Hugues van der Straten, Mary Cadogan, and Ingrid were there, and Dorothy was waiting in the Saab. Krishnaji and I drove with her to Brockwood. Mary Cadogan and Hugues came in his car, and Ingrid brought Dr. Parchure. We all arrived in time for lunch. We talked after lunch with Hugues and Mary C., and to Mary L. by phone. I had a short nap, and then walked with Krishnaji and Scott.'

There's nothing much the next day except that Jean-Michel Maroger arrived.

October thirteenth: 'It rained most of the day. Krishnaji talked to the students at 11:45 a.m., and I went to a staff meeting occurring at that time. After lunch, I went in a school car to Alresford to get the Mercedes license renewed. Dr. Parchure talked at length with Dorothy. Krishnaji was tired and didn't feel like a walk. I walked around the lanes with Scott.'

The fourteenth: 'Krishnaji slept nine hours after Dr. Parchure gave him a Compoz tablet. Krishnaji saw de Pomereaux. Mary and Joe came at noon, and stayed till 4 p.m. A Mercedes van was brought and looked at for video.' I see your hand in that. [S chuckles.]

October fifteenth: 'There was wind and rain much of the day. Krishnaji spoke to the Brockwood staff at 11:45 a.m. Jane and Ian Hammond came to lunch, and it was decided to wall up the West Wing, instead of putting doors to separate the West Wing hall from the blue room area, which becomes part of the school library. After coffee in Dorothy's office, others left, and I had a long talk with her about her present situation, and later she walked with Krishnaji and me around the lanes. It's the first time she's been on the walk with Krishnaji and me since her heart attack. In the evening, Krishnaji spoke of what he saw he can do with the staff discussions when they still hold to opinions.'

The sixteenth. ‘Krishnaji didn’t sleep well. At 11:45 a.m., Krishnaji spoke to the school and guests. There is a good group of new students. The Bohms were there, and David spoke with Krishnaji after lunch. Mr. Grohe and his son from Switzerland sat with Krishnaji at lunch and discussed with him and Gisèle Balleys their interest in a Swiss school. At 4:30 p.m. Krishnaji met the five: Dorothy, Ingrid, Scott, Harsh, and Stephen, and me. He clarified Dorothy’s activities, etcetera. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked.’

Monday, the seventeenth: ‘It is a clear day. Krishnaji slept well on half a tablet of Compoz. He rested all morning. Mr. Grohe left after donating 50,000 Swiss francs to Brockwood. Tungki gave 8,000 pounds sterling.’ Do you remember Tungki?

S: I remember him well.

M: Yes. ‘I took the car out to encourage the battery. At 3 p.m., as world teacher not only personal, do nothing unnecessary. If anything happened to you, it would be a blow physically and psychically.’ What in the world am I talking about? ‘Walked in the afternoon with Krishnaji and Dorothy.’

S: That sounds like a quote from Krishnaji.

M: It does, but it isn’t in quotes. It sounds like he’s admonishing me not to do dangerous things, but it isn’t explained. But we’ll soon get back to the big diary. I’m sorry this is so incomplete.

S: We’re grateful we have what we have.

M: October eighteenth. ‘Krishnaji slept moderately well, but was tired. He spoke to the staff at 11:45 a.m. I talked to somebody about future insurance at 10 a.m. At 11 a.m., Ms. Adrian Spanier’—she was the decorator woman who got me things—‘came with samples for curtains, etcetera. Krishnaji liked, for his bedroom, the red and white version of fabric I have in my bedroom in Ojai. Ms. Spanier stayed for lunch.’ They’re still there, the red and white curtains. ‘Krishnaji was tired and went only for a short walk. Dorothy and I went further.’

Wednesday the nineteenth. Now we have the big diary. ‘Krishnaji took half a Compoz pill at 11:30 p.m. last night, and slept until 6:30 a.m. but looked very tired. He has looked this way the last three days, increasingly. I met Mary Cadogan at the 10:30 a.m. Petersfield train. We talked at some length about the situation here at Brockwood, and she talked with Dr. Parchure before lunch. After lunch, Krishnaji spoke with her and me in the little blue room about events in California, what has happened here, and some of his plans and problems in India. He reached out in his imagination to what he wants at Brockwood: the place is in a rut. Now it must grow, change, move, be alive. It is the only center in Europe, and must draw people. His ideas were vivid, but his manner of speech was slow and almost difficult, as though it were an effort.’

‘He slept for an hour, and then came to tell me that we must go for a walk. I called Dorothy, and we started off down the drive along the lane to West Meon, but Krishnaji then said he had pulled a muscle when he walked fast Saturday, and it was hurting him, so he turned back. It must’ve been hurting him yesterday when he also turned back, but he didn’t tell me or Dr. Parchure about the pain. His face these past days has looked gaunt. His posture is round-shouldered, older, and unlike his usual, almost boy’s vitality. It turns a knife in me.’

‘I talked to Parchure in the evening. He gave Krishnaji a vitamin B12 shot last night, but it and sleep have not given him strength. I said Krishnaji must rest, not speak for the remaining week here before India. Parchure has given up on trying to persuade him to rest, but I said we should try again together. Krishnaji was watching TV with Scott. I waited until it was over, and said my piece. Dr. Parchure joined, and said he didn’t know what else to suggest medically. Did Krishnaji know what was making him so tired? Krishnaji thought and said it was Rajagopal’s attack, which he was feeling now. “It wasn’t the trip. I slept on the plane. I liked being in Ojai, I felt well there.” Reluctantly, he was persuaded by Dr. Parchure, and me, and Scott that though he will talk to the students tomorrow, he will rest after that, and not’—underlined not—‘talk to the school Sunday or have the two discussions he was planning next week to the staff and students. Also, he very reluctantly agreed not to go to London on Monday as we had planned to lunch with Mary and Joe, and to have his hair cut. When the other two left, Krishnaji said he felt better already because he had talked about it. I put a hot pad on his leg. “I’ll be all right tomorrow, you’ll see, ” he said.’ [S chuckles.]

October twentieth. ‘Krishnaji slept well without pills. “Like a log,” he said, until 7:15 a.m. He looks much better. He said wistfully, “Couldn’t I go to London Monday?” He wants to see the fitting of Maxwell shoes he had urged me to order in June, but he took it with equanimity when I pointed out the waste of his precious energy, and so, Mary L. will come down here on Monday. He spoke for one and three-quarter hours to the students, but will omit further talks until he leaves for India. He came out of this talk with the students looking fresh, and we lunched. He rested all afternoon. No walk. I went to the staff meeting. After supper, we watched a TV program about tigers, gorillas, and other wild animals kept by a man named Aspinall here in Britain. Before going to sleep, Krishnaji said to me, “They are immature here. This place must become something marvelous. You must be careful. Look after yourself. Do you understand? I might die, and you must see that this place is marvelous. You must live as if I were already dead. Do you understand what I’m telling you? When I leave Ojai, it is out of my mind. The house, the roses, Rajagopal, and all that, and when I leave here, it will be out of my mind, and when I leave India, that too.” I asked him, “Are you telling me something more?” Krishnaji replied, “No, I’m not going to die. I will live a long time more, I hope. But you must understand how to live.”’

October twenty-first. ‘Krishnaji slept well. I took the 9:46 a.m. to London. Joe kindly met me in Waterloo and drove me to Peter Jones, where I shopped for Viyella for Krishnaji to have made into shirts in India. He says he needs to wear warmer things. I walked to the General Trading Company for tableware he wants for Vasanta Vihar, and then I went on to Harrods, where I got him warm gloves, etcetera. Also, he wants some things from Floris for Vatsala'—that's Parchure's wife. 'There was no suitable Viyella at Peter Jones, so I went to Liberty's and wound up with seven pieces for shirts. I was tired by 3:30 p.m., so went to Waterloo and back. Krishnaji had rested in bed all day and looked well. Dr. Parchure has taken his blood sugar levels. Fasting 105. Postprandial 130. Blood pressure was 108 over 80.'

The twenty-second. 'Krishnaji remained in bed all day. He dictated a piece on the future of Brockwood, what it must become. More than a school, a place where people seriously interested in the teachings can come to study. A place for the awakening of intelligence without a leader for, "The teachings themselves are the expression of truth which serious people must find for themselves." Hugues van der Straten and his daughter, Fabienne, arrived, and Krishnaji spoke to her in the morning, and again in the afternoon. I talked to him at some length about Brockwood, and joined him, Dorothy, Christina, and two students in the vegetable garden in the afternoon, where we sorted potatoes in the sharp autumn air and sunlight. In the evening, Krishnaji had me read the dictation to him, Scott, and Dr. Parchure; and he put in additions that put responsibility on me for bringing things about at Brockwood, as if he was out of it, but repeated that he would live another ten years. Krishnaji's voice was hoarse in the evening. The two days in bed have given him rest but no surge of energy.'

October twenty-third. 'Krishnaji saw Fabienne in the morning and then talked to Hugues. I read Krishnaji's dictation on Brockwood to Hugues, and discussed the future at length with him. I did the same to Mary Cadogan by telephone. Krishnaji got up for lunch and talked a lot with Dorothy at the table. The Bohms were there. Hugues and Fabienne left. I barely had time to lie down before Krishnaji came in to say we should go for a walk. Summertime ended this morning. The clocks are turned back, and it was darkening as we walked around the lanes. Krishnaji's pulled muscle is healed, and he walked well, firmly, and without apparent fatigue. The air was bracing. I told him of the conversations with Hugues and Mary Cadogan. We need to build up money reserves for the future of Brockwood. He spoke of doing more tapes as they bring income, and we will try to build a reserve financially. "We mustn't buy any more houses," he said. But, when we passed the Dell cottages, he said we must get the two we don't own when they become available. He said India has enough property and funds, and when we someday sell Saanen, the proceeds shouldn't be divided three ways with India. His will divides anything he owns between KFA, KFT, and KFI. But, he said he might change that. As to anything in the teaching trust, I must give half of it'—well, the teaching trust was the Alzina thing…It became teaching trust.

S: Right. Yes.

M: '…as to anything in the teaching trust, I must give half to KFT and half to KFA. He earlier spoke of my responsibility to Brockwood. I must act as if he were gone. But he repeated he would live another ten years. He was again beautiful and strong on the walk. My heart beats in response to his. He said to me, "there is no separation between us. I care deeply for you. I'm closer to you than I've ever been to anyone, do you understand?

You must never feel isolated; that would be terrible. You must be strong here; you must help them here—not the details. You sometimes start with details. It is the whole. You must see to it here and at Ojai, if I die now or in ten years, you must take charge, with others. Something else is looking after me. My health is all right. When you write, be careful. No one knows who opens letters.' This is all going-to-India advice. 'I talked at length after supper with Dorothy about Brockwood's future, the study center, etcetera.'

The twenty-fourth. 'I went to Alresford for chocolates for Krishnaji to take to India. Christopher Titmus came to lunch. He wants to talk to Krishnaji in the spring. Krishnaji spoke to Gisèle Balleys, and a student named Per Dalgren.' Does that mean anything to you?

S: Yes, he was a nice student. I remember him.

M: Yes. 'Then Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked around the lanes. Krishnaji dictated a subject for exploration in the possible brain seminar in June which Juan Hancke is suggesting.' Who was Juan?

S: He was a biology teacher at Brockwood. He was from Chile, I think, and had a PhD on something about the brain.

October twenty-fifth. 'Mary and Joe came at noon. Mary lunched with us, and Joe, who has had a cold, went to the pub, and came back for her. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked around the lanes. I helped Krishnaji pack.'

The twenty-sixth. 'I met Mary C. at Petersfield. She talked with Krishnaji and me about India. I spoke to Vanda in Florence. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked in the lanes, and saw a scarlet maple. Krishnaji went early to bed. The Mercedes was washed and resined.'

October twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji came and woke me up 4:30 a.m. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I left at 7:30 in the Mercedes, and Dr. Parchure went in another car with Scott and Kathy. It was very foggy, but we reached Heathrow before 9 a.m. Rita Zampese met us there, and was able to accompany Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure right onto the British Air airplane. Krishnaji and Dr. Parchure flew at 10:15 a.m. to Delhi. Dorothy and I drove back to Brockwood. Krishnaji is due in Delhi tonight, British time, but 4:20 a.m. in India. He stays with Pupul in Delhi.'

Then there isn't much about Krishnaji because he isn't with me. Oh, I see that on October twenty-ninth, you and Kathy moved into the West Wing while renovations were being done on your cottage.

S: I remember that.

M: On October thirty-first, 'Krishnaji telephoned me from Delhi, but I was in London. He called back on the next day, November first. He says he is well, and asked me to send the file of letters about India of the last months. I spoke briefly to Pupul, and posted the file in the afternoon.'

Editor's Note: The rest of the entries, while interesting for the history of the rebuilding of Brockwood after the fire, and for the history of Mary's life, have little to do with Krishnaji, and so have been edited out. Mary does track Krishnaji's movements in India, announce when various talks occurred, and relate Dr. Parchure's letters to her about Krishnaji's health; these have value for the archives, but probably hold little interest to the readers of these memoirs.

Issue 78: November 18, 1983 to April 19, 1984

This issue is titled as beginning on November eighteenth, 1983, but the first entry we get from Mary's diaries is February fifteenth, 1984; and the discrepancy is, as before, because Mary was not with Krishnaji in India during this period, so this period has been edited out. Of course, Mary was very busy during this time with a great many things for Krishnaji and for the Foundations, and a couple of these are worth noting as they affect what appears later in this issue and in following issues. On January sixteenth, Mary went to a meeting of teachers and the school board about an issue that had many of them and many parents in an uproar. When Mary reads this out to me from her diaries, she and I discuss it as I remembered what I had heard about this issue at the time even though I was at Brockwood. The issue was that the administration of the Oak Grove School decided its authority would be bolstered if the school staff were called not by their first names—which had always been the case, and which was the case at Brockwood—but Mr. or Mrs. or Ms., and then their surname. This created such a furor and ongoing conflict that it only served to further erode the authority of the administration. A meeting after this one on the sixteenth that included parents went on past midnight. Of course, the origins of this contention were, as we have seen, long-standing, and the consequences of it would continue until well past the end of Krishnaji's life.

Something else that has been edited out of this issue—but that needs mentioning—is all the work Mary was involved with to finish the restoration of the West Wing at Brockwood from the fire damage. In fact, when we rejoin Mary's diaries in this issue, it is February and she is, most unusually, at Brockwood. Krishnaji's typical schedule had him go from the Indian part of his annual program to Ojai; but to get to California, he would usually stop by Brockwood for about a week on the way. Only twice, of which I am aware, did he fly from India to California across the Pacific. So Mary went to Brockwood, before his intended arrival to move all of Krishnaji's things back into his restored room, and do whatever else was necessary to bring the restored West Wing to her standards.

Mary: February fifteenth: 'Krishnaji arrived from Bombay at Heathrow at 9:10 a.m. Rita Zampese, who had met him in Bombay, accompanied him. Dorothy and I met him as well as Ingrid and Mary C. He looks wonderfully well. When we got back to Brockwood, Krishnaji looked at all the fire reconstruction in the West Wing, then lunched with the school. After a talk to Dorothy, Mary C., Scott, and me about India, he took a nap. Mary C. and Dorothy met with Mr. Grohe, who is here for several days. Whisper died early this morning.' She just died of old age. 'Krishnaji slept well and so did I.'

The sixteenth: 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji talked to Dorothy, Ingrid, Mary Cadogan, Scott, and me about a possible study center, which he would like to call something different. Then at 11 a.m. Mr. Grohe joined in. Jane and Ian came to lunch. Ian had figures on the cost of building a study center and, after lunch, we went down to look at where it might be built. Krishnaji favors the old apple orchard. He had a nap and then walked around the lanes with Mr. Grohe, Dorothy, and me. In the evening he watched The Living Planet, the Attenborough video.'

February seventeenth. 'Krishnaji talked to Dorothy and then Anneke in the morning, while I settled the insurance matters. The BBC's Terry Anderson spoke with Krishnaji at lunch about doing a program on Brockwood, including an interview with Krishnaji for both the BBC television and radio. It's too short for Krishnaji. The walk with Krishnaji included Mr. Grohe, Dorothy, and me. Krishnaji put his hands (also yesterday) on Peter Jenkins's little boy, Richard, age 7, who has cancer. It's the brother of the little girl with leukemia that Krishnaji cured.'

Scott: Oh god.

M: Poor Peter Jenkins. He'd been through leukemia with his little girl and now cancer with his little boy. 'In the evening we watched another Living Planet video.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school at 11 a.m. Mary and Joe came to lunch. The estimate for the cost of the proposed study center came from Ian, and it was prohibitively high. Krishnaji felt it was too expensive. We need to build up endowment funds, not spend on buildings. Krishnaji walked with Mr. Grohe, Dorothy, and me. I talked to Nicole Philippeau, who is here for a weekend.'

S: This is when I decided to take on the…

M: The building of the Study Center.

S: Right, because Krishnaji had wanted one for so long, and I thought it had to be possible. But this was just an individual project I took on. I wasn't asked, at that time, to do it.

M: This was before Grohe gave money for the project.

S: Oh, yes. He hadn't given a thing for this project at that time. I did some investigation of the cheapest kind of construction possible, which turned out to be an A-frame construction, but we'll come to what happened with that…

M: Yes, we'll come to that.

S: But it was from here, really, that I started putting time and energy into creating a study center—Krishnaji going to look at the site he preferred, Ian Hammond coming up with a figure which was too expensive, and all the discussions.

M: Yes.

Well, there isn't much on the eighteenth or nineteenth of February, but on the twentieth, 'I was up at 5:30 a.m. At 9 a.m., Krishnaji and I left with Dorothy for Heathrow. The Bohms, who were on the same flight, met us there, as did Rita Zampese. Our TWA flight was canceled due to some mechanical problem, so I booked us on the British Air flight for tomorrow, then we went back to Brockwood, and rested all afternoon.'

February twenty-first: 'Again, Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to Heathrow, where we took the 10 a.m. British Air flight to Los Angeles. Mark and David met us. The wheelchair got us quickly through the formalities. The Bohms, who were on the same flight, went with Mark, while Krishnaji and I went with David, and we arrived at Ojai at 4 p.m. We are both tired. I have a cold. I spoke to Amanda. They have a new Airedale named Heathcliff.' [Both chuckle.]

The twenty-second: 'We both slept a lot. Erna and Theo came in the morning. Krishnaji had lunch in bed, slept all afternoon, and had to be awakened for supper. Then he slept till 2 a.m., but he was awake from then on.' [Chuckles.]

February twenty-third: 'Krishnaji got up to lunch at Arya Vihara. Merali arrived, and I talked to him after lunch about selling his property in San Diego for payment of the promised matching fund, now almost two years late. He is not going to make up the interest KFA has lost because of delay.' I can't remember what all that was about.

S: I do. There was a matching fund, I think for payment for the construction of the high school, which Baboo had promised…

M: Yes, and he didn't…

S: …but his money was tied up in a shopping center in San Diego, and the shopping center didn't sell, didn't sell, didn't sell, didn't sell.

M: Yes, I see. I see. How can you remember all this stuff? I can't.

S: Well, I remember it because [chuckles] this was one of many sore points that I had with Erna. Erna had always insisted that I could not seek donations for the video from Americans.

M: But Merali was not American.

S: Exactly; he was a European, which was supposed to be the KFT's domain, and I had the original contact with Baboo Merali in Saanen, and Erna pinched him. [Both chuckle.] Here was a generous donor, and I was dying to have funds for the video, and Erna got the funds for Ojai. And she saw no contradiction with all this. [Both laugh.]

M: Oh, dear.

S: She and I locked horns many times.

M: Yes, I know. I was aware of it. [S chuckles.] 'I went to the school meeting of the board and staff. Krishnaji walked with Theo.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji saw David Bohm at 10 a.m., after which we lunched at Arya Vihara and talked at table till almost 4 p.m. The table conversation was on perception, and it was taped. Krishnaji slept till supper time.'

February twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji slept well. He saw Dave again at 10 a.m., and we taped another conversation at lunch, this time about honesty.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji talked to Merali after lunch. In the late afternoon, Krishnaji and I walked down McAndrew Road.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji again saw Dave at 10 a.m., and there was another taped discussion over lunch at Arya Vihara, this time on "The Ebb and Flow of Life." A letter came from Madame Matti saying that Chalet Tannegg had been sold, so we cannot rent it for the following summer. I telephoned Vanda in Florence with the news. Krishnaji was quite tired in the late afternoon and evening.'

The next several days are really the same. This was the period when David Bohm was having great difficulties, so Krishnaji saw him every morning, and then there was a recorded discussion over lunch. Krishnaji would also occasionally see Saral. There isn't much more about this that can be said.'

The third of March: 'At 10 a.m., I went with Erna and Theo to a meeting at the school of staff, parents, school board, and trustees. There was another uproar.' [Both chuckle] 'After lunch at Arya Vihara, the Lilliefelts, Kishbaugh, Krishnaji, and I talked about it all.'

March fourth: 'The Bohms left for Claremont. At 11 a.m., Krishnaji held a discussion at the school with the parents and everyone. After lunch at Arya Vihara, Krishnaji, John Hidley, Tom Krause, Erna, Theo, and I talked. They then called in Mark Lee and David Moody. The school committee is to be abolished. Two parents and two staff advisors will be added to the school board, and Mark and David must work as a team, as co-directors. We talked until 5:30 p.m., when Krishnaji and I went for a short walk. Krishnaji is tired but feels something was accomplished.'

Again, there isn't much except that Krishnaji kept seeing Mark and David about the school troubles, and he also saw some teachers who wanted to talk about the school. On March tenth, there was a trustee meeting that lasted all day, obviously about the school troubles.

On the eleventh of March: 'At 11 a.m., the school board and trustees met here with Krishnaji. After lunch, trustees met again to consider the school board appointments. John Hidley was invited. There was a long talk by Krishnaji about right action, at the end of which it was finally agreed on what to do. It was exhausting.'

Again, there is nothing significant until March thirteenth when Dorothy rang. She had received a long letter of complaint sent two weeks ago by the Oak Grove parents and staff, and which was addressed to the Krishnamurti Foundation of America.' I don't know why Dorothy got it, or maybe it was just a copy that was sent to her.

On March fifteenth, 'Krishnaji talked alone with teaching staff,' and the next day, 'Krishnaji talked to Mark Lee.'

March nineteenth. 'Krishnaji and I took a picnic lunch and ate it with Amanda and Phil on their terrace. Then Krishnaji, I, and Alan Kishbaugh took British Air 2:05 flight to Albuquerque. We hired an Avis car and drove to the Los Alamos Inn, where Dr. Raju and Mrs. Phyllis Barnes received Krishnaji and showed us to our rooms. Dr. Raju brought hot food, which Krishnaji ate in bed. Alan and I ate in the restaurant.'

The next day, 'Dr. Raju and Mrs. Phyllis Barnes came for us in a van and drove us to the auditorium of the Los Alamos National Laboratory, where Krishnaji spoke to an overflowing crowd of 700 scientists from 8:10 a.m. to 9 a.m. Then, he answered questions for thirty-five minutes. We returned to the Inn, where Krishnaji had breakfast in his room. Dr. Raju had brought food. At noon, we went with Mr. Raju to lunch in a restaurant with ten scientists. After that, we bought an electric razor as Krishnaji's had malfunctioned. Then Krishnaji slept. At 4:30 p.m., we drove to Bandelier Park, walked up the canyon, and saw the cliff caves. Krishnaji had supper in bed. Alan and I ate in the dining room.'

March twenty-first: 'Dr. Raju brought idlis for Krishnaji's breakfast at 7:30 a.m. At 8:45 a.m., we went to the discussion hall, where about sixty scientists presented fifteen typed questions to Krishnaji. He read them and chose the first, "What is meditation, what is creativity?" and answered it for over an hour with supreme eloquence. He then took the last one on what he would direct if he were director of the laboratory.' [Chuckles.] 'He had almost tears in his voice at the end and I wept. A young man, Kurt Beacheart, who wrote an interesting letter, was there, and I introduced him to Krishnaji. Dr. and Mrs. Raju gave a lunch for Krishnaji at their house. Then we left Los Alamos. Alan showed us an interesting Pueblo reservation. We walked around Santa Fe, and then from Albuquerque we flew back to Los Angeles. The Moodys met us and drove us back to Ojai, arriving at 9:30 p.m.'

Krishnaji rested on the next couple of days, but there continue to be difficult meetings between parents, teachers, the school board, and Mark and David, which resulted in changes to the school board and to the trustees.

On March twenty-seventh, Krishnaji resumed doing his dictations of his portable Sony recorder.

And on March twenty-ninth, 'at 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a discussion with the Oak Grove School teachers.'

The next day, 'Erna and Theo met the plane in Santa Barbara on which Asit arrived from San Francisco to stay here until we go to New York. On the same flight arrived Terry Doyle, who came to meet us all with regard to his being the headmaster of the upper school or high school of the Oak Grove School. We met him at lunch. Asit had supper with Krishnaji and me.' It didn't work out with Terry Doyle.

On the thirty-first, 'At 3:30 p.m., Senator Claiborne Pell and Carole Taylor came to see Krishnaji. The senator's initial question was, "Does individual consciousness survive death?"' I don't seem to have Krishnaji's answer to this. [Both chuckle] 'I had tea for them at 5 p.m. and they left later. Asit had supper with us.' I don't know what Krishnaji said to them. I don't think it was very…

S: Un-reassuring, probably. Yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: April first: 'Asit showed us the dummy of his book of photos of Krishnaji, A Thousand Moons. He showed them later to Erna and Theo. I had a talk with Terry Doyle on his being part of the Oak Grove School. The newly appointed school board came to lunch at Arya Vihara. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji met parents of the Oak Grove School at the Pavilion, which was another waste of his time. We looked at the upper school Max is building and then dined with the Hookers at the Ranch House Restaurant; Evelyne, Asit, Doyle, the Lilliefelts, Krishnaji, and me.'

I am having early walks with Erna on all these days, but I'm not mentioning it. On the second of April: 'After breakfast, Krishnaji, Asit, and I discussed on tape Asit's question, "What is a worthwhile life?"' Is that in the archives list?

S: [sighs] It's hard to tell.

M: The next day, 'In the morning, Krishnaji, Asit, and I did another taped discussion.'

Then again, there are just the usual Ojai things until April eighth, when Krishnaji held another discussion with the Oak Grove School teaching staff.

April twelve. 'Yesterday I was up at 4:30 a.m., and at 7 a.m., Krishnaji, Asit (who has been staying with us for a fortnight), and Erna and Theo left Ojai for the Los Angeles airport with David Moody driving us in the school van. The quiet of the house, wrapped in sunlight, flowers, and breathing orange blossoms, was left for ten days. We went by the sea and, not driving, I could watch the waves washing across the sand, breaking on rocks, and saw the dark backs of three whales and their extraordinary plumes of breath. I felt floating in the extraordinary gift of being able to turn and see Krishnaji sitting there, looking immaculate in elegant ease. He was a little far-off, but nodding with his eyes when I turned, knowing what was in my mind.' I always felt he could read my mind. Did he read yours?

S: Yes. Absolutely. Absolutely. [Chuckles.]

M: 'Here we go off again to airports and places and talks and he looked younger than when I first went with him almost twenty years ago. We all five went on American Airlines flight number 4 at 10 a.m. This time Krishnaji and I had first-row seats up in the top section of the 747, and we liked it because it was all nonsmoking and we had space in front of the seats. The food wasn't good, but no matter. We arrived at 6 p.m., and went by taxi to the Hotel Dorset, as Bud's car is being fixed. There we have the same suite, number 1507, as last year. Asit is downstairs, and the Lilliefelts are at the Wyndham, a hotel nearby. Asit had supper with us in our sitting room, and then he and I put through a telephone call for Krishnaji to Mrs. Gandhi in New Delhi. This was requested by Pupul who sent word via Asit that Mrs. Gandhi's son, Rajiv, had been threatened by the rebelling Sikhs in the Punjab; he was to be killed this Friday the thirteenth. Pupul's thought is that if her friend knows the son is in Krishnaji's consciousness, it will comfort her anxiety. So Krishnaji agreed, and with a private number we finally got through and Krishnaji spoke briefly. He couldn't hear her very well, but she evidently heard him. He was not too tired from the flight, and we went to bed right after supper.'

'Today we had a quiet morning. Bud came by. Lisa is in bed with a cold. It was lovely to see him. He, Krishnaji, Asit, and I went to Il Nido at 1 p.m., the Italian restaurant that Krishnaji likes, where I gave lunch to the four of us, plus David Shainberg and Cathryn de Segonzac. Festive it was. Krishnaji liked the porcini and small spinach ravioli with two kinds of spaghettini.' [Chuckles.] 'Afterward, he had fresh raspberries, and he liked the San Pellegrino sparkling water while the rest of us had white wine.' [Chuckles.] 'There was much laughter, with Krishnaji taking off in the high infectious laugh he has in him when something strikes him as very funny. This time it was my remembering the old Whitney Darrow cartoon in the New Yorker about the fat, middle-aged woman being carried off into the jungle by a gorilla with her friends looking on, and one saying, "I never could see what he sees in her."' [Both laugh.] It was a funny cartoon. I can see it in my memory. [Chuckles.] 'Today was sunny and warm in New York, and we walked back to the hotel. Krishnaji stepped out into the traffic of Third Avenue as though it was a country lane.' [Chuckles.] He used to terrorize me by doing that. He did it crossing Piccadilly. Traffic was pouring down, and he wanted to cross to Fortnum's. I had to grab him. It was the first time that happened, and I realized that part of my responsibility—which we've described—was seeing that he wasn't killed in traffic. [Chuckles.] Because he would just walk across. He once went from Huntsman—instead of waiting for me at Huntsman—he went to Fortnum's, walking across Piccadilly traffic and all that, and then he realized that I was supposed to meet him back at Huntsman, so he did the same thing in reverse and came back to Huntsman. When I found out what he'd done, my blood froze. [S laughs.] Anyway, 'At 4 p.m., he gave an interview to three people from the magazine Parabola; a dominant, gray-haired woman with a lemoned expression seemed to be the leader. It was not a perceptive group.' [Chuckles.] 'At 5 p.m., he and I went out for a walk and errands; orange skin cream was at last found in Elizabeth Arden, yogurt, lecithin, etcetera, on 57th Street, a le Carré thriller at Doubleday, and some shepherd's lotion at a chemist's. We had supper in the rooms.'

April thirteenth. 'Pupul arrived from Washington and came to see Krishnaji after breakfast. She is in this country for the Festival of India, which will take place in 1985 and which will involve various museums, including the Cooper Hewitt.' That's the one that Lisa was the head of. 'She had talked with Mrs. Gandhi, who thanked her copiously for asking Krishnaji to telephone. Later Krishnaji, Pupul, Asit, and I went to lunch with David Shainberg and Cathryn de Segonzac at Il Nido. It was a late lunch. Asit took pictures of Krishnaji with my Minolta. Another documenting of Krishnaji's life, which Asit is doing. We again ate very well at Il Nido, and Krishnaji tasted a small bit of zabaglione, which he liked, but which his sugarless diet precludes. He wants to do a discussion on Monday with those at lunch on what prevents people who have begun to see what he's talking about, but do not follow through in arduous self-awareness. Jimmy Granger was in the restaurant, recognized me, and stopped to greet me.' Jimmy Granger is Stewart Granger, the actor, who was a good friend of Sam's and mine. I hadn't seen him in a long time. 'Krishnaji was pleased at this because he said it showed I hadn't changed in appearance in the many years since Jimmy had last seen me.' [Both laugh.] 'At 4 p.m., all of us, minus Pupul, went to the movie Greystoke: The Legend of Tarzan, which Krishnaji liked. It was well done, and had in it Ralph Richardson's last performance. We came back to the hotel and had supper in our rooms. Because of something Krishnaji had said, I asked him, "What do you mean by a first-class mind?" "One that is free of conditioning, that inquires," he replied.'

Until the fire at Brockwood, Krishnaji had a black and white photo of this statue, the Winged Victory, which he kept next to his bed. The original photo was damaged by the fire, and it was replaced by this post card, which remained next to his bed for the rest of his life.

The fourteenth, April. 'Krishnaji had slept well. Asit came up at 10:30 a.m., and, in a hired car, we went to Felt Forum for Krishnaji's 11 a.m. first New York talk. The hall was about two-thirds full. Krishnaji spoke for an hour and twenty-five minutes, and put very much into it. We lunched quietly and alone at Il Nido. "Very good food," said

Krishnaji. It was raining faintly when we walked back to the hotel. Hugues van der Straten rang that they were leaving and couldn't come by, which was just as well as Krishnaji slept until 5 p.m. when Pupul arrived and soon Asit, too. Her book on Krishnaji is running 600 pages. The first draft is almost done. She asked Krishnaji what she called "an impossible question": What should be done in the Punjab where Sikhs are demanding a separate nation, including the territory in adjoining states? This is a dilemma facing Mrs. Gandhi. Pupul wanted Krishnaji "to put it in his consciousness." He said it was a question that must be answered. Asit showed Pupul the dummy of his book of photos of Krishnaji. She liked it, but wants to help him choose other photos. Watching them, Asit looks almost exactly like Pupul.' [Chuckles.] 'We had a discussion of what Krishnaji means by "mutation of mind." Science says mutation means a change that is carried by inheritance to the next generation. Does he mean that, or does he mean a change in consciousness that affects the total human species not necessarily via genetic change? Krishnaji has said not the latter when this point was raised at Brockwood last fall. Now he seems to go further, and wants to go into it. Pupul and Asit went off to a movie. Krishnaji and I had supper and went to bed.'

The fifteenth. ‘There was lightning and thunder in the night. Krishnaji, at breakfast, saw a flute player on TV. His face lit up and he said, “I wish I had continued playing the flute. I was good at it. But all of those things were wiped out so I could do this.”’ By which he meant to talk. ‘“And that was right.” I asked him, “Did you decide that or did Mrs. Besant point it out?” Krishnaji replied, “They probably said something, but I think I decided it.” He mentioned the length of Pupul’s book and said, “You should write about all this.” Asit came with us in the car to Felt Forum again. The crowd was bigger. Krishnaji plunged right into an intense, marvelous talk, his voice charged with energy. Sparks seemed to fly. He was at his most powerful and vital. We went afterward straight to Shainberg’s apartment, where there was another of those crowded buffet lunches. Pupul and Asit were there. Renée Weber, whom I began to introduce as Patricia Hunt-Perry by mistake.’ [S chuckles.] ‘Blockhead me,’ it says. ‘Patricia came soon after and handed out the UN invitations for those on our list. Krishnaji and I were dropped back at the hotel by Pupul and Asit, who went off to a cinema. At 3:30 p.m., Philippa and David came to see me. They had been at the talk. A John White, author and friend of Patricia Hunt-Perry, who is doing a book on enlightenment, saw Krishnaji from 4:30 p.m. until almost 6 p.m. “He asked a lot of questions,” said Krishnaji.’ I wonder what happened to that. I’ve never heard of the book. ‘We had a quiet supper in our sitting room after everyone left. In spite of this activity, Krishnaji’s energies remain high.’

The sixteenth. ‘It was supposed to be a day of rest, and that is what Krishnaji did all morning. I went out in the rain to get our boarding passes on American Airlines on Friday and some health foods, and I made a table reservation at a Chinese restaurant, Mr. Chow, on East 57th Street. Asit came with us to the restaurant. It turned out to be airy, quiet, and rather elegant. There was not a Chinese face in the place, but the food was Chinese, and delicious. They were nonplussed at vegetarians and brought a succession of nine different dishes, all very good. Krishnaji was pleased. So was I, until we started up 57th Street and my stomach began to ache. But I kept walking to 65th and Madison, where there was a Coach store, and Krishnaji carefully chose two brown belts, which he has wanted. We came back to the hotel where at 4:30 p.m., there was a Krishnaji, Pupul, Asit, David Shainberg, and me discussion on why people come to a block after years of studying the teachings. Pupul left, and we went on into what is the most basic fear, death, or what? We didn’t resolve it. Krishnaji and I had supper in the sitting room.’

The seventeenth of April. ‘Bud’s daughter Daisy came by after breakfast to talk to me and brought me a short story she’s written. She is good. Asit came with Krishnaji, me, and Patricia Hunt-Perry to the UN, where Narasimhan received Krishnaji at the entrance, and escorted him to the Dag Hammarskjold Auditorium where, at 1:15 p.m., Krishnaji spoke to delegates and personnel of the UN. The invitation to speak was from Dr. Muller for the Pacem in Terris organization within the UN, and Krishnaji was asked to speak on peace. Dr. Muller had asked Narasimhan, who had come from Houston where he is lecturing, to preside in his absence. And this is what was done, though at the last minute, Muller’s trip was postponed and he was there. It was a small auditorium, perhaps two hundred seats. Bud came, Pupul, Shainberg, etcetera, with special invitations since it was not open to the public. Krishnaji sat behind a table on the stage and after a rather bureaucratic introduction by Narasimhan, he began to talk in a relaxed, utterly clear way about peace coming about only through a change of consciousness in each human being; and the impossibility of peace among people divided by nationalities, politics, religions, or ideology, and it not coming externally through organizations. Many heads were nodding in agreement, but who knows what it meant to them. "They have probably forgotten it already," said Krishnaji later. He said, when I asked him, that he didn't know what he was going to say until he began. "It is better that way." Some questions were asked at the end, and Krishnaji invited an elderly man to come up and sit with him on the stage. It turned out to be a newspaperman who had been reporting on the UN for years. They sat back and talked for a bit in a relaxed way. Pupul's car had diplomatic plates, and the one from Bud's garage didn't so it couldn't enter, so she dropped us back at the hotel. It was, by then, 3:30 p.m., too late for a restaurant and Krishnaji didn't want room service. "Let's go out," he said. So we walked over to the St. Regis Hotel, but Krishnaji didn't like it, so we walked on. Finally, in Radio City, we went into something new for Krishnaji, a coffee shop. "I don't know where I am," he said.' [Both chuckle.] 'I felt like a shepherd. On the way back, I suggested we get the handbag we have long talked about for Erna, and went in, not to Gucci, but to Mark Cross, where we found a nice black one. A present from Krishnaji to her. Then to the refuge of the hotel and later supper in the rooms.'

April eighteenth. 'Krishnaji, Asit, and I went to an 11 a.m. seminar organized by David Shainberg and held at the B'nai B'rith building near the UN, where security demanded identification to get in. There were about fifty people. Somehow these Shainberg seminars go in too many directions to be good; too many opinions are voiced. Afterward, I had the Lilliefelts, Pupul, and Asit to lunch with Krishnaji at Il Nido. Pupul wasn't feeling well and left, and Asit had an appointment of his own; so Erna, Theo, Krishnaji, and I wound up pleasantly talking, and Krishnaji had Erna open her present, the bag we bought yesterday. We went back to the hotel for a 4 p.m. interview of Krishnaji by Douglas Aaronson of New Age Book Review. He had been at the seminar in the morning. At the same time, another of Bud's daughters, Toodie, came in from East Hampton to see me. Later, Krishnaji and I had supper in the rooms. Asit, who rented a dinner jacket, went with Pupul last night to a dinner party and met Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis. He talked to her about Krishnaji, and she said she would like to meet him. Krishnaji agreed to invite her tomorrow.'

April nineteenth. 'Pupul came by with her Indian government car and took Krishnaji, Asit, and me to the second session of the Shainberg seminar. Asit is in a whirl as publisher Abrams wants to publish his book of photos of Krishnaji. Asit is still using my Minolta here in New York, but had just bought a Nikon AF camera, which is so simple that I will get one as a backup. He took pictures during the seminar, which went better today as Krishnaji took charge of the discussion and kept one subject in focus. Senator Claiborne Pell and a Ms. Carole Taylor were there. All these people seem like not very bright high-schoolers alongside Krishnaji. He brought it all to a halt a little before 1 p.m. so that we could get to Bud's for lunch. Pupul dropped us at Bud's apartment. Lisa couldn't be there, but Bud, Daisy, and Laurie were, and Khen'—that's Bud's cook—'gave what Krishnaji said was the best food he'd had in New York. "Simple and clean." Wild rice, string beans, salad, cheeses, and papaya. Daisy took some photos of Krishnaji.

We then went to the Metropolitan Museum, where Krishnaji wanted to see the Egyptian Temple of Dendur.' It's a very little temple, and they had the whole thing on exhibit. '"You must walk around it from left to right," said Krishnaji, so we did. "This is what we did with the mother prostrating before the entrance," said Krishnaji. "Seven times around, and three times a day." Does he remember this, or was he told this? I forgot to ask. There were too many people at the exhibit for Krishnaji. He would have liked to see it in the empty large hall, but we pressed on with our timing and got back to the hotel by 3:30 p.m., in time for him to have a short rest before the arrival of Asit at 4:15 p.m. with Mrs. Onassis. She wore a long gray coat over a tunic and trousers and boots.' [S laughs.] Yes, this is a note from me to me.

S: Yes, I could tell. [S laughs.]

M: 'The large eyes and breathy voice matched all distant remembrances. Krishnaji came in and she…'

S: Had you met her before?

M: I hadn't met her, no. But you'd seen her on television, you know. [Mimicking a breathless voice:] She had a kind of breathless voice. A little girl voice. I'm not criticizing.

S: No.

M: She was effective. 'Krishnaji came in and shook hands in his courtly way and then a Mr. Edward Plunkett arrived. I never found out who he is other than that he was the man on the other side of her at the dinner party where Asit talked to her about Krishnaji and he knew a lot about Krishnaji. She had suggested he be invited in case it was hard to talk to Krishnaji.' [Chuckles.] 'Small talk was about nil, and Krishnaji soon asked, "Do you want to talk seriously?" A breathless, "Yes." So, he did until almost six o'clock, giving her a tidal wave of Krishnaji basics.' [Both laugh.] 'He kept asking, "Do you understand?" "I think so," she kept saying. Then he put her rather on the spot with questions, "What is thought?" Silence, while he waited and she pondered an answer in front of three strangers.' [Both chuckle.] 'She said it had something to do with planning. "Yes," said Krishnaji, and then "And what else?" I found myself wanting to help her, like a child in school, and also would have liked to leave her alone with Krishnaji, as at times he came rather close to personal things, speaking of sorrow, loneliness, etcetera. But, with Asit there, watching her carefully, and Mr. Plunkett, my leaving would have been pointless. Pupul's arrival ended the conversation after Krishnaji had invited Mrs. Onassis to visit if she ever comes to India. Asit escorted her downstairs, and then left for his flight to Paris, which he has twice postponed so he could be present when Mrs. Onassis met Krishnaji.'

'P.S.: When Krishnaji asked her questions, she said, "I think of myself as a very articulate person. But I don't know what to say."' [Chuckles.]

S: Alright, well, we should end it there because we don't have enough tape for the next day.

M: Okay, well, we got through quite a bit. We'll start next time on the twentieth.

Issue 79: April 20, 1984 to June 30, 1984

The two months covered in this issue are full of travel for Krishnaji and Mary—New York, Ojai, San Francisco, England, and Switzerland—and difficult changes in his organizations. The Oak Grove School changes leadership, and Brockwood's administration continues to be unsettled. But more significantly, after years of Krishnaji wanting an adult study center, a generous donation allows a start on that to be made.

Mary: Alright, we start our discussion today on April twentieth, 1984, and Krishnaji and I are in New York, and he had just finished that year's public talks there. 'We left our hotel by taxi and went to the airport, and took a noon flight on American Airlines to Los Angeles, arriving at 2:40 p.m. The Moodys were late meeting us as they were caught in traffic. David finally appeared just as I was renting a car. We drove along the beach to Ojai on a lovely afternoon, and Krishnaji saw Topa Topa "more clearly than ever," he said.' Whenever we came back to Ojai, he always waited to see Topa Topa. You come up the coast and then there's a big rock, and just after you pass the big rock, the Oxnard Valley opens out and you can see Topa Topa.

Scott: Ah, I didn't know you could see Topa Topa from there.

M: Yes. He had climbed Topa Topa all by himself when he was young.

S: Yes.

M: 'The lovely quiet house, the glowing flowers were a joy. Michael had put food for supper in the kitchen. We unpacked. I went to bed after watching Washington Week in Review.' We always like to look at that.

S: Yes, that's a very good program. Now, before we go on to the twenty-first, I just want to talk about something that you and I talked about yesterday that you didn't elaborate—and that you neglected to put in the previous discussions—which is, and I heard this in a tape that you made at some point, that you began to feel a real sense of protecting Krishnaji, or that sense that you had quickened or solidified or something, when you were crossing Piccadilly with Krishnaji. We mentioned this incident in our last discussion but didn't go into it. But what was also important that you say in this tape is that you grabbed Krishnaji's elbow as he was about to step into traffic—

M: I didn't grasp his elbow, I grasped his arm because he was already in motion.

S: His arm. Right. Right. And that he said that you had saved his life.

M: Well, so he did.

S: Okay, so I'm just putting this on the record, because you didn't talk about this. I think you're too self-effacing, so you didn't talk about this.

M: No, I didn't think of it. I mean, I don't know how much he meant it, but I mean that's what he said. But he didn't say it with great drama: "You saved my life." He just said casually, "Oh, you saved my life," in a very offhand way.

S: Which I expect is how he would say it if you did really save his life, so. [Both chuckle.] Alright…

M: But I must say it did make me realize how careful I had to be, and that I had to think of things like crossing roads. [Both chuckle.]

The twenty-first of April. 'It was a warm, beautiful day. I did laundry and relaxed, puttering around. Dorothy telephoned from Mudiford'—that's where she and Doris and Montague used to go on vacation together. 'She was worried that there had been no answer here when she called last week. She had forgotten the New York talks.' She didn't know why we weren't there.

M: There was a letter from Vanda and one from Gisèle. They have rented a chalet in Schönried for this summer.' Remember that was because we can't go back to Tannegg as it had been sold.

There wasn't much the next day, but on the twenty-third, 'It was a hot, beautiful day. Patricia Hunt-Perry arrived for three days, and is staying at Arya Vihara, as is Ravi Ravindra, and a friend of hers, Milton Friedman. She had asked that Milton be invited. He is staying in Ojai for a month working on a book. He was a journalist and lately a speechwriter for the Reagan administration, but quit when asked to write the "positive" side of a conservation program. He spoke enthusiastically of Washington as a place for Krishnaji to speak. Krishnaji seems to think it a good idea.' He'd never spoken in Washington. He'd been in Washington, but he'd never spoken publicly there. 'Patricia Hunt-Perry came to interview Krishnaji for an article on death. Krishnaji had a nap in the afternoon while I bought a Nikon L35 AF camera.' I was all the time buying cameras to match Asit's and following his advice, and Krishnaji was always egging me on—"Oh, you must have one, you must have one. Just like his." So I'd buy it, and then when I'd try to point it at him and use it, "Not today," he'd say, "not today." [Both chuckle.]

S: Which was the only reason you bought the cameras, anyway…was to take pictures of him.

M: Exactly. So it went in the future when there were newer, better Nikon, or whatever, and he would say, "You must have it," I'd say "Well, if you let me photograph you. Otherwise, no." [Both chuckle.] He didn't commit himself, but…

S: [laughing] But you got the cameras nonetheless.

M: Yes. There is an unusual number of pictures by me of Krishnaji walking ahead of me with his back to me. [S laughs.] That was the only chance I had at times. But then, if other professional people were photographing him, like once in Bombay, I've got a lot of pictures I took in Bombay because there was a professional who had been called in to do it. So I thought, well, he's doing it, I'm going to do it, too, at the same time.

S: Exactly. Yes. Yes. [Both chuckle.]

M: April twenty-fourth. 'I did desk work and laundry. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji gave Patricia Hunt-Perry another interview for the article she is writing on death. Erna and Theo returned from the East.' Oh, they had been in New York with us, of course. 'Rajagopal has sent Erna a $30,000 donation from K&R for scholarships. There was a letter from Vanda and Gisèle and a picture of Chalet Horner in Schönried where we will stay this summer.'

April twenty-fifth. 'At lunch there was a discussion about Krishnaji speaking in Washington next year, and Milton Friedman said he would arrange it there.' He did, too. 'At 4:30, Krishnaji, Patricia Hunt-Perry, Ravi Ravindra, and I did a taped discussion.'

There is nothing of significance for the next couple of days, but on April twenty-eighth, 'Pupul and Mr. Jose, her secretary, arrived by car from Beverly Hills to spend today and tonight. She has been in Los Angeles about the 1985 India Festival. We all lunched at Arya Vihara, and in the afternoon, Krishnaji and Pupul did a taped conversation. I made supper for the three of us. We ate on trays in Krishnaji's room.'

Again, not much except Pupul leaving for New York, people to lunch, I talked—at length—to Mark about his situation, and Krishnaji saw Frances and Milton Friedman. I was doing early walks with Erna on all these days, but I'm not mentioning it.

May second: 'In the morning, I finished my desk work, and packed. The Moodys drove Krishnaji and me to the Santa Barbara airport, from where we flew to San Francisco on United. A woman in the seat next to us nursed her baby but we soon landed in San Francisco.' Why did I mention she was nursing her baby? It must've been rather, uh…

S: Unusual in some way?

M: Yes, I guess she didn't do it subtly or discreetly. A person can do it quietly or stridently. Anyway, I noted it for some reason. 'We took a taxi to the Huntington Hotel, where we have the same suite as in past years, number 514 and 512. These are the best hotel rooms we have had anywhere so far.' So they were. 'We unpacked, then walked in the wind and rain on Nob Hill. We had supper in our rooms.' The suite had a little kitchen; it was very nice.

May third. 'Repeating last year, Krishnaji gave an hour's radio interview to Michael Toms of New Dimension radio. It is taped and will later be broadcast by satellite and picked up by about fifty nonprofit radio stations around the country who send it out on their networks at whatever time they choose. Mrs. Justine Toms came to the hotel and drove us to their recording station, which is in their house.' They were both very nice people. 'The subject asked by Mr. Toms was about conflict, its causes, etc. Krishnaji answered thoroughly, occasionally tapping his palms on the table to emphasize his points.' [Chuckles.] That isn't good for a recording but that's what he did. [S chuckles.] 'I was given a cassette of it, and we were driven back to the Huntington, where we lunched quietly in its Big Four Restaurant. Evelyne came with her daughter Eloise. I asked Krishnaji if he thought it useful for me to question him on tape and he said we should do it. A rest after lunch and then we walked down California Street to Polk Street to buy another book by Paul Theroux, some cheese, and fruit. In the fruit and health food store, young people who worked there said, "It is an honor to have you here, sir."' [Both chuckle.] 'And a young woman on the street said, "How do you do, sir? Welcome to San Francisco. It is an honor to have you come to our city." Krishnaji looked away from the two very large photos of him outside the Masonic Hall. He wanted the Theroux book as he has taken a liking to his writing since Asit gave him Theroux's book about a trip around the coast of Britain, The Kingdom by the Sea. It is critical of the country as it is today and Krishnaji, surprisingly, read it through. He wants me to read it. "We don't really know what Britain is like. We only see part of it," he said, which is true of almost all the countries we visit. Coming up the steep Nob Hill, we took turns carrying our packages and felt we'd had enough exercise. We rested, read, and had supper in the rooms.'

'A few days ago, in Ojai, Krishnaji spoke again of his not liking to go out in the dark. He had stepped out on the front terrace after supper and came back in. He said it is a feeling he's always had. It is not fear as such, but he doesn't like it. It is all right if another person is with him, "or a dog," he said unexpectedly. I tried to find out what it was. "Something else" is more prevalent in the dark. "Evil?" I asked. It seems to be in a realm he doesn't want to discuss. It can't be accurately described. I asked him if the things he does to cleanse or make safe a room, etcetera, are things he was taught…?' You know, that's what he would do. Have we talked about that?

S: Yes, yes, I know. Yes, we have.

M: Okay. '…something occult by someone when he was young, Leadbeater, or someone? He said no, no one taught it. It is something he learned by himself. I asked would it take away its power or use if he were to tell what it is? He said yes, and that it can't be put into words.' Which shut me up. [S laughs.] Well, I wasn't surprised.

S: Yes. [Chuckles.]

M: May fourth. 'Krishnaji slept well. Naudé came at 12:30 p.m., looking smiling. Somewhat more portly.' [Chuckles.] 'We chatted as of yore until Krishnaji came in and greeted him so nicely, "Hello, sir," Krishnaji's face alive and friendly. Alain had first asked if he could bring "a very talented musician" to lunch, and, of course, I said yes. Then he rang to ask if he could also bring a very nice woman interested in Krishnaji, etcetera. I hesitated slightly at two strangers on a day before a talk, but Krishnaji said,

"Why not? It doesn't matter." So I told Alain this and he also wanted to switch the lunch to Greens instead of the Chinese place he had said we would like. The two friends were waiting downstairs in a car that the woman, Anna Silver, had rented. The musician, polite and smiling, was a pupil of Alain's, Ken Johansson, a pale young Dane with an unmarked face and careful, childlike hands. Greens was busy, but Krishnaji's presence got us a corner table by the window. The conversation flowed along the surface. Krishnaji told some stories and it all remained sociable. Alain outmaneuvered me and got the check, which was a bit irritating, as I had done the inviting. But I think it was the woman who really paid via Alain.' [Chuckles.] 'They drove us back to the Huntington and that was that. Krishnaji seemed pleased to see Alain, but later asked me what is wrong with him? Krishnaji felt Alain doesn't really want to be with us. At 4:30 p.m., Terry Doyle came and talked to Krishnaji. He is going to join the Oak Grove School. We walked four laps around Huntinton Park square and had supper in the rooms.'

May fifth. 'On awakening, Krishnaji said he had dreamt of Nitya—that they were walking where there were deep cement canals that had been built. The water hadn't been let in yet and he was afraid Nitya would fall in and he was shouting at him. We had breakfast at 8 a.m., and at 10:55 a.m., we met Theo downstairs and walked the few yards across Taylor Street to the Masonic auditorium stage door.' It was the best arrangement for talks. You just crossed the street and there it was. 'Krishnaji gave the first San Francisco talk to an almost filled house. Erna, Theo, and Alan Kishbaugh came right over to the hotel rooms afterward to meet briefly with Terry Doyle, who is here with his daughter Felicity. It is agreed that he will join Oak Grove School as a teacher of history and English initially, in place of Lee Nichols, who was leaving. He will also help with administration and be what he calls a "Mentor" between older students and staff, parents, etcetera. Erna and Theo lunched with Krishnaji and me downstairs in the Big Four Restaurant and discussed at length the difficulties of Mark and Asha. Asha flew up here and was with Mark at a table in the auditorium lobby, giving information on the school. Krishnaji has said firmly that director's wives have no place in the school and it was felt that her coming here and doing the same thing as Mark was a challenge to us. Krishnaji is going to talk to Mark and to her on Tuesday. We stayed in all afternoon, napped, and had supper in the rooms.'

May sixth: 'I invited Pat Holt to lunch but she couldn't come.' That was a woman who did journalism when we'd been there before. 'Krishnaji gave his second San Francisco talk. A very fine one. Afterward, we took Miranda and John to lunch at Greens, which was very pleasant. "I like them," said Krishnaji. I telephoned Filomena in Rome as it is tomorrow there, and her birthday.'

The seventh of May. 'Krishnaji and I had breakfast, then left the Huntington at 8:30 a.m. We took the 10 a.m. United flight to Santa Barbara where the Moodys met us and drove us to Ojai. It was very hot in the valley, and there was a forest fire towards Santa Paula in May.' I underlined May because to have a forest fire already in May is bad news. 'We lunched at Arya Vihara, then slept in the afternoon. It was too hot to walk. My brother telephoned from Phoenix, where he and Lisa went for a meeting.'

The eighth of May. 'Erna and Theo returned from San Francisco. I went to Ventura and voted an absentee ballot for the June fifth primary, as I won't be here. I then bought plants at Green Thumb Nursery, marketed, and got home at 6:30 p.m. Meanwhile, Krishnaji had talked to Mark, and then to both Mark and Asha. He said just about everything. It was a shock for Mark. Krishnaji and I walked down to see the Lilliefelts, and Krishnaji told them the gist of it.'

May ninth. 'Krishnaji and I drove to Oxnard and got his IRS clearance. Then to Beverly Hills and Dr. Laura Fox, where Krishnaji had a field of vision test. There was no change from his test last year. We ate picnics in the car on a shady street, and then bought another Remington razor, a new showerhead for his bath, things at Lindberg's, and came home along the beach. It was warm but not as hot as yesterday. Krishnaji had a letter from David Bohm. His anxiety attacks began again on his return to England. It is a touching, sad letter.' I don't know what that means.

S: David was terribly anxious about his health. He had real…

M: Yes he was.

S: He was almost a hypochondriac, but he also had real health issues with his heart.

M: That's true. Yes.

S: And I think he had panic attacks about his health.

M: The tenth. 'Mark came to talk to Krishnaji and me. He has decided to leave the school, but wants to remain for one year to transfer the directorship to someone else. Krishnaji told him, "I feel we must not lose you," and spoke of new things starting in India which Mark could be part of if it interests him. Rupert Sheldrake and Jill Purce came to lunch at Arya Vihara. They are part of a seminar on R. D. Laing, the English psychiatrist, and all sorts of other types at the Ojai Foundation up on the Happy Valley land. It seems to entertain Rupert.' [Chuckles.] 'I spoke to Shainberg in New York about David Bohm's condition. He has been in constant touch with him, and arranged for Dave to see a good therapist in London.' Good.

There isn't much the next day, just errands for me in Los Angeles.

The twelfth of May: 'Krishnaji's eighty-ninth birthday. He slept well and looked wonderfully. Birthday greetings as usual are waved away with a note of scorn, but I felt filled with a silent celebration' [chuckles] 'at the shine in his face when it lights up looking at his rose bushes, his lightness of movement, and the beauty that is without age and seems to increase with each year. He is well. He is strong in energy. His mind is more alive than ever. And he is dear beyond any human measure. It has been a hot day. I telephoned Dorothy, as it is her birthday, too. Erna's back is bothering her, so she remained at home. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw a Mrs. Barbara Gardner and husband because she is doing a book on Mrs. Besant. It was too hot to walk, so we just had our usual supper. Television on Saturdays provides only T.J. Hooker, a cops and robber.' I don't remember that program.

The next day is only that, 'Terry Doyle returned to Ojai and Krishnaji talked to him in afternoon.'

May fourteenth. 'There was a 9:30 a.m. meeting of Krishnaji with Terry Doyle, Mark Lee, David Moody, the Lilliefelts, Alan Hooker, and me about the statement The Intent of the Oak Grove School, and we brought it up-to-date. At noon, Erna and I talked to Milton Friedman about Krishnaji speaking in Washington, D.C. April twentieth and twenty-first, 1985. We have booked The Kennedy Center Concert Hall. Alfonso Colón and Armando Riesco were at Arya Vihara for lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview for a career newspaper to a Mrs. Oku Kay Grosgean.'

The fifteenth. 'I went to leave a letter of welcome to Mr. Grohe, who is arriving today at the Ojai Valley Inn. Then I drove to Beverly Hills for a haircut and did small errands. Then to see Amanda and Phil. I'm not sure if I can see them again before we leave. I returned to Ojai by 6 p.m. Krishnaji had been having a meeting, which lasted almost three hours, with the teaching staff. He then walked to the dip with Theo. We had supper at 8 p.m. Too late.' We shouldn't have eaten so late. 'The Lilliefelts had met Grohe and his son at the Los Angeles airport.'

There isn't much from the next two days, but on May eighteenth, 'Krishnaji and I walked to the dip and back at 6:30 a.m., the beginning of a warm day, but the morning was cool and gentle. Krishnaji said that he dreamed that Rajagopal said to him, "Why didn't you tell me you would turn out like this?" and Krishnaji told him, "Because you behaved like such a bastard."' [Both chuckle.] 'There was a quiet lunch at Arya Vihara. Mr. Grohe was there. Krishnaji rechecked The Intent of the Oak Grove School text, and I retyped it. Later, we drove over to look at the new school building in the Oak Grove. Krishnaji kept saying, "What a beautiful place," and "Don't those teachers see it? How can they quarrel about things?"'

May nineteenth. 'It was a warm day. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave Ojai talk number one to a large audience in the Oak Grove. All went well. Grohe, Alan Kishbaugh and Stella R. were at lunch. We had a quiet afternoon.'

The next day Krishnaji gave the second Ojai talk to a large crowd and in perfect weather.

May twenty-first. 'A Lois Hobson was at lunch. She works at the State Department but could be a possible teacher here. I retyped The Intent of the Oak Grove School, and worked on questions handed in for Krishnaji.'

The twenty-second. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held a question-and-answer session in the Oak Grove. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji planted a peepul tree for the new school building. The crowd and the sun tired him.'

May twenty-third. ‘At 9:30 a.m., though Krishnaji was tired from yesterday, he had a meeting of Mark Lee, Erna, and me. Mark is to move out of the school’s main building and is already looking for a house. Terry Doyle is to join the school as head of the upper school; and he, Mark, and David Moody are to work out the administration. I left and went for a massage. When I returned, I found the meeting was still going on, and it was joined now by Terry Doyle and David Moody. By the time of my return to the meeting, Moody had suggested the school be run by the entire staff, which was rejected by Krishnaji, Erna, and Doyle. Doyle is to be the director of the entire school. Krishnaji had been very outspoken. Meanwhile, Amanda is in St. Johns Hospital and was operated on. What was removed was found to be malignant. Amanda is still in the recovery room. Krishnaji had asked me not to worry; that if he could help her, he had to do it through me, and it would be prevented if I became upset. At supper, on the TV came Tribute to a Bad Man and Krishnaji was touched by my smile when Sam’s name came on the screen. He said, “I’m so glad you smiled. I’m so glad you loved someone.” In the kitchen, as we did the supper dishes, he was smiling, too. When I asked him why, he said, “It made me feel such a rush of emotion toward you. I felt no difference with him. I couldn’t feel anything else, that would be dreadful.” His face, when he said all this, was alight and eager with surprise and discovery. He is that flower of the human spirit.’

S: So, what was this Tribute to a Bad Man?

M: It was a picture Sam did.

S: Oh.

M: Yes, sort of a Western—I’ve forgotten what it was…I think maybe James Cagney was in it. I don’t remember too much about it.

May twenty-fourth. ‘Krishnaji laughed suddenly in the kitchen at breakfast. “Why?” I asked. “I’m thinking of your smile. It made me feel very close to you.”’ [S chuckles.] ‘At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer session in the Grove. In the car coming back along Grand Avenue, he said, “I may be going to faint,” but he didn’t. He just closed his eyes for a few minutes while I kept driving slowly. Then it passed. It is some time since he last fainted. As we stepped out of the garage, a green car rushed up behind us, and out jumped an aggressive, absurdly dressed German who had followed Krishnaji from the Grove, demanding to talk to him. Krishnaji had said no, and said it again here with the man shouting at him. I tried to stop the man and he turned on me, “Who are you? Mary Zimbalist?” “Yes,” I replied, but Krishnaji stopped me from saying all I wanted to say. He quietly told the man he couldn’t see him, and we went into the house. Later he told me that I mustn’t try to defend him.’

‘“Why not?” I asked.’

‘“Because they won’t attack me but they might take it out on you. I must defend you,” he replied.’

‘Me: “Isn’t it my job to protect you?”’

‘Krishnaji said, “Something else is doing that. And if you react…do you understand?”’

‘Me: “You mean that if I say something that it may jar that other thing?”’

‘Krishnaji: “Yes. I can tell by looking at their eyes how crazy people are. Of course, if they tried to break into the house, we would both act.”’

‘Me: “Am I supposed to just stand there if someone was physically attacking you?”’

‘Krishnaji: “No, that would be different.”’

May twenty-fifth. ‘Krishnaji saw Armando Riesco before lunch. He is ailing and Krishnaji put his hands on him. He has also done this for Mark Lee, whose back was so bad a doctor wanted to put him in traction for a week, but Krishnaji has totally removed the pain. Mark also reported that severe burns on Carl Talbot’s hands stopped hurting when Krishnaji barely touched his fingers at the peepul tree planting on Tuesday, and the hand is healing. Lois Hobson was at lunch. Krishnaji thinks we must get her for the school. Krishnaji saw Colón and the Fundación people at 3 p.m. I got supper ready after making a Spanish soup of chickpeas, spinach, and the saffron. And we took a short walk up toward Thacher in the slight cool of 6:45 p.m. Amanda telephoned from the hospital. She said she had “no complaints.” Dear god, she has had medical horrors and I have never heard a word or voice tone of complaint from her in all these years.’ She had awful things happen to her.

S: Oh dear.

M: The twenty-sixth: ‘Krishnaji’s third Ojai talk. A big crowd. Very warm day. He put his hands on Riesco afterward at the house, and Riesco says he is better.’

May twenty-seventh. ‘At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his fourth talk to a huge crowd. At 4 p.m. Mark Lee, Terry Doyle, and David Moody came and described to Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Alan Kishbaugh, and me the plan they have worked out for the administration of the school. Mark resigns as administrator and for one year becomes “Director of Development,” which means he will deal with the outside world, like the California accreditation board, and he will go about collecting students, money, and describe the school and its education to various groups including teachers in training. According to Doyle, universities, etcetera will pay considerable sums to people who come and hold seminars on unusual education. Mark will try it for a year. If he can do it, incoming students will be gained and it will also pay his salary, so nothing extra for Oak Grove School. If he is unable to do it, at the end of the year he said he would not want to continue. Meanwhile, David becomes director of the elementary school and Doyle of the upper school. Both of them plus two elected teachers plus an administrative officer will run the school. For the latter job, Doyle wants Lois Hobson, if she comes to us. All this will be put to the trustee meeting tomorrow. It all sounded pretty good until, on the way out, both David and Mark handed Erna letters asking for a big hike in salary. Erna was shocked. Krishnaji was shocked. Much discussion of this ensued among Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Alan, and me. It was a very hot day.'

May the twenty-eighth. 'Alan Kishbaugh, who stayed in the guest flat last night, came to breakfast at 9:30. Erna and Theo also came. Then Evelyne and Alan Hooker came for a trustee meeting. Mark, Terry, and David Moody came once the meeting had started and explained the new school plan. Krishnaji expressed shock at the money letters. Moody became very emotional and sat with a bowed head. The trustees want a person to be responsible to them, which means, a principal, and Doyle was appointed. We went to Arya Vihara for lunch. Ingeborg von Massenbach and her daughter Helen were there, having arrived to stay until June 7. Lou Blau was also there. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a meeting with trustees, the school board, and the Oak Grove School staff; and the new setup was announced. Mark began by speaking very well about his change of responsibilities. Then David, who had pulled himself together, also spoke well, and so did Terry Doyle. There was a knee-jerk reaction from some of the staff: "We weren't consulted," and "We used to run the school." But Krishnaji wafted in eloquence about "You are the inner circle, we are the outer circle. You get on with teaching and let us provide what you need to teach, etcetera." It seemed to mollify them. While this was going on, the telephone rang and it was Amanda, blessedly home from the hospital. The thermometer was 100 all day.' Golly.

May twenty-ninth. 'On this day, when Krishnaji should have been resting, and the thermometer reached a 106 in the shade on my back porch…' How did we stand it? We had no air conditioning in those days.

S: Whew. I know.

M: '…Krishnaji saw Al Blackburn at noon. Evelyne brought the actor Richard Chamberlain to lunch, and Rupert Sheldrake and Jill Purce were there as well. She asked me at lunch if Krishnaji would help her sciatica, and so he did afterward. Then he talked to Lais Da Silva and later at 5 p.m. to Bill Quinn.'

The next two days have nothing of real significance—I'm doing errands, getting the house ready to leave, and packing.

June first: 'With all the sitting that lies ahead for me, I went for an early walk with Erna. Then intensive packing all morning, finishing everything by 12:30 p.m. We had lunch at Arya Vihara, and then at 2:10 p.m., Krishnaji and I and Mr. Grohe left in the school van for the Los Angeles airport with Mark and David Moody driving. We stopped in Malibu and, while they stayed outside, I went in to see Amanda and Phil. There was Amanda in an old bathrobe, looking unchanged, undiminished. We sat in the living room, all three of us, and it was as it has always been all these years. These moments of being together seem out of time, the present and the past and always. After about fifteen minutes, I left quickly with the sound of all our voices and amusement in my bones. Halfway past Santa Monica, I realized that the usual 5:55 p.m. departure time of the normal TWA flight was now 5:15 p.m. Mark drove with haste and skill and we got there with thirty minutes to spare.' [Chuckles.] 'Alan Kishbaugh was there to see us off. Krishnaji and I had our usual seats in the bow, and Mr. Grohe got one just behind.'

June second. 'We arrived at Heathrow at 11:20 a.m. Rita Zampese met us and so did Dorothy, Scott, and Harsh. One of Krishnaji's bags was missing. The recent story of Brockwood was in Dorothy's face: tight, repressed, unhappy. Brockwood was physically beautiful. The new enclosed front hall was finished. The color of the newly finished drawing room walls was perfect again, and all was well upstairs. But the atmosphere in the school struck Krishnaji so forcibly that he felt like turning around and leaving. We reached Brockwood in time for a late lunch. Mr. Grohe is staying two nights in the West Wing. Dr. Parchure is here. I spoke to Mary Links. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon.'

June third. 'Krishnaji slept till 10 a.m. In the afternoon, ten of us, including Krishnaji, drove to the New Forest to look at a type of house we might be able to build as a study center at Brockwood. Krishnaji found it not suitable. Grohe has offered to pay for a normal building, keeping a room for himself. We got back after 6 p.m. Krishnaji, Mr. Grohe, and Scott went for a walk. Krishnaji's missing bag was delivered by TWA. I unpacked it for him, and then fell into bed and a heavy sleep.' Do you remember that walk, or do you want to add anything?

S: I remember not just the walk, but before that. When Krishnaji had last been at Brockwood, I had decided to see if we couldn't build a study center as he had wanted. He had given up on the idea because of the prohibitive costs presented by Ian Hammond. In my investigations, I found that A-frame buildings were the cheapest kind of building to build, and it was really the most we could afford, and maybe not even that. I had been in contact with a builder who specialized in A-frame buildings, and a special A-frame architect, and we had a tentative drawing made; but people, especially Krishnaji, wanted to see what a large A-frame building looked like. There happened to be one not so far away in the New Forest, so we went to see this. Krishnaji took one look at the building from the road and just shook his head. And everybody else there also didn't like it, at which point my heart sank, because even building that would have been a real stretch, and we certainly couldn't build anything for more money. So we got in the cars to come back. I can't remember what car Grohe drove in to get there, but as we were getting in the cars for the return to Brockwood, he said he wanted to ride back with me. I can remember I was sitting in the back of the car with him, and he said something to the effect that we must build a proper building, and that he would pay for it, or that's what I thought he said, but I didn't quite understand him. Of course, I was effusive in my thanks, etcetera, etcetera, and as soon as we got back, I went up to Krishnaji's room and I told him what I thought Grohe had said to me, but I just wasn't sure. Of course, I didn't feel I could ask Grohe the obvious questions like, "How much will you pay?" and "What exactly are you giving us?" etcetera. Krishnaji told me not to worry, and that he would talk to Grohe about it. So, Krishnaji then invited Grohe and me on the walk, and I believe I heard him confirm some amount with Krishnaji.

M: Do you remember what amount was mentioned?

S: No, I can't remember, but it was a large amount. Although Grohe didn't pay for all of it, but he did give us a huge portion. I think he gave us a million pounds.

M: That's what my recollection is.

S: I think—yes, he ended up giving us a million pounds, but it cost a lot more than that.

M: Did it?

S: Oh, yes, and we raised all the rest of it.

M: Yes.

S: But this was an extraordinary moment, because after that walk, which was after the collapse of my planning for an A-frame building, and then the miracle of a better plan being possible because of Grohe's generosity, that evening, at supper, my appendix burst.

M: Your what?

S: My appendix burst.

M: Was it then?

S: That very evening.

M: Good god. [Both chuckle.]

S: It will probably say something in your…

M: Well, it does. Now wait a minute…

S: [laughs] Anyway…

June fourth. 'Scott is in the Winchester Hospital with a possible gallstone attack.' That's when they couldn't diagnose…

S: Yes, they misdiagnosed it, yes.

M: [chuckles] 'Mr. Grohe left for Switzerland. Mary and Joe came at noon and stayed until 4 p.m. I spoke to Vanda in Florence.'

June fifth. 'Iris Murdoch came to meet Krishnaji, lunched with us, and she and Krishnaji talked some more until she went back to Oxford at 3 p.m. They plan to do a video dialogue in October. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked through the Grove and down across the fields. The tests on Scott in the hospital are inconclusive.'

S: To say also, just to add to the information here—I had made the contact with Iris Murdoch through a strange channel. Brian Jenkins's mother knew Iris Murdoch, and she was the initial contact. I then went to Oxford to talk with her about coming and having a discussion with Krishnaji.

M: You did?

S: Yes. And then she came and met him, and they eventually had the recorded discussion, but I felt terrible that I had initiated this and I wasn't there when she came because I was too ill. But it was originally from Brian Jenkins.

M: I know somewhere, in talking, I think with Mary L.—we had talked about possible people and Iris Murdoch's name was mentioned.

June sixth: 'In the morning, I went to Alresford and the bank on errands. At noon, the Links brought John Julius Norwich, Mr. and Mrs. Forbes Taylor, Jack Gill, and his assistant came to talk to Krishnaji and me about a film for TV of Krishnaji's early life. We discussed it again after lunch. Krishnaji seems to agree to it. Harsh had a compact disc player installed in Krishnaji's room and he is pleased by it.'

The seventh. 'Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I took the 10:45 a.m. Petersfield train to London. Joe met us, drove Krishnaji and me to Huntsman, and then we went to lunch with him and Mary at Hyde Park Street.' That's where they lived. 'Joe drove Krishnaji to the dentist, Mr. Thompson. Mary and I sat and talked mostly about the pros and cons of the Norwich TV film project. Krishnaji had a tooth filled, and then we came back by train.'

The next day. 'The Marogers arrived. Also David Shainberg and Catherine de Segonzac. Krishnaji held the first brain seminar with Shainberg, Dr. David Pete, Professor Francisco Varela, and Professor Bergstrom. It was videotaped with four cameras, Kathy handling it instead of Scott, who is still in hospital. It was a warm day. We all rested in the afternoon, then I went on the walk with Krishnaji to the Grove, and then Dorothy and I went round the fields.'

June ninth. 'Dagmar Lichti and Rita Zampese came for the weekend. Dagmar is in the West Wing. Krishnaji has a sudden idea for Scott to mostly come out of the school and head the study center project here. I briefly mentioned it to Ingrid, Jean-Michel, and later Mary Cadogan by phone, and all are enthusiastic. Krishnaji held the second session of the brain seminar at 11:45 a.m. At 3:30 p.m. I went with Kathy and Dagmar to see Scott in the Winchester Hospital. Dagmar thinks he has an abscess on the appendix. While she discussed this with the floor doctor, I put Krishnaji's study center idea to Scott and Kathy. They are to talk it over, but seemed elated. I telephoned Amanda. She is well.'

The tenth. 'Krishnaji held the third brain seminar discussion. These haven't gone too well. The scientists are not responsive to Krishnaji. He, Shainberg, and I talked after lunch. At 5 p.m., I attended a boring staff meeting. After supper Dagmar Lichti left with Rita. I cleaned the room so that Marie-Bertrande could move in. Parchure earlier tested Krishnaji's blood sugar. His fasting number was 105.'

June eleventh. 'I talked to Shainberg about critical things he has said about Krishnaji. He and Catherine de Segonzac left for Israel. Meanwhile, Krishnaji had a talk with Dorothy and told her he had asked Scott to head the study center. She is to be full principal of the school. Krishnaji spent the day in bed. I went to Alresford on errands, but got back in time for a school meeting. In the evening I talked with Marie-Bertrande.'

June twelfth. 'Merali left. I talked to Mary Cadogan on the phone about Scott and Mr. Grohe being made trustees. Krishnaji approves. Three men from Border Television came to talk to Krishnaji about an interview on Channel 4. He spoke to them before and after lunch. Lady Dufferin also was at lunch. At 4 p.m., he gave an interview to Mrs. Ann Toothe. And then put his hands on de Pomereaux again. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I had a short walk. After supper I went to the hospital with Kathy to ask for Scott's acceptance of the study center post and trusteeship.' It doesn't say you agreed. [Both chuckle.]

June thirteenth. 'I went to Alresford with Marie-Bertrande. Mr. Grohe returned. Mary C. came, and she and I talked to Dorothy about Scott's trusteeship and the idea we had of making Ingrid the school manager, and Harsh and Stephen co-directors of studies. Dorothy agreed. After Krishnaji had spoken alone with Mr. Grohe, we joined forces, and Mr. Grohe was invited to become a trustee of the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust, and Krishnamurti Educational Center at Brockwood Park. He accepted. Kathy brought Scott back from the hospital.' Did they take out your appendix?

S: No, they couldn't.

M: You still had it?

S: Yes, what had happened…well, let me first say that we all have what's called a peritoneum in the stomach whose job it is to encapsulate infections in the abdomen. I was lucky and healthy, and so my peritoneum had surrounded my appendix, and the appendix burst inside that. But that meant they didn't dare operate, because if they did, then I would get peritonitis. So they said that I had to wait for about six months, by which time my body would have slowly absorbed all the poisons, and then they could remove it. But, of course, at any time, it could open and then I would get peritonitis, so it was…

M: Well, did you eventually have it out?

S: Eventually I did. Six months later I had it out. But I…

M: That's terrible.

S: Yes, and that's why I wasn't supposed to go to Saanen that year and I wasn't supposed to do anything that wasn't very, very gentle and careful.

M: Gently move around.

S: Yes.

M: Heavens.

S: But I did go to Saanen that year and I did, you know, carry on, more or less, as normal.

M: You didn't climb in the mountains?

S: No, I didn't climb any mountains that year. [Chuckles.] I could barely climb stairs.

M: Goodness. 'After lunch Krishnaji, with Dorothy, Scott, Mr. Grohe, Ingrid, Harsh, Mary Cadogan, and me present, Krishnaji announced the new trustees and the new positions in the school. Stephen was absent but came for supper and afterward Dorothy, Mary C., Ingrid, Harsh, and I explained. At 8 p.m., we met Grohe and Gisèle about the activities of the study center. It was a busy day.'

June fourteenth. 'Krishnaji and I took the 9:45 a.m. train to London. We had Huntsman and Maxwell fittings, then Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt. We lunched with Mary and Joe at their flat. Joe took Krishnaji to the dentist while I talked to Mary. Then Joe went back to fetch Krishnaji with me and Joe dropped us at Waterloo.' That's almost becoming…

M: A ritual; an undeviating, excellent arrangement.

June fifteenth. 'In the morning Krishnaji talked to Scott and then to Ingrid. After lunch, at 4:15, Krishnaji talked to Dorothy and Ingrid. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji attended a staff meeting and announced the new setup of the school, that Scott and Kathy are going to create and run the adult center, and also that Mr. Grohe and Scott are becoming trustees. He felt no contact with the staff in talking with them, and was very disturbed by it all. He said it was my responsibility to do something.' Me. [S chuckles.]

June sixteenth. 'Krishnaji talked with students, who are very critical of the state of the school. A German woman architect arrived, but was quite unqualified. Krishnaji saw Brian Jenkins in the afternoon. Scott has had a relapse. Pain and fever. Doctor came to see him.' What happened?

S: I can't remember.

M: 'I talked to the Hammonds about recommending an architect for the study center.'

The seventeenth of June. 'My brother rang from the airport. He, Lisa, and their son, Lindsey, are on their way to Berlin and Paris. Krishnaji spoke witheringly to the staff and guest helpers. David and Saral came to lunch with Krishnaji and he put his hands on Dave afterward.' Well, what about you?

S: I probably didn't ask. [Both chuckle.]

M: Do you remember it?

S: No, I don't.

M: June eighteenth. 'It was a warm day. I was up at 4:30 a.m., and went to work at my desk. Then went to Alresford and Winchester for errands.' 4:30 a.m., I got up to the desk? That's ridiculous. Anyway, 'I got back at 1:45 p.m. At 2 p.m., Mary and Joe came and Krishnaji, Mary, and I did a taped conversation about there being no one representing Krishnaji in the past, present, or future.' Oh, yes, that silly woman, Vimala Thakar, had said that she would carry on Krishnaji's work, and, of course, it wasn't true, so it was felt that something should be put in the Bulletin. I think that's what we're talking about.

'At 5 p.m., Krishnaji came to a school meeting and talked for two and a half hours. He said he is joining Dorothy, Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen in running the school. He spoke intensely—close to tears at times.'

June nineteenth. 'Krishnaji attended the 9 a.m. meeting of the four: Dorothy, Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen.' Oh, yes. There was a meeting every morning of the four of them, but you must have been there, too…

S: No, I was probably still sick, and I think by then I had come out of school things to give my energy to the study center.

M: Oh, yes, it's awful you were so sick. 'Ian and Jane brought an architect, Mr. Jack, to look at the study center's site. Then talk with Krishnaji and Mr. Grohe, Scott, Kathy, and me about building. He made a good impression. All lunched and then Grohe left for France. Krishnaji saw David Bohm, who had come down, then he went to bed. I talked at length to Harsh, then went for a short evening walk, and then talked to Claire.' Oh, that was the Claire and Harsh drama.

S: Yes, yes, and which went on. Claire was Harsh's wife. But, just to say, I wasn't happy about this architect that Ian and Jane had brought.

M: No? Good.

S: This architect was someone from Ian's old office. Ian had been an architect, but he had retired by then. I had just been made a trustee, and as you know, Ian's wife, Jane, was a trustee, and at that time, I was terribly ill. So, when this architect was really, I felt, foisted on me, I felt I just couldn't resist. So we spent a lot of money and a lot of time…

M: Oh, really?

S: Oh, yes. Coming up with a building that was completely refused permission, and that Krishnaji didn't like.

M: I don't remember any of this.

S: Because Krishnaji couldn't visualize a building from drawings, a model was made of it, and Krishnaji said it looked like a country club, which it did. It was…

M: Oh, yes, I remember that model and that it looked like, I thought, a golf club.

S: Yes. But by that time, which was several months later, of course, I was healthier. When Krishnaji didn't like the design, Ian said that he would step in and take charge of the project, but I just said, no, that I wanted to get other people.

M: Well, you were the one who—

S: —was in charge of it, but it was still difficult to say this to the husband of a trustee. Anyway, I did, and went around seeing all the best architects in England and got them all…well, we'll come across it in your diaries.

M: Okay.

There's nothing much the next day.

June twenty-first. 'Krishnaji and I went to London. We met Asit at Huntsman, I picked up the first pair of Maxwell shoes I had ordered, and we walked to the Connaught, where Asit gave us lunch, joined by a friend of his. Krishnaji and I walked back and looked unsuccessfully for knitted shirts for him. We caught the 4:20 p.m. train back to Petersfield. It was another hot day. Krishnaji was all right in the city, but he has hay fever here.'

June twenty-second. 'At 8:45 a.m., Krishnaji was interviewed by Eric Robson of Border Television for a series on revelation starting in August. At 11 a.m., he and I came to the meeting of the four, Dorothy, Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen. It was decided not to have a garden helper, David Jinks, stay and join the staff. After lunch, I went to Petersfield and meanwhile three girl students went to Krishnaji with a letter about Jinks. He talked to them until the 5 o'clock staff meeting, which he attended, and gave the letter to the staff. Two and a half hours of contention and confusion followed, and produced a revocation of the morning decision, and Jinks was allowed to stay. Krishnaji is disgusted by the whole thing.' What had happened with this Jinks character? Or don't you remember?

S: I can't remember but it was typical of the contention and chaos at that time.

M: June twenty-third. Krishnaji and I talked with Ingrid and Harsh. At noon, Krishnaji talked to the students while, at a staff meeting, I said that the Foundation had decided that ultimate decisions reside with Dorothy and the three, and cannot be overturned by others. In the afternoon, there was an open house in the school and garden.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji and I attended the 9 a.m. meeting of Dorothy, Harsh, Stephen, and Ingrid, and it was difficult. Dorothy was very hostile. At 11:45 a.m., Krishnaji did a videotaped conversation with Ronald Eyre.' Remember Ronald? He was nice.

S: I do. He was another one that I had made the contact with and got him to come to do the videotaped interview, and then I wasn't there for the interview. I was ill again.

M: Too ill again.

S: And Kathy pulled it all off. She really did a wonderful job with all that.

M: Yes, yes.

June twenty-fifth. 'I telephoned Filomena. It was difficult to know if she understood me. I took a 9:45 a.m. train to London. Adrian Spanier'—that's the interior decorator I used for the fire restoration work—'met me and we went to look at armoires. I bought a mahogany one and a chest of drawers for use in the wallpaper room to make it into an extra guest room. I looked at fabrics for my room but found nothing. I went alone to Habitat, then took the 2:48 p.m. train back. Krishnaji had stayed in bed. Mr. Santhanam had come to see him. I telephoned Amanda. All is well.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji met at 9 a.m. with the four. It went well. At noon, Mary and Joe came and stayed until 3 p.m. At 5 p.m., there was the last school meeting of the term, to which Krishnaji came.'

There's really nothing for the next few days except that the school term ended and the students left.

June twenty-ninth: 'Since we came to Brockwood this month, it has been a period of endless meetings and intense concern on Krishnaji's part. Krishnaji and I left Brockwood at 8:15 a.m. with Harsh driving us to Heathrow. We took a Swissair flight at 10:35 a.m. to Geneva, and went to the Hotel des Bergues. We lunched in the Amphitryon, went to Jacquet for ties, Krishnaji left both his watches and naviquartz at Patek for servicing, and we bought two bathrobes for him at the Pharmacie Principale. We came back to the hotel, rested, and slept. Dined pleasantly in the Amphitryon.'

June thirtieth. 'We had a quiet morning in the hotel. At noon Hertz delivered a red Fiesta and we drove to Grohe's house for lunch. Then, we went on up to the Chalet Horner in Schönried. Vanda and Fosca had arrived there last night.'

S: I think we should leave it here as there's a little bit of tape but probably not enough for another day, and this is a good ending place.

Issue 80: July 1, 1984 to September 15, 1984

Mary is so busy in the period covered by this issue, that she has little time to write her more lengthy thoughts in her big diary. Nonetheless, we see from her little daily diary this extraordinary period in her life with Krishnaji. The conflict at Brockwood escalates to what is probably Brockwood's darkest hour: Krishnaji threatening to leave Brockwood. But it was also a period that saw further change in the Brockwood staff to a new era, and progress in the creation of the adult study center.

This issue also includes a discussion of Mary's unique inclusiveness.

Mary: We're beginning our discussion today on July first, 1984, and my diary says, 'Yesterday we left Geneva in a Hertz Ford Fiesta, drove along the lake to Mr. Grohe's house in Buchillon, lunched with him, his son, and secretary, and then we continued on up the mountains to Schönried. Somehow, we found Chalet Horner, rented by Vanda and Gisèle in April when we learned that Chalet Tannegg had been sold. It is rather steeply up a small road and has the Tannegg view, but is higher up and taking in the whole valley. It belongs to an English woman. There are a lot of steep stairs, but all else is adequate. Krishnaji has the main room on the same floor as the living and dining rooms and kitchen. I am in the attic, and Vanda, Fosca, and Dr. Parchure, when he arrives tomorrow, share the ground floor. Fosca had her ninetieth birthday last December and is still her funny, dear self. Fosca is so pleased to see Krishnaji, to be with us all another summer. Vanda is looking well. I spent the day unpacking, and slept three hours in the afternoon.' I, who goes around saying that I don't know how to nap, am lying. I seem to take nothing but naps in these books.

Scott: [chuckles] No—you've just forgotten how to nap.

M: I've forgotten how to nap. I must resuscitate it.

The second of July. 'I went to Gstaad on various errands. Krishnaji remained in bed, resting. I fetched Dr. Parchure at the Schönried station in the evening.'

July third. 'I did errands in the morning, and at 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji and I drove to the road above Tannegg and took our accustomed path through the woods to the river. Everything is so dearly familiar. We are here another year. What a wondering luxury that is, to have come back again. Krishnaji is well, strong, and we are here once more. The familiar seems a space of sanity. Krishnaji likes this walk. There is nothing level for walking near Chalet Horner, but it is only a ten-minute drive to our Tannegg zone. The Tannegg was empty and mute as we drove past. We stopped by the tent on the way back. It is bigger and lengthwise, parallel to the river this year.'

There is not much on the next two days except that on the fifth, 'Krishnaji spoke to Harsh, Ray McCoy, and Raman about the school.'

July sixth. 'I met Friedrich Grohe at the station and brought him to the chalet. He is giving another large donation to the KFA and wants to buy the Zalk House in Ojai. I helped Grohe fill out bank forms, and we telephoned Erna in Ojai with the news. Krishnaji is moved by Grohe's generosity, and disturbed by the lack of responsibility at Brockwood. In the afternoon, I drove the car to the tent, walked to Saanen station, took the train back to Schönried, and walked up the hill to the chalet. Then Krishnaji and I walked down the mountain, across the fields where there was too much sun for Krishnaji, but there was nothing to do but keep going. It was too severe a walk for both of us, and the lack of shade for Krishnaji rules it out as well.'

S: There was a funny thing that happened, and it might have been this year or the following year, because I can remember that the tent was lengthwise, parallel to the river. Anyway, Krishnaji had come down to the tent as he usually did every year, just to see the preparations. He and I were standing at the entry to the tent, and a woman came up with one of Krishnaji's books in her hand and Krishnaji's picture on the back. She just looked briefly at Krishnaji, and then looked right at me and asked me is this the place where Krishnamurti speaks? She didn't recognize him. And, of course, Krishnaji just tried to be invisible. [Both laugh.] It was so funny, looking at him trying not to be there, [laughs] and so I just said yes, this is the place, etcetera. She was just turning and about to go when she recognized Krishnaji. [Both laugh.] I can still see him so clearly, though, trying to be invisible and not be there. [Both laugh.]

M: July seventh. 'I changed the red Fiesta for a more discreet gray-green Opel. Bought Adidas shoes, and brought Natasha up to see Vanda. We had her stay to lunch. She will stay with Vanda in Florence. Krishnaji came to the table, but otherwise slept most of the day.'

The eighth. 'Krishnaji gave his first Saanen talk, a strong talk, in the new expanded tent. It is much nicer than previous years. He now sits on the west side, and the tent is wider. A large crowd filled it. Grohe brought a friend from Austria to lunch, a Mr. Hammerli. I went with them and later with a friend of Vanda, Monica von Siebenthal, to see other walks for Krishnaji around Schönried, but they have too little shade, so it was back to Tannegg for the walk that he prefers when he woke up from his nap. It was a warm day. He was tired but after supper watched the film Great Escape in German on TV.'

July ninth. 'Vanda left for Florence, independent as always, refusing to let me drive her to the station.' [Chuckles.] 'I marketed and saw Harsh and Stephen in the afternoon. Later we tried a drive to Lauenen and Turbach, but the sun was too strong. Scott arrived in Saanen and came up to see Krishnaji. Grohe has lent Kathy and Scott his VW. Scott doesn't look healthy and had to take things slowly.'

S: I still had my burst appendix. So I guess my story of the woman was from the following year.

M: July tenth. ‘At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his second Saanen talk. At 4 p.m., Jane Hammond and Ingrid came to see Krishnaji and me.’ It doesn’t say what about. ‘Another hot day.’

The eleventh. ‘It was hot again. Scott brought the initial floor plans for the proposed Brockwood Study Center. I went down and invited Dorothy and Montague to lunch tomorrow. At 4 p.m., Christina, Gary, Harsh, Wendy, Scott, Ingrid, Raman, and Ray McCoy came to talk about Brockwood. They seem determined to make things right.’

S: I have to say that, at this point, I no longer had anything much to do with the school.

M: Oh?

S: Yes, when Krishnaji asked me to look after the creation of the study center—and I can remember—it was a great relief…

M: Because it sprang you out of the school.

S: Exactly, it sprang me from the school, which was in such turmoil. So, for some reason, I was asked to come to some of these meetings, but I wasn’t really involved in the school.

M: Yes, well, you are part of the Brockwood totality.

S: Yes, I was.

M: July twelfth. ‘It is a little cooler, and Krishnaji gave his third Saanen talk. I fetched Dorothy and Montague up to lunch. Dorothy is pleased to have driven her Land Rover once again to Saanen after not being able to come last year. To her it is an affirmation that she is well again. I met Guido Franco at the Ermitage Hotel, where I stayed my first summer in Saanen. He wishes to do an article on Krishnaji for a Swiss magazine L’Illustré. When I came back, Krishnaji and I went to the Tannegg hill for a walk in the woods. After supper, Scott and Kathy and Mary Cadogan (who had just arrived) came by.’

The next day was the meeting of the international committees, and on July fourteenth, ‘Princess Gabrielle of Liechtenstein came to lunch. She was at the committee meeting yesterday, lives in Geneva, but is staying now in Rougemont. She very tentatively spoke of Merali, who has tried to involve her in Palamaner.[1] But, as she saw I had reservations about him, her own began to come out. She said a man in Geneva “who should know” told her that the source of Merali’s money is from doing things for the dictatorship of Zaire. When she left, I went to see Mary Cadogan and Jane to discuss this.’

S: I don’t know. A great deal of his money came from his contact with Mobutu Sese Seko, who was forever the dictator of Zaire.

M: Oh.

S: And while it's not something I would want to do, what about someone who owns stock in Boeing? Which I also wouldn't want to do. I mean, I don't know, but it might be morally similar. I don't think Merali ever did anything like stealing or anything like that. But if a government like Zaire wants to buy things and there are businesses in other countries like the United States and Belgium—which actually put Seko in power—which want to sell them those things, and Merali acts as the middleman, again, it's not what I would want to do…but there's a lot of things I wouldn't do. [Both chuckle.]

M: I hope so. Well, anyway, after discussing this with Mary and Jane, I later picked them up as well as Dorothy, and drove up to the top of the Hornberg for a supper of fondue. All went pleasantly until Brockwood was broached, then Dorothy immediately cut in, saying she was leaving Brockwood. A long, difficult conversation ensued, trying to get her to see the need for cooperation. She is tight, angry, and suspicious.' That was her flaw. She remained that way, really.

S: Yes. There is something unrelated I want to talk about, just briefly, because I don't think we've mentioned it. It is just something I was thinking about after the last discussion we had, and it's something that I want to go on the record about you [chuckles]. Most of the people who were around Krishnaji were very jealous of contact with him, and wanted to restrict the access that other people had. Dorothy was certainly like that. Very strongly. No one was to go on a walk in the afternoon with Krishnaji but you and her and some other visiting dignitaries.

India was an absolute festering little cesspit of this kind of thing, where people were always keeping score of who Krishnaji asked to go on the walk, or whether he asked them to go in his car, or…It was just—it was just awful. It was just awful.

M: I felt that the Indians tolerated me because I didn't go there very much.

S: Perhaps, but it was also because you rose above it somehow, and Krishnaji kept you above it. You were in a different category altogether.

M: I knew when I started doing anything for him that this would happen.

S: Yes, absolutely.

M: And it would be… I thought, well, if I can't do it, well, you know, I just shouldn't get involved in it.

S: Exactly. So, one of the things that happened as a consequence of this, is that as I began to have increasing contact with Krishnaji, and I had more and more contact with him, was that this rankled Dorothy a great deal.

M: Yes. I'm sure.

S: Dorothy had said to both Krishnaji and to Mary Cadogan (and they both told me this) that when asked some years before, or at some point, who should look after Brockwood after her, she had said me. But when I began to have this increased contact with Krishnaji, my relationship with Dorothy began to be really difficult.

M: Yes, she was very pro your doing things, initially.

S: Yes, very pro, and very supportive of me, etcetera. But as my contact with Krishnaji increased, that went down. That previous summer—I guess it was 1983—when I stayed at Tannegg, that was just terrible. She seemed terribly afraid of losing power at Brockwood, and terribly afraid of losing the special contact she felt she had with Krishnaji, so that I would go out for walks with Krishnaji, or I would just go up to his room, was threatening. No one else would just go up to his room to listen to his music with him or watch television with him. Dorothy went up with trepidation.

What I really want to say is that you stand out in absolute contrast to all of that. And I remember being astonished at the time, and grateful—and I still am—that you always welcomed me. [M chuckles] Whatever Krishnaji wanted, you had no kind of egotism standing in the way, that you weren't thinking, "Oh, that other person is there, he's taking time away from me…"

M: No, I was delighted that you were there.

S: Yes, but that was yet another thing that made you absolutely unique in Krishnaji's circles. Because, well, as I mentioned, India was ridiculous, but Erna also was jealous of who had contact with him.

M: Yes.

S: So you see, it really made you unique in Krishnaji's entire circle that you didn't have that selfishness, or that possessiveness of wanting to keep other people away…You didn't have any of that. And I think that that needs to be put on the record somewhere, because…well, it was a gift to me; but it must also have been a gift to Krishnaji, not to have that terrible selfishness surrounding him.

M: Yes, yes. Yes. Well, I don't know I…I didn't want to do anything else…

S: Well, I know, but that [chuckles] was very unique.

M: Well…for instance, I was very aware that I was supplanting Vanda in a way, and in Gstaad…I didn't…I mean, I at first rented my own place and let Naudé stay down there. But gradually, as she always used to like to go back to Florence, because Paolo and Jon, her daughter and son-in-law, who lived in Canada, always came back to Florence, home—obviously, from Paolo's point of view—in July. So, Vanda would come and open the chalet, and put Fosca there or someone to cook for him, and then go back. Then she came back after.

S: Yes.

M: So she gradually—I forget when or how gradual it was—but anyway, she asked me to run the chalet while she was away. And then, eventually, we shared the rent. But when she was there, she was maîtress de maison and, when she wasn't there, I ran the place. It was all amicable.

S: Yes, it was. It was.

M: But, I was conscious that I was intruding on what had been her territory, as it were. I only did it when she asked me to.

S: Yes, yes. From the point of view of a visitor, like myself, it was always obvious that there was a balance, a give-and-take between the two of you, which was very nice.

M: Yes. I had a little bit of trouble getting her to let me share the cost of the rent. Because otherwise she was supporting me, and I said, well, you're kind enough to want me to be here, and let me stay here, but I must share the cost of it. I didn't interfere with Fosca…

S: Of course.

M: …because Fosca was her employee. But the rent of the place, I could be part of. She demurred a bit, but then finally it…anyway.

S: Well, it's just worth noting.

M: Yes, but I was quite aware that the less I went to India, the better.

S: India was terrible. And the final year in India, which—well, you weren't there, so we probably won't talk about it, but that final year especially…Because Krishnaji had me put in the upstairs bedroom next to him at Vasanta Vihar, and he said to me, "You must just come in whenever you want to. Just walk in no matter who's here," and I said, "Krishnaji I can't"—he said "No, you must do that, no matter who's here. And, if I want private time with that person, I'll just say it to you." Well, this was just terrible for the Indians, but I could tell that's what Krishnaji wanted. This was terrible for them. And there was only once that Krishnaji said that he was talking privately—and I can't remember who it was to, it might have been Nandini—but my doing this was terrible for the Indians. But, I guess, Krishnaji was saying something with all of this. But, of course, to them, I was just being brash and rude and awful and usurping of their rightful place.

M: Yes.

S: And it was just very difficult.

M: Yes, and of course you did the ultimate thing they hated by getting him out of there.

S: I know. That was also just terrible.

M: Mm. Yes. Thank god. Well, where were we?

S: We were about to begin the fifteenth.

M: Right, the fifteenth of July: 'It rained.Krishnaji gave his fourth Saanen talk. A strong, clear one. Grohe brought the same man to lunch as last Sunday and they both ran down the mountain to catch the train, faster than if I had driven them.' [Chuckles.] 'Having lent his car to the Forbeses, Grohe is content to go everywhere on foot, an impassioned walker. I walked with Krishnaji on the Tannegg walk. Mary Cadogan had a difficult talk with Dorothy, and Jane was there, too. Scott came by briefly in the evening.'

S: I should say that when I came by a lot of these times, it was because Krishnaji was putting his hands on me.

M: Oh, was he?

S: That's often what it was, yes, because I was still ill.

M: The sixteenth. 'At 9:30, Krishnaji spoke to Dorothy, Mary Cadogan, Jane, and me. Dorothy, half in tears, asked to retire. Krishnaji said she cannot' (underlined) 'retire. He spoke with tremendous force and then left the room. Dorothy and the rest of us agreed to start afresh at Brockwood without the record of the past troubles. Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen were waiting below, and they joined us and we all talked until 1 p.m. about a new organization of the school. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched alone. I rushed to do the marketing and got back by 4 p.m. for a KFT trustee meeting. It was an exhausting but accomplishing day.'

S: Krishnaji was right in preventing Dorothy from leaving at that time, because if Dorothy had left then, she would have left in a huff, and the staff were divided between the Dorothy supporters and those who saw the need for change; and it would have been so very hard for whoever was running the school, who at this point were Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen. It was important to try to avoid this. It just wasn't time.

M: Yes. Well, she never was her old self again.

S: And she was never reconciled with the fact that Krishnaji had for years been criticizing her because she saw herself as doing what he had talked about for education.

M: Yes, yes, he had.

July seventeenth. 'At 10:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen talk. Dagmar Lichti and Rita Zampese came to lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji was interviewed by Heinrich Jaenecke of the Stern Magazine.' I think that's a German magazine.

S: Yes, yes.

M: 'After that, we went for the Tannegg walk. Krishnaji went to sleep early and slept well.'

The eighteenth. 'I marketed, fetched Krishnaji's prescription from Dagmar Lichti, and did other errands. The Marogers came to lunch. At 2 p.m. Dr. Parchure and I went to the Brockwood meeting at which it was explained to all staff members present what had been agreed about a new start. Dorothy was there and agreed. Christine and Gary came back to the chalet and talked about their responsibilities given them by Krishnaji, which was to study the teachings and discuss them with students.' They never really did that.

S: Hm, I don't remember their doing it.

M: The nineteenth. 'Krishnaji gave talk number six. We had a quiet lunch with just Krishnaji, Parchure, and me. At 4 p.m., Guido Franco interviewed Krishnaji for L'Illustré the Swiss magazine. Then we went for the Tannegg walk.'

The next day, 'At 10 a.m. I went to the second meeting of the international Krishnamurti committees. At lunch were Krishnaji, Grohe and his older son, and Parchure. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji had a haircut by Mr. Nicolas. Mrs. Sherman and son David came about her son going to one of the schools. She had given us two earlier children, Isaac and Rachel.' Do you remember them?

S: Ah, yes.

M: 'Krishnaji and I walked above Tannegg.'

July twenty-first. 'Mary L. rang from England. I worked on questions handed in for Krishnaji's question-and-answer meetings. I dined with Mary Cadogan, Kathy, and Scott at Turbach. Krishnaji spent the whole day in bed.'

The next day, there is only that Krishnaji had the first question-and-answer meeting of the Saanen season, and there's even less for the day after.

On July twenty-fourth, 'Asit arrived in Gstaad last night from Paris. I fetched him at the Palace Hotel and drove him and Dr. Parchure to the tent for Krishnaji's second question-and-answer meeting. Krishnaji, Asit, and I were at lunch. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview to a Mr. Eiseury and six other psychotherapists. At 5:30 p.m., Krishnaji, Asit, and I walked above Tannegg. Dorothy and Montague came to say goodbye. They have to get back to Brockwood as their son Guy, for some reason, cannot keep his dog Kip any longer, and Dorothy wants to look after him.'

July twenty-fifth. 'I met Nicole Philippeau and her daughter Christelle at the Ermitage for coffee. Asit and Princess Gabrielle came to lunch with Krishnaji and me. At 4 p.m., I went with Scott and Catherine de Maurex to look at chalets for next year. There are all too few, and the ones that are available are too large, ornate, expensive, and unappealing. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji talked with Stephen, then walked with Asit and me in the Tannegg woods. I dined at the chalet of the audio group.'

The twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji held his third question-and-answer meeting in the tent. I brought Asit back and fetched Mary Cadogan also to lunch. At 3 p.m., the Saanen Gathering Committee, consisting of Gisèle, Mary Cadogan, and me, met. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji held a meeting with Mary Cadogan, Ingrid, Scott, Kathy, Harsh, Steven, Wendy, Ray McCoy, and me. I dined with Jackie Siddoo. And I had letters from Amanda and Phil.'

There isn't anything of significance the next day, and on the twenty-eighth, 'At 7:30 a.m., I drove Dr. Parchure to the train to Geneva. He goes to Brockwood and then on Monday he flies to India. I brought Asit from the Palace Hotel to go over with him the text of his photo book. Asit, Krishnaji, and I lunched with Grohe in Rougemont. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji gave an interview to a Dutch man, Peter Rampschum, for the magazine De Ronde Tafel. Krishnaji, Asit, and I walked in the Tannegg wood.'

July twenty-ninth. 'It was a marvelous, clear day. I fetched Asit to the chalet to talk with Krishnaji. Scott and Kathy joined us for lunch, after which we watched the opening of the Olympics in Los Angeles on television. Krishnaji saw Donald Hoppen about a book he is writing on architecture in which he quotes Krishnaji. Krishnaji, Asit, and I to the Tannegg walk.'

July thirtieth. 'Krishnaji, Asit, and I did a taped conversation on meditation. Kathy and Scott came and we all five lunched at the Chlösterli restaurant. Krishnaji liked it, and the big, woolly Bernese Mountain Dog lay under his seat all through the meal again. It was too hot to walk. Radha Burnier rang from London. She will come here on August eleventh. Kathy and Scott left for Buchillon.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji dictated letters. Asit came to say goodbye, but stayed for lunch. I ran errands, and Krishnaji saw the Siddoo sisters at 4:30 p.m. They want to restart the school again in 1985, but it was understood that it should not use Krishnaji's name. Krishnaji and I went on the Tannegg walk. Guido Franco and his son Rafael photographed him for a Swiss magazine.'

August first. 'I worked at the desk all morning. We lunched quietly and took naps, then we went to the Tannegg wood for our walk. As we come to the trees, Krishnaji says, "May we come in? You don't mind?" He is also watching cars for the color of a possible 190 Mercedes he increasingly thinks we should have in place of my old gray diesel in Ojai.' [Chuckles.]

S: Oh, yes. I remember that.

M: 'He said, "I will live at least another five years," but next year he wants to come here earlier and rest more before the talks.'

There's nothing much the next day except that, 'F. Grohe came to lunch and he suggested Rougemont as a place for us to stay next year.' And the next day I, indeed, went to look there for a chalet for next year.

August third. 'I spent most of the day working at my desk. It was a hot day and we lunched alone. Krishnaji made a dictation into the Sony on his responsibility to the schools, and his plans for a "nucleus" to study the teachings with him. We walked in the Tannegg wood.'

There is nothing much the next day, but on August fifth, 'I worked at the desk all morning, then Mr. Grohe came to lunch. Afterward, we went to look at his Rougemont flat and an adjoining larger one for next summer's rental. The larger one would be for Dr. Parchure, Vanda, whoever cooks, and me, and Mr. Grohe would lend his small one to Krishnaji. Krishnaji liked it. I telephoned Erna as she and Theo go on to Arosa after landing in England on the seventeenth, and come to Brockwood for the talks.' They had a friend in Arosa they went to visit.

The next day, 'I again spent all morning working at the desk. Patricia Hunt-Perry writes that the UN wants Krishnaji to speak again next year. We lunched quietly. I went to look at the Cabana Apartments, which were not suitable. Krishnaji had photos taken by Guido Franco, again. Krishnaji and I walked above Tannegg.'

August seventh. 'I went to the station to meet Friedrich Grohe and Scott, who has been staying with him in Buchillon. Krishnaji, they, and I did a taped discussion on The Study, as the adult study center is now called, all morning. I then took them to lunch at Chlösterli and continued the conversation all afternoon.' This was all about what The Study should be, what should occur in it, and all that.

S: Right. Yes. I remember those conversations.

M: Yes. Krishnaji and I dropped them at the Gstaad station and then went on our walk in the woods. I got a long telephone report from Mary Cadogan on her and Jane's meeting yesterday with Dorothy at Brockwood. Krishnaji talked to me about his ideas for a very special "quiet room" in The Study.' [S chuckles.] What are you chuckling about?

S: Well, I can remember that as Krishnaji refined his ideas about the quiet room, he first gave them to the architects I eventually fired, but by the time we had Keith Critchlow as our architect, these ideas of Krishnaji's had matured, and he gave them to Critchlow. And Krishnaji's wishes were essentially this: The quiet room wasn't to have anything above it, or beneath it, or next to it, but it mustn't be apart. [Laughs.]

M: I told him it had to be a balloon. [Both chuckle.]

S: And then, also, a person mustn't be able to walk directly…

M: Into it.

S: …into it, but had to walk around it to get into it, and also a person should have to step up to go into it. Also, it should have natural light, but it shouldn't have any windows that anyone can look out of. [Both laugh.] And this was just an impossible…

M: I know.

S: And it was really to Critchlow's credit and genius…

M: He did it, everything he did.

S: …that he did it! Yes.

M: Yes. [Both chuckle.] Was he rather staggered by it?

S: He was absolutely stunned. [Both laugh.]

M: And it had to be in the northeast corner of the building. But he did it!

S: Yes, he did, but part of the idea for the solution to this puzzle came from the previous architect, before we got Critchlow, but I can't remember how much. Anyway, I can remember thinking that the demands for this room were just impossible. [Both chuckle.]

M: August eighth. 'I ran errands, including to the Jérack's agent.' That's a real estate place. 'There are no suitable chalets available for next year. Vanda, who is due today, is coming Friday instead.' This was on a Wednesday. 'We lunched quietly. Krishnaji is intent on making Brockwood excellent. I telephoned Filomena and the Dunnes. Krishnaji and I walked in the rain.'

August ninth. 'I began organizing and packing things we will store during the winter for next summer, and will put them in the Rougemont chalet. Friedrich Grohe and his older son Christoph came and took us to lunch at Chlösterli. We came back and took a nap. We did the Tannegg walk at 6 p.m.' One of the luxuries of having rented Tannegg all those years was that we could store a lot of our things in the basement from one year to the next.

August tenth. 'There was rain and fog. At 10 a.m., I went to the Cantonal Bank about the Alzina investments, then marketed. We lunched quietly watching the LA Olympics on television. On the way to Krishnaji's haircut, we saw Vanda arriving on foot from the Schönried station.' [Chuckles.] 'We took her up the hill, and then went on to the haircut. We stopped for things ordered at a pharmacy, fetched laundry, then went in the rain for our usual Tannegg walk.' [Chuckles.] Rain never stopped Krishnaji walking.

S: Oh, no.

M: August eleventh. 'A rainy day, which I spent mostly at my desk. Mrs. Ratzberg, agent for Chalet Horner, came about the final bill, and took away two cartons of accumulated books that had grown at Tannegg all these years.' I don't know what she was going to do with all those books. 'Krishnaji and I walked earlier than usual in the Tannegg wood and then met Radha Burnier at Schönried station. She stays here in the room that Dr. Parchure had until we leave on Tuesday.' This was written on a Saturday.

August twelfth. 'In the morning Krishnaji and Radha did a taped conversation beginning with the question, "What is silence?" In the afternoon, Vanda had a Scandinavian boy to see Krishnaji, and then Krishnaji, Radha, and I walked at Tannegg.'

The next day, 'I spent most of the day packing. I went to the Cantonal Bank again about the Alzina investments; and in the afternoon, and with the help of Ortolani, and the Scandinavian boy Vanda produced yesterday, Jeff, we took a trunk, and various things to store in the Rougemont basement for next summer. I signed the lease for the four-bedroom apartment. Krishnaji, Radha, and I walked in the Tannegg wood. "Au revoir. À l'année prochaine," said Krishnaji to the trees. Krishnaji watched the final Olympics broadcast, and I finished packing.'

August fourteenth. 'I finished the packing before breakfast. Ortolani came to help carry the bags to the car, and to take Radha to her train. It is understood that Fosca is now too old to come and be with us for another summer. The dear soul is as young as ever in her spirit, but it's physically too much for her. Krishnaji and I said goodbye to her and Vanda, and drove to Geneva airport. Krishnaji allowed me to get a wheelchair, and the Swiss man who brought it and pushed again was one who had been to the Saanen talks and Brockwood, and to Gisèle's video showings at Buchillon.' [Chuckles.] 'We flew on Swissair 832 to Heathrow. Rita met us, as did Dorothy and Scott. It was a warm day at Brockwood. The country is in drought. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked with Kip.'

August fifteenth. 'Krishnaji held a meeting with the staff at 11:30 a.m. Those who were not in Saanen apparently feel none of the starting afresh that had united us at Saanen. Brian Jenkins, who was there, is caught up in resentment over the Brockwood staff not wanting his marriage to the Dutch student to be held at Brockwood.' [Chuckles.] 'It was clear that there was division and anger again, and the resentful ones have coalesced around Dorothy, who permits, even encourages, it. Krishnaji, Mary Cadogan, Jane Hammond, Dorothy, Scott, Ingrid, Stephen, Harsh, Ray McCoy, and I met all afternoon. Krishnaji said he could not live with the discord. Unless agreement comes about, he will close the door between the school and the West Wing. It ended on that note. He and I walked around the fields alone.'

S: Yes. That was the worst moment at Brockwood that I can remember. "Closing the door" really meant that Krishnaji would have nothing more to do with the school. Because your living quarters were separate.

M: Separate, yes.

S: So he would just…

M: Just live there. I had always wanted a kitchen so that if for any reason—I didn't think of this—but I thought if somehow the school weren't there, and he had to stay there, I could function with my own kitchen.

S: Yes, he would just live there when he was in England, but have nothing more to do with the school. What could be more awful?

M: August sixteenth. 'The Mercedes battery is too low to start the car. The architects, Mr. Jack and his colleague, came in the afternoon with the latest plans for The Study. Krishnaji explained to them what is needed for a quiet room, and they seemed intrigued.' [Chuckles.] 'Dorothy and others have got all the marquee chairs and tables put up, and then she came on the walk with Krishnaji and me. She tripped going out of the grove and fell heavily on her chest, but said it was only a bruise. I fetched petrol after the Mercedes battery was recharged. I fixed flowers for the West Wing, and put things in order for the guest rooms.'

The next day. 'I got up at 4 a.m., and at 5 a.m., I drove with Scott to Gatwick to meet Erna and Theo on a charter flight from Los Angeles. They are staying in the West Wing double spare room. It is good to see them. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked with Kip in the late afternoon.'

August eighteenth. 'I took Erna and Theo to Alresford, where I bought two pillows for the sitting room. Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and I walked around the fields. At 7 p.m., there was a channel 4 broadcast of the Krishnaji interview done in June by Border Television for a series called Revelation.'

The nineteenth. 'It was a warm day. I went to Brian Jenkins's and the Dutch student's wedding in the Morton woods.' [Chuckles.] I did it to placate him. [S chuckles.] 'Krishnaji didn't go. I came back for lunch, and slept in the afternoon. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked down and looked at the tent.'

S: This was another very weird thing. When Dorothy found out the relationship between Brian Jenkins, a teacher, and this Dutch student, she didn't do anything to discourage it. She, in fact, encouraged it. Brian was one of her pet projects; and Dorothy herself had been a student of Montague's when their relationship started, and then they married. So, she didn't think there was anything wrong in such relationships. There were several cases where she should have acted about these unprofessional relationships, because they're just not correct, but she didn't.

M: No, they're not. They're really not correct at all.

S: This was always a problem when she was principal, and, of course, when Brian and this student finally got married, it was just the source of even more resentment because the group of four who were running the school, supposedly with Dorothy, at that time (Stephen, Harsh, Ingrid, and Ray) would not let the Dutch student remain part of the school. And, of course, she and Brian thought that she was just going to continue in the school as both a student and the wife of a staff member, having a foot in both camps. Well, that's…

M: No.

S: And so, it was a source of tremendous resentment by Brian and by the student and her friends, and her parents, who also didn't take it well.

M: Her parents, I remember dimly that the parents…

S: The parents were part of the Dutch committee and they…

M: Did they want this marriage?

S: Well, it was there, and being Dutch, and therefore liberal and accepting, they just accepted it. But I thought it was very wrong and, of course, it ended badly, etcetera. But it was a point of real resentment that she couldn't continue in the school as a student married to a staff member and it was just all very…It was just a mess.

M: Exactly. Yes. Yes, I remember that. Yes.

S: And it increased resentment by Dorothy's coterie against the four who were running the school.

M: Yes. Yes, that's messy.

S: And, of course, the resentment spread more to the students because this Dutch girl had many friends—she was really a very nice person—so they also were against the four, thinking that this student was being treated badly when she had this wonderful fairytale marriage to a Brockwood staff member…and it was just, it was just a mess.

M: Yes, I remember it.

There is really nothing the next day, and on the twenty-first, my diary reads, 'I took Erna and Theo to the Petersfield train, then I went on to Chichester to have the Mercedes serviced. Kathy brought me back. In the afternoon, using the school car, I went to Alresford to the bank and to do other errands. When I came back, Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked only in the shade of the grove. It was very hot.'

August twenty-second. 'There was some rain. I took a school car to meet Sunanda and Pama Patwardhan at Petersfield. They talked with Krishnaji before and after lunch, then Kathy and I took them back to the train, and Kathy drove me to Chichester, where I retrieved the Mercedes.'

The twenty-third. 'Krishnaji and I took the 10:45 a.m. train to London. I went to the U.S. embassy for my absentee ballot form. Krishnaji went to the dentist, Mr. Thompson. Then we had a late lunch at Fortnum's. We walked from there to Burberry and got a raincoat for Krishnaji, then got the 4:20 p.m. back to Petersfield. It was hot in London. Friedrich Grohe had arrived while we were in London and is in the little West Wing guest room, my ex-office. Scott brought a fresh version of the architects' floor plan for The Study.'

August twenty-fourth. 'I went to Alresford and bought two antique mirrors for the bird wallpaper West Wing guest room. It is no longer a dining room, and with the wardrobe and chest of drawers I bought in London in June, it is now a nice single guest room, reminiscent of such rooms in my East Coast youth.' [Chuckles.] I'm trying to remember what such a reminiscence was. I think perhaps it was the chest of drawers and the wardrobe because, as you know, old houses in the East didn't have closets.

S: Yes, yes. That's right.

M: I don't remember. Anyway, that's what it says. 'I wanted to get it ready for Pupul's use in September. People are arriving for the Brockwood Gathering. Krishnaji talked for two hours with Shakuntala, and later with Scott and me about getting those staff who are united to back the running of the school in a strong way.' Shakuntala was on Dorothy's side, and antagonistic to the other four.

S: Oh, absolutely.

M: With, what's his name?

S: Baruch.

M: Oh, yes.

August twenty-fifth. 'At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave the first Brockwood talk. Afterward, we had fruit and salad upstairs, and then returned to the marquee for the other food. Krishnaji was busy all afternoon meeting various people. After supper, at Krishnaji's urging, I held a meeting of the members of staff who are united, and Dorothy, who sat without participating.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji gave his second Brockwood talk. A very fine one. Again, we had fruit salad in our kitchen afterward, and then went back to the tent. Topazia is here for the talks. An unbalanced man attacked Krishnaji verbally.' Do you remember that?

S: No.

M: I don't either. 'At 3 p.m., Scott, Grohe, and I met Shakuntala and Baruch about their staying at the school. They are leaving.' Were we trying to encourage them to leave or to stay?

S: I can't remember. Baruch ended up going, and Shakuntala staying, and that created a big problem because…well, we'll come across it, because it was a huge incident.

M: Yes, I know what we're heading for. Anyway, on this date, they are leaving. 'Then, at Doris's request, she met Scott and me and protested "the treatment" of Shakuntala, Brian Jenkins, and Eleanor, but this was interrupted by the entrance into the West Wing of a mad woman brought by Montague who was insisting on seeing Krishnaji. Doris fled, and I somehow got through the woman's obsession by asking her name and telling her mine. She came to, as though from a fit, and was quiet.' Never a dull moment. [Both chuckle.] 'The walk with Krishnaji included Grohe, Dorothy, Erna, and Theo.' There's always a mad woman surfacing here and there.

The twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji saw Doris at length and then added Shakuntala, Baruch, and me to the meeting. Baruch is leaving, but now Shakuntala says that she wants to stay. All this lasted all morning and Krishnaji had no rest. He had lunch in bed and got up only to walk with Dorothy, Friedrich, Erna, Theo, and me. I worked on questions for tomorrow.'

August twenty-eighth. 'Krishnaji held a question-and-answer meeting in the marquee. Afterward, Krishnaji and I had fruit salad upstairs with Friedrich and Scott present, then back to the tent for food. At 4:30 p.m., in drawing room, Krishnaji spoke to all the staff who are staying, plus Jane Hammond, Friedrich, Erna, and Theo. Doris and Dorothy were aggressively critical. Krishnaji passionately was trying to get everyone together. He will close the door to the school if it does not happen. In spite of it being late, etcetera, he, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, Friedrich, and I went for a short walk. I ate upstairs,' it says.

The twenty-ninth. 'I went to Alresford for cheese. Erna spent the morning talking with Dorothy, and told Erna she wants to retire. I spent time after lunch with Princess Gabrielle of Liechtenstein and took her back to Mrs. Morton's where she is staying. Krishnaji, Theo, and I walked.'

August thirtieth. 'Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer meeting, and it was very fine. Erna got a letter from Cohen about Rajagopal saying he wants to make peace, settle differences with Krishnaji before he, Rajagopal, dies. Erna telephoned Cohen, who will make inquiries. Mary Cadogan and I spoke with Doris about her coming to the International Trustees Meetings, which she wants to attend, and we talked to her about not being aggressive. She wants intensely to be at them and agreed. Krishnaji talked alone with Dorothy at 3 p.m., which apparently went well, and was followed by a meeting of all staff who are staying. Dorothy is more relaxed and responsive. Only Brian Jenkins remains disgruntled. The walk later with Krishnaji included Dorothy, Erna, Theo, Friedrich, and Magda Sichitiu. Later Mary Cadogan, Scott, Ray McCoy, and I spoke with Brian Jenkins. Any memoirs of that?

S: No, no. I think I've just pushed it into my subconscious.

M: Yes, well…Leave it there. [S chuckles.]

August thirty-first. 'Krishnaji's voice is hoarse from fatigue and too much use. He stayed in bed. I met Sunanda and Pama in Petersfield. They are staying until the end of the International Trustee Meetings. Krishnaji saw Dorothy in the morning, and she seems relaxed and her best self. Erna and Theo went with Friedrich and Magda to the Isle of Wight.'

September first. 'Krishnaji gave his third Brockwood talk. Mary and Joe with their granddaughter, Anna, were here, and had fruit and salad and later coffee with us in the kitchen. Krishnaji talked briefly with a Czech publisher of his books in Germany. The walk was with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, Magda, and me. Krishnaji's voice was hoarse in the morning but better by evening.'

September second. 'Krishnaji gave his fourth Brockwood talk, which was very fine. His voice was still hoarse but improved as he went along. Dr. Chandnani gave both Krishnaji and me cholera shots for India. Grohe left for Switzerland. Mark Edwards took photos needed by KFA. The Gathering ended, and people began to leave. There was a short walk of Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, and Theo. In the evening Krishnaji, Scott, and I watched a movie on video. The weather stayed dry throughout the talks.'

The third. 'Krishnaji rested in bed till the afternoon. I spent the morning on laundry and arranging for guests. The Gathering people left, but Radhika Herzberger and her daughter, Maya, arrived. Krishnaji spoke to Polish Magdalina Jasciuska before she left. The walk was with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, and Theo. The Mercedes battery was dead again, and had to be taken for recharging.'

September fourth. 'The Mercedes battery was returned early, and Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I caught the 10:45 a.m. train to London. Joe met us, and drove us to Huntsman where Krishnaji helped Theo buy a jacket. We walked to Fortnum's where Mary Links joined us for lunch. At Hatchards, I got the Oxford Book of English Verse and Golden Treasury.' That was for Krishnaji. 'Back at Brockwood, Evelyne Blau and Alan Kishbaugh had arrived for the International Trustee Meetings. Erna spoke to Merali in Belgium, who says the San Diego sale of his property fell through, so he can make no payment towards the donation he pledged KFA since 1982.'

September fifth. 'Mr. Grohe returned. Jean-Michel and the van der Stratens arrived. After lunch, all trustees met with Krishnaji in the assembly room for the first of our meetings. There was a walk with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and Alan Kishbaugh. Most met in the evening to talk.'

The sixth. 'The trustee meetings began at 10 a.m. Krishnaji joined in a bit later. After lunch he talked to Sarjit Siddoo with Erna and me there about their school, if they revive it in 1985. At 3 p.m., the meetings resumed till 5 p.m. On the walk was Krishnaji, Dorothy, Grohe, Erna, Theo, Radhika, and me. At 7:30 p.m., there was another meeting where Harsh showed how indexing can be done on computers. To bed wearily.'

September seventh. 'Most of the trustees went to lunch with the Digbys at their family castle in Sherborne, Dorset. Krishnaji, Radhika, Sunanda, Dorothy, and I stayed at Brockwood. Pupul arrived from New York in the morning. She chose to share the room with Radhika instead of having the West Wing Bird Room, so Asit will have it and share the bath with Grohe.' [Chuckles.] 'It was a quieter day. I went to Alresford on errands.'

September eighth. 'Asit arrived from Singapore. At 10 a.m., the trustee meetings resumed, and dealt all day with publications matters. Mary and Joe came down, and Mary presided at the meeting as head of the publication committee. India again wants the copyright shared, this time between the three English-speaking Foundations. Agreement was made to form an international publication committee with two members from each of the English-speaking Foundations—Mary Links and Mary Cadogan for England, Sunanda and Asit for India, and Alan Kishbaugh and I were nominated for the U.S. Alfonso Colón and Riesco from the Fundación are included as "consultants." This committee of six met after lunch, and it went easily. At 3 p.m., the full trustee meetings resumed, and it was more difficult. We agreed to inquire about the legal implications of shared copyright. Mary Cadogan will consult our copyright lawyer, Rubinstein.'

The ninth. 'At 9 a.m., there was a meeting with the KF Trust members about the plans for The Study. At 10 a.m., the International Trustees Meetings resumed and continued all day till 6 p.m. Merali arrived. While Krishnaji finished his supper, Pupul, Asit, Scott, Sunanda, Grohe, and I sat with him and chatted. It was a looonnnng day,' it says.

September tenth: 'At 10 a.m., there was a meeting with Merali of Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, Evelyne, Alan Kishbaugh, Pupul, Asit, Sunanda, Pama, Radhika, and me about his nonpayment of the pledged donation to the KFA—it had been the basis for a matching fund drive. He had asked that Indian members be present. Asit, as a businessman, asked many questions that were totally to the point, and Merali squirmed and got emotional. It broke up, and then there was a meeting of Mary Cadogan, Jane Hammond, Pupul, Radhika, Sunanda, Pama, Asit, and me. At 3 p.m., all the Foundations resumed the meetings, with Krishnaji speaking about the schools, a school journal, and since one of us (himself) had been free of conditioning, what could help other children to be that way? In evening we saw a shortened version (to fifty-eight minutes) of The Challenge of Change film.'

September eleventh. 'At 11 a.m., Krishnaji spoke in the Assembly Hall to all trustees and the Brockwood staff. In the afternoon, there was a meeting without Krishnaji of trustees to review what had been accomplished during the week. It was Pupul's sixty-ninth birthday. During Krishnaji's breakfast, she, Asit, Sunanda, and I taped Asit's questions of Krishnaji about what kept him untouched by all his surroundings when he was young. Eventually, there was a walk around the block of Krishnaji, Asit, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, Grohe, Merali, Kishbaugh, and me.'

September twelfth. 'At 10 a.m., Krishnaji spoke to Merali alone. Then he told Erna and me, Pupul, Radhika, and Asit what Merali had said. Pupul, Radhika, Mary, and Asit left by car for London. Alan Kishbaugh left. Krishnaji rested after lunch, but then spent two more hours with Merali, at first with Sunanda and Pama present, and then with Erna and Theo. Merali finally promised to pay the KFA half of what he had pledged by the end of the year and the balance owing to be paid on the sale of his San Diego property. After his supper, Krishnaji watched a video of a Clint Eastwood movie and finally slept.'

The thirteenth. 'Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went by train to London where we met Asit at Huntsman so that Krishnaji could supervise Asit's fitting. The Lilliefelts went off shopping. I took my dear brown tweed coat to be copied at Hilliard's on Cork Street in a tweed I found at Huntsman. Krishnaji, Asit, Mary Links, and I lunched at Fortnum's. Mary spoke frankly about the reactions of KF India to the second volume of her biography of Krishnaji. Asit listened sympathetically. Krishnaji and I bought books at Hatchards and came home.'

The next day. 'The house is quieter. Krishnaji rested all morning but got up for lunch. I worked at the desk. The walk with Krishnaji included Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and me. I got Krishnaji's supper tray. Then Erna, Theo, Dorothy, Kathy, and Scott dined with me at the Old House in Wickham. We went in the school van.'

September fifteenth. 'I worked at the desk almost all day. I spoke to Ginny Travers in Stratford, and will go to see her on the twenty-seventh. Walk. Telephoned Filomena to say I will go to see her October second.'

S: Alright well, we should probably end it there.

M: Alright.

[1] A project of the Krishnamurti Foundation of India in rural India.

Issue 81: September 16, 1984 to November 18, 1984

The conflict at Brockwood continues in this issue, but that is as nothing when they get to India, and they are very nearby when Indira Gandhi is assassinated. There is so much about these two lives that just seems unbelievable.

Mary: We begin today with my diary entry for September sixteen, 1984, and we're at Brockwood. The Bohms came down for lunch, and I spoke to them and the Lilliefelts after lunch.' They were visiting from Ojai. 'There was a late afternoon walk with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and me across the fields and back along the lanes. I telephoned Vivian in Ojai—the Krishnamurti Library opened at Arya Vihara, and is going well. But, she said, Terry Doyle is resigning. He later telephoned and spoke to Erna. He doesn't want to be the principal. Erna and Theo fly back to Ojai tomorrow and they will deal with it on arrival.'

Scott: It is quite extraordinary that someone just begins the job of being principal, and then decides that he doesn't want to do it.

M: Well, I don't remember anything about him.

S: He just began.

M: I know. He just appeared and fairly quickly disappeared.

S: But just the idea that someone would begin that job, and then decide they don't want to do it, is…[both chuckle]. Anyway…

M: The next day just says, 'Erna and Theo left in a taxi for Gatwick and their flight to Los Angeles. Krishnaji stayed in bed all day. I did laundry, worked at my desk, and talked to Natasha.'

The eighteenth. 'I slept till 7 a.m., worked at my desk, and did laundry. Harsh again came to talk to me about the school. Krishnaji had lunch in bed, but spoke in the afternoon to Brian Jenkins. I went to Petersfield for compact discs for Krishnaji and for other errands.'

September nineteenth. 'I went to London to the General Trading Company and to Harrods'—they're both stores—'and came back on the 4:20 p.m. train. Krishnaji had talked to Dorothy, Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen. Erna had rung from Ojai, but the phones here are out of order so she couldn't get through properly.'

September twentieth. 'Rain. I attended the 9 a.m. staff meeting. Later, Krishnaji met with Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen. I met Betsy at Petersfield station and brought her here. We lunched in the West Wing kitchen. The telephone worked briefly, and Krishnaji and I were able to reach Erna in Ojai. Terry Doyle is resigning. Erna wants to accept it, and we agreed. I took Betsy back to the train.'

The next day. ‘I attended another staff meeting at 9 a.m. At 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji spoke to the staff about relationship. Erna telephoned. KFA has accepted Terry Doyle’s resignation from the Oak Grove School. David Moody becomes head of the upper school and perhaps Rupert Oysler will head the lower one. We will do without a principal for the moment. Krishnaji agreed to all this. Scott and I edited the announcement in the Bulletin of the Study Center. Krishnaji came on a short walk with Dorothy and me.’

The twenty-second of September: ‘Krishnaji didn’t sleep well, so he spent the day in bed. I worked most of the day at my desk, then walked alone. Erna telephoned and said that David Moody is in charge of both the upper and the lower school.’

The next day. ‘Krishnaji slept better. I went to another staff meeting at 9 a.m., and Krishnaji spoke to the staff at 11:30 a.m. On the walk was Krishnaji, Dorothy, and me. We telephoned David Moody at Arya Vihara.’ He and Vivian were living there.

September twenty-fourth: ‘At 9 a.m. there was again a staff meeting, and at 11:30 a.m., Krishnaji spoke again to the staff. I went with Scott to Alresford where I got the car road tax paid, and did other small errands. When we got back, Krishnaji had spoken to Dorothy, Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen after they had had a row.’ [Chuckle.] ‘I walked with Dorothy at 5 p.m.’

The twenty-fifth. ‘Krishnaji slept poorly. We canceled our trip to London, and he met Dorothy, Ingrid, Harsh, Stephen, and me about the row they had had yesterday. Krishnaji left, and we went on till one o’clock. I brought him lunch on a tray. At 5:30 p.m., the four came up to tell him they would work together. After supper, Krishnaji spoke to Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen, while Scott and I took on Gérard, whose refusal to change his room set off yesterday’s almighty row—he shouting, and Dorothy siding with him. All this is becoming unbearable. I’m sick of it.’ [Both laugh.] Oh, really! That was a dreadful time.

S: Oh, yes, it was.

M: September twenty-sixth. ‘Krishnaji slept well. He got up for lunch and spoke afterward to Alan Maroger. Scott and I talked again to Gérard, and Krishnaji spent an hour seeing Christopher Titmus. Scott, Ingrid, Harsh, Stephen, and I talked, and then went to see Dorothy about the person G. problem, and a miserable meeting ensued. Dorothy was tight, angry, violent, and bursting out. I couldn’t get through her rage. It is irrational. I finally left to get Krishnaji’s supper. Person G. then went and apologized to Stephen and Ingrid, so we didn’t ask him to leave.’ We should have, but anyway.

S: We did eventually.

M: Yes.

‘During all this fracas, a welcome to returning students was going on.’ [S laughs.] ‘Dorothy seems embedded in her anger.’ Good heavens.

Krishnaji riding in a car in India (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Yes. I think this was one of the ridiculous tests of strength that she had. Here were the four—Dorothy, Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen, who were supposed to be in charge of things, and they had—

M: I thought you were in the four.

S: I wasn't in the four since the previous spring. I'd come out. I was out doing the center…

M: Yes, you were doing the center.

S: …but, for some reason, I still got dragged into problems. Anyway, the four had decided that in the whole allocation of rooms for staff that person G. had to move his room, which was pretty normal. But he didn't want to. He wanted to stay where he was. And Dorothy sided with him. So, the test then became, who was the authority in the place? Was it Dorothy, or was it the group or those three? So it was…[laughs] an absolute mess and fracas over nothing, and, yes, Dorothy was pulling out all the stops of anger, yelling, etcetera.

M: 'The three and Scott sat and talked with Krishnaji.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji went to London for a haircut with Scott. I saw them off and came back into the house through Dorothy's office. We began to talk and she was nervous, upset, but quieter. Somehow, something was different, as if her violence yesterday had gone too far, and she was shocked by it. She was also afraid it had damaged our friendship. She admitted, and I agreed, that it had been very bad yesterday. "What about them?" she asked, and I realized what she meant—herself and me. I said I loved her dearly and couldn't bear to go against her, but had to because of what is best for the school, that I hadn't been able to get through to her yesterday, couldn't she see that? She was quiet, and we were able to talk. I felt some sort of crisis had been broken through. I left at 1:30 p.m. and drove to Stratford, going via Broadway to have tea with Amanda Pallant in her new cottage. She is an herbalist and sees and treats patients there. It was a very nice visit. I went on to Stratford and found Ginny Travers's flat and the key under the flowerpot. I left my bag and the car there, and walked to the theater in time for the evening performance of Hamlet. Ginny is playing the mother, Gertrude, with Roger Rees as Hamlet. After the performance, Ginny and I had supper in the theater restaurant, and I stayed the night in her flat.'

The twenty-eighth. 'After breakfast, I went with Ginny to visit the Shakespeare houses in Stratford. She had to leave at 1 p.m., so I stopped to see the Anne Hathaway's Cottage by myself. Then I drove back to Brockwood, arriving about 4:30 p.m. Krishnaji was feeling rested, and we went with Ingrid and John Porter to see where the grove needs more azaleas. We had only a short walk before supper.'

September twenty-ninth: 'Pupul telephoned from Delhi. Krishnaji and the Dalai Lama are both to speak on the same platform, under no auspices, in Delhi on November fourth. She has invited the Dalai Lama to lunch with him the day before. She has booked a room for me at the Taj Hotel during Krishnaji's Delhi stay. I went to Petersfield on errands in the afternoon, then walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy. It was a beautiful, clear afternoon with golden light and sharp autumn air. Krishnaji is feeling well. This is a season dear to me.'

S: Yes, English autumns are really lovely.

M: Any autumn I love.

The next day just says, 'Krishnaji spoke to the school at 11:30 a.m., and we walked with Dorothy at 4:30.'

There's even less for the first of October: 'Krishnaji is tired, so he stayed in bed. I did desk work most of the day, but went to the staff meeting.'

October second. 'At 10:30 a.m., I left in Mrs. Thompkin's taxi to Heathrow and took the Alitalia flight at 1:30 p.m. to Rome. Mario met me, and then I saw Filomena, frail and bent over almost at a right angle. How dear she is. We drove to her apartment where I am staying. After greeting all the family, I sat and talked to her at length. I telephoned Krishnaji to let him know I was safely there. He had talked to the students earlier. Filomena and I had supper in her little kitchen; Mistica'—that's her niece—'and Vincenza'—the mother of Mistica, and Filomena's sister—'are bringing the food. Early to bed.'

The next day. ‘I went with Filomena’s son, Mario, to the bank to cash travel checks in the morning. In the afternoon, he drove me and Mistica into central Rome and we went on foot looking for Castel, the place where years ago I bought shirting for Sam and where I took Krishnaji for the same in the late 1960s. Krishnaji wanted material similar to some from there we got before, and the possibility of my getting it may—repeat, may—have softened his opposition to my going to Rome at all.’ [Both laugh.] The “may” is underlined. ‘I wasn’t sure the place existed after all these years, but it does, unchanged. They recognized the fabric in the old shirt I had brought with me, but it was no longer made. So, I looked and found four others that I hope he will like. All this was very satisfying, and it was nice to have a glimpse of Vecchia Roma again, past the Fontana delle Tartarughe.’ That’s the fountain of the turtles. It’s a charming little tiny piazza with the fountain with, I think it’s four, maybe more, statues of turtles around it.

S: Right. And the shirt shop is near there?

M: Yes, must have been. I forget. Yes, it is because that’s what brought me to the Tartarughe Fountain. ‘…past the Fontana delle Tartarughe. The trattoria where Jarmila and I used to lunch was gone.’ Jarmila is an old, old friend in California; she’s American, but her family was Czech. I think. ‘…the trattoria where we used to lunch was gone but little else seemed changed. I telephoned Vanda in Fiesole and also Fosca. Krishnaji at Brockwood had spent the day in bed.’

October fourth. ‘With Mario and Filomena, I returned to the Fiumicino airport. As always, these small visits with Filomena make the years fall away and we could just as well have been at Malibu. Her mind is a little vaguer. She misunderstood my letter about Amanda’s operation in May and thought it was one of her daughters, but seemed to take it in when I explained it carefully. I have an unease in Mario’s suggestion that Filomena’s U.S. bonds, which are her entire capital, be cashed in and sent to Rome. He would then control it. And my unease is that she seems worried about money. As her income with pension from me and Social Security checks and bond interest comes to a good sum every month, the dollar is high, and she pays no taxes, so that doesn’t sound worrisome. But it turned out she had spent quite a bit on repairing the other house.’ She owned—well I don’t know whether you don’t want to know, but there were two houses and her relatives all lived in the big one, and she lived in the other, little one. ‘I can’t describe them as greedy or grasping, exactly, but they live with little space between basic needs and what Mario earns, and Filomena has always been the fountain of funds in their lives. I do not like her worrying about money. She should have security of mind as well as her needs taken care of. We talked about all this and left it that when I saw my brother, I would discuss this, and then they and I would discuss the matter later. So it was shelved for the present. We said goodbye at the airport. Will I ever see her again?’ I flew back on Alitalia. Mrs. Thompkins met me and I was back at Brockwood by 2:45 p.m. Krishnaji was waiting for me. He seems to know when one will arrive.’ It’s true, he did that with other people, too. I am boundlessly glad to be back and he liked the Castel shirting. He said, “When you are away, it is much more work for me.”’ [Both laugh.] I don’t know what he meant.

S: All kinds of things, I'm sure. You did everything. [Both chuckle.]

M: The fifth of October: 'At noon we started a project of videotaping Krishnaji's answers to questions on a single subject, asked by me, and the answer was to last just twenty-eight minutes.' There was an idea to get them on television. They have to be that length.

S: Yes, I remember those.

M: 'Twenty-eight minutes was the right length for TV broadcasts and also for use in the information centers where newcomers are sometimes overwhelmed by a whole talk. Today I posed the questions, and then the cameras stay on Krishnaji. The first one was on "conditioning." Afterward, he said we should keep going, so we did a second one on "fear." My brother telephoned from New York. He and Lisa may have to go to India about the Cooper-Hewitt share of the 1985 Festival of India exhibitions, and they might be in Delhi while I'm there. We'll know more later.'

October sixth. 'I worked at my desk most of the day. Krishnaji rested in the morning, then spoke with Harsh and Claire after lunch. I spoke to Erna in Ojai about my giving the Senior Canyon Water shares to KFA.' If you want water in Ojai, you have to buy shares in the Senior Canyon Water, and as I had bought all of what became the KFA property in the east end of the valley, before giving it back to the KFA, I had the shares in the Senior Canyon Water company for Arya Vihara, and the office, and guest house. I gave those to the KFA, but kept two shares so that I had a right to water for this house.

The next day. 'Krishnaji spoke to the school in the morning, to a Greek boy, to Natasha, and then to the four. He had no nap. I went to the staff meeting where I could hear nothing as I'm getting so deaf. Krishnaji said, "You must hurry up to understand everything. I may live another ten years, but you must understand."'

October eighth. 'I got up early and began sample editing of some pieces Krishnaji dictated into his Sony in Ojai last spring. I will send them to Mary L. for her vetting. Krishnaji asked, "Haven't you got enough to do?" but this is something I would like to do. Editing is needed and I offered to do it at the International Trustee Meetings in September. The old Hoover washing machine broke down, and I'm negotiating for a new Miele washing machine. I went to Petersfield on errands in the afternoon but got back to attend the school meeting at 5 p.m. Krishnaji says the disturbance in the house is what has tired him.'

S: Did he mean the psychological dissonance that was in the school?

M: Yes, yes.

The ninth. 'Krishnaji slept poorly. Nevertheless he spoke to the students. Pandit Jasraj, a singer, came to lunch and sang beautifully at 5 p.m. for Krishnaji and the school.' He was a very good singer. I'd heard him in India. 'I did editing of the transcript of the Border

TV interview with Krishnaji for the Revelation series for publication by them. A new Miele washing machine was installed.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji remained in bed resting. Dr. Reilly came to see him and gave us both a flu vaccine. I worked at the desk and used the new washing machine most of day.' [Chuckles.]

The eleventh. 'Krishnaji spoke to staff at 11:30 a.m. He gave Doris an interview in the afternoon. He had previously told the students about his compact disc player and had said they should hear it, so they took him at his word. His room was stuffy with them when I came back from Alresford errands.' [Chuckles.]

October twelfth. 'Krishnaji slept well. He said that in the last two nights he had vague dreams of "the brother." He "couldn't see his face, but we were going somewhere, a doctor's. He went to the doctor, then he went somewhere and I didn't know where, and then there were a bunch of people saying, 'We're for Theosophy.'"' [Both chuckle.] Oh, dear. '"It was a dream, you know. A dream." Krishnaji felt it was funny. We went by train to London. Mary and Joe met us. Krishnaji had a Huntsman fitting, and then we lunched with Mary at Fortnum's, bought books at Hatchards, and came home.'

S: The ritual successfully performed.

M: Absolutely. A completely correct day in London. [Both chuckle.] 'I ate on a tray with Krishnaji and watched the TV news, which was mostly the aftermath of the IRA bombing of the Brighton Hotel aimed at Mrs. Thatcher and the conservative cabinet during the Conservative Conference meetings there.' Goodness.

The next day. 'I have a slight cold. Krishnaji spent the day in bed except for giving an interview to Esther Shakun. I worked at my desk all day.' I don't know who that was.

October fourteenth. 'Krishnaji recorded on video answers to questions posed by me and Ray McCoy on "What is religion?" and "What is a religious mind?" Each answer was twenty-eight minutes long. It went well. At 4:15 p.m., he joined a staff meeting discussion on conflict, and then he and I went for a walk in the fields.'

The fifteenth. 'My cold is fairly heavy. I finished editing Krishnaji's Sony dictations, and then did general desk work. I ate my lunch upstairs. In the afternoon, Krishnaji gave an interview for an article to Edwin Oostmejer, a Dutch journalist.'

Then for the next two days, there's nothing significant.

October eighteenth. 'Iris Murdoch came from Oxford to do a video dialogue with Krishnaji. Mary and Joe, and their friend, Harold Carlton, came too, and watched the dialogue with the school on a monitor in the dining room. Murdoch and Krishnaji continued the discussion after lunch.' That's true, there were two. 'Murdoch was interesting but never seemed to make the jump to seeing instantly what Krishnaji means.

She would say. “Ah yes, I see that. It is like Plato, etcetera,” lining it up or verifying it through intellectual knowledge already stored. Later I went to Alresford for a typhoid shot.’

The nineteenth. ‘I met a David Bradshaw, a young Oxford don, at the Winchester bus station. He’s doing a life of Aldous Huxley and Krishnaji said he would talk to him. Krishnaji saw him before and after lunch, then I took him back to Winchester and bought a small Sony shortwave radio in Alresford on the way home to take to India. Talked on the telephone to Phyl Fry. I will not be able to see them this trip, which is a sadness.’

On the twentieth. ‘Mary and Joe came at noon, lunched, and stayed till about 4 p.m. They brought me original photographs of Krishnaji at Ommen in 1926. I walked with Grohe around the block. Rita Zampese brought our Air India tickets, which she has been kind enough to get, as well as my Indian visa, and stayed the night in the West Wing double guest room. Krishnaji says he feels slight bronchitis.’

The next day. ‘Krishnaji says he is alright. “A pink pill did it.”’ Do you remember the pink pills?

S: Oh, yes. I remember the magic pink pills.

M: Mm. ‘So, he spoke to the staff at 11:30 a.m., and to a staff member after lunch. Saral and Dave lunched here. Dave is looking well. Krishnaji, Grohe, Rita Z., and I walked around the block. I spoke to Erna in Ojai.’

October twenty-second. ‘Krishnaji spoke to Claire about her son Anand at 9 a.m., after which he had breakfast. At noon, he gave an interview to the Swedish journalist for Svenska Dagbladet.’ It probably means the Swedish daily or something, but I don’t know. ‘I think his name is Lundstrom. After lunch, at 4:15 p.m., Scott, Kathy, Friedrich, and I met the architect, Mr. Jack, and his colleague in Winchester to look at flint and brick buildings. We came back to Brockwood and, with Krishnaji, looked at the model of the proposed study. It looks like a motel or golf club to me. Krishnaji didn’t like it. ’

The next day. ‘Krishnaji and I went to London where Mary and Joe met us. Krishnaji had a Huntsman fitting. Krishnaji, Mary, and I lunched at Fortnum’s, and Krishnaji had his hair cut at Truefitt while I bought film to take to India. Then we went to W. Bill to get him a navy pullover, and we caught the 4:50 p.m. train back. Back at Brockwood, Scott’s parents have arrived from Houston. They are here for Scott’s appendectomy.’ Whew. ‘A very nice couple. His father looks like Scott. Today Krishnaji had me write down, “Austerity of the mind is wholly different from the austerity of will.” In the evening, on television, he watched the whole of the old movie To Sir, with Love. He likes Sidney Poitier as an actor.’

October the twenty-fourth. ‘There was rain and wind. We both stayed in. Krishnaji remaining in bed while I packed. The Forbes family left for London. Tomorrow Scott will have an appendix operation.’ You had it in London? Why?

S: Yes. Because it was still a little tricky, for some reason which I can't remember.

M: Where did you have it in London?

S: At the Royal Free Hospital. I think the complication was because I had had hepatitis, but whatever reason it was, it allowed me to see a very famous lady who had been knighted for her work on livers, so because of whatever complication I had, I was given an appointment to see her.

M: Oh. [Chuckles.] That's a nice way to put it.

S: Yes. [Both laugh.] And when she saw me, she said, "Well, why don't you have your appendectomy here?" She had a surgeon at that hospital that she thought was very good and who she thought should do it—a very nice Indian man, actually.

M: And he did it well, probably. A satisfied customer?

S: I guess he did it well. I'm still here. [Chuckles.]

M: What about the liver?

Krishnaji riding in a car in India (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: It turned out to be a harmless syndrome I have, which wasn't well known at the time and was part of what confused the doctors in Winchester when I originally had the burst appendix that they misdiagnosed. It was this lady who identified this little known syndrome, which seems to have no consequences other than throwing off test results. Anyway, the end result was that I had my operation in a very good teaching hospital with a very good surgeon.

M: [laughs] Good. Good.

S: And, of course, the wonderful English thing in those days was that you just walked into a hospital, you didn't sign anything—no release or anything, and not a penny is charged. You just go in, they welcome you, you had your operation, and then…

M: …off you go. [M chuckles.] A better world. We know the world has gotten worse.

S: Yes. [Chuckles.]

M: October twenty-fifth. 'Scott had his operation in the London hospital today. Mary Cadogan and the Hammonds were at lunch. At Krishnaji's direction, Ray McCoy became an associate member of the KF Trust and a member with Dorothy, Ingrid, Harsh, and Stephen of the group running the school. Mary Cadogan had a long talk with Dorothy. Krishnaji invited Dorothy to come to India in December, and she will come with Rita Zampese to Rishi Valley.'

October twenty-sixth. 'I went to London, giving Friedrich a lift to Petersfield station. I fitted my new tweed copy of my brown coat at Hilliard's, did small errands, and lunched very pleasantly with Mary and Joe at their apartment on Hyde Park Street. I got back to Brockwood at 6 p.m. Krishnaji had talked to students, to Dorothy, and to Brian Jenkins and his new wife. After supper we telephoned Vanda in Florence, and then I spoke to my brother in New York. He and Lisa are not coming to Delhi next week. Maybe later. Then I had the familiar happiness of talking to Amanda and Phil in Malibu.'

The next day I am packing, and then the next two days rather run together. On the twenty-eighth, 'Krishnaji and I got up at 4 a.m., and had only nettle tea, our vitamins, and protein powder drink before leaving at 6:30 a.m. with Dorothy and Ingrid to Heathrow. Friedrich came too, but flew off to Switzerland. Much of the school was up standing in the dark rain to see Krishnaji off. Rita Zampese met us at Heathrow at 7:50 a.m., as did a Mr. Ramesh Sahini, chief protocol officer at the Indian High Commission, sent by Pupul to see that "His Eminence"' [both chuckle] 'etcetera.' Really…

S: Oh, god.

M: I don't bother to say what he had to see to, so it was obviously just show. 'We sat in Air India after buying a paperback book and the New Yorker at the bookstore. It is settled that Dorothy will fly with Rita, Friedrich, and Magda Sichitiu on December fifteenth and come to Rishi Valley. I have suggested Dorothy return with me after the Madras part of Krishnaji's tour, which should be on January twenty-sixth, as she shouldn't travel alone. Rita and the protocol man saw us into our front row seats on the 747, and in the comfort, such as it is, we flew from Heathrow at 8:45 a.m. across Russia, Afghanistan, and Pakistan. We read, slept, and were plied with food. Pupul had specified what Air India should provide as food for us. Krishnaji and I both woke up to watch, without sound, the end of the film Blue Thunder with helicopters chasing each other over Los Angeles.' [Both chuckle.] 'We landed at 11:20 a.m. at Delhi. Pama and Mr. Murli Rao were at the foot of the plane steps with a car to drive us to the VIP lounge, where Pupul, in a white heavy cotton sari, was smiling. Mr. Jose, her secretary, and Murli Rao took our passports and tickets and went off to see to everything. After a short while, we could go, and so Krishnaji and I went with Pupul to her house on Safdarjung Road. Nandini and her daughter, Devi, were there, as was Dr. Parchure. Pupul's house is very nice, done with her good taste.' She did have good taste. We have to say that.

S: Yes. That's right. [Laughs]. We like to say nice things about people.

M: Yes, we do. We try to be fair.

S: We try, yes.

M: 'When the others and the baggage came, Devi and Mr. Jose took me to the Taj Hotel, where I have a comfortable room. Driving in the soft warm air, I felt again in India when I saw the calm cows in the road.' [Chuckles.] 'On these trips with Krishnaji, I am borne by the kindness of his friends, sheltered, protected, and instructed by Krishnaji to let it be that way. He is uneasy at my being in a hotel there for a few days, and imagines dangerous food, etcetera.' [Both chuckle.] 'They put fruit in the room and he said you mustn't eat it. I am to eat nothing, he says, but tea, toast, and maybe a boiled egg for breakfast.' [Both chuckle.] 'It is, in fact, a hotel more luxurious than the Dorset in New York, which he likes. The next day, Pupul's car came for me in the morning. Asit had arrived in the night from Singapore. Krishnaji was beautiful as ever in his Indian clothes, an apricot kurta and buff bandi'—that's the sleeveless sort of a waistcoat. 'Devi and I went shopping unsuccessfully and came back to Pupul's to a late lunch. It was family only with Krishnaji and me. Asit asked him why there has always been turmoil around Krishnaji, TS people, Rajagopal, etcetera. Krishnaji said it was not surprising, "In good soil the tree grows and so do the weeds."' [Chuckles.] 'There was talk too about the "quiet room" in The Study at Brockwood. There was rather a challenge from both Pupul and Asit. Krishnaji said it was "entirely different" from a meditation room or a temple. "It is a place to be quiet, not to bring problems, thoughts," said Krishnaji. He said he had found it very difficult to live at Brockwood, in a house full of "a hundred" people where there is turmoil. I went back to the hotel, afraid if I give in to sleep I wouldn't wake up in time for a walk. So, I read, the archive correspondence I had brought from KFA to KFI, copies of correspondence between Krishnaji and Annie Besant, also with letters to her from Nitya. It was interesting to read in his letters of February seven, 1924 that Krishnaji, during the process, had said, "In one of the messages Krishnaji repeated from the Master, it was said that this house'—Arya Vihara—'would become a center and that they will watch over it."' Make whatever you can of that.

M: 'I came back to Pupul's and went for a walk in Lodi Gardens with Krishnaji, Nandini, and Devi. Supper was en famille. On the walk, Krishnaji told me that the night before we left Brockwood, i.e., early Sunday morning, around 3 a.m., he was awakened with an intense sense of something, a power that was with him, and that it had been going on as we flew. "Something happening."'

The thirtieth of October: 'I went with Devi to Cottage Industries shopping. Later I went with Krishnaji, Pupul, Sunanda, and Pama to lunch with the vice president and Mrs. Venkataraman. They live in a Lutyens house—stately, classical, and large. We sat on very long red sofas, far from each other in an otherwise empty room.'

S: Yes. [Chuckles.]

M: 'So, conversation is not enhanced. The hostess, with a diamond nose ring, didn't know about Lutyens, so my compliment went for naught.' [Both chuckle]. 'Krishnaji sat on her right at lunch, and on her left was a minister, I think, for fertilizer (question mark)' [Both laugh] 'named Sathi.' I'm not kidding. [Both chuckle.] 'All went along until a luckless serving man somehow upset a bowl of very hot soup down the minister's back. He gave a strangled look and tore off his shirt and vest; and instead of leaving the room of this very formal lunch, or being lent another shirt, he just sat out the meal, naked from the waist up. Krishnaji was very disapproving.'

S: [laughs] I know. I remember Krishnaji telling me about it [laughs]. It was…

M: I've underlined the "very."

S: Yes, yes. This man just sat there with no top on.

M: Yes. [Both laugh.] 'I walked later with Krishnaji in Lodi Park. Nandini, Devi, and Mr. Kantilal Dalal were along. We had dinner at Pupul's. Krishnaji, Pupul, Nandini, Devi, Asit, and Rajiv Sethi, the designer with whom Lisa is working for the World of India Exhibition. Afterward, Pupul brought out the manuscript of her biography of Krishnaji, and she asked me to read aloud from the opening chapter, which begins with his birth and circumstances of his early life. Krishnaji listened attentively and asked if we felt something in the room. And at the end, he was so moved by the presence in the room that he seemed close to tears. "I could prostrate myself to that," he said. Back at the hotel I could hardly sleep.'

October thirty-first. 'Devi came to the hotel early and we went to two shops. We arrived back at Pupul's at 11:30 a.m. I saw Nandini standing in the hall, very still, as though arrested in something shocking. Behind her, in the living room I saw Krishnaji standing, and knew instantly that he was not whatever had happened. Sunanda was standing motionless too, and one of them, I think Nandini, said in a low voice, "Indira Gandhi has been shot." Pupul had been telephoned earlier, and had had Asit drive her the short distance up Safdarjung Road to the Prime Minister's residence. It was already blocked, but Pupul said she was a minister, and got through. She told Asit to wait in the car, went in through the garden to the Prime Minister's house, came back walking deliberately, Asit said, and told him, "The Prime Minister has been shot by two of her guards. It is all over. Go and tell Krishnaji but no one else." She said it in Gujarati. She turned back to the house, and Asit returned to tell Krishnaji. We stayed in Pupul's house waiting for news. The television played interminable chants. Around 3 p.m., Krishnaji, Asit, Nandi, and I were in Pupul's sitting room, and Krishnaji said quietly, "I don't know if you believe in ghosts, but I've been seeing Mrs. Gandhi standing there." He indicated a spot about two feet from where I was sitting at the right end of the sofa. He said that she stood there, looking at him, for more than a minute, and then disappeared. As the afternoon continued with no word from Pupul, Asit, Nandini, and Rajiv Sethi went to the PM's house to look for her. Pupul had gone to the hospital and they waited at the house. Around 6 p.m., the news of the Prime Minister's death was announced. It had been withheld until her son and senior ministers could be notified and get back. They all happened to be out of Delhi. Also, they waited so that police and military could prepare for whatever came once the news was out. By the time Rajiv Gandhi got back in a military plane from Bengal, he was appointed Prime Minister and sworn into office. Pupul finally got home about 11 o'clock. She had been with Mrs. Sonia Gandhi all day in the hospital. There were enormous crowds at the hospital. She had helped dress Mrs. Gandhi's body, and accompanied its return, on a gun carriage, to her house before it will be taken to lie in state. Pupul looked drained and exhausted. I left her with Krishnaji, and Asit accompanied me back to the hotel. The streets in this part of the city are empty. A curfew in other sections has been declared. I have been looking out over the city, and violence against Sikhs has begun. There are fires in the outskirts.' The guards who shot her were Sikhs.

The first of November: 'Pupul went out before 5 a.m. to accompany Mrs. Gandhi's body to where it will lie in state until the funeral on Saturday. A car came and took me to Pupul's house at 10 a.m. All the taxis have disappeared at the hotel as most have Sikh drivers. There has been burning of houses and attacks on Sikhs throughout the night in Delhi and elsewhere in the country. Krishnaji's talks with the Dalai Lama have been canceled. There are curfews, but not in Delhi. The streets are almost empty here. We stayed in Pupul's house all morning. The TV showed, endlessly, the lying in state and the thousands filing past, many throwing fists in the air and chanting in Hindi "Blood for blood." It is felt safer for Krishnaji to get out of Delhi, and so our departure for Benares has been moved from Monday to Saturday.' This was written on Thursday. 'There were rumors all day of trouble and curfews all over India. Pupul's house remains a seeming spot of safety. It was a quiet morning, like any other in the garden. Birds wing about. The sunlight is pale and gentle. After lunch, I took a nap on a mat in the living room, and later Krishnaji wanted his walk, so he, Asit, Nandini, Devi, and I drove to an almost empty Lodi Park. We passed only one burned-out and toppled car. Pupul returned from the Prime Minister's house with news that it appears safe for Krishnaji to go to Benares. A television crew came and interviewed her about Mrs. Gandhi. After supper, Rajiv Sethi dropped me at my hotel. When I spoke to Krishnaji before dinner, he said that yesterday, before Mrs. Gandhi was killed, he thought of her in the morning while he was brushing his teeth and said to himself, "I'll probably never see her again." He was to have seen her at lunch this Saturday at Pupul's house, a lunch that both Mrs. Gandhi and the Dalai Lama were to attend.'

November second. 'Our going to Benares is canceled as unsafe. Instead we go south tomorrow to Madras where it is quieter. A car came from Pupul's and took me to her house at 11 a.m. The disturbed atmosphere is affecting Krishnaji. We lunched and I stayed there until Krishnaji, Asit, and I walked in Lodi Park. I got Krishnaji packed. Scott got through by telephone from Brockwood. I asked him to spread the news that we are alright and going to Madras, including to tell Erna, and via her, the Dunnes and my brother. I came back to the hotel and packed. I had the TV on and heard that the flights to Madras are canceled. I telephoned Pupul's, and after flurries of inquiry, heard we will fly tomorrow, but at 11 a.m. instead of 6:30 a.m. This hotel continues to function normally except there are worried-looking turbaned guests.' The Sikhs are turbaned. 'The disorders have continued, and there are horrifying accounts of Sikhs being set afire. Nothing has been learned since Wednesday'—this is Friday already—'of the Sikh bodyguard who was captured after shooting Mrs. Gandhi. The one who shot first was killed by other guards, and he is said to have been on her guard duty for over ten years, and to have traveled abroad with her. How is it possible for a man, after all that, to shoot an elderly woman? Twenty-two bullets are said to have hit her, all in the body and lower torso. Only her face shows in the lying in state, untouched. And people continue to drag people out of houses and trains and kill them. What is the savagery that lies so near the surface? Her son spoke to the nation on television this evening. He was very dignified and well spoken.'

The third of November: 'Mr. Jose, Pupul's nice and so efficient secretary, and Mr. Murli Rao came for me at the hotel at 9 a.m. I went to Pupul's house. Aditi, Nandini's granddaughter, had arrived from Mexico where she was with her dance troupe. Krishnaji, Sunanda, Pama, Prema, Ahalya, Dr. Parchure, and I flew at 11 a.m. to Madras. Krishnaji and I were in first class, which was almost empty. He and I had a picnic lunch. A steam bath hit us as we stepped out of the plane at Madras. Radha Burnier, Jayalakshmi Amma…' Amma is not her name. It's like a title, I think, something to do with the Tamil word for mother. Anyway, 'Jayalakshmi Amma and others were waiting to greet Krishnaji at Vasanta Vihar. Sunanda has kindly given me her front room on the ground floor, which has a new tiled bath. Krishnaji wanted a walk, and so, with Pama, we went to Radha's house at the Theosophical Society and walked on the beach. It is quiet here, and there have been few disturbances. Mrs. Gandhi's funeral and cremation took place in Delhi.'

The fourth of November. 'It was a quiet day with discussions at the meals. We walked on Radha's beach again. Krishnaji wants to go to Benares on Friday. In spite of the difficulties and dangers of train travel, over a hundred people have already gone to Benares for the planned gathering, and Krishnaji feels he must go for that as well as Rajghat itself needing his presence. He hasn't been there in a few years. Achyut and Balasundaram arrived from Bangalore during the evening.'

The next day. ‘After much consultation, it is decided to go to Benares Friday. I worked on letters, had a nap after lunch, and we all walked on the beach in the late afternoon. Dr. Sudarshan came to dinner.’ That was a Tuesday.

The sixth. ‘With Prema Srinivasan, I went to see her daughter’s, Sheela Balaji’s, workshop where she makes designs of cloth done in vegetable dyes. Then we went to a boutique where Malini’—that’s her other daughter—‘sells it. I bought printed cotton for tunics. We came back and I had coffee with Prema at her house. In the afternoon, I dictated letters to a typist, then went on another beach walk with Krishnaji, Radha, and Pama. In the U.S., Reagan is reelected too overwhelmingly.’

There’s really nothing for the next two days, then on November ninth. ‘I was up at 3 a.m., and at 4 a.m. we left Vasanta Vihar. Krishnaji, Sunanda, Pama, Parchure, Ahalya, and I flew to Delhi. Pupul met us and took us to her house for breakfast. Mr. Murli Rao took me to the Taj Hotel, where again I had a room for the night. We lunched at Pupul’s, rested there in the afternoon, and then walked in Lodi Gardens. Mr. and Mrs. L. K. Jha came in while we were dining and afterward dropped me at the hotel.’ He was, I think, the Indian ambassador to Washington.

The tenth. ‘I was up at 4 a.m. and Mr. Jose came for me an hour later. From Pupul’s, Krishnaji, Nandini, Aditi, Sunanda, Pama, Parchure, Ahalya, and I went to the airport, and at 7 a.m. flew nonstop to Benares. The drive to Rajghat from the airport was even bumpier and dustier than in the past.’ [S chuckles.] ‘All the school was out to greet Krishnaji. I have the same room as before, below Krishnaji’s. The Sathayes have made it as comfortable as they could. He is now principal, and she is quiet and nice. We had breakfast and unpacked. I slept in the afternoon, and we walked around the playing fields.’

The next day. ‘At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave a talk to the campers who have been waiting for him, and later all of us lunched with them in the school dining room. The walk was again around the playing fields in late afternoon.’

November twelfth. ‘At 8:30 a.m., Krishnaji gave his second talk to the campers and other visitors. The twelve days of mourning for Mrs. Gandhi have ended. I went with Nandini and Aditi to Benares, where they bought saris at the Kissam Sari Emporium. Benares is its unchanging self: dusty, filthy, crowded, mad, and totally India. I came back to lunch, nap, and walk.’

S: Yes. [Both chuckle.]

November thirteenth. ‘Krishnaji came to the breakfast table and had sharp words for those present about the Anvekars, who are leaving. He then talked to them separately, and afterward held a KFI trustee meeting about it. It was difficult and rough going.’ I don’t know why I don’t explain what all that was about. ‘We walked again around the playing field in the afternoon.’

The next day. ‘I went shopping in the morning with Nandini, Sunanda, and Ahalya where I got tussar and raw silk for Krishnaji.’ For shirts, I guess, or some Indian something. ‘Back to lunch. The late afternoon walk with Krishnaji included a group and we walked across the Varuna’—that’s the little river that runs between the Rajghat buildings and the farmland. It’s the road to Sarnath, actually—‘as far as the pump on the east edge of the Rajghat land. Krishnaji has the beginnings of cold symptoms. The villagers are being difficult.’ They wanted…

S: They wanted the Rajghat land, essentially.

M: Yes. Yes. ‘The walk was one he shouldn’t have been taking as his cold symptoms increased in the evening.’

November fifteenth. ‘Krishnaji stayed in bed with a slight cold and slight fever. I did desk things in the morning. And in the afternoon I went with Nandini, Sunanda, and Ahalya into Benares to buy saris. The sari shop owner came for us in a car and then led us through winding narrow alleys in what had been a fortress where cell-like shops, selling anything and everything, line the narrow, rough cobblestone walk.’ Going through the kasbah-like alleys in this former fortress is really weird…well, you’ve been there.

S: I’ve been there, yes. It’s a throwback to…

M: It is. It is. ‘Bicycles, children, goats, noise, smells. We came to the sari shop, a cell, like the others, but lined with canvas. You drop sandals at the entrance, sit against bolsters on the floor, and then saris are flung out for inspection. These were mostly cotton ones, a specialty. Much talk. Much choosing. I bought nothing, as I do not intend to wear saris, and at the end, one has to politely evade proffered coffee. It was dark when we left, and the man guided us out. I concentrated on Sunanda’s feet right in front of me and kept walking. “My god,” she said “What a place. If any trouble starts here, we’d all be knifed.”’ [Both chuckle.] ‘When we reached the street, there was, of course, no car, so we had to pick our way through people on the pavement selling fruit, vegetables, parrots in small cages. We waited in a jeweler’s shop, in the purple fluorescent light, and eventually someone came who knew where the car was. We found it, then drove back through the noise and dust to Rajghat and buckets of hot water. Head, nose, body, feet, and sandals have to be washed after an expedition to Kashi.’ Kashi is the name of Benares in ancient days. [Chuckles.] Benares has to be seen to be believed.

S: Yes, yes. And even after you’ve seen it, you can’t believe it. [Laughs.]

M: I hope it isn’t changing. It’s been that way for…centuries.

S: Yes. It’s been that way for so long now.

M: The sixteenth. ‘Krishnaji’s temperature was normal but he stayed in bed all day sleeping and reading. I dictated letters slowly, so my non-Indian English was understandable to the very willing man who took it in shorthand. I slept and read in the afternoon.' [Both chuckle.] Well, it was nice of him. I'm not very good at dictating, although you wouldn't know it from this. [Both laugh.]

Krishnaji riding in a car in India (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Well, here you're reading your diaries.

M: People would say to me, "Why don't you have somebody type your letters?" And I'd say, "Because I can't dictate, I have to see the letter if I'm writing it. I can't just listen to myself."

The seventeenth. 'Krishnaji is better, but he stayed in bed. I spent most of the day doing letters. There was a cyclone in Madras with heavy rains and many trees downed.'

November eighteenth. 'Krishnaji spoke in the assembly hall to the teachers, and one, a man named Dennis, was rather aggressive. Then he rested for the remainder of the day. I walked around the campus and ended up at Vatsala's and Dr. Parchure's cottage, and talked with him about his working in the North. He gets on with the Upasani, Sathaye, and the two new ones, Dr. Hira Lal and Maheshji.' Mahesh was his name, but you put ji on the end of some names in India. This, according to Sunanda, is a term of both familiarity and respect. So, with Krishnaji, you wouldn't call him Krishna, that would be too intimate.

S: And also it doesn't show respect.

M: But putting the ji on the end of it makes it both friendly, affectionate, and respectful. And that applies to all the names with ji that you use in India. So, 'it is in the North that Parchure has collected a fair number of people interested in Krishnaji's teachings.' This is what Parchure has done. 'He does not seem to mind at all, all that repels me about this place. Vatsala seems happier in Rishi Valley than here, as she has her sons Vikram and Vishwas near enough there in Bangalore.' She likes it better to be in Rishi Valley for that reason.

S: Also, just to say, while we're on the ji subject, I can remember, now that you mentioned it, sometimes Indians would refer to you as Mariaji.

M: Yes, Sunanda always called me Mariaji. She never called me Maria or Mary.

S: Yes, and Krishnaji was the only person I ever heard call you Maria.

M: Oh yes, that's right. He was the only one who called me Maria.

S: It was nice, Mariaji, it was also nice.

M: Yes. [Chuckles.]

S: Alright, on that topic, I think we have to end this. We're running out of tape.

M: We have to end. Alright. We'll begin next time on November nineteenth, 1984.

Issue 82: November 19, 1984 to December 31, 1984

Mary discusses with herself, in her diaries, the value of the record she is keeping. She remains in awe and extremely grateful that she is able to be in Krishnaji's presence, and she sees the necessity and yet the impossibility of adequately describing that presence.

Krishnaji and Mary are in India throughout this issue, which covers less than a month and a half, and Mary's health suffers. She decides she must cut her visit short for her wellbeing, but before she leaves, she gives us word pictures of Krishnaji in India that are extraordinary.

Mary: Alright. We're beginning on November nineteenth, 1984, and we're in Rajghat.

'Krishnaji spoke to the students in the morning. It was difficult, as they have insufficient English and no notion of his teachings. Afterward he rested while I did letters. Last night I asked him where, other than Vasanta Vihar, was there difficulty in working together as between the Patwardhans and Parchure. A religious center, which Krishnaji wants, could be created. Today Nandini, Sunanda, and Ahalya went shopping, and I felt a fourth trip to Benares was pushing my luck.' [Scott chuckles.] 'So I stayed here, and was at lunch with Krishnaji, Upasani, Sathe, Parchure, Maheshji, and Dr. Hira Lal. On a sudden decision, Krishnaji told them to come back at 4 p.m. He wanted to tell them two things. When we reconvened, he said that one, someone should be responsible for Krishnaji's teachings among the students. Maheshji is to do this. Two, he spoke of a religious center for the north here at Rajghat: the five of them working together in the school is good, but it must also be for that. Parchure is to be based here during his time in India when he is not traveling with Krishnaji or in the West. He and the other four get on well and trust each other, and they pledged themselves to this. Krishnaji spoke at length and with eloquence about this working together. "If Sathe makes a mistake, it is my mistake because I let him make it." Afterward he dictated to me, "A religious brain has no shelter. It is not scattered. It is unshackled. It has no schedule. It is non-comparative, utterly free from all ritual, dogma, faith. It is capable of cooperation because it is wholly free in independence."'

'Later there was chanting in the assembly hall. Krishnaji sat on the floor among the students, and nine South Indian Brahmin priests chanted.' It was wonderful. 'It is a harsh, compelling, ancient sound that seemed to come from deep in the unconscious of centuries. The sound of Sanskrit has some indecipherable depth and meaning to my totally uncomprehending ears. It went on intensely for longer than my bones on a hard seat liked, but Krishnaji was euphoric when we walked back with a flashlight. "That sound, the depth of that sound," he kept saying.' It was wonderful. Were you in any of those chantings?

S: Not that particular one. But I've been to others with Indian Brahmin priests, yes.

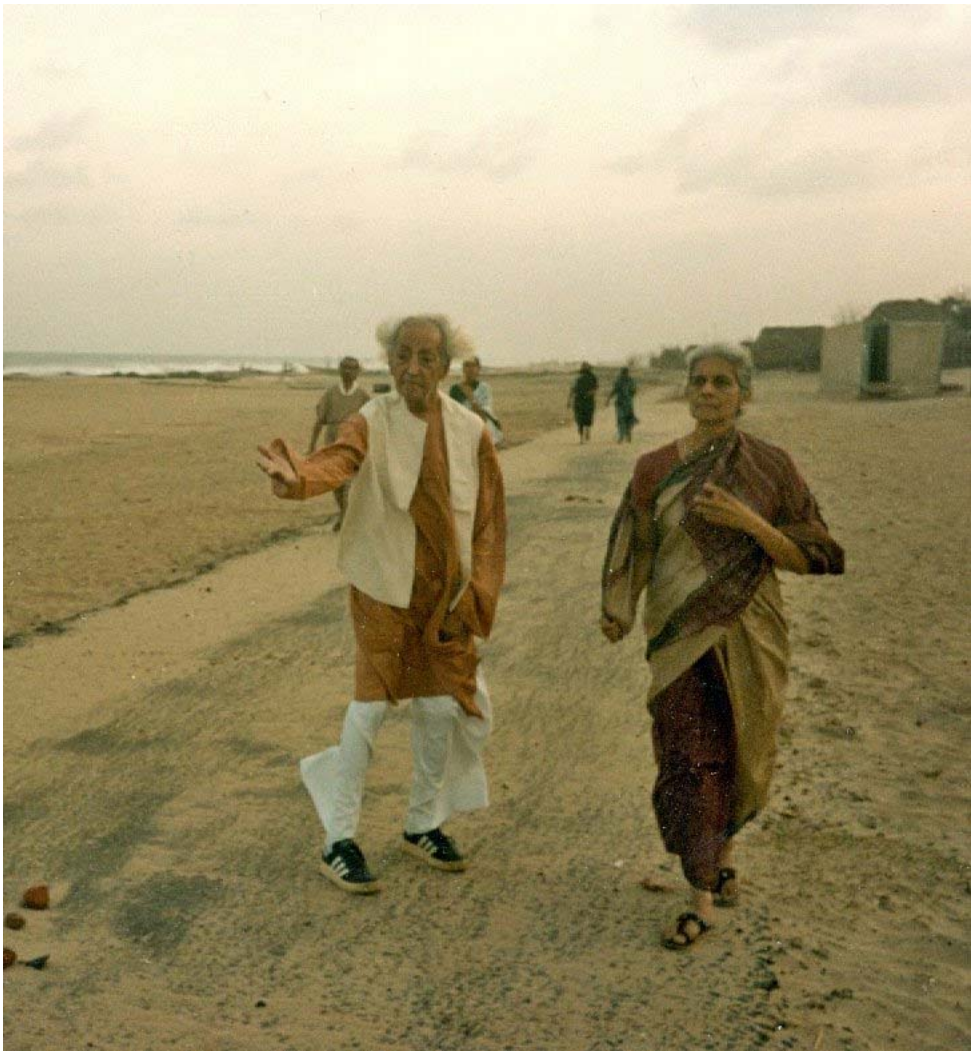
M: Just extraordinary.

Now the twentieth. ‘Pupul arrived from Delhi while we were still at the breakfast table. Prema rang from Madras and said that six or seven trees at Vasanta Vihar were felled by a heavy cyclone there. Pupul still has her government car and seems still at the center of things in Delhi. If Rajiv Gandhi wins the elections at the end of December, the Festival of India in the U.S. in 1985 will go ahead. If he loses, “I am on my way out,” said Pupul.’ [Chuckles.] ‘But she thinks he will win. Krishnaji asked her if she and Rajiv Gandhi were friendly, and Pupul smiled happily, “He is very fond of me.” At 10 a.m. Krishnaji held a KF India meeting and told them the two things he had discussed with the Rajghat group yesterday: his teachings have to be brought to the students in the school, and a religious center should be created here. He read them the paragraph on “A religious mind has no shelter,” etcetera. He said a similar center should come about at Rishi Valley and one at Vasanta Vihar. I dictated letters to Mr. Chandran in the afternoon, and walked with Krishnaji, Sathe, Nandini, and her friend, Bakul, three times around the playing field where boy students were playing cricket. The air pollution of Benares: dust, smoke, and who knows what, is beginning to grate in my nose and lungs.’

November twenty-first. ‘Pandit Jagannath Upadhyaya’—it’s pronounced “Upadhya,” but it’s written Upadhyaya. Don’t ask me why there’s a difference, but that’s the way it is [S chuckles]—’came after breakfast. Krishnaji asked him what the Buddha said about time and this led to a discussion in which Krishnaji said, “Change implies time, and so is not change.” I have a cold. I went for a walk with Krishnaji in the afternoon, but had supper in bed. There was noise all night of broadcast music from across the river.’

The next day: ‘Sunanda, Pama, and others left for Madras and Rishi Valley. I have a slight fever so stayed in my room and began a course of erythromycin. Krishnaji spoke to the teachers.’

The twenty-third: ‘My fever is down but I spent the day in bed submerged in reading the only thing that is available as I’ve gone through what I brought. So I’m reading a novel from the school library.’



November the twenty-fourth. ‘I have had a cold and slight fever for two days and am taking no chances because this is India. I agreed with Dr. Parchure to start a course of erythromycin, which Lailee gave me for the trip. I have some weakness, but on the whole it was a bit of luxury to stay in bed. I got up this morning; I washed my hair and the rest of me with the one hot water bucket.’ [Chuckles.] You got very quickly used to using one bucket of hot water to wash your hair, your body, and do your laundry.

M: Yes. ‘In the dark a muffled man at daybreak brings…’ He was always muffled and brings…

S: Yes, because he was cold.

M: …and came carrying up his heavy bucket, which he had heated on a little—

Krishnaji walking in Madras with Radha Burnier (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Brazier of charcoals. Yes, yes.

M: Something. And he staggered up the stairs with it in the early morning and that was your ration. 'Got up this morning, washed hair and the rest in a hot bucket that the dark muffled man brings at daybreak. Parameshwaran brought a breakfast tray, but I was dressed, and so ready to walk over to the assembly hall for Krishnaji's third talk here. He had come downstairs early to see how I was. I hope he was reassured by the lightness of my sickness, as his first reaction was that India is a perilous place for me. "You must outlive me, and it is not good for you here. I am used to it: the dirt, the noise, the food, the traveling." He thought I should come to Rishi Valley and then return to the West. He left it on a "We'll see" status. His talk this morning was mostly on time and thought. The past, present, and future are the same. The past creates the present and, slightly modified, becomes the future, so the future is now. He does not always insert "Unless you change" in the middle of this, and so to the newcomer it can sound rather hopeless. But he is now exploring change as being within time, and therefore not change. The key is attention. That total attention, at his depth, which he doesn't let thought creep into. This real attention brings an energy, which is not thought. This energy, he said this morning, is love. It is intelligence and compassion. So, things are not changed into something else or better. If they are seen, they end, and that is instantaneous and not in time.' This is what nobody seems to understand. These discussions we have go on endlessly.

S: I know, I know.

M: Not seeing, you've got to see it and the seeing—his idea of seeing is change. But they just see the words.

'I walked back to my room, avoiding gravel in my sandals, Krishnaji ahead under his big Briggs sun umbrella, escorted by Upasani. Pupul and Nandini were at the talk. Pupul is not feeling too well. The shocks of the past weeks in Delhi are probably affecting her now.'

'What am I trying to do in this spasmodically kept account? For what and for whose eyes? If my own, what will it lead to? I am in a constant inhibition of feeling I am counting sunlight when I write of Krishnaji, and it is only because of Krishnaji that anything should be noted. I am not interested in my own reactions. It should be about him or it is pointless. Yet the enormity of trying to write about him is overwhelming. Too much of it results in listing events as in the little blue Smythson'—that's the little daily—'diary that I keep each day. Where is the "perfume" of all this, as he sometimes says? Something has let me be witness to this extraordinary man as few others are or have been. Have I not a human duty in this, as he at times has implied, to be able to convey to others what "this man" was like? The record of what he teaches is all there, well documented. Is it important that I try to record that sunlight of the man? How yesterday he came to see how I was, and sat quietly on a chair, looking so silently, gently, overwhelmingly beautiful. When I said something of that, it had no more weight than if a moth had alighted for an instant on his sleeve and gone.' [Chuckles.]

S: Mm, hm. Quite right.

M: That's the way it was.

November the twenty-fifth. 'At 9:30 a.m. Krishnaji gave his fourth Rajghat talk in the assembly hall. He asked which of the long list of subjects he should talk about. Different ones were called in in heavy accents, and he chose to begin with desire, and went on to death and meditation. He spoke of the senses being fully alive, not suppressed. Four red-robed Buddhist monks in the front of me listened impassively. Their smooth Tibetan faces were like wax. Nandini and her friend Bakul left for Bombay. I didn't walk but rested one more day.'

November twenty-sixth: 'At 9:30 six Benares Brahmin pandits came with Pandit Jagannath Upadhyaya to discuss with Krishnaji. Upadhyaya speaks in Hindi, so there is an interpreter, but Pupul soon took over this job. Everyone sits on the floor in the upstairs room, including about twenty audience members, but Pupul sits in an armchair, cross-legged, looking rather monumental, and the cause of it all.' [Chuckles.] Upadhyaya's opening question to Krishnaji was on the difference in Krishnaji's terms between brain and mind. By 11 a.m., it was still on brain. Tomorrow, perhaps, we will get to mind. The pandits were mostly middle-aged, wearing doti, kurta, and shawl; one, rather portly, had three rings. Men here tend to wear rings that women would in the West: a stone and band in gold. Upadhyaya has expressive, intelligent hands, the gray hair of a fox terrier, and the most unfortunate upper front teeth I have ever seen.' And so he did. Poor man. They stuck straight out of his mouth and Krishnaji persuaded him to have them fixed. I don't know if that will be in here because it happened after I'd left. Unfortunately, he didn't outlive Krishnaji by very much: he died soon afterward, about six months after Krishnaji died.

S: Yes, yes.

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

M: 'His teeth are disguised by a mustache, but go straight out like a gopher. Krishnaji is trying to get something done about them as he thinks he cannot get properly nourished and is talking with him about having them fixed in Delhi. Pupul has a dentist in mind. It should have been seen to forty years ago. Otherwise, he has a nice, intelligent face, which lights up in speaking to Krishnaji. The pandits all stayed to lunch, their attention fastened on Krishnaji. I helped Ahalya pack Krishnaji's trunk for Madras.'

The twenty-seventh of November. 'Dr. Parchure left early by train for Madras. At 9:30 a.m. yesterday's discussion resumed with the addition of Rinpoche Samdhong.' That's our Tibetan Rinpoche. 'Krishnaji went into what he means by mind, which he says is "totally different" from brain. An absorbing exploration in which he came to stating that when the brain is still and the self is not, then there is mind, which is love, intelligence, compassion. Because of thought and self-centeredness, we live in disorder. Death must be the most marvelous thing because it ends disorder, and so it brings order. I queried this and he said there is order in the universe and my perception (can't say brain or mind) made the jump from the personal ending by death; so there remains the order of the universe. How far ahead he goes. Rinpoche stayed for lunch and Krishnaji, who had spoken eloquently of the highest use of all the senses during the morning discussion, several times asked why celibacy is insisted upon in various religions. Rinpoche did not respond very much to this, but he did describe the steps of the Tibetan Buddhist monkhood. Seven years of probation and many vows, etcetera. Krishnaji asked him about the Dalai Lama and his view of him. Rinpoche said that the Dalai Lama is in a guru position to him, as the Dalai Lama was involved in his ordination. He said he would obey the Dalai Lama, and Krishnaji took this up as obedience "is a terrible thing." "Why should I obey? If I'm wrong, I'm wrong, and I will find out for myself." He maintained that help is harmful because it weakens people. We all pointed out that he spends his life helping people. "Then why do you talk so much?" asked Rinpoche. Krishnaji says he does not want to help people—time in this for enquiries about what the Buddha said on this. "But Buddha continued to talk," said Rinpoche after quoting the Buddha in similar lines to Krishnaji's. He maintained that there is only pointing the truth, not help. The truth is the only authority. We walked four rounds of the playing field with Krishnaji.'

The next two days there is really nothing. People left and we packed.

November the thirtieth. 'I felt normal on awakening, but was sick to my stomach shortly after. Krishnaji and I drove to the airport through dust and rough road to catch the noon plane. It was two hours late. We reached Delhi at 3:30 p.m. Pupul, who returned there two days ago, was at the airport with Mr. Jose and Murli Rao to meet Krishnaji. Krishnaji had a 4 o'clock lunch at Pupul's, but I couldn't look at food. Instead, I took a spoon of brandy in hot water, which quieted the stomach.' I don't know who prescribed that. I don't like brandy. 'Krishnaji kept glancing at me worriedly at the table, so I went and lay down until we had to return at 5 p.m. to the airport where Krishnaji and I took the 6:30 p.m. flight to Madras, due at 9:30 p.m. However, the weather made landing impossible, so the plane went on to Bangalore. I wondered how to look after Krishnaji if we had to get off there. But we were kept onboard for about forty-five minutes until the weather lifted and flew back to Madras. A cyclone is forecast for the coast. We circled before landing, but finally the pilot made a good landing. The plane was cramped and full. It was claustrophobic, but I had the sense to go throw up in the loo' [chuckles] 'and felt better. A car with Pama and others met Krishnaji when we landed, and it was a mercy to go right to bed at Vasanta Vihar; the nice clean bathroom, a welcome sight. The one at Rajghat was pretty bad. I would just as soon never go near Benares again.' [Both chuckle]. I was feeling a little under the weather when I wrote that.

S: Yes. But Benares is rough. Why don't you tell the rest of the story that you told me about maybe being stuck in Bangalore, as it's not on record?

M: Was that off the record?

S: Yes, it was.

M: Oh well, on the plane I thought—I was responsible for Krishnaji, so I had to take him to a hotel if we had to stay in Bangalore. But how? I didn't know Bangalore at all. So I looked around in the crowded plane and saw a sort of elderly man of knowledge and property, and I thought he will know the best hotel in Bangalore. But I don't think I had asked him because we never left the plane, so it wasn't necessary, [chuckling] but that is what I was planning, and that is what it was like for me in all the weird circumstances we faced.

S: Right. [Both chuckle.]

M: So, the first of December. 'I felt weak but normal on awakening. Sunanda had a doctor come, but I had no fever as I seemed recovered. I had a quiet day getting cleaned of Benares dust, etcetera, but Krishnaji went in the afternoon to see the storm along the beach.'

The second of December. 'I feel better, though food is still repellent to me. I rested and repacked for Rishi Valley. I did manage to go with Krishnaji to the beach in the late afternoon and walked partially. Radha has had hepatitis but is up and around.'

December third. 'The last two days were quiet at Vasanta Vihar. I began to get over the stomach upsets but felt weak on Saturday.' This is written on a Monday. 'With a big wind still blowing from the fringes of a new cyclone, Krishnaji went to see the sea and came back exhilarated, hair flying.' [Chuckles.] 'Huge waves close in the sand, he said. He had walked alone as Pama still has an injured ankle and Radha has come down with hepatitis, though she is now recovering. I had stayed in, weakly reading, but yesterday I went with him and walked a little slowly behind him. It was getting dark but he said he hadn't minded. At Rajghat he had talked to me about his unease when it begins to darken. He has always felt this way, he said, "I feel like a skeleton wandering." If someone close to him is there, he feels more protected.'

'This morning I was up at 3 a.m., and at 4 a.m., in the Santhanam car, we left Vasanta Vihar for Rishi Valley and reached here at 8:40 a.m. In a drizzle with umbrellas, the school, Radhika, Narayan, Mrs. Thomas, etcetera were waiting to greet him outside the old guest house. Parameshwaran had breakfast ready. I settled into the same room I've had these latter years, next to the dining room and across from Krishnaji in the old guest house. I opened the accumulated mail. Krishnaji slept, and in the late afternoon he, Radhika, and I walked. There is great quiet in the valley; remoteness, and an ancient rhythm. There is also a drought as it is another dry year. The big old well is almost empty, and the streambeds are dry.'

S: Let's just say for the sake of history, that the Santhanam car was significant because there was only one, I think it was in those days, one make of Indian car; and that was built on old machinery used for making a car in England in the fifties. The engine was awful, it handled like a truck, rode like a tractor, [M chuckles] and it was just awful. But there were a few imported cars, very few, and a person had to be very wealthy to own an imported car, and Santhanam was such a man.

M: Mm, hm.

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

S: So he would lend his good imported car and driver to Krishnaji for going to Rishi Valley and back, and even sometimes for going to the beach and back for the walks. But it was a great boon to have a decent car for Krishnaji to ride in because—

M: I wasn't aware of all the car situation.

S: Oh, yes. Well, this is why I'm putting it down. This is important because it, you know, otherwise Krishnaji would have had to go in that awful car.

M: I think I went in an auto rickshaw once when I was staying in Madras on my first trip many years previously.

S: Oh, yes, when you were staying in the house rented by Jayalakshmi.

M: Yes, she rented a house and rented all the furniture from that big department store in Madras, and lent us her Brahmin cook. I was staggered by such generosity, hospitality, and thoughtfulness. I know we've covered this. Anyway, I was sick, and Krishnaji, who knew about my condition, said that I was to come to him as soon as I didn't have a fever, and that's when I took the auto rickshaw.

December fourth. ‘I did Christmas letters and checks. The Parchure family came to see Krishnaji. At lunch, Krishnaji, Narayan, Narayan’s brother Krishna, a sister, Uma, Rajesh, Radhika, and me. We started for a walk in the afternoon, but showers caught us, and we came back.’

The next day. ‘Krishnaji rested. I continued to write Christmas notes and checks. At lunch, as yesterday, there was Radhika, Narayan with his brother, Krishna, and his sister, Uma, Rajesh, and me. Krishnaji pursued the question he put yesterday to Uma and others: “How do you regard K? Is he different from you? And if so, why?” He was asking the family members, but they had no answer to it any more than the rest of us. Krishnaji teases Uma about her sociologist point of view. She smiles and was restrained in her replies. In the afternoon, Krishnaji, Radhika, and I walked toward Tetu. One feels the valley most strongly there. The simplicity of the earth, the hills, sky, and a sort of stillness. “This would be a good place to die,” said Krishnaji. It was dark when we got back, but he didn’t mind because Radhika and I were with him. The valley is moist from yesterday’s rain.’

The sixth. ‘I worked almost all day at my desk. Krishnaji, Radhika, and I again walked on the Tetu Road as far as the little temple. Krishnaji is moved by the beauty of the country. “One could die out here.”’ He said it again.

The next day. ‘I spent almost all day doing desk work. I didn’t feel too well in the stomach but kept going. Dr. Parchure gave me pills for my stomach, and is also doing surprising therapy to the swelling in my bad leg, forcing me to move and break up the swelling.’

The eighth. ‘Krishnaji rested and so did I, most of the day. I had lunch and supper in the guest dining room where non-spiced food(?)’—big question mark in parentheses [S chuckles]—‘is provided.’

S: Yes, yes. Their vision of non-spiced food is uh…yes. [Chuckles.]

M: The ninth of December. ‘At 9:30 a.m. Krishnaji spoke to the teachers from the schools of Rishi Valley, Madras, Bangalore, and Rajghat. After his rest, I walked with Krishnaji, Radhika, and Mr. Naidu, seeing the silkworms in a new building for them.’ That was Mr. Naidu’s project. It was very interesting.

The tenth. ‘Krishnaji is feeling tired, so he rested. I wrote letters. We walked along the Tetu Road after seeing the dairy and the new bio-gas mechanism.’ They had an ingenious thing, maybe you can describe that better than I can.

S: It was then becoming current in India. It was called Gopi gas. [M chuckles.] Gopi after the cow herders. Well, they take all of the manure from the cows in a dairy, put it into a big tank—

M: That’s right.

S: And, of course, it gives off methane, which is then piped to different places, which burns like natural gas.

M: It's a very good idea.

S: It is. Then, after the methane has all been expended, they just spread the manure on the fields.

M: A very good idea. We should have it in Ojai.

S: Yes, except that you don't have any cows here.

M: No, we haven't a cow in sight [S laughs]. Not in the whole valley, as far as I know, there isn't a cow.

S: Yes, that's a drawback. [Both chuckle.]

M: The eleventh. 'Krishnaji held a second discussion with teachers from the different schools. Several of them were at lunch. Krishnaji walked with Radhika and me. My second suitcase finally arrived.' I don't know where it was lost, but anyway…

There's really nothing the next day, but on December thirteenth, 'At 9:30 a.m. Krishnaji held the third meeting with teachers. Nandini and Bakul arrived from Bombay. I did letters. I walked with Krishnaji, Radhika, and a teacher on the Tetu Road. Krishnaji, Radhika, Nandini, Bakul, and I had supper together in the old guest house.'

Again, nothing until December fifteenth. 'At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the fourth discussion with teachers, after which he saw a Spaniard, Tomás Fernández, who was unwell, and he treated him. In the afternoon an Indian government film person photographed Krishnaji on the walk. At 6 p.m., there was a dance recital by students in the assembly hall. Heaters were put in Krishnaji's room and mine.'

The next day, 'Krishnaji treated the Spaniard again. I talked to him at some length. In the afternoon, Krishnaji was filmed walking about by the Indian government film people. Dorothy, Rita Zampese, and Friedrich Grohe arrived at 11 p.m.'

December seventeenth: 'Mr. Naidu's wife died of heart attack in the evening. Dorothy, Rita, and Friedrich breakfasted and lunched with Krishnaji. Krishnaji rested in the morning, then did the usual walk in the afternoon. Krishnaji put hands on the Spaniard Tomás Fernández again. He also saw Kantilal Dalal.'

The eighteenth of December: 'On the afternoon walk with Krishnaji were Nandini, Bakul, Radhika, and me. We went on the Tetu Road where days ago Krishnaji had said that he was so moved by the beauty of the country that "One could die out here," but today, we went as far as the small temple, where the head and torso of a goddess is fashioned in clay on the base of a tree and where the villagers sacrifice goats. One other day we walked there, and Krishnaji asked us if we felt something about the atmosphere. Radhika said she felt nothing. Nandini said she had once walked there with her son, Gansham, and they had not wanted to stop near that temple. There is something unpleasant about it. I have always been drawn toward the country there because it is beautiful, totally country, with fields, orchards, and a red sandy road and Rishi Konda at the end of the valley. But I've always tread carefully, feeling alien in the eyes of the land and the dark Telugu faces, even though the children offer a handful of groundnuts as a present, and once some custard apples were offered by an old, bent twig of a man. I would walk there alone, but warily, somehow. Today, Krishnaji and the rest of us stepped into the temple, which is a stone box, not very deep, empty except for a row of lingam-shaped stones, and there, after showing Nandi and Bakul the statue of the goddess at the base of the tree, we turned back on the road toward the school. It was late afternoon. The sun had dropped behind Rishi Konda. The sky was pale gold, but dark was beginning on the path. About halfway back, Krishnaji asked me if I had felt anything behind us. I said I had felt I wanted to move away from the temple. He said he had felt something following him. He watched what he felt, and then he said to it, "Enough"…"I did something and told it to leave, and instantly it was gone." He said the school land of Rishi Valley is peaceful, but the land beyond is not. "It is a dark land. There is danger in those villages. We must keep them at arm's length." Dorothy, Rita Zampese, and Friedrich Grohe arrived last night. Dorothy doesn't look quite right, but it may be the strain of the trip. She's going to return with Rita on the January thirteenth instead of later with me. This frees me to leave on my own when it seems best. Also, Friedrich, who leaves earlier, wants to travel with Krishnaji from London to California. This means I could go ahead to Ojai. I will have to think it out. Leaving India is a desirable thought. Something dogs me on this trip, though everything is done to make my visit pleasant with great thoughtfulness. There is something about the country that is, to me, what? As Krishnaji said, "it is a dark land."'

The next day, 'Sunanda and Pama returned to Madras. At 9:30 a.m. there was a discussion in the assembly hall between Krishnaji, Pupul, and Narayan. I worked on the new Filofax account book for 1985, then walked with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Rita, and Friedrich.'

December twentieth. 'At 9:30 a.m. Krishnaji spoke to the school. He had seven children with him on the dais, and came back exhilarated by their interest.' There are lovely photographs of that. 'Mr. and Mrs. Thomas and Radhika were at lunch. Krishnaji walked with them and Friedrich Grohe to the mouth of the valley, while I went to see Mrs. Parchure, Mr. Naidu, and Dorothy. Krishnaji, also exhilarated by his long walk, asked me to have supper with him on trays in his room.'

There's nothing of significance on the next day, but on December twenty-second. 'Krishnaji had an extra discussion with students, at the students' urging. As usual, the mid-aged ones were the talkers.' That means twelve-year-olds. 'He had six come to join him one after another on the dais. Unfortunately, the video equipment had gone to Madras and so, the lively, funny, and very good discussion was only on audio recording. Afterward Krishnaji was engulfed in children. "Can we talk again, sir?" and "Why don't you stay here, sir? You should be our principal, sir.”’ [Both chuckle]. ‘The older silent students now want a meeting, but they have waited too long, and Krishnaji will rest until he leaves on December twenty-sixth.’ The older students had that sort of adolescent embarrassment in making fools of themselves in their…

S: Yes, and superior, too. Yes.

M: And thinking they’re superior to the younger ones who chatted away and were wonderful. But when they finally decided they wanted to get into the act, it was too late. [S chuckles.] ‘I took photos as I have at other meetings. Krishnaji, later in the morning, saw Mr. Naidu with his three children. Mrs. Naidu died suddenly of a heart attack last Monday. She was only forty-two. Four students came to interview me for the school magazine. Krishnaji lunched in bed. I in the guest dining room. I slept only in spurts last night, and so took a half an hour nap after lunch, then went to call on Vatsala Parchure. Dr. Parchure sat through tea, Earl Grey, which he notices I drink in Switzerland, and then went out so that Vatsala and I could talk alone. She is as nice and as remarkable in her own way as her husband. She is housemother to twenty-five children, mostly the very young ones. She also teaches them general studies, Hindi, and handwork. In doing all this, she is growing as a person, liking it, learning new things to do better, and accepting his duties that keep him absent so much of the time. “I am a happy person,” she said, and it seems clear that she is. What a very nice couple they are. I came back in time to walk with Krishnaji, Narayan, Rita, Grohe, Radhika, and a male teacher, Alo, along the Tetu road, past the temple to the crossroad. Krishnaji strode purposefully around the back of the temple. And when later along the road I asked him if he had felt anything following him, and he said, “No, I went deliberately around the temple, did certain things, and said ‘You stay here. This is your place.’”’

‘Then I asked, “Did you feel a resistance?”’

‘Krishnaji, “It didn’t like it, naturally.”’

‘The school van eventually met us. We had probably walked three miles.

The twenty-third. ‘Pupul leaves today, so she, Radhika, and I had supper with Krishnaji last evening. During supper, there was a long talk about his life and some occult matters, and Pupul’s book on Krishnaji. She had given me an article supplied by Radha Burnier that Krishnaji had written sometime in the twenties after Nitya’s death. It describes his concept of Masters, not as remote, strange, beings, but as part of himself and his daily life. He said he had not seen them often and only “as the flash of a passing bird.” We spoke of whether Leadbeater could have made the vague dreaming boy imagine these things. Pupul says there is little direct testimony from Krishnaji in those days. Much of the accounts are by CWL. We even speculated whether Leadbeater might have given the young Krishnaji some drug that made him both sleepy and suggestible on the occasion of the “Initiation.” Radhika and I leaned to feeling that Leadbeater was an absolute charlatan. There was talk about the Ootacamund experience. Pupul and Nandini wanted to call a doctor, but Krishnaji refused. He said, “Both of you have had children. You can’t stop the baby from being born." Pupul said that when she had returned to Bombay, on three nights running, she had gone to bed and felt death enclosing her as though in birth, and her body had fought back. It never came again. She also described the conversation in Asit's flat in Bombay a few years ago when EXIT, the British society for suitable suicide, came up, and Nandini wouldn't speak of it, rather emotionally.'

'Krishnaji had then gone on about "cleansing" the apartment of a presence. He then spoke of what he had done on the walk in the afternoon. He said he does and says certain things that he never was taught but has come upon it by himself. He spoke of cleansing the room in the hospital at Cedars-Sinai when we went there for his operation. He said someone had died in that room. I and he felt it, and he acted on it. He said he does things to the car before a long trip like Madras to Rishi Valley. He asked Pupul if she knew a "real mantra," and she and Radhika spoke of a mandala, which means a protected space. Krishnaji spoke of violence in the villages, animal sacrifices. What seems to make this killing of animals more dark than the usual widespread killing for food, etcetera is that this is done for religious ends. Radhika said that she uses what she calls "alertness" as a protection. Krishnaji said he would have difficulty in walking from here, the old guest house, to her house in the dark.'

'Once in Ashdown Forest'—that's in England—'he had a bad time at night. When he had been speaking of his young days, there came into the room that curious atmosphere that so many times has seemed to appear when something innately concerned with him and his origins is discussed. "Do you feel the atmosphere?" he asked. Even Radhika said that she felt it, but when we began to speak of evil, it vanished, and instantly Krishnaji spotted it. He said that to speak of evil invites it. That good attracts evil, that one shouldn't discuss evil in a room but out of doors, and not at night. He said he has never discussed what he does to dispel evil but asked Radhika if she would want to know, bearing in mind that there is danger in it. She backed away, and said she wouldn't ask. This morning, I asked him if the same offer was open to me. He thought for a moment and said, "No." I asked if it was offered to Radhika because she must protect this place. "Yes," and that I would want it only to protect him, and something larger is protecting him. One cannot protect oneself. He said also that I am not always sufficiently, deeply attentive, and therefore it would be dangerous for me to know these things. That is something I must ponder. He said I must not get mixed up in these things. I said I was not interested in occult things, was not afraid. But he said the danger would be "if it gets into my mind without my realizing it," so we left it at that. But he said that last night he had gone around and cleansed this whole house. The real protection is to be without anger, antagonism, envy, hatred, and self.'

See, these things—

S: Are wonderful.

M: Yes, and they would be lost if I hadn't kept this account.

S: I know, I know—and if you weren't reading them out now. [Both chuckle.]

M: December twenty-fourth. ‘Later yesterday we took what was planned as a long walk. Krishnaji is still exhilarated by having been able to walk to the mouth of the valley the other day, and seems rather pleased, as a child might, with his powers. So Dorothy was invited. “Can you stand a long walk?” she was asked, which arouses her mettle and also her wish not to be regarded by Krishnaji as old and enfeebled. Rita and Grohe, both long-distance walkers, Narayan, Radhika, and I went. The plan was the Tetu Road to where another branches to the right and joins the main road to the valley, if one can call it that. Passing the horrid temple, Krishnaji walked purposely, with a dominating stride around it, and told me later, “I have pulled its sting.” We turned right, where a wide road appears. The school van met us, but Krishnaji wanted to go on, so we walked as far as the village on the main road. He didn’t want to walk through that, so we all came back in the van. About his meeting with Mr. Naidu and his children, he told me that he had said to them, “Don’t hang onto it,” (the mother’s death) “finish with it.” This afternoon, we walked to look at a site where Grohe is going to build two cottages, one for his own use, and for a study ashram. He is enthusiastic about Rishi Valley. As a detail, he has just bought ten bicycles for the school. On the way back, we ran into Merali, who arrived a week ago but has been ill and invisible. This is Christmas Eve, and I had supper on trays with Krishnaji. Dr. Parchure came and gave his nightly massage to the swelling in my leg. Now, I can hear the students singing carols. “Oh Come All Ye Faithful” is energetically coming through the Indian night.’ [S chuckles.] ‘The stars are diamond bright and very close.’

The twenty-fifth. ‘I had breakfast alone with Krishnaji, and went to the teacher’s midmorning tea break. I called on Parameshwaran’s wife and packed. Dr. Parchure has diagnosed parasites.’ I guess I had parasites. ‘I walked with Krishnaji in the late afternoon, and had supper with him on trays.’ That was Christmas and Rishi Valley.

M: Boxing Day, the twenty-sixth. 'I was up in time to leave at 4 a.m. with Krishnaji, Narayan, and Dr. Parchure in the usual Santhanam car. I felt carsick and had to stop and vomit somewhere or other on the dark road. I felt prostrate in the car trying to hold off nausea while Krishnaji all the way put his hands to help me. We arrived at Vasanta Vihar by 8:30 a.m., and I went right to bed. I slept and stayed in the room all day, though I felt better and able to unpack in the afternoon and put everything in order. Dr. Parchure gave me parasite pills to take for three days. Dorothy, Rita, Grohe, Dominique, and Yen Yang came in the school bus. The air conditioner I urged for Dorothy's room is making a big difference for her.' Dominique and Yen Yang were from Brockwood.

December twenty-seventh. 'I felt better and got up, and went shopping with Rita and Dorothy to buy books for Krishnaji. Then slept in the afternoon and walked on the beach off Radha's house in the late afternoon with Krishnaji, Pama, and Grohe. In the night, I decided not to stay in India till Krishnaji goes to Bombay but to go with Dorothy and Rita on January thirteen/fourteen. My spirits lightened. I've had enough of India. I am weary of the difficult food, the weather, the sights, the sounds, the tastes, and the smells. Nothing seems clean to any of the senses. Even the sea, the rolling surf off the Bay of Bengal, smells polluted to me. There seems no freshness in nature. Everything seems smeared with human insensitivity, soiled. The sight of an old woman sweeping in the filthy streets with bare hands sickens me. So does the tolerance of it all. I cannot imagine wanting to stay alive in the conditions of life that millions and millions endure in this part of the world, and I am past the human capacity, if I ever had it, to do anything but shrink from all this. So I will flee to my infinitely cleaner, luckier, safety of life where atomic annihilation is as likely, but meanwhile, clean, sweet smelling fields, bed, house, food, and air is possible. Will I ever not wonder, as I have since childhood, why I have been so lucky, so blessed, really? And the supreme blessing is Krishnaji. How have I been allowed that?' It's true; ever since I was a child, I thought, "Why am I so lucky?"

S: Yes. Your have often said that to me.

M: Why have I got a clean bed to sleep in and enough food and beautiful things around me? I always felt that I'd have to pay for it some day, that life would even things out.

The twenty-eighth of December: 'I went with Rita to Lufthansa, where I changed my ticket to fly out of Bombay early on the fourteenth, leaving here on Indian Airlines on Sunday the thirteenth. It rained in the afternoon, but between showers, I went with Krishnaji, Pama, and Grohe to the beach for our walk, as usual. Krishnaji's optimism that the showers let up for the walk was correct. In the evening, news began of the counting of the election. Rajiv Gandhi is winning in a landslide.'

December the twenty-ninth. 'It is Sunanda's birthday, and I have given her a cotton sari she admired. The day was quiet and reasonably sunny, but just before 5:30 p.m., as we all sat in the garden waiting for Krishnaji's public talk, a heavy shower suddenly plunged down. Krishnaji had not come out, luckily; but when he eventually did, he gave a strong, hard-hitting talk. The first of the Madras four. He came to the supper table later but scared me a bit by going out on the street for a walk by himself right after the talk. Luckily, Narayan saw him and caught up with him.'

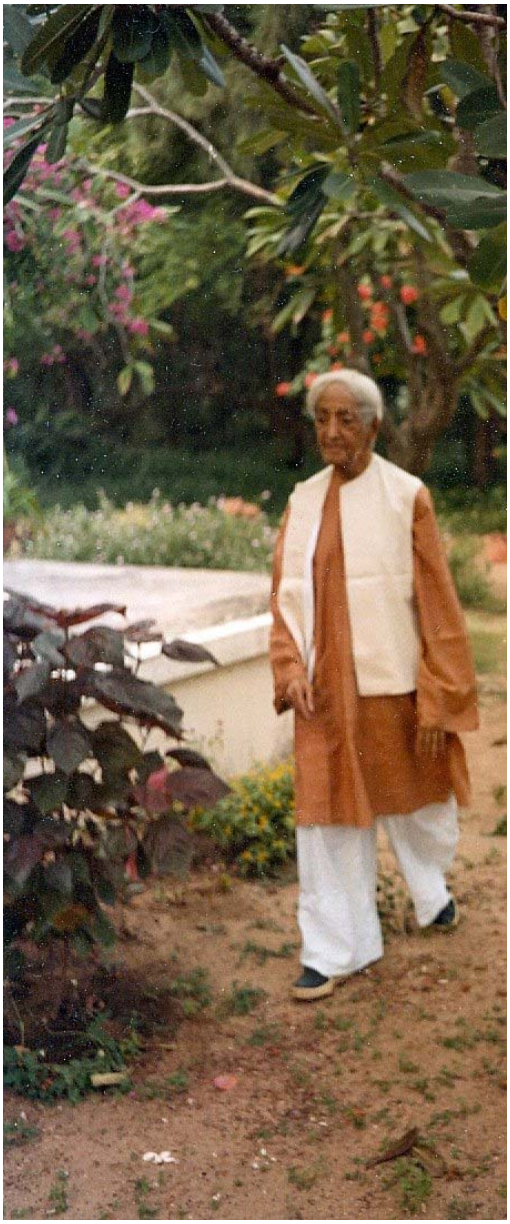
The thirtieth of December. 'Again, the day was quiet for the second talk, which Krishnaji was due to give at 5:30 p.m. The day had been damp as always, but reasonably sunny. Then at 5:30 p.m., this time, just after Krishnaji had sat upon the platform, rain began and then increased and then poured. The sky showed no hope of clearing and everyone was drenched. I had to change completely, and then went up to find Krishnaji in bed with a warm blanket and a hot water bottle. He had been intending to change into dry clothes and go back to give his talk, but Dr. Parchure had pointed out that the audience was soaked and would have had to sit in pools of water on the tarmac. So Krishnaji agreed to a cancellation. Many of us sat in the big hall and talked until suppertime, when Krishnaji came down and we went to eat.'

December thirty-first. 'I asked Krishnaji if his meditation has come to him here in India. He shook his head and said, "Too busy. One must be quiet for it to come." There were showers on and off all day. All very unusual for this time of year, say the local people. I did letters. We were able to walk on the beach, though, Krishnaji, Radha, Pama, Grohe, and I. At 7 p.m., Grohe went off to the airport to fly back to Switzerland. He spent a long time talking to me about building in Rishi Valley and at Brockwood. He thinks it is "bon marché" to build in Rishi Valley, so he is financing two bungalows, one for his own use when he is there and one for Krishnaji, even though Krishnaji says he prefers the old quarters. And the balance needed to build an "ashram" or study. He seems to think I can expedite having all this done by next year. I went with Prema and him Saturday to see a local architect's work, and also another house. But I had to point out that this is India's project and I would be intruding. He is curiously impractical.

I recognize that I have other people's efforts and concern lavished on me right now, but I do not expect it or contrive at it, and take nothing for granted. So this year is ending tonight, with hardly a mark of its passing. It is just a night. I have said goodnight to Krishnaji and say only to myself how extraordinary is the grace and wonder of another year with him.' Signed thirty-one December, 1984, Madras.

Issue 83: January 1, 1985 to April 19, 1985



Mary ends what is to be her last trip to India, and about a month later, Krishnaji joins her in Ojai. They have some rest, and then fly to New York for his second talk at the U.N. and to Washington D.C. for first talk there. Both Mary and Krishnaji appear in good health.

Mary: We begin our discussion today with January first, 1985, and we're in Madras. 'I went up early to start the day and the year with Krishnaji. A stubborn and determined rain gave no possibility of having the 7:30 a.m. question-and-answer meeting in the garden as usual, so everything took place in the big hall here at Vasanta Vihar. People kept piling in. Indians can fold themselves down into a few square inches of floor' [both chuckle]. 'Krishnaji spoke wonderfully with power, authority, and what was called "a presence." The later morning was consumed for me by Harsh, who, was is from Brockwood and after an unsatisfactory talk with Brian Jenkins, wanted to go round and round about Brockwood's problems.' Brian Jenkins must also have been in Madras at the time. 'I found a sticking point in him: Krishnaji's having asked him at some point during the wear and tear of last June whether he could handle the principalship of Brockwood Park if Dorothy left. It was only a question, not an appointment or a promise of one, but Harsh has fastened onto it. I told him that I had no idea if this was to be but suggested he act and think in terms of what is best for Brockwood as things arise, deal as rightly and as clearly as he can, and not hinge his thinking on something else. He had just talked to Brian Jenkins, who refuses to answer a letter from the four—Harsh, Ingrid, Stephen, and Ray—sent him regarding his cooperation at Brockwood during the remainder of the school year. I don't want to list here all the ins and outs of these interminable problems, but the implication of the letter was that his returning to Brockwood hinged on some cooperative agreement. Brian wouldn't give this and went directly to Dorothy, who is also here from Brockwood. He then asked to see me after lunch, and told me that the letter was inaccurate, and that he thinks he will resign from the staff. I told him I thought he should, since he and his new wife are starting a new life anyway, and his dissatisfaction with Brockwood was not bringing about the harmony that is necessary. He asked me to tell Krishnaji. He then went and spoke to Dorothy and Harsh, who happened to be talking together anyway, and said he was resigning. How nice if this settled everything, but possibly it won't. The Jenkinses return to England next week and Harsh, Claire, and Annand leave here tomorrow. Professor Sudarshan brought the Maharajah of Trevancore and wife to lunch. Krishnaji, Pama, and I went to Radha's, and she walked on the beach with us.' That was the first of the year.

Scott: [chuckles] What a way to begin the year.

M: Yes, yes. [S chuckles.] All the problems were seething around. [Chuckles.]

January second. 'Ninety-six-year-old Madahvachari came to lunch. I remember him as a tall man, but he has shrunk. He seems to have outlived his faculties and his villainy.'

Krishnaji in Madras in 1984 (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: [chuckles] That's quite an accomplishment.

M: 'Beyond some age, one is no longer accountable (apparently) for one's sins, but both Achyutji, who sat as far from him at the table as he could, and I remember that he betrayed Krishnaji to Rajagopal. Krishnaji was amiable to him and invited him to come again. But later coming back in the car from the beach walk, Krishnaji said how dreadful it is to live like that. I asked what choice Madahvachari had, and Krishnaji said he should "take a pill."' [S chuckles.] 'What pill can one get? I pointed out.' [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji seems to think that these lethal pills are available, so we muttered about ways of suicide all the way back to Vasanta Vihar. Krishnaji thinks a gun is too messy for the survivors, as is wrist cutting.' [Both chuckle].

S: None of these, of course, would he actually endorse, but…

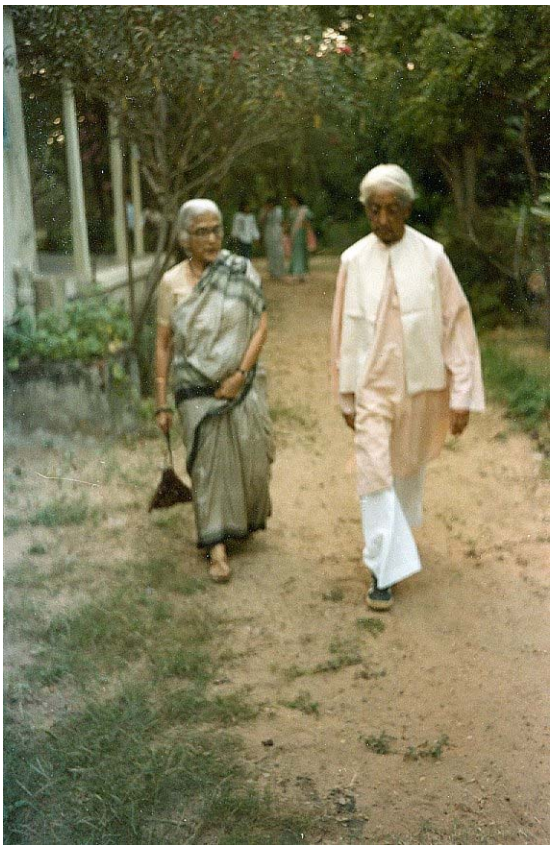
M: No. No.

S: …but he likes playing with ideas, yes.

M: 'A pill and the plastic bag over the head that one hears of seemed the least offensive. These are the topics of conversation in our day, or is it of our age?' [Both chuckle.] 'On par with "Should one move to a better climate?" or "Where to go next winter?"' [Both chuckle.] 'Malini brought the tailor to refit all the tunics I ordered in November.'

The third of January. 'Heavy rains made Krishnaji's second question-and-answer meeting impossible in the garden, so again it was held in the Vasanta Vihar hall. Later I went with Sunanda and Parchure to look at two available halls for the talks if the rains continue. Both were dismal.' [Chuckles.] 'I slipped on the stone steps but only bruised my hands and hip. At 6:15 p.m. Lakshmi Shankar sang in Vasanta Vihar Hall—sad longing devotional songs.' She sang beautifully.

S: Yes, she did.

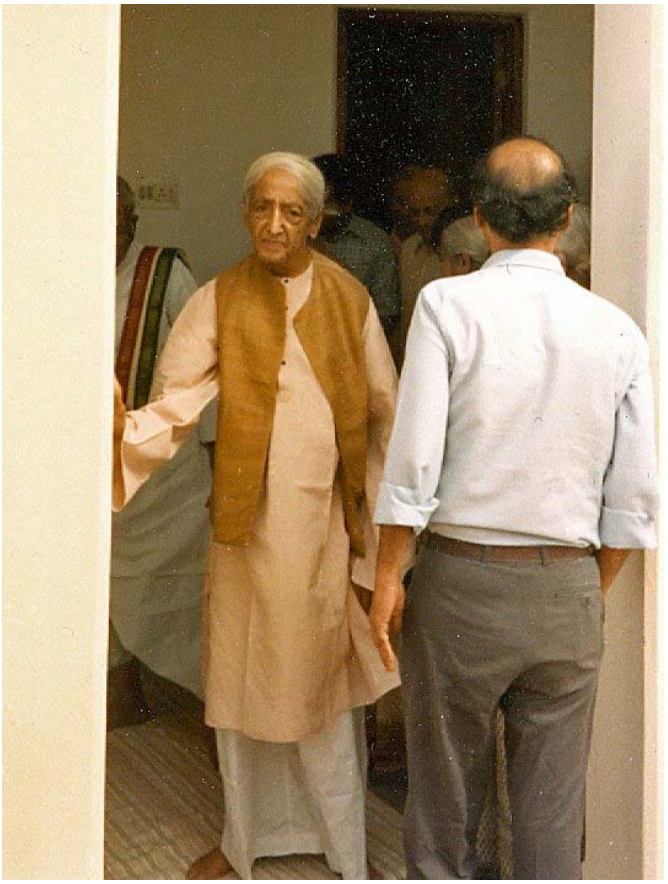


M: January fourth. 'There were showers on and off. I went to cash travel checks so I could give Dr. Parchure cash for fixing his cottage at Rajghat, and got some books for Krishnaji. To Krishnaji's discomfort the rain held, so he gave the extra talk he agreed to give tonight, to replace the one that was rained out last Sunday, in the less crummy of the two halls, but crummy it was. It was a wedding place. And though he gave a good talk, it tired him because of the place. It was announced that the talks tomorrow and Sunday will be held at Vasanta Vihar and canceled if it rains. The drive past the slums along the beach disturbed him, as well they might. These sights make me want to never come to India again.'

S: Yes.

M: The next day. 'At 5:30 p.m. in clear weather, Krishnaji gave his third Madras talk in the Vasanta Vihar garden. Radhika, the Thomases, Vatsala Parchure, and others arrived for the talks from Rishi Valley in the school van. After the talk, I dined at Prema's along with Sunanda, Radhika, Rebecca Thomas, Dorothy, Rita, Ahalya, and Malini, who at last had my new kurtas from her tailor. These were ordered in early November. Prema's dinner was delicious, and the first enjoyable meal I have eaten in India.' I'm clearly really fed up with India.

S: Well, it's very hard to be there.



M: The sixth. 'Pupul arrived in the afternoon. At 5:30 p.m. Krishnaji's fourth Madras talk in Vasanta Vihar garden. Very fine.'

January seventh. ‘At 10 a.m., there was a KFI trustee meeting held upstairs. Asit arrived for it, and Dorothy, I, and Dr. Adikaram were invited.’ He was the head of the Sri Lankan Krishnamurti world, and a nice man. ‘I sat feeling that talk of more schools was mad. The shortage of teachers is constant. So is money. And most of all, the energy of those who do come for Krishnaji’s teachings is siphoned off into academics or supporting academics and the feeling for the teachings, the essential of what should concern us, is spread too thin. I said as much, but Pupul disagreed. She thinks there should be as many schools “as the ground of different human beings.” It seems to me we are all, for the most part, occupied with simply progressive, but usual, schools. On the beach walk, the India film people who were in Rishi Valley and are doing a documentary on Krishnaji were there to record his walk and also photographed him. When we got back, a seventeen-year-old musician, Ravi Kiran, played a rare instrument called gottuvadyam. It is said to be very hard to play. It is veena-like but without struts, and has twenty-one strings. The boy came with his father and younger brother and sister. At the end, when Krishnaji approached to thank them and present the usual garland, which Sunanda had waiting, the father and then the boy and then the younger ones prostrated themselves in the old total way: flat out, whole body and arms outstretched, touching Krishnaji’s feet, at which Krishnaji put his hands on either side of the prostrate head. It was, to me, very moving. The instant and intense fervor of it. Krishnaji was touched by it. “They are real Brahmins,” he said. This was the real, ancient prostration, the way he and Nitya prostrated themselves to their father when they came back after the years in Europe. I think Krishnaji was more impressed by the actions of the children and father than by the playing, but it had lasted one and a half hours, and it was by this time 8 o'clock, and he had had no supper and has been working, i.e., talking, for four straight days, plus a morning of KFI meeting. All much too much, and he is very tired.'

The eighth. 'Rita left for Goa. I took Dorothy to town on errands and sent flowers to people. Krishnaji is tired and spent the whole day resting in his room, reading, and sleeping. At 4:30 p.m. the rest of us went to the school in Damodar Gardens. Pupul spoke to the older students. There was tree planting, tea, and seeing children's exhibits.'

S: Just for the record, Damodar Gardens was part of the Theosophical Society compound, but it was where the Krishnamurti Foundation of India Madras school was located.

M: Yes.

January ninth. 'At 9:30 a.m. there was a seminar in the Vasanta Vihar hall with Krishnaji, Pupul, Achyut, Sudarshan, Radha Burnier, and four scientists. The scientists were not versed in Krishnaji's teachings, so most of the time went into defining terms and concepts, like self-knowledge being limited, brain, mind, time, etcetera. I doubt this sort of discussion is stimulating to Krishnaji, because it doesn't get beyond his having to sort out and explain basics, and doesn't go with him to explore new areas. Earlier, Krishnaji had said to me that there is so much division in the KFI that he's not going to interfere.

“Let them run it,” he said. I pointed out that this means a dictatorship by Pupul, and that he is perceived as being afraid of her. He finds her much more assertive these days. A case in point is Dr. Hiralal: Pupul is for him. Krishnaji doubts he is the right person to be a member of KFI. At 4 p.m. I went with Sunanda and Dorothy to tea at Ahalya’s in Besant House in the Theosophical Society compound. It is a nice, old-fashioned colonial-style building with verandas all around. After tea, Ahalya dropped me at Radha’s, where Krishnaji came for a beach walk. Before supper, Pupul showed Krishnaji, Sunanda, and me a letter found among Shiva Rao’s papers sent by Murli Rao, who had custody of them. The note is possibly in Krishnaji’s handwriting, though Krishnaji is not sure after looking at it. It is dated London, 10 October 1925, and purports to be from Maha Chohan to Krishnaji, though Krishnaji’s name is not specified, commending him for his work. Krishnaji has no recollection of it, and has no explanation to offer, though he said at one point that Leadbeater had invented the current concepts of the Masters. Pupul is spending Friday in the Theosophical Society archives with Radha. Pupul says there are some remarkable photographs there. I wondered if I could go with Pupul, but she said Radha is cagey about showing things. Pupul said she would share copies of anything she got. After supper, Dr. Parchure brought welcome reports that Krishnaji and I are now both free of parasites, but Krishnaji’s postprandial blood sugar is up to 175 since he stopped taking Rastinon medication. He must resume taking half a tablet a day, and then can eat any fruit he chooses.’

The tenth: ‘There was the second meeting at 9:30 a.m. of the two-day seminar. It went a little better. In the afternoon Krishnaji met Major Rakesh Sharma, the Indian astronaut who participated in a Russian space mission. He talked with him almost an hour, liked him, and invited him to come on the beach walk along with Radha, Dorothy, Pama, and me. Krishnaji had me walk and talk to Sharma. A very nice, intelligent, and easy-to-talk-to man. Likable.’

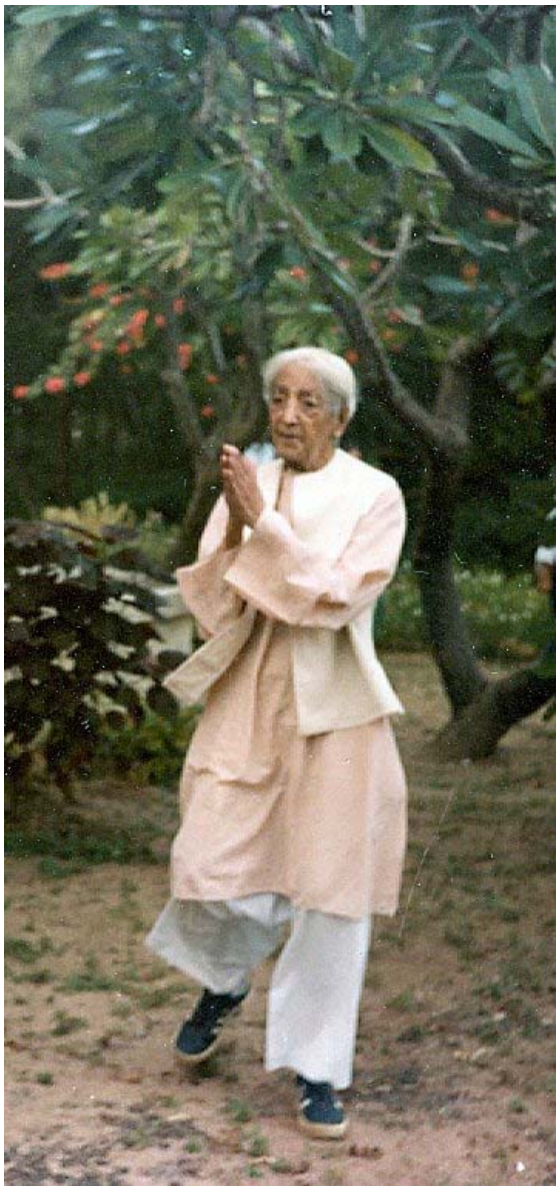
S: Yes, I met him.

M: You probably did.

S: But I wasn’t there that year, so I must have met him the next year, but I do remember him.

M: ‘Pandit Jagannath Upadhyaya arrived.’

The eleventh: ‘A large group left at 7 a.m. to go see Palamaner, and they got back at 10 p.m. I stayed here. Hours of sitting in a car and sun with the prospects of sitting in an aircraft ahead would not be the best thing for my leg, and I had no wish to go anyway. Krishnaji, Pupul, Sunanda, and Pandit Jagannath Upadhyaya, who arrived last night, and I had lunch. Krishnaji rested most of the day. I packed slowly. Krishnaji and I walked on the beach.’



S: I remember I was there the year that the offer for the Palamaner land was first made, and it was very contested in the KFI.

M: Yes. I'm now doing this from memory, I may be wrong—but wasn't the nice man who did the second school in Bangalore—wasn't there talk of him doing the school in Palamaner, but it didn't happen?

S: That I can't remember, but it was the politics behind the offer that was so interesting. Apparently there was a huge tract of land, but the family that supposedly owned it, their ownership was contested. It wasn't completely solid or correct or something.

M: Yes, that sounds right, now that I hear this.

S: So they came up with the idea that they were going to donate some several hundred acres to the Krishnamurti Foundation of India, because if the gift was accepted as legal…

Krishnaji in Madras in 1984 (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

M: That verified that they own it.

S: Exactly, that verifies that they own the land. I can remember the debate in the KFI meetings—I was in them for some reason—it was adamant between the opposing groups. 'No, we shouldn't take it,' 'Yes, we should,' and it was very, very interesting.

M: Yes, now that you told me all this, I've obviously heard it. But I don't remember it very well. [Chuckles.] Except that it was always shadowy off there and nothing ever happened that I knew of.

S: Yes, yes. It was always shadowy, but apparently it was a very beautiful place, though absolutely out in the middle of nowhere. It would have made Rishi Valley look like it was in the hub of a metropolis. This was really out in the wilderness.

M: There was a waterfall—

S: Yes, the land had a waterfall, a year-round waterfall, which is something.

M: That's what I remember of it. I wonder what happened to it afterward?

S: I have no idea, that's why I was asking you. [Both chuckle.] And Krishnaji was rather for it.

M: Well, Krishnaji…"Take it. Buy it. Get it," was Krishnaji's approach to land.

S: [both laughing] Yes, yes. He liked land.

M: Yes. He liked land. [Both chuckle.]

January twelfth. 'At 9:30 a.m. Krishnaji held a discussion in the hall with Upadhyaya, Pupul, Radha, Achyutji, and most others were onlookers. The long-winded Hindi of Upadhyaya and its translation, which often turned out to be, "The Buddha says etcetera, etcetera, etcetera" makes a fair amount of tedium. Krishnaji kept wordlessly catching my eye, and eventually he told Upadhyaya to leave aside what the Buddha said and say what he himself thought. Major Sharma was at lunch and Krishnaji put him through quite a questioning. Was he a Brahmin? Yes. With that background, what did he feel about being in the Air Force? Sharma said it troubled him. That he had not killed anyone, and did not intend to, but when he was seventeen years old, all he thought of was flying one of those marvelous machines without measuring the implications he now sees. Krishnaji was cooking him a bit.' [S chuckles.] 'In late afternoon, Krishnaji, Radhika, who went to Palamaner yesterday and came here afterward, Radha, and I walked on the beach. For me it was the last walk. I am leaving tomorrow, and will put this depressing place away. Malini came by to say goodbye to me in the evening.' Gosh, I was hypercritical of everything.

S: Well, not without reason. [Chuckles.]

M: Well, I don't know.

January thirteen. 'Krishnaji has worn my rings and rudraksha on the chain for two nights and gave them back to me this morning after walking to the window with them.' I don't know what that has to do with. Well, that's what it says. This must be explained for those who don't know.

Krishnaji in Madras in 1984 (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

S: Yes.

M: He did something, magnetized, I believe the word is, jewelry. He did it for Mary Lutyens's ring, and he'd done it for other people in the past, and so he took the things that I wear, which were just listed, to do this mysterious thing to them before I left with them. It was considered protective.

S: Yes. Now for those who don't understand what magnetized means…

M: You say.

S: Well, it's as if he would put some kind of energy into them.

M: Yes.

S: And the energy was a positive, protective kind of energy.

M: Yes.

S: And he felt that this would protect the wearer.

M: Yes. Mary Lutyens always swore, because he would wear her ring over lunch at Fortnum's, that afterward the ring had extra luster and shone in a far greater way than before.

S: But originally, she had been kind of skeptically looking at this and doubting her perceptions…

M: But what she thought she saw was confirmed when a grandchild of hers said to her, "Oh you've had your ring cleaned!"

S: Yes.

M: Spontaneously the grandchild said that, but it was just that Krishnaji had worn it over lunch at Fortnum's. So Mary believed what she thought she had always seen. [Chuckles.] Anyway. 'It is painful to leave Krishnaji as always. He and I spoke briefly, then Dorothy and I left at 9:30 a.m., just before Krishnaji was to hold another discussion with Upadhyaya, and the others. Everyone was on the veranda to say goodbye, Krishnaji folding his hands in what, to me, was a blessing. Pama came with us to the airport, which was a help in the steaming confusion of crowds and luggage. Dorothy and I landed in Bombay at 1 p.m. and were met by a Lufthansa woman who took us and our luggage to the Centaur Hotel in the airport where Lufthansa had provided each of us with a free room in which to rest until our midnight check-in. Rita, who has been in Goa for three days, arrived around 5 p.m. Then came Bakul and Devi, bringing home-cooked things.' That's Nandini's daughter, Devi Mangaldas. 'Nandini was unable to come because of a reaction to taking penicillin. I spoke to her on the telephone. Five of us ate in the room I had, ordering some things from room service, too. Then they left and I slept till awakened at 11:45 p.m. We went at midnight to the international air terminal where Dorothy, Rita, and I took a 2 a.m. Lufthansa flight out of India. I was still on first-class tickets and had the best forward seat with no one next to me. I was able to sleep on and off.'

The fourteenth of January. 'We landed at Frankfurt at 7 a.m. I am out of India, and back in Europe in a huge gray airport. Rita led the way to where we waited for an 8:15 a.m. flight to Heathrow. Lufthansa gave us two breakfasts. Real coffee, croissants, and French confiture seemed tremendous treats.' [S chuckles.] 'Then around 11 a.m. there was England in snow—a charcoal drawing landscape, Northern, utterly un-tropical, and wonderful. With only a silk shirt and cardigan, I welcomed the cold as one might reach toward sunlight.' [Both chuckle.] 'Guy and Montague met and then took Dorothy to Brockwood, and Harsh, with my duffel coat and his car, drove me there. All is snow!' That was wonderful for me.

S: [chuckles] Yes.

M: 'The driveway, everything is white. The students have built a huge snowman. My room is warm through two heaters. The melting comfort of a bath, getting completely clean, and then eating salad and finally one's own linen-sheeted bed was overwhelming.' [Both chuckle.] You can see that—

S: You were glad to be there.

M: The spoiled Western point of view. [Both laugh.] 'I telephoned Amanda, Erna, Bud, also Mary Links. All are well, but Bud and Lisa are about to go to California, then India for the museum—all out of step with my moves, so it is unlikely we will meet till later.' I remember the delight of snowflakes on my face.

S: Yes, yes.

M: That was wonderful.

S: Well, it is a delight. But it's especially a delight after being in a tropical place.

M: It is. Exactly. [Chuckles.]

January fifteenth: 'I slept deeply and well, and feel physically back in balance. Food and air and their cleanliness. The cold is healing. I had a slow, relaxed, quiet breakfast after doing exercises and washing my hair. The quiet of our little kitchen, and cleaning the toaster and kettle, were a pleasure. I talked to Mary Cadogan at some length, also Betsy, and later Phyl Fry. I went for a walk in the grove with snow falling on my face. Rabbit tracks were everywhere. The snow was crisp, and carpets everything. The leaves of the rhododendron are curled in the cold. The handkerchief tree is bare and sleeping.'

Now I realize there's going to be a vast gap in my entries in the big diary because I can see that the next entry in it is April eighth, and we're only in January. Well, you see, when Krishnaji wasn't there, I didn't write.

S: Yes, but Krishnaji came back before that.

M: Well, he did but…well, anyway, we'll see.

January sixteenth. 'I went with Scott to catch the Petersfield 8:01 a.m. train to London. Once there, I went my own way by tube to Harrods. Then to have my hair cut. I lunched with Mary and Joe at Hyde Park Street.' That's their flat. 'I came back on the 4:20 p.m. train and ran into Scott, who had been on the same train. So we got back to Brockwood together. I had supper alone upstairs.'

The seventeenth: 'I went to the morning meeting and to a meeting of the five.' Who was the five by now?

S: Ingrid, Harsh, Stephen, Ray, and Dorothy.

M: Ah, yes. 'In the afternoon I went to Alresford with Dorothy to do errands, including booking my flight to Los Angeles on the twenty-sixth. Bud telephoned. They go to California this weekend and to India in early February.'

January eighteenth. 'I went to the morning meeting. Six inches of snow have fallen here. I walked at noon with Scott around the grove and fields. Everything is white and beautiful. I cabled Krishnaji the date of my flight to California and spoke to Erna.'

The nineteenth. 'Dorothy drove me to Petersfield where I took the 9:46 a.m. to London, went to the Tate Gallery, lunched with Betsy at her flat, then took the train back to Petersfield and by taxi to Brockwood. I talked to Diane Maroger, who has had two leg fractures since October. Daphne'—that's her sister—'is married.'

There is nothing the next day, but on January twenty-first, 'Scott drove me to the Petersfield station. I took the 8:01 a.m. to London and went to TWA to fetch Krishnaji's and my tickets, then had a fitting of the tweed coat at Hilliard's. Met Adrian Spanier'—that's the decorator woman—'at the fabric wholesaler about curtains for my room in Brockwood. I went to a Chagall exhibition at the Royal Academy, then came back to Petersfield by taxi. The snow had been washed away by rain.'

The twenty-second of January. 'I attended the morning meeting. In mid-morning, I met Mary Cadogan at Petersfield, drove her back to Brockwood where we went over video matters, and then held a Saanen Gathering Committee meeting the rest of the day. Doris resigned from the Saanen Gathering Committee.'

The twenty-third. 'I slept late, and lunched with Kathy and Scott at the No Name Pub.' Oh, do you remember No Name Pub? It sort of disappeared from my life.

S: I'm sure it's still there.

M: Yes, I'm sure it is, but I haven't been in a long time. Of course, I haven't been in England in a long time. [chuckles] 'Later I had tea with them at their house.'

January twenty-fourth. 'I took the 8:01 a.m. train to London where I met Adrian Spanier about curtain fabric. We found one and I decided on it. Then I walked to HMV and bought compact discs for Krishnaji, fetched the new tweed coat at Hilliard's, and lunched with Mary L. at Fortnum's. Then at 3:30 p.m. I visited with Fleur at her apartment in the Albany.' She had tremendous taste, that woman. And they had a wonderful house in the country, a farmhouse, and I used to stay there with her. It was lovely. Anyway, 'I went by tube to Waterloo and so back to Brockwood. Talked with Christine and Gary after supper.'

January twenty-fifth. 'Most of the day for me was packing. Krishnaji went today from Madras to Bombay.'

January twenty-sixth: 'I attended the morning meeting, then left Brockwood at 9 a.m. with Scott driving me to Heathrow. He and Rita saw me off on TWA flight 761, departure at 11:30 a.m. I arrived in Los Angeles at 2:05 p.m. Vivian Moody met me and drove me to Ojai. The house is clean and lovely. I cabled Krishnaji of my safe arrival.'

There's nothing the next day, but on the twenty-eighth, 'I went on an early walk with Erna. A letter arrived from Krishnaji sent from Madras on the nineteenth. I worked most of the day at my desk. My brother telephoned. They are back from California and leave soon for India for the Cooper Hewitt Museum's hosting of the Festival of India.' Pupul had arranged to have the Festival of India exhibition in Lisa's Cooper-Hewitt Museum. I don't know if it will be in this, but eventually the museum had created a lot of things for the festival, and Pupul never gave them back. [S chuckles.] For instance, Lisa got all sorts of designers who designed clothes and fabrics and furniture, and had them made in India. Bud and Lisa had gone to India to supervise the making of these things, all for this wonderful exhibition. But then these things traveled around and the museum never got them back. [Both chuckle.] Anyway, that's as it was.

The next day. 'I had another early walk. Electricians came for more light on the path here and an extra doorbell. Erna came by. The green Mercedes battery is dead. Dieter'—that's the garage man—'delivered a new one and the diesel had its 25,000-mile service. I drove him back to the garage and marketed.'

The thirtieth: 'I went to Los Angeles in KMN1'—that's the green car—'and Lailee's for the annual medical exam. She said the valves in the vein in the leg are causing the edema, and gave me a diuretic. Lunch with Amanda and Phil in Malibu, then bought six tree roses at Green Thumb nursery in Ventura.'

The thirty-first. 'Another early walk. Later, I drove Erna to Cohen's office to discuss his meeting tomorrow with Rajagopal's lawyers. The electrician put in the walk lights. I went with Erna and Theo to dine with the Hookers at the Ranch House Restaurant.'

February first. 'Again an early walk. Erna came with me to the meeting about the case with Cohen and Avsham'—that's Rajagopal's lawyer—'at Cohen's office from 10 a.m. till almost noon.'

The most notable thing over the next two days is that Krishnaji's first two Bombay talks occurred. In fact, I don't think there is anything worth mentioning until February sixth, when Krishnaji's second letter arrived, written in Madras from January twentieth until the thirtieth, and Shakuntala, who was visiting from Brockwood, came to supper.

February seventh. 'Again, I had an early walk and spent most of the day at my desk. Friedrich came by. He's marrying Magda on Saturday and has bought a house in Ojai. Scott telephoned to say that the county had refused our permit to build a study center at Brockwood.'

February ninth: 'One inch of rain in the night. I worked at my desk most of the day. Friedrich and Magda are married in Santa Barbara, and Erna and Theo were their witnesses. Krishnaji gave this third talk in Bombay.'

The next day was Krishnaji's fourth Bombay talk. I'm trying to avoid the details.

S: No, don't.

M: All right, the eleventh of February: 'Early walk. It was a warm day, and I oiled the nandis.' In those days they were oiled, but I stopped doing that. They looked nicer gray. 'I left at 3 p.m. and bought a Cuisinart pot in Ventura and went on to the Dunnes'.' I mean, really, these details are so—

S: No, these are very important. [Both chuckle.]

M: Apologies to you, Robin.[1] I did try to stop him, but as usual, I have failed. [S laughs.] 'Talked to Philippa. Miranda and John came and all celebrated Phil's seventy-seventh birthday. I spent the night there.'

February twelfth: 'At 7 a.m. I telephoned Brockwood, but Krishnaji's plane was three-and-a-half hours late leaving Bombay, so he wasn't there yet. I had breakfast with Philippa and Amanda. We all saw a whale. Then I drove to town to see Miranda and John at their apartment on Holt Street. I had a long talk with John. Then, on my credit card, I rang Brockwood again and this time spoke to Krishnaji. His voice was clear as the mountain spring.' [Chuckles.] 'There was snow at Brockwood. Asit flew with him. I went to Tassell'—that's a designer—'and bought three things and also bought a Sony Walkman. Had my teeth cleaned. Drove back to Ojai. It is a blessing that Krishnaji is halfway home.'

The thirteenth: 'Birthday calls'—it was my birthday—'from my brother, Betsy, Rita Zampese, and Winky. I spent the day doing desk work and cleaning silver after an early walk. A letter from Pascaline Mallet saying that Gizelle Questiau died in a car accident. She had just become president of L'Association Culturelle Krishnamurti.' That's the Krishnamurti organization in France.

The fourteenth of February: 'The bedroom wing carpets were cleaned. I marketed and gave sixty-seven shares of the Senior Canyon Water to KFA.' I think I've explained that to you.

S: Yes, you have.

M: 'At 6 p.m. I went with the Lilliefelts to the Oak Grove School, saw the new building, and then attended a meeting of parents, teachers, and architects about the use of creosote in landscaping.'

S: Oh, yes, I remember that. This was another…[laughs]. Look at all the wood used in the Oak Grove School—the school buildings are all made of wood, the upper school and lower school, and all of the terraces, and the banisters. They're all made out of wood and, of course, to protect them, they are creosoted.

M: Is that a fire danger?

S: No, it's just that if a child gets a splinter of wood that is creosoted, it gets a little inflamed.

M: Oh. Oh, I never knew that.

S: So, this was thought of as being terribly unhealthy, etcetera, etcetera and that more organic oils or things should be used in case their children get splinters.

M: How do you know all this?

S: Yes, I don't know how these things always came to me.

M: Did they do that in England? Brockwood didn't have creosote anywhere, does it?

S: Oh, sure.

M: Really? Oh.

S: Yes. It was normal in those days. But I remember this incident and thinking I was so glad we didn't have any parents around. [Both laugh.]

M: That was always one of Brockwood's blessings because you never see parents. They are off in…

S: Yes. Exactly. Yes. They're scattered around the world, yes.

M: Yes. Asia, Africa, or wherever. [Both laugh.] Here, they're all sitting in Ojai.

S: Exactly. Finding things to criticize.

M: Yes. Or to tell us what to do with the school.

February fifteenth: ‘I drove to Malibu, saw Winky, and got books for Krishnaji, then drove on to Beverly Hills to get a fitting at Giselle’s’—that’s the place that made things for me. ‘I also bought cheese and houseplants before coming home.’

The next day was mostly ‘household preparation for Krishnaji’s arrival and marketing.’

February seventeenth: ‘Krishnaji’s TWA flight 761, which was due at 2:05 p.m., arrived at 2:56 p.m. I left Ojai at 10:30 a.m., lunched with Amanda and Phil, gave her a present of a blouse, and left there at 1:30 p.m. to find that a landslide had blocked the highway; so I had to go via Malibu Canyon and valley. I arrived at the airport in time. Krishnaji came out quickly, because of the wheelchair, with Asit and luggage. Krishnaji came with me, and Asit went with David and Jack. Krishnaji wanted to go the quiet way by the sea, so again, we came through Malibu Canyon and along the beach with the yellow flowers in bloom.’ He always liked those yellow flowers that bloomed near that big rock down there. ‘Krishnaji and I had supper alone.’

February eighteenth: ‘Krishnaji, Asit, and I had breakfast by the stove.’ That’s in the dining room. ‘Krishnaji talked to Erna, Theo, and me in the morning, and then he spent the rest of the day in bed with lunch on a tray. I went over to Arya Vihara. Shakuntala was there. Asit went out with Michael, so Krishnaji and I had supper on trays, and Krishnaji resumed his on-and-off all-day sleep.’

February nineteenth: ‘I had an early walk. Krishnaji got up when I went out, and unpacked the rest of his bag. He later came to lunch at Arya Vihara. Shakuntala was there before leaving for Brockwood. Krishnaji slept in the afternoon. I telephoned my brother on his sixty-first birthday. He and Lisa leave tomorrow for Paris and India, returning March fifteenth. Krishnaji and I had supper alone.’

February twentieth: ‘I had another early walk. Krishnaji stayed in bed all day after having breakfast in the dining room with Asit and me. He slept all morning and most of the afternoon.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji was up for lunch. In the afternoon, Erna, Theo, Asit, and I discussed Mary Cadogan’s suggestion to have other Foundations represented on the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust in England.’

The twenty-second of February: ‘Asit left for Singapore. Krishnaji slept a lot but got up for lunch and walked with the Lilliefelts and me in the afternoon.’

February twenty-third: ‘I worked at the desk and did house things. Keith Berwick and wife came to lunch at Arya Vihara. He then listened to the audiotape of one of Krishnaji’s Bombay talks. Krishnaji slept and read.’ Keith Berwick?

S: He was the one who did the “Revelation” program on TV.

M: Oh, yes. Yes. There’s really nothing of note for the next two days.

February twenty-sixth: ‘I went on a walk at 6:15 a.m. Later, at 10 a.m., Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I met Mr. Cohen at his office. We reviewed Rajagopal’s offer, then returned for lunch at Arya Vihara. I got a video membership at the video shop, and got a video movie for Krishnaji to look at.’

February twenty-seventh: ‘I went for the usual early walk. In the afternoon, I went to see Dr. Gary Deutsch, Mark Renneker’s friend in Santa Paula, about Krishnaji and I becoming his patients.’ [Chuckles.] ‘Krishnaji went for a walk to the dip with Theo.’

There is really nothing the next day, but on March first, ‘At 10 a.m. we began a KFA meeting that lasted all day. Krishnaji didn’t walk. Cohen wants to see us Monday about further progress in a settlement.’ If you’ll remember, this is a lawsuit that Rajagopal initiated against Krishnaji and the KFA. It was nonsense, but it used up time and money, which Rajagopal had in abundance.

The next day, ‘At 11 a.m. Krishnaji spoke to teachers. We lunched at Arya Vihara. After his rest, Krishnaji walked to the Lilliefelts’ and Theo drove him back.’

March third: ‘Max Falk came at 11 a.m. to speak with Krishnaji and me regarding his charges for building the high school. Krishnaji asked Erna to come after he had talked for a while. Max sees nothing wrong with his having charged the Foundation thirty-two percent. So we said goodbye.’ A contractor doesn’t get thirty-two percent.

S: Not usually.

M: And also he paid himself for having done some carpentry work, then he charged thirty-two percent on that so that he paid himself twice. ‘“That is the end of Max,” said Krishnaji. Krishnaji rested in the afternoon, then walked down to the Lilliefelts’ later.’ Max had been recommended to me about building this house by previous people for whom he’d built houses; and they said he was a wonderful contractor, and they made a lifelong friend. He took the job for this house without even signing a contract. Well, we signed one eventually, but, I mean, he went right to work.

S: Yes. And he was very nice. I wonder what happened to him.

M: I don’t know. The usual contractor’s price is, I forget what, twenty percent or something. But he took thirty-two percent, and said nothing—he thought it was okay.

The fourth of March: ‘Krishnaji, I, and the Lilliefelts went at 10 a.m. to see Mr. Cohen about further discussion between him and Rajagopal’s lawyer, Avsham. We agreed with what Cohen had said. Krishnaji gave me a durable power of attorney. We had lunch at Arya Vihara. Milton Friedman came.’ Milton Friedman was not the famous economist of the same name, but he was a man who lived in Washington and he did speechwriting for Gerald Ford or something. He was interested in Krishnaji, and we made him a trustee, eventually, but he never came to a meeting.

S: Oh. [Both chuckle.]

M: Anyway, he was the one who arranged for Krishnaji to talk in Washington, D. C.

S: Ah, yes. Right.

M: 'Lunch at Arya Vihara. Milton Friedman came. Krishnaji rested all afternoon.'

The next four days is mostly Krishnaji resting. He says he is tired and "washed out."

March ninth: 'At 11 a.m. Krishnaji held a discussion with the Oak Grove teachers. He was tired in the afternoon and slept. He walked to the Lilliefelts' and Theo drove him back.'

Then there isn't much for the next three days but Krishnaji resting and who came for lunch.

The thirteenth of March: 'Over lunch at Arya Vihara, there was talk of a TV film last night on child prodigies, and we talked of Krishnaji's childhood. Krishnaji wants to have me, Erna, and Theo question him on tape.'

S: Right.

M: The fourteenth. I am doing early walks all these days, but not mentioning it. 'I worked all day on income tax matters. Lunch at Arya Vihara included the Grohes. Krishnaji watched Topaz, an old film on video, in the afternoon. Then he met Theo and walked down Grand Avenue. After returning the video to the store, I picked them up near the bottom of Grand Avenue and drove them back. In the evening we watched a TV show of Sherlock Holmes.'

The fifteenth of March: 'At 10 a.m. Krishnaji talked with Erna, Theo, and me about his life, which we taped on cassette. Incorporating what he'd learned this winter from Pandit Upadhyaya. It is to be a private recording. Lunched at Arya Vihara. Typed income tax but didn't finish.'

S: Aha, that's right. That's the tape you have.

M: March sixteenth: 'At 11 a.m. Krishnaji held a meeting here with the Oak Grove School staff for a discussion. It went on till 1:30 p.m. During this, Scott, Harsh, and Ingrid all rang from Brockwood. Lunch at Arya Vihara. Marketed. At 4:30 p.m., Moody came to talk to Krishnaji and me about the school, the board, etcetera.'

The next day. 'At 11 a.m. there was a meeting of the new school board. Krishnaji attended. All lunched at Arya Vihara. We resumed the meeting after lunch until after 4 p.m. Krishnaji walked with Theo. My brother and Lisa returned to New York from Paris and India, and we talked in the evening.'

There's really nothing the next day. Then on the nineteenth, 'I spoke to Ingrid at Brockwood. She is not coming here after all. Then I drove to Studio City for a fitting on clothes from what was formerly Giselle, after which I drove on to Beverly Hills on errands. I had tea with Amanda and Phil on the way home. Krishnaji had talked to Mark Lee.'

The twentieth of March: 'At 9:30 a.m. David Moody came to talk to Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and me. Michael washed and put resin on the green car. I went to Green Thumb for roses, azaleas, and houseplants. Cohen received a text of a settlement agreement from Avsham.'

March twenty-first: 'We had an early lunch at noon. Then Krishnaji and I went to Doctor Deutsch in Santa Paula for Krishnaji's first meeting with him and an exam. Krishnaji's blood sugar, postprandial, was 85. My EKG is okay. "Lovely country," said Krishnaji on the drive back. Krishnaji walked with Theo.'

The twenty-second: 'Krishnaji and I left at 9 a.m. and drove via Malibu to Beverly Hills for eye exams by Doctor Fox. Both of us were mostly unchanged except Krishnaji, who has a bit of a cataract in his left eye and the beginning of one in the right eye, but neither interfere with his sight. We lunched with Evelyne Blau at her house—Japanese food. We bought croissants later and a clock for the kitchen. Home after 6 p.m.'

March twenty-third: 'Asit's book of photographs, A Thousand Moons: Krishnamurti at 85, arrived. It seemed very well done. At 11 a.m. Krishnaji talked to the teachers, lunched at Arya Vihara, then we had a quiet afternoon.'

The twenty-fourth of March: 'In the morning I worked at the desk and made lunch for Krishnaji, who is spending the day in bed. At noon, I went to the school and a meeting.' It doesn't say what kind of meeting.

March twenty-five: 'Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went to Cohen's office at 11 a.m. about the text of a settlement with Rajagopal. Radha Burnier was at lunch at Arya Vihara.'

The next day. 'Raman'—he was a cook at Brockwood—'arrived at Arya Vihara last night and came over in the morning to say hello. Radha was at lunch again. Afterward, I took her back to Krotona, where she is staying. I went to Ventura for vitamins.'

The twenty-seventh. 'There was rain, so I didn't do the early walk. Spent the morning working at my desk. We lunched at Arya Vihara, then rested. At 4 p.m. the actor Anthony Perkins came to see Krishnaji. Krishnaji walked to the Lilliefelts'. We had supper at 6:30 p.m. A new schedule.'

The next day. 'I worked most of the morning at the desk, apart from taking Krishnaji at 10 a.m. for a haircut here in Ojai. Evelyne telephoned about questions for tomorrow. Radha came to lunch at Arya Vihara.'

March twenty-ninth. ‘Chagall died yesterday. At 11 a.m. there was filming by Mendizza of Krishnaji in the living room answering questions put by me off-camera.’ I don’t remember that. ‘A physicist, Doctor Roger Jones, was at lunch at Arya Vihara. Radha was there, too. Krishnaji rested in the afternoon.’

The thirtieth. ‘I fetched our air tickets and marketed. At 11 a.m. Krishnaji talked to the staff of the Oak Grove School, then we lunched at Arya Vihara.’

There is nothing worth reporting for the next couple of days. Krishnaji is still resting but also still seeing people. The only thing to report is that on April second, ‘Krishnaji watched a TV program about organized religion and said, “We’ve lost.”’ [Both chuckle.] ‘Krishnaji talked with Moody and again with Rupert Oysler at 4 p.m. He says he is tired and his head is causing it.’

The third of April: ‘At 11 a.m. I took Krishnaji to speak to the Oak Grove School students while I did errands. I then met him at school. It was a beautiful warm day in the eighties. We lunched at Arya Vihara. Napped.’ I can’t believe all these naps.

Again, we can skip the next three days, until April eighth. ‘Yesterday Krishnaji and I got up at 4 a.m. Krishnaji had slept only three hours. We left Ojai early, David and Vivian Moody taking us to Los Angeles Airport in the school’s small van because of our three bags. Ojai was still exquisite, with that hushed edge of the first spring bursting into flower and the rose bush’s buds full, even on the new tree roses we have just added. All week long there has been the breath of jasmine by the front door and pools of scent on my back porch from the pittosporum. When we return in two weeks, orange blossoms should fill the rest of the valley. Krishnaji and I took an 8:30 a.m. TWA flight to New York. This time trying business class instead of first, but with bulkhead seats, so that my bad leg could be raised on it.’ I could prop it up on it, I mean. ‘We read and slept and reached New York by 4:30 p.m., taxied into town and to the Dorset Hotel, where we again have Suite 1507, which Krishnaji likes and is used to. We unpacked and had an uninspiring room service supper. Krishnaji, who had had little sleep before leaving yesterday, took half of the half-tablet of Halcion prescribed by our new Dr. Deutsch, i.e., one quarter of a tablet of .25 milligrams, and it gave him an excellent night’s sleep with no aftereffect. We were quiet all morning. Then we went to Il Nido, where we gave lunch to Narasimhan. Being Monday, it was quiet there and we had a very good lunch. First course: shredded real mozzarella’ [S chuckles] ‘and cold roasted peppers with basil leaves and capers. Main course: two kinds of spaghettini, i.e., one with tomato sauce and one with pesto. Arugula salad. Fresh raspberries for dessert. Krishnaji and I walked back’—you can’t say I don’t give you details [S chuckles]—‘to the hotel and rested. At 4 p.m., Indira and Chandra Mauli came to see Krishnaji at 4 p.m.’ Indira is his niece.

S: Krishnaji’s niece?

M: Yes, she’s the sister of Narayan, I think. And Chandra Mauli is her husband. ‘After they left, we walked to Doubleday for books and around the IBM building, where we both enjoyed the indoor hall with bamboo trees and large tubs of flowering plants.

Krishnaji appreciates the taste of it, and it increased his approval of IBM as a provider of excellence.' [Both laugh.] 'It was cold and we came back to supper again in our rooms. I spoke to my brother, who has returned from the Vineyard. Earlier I had spoken to Mister Roy at the U.N. and the video man there, Mr. Blotsky. We can only have one camera and a three-quarter-inch video on Thursday, but can use it as we please. We had supper in our rooms. I spoke with Philippa on the phone.'

April ninth: 'I scuttled up to the 57th Street health food store for miscellaneous. Then Krishnaji and I again went to Il Nido, where the Shainbergs lunched with us. Catherine De Segonzac and David are now married. Our meeting was friendly, though of late, too many reports of David speaking critically of Krishnaji have intervened and my taking him to task for it last year is a fact in the pot. But one felt he wanted to be friendly. She, less. They seem happy, though, and pleased to be married. Both have a tendency to jump to their own opinions without listening to what Krishnaji is saying. We walked back. Krishnaji and I stopped at the Belgian shoe place.' I've got on one pair of them this very minute. [S chuckles.] They're one of his pairs. 'That was enough of a walk for today. It is still cold in New York. We had supper in the rooms on the very limited vegetarian possibilities.'

April tenth. 'Krishnaji did not bring a beret and needs one in this cold; so I sallied out early. There was nothing at Saks, so I kept going down Madison Avenue and finally found one at a man's hat store at 42nd Street. Hurried back to the hotel for the arrival of Philippa at 11 a.m. She and I had a long talk until Krishnaji emerged to go to lunch. Krishnaji, she, and I went by taxi to Le Cirque Restaurant in the Mayfair Hotel, where Bud and Lisa met us. It turned out to be noisy, crowded, fashionable, a freak's place with overly-elaborate and carelessly cooked food. Krishnaji's eyes roamed the room.' [Chuckles.] 'Bud and Lisa told about their Indian trip. I charged the lunch on a credit card, wishing the amount had gone instead to Amnesty International for those starving in Ethiopia.' [S chuckles.] 'We walked back to the hotel, where Krishnaji took a nap and Philippa and I talked some more until she went off to a lute lesson. We had supper in the room. Krishnaji talked of his worry that the KFA will wind up, when we older ones are gone, in the hands of the current younger generation, which he does not want, especially as one has a wife he sees becoming a bull in a china shop.' [Chuckles.] 'He has the idea of bringing in someone from outside of the US who would "run things."' [S laughs.] 'He had a suggestion of who this person might be and he wanted me to call this person, and have this person come and discuss it. I suggested that Erna should be consulted. I called her and, predictably, she didn't take to the idea because she doesn't really like this person. We will talk it over later.'

April eleventh. 'Patricia Hunt-Perry came to the hotel at noon. Daisy followed, then Bud with his car, and we all drove with Krishnaji to the U.N. where he was to speak at 1:15 p.m., again at the invitation of the Pacem in Terris committee.' That's that organization within the UN. 'The requested topic was "Beyond the Fortieth Anniversary of the U.N.: The Future for Peace." A Mr. Mark Roy has succeeded Doctor Robert Muller as head of Pacem in Terris, and both were present, sitting on the platform on either side of Krishnaji when he finally spoke. Confusion seems endemic in the U.N., and the conference hall number four was still occupied by another meeting when we arrived, and Krishnaji had to wait. Bud, Daisy, and I found an empty conference room where he could at least be away from the confusion until about 1:30 p.m., when he was able to speak. Evelyne was up in a booth where it was videotaped, so we have a useful record of his eloquent talk and responses to questions afterward. The questions were dumb and obvious, but his answers had an air of greatness, an absolute authority of vision that made me smile way inside at that extraordinary and totally undimmed power. They gave him a small silver medal, which is their peace award. And we got out of there swiftly.' He forgot the peace award, left it on the table. [Chuckles.]

S: It was more than that—as he told me, anyway. When they gave it to him, he left it deliberately on the podium or wherever where he was speaking, so they rushed back afterward into some kind of an anteroom where he was and they gave it to him again there, so he left it there.

M: [chuckles] Did he?

S: [laughs] Yes. So then, eventually, they mailed it to him.

M: Oh, it doesn't say that here.

S: [laughs] But I remember Krishnaji telling me about this. He kept on trying to leave it behind and they…[laughs].

M: [chuckles] It only says here: 'We got out of there swiftly with Bud and Daisy and I went uptown to a late and quiet lunch at Bud's apartment. "No more U.N. That's that," said Krishnaji. In the middle of lunch, Bud answered a telephone call and came back, saying he had just bought a house in Naples, Florida. Part of their scheme of life after they sell their New York apartment and Lisa quits the Cooper-Hewitt Museum.' They were going to retire there. 'Krishnaji and I returned to the hotel, where we eventually had supper in the rooms. He heard me say on the telephone to Phyllis Lutyens that I was seventy. "Seventy, you're seventy?" he said.' [Both chuckle] '"My god." He began laughing at me, at the two of us at our ages. "I will probably live another ten years and that will be enough, but you must live another fifteen."' [Both chuckle] That was in, what, 1985.[2]

S: 1985. So you've done another twenty.

M: Yes. [Said very quietly and reflectively.]

April twelfth. 'We left the hotel at 9:30 a.m. and went by taxi to LaGuardia for an 11 a.m. TWA flight to Washington. Milton Friedman met us at the national airport and drove us in his 300D Turbo Mercedes, which caught Krishnaji's eye,' [S chuckles] 'to the Watergate Hotel. One room, number 1410, which has a kitchenette and doors dividing the bed area from the sitting room, was ready. So we left the luggage there, and all three went down to lunch. Milton then left, and Krishnaji moved into the second room, 1401, across the hall. It is a spacious one with a bed area and a sitting area, closed-off sink and refrigerator, bath, etcetera. We will take our meals in mine, which has a dining room table, and use it for people who come to see Krishnaji. It is a comfortable and seemingly well-run hotel.' Was this after it became so notorious?

S: Oh, yes. Oh, yes—1972 and 1973 was the Nixon scandal. And I can remember Krishnaji brought me back a bathrobe from the Watergate Hotel, and I was so thrilled to have it [M chuckles] because I was so thrilled about Watergate and that it had gotten rid of Nixon. So that was a great treasure. [Both laugh.]

M: Well, he stole it, of course. [Both chuckle.] He had a theory that things that are put in your room are yours—he did this also at Plaza Athenée—they had from Porthault, that wonderful linen place, washcloths.

S: Yes.

M: And he always stole them. He thought they were given to you.

S: Yes. Well, I think you probably paid for them.

M: Oh, I'm sure we paid for them, [S laughs] and paid for them. We should have gotten towels to go with it.

S: [laughs] Should've taken all the furniture, probably. [Chuckles.]

M: 'Both of us liked the great height of the Watergate building both inside and out. In the late afternoon, we went over to the Kennedy Center and looked at the concert hall where Krishnaji will speak. We came back to supper in the room.'

The thirteenth of April. 'Milton Friedman brought a friend, Gail Hamilton, and drove us out into Maryland to lunch at a Chinese restaurant. We came back through woods that Krishnaji found beautiful. "I could live here," he said. Then, back in Washington, we went to the Lincoln Memorial. Policemen let us drive close to where only buses are allowed because we had a ninety-year-old man in the car. And then Krishnaji and I climbed up the steps of the monument. "Look up as you go. See, it is like the Parthenon. See those corners of the roof. It is just like the Parthenon," he said looking at the huge statue. People were climbing, shouting there, but not really looking at the statue. "They have no respect," said Krishnaji. "They don't have the feeling of respect." I would have liked to go across to the Vietnam Memorial, but the crowds were too great. Milton drove us past the White House and the surrounding government buildings. I was rather glad to see the White House looked like a house, an American house, and not a palace. We came back to the hotel. Of Lincoln, Krishnaji said, "I could have cried, and while we were there I did what I do to the room." He referred to what he does at night to the house in Ojai, waiting till I've gone ahead into the bedroom. He stands in what he says is the center, i.e., the front hall, and I never pry but go ahead to my bedroom. He would not do it in front of me, but if I understand it, it is something that protects. And if for some reason I have to go back into that part of the house, it undoes what he has done, and he must do it anew. This perhaps is related to his doing something to rooms in hotels or the hospitals we've been in. Cleansing and protecting.' Krishnaji was very moved by Lincoln. 'We had supper in the room, and he took a quarter of a Halcion, which gives him excellent sleep and no side effect.' And then he told me that I must do it when he wasn't there. But he didn't say how.

S: He didn't say how or what.

M: He never said how for such things.

S: Yes, yes.

M: But I do it. I still do it.

April fourteenth. 'Quiet day but we went down to lunch in the hotel where there was a buffet and he was able to get enough vegetables. We talked about the Lincoln Memorial yesterday, and I asked him what he considered was the human impulse of worship—not necessarily of an image, not part of belief, but simply a feeling of worship. He said respect, devotion, worship were all toward something outer, even if not defined. Outer means division. To see without movement is without division. In that, there is no I, no self. That perception is the action of change because it is without movement. We rested and later walked along the river, then had supper in the room. I spoke to Ann Deford.' That's my stepsister, who lives in Maryland.

April fifteenth. 'At 10 a.m., Friedman brought the Washington Post man, Michael Kernan, to do an interview for the paper. A nice man, Krishnaji thought. The photographer, named Chevalier, took photos. Krishnaji and I lunched downstairs.' I think we never got copies of those photos. 'I had the hotel put kitchen equipment in my room, and I bought food in the Safeway store downstairs. At 4 p.m., Friedman brought from The Voice of America a man and an Iranian, Miss Feresteh, to record an interview for broadcast. Afterward, Krishnaji asked the man if he could use all that he said, and they replied, "We never censor." We walked along the river later and then I was able to give Krishnaji a proper supper of fat, fresh asparagus, soup, an omelet, and brie.' There were little kitchens in these places.

The sixteenth. 'Lois Hobson telephoned and we invited her to lunch.' She was a Krishnaji enthusiast, and I'd met her before, probably in Ojai. 'At 10 a.m., Friedman and I went over to the Kennedy Center so I could see where Krishnaji enters.' The Kennedy Center is right next door, so we could walk over there.

S: Right.

M: 'At 11 a.m. a Robert Aubry Davis came to do a radio interview with Krishnaji for FM 91. He brought his seven-year-old daughter, a delicate, polite little girl who wanted to meet Krishnaji and brought him a poem. He greeted her gravely, smilingly, and she sat listening to it all as her father asked Krishnaji about education in Krishnamurti schools. She said shyly that she understood most of what he was saying. Krishnaji kissed her hand in saying goodbye, and she reached up and kissed his cheek.' [S chuckles.] 'In the car she told Milton she liked Mr. Krishnamurti very much, and Mrs. Krishnamurti was very nice.' [Both laugh.] 'Her poem was remarkable. The parents teach her at home. She is an only child. Perhaps that is how, in this shocking world, to protect a gifted child.' [Chuckles.] 'Lois Hobson was interested and interesting at lunch, though all our conversation was on the shoddiness of today's society. Later Krishnaji and I walked along the river and had supper in the rooms.' [Chuckles.]

April seventeenth. 'My stepsister, Ann Deford, came to lunch with Krishnaji and me in the hotel dining room. It was good to see her again. She is very much herself: the blond hair grown gray, the hands are gnarled by age, as mine are, but she is still slim, upright, and the same laugh that is so McAdoo, the same amusements at life, and sensibleness. It is nice to meet on the same friendly footing, though the years have passed. Krishnaji said, "A nice lady." At 4:30 Milton Friedman brought a Mr. and Mrs. Paul Temple to tea. She is a friend of his, and he a vastly wealthy man "interested in consciousness and healing," but rooted in Christianity from some "experience." Milton Friedman rather hoped Temple would donate to the Krishnamurti Foundation, but Krishnaji doesn't cater to the Orthodox questions, and I didn't see any meeting in the one-and-a-half to two hours of the visit. Krishnaji gave out so much. He was tired when they left. Evelyne Blau came to tea while the Temples were there.'

S: [chuckles] We have to end, but before we do, I want to tell you my remembrance—even though I wasn't there, but I can remember your telling me about this conversation with the Temples.

M: I did?

S: Yes, and according to what you told me at the time, you had, at the beginning, because this was a very wealthy philanthropist, you'd thought well, maybe—I can't remember the sum you mentioned. Let's say, for the sake of this, maybe he'll give half a million dollars. But that after a while, after a little bit of conversation, you thought, well, maybe a quarter of a million. [Both chuckle.] Then, as the discussion progressed, the amount you were hoping for got smaller and smaller until you realized there would be nothing.

M: Yes. [Laughing.] I remember now. I'm glad you remember these things.

FOOTNOTES:

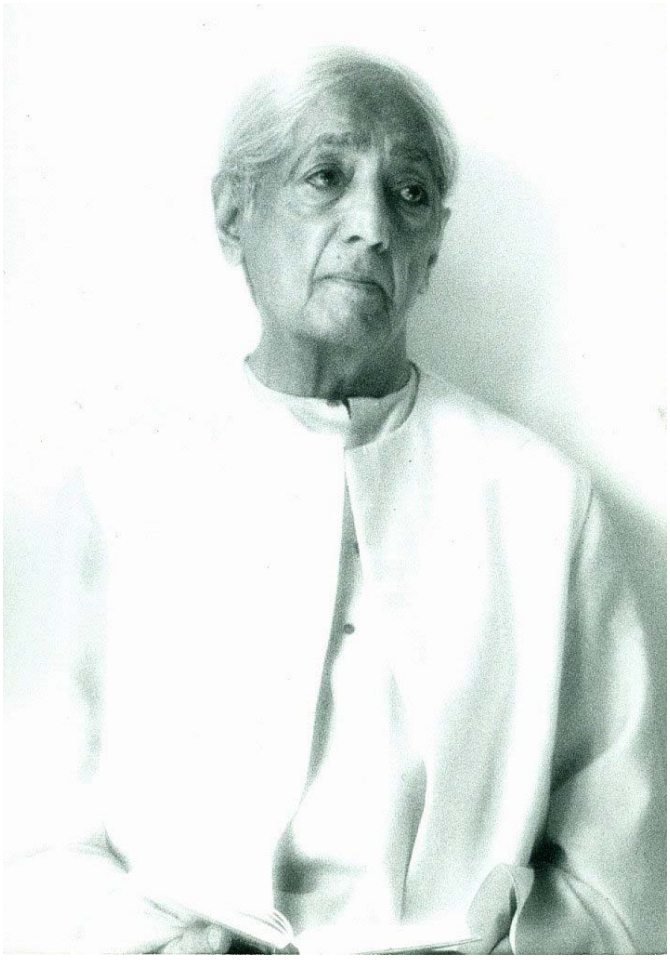
[1] Robin Ann Martin had met Mary by this time and had, for many years, been the lone transcriber of these discussions. Mary, over the years, made several asides like this to Robin, but they have all been edited out. It seems only right that at least one remains as they were part of the joking playfulness that were an important part of these discussions.

[2] Krishnaji died about ten months later.

Issue 84: April 19, 1985 to June 20, 1985

We usually see with the clarity of hindsight things we never saw at the time of their occurrence, and this seems to be what this issue offers us. What Mary calls at one point in this issue "hypercritical" we can now see as the very early signs of the pancreatic cancer that was going to kill Krishnaji in eight months. Krishnaji's frequent stomach trouble, his weakness, and his easy fevers left him agitated, testy, and anxious, but these were completely out of character for him. Of course, looking at the conflicts and incompetence in the KFI, KFA, and Brockwood, anyone could understand why he would be irritable and testy; but these seem always to have been around him, and his responses had never been anything that could have been characterized as "hypercritical." Krishnaji remained unflinchingly affectionate and appreciative of Mary, but he seemed to have wanted her to achieve some inner growth or change for which there is very little time, despite his saying he "should live" another ten years.

Again, with the luxury of hindsight, one can speculate that it might have been for the better that no one, not even the doctors who saw him, suspected his fatal underlying condition. If it had been suspected, all of his programs would have stopped, and heaven and earth would have been moved to treat what we were told eight months later was an incurable condition. As it was, Krishnaji made the changes he felt were necessary at Brockwood, he ended Saanen beautifully, and withdrew softly from India, making changes there he felt were needed. And he was able to die, as he wanted to die, in Ojai.



Therefore, we see in this issue, the beginning of the gentle and graceful movement to what Mary Lutyens called "The Open Door."

Mary: We begin on April eighteenth, and Krishnaji and I are still in Washington, DC. 'Michael Kernan, who interviewed Krishnaji on Monday, wrote a very good article which appeared in the Washington Post this morning. He came with Milton Friedman to lunch with us in the hotel dining room at 12:15 p.m. He is a nice man, and Krishnaji likes him. He may come to Ojai. Milton Friedman then drove Krishnaji, me, and Evelyne to the capital, where, in his Senate office, Senator Claiborne Pell gave a tea at 3 p.m. for Krishnaji. He introduced Krishnaji to about forty or fifty people and then asked an opening question on what is the cause of conflict. Krishnaji spoke with relaxed authority, handling mostly rather obvious questions with his accustomed skill. It lasted an hour, and then Milton Friedman guided us to the rotunda where Krishnaji wanted to look up at the dome. We drove back past the I. M. Pei addition to the National Gallery, which I wanted to see.' I wanted to go in because I like I. M. Pei's work.

Scott: Yes, he's brilliant.

M: He did the Louvre pyramid, but I couldn't leave Krishnaji and go, so I didn't get into it, but someday maybe I will. 'The capital is as handsome as I had imagined, and now, with the immaculately tended beds of tulips and flowering trees, it seemed a city of dignity and beauty. Erna and Theo arrived at the hotel around 6 p.m. and had supper with us in the rooms.'

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

The nineteenth. 'Erna rang from downstairs to say that Merali's generous donation has arrived in our bank. I went with her and Theo to the Kennedy Center to check on things for the talk. Krishnaji remained in bed all day and took lunch with me in the room. My brother, who arrived with Lisa this morning, came to see me in the afternoon, and we talked for several hours. It was a hot day. Krishnaji ate in his room. It was Theo's seventy-ninth birthday.'

April twentieth. 'At 2:30 p.m., Lois Hobson drove Krishnaji, Theo, and me the short distance to the Kennedy Center, and Krishnaji gave his first talk there in the concert hall. It was a large audience. The sound was not clear, and I was roaming about, as was Theo, trying to do something about it. Erna and Theo came by later to say that the sound problem was due to the lavalier microphone and that tomorrow there will be a standing microphone. The four of us walked along the river. Krishnaji and I ate alone in the room.' You know, the Watergate Hotel is about two blocks away from the Kennedy Center, and it's a rather nice hotel, apart from its reputation for skulduggery.

S: I think it has a wonderful reputation! [Both chuckle.]

M: The twenty-first of April. 'At 11 a.m. Lois Hobson again drove us to the Kennedy Center where, with excellent sound, Krishnaji gave a marvelous talk.[1] A triumph. The hall was sold out. All the books, 500 of them, were sold, and 196 copies of Asit's book, A Thousand Moons, were also sold. We walked back to the hotel. Bud, Lisa, and Laurie'—that is one of Bud's children—'lunched with us in the hotel dining room. At 5 p.m. Milton Friedman brought a Mr. Silverstone and another younger reporter who did interviews of Krishnaji for the United Press International. This lasted one and a half hours. I made some vegetable something, and we had supper in the room. We both had packed during the day.' Krishnaji's Washington trip was exceedingly successful.

April twenty-second. 'We left the Watergate Hotel at 7 a.m. and took a taxi to Dulles Airport. Krishnaji was delighted by the trees and the countryside, and he liked the quiet airport. The captain saluted him in the traditional namaste way and let him see the cockpit. The American Airline flight 77 left at 8:45 a.m. We had seats 1A and 1B in the forward first class. The bulkhead seats.' Those are the single ones; the ones we like because I could put my foot up on the bulkhead. He didn't. And nobody is next to you. 'It was a good, smooth flight to Los Angeles. We arrived at 11 a.m., and David and Vivian met us and we drove home along the beach to Ojai. Our roses were in fullest bloom. I made lunch for Krishnaji and me, and talked to Amanda. Then I went marketing, made supper, and so we are happily home again.'

The twenty-third of April: 'It was a beautiful morning. I picked roses and did laundry. Erna and Theo flew back from Washington in time for lunch, which Michael cooked at Arya Vihara after which I opened piles of mail.'

The twenty-fourth. 'I went on an early walk with Erna. Krishnaji recorded a cassette addressing Rajagopal. We lunched at Arya Vihara. In the afternoon Erna and Theo heard the tape and we discussed the text of the statement to be made by Krishnaji as part of a settlement in the case. In the early morning I spoke to Philippa and later to Amanda on her return from birding.' She was a bird-watcher and went with friends looking at birds.

April twenty-fifth. 'After an early lunch, Krishnaji and I drove to Santa Paula where he saw Dr. Deutsch at 2:30 p.m. Krishnaji's blood sugar was 112. Krishnaji talked to him about healing. We came home via Dieter's and inquired about the Mercedes models to come.' [S chuckles.] Dieter also sells cars.

S: Yes. More specifically, he sells Mercedes.

M: Well, yes. He sells Mercedes cars. I think he has a few other makes, but I forget which.

S: Jaguars?

M: No, not Jaguars. Krishnaji did not like Jaguars. He cured me of my Jaguar infatuation. [Both laugh.] I don't know what he had against them except that they weren't Mercedes.

S: Yes, that was enough. [Chuckles]

M: April twenty-sixth. 'After my usual early walk with Erna, I worked at my desk and did more laundry. Joyce Buck came by briefly.' She was a friend of Amanda's and I also knew her, but we don't have to go on about it. 'Krishnaji was tired and didn't go to Dr. Hara in the afternoon, but I did.'

April twenty-seventh. I am going on early walks every morning, so I won't keep mentioning it. 'At 10 a.m. there was a trustee meeting, which lasted all day. After it, Krishnaji, Friedrich, and I discussed the new buildings in Rishi Valley, which Friedrich was financing. Krishnaji walked down to Erna and Theo's while I made supper. He is disturbed by the amount of desk work I have and wants me to dictate letters. "You must not wear yourself out. As long as I live, you are with me and you must be able to look after me. You are always busy, never quiet." That was said not as a compliment, and it was a, uh—

S: A chastisement.

M: Yes, a chastisement, quite right. [Both chuckle.] It was always a conundrum for me of how to get things done without appearing to be doing anything.

S: Yes.

M: [both chuckle] The fact that I was looking out for him was not weighed in the scale. I mean, you know, it should just be—

S: Seemingly effortless and not take any—

M: Yes. It shouldn't show, or be noticeable, or I don't know what, so [both chuckle] there was always a sort of balance of things.

S: Yes.

M: April twenty-eighth. 'Daylight Savings Time began. I dictated letters onto a cassette. Ronald Eyre from England came to lunch, after which I did more desk work. Krishnaji is tired, so he rested and had supper in bed as usual.'

The twenty-ninth. 'Scott rang from Brockwood about the necessity to change the architects for the study center. I continued my desk work. Ravi Ravindra came to lunch at Arya Vihara and then interviewed Krishnaji afterward on the subject of death.'

The thirtieth. 'Another day of mostly desk work for me. Sidney Field came to lunch at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji rested most of the afternoon except for a talk with David Moody.

Krishnaji's stomach is bothering him. He says he has trouble swallowing, and that the food in Washington upset him.' This is a week later, so I don't understand. Anyway, it's what my diary says.

The first of May. 'Krishnaji and I drove at 9 a.m. to Beverly Hills. Krishnaji said, "I want to teach you meditation." Definition of austerity.

S: So, wait a minute; austerity was something you discussed.

M: It was a conversation. 'He saw Dr. Fox at 11 a.m. for a field of vision test. There's no change from last year. Then we went to the shaver place.' [Chuckles.] Shavers are a fascination with him. They have to be the latest.

S: I know. Absolutely.

M: Often they had to be a Braun.

S: Yes.

M: 'We had a picnic in the car on a shady street and then to a luggage store. Krishnaji had me buy a suitcase at Vuitton and then to the health food store, Lindbergh's. We were home by 6 p.m. Krishnaji's stomach is alright.'

May second. 'I drove to a Suzanne fitting in North Hollywood.' That's a dressmaker. 'Then to have my hair cut. I stopped to see Amanda and Phil on the way home. Krishnaji had a talk with both Moodys about them going to India next December. Later, he got upset at my not having done all the letters and ironing. He said he would answer letters.' [Laughs.] You see, he tells me I'm too busy, then…anyway, 'I said that by Monday morning I would have finished both.' [Both chuckle.]

May third. 'I got up at 3 a.m. and worked on dictating letters into a cassette recorder. Ravi Ravindra came to lunch and I went marketing.'

There is nothing of note the next day except I'm still doing letters.

May fifth. 'I was up early ironing.' [Chuckles.] 'At 11 a.m. Krishnaji spoke to parents and staff at the Oak Grove School in the new library. He walked then to the Grove afterward. We had a late lunch at Arya Vihara.'

May sixth. 'I'm still doing desk work and ironing. I fetched Mar de Manziarly to lunch with us at Arya Vihara and took her home afterward. Scott telephoned from Brockwood about new architects.'

The seventh. 'It is cold, rainy, and gray. At 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji was interviewed for the Los Angeles Times by Allen Parachini.'

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

The next day, 'Krishnaji dictated letters, and I typed them. Krishnaji saw Alfonso Colón at 4:30 p.m.'

There is really nothing the next day.

May tenth. 'I was awake very early and worked at my desk. Later in the morning, I drove to Malibu and lunched with Amanda and Phil. Then I went on to the airport to meet Rita Zampese, due at 1:30 p.m. She finally emerged at 3 p.m., and we drove to Ojai and Arya Vihara, where she is staying. I was later than expected in returning, which made Krishnaji think something had happened to me, which made him very nervous. Meanwhile, Pupul and Mr. Jose, her secretary, had arrived from New York. I made supper for Krishnaji and Pupul. I was in bed with lights out at 9 p.m. This was an eighteen-hour day.' [Both chuckle.]

The eleventh of May. 'Whether today is Krishnaji's ninetieth birthday or tomorrow depends on whether you count days in the traditional Indian way in which the date changes at 4 a.m., or the Western way, for which the date changes at midnight. Krishnaji was born at 12:30 a.m. on what we would call May twelfth, but which traditional India says is still the eleventh. Either way, ninety has no meaning except as an astounding statistic. I heard him starting his day at 5:45 a.m. He had slept well in spite of the agitation last night when I returned to Ojai later than Krishnaji expected and he thought of motor accidents. He had made tea for Pupul, who had arrived, and Mr. Jose from New York.' [Chuckles.] Krishnaji making tea, I can visualize it. Pupul told me she didn't know how to heat water on the stove.

S: Yes, yes. I know. I heard her several times bragging about that. She's never boiled an egg in her life.

M: She's never even heated water…I mean, making tea is—you have to heat the water, that's all you need to know.

S: Yes. It's not very technical.

M: No. [Chuckles.] Anyway, 'Krishnaji made tea for Pupul, who had arrived with Mr. Jose from New York, but he was so upset his hands shook so much he could not carry the teacup. I felt sick at upsetting him, especially as his talks begin today. He has lately been hypercritical, saying I'm not totally ordered within. He is bothered by my falling behind at the desk work, being too busy, and not paying attention, but he was calm this morning, having slept well. He now takes a crumb of halcyon, one quarter of a tablet prescribed for sleep by Dr. Deutsch. I wonder if it is good every night. But sleep is necessary through the talks. He gave the first Ojai one in the Grove at 11:30 a.m. It was a bright morning early, but it turned cloudy and very cool for the big crowd. KCET had a crew videotaping it for a program they will broadcast later on.' KCET were headquartered in San Francisco, and they came down to tape the talk. 'We had lunch at Arya Vihara with Pupul, Mr. Jose, Grohe, and Magda's daughter, Rukmini, Kishbaugh and Stella—they plan to marry in June—Rita Zampese, Theo, and Michael. We both napped in the afternoon. I made supper for Krishnaji, Pupul, and me on trays as usual. Pupul described finding at Adyar in the Theosophical Society archives, which Radha let her examine, a letter from Nitya to Mrs. Besant describing much more about Krishnaji's pepper tree events: the child entity talking to his mother, describing "they" working on his body, cleaning his eyes so that he could "see," and his telling some entity "beyond the wall" to go away. Krishnaji seemed to understand what this meant, and admonished Pupul and me not to inquire too far into esoteric things because if you open the door to that, you also open the door to "what is beyond the wall."'

S: Which are negative things.

M: Yes. 'After Pupul left he said severely to me, "You must have no disorder because of that beyond the wall." He found it extraordinary that the guru of Upadhyaya's guru, Vishudhananat, apparently had told Mrs. Besant that there was to be a manifestation of the Maitreya, and later told Upadhyayaji's guru that Krishnaji was that manifestation.' Well, one doesn't know what to think of such reports.

May twelfth. 'The morning was a clear beginning of summer. Krishnaji at ninety is as beautiful as ever, in some ways more so. The lines are more finely drawn. He had slept well. I fetched the Sunday papers and had breakfast ready for him and Pupul when she came over. She went ahead with the Lilliefelts, then Krishnaji and I drove slowly to the Grove, where he gave his second talk. After lunch at Arya Vihara, he, both Grohes, Pupul, and I went over plans that Pupul brought from Radhika for the new Rishi Valley buildings that Grohe was financing. There was considerable confusion.' [Both chuckle.] I don't seem to describe it.

S: I think I might remember what at least some of this confusion was about.

M: What was it?

S: Grohe had given money for a house for himself and also for another building, which Krishnaji could stay in.

M: But Krishnaji didn't want to.

S: That's right, but the building could also be used as a study center. But Radhika had wanted to change that into a place where parents could stay, both of those places. So it was no longer a study center. It was a—

M: Guesthouse.

S: It was a guesthouse. And the following or this coming winter, when I was in India, Krishnaji wanted me to have a talk with Radhika and Grohe about what he had said about a study center. Krishnaji was present, of course, so he was part of the discussion. But I think this is what the confusion was about. [Both chuckle.]

M: 'Later, after supper, Krishnaji renewed the subject of what was spoken of last night: Upadhyaya's telling of his guru's guru'—his guru being named, I think, Kavirath—'foretelling of a "manifestation."'

May thirteenth. 'Pupul left after breakfast for Los Angeles, London, and India. I did laundry and sorted out questions for tomorrow's meeting. The Colóns brought Mr. and Mrs. Hugo Baldi to see Krishnaji at 4 p.m.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji was awake early. He didn't have enough sleep, but at 11:30 Krishnaji held the first question-and-answer meeting in the Oak Grove. Lois Hobson and two friends came to Arya Vihara for lunch with us and then came over to the cottage afterward. It was a hot day. Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I talked a bit. We had supper by 6:30 p.m. and were in bed by 8:30 p.m.'

May fifteenth. 'Krishnaji was awake early, and again did not have enough sleep. He dictated letters about the proposed new buildings in Rishi Valley and Grohe's donations. I marketed and the new Balans desk chair arrived.'

The sixteenth. 'At 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer meeting in the Oak Grove. We lunched afterward with the Hookers at the Ranch House Restaurant. The Lilliefelts and Rita Zampese were also there. Krishnaji's stomach ached in the evening. A hot pad and Perrier water helped.'

May seventeenth. 'I woke up at 2 a.m., got up at 3 a.m., and worked at the desk. Krishnaji is feeling better but he is tired. Krishnaji dictated to me a tentative letter to Rajagopal. Austin Bee brought an envelope with a statement Rajagopal wants Krishnaji to sign.

Monica Phillips and her husband came to lunch at Arya Vihara. Erna and I looked at the video of Krishnaji answering questions filmed here in the cottage on March twenty-ninth.'

May eighteenth. 'I was up early again and worked at my desk. At 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji gave the third Ojai talk on beauty and love. It was a deeply moving talk[2] to a large crowd. We lunched at Arya Vihara. His stomach hurt a little in the morning but subsided.'

The nineteenth. 'Krishnaji gave this fourth talk in the Oak Grove to a huge crowd. Miranda and John joined me, sitting in the back, and came to Arya Vihara for lunch afterward. Krishnaji talked to Miranda at the table. "I like that girl," he said. Later he told me once again, "You must outlive me so you can look after me. After that you can follow me."' [Both chuckle.] Well, his saying that made me wonder what he was telling me. Should I commit suicide? Or should I…

S: Oh no, no, no. You can come at your leisure. [Both chuckle.]

M: Anyway, I clearly am not writing much these days as I'm getting up at 2 a.m. and 3 a.m.

S: Yes, I can understand that.

M: May twentieth. 'At 9 a.m. Erna, Theo, and I accompanied Krishnaji to Oxnard for his IRS clearance so he could leave the country. Then at 10 a.m., we met Stanley Cohen about the "Statement of Intent" brought by Austin Bee. Cohen amended it and Krishnaji signed it. Cohen has had shingles, and Krishnaji put his hands on him. Donald Ingram Smith was at Arya Vihara for lunch. Krishnaji was tired from the Oxnard trip. He said I must pay more attention to the way I sit, to my health, etcetera. He slept and later walked to the Lilliefelts' while I made supper.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji is very tired. He ate breakfast but felt sick to his stomach, so he refused lunch. He fainted in bed, but was better by suppertime and ate lightly. I worked at the desk all day to finish letters. Philippa telephoned. She is coming to Malibu in June.'

The twenty-second. 'Krishnaji was feeling weak in the morning but got up by lunchtime. Ex-Governor Jerry Brown brought a friend, Jacques Barzaghi, to lunch. Krishnaji talked for over an hour with both of them back at the cottage and later went with Theo to the Oak Grove to show where he wanted the fencing to be put.'

There's really nothing the next day except packing.

May twenty-fourth. 'At 2:50 a.m. Krishnaji collided with the table by the red chair near his bed and fell, hitting his left hip and scraping his leg. I heard it and came rushing in, put a dressing on his leg, and he slept again till 6 a.m. He was alright and we finished packing.' He only very rarely got confused when he got up in the night. In other words, he walked to the window instead of the bathroom, where he probably wanted to go.

S: Yes.

M: 'We had an early lunch at Arya Vihara, and then Mark Lee drove Krishnaji, me, and Friedrich to the airport, where we took TWA 760 at 5:40 p.m. to London. He had one of the front seats, but I didn't. He slept some on the flight.'

The twenty-fifth. 'We landed at Heathrow at noon. There was a wheelchair for Krishnaji, which got us out in record time. Dorothy, Mary Cadogan, Scott, Ingrid, and Ray were there to meet us. We drove with Dorothy to Brockwood. England is green and beautiful. The new curtains look nice in my room. We had a late lunch, after which I talked to Mary Cadogan, Dorothy, Ingrid, and Scott. Dr. Parchure is here, also Sathaye from Rajghat. I telephoned to Mary Links but spoke only to Joe. Mary was out. Krishnaji feels disturbance still in the house here.'

May twenty-sixth. 'Krishnaji slept deeply and so did I. Dr. Parchure gave him massage, which did him great good, so he was up for lunch. The Bohms were there. Afterward Scott and Kathy showed Krishnaji, Friedrich, and me the plans for the proposed study of five different architects, and it was quite an exhibition. Then Krishnaji and I took deep naps.'

S: Alright, I should just say a little something here.

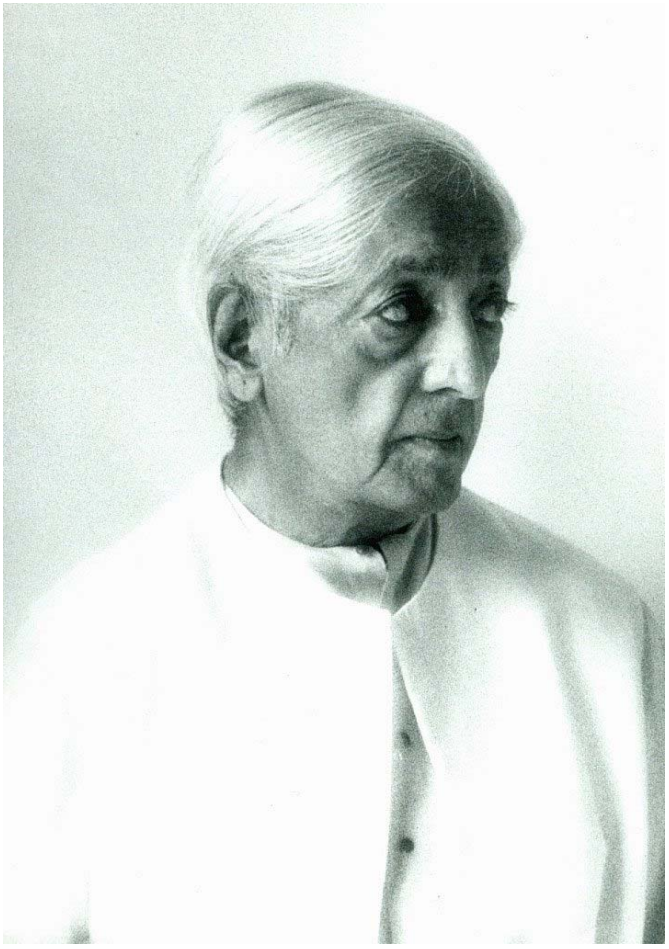
M: Yes.

S: [chuckles] Having gotten rid of the previous architects, which I felt had been foisted on me when I was really quite ill, I then went and found all the very best architects in England.

M: Where did you find them? How did you find them?

S: I can't remember that. But they all presented drawings, except for Critchlow, who just presented a sketch. But what was interesting about Critchlow was how we found him. Krishnaji had asked me the year before, before Parchure left, if I would do his leg and foot massage and hand massage that Parchure did. Krishnaji wasn't certain his body could take my touch. [M chuckles.] So I tried it there with Parchure a little bit and Parchure showed me what to do, and Krishnaji was pleased that his body was happy with my touch. So, that winter, when Krishnaji was away, I thought I've got to learn something about massage. So I went off and did a weekend course on massage.

M: Did you?



S: Yes. It was, it was a part of a larger course, but I thought I just need to get some sense of what constitutes massage. One of the other people who was taking the course was the wife of the person who had invented some children's program for television. Anyway, we got to talking, and she asked me what I was doing, and I explained I was looking for architects and I think she was vaguely familiar with Krishnaji's work. And she said to me that she had read an article on someone she thought I would be interested in. I think she said that he taught at the Royal Academy of Art, and she said, "I think his name is Keith something, I'm not sure." So, I researched and found Keith Critchlow was the man to whom she was referring. So, I presented all these five architects' tentative drawings to Krishnaji, and at this point, what's interesting is that when Krishnaji saw all these five drawings, his response was to get all of them to work together.

M: Oh, yes. I remember. [Both laugh.]

S: Which left me completely baffled, but luckily he said this also to Mary Lutyens, who said absolutely not! She said that architects are not going to work together. [Both chuckle.]

M: Yes. Famous architect's daughter knew…

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

S: Yes, exactly. The architect's daughter knew exactly that this was a terrible idea. And so Krishnaji dropped it, but it was interesting that his first response was, "Oh, here are all these brilliant people doing wonderful work. Let's have them all work together." [Both laugh.]

M: Well, I remember that the credentials of Critchlow, as told to me by you, was that he was specialized in religious architecture.

S: Yes.

M: And that seemed a good sign.

S: Well, yes, he was an expert. He had done the deciphering of a lot of the mathematical code things in the Chartres Cathedral and other things like that. But what was a little bit difficult is that he'd only ever designed one building that had been constructed in his life, and that was a large dome in Colorado.

M: Well, now, wait a minute. Another thing that made a big impression on me was a building in either Arizona or New Mexico, which was made of wood—a big auditorium, I think.

S: That's what I'm talking about. I think it was Colorado, but it could have been Arizona or New Mexico.

M: Well, southwest of this country. And it looked in the photographs as though it was the inside of a basket. In other words, the wooden structure—

S: Yes, it was very beautiful.

M: Beautiful. He used wood beams like basket weave.

S: Yes, yes.

M: And I found that remarkable. I was sold on him just from that one building.

S: Yes, he was really a designer. And he didn't have, for instance, the structural architectural things, but he was a wonderful design person—really brilliant.

M: Well, that was fortuitous because he gave us just exactly the right building.

S: Yes, he did. And these other proposals that these other architects did were all very beautiful, but there was just something that made Critchlow the obvious right choice.

M: May twenty-seventh. 'Krishnaji had lunch in bed. He was tired. There was a meeting in his room of The Four—Ingrid, Harsh, Stephen, Ray, plus Scott and me. He rested in the afternoon. I went to a school meeting at 5:30 p.m. Person B. was seen in the house in spite of being told that he could come only by invitation from The Four. Krishnaji objected strongly.

S: He objected strongly to the fact that Person B. had come without that invitation.

M: Yes. And also—he'd been sleeping in Person S.'s and she was married, and her daughter was in the next room, and this is a school.

S: Yes, well, Person B. and Person S. were lovers.

M: Yes. But he wasn't supposed to be there. So, 'Stephen and Harsh asked him to leave, and Person B. was to them contemptuous. Krishnaji asked Scott and me to find him, so we went looking for him in the car and found him with Person S. in one of the lanes. We asked him to leave, but when we returned, Krishnaji sent for them, so we went to find them again. Krishnaji talked with them in front of Scott and me till 11:30 p.m. He spoke very severely, drastically, especially to Person B.: "You are using this place."'

S: Well, let me give my version of that because you and I were in the room.

M: That's what I remember.

S: Krishnaji had initially told us to find them and to tell Person B. to leave. But when we reported back to Krishnaji that we had done that, he told us to get them as he wanted to talk to them. So we did, and he wanted us to be present when he talked with them, and Krishnaji was amazing. I remember thinking at the time—and I can still see it—this is what an angry god looks like. [M chuckles.] I also remember thinking that I don't care what I do, I am never going to put myself in a position where I deserve this kind of communication from Krishnaji. [Both chuckle.] Krishnaji just really ripped into them in no uncertain terms…

M: Yes.

S: …but this was all part of the ridiculous power struggle that Dorothy was still behind. Because she gave both of these persons to feel, 'Oh, well, you can do whatever, ignore the four people who are supposed to be running the place because I still have the authority.' And Person B., of course, was contemptuous of The Four because he was a Dorothy supporter. And in the perverse way people think about these things, Persons B. and S. probably both thought they were supporting Dorothy by having contempt for The Four, but, of course, it had the opposite effect. Krishnaji really laid into them for a long time—I mean, a really long time.

M: I remember Krishnaji then asked for The Four to come in.

S: That's right, and with Persons B. and S. still there, he summarized what he had been saying. And it was absolutely clear, then, who Krishnaji saw as being in charge of Brockwood, and that this sort of behavior was…

M: Not on.

S: Yes, and from then on, Person B. was not welcome at Brockwood anymore, which was also the end of Person S. who left not that long afterward because it was clear they had really violated Krishnaji's wishes. And if Dorothy was behind it, well, then too bad. It was just…

M: Yes. Well, that's a very good reconstruction.

S: But Krishnaji was just withering.

M: Yes. I remember that.

S: And then afterward, when everybody had gone and I think you were still in the room, but it was just he and you and I, Krishnaji [chuckles] made some kind of a comment like, "Oh, it feels good to get angry a little bit." It was completely broken and over for him. He didn't carry all that ferociousness. Not at all. It was just—it was completely gone.

M: [chuckles] Yes, it purged the whole thing.

S: It just purged the whole thing and it was gone.

M: [chuckles] Well, that was the twenty-seventh.

S: A day to remember.

M: May twenty-eighth. 'Joan Taylor from ITV came to discuss the coverage of the Brockwood talks in September for "The Human Factor" program. Scott and I discussed it with her. At noon, Mary and Joe came for lunch. Dorothy told The Four that she will retire after the Gatherings in September. She joined Krishnaji, Mary, Joe, and me for coffee. Scott showed the five architects' drawings."

S: I think that is when Krishnaji said to her that all the architects should work together and Mary said "Oh, no." [Chuckles.] I think that was the occasion.

M: Yes. [Chuckles.]

S: Because I remember it was in the drawing room.

M: 'Later Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked through the grove and around the fields.'

May twenty-ninth. 'An architect came for lunch. And another, Keith Critchlow, came to tea. After meeting Critchlow, Krishnaji said he feels "he is our man" to design the study center. We all felt this.' Now, let's see if that's the time when he drew that extraordinary thing, but I want to expand on that when we come to it.

The next day, ‘Krishnaji dictated letters onto cassettes, and at 4 p.m. Dana (or Diana) Marshall interviewed Krishnaji for the Sunday Times. Later Krishnaji, Scott, Friedrich, and I walked around the grove and fields.’

May thirty-first. ‘Jane and Ian came to lunch and she kindly took a cassette of letters to type, which I had dictated.’ Blessed Jane. ‘The Four came to an agreement with Person S. Krishnaji said, “It is essential to uncover what self-interest is not. But it’s quite easy to observe when self-interest is.” Yes, yes. But not for everybody, though. [Both chuckle.]

The first of June. ‘The daily massage by Dr. Parchure and Vitamin B shots are doing good to Krishnaji. At 4 p.m. Krishnaji was interviewed by Duncan Fallowell for Harper’s and Queen magazine. It took an hour and a half.’

The second June: ‘I fetched Prema Srinivasan at the Petersfield station. Krishnaji held a videotaped discussion with four students at noon. At 2 p.m. there was a film of comments by a painter named Collins.’ I think that was just a film that was shown, but I’m not sure. ‘At 4 p.m., Krishnaji talked with The Four, plus Scott, Christine, Gary, and me, after which I drove Prema back to the train station. There was only a short walk with Krishnaji.’

The third of June. ‘Krishnaji and I went to London on the 10:46 a.m. Joe met us at Waterloo and took us to Huntsman. I took the tweed coat back to Hilliard’s and returned a sweater to Ferragamo. Krishnaji and I walked to Fortnum’s and lunched with Mary, then Krishnaji had a haircut at Truefitt while I walked to Culpepper to get him skullcap herb, prescribed by Amanda Pallant for nerve improvement for Krishnaji’s shaky hands. We bought books at Hatchards and came home.’

The next day, ‘Scott and I went to London on the 8:45 a.m. train. I went to the Swiss consulate for Krishnaji’s visa then to Hilliard’s to refit the tweed coat; to Peale for a present for Vanda; to Harrods; and then to see Betsy at her flat. I caught the 4:18 p.m. train home. Hughes and Suzanne are in the West Wing guest room for the night. The Finance Committee was meeting. Jean-Michel is here, too. Daphne has had a baby son. Krishnaji had talked to the students and had had a busy day.’

June fifth. ‘The Van der Stratens had breakfast with me, and then I talked with them and Jean-Michel. Adrian Spanier came with a painter, Mr. Alecson, to see what was wrong with the paint in the drawing room. Keith Critchlow and Peter Gilbert came to lunch and showed Krishnaji, the Forbeses, Grohe, and me the first sketching for the study. Very good, Krishnaji and all thought. At 4 p.m., Krishnaji talked with The Four and Scott, Gary, Christina, and me. The van der Stratens and Jean-Michel left. Krishnaji and I walked in the grove and field.’ Well, when was this moment when Critchlow…

S: Slightly afterward, I think.

M: Is it? Alright, I’ll…I’ll…

S: Because he came up with a first drawing, which was quite good, but it wasn't…

M: I remember the sequence of it. That Krishnaji told him what he wanted in the building. And then Krishnaji immediately said, "Now sir, how will you do it?" As though you think of all of it…and then he presented that astonishing thing, which I'm waiting to describe. He drew the…human figure in a lotus position.

S: Yes. He said he got up in the morning and had that as an idea.

M: Oh.

S: Yes, he said he woke up with this idea that, because the building was being called the Krishnamurti Study, that its form should be the form of the classic position of someone studying, which was always sitting cross-legged. People didn't use to have chairs, even in many places in the West.

M: Well, then we'd better explain it right now, even if it comes up later, because this is a fuller explanation.

S: Okay. So, Critchlow drew the picture as you draw a building design, as if you are looking down on it from a bird's eye view, from the top. He drew a picture of a man sitting in what he said was a classic study posture, which was sitting cross-legged. And then he used what he called the Platonic forms to simply take that shape and formalize it and turn it into a building.

M: He said he made it into geometry. I remember that.

S: Yes. Geometric forms, just made that into a building, then.

M: Yes. I can remember that he started on the page, I can still see him doing it—he took the figure, which was seen from above, and he made lines, lines, lines. He just made it into the shape of a building, and it is the shape of the building he built.

S: Yes. And what was interesting also is that, because Krishnaji had had that conversation with him about the most important room in the entire building—the quiet room—and that there were also to be the archives, and the library. Well, the spine, the head, is really the quiet room; and off of that are coming the archives and the library, like shoulders. And then the functional areas are the—

M: Bedrooms.

S: Yes—the legs that come out. And then the legs crossing in the middle are the living room and dining room.

M: That's right.

Copyright Mary Zimbalist

S: And the empty space, between the crossed feet and the abdomen in someone sitting, is the empty space of the courtyard.

M: Yes, that's right.

S: So it's all brilliant, really very brilliant.

M: Yes, it was.

June sixth. 'At noon, Krishnaji spoke to all the staff. In the afternoon we walked, Grohe too, around the block. Then Krishnaji spoke with Shakuntala and Natasha. Krishnaji said, "This is not a prophecy. When it happens I can't predict, but I feel I should last another ten years."'

The seventh. 'Krishnaji met The Four plus for an hour.' I think The Four plus means Ingrid, Harsh, Stephen, Ray, Gary, Christina, you, and me. I think I later call them The Eight. 'I went to Alresford on errands with Scott. The car's power steering leaks. Krishnaji had lunch in bed. I talked to Donald Dennis after lunch and later to the Sathayes. At 5 p.m., there was a staff meeting. Friedrich left.'

June eighth. ‘Krishnaji spent the day in bed again. I met The Four plus to discuss the implications of what Krishnaji had said yesterday about their responsibilities. The merits of having a principal emerged. Also Ray withdrew from the school day and the long meetings and teaching to concentrate on KFT and archives work. I talked to Krishnaji afterward and we both feel Scott should be the principal as well as run the study. Together we spoke of it to him, and later I sounded out Ingrid and Ray. I will sound out the others tomorrow. I went to the open discussion conducted by Gary and Christina.

S: Alright. Let me fill in a little bit.

M: Yes, do fill in because there’s a lot in that. You were more or less out of the school.

S: Yes. I was out of the school, and I had thought that the school was not in my future in any way. I was to build and run the study center, and I was still in charge of the video department. At the same time, Krishnaji would occasionally say to me that he was cooking me. [Chuckles.]

M: I was watching you being cooked. [Laughs.]

S: Yes, and you remember him saying it. He was cooking me.

M: Oh, yes.

S: And occasionally he would say things like, “Look, you’re going be running all of this.” But I always thought, “Well, he might not literally mean that, or who knows what he means by that, and Krishnaji can change his mind; so, that’s not…it shouldn’t concern me. I’ll deal with what I’ll have to deal with when I have to deal with it.” And I had really felt at this time that the school was not part of my life any longer. And it was also clear that some personal dynamics in The Four kept them from working as well together as they might have [M chuckles], and so the school couldn’t be run by a committee—that was clearly emerging from these discussions. So, then, here was this suggestion that maybe we should again have one person running it.

M: Yes.

S: Now, one of The Four felt they should be principal and another of The Four was quite certain that they would be doing it. So, it had been decided that there should be a principal; and Krishnaji’s guardian angel, you, was going around, sounding people out, [both chuckle] and I don’t think there was any confusion about where the sounding out by Mary Z originated. [Both chuckle.]

M: I have never understood an organization with multiple people at the top.

S: No, it doesn’t usually work, and if it does, it’s usually not creative and dynamic—it’s usually only a space keeper. And so you were going around; and I was thinking that this was going to be difficult: there you were, doing this. [Laughs.] And I remember one of

The Four who thought they would be head coming to me after that discussion about there needing to be a principal, wanting a serious discussion with me about the fact that now that I was running the center, and this person was going to run the school, we had to, you know, get our relationship straight, etcetera, etcetera, and I was thinking, "I'm not saying anything here." [M laughs.]

M: June ninth. 'Krishnaji recorded a videotaped discussion with four students, similar to last Sunday's. At 4 p.m. he gave an interview to a Ms. Ann Baguely. I talked to all eight of staff about who should be the coordinator at 4 p.m. Krishnaji joined us at 4:45 p.m., and the talk was on what we want Brockwood to be.' [Chuckles.] 'Later The Four asked Person G. to leave tomorrow.' That was a good move. 'He has been contentious.' [Chuckles.]

June tenth. 'Krishnaji talked to students. He had lunch upstairs, but it was not the rest he intended as Harsh came up to speak to him privately and four students were waiting to speak to him afterward. Then at 4:30 p.m. he met The Eight[3]. He told them of the students' feelings of lack of communication and said, "What are you going to do?" I met The Eight after supper and they acted to appoint Scott to be the coordinator and call meetings of all returning staff and students to discuss what is needed next year. It was Scott's birthday.'

S: Let's just say a little bit more here. Because this is interesting, it's also part of the way Krishnaji worked. And just to say that these talks with The Four and then the group you call The Eight, were collectively called, I think, "The Bird Room Talks."

M: Oh.

S: They're recorded and they're labeled (or they were) "The Bird Room Talks" because they took place in the bird room.

M: Yes. The bird room was the West Wing guest room.

S: Right. It used to be the dining room.

M: It began as a dining room but never functioned as that, so it became a guest room. It had bird wallpaper.

S: Although it now has butterfly wallpaper.

M: Well, I couldn't get the bird paper anymore. It wasn't made. So then I had to replace it, because there was a leak in the ceiling, there were always leaks in that room, and it had to be redone. So I found one I liked that was butterflies. And it's better.

S: I know. Right. [Chuckles.] Yes, it's cheerier.

M: Because it's a north-facing room. And the birds were rather blue and didn't do anything, although it was pretty wallpaper, I must say, but the butterflies is all yellow and white, so it's much better anyway.

S: Yes, I'd agree.

M: Giving you the author's [S chuckles] point of view in decorating guest rooms.

S: Exactly. Exactly. Anyway, so what was interesting here is that saying "the coordinator" is just a nice, gentle way of saying "the director," and Krishnaji brought this about by actually getting the people who were in charge, minus Dorothy, to make me the head. And Dorothy didn't know about these bird room meetings, nor did anyone else.

M: No. That's why they were held upstairs in the West Wing.

S: That's right. So these were confidential meetings. Just the fact that they even were taking place was not known, never mind what they were about. So, I was made the head without the current head knowing; and without any consultation with the trustees [chuckles]. Apart from you, none of the other trustees knew anything about all this.

M: That's right.

S: Everybody knew that Krishnaji was behind it all, but he gave The Eight the feeling that they were the ones who were bringing this about, out of necessity.

M: Yes.

S: So, it was just an interesting way that Krishnaji had of working.

M: That was a very good addendum. [Chuckles.]

June eleventh. 'Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me to Petersfield, where he and I took the 11:46 a.m. to Waterloo. Mary Links met us there and we had a late lunch at Fortnum's. I went to pick up Krishnaji's passport with a visa at the Swiss consulate. Then I walked to Mr. Thompson's office'—that's the dentist—'where Mary and Joe had taken Krishnaji for a tooth appointment. They drove us to Waterloo and we took the 6:20 p.m. train back.'

S: Okay. Let me just add one other thing to what I was saying. Even after it was done, Dorothy wasn't told, nor were the other staff and the students, so no one knew. For the rest of that school year, until the school year ended on the thirtieth of June, no one knew that I was in charge.

M: Yes. Of course, the end of June is just around corner.

S: I know. I don't know when the trustees were informed, but I do remember when Dorothy was informed, and I'm sure we'll get around to that. But, as far as I had understood Krishnaji's intention, it was just not to make an abrupt change, but to just gently, gently, gently bring about the change. No rupture. No rending of things. No big, just…

M: Yes. No confrontations.

S: Exactly, and I can remember asking Krishnaji when the staff should know. And he said, "They'll pick it up." Which is what happened, and it was very interesting because for the rest of this month, in the staff meetings, and the staff meetings were frequent in those days…

M: Did you go to the staff meetings?

S: Since I had come out of the school, I usually kept going to the staff meetings, but not always. But after this, I always went. And now, when I spoke, the people who were in charge—namely The Four plus Gary and Christina—listened to me in a way that, without saying anything, just gave me a little bit more voice, somehow, and the rest of the staff just followed suit. So that I just became a prominent voice without anyone saying Scott is in charge.

M: Yes. Yes. It just sort of flowed in like water.

S: Yes, it just flowed in, just like Krishnaji said, and people picked it up and, it just became a fact.

M: It all happened. And was Dorothy at the staff meetings? She must have been.

S: Oh, yes. Dorothy was in the staff meetings. I don't know what she was picking up but I was always respectful and non-confrontational toward her.

M: Yes. It's a far cry from Dorothy's original, when you first joined, and she thought that when she was through, you would take over.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: Her first assessment of you was very good, but alas…

S: Yes, as it came closer to the time…I know. [Chuckles.] Yes, yes.

M: Self-interest, um…good.

The next day, 'Krishnaji had lunch in bed but got up to come to a 4:30 p.m. meeting with The Eight. He also talked at length with Scott and me earlier in the morning.'

June thirteenth. 'I went for an early walk around the lanes, then got everything done in time. I did a cassette of letters for Jane. At noon, Krishnaji held a discussion with the staff: Freedom, what is it? Does insight follow or precede it? Krishnaji talked to Shakuntala after lunch. I took a long, deep nap. Then Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked with Kip across the fields and back along the lane. Over five miles (I think it is) of walking for me today. Krishnaji and I, with Scott, went over the options on a new Mercedes car.' [Both chuckle.] We had some fantasy that we would get it for diplomatic prices.

S: Oh, that's right, that's right. I remember I was investigating that.

M: Yes. We could get it for 18,000 pounds sterling, I think, when it was being sold for God knows what. I forgot.

S: Yes, yes. Yes. And I think I looked at the Mercedes models in Paris the year before.

M: Yes, it was to be some diplomatic corps. They would buy it in…

S: Belgium or Luxembourg or something…

M: …Belgium, I think. Belgium comes to mind.

S: Yes, Belgium, I think it was. But I had looked at the new model that Krishnaji was interested in when I was in Paris, I think, the year before. I'd gone to the Champs-Elysées showroom. [Chuckles.]

M: Fourteenth in the big book: 'Krishnaji's hoarseness, which he has said was nothing for two days, he admits this morning is a cold. He stayed in bed all day and didn't try to do the dishes.' [*Both chuckle[4].] 'A meeting took place after lunch of The Eight. Scott, now the principal-to-be, called coordinator—or whatever title will emerge—proposed three more for the group: Kathy, Wendy, and Colin.' Where was Colin in all these stories?

S: Well, Colin was just a staff member teaching physics. He didn't have any other responsibilities.

M: 'Scott thought the discussion of adding these three people would be settled in five minutes. It took forty.' [S chuckles.] 'I went to the garage and picked up the Mercedes after a new reconditioned steering box had been put in. Expensive, over 600 pounds sterling, but required. Then I went to Alresford on errands and got back in time just for the staff meeting at 5 p.m. After supper, Krishnaji had me sit by him. He held my hand and said gently, "You must listen. Do you feel it? It, that thing, has been with me all day. It is with me most of the time now that I'm older. You must pay attention. You must outlive me but not as an old person. Not living in memories, as people do. You must be alive, alert. I think I will live another ten years, and you must take care of me. You are the closest person to K. You must live beyond me to represent K. You do not today, but you must learn to. Do you understand? Do you understand?" He was very serious, very intense, as he said all this.'

S: Hm. How lovely. You do, Mary. You represent him more than anyone.

M: [Sigh.] What day was that? [The tone of her voice here is so very quiet, as if she heard Scott, but she doesn't want to respond.]

June fifteenth. 'Krishnaji's voice is still hoarse. He remained in bed all day. Ingrid saw him for a bit. I spend most of the day working at my desk. I spoke to Christopher Fry on the phone. I'm going to tea with them next week. Marjolaine van der Straten, now de Hoop'—that was her married name—'and her husband came in the evening, and we put them up for the night in the West Wing. Krishnaji, Scott, and I watched Godfather II on television.'

There is really nothing the next day, then the eleventh of June. 'Krishnaji is better. Krishnaji talked to The Eight, plus the added three, Kathy, Wendy, and Colin, equaling eleven, about Scott's authority and who decides things, but most of all on clearing the brain. He had lunch in bed and stayed in his room all day. I went to Alresford and Petersfield on errands. Dorothy came up for dandelion coffee with Krishnaji and me. I attended the school meeting at 5 p.m. Scott had Critchlow and some county planning people meet here in the afternoon about the study center.'

S: We may need to add something for the historic record here. The previous plans from the first architects had been refused permission.

M: Yes, I remember.

S: Because it's a historically protected area, and also the area is listed as being of "outstanding natural beauty," so you have to get special permission to build. And the local farmer, Morton, of course had taken up against our building. And our planning permission request had been unanimously refused. So, because it's a special area, it's very difficult to appeal the refusal, and, of course, one can't apply again. But I had gone to a lawyer, a specialist in the field, in London, a QC, a Queen's Council[5], which is the best, and he went through our application.

M: How do you find someone like that?

S: I can't remember. But he was a QC in London, at Lincoln's Inn.

M: Yes.

S: And he went through our refused application, and he said actually what was submitted was not a legal application because there was one small detail having to do with the proposed septic system, which had not been included in the application.

M: My god!

S: So, as this was not a legal application, it can't have been refused. [M chuckles.] In fact, there's no judgment on it at all, because it wasn't a legal application, so no appeal of the judgment is needed.

M: My god.

S: So, we were then at square one, not having to undo a refusal for this area.

M: But how did that get communicated to the County Council?

S: Well then, this is rather a long story, but it should be told. Then, I realized I had to do a whole lot of work on the Planning Committee section of the County Council that I had never thought I had to do, and that I can't just leave it up to the architects. So, while Critchlow was working on his design, I started my work on the planning committee, and there were about twenty-five or thirty of them. I contacted every single one of them…

M: My god.

S: …and I set about doing all the lobbying that I could think of. I went around to see them. I invited them out to see the site, escorting them all around.

M: Did they come?

S: Oh, many of them did, and I went to see the ones that didn't. I wrote to them, I did all kinds of things. Now, there were three really peculiar things that happened. There was one person on the committee who was most vocally against us, who was, I think, the chairman of the committee; and his son was an Anglican minister. Well, his son, the Anglican minister, had at this time invited over for dinner to his parents' house an African bishop. In the course of the dinner conversation, this chairman said to the African bishop, just making small talk, that he had gone out to a site applying for permission to build, and he said about Krishnamurti and was making some disparaging remarks about gurus. And this African bishop said, "Oh no, you're quite wrong. Krishnamurti is a very, very serious and worthy figure." So, this African bishop, whose name I never learned, sold this guy on Krishnaji. It was the chairman himself who told me this story.

M: Well, my goodness.

S: And then there was another strange thing that happened. Keith Critchlow brought to see the site, when we were in this process of lobbying everybody, Lord Northampton. Now, Lord Northampton is the Lord of Northampton [both chuckle], and he was also someone very important, perhaps even the head of the Masonic Order in England. At the end of his visit, he kind of grilled me and I could see that he was now for this project. He said to me, "Let me see the list of who is on the planning committee." I got him the list, and as his finger went down the list, he would occasional say, "Mm, hm." Then a little farther down, "Mm, hm." [M chuckles] And there were about six or eight of these "Mm, hms."

M: They're all Masons. [Laughing.]

S: I thought that they were all Masonic people that he knew. Anyway, so he went down this list. And then there was a third thing.

M: This is fascinating. I never knew any of this.

S: It was absolutely fascinating. I think it's only Kathy that knows all this as she, of course, was part of my doing all this. So the third thing was that Donald Dennis's wife at that time, Kirsty, her uncle was the head of the Liberal Democratic Party. A Scottish chap.

M: Yes, I remember that.

S: Anyway, he was a nice man. But she wrote to him, told him of our situation, and asked for his help. There were a lot of people in the Liberal Democratic Party in Hampshire County politic and on the planning committee.

M: Yes. Good for Kirsty.

S: Yes, well, he wrote back a really wonderful letter. It was very affectionate to her and said something like, "Dear Kirsty, it's lovely as always to hear from you. I'm so glad that you're so happy at Brockwood and doing such wonderful work, etcetera, etcetera. And, of course, I understand your concern about this impending vote of the local planning committee. But, of course, I can't interfere in any way" [M chuckles] "because this is a local matter, and it's completely outside of my jurisdiction so I can't possibly interfere." And he sent a copy of that letter to all of the Liberal Democrats on the planning committee. [Both laugh.]

M: This is fascinating.

S: I felt this was so wonderfully English, that someone was saying that they couldn't possible interfere and sending a copy of these letters showing familiarity and support—

M: Yes, approval and support, everything.

S: Exactly.

M: This is fascinating.

S: Yes. So when we came with our new application with Critchlow's drawings and plans finally done and submitted, I got to the planning meeting earlier than anybody else so that I could greet everybody as they came through the door. And I knew everybody's name so I could say, "Hello Mr. Johnson" or "Mrs. Smith" or whoever it was—

M: I think you should run for president.

S: [laughs] No, really I'm not suited for this. And while our first application had been unanimously refused, the second one was unanimously approved. Not one dissent. [Both laugh.]

M: That's absolutely wonderful. That's a whole chapter in this saga.

S: It was so…when I came out, I was just so…I think I called Krishnaji immediately.

M: Yes. How did, I mean—

S: I think I flew back from Saanen or vacation or something. We'll see. I can't remember that. We'll see.

M: Well, this is June. Um, but how did—I mean, were they aware that the first application had never taken place because there was that tiny thing missing?

S: Oh, yes, I remember, during the planning permission meeting someone said, "Why are we voting on this again?" And someone else explained that our first application wasn't legal, and then there was a little discussion, and they were trying to have a balanced discussion of our new application, but I remember thinking that the meeting felt fairly positive to me; it felt rather good. But then, when the vote was taken, for it to be unanimously approved, it was just…I walked out of there on a cloud. I waited to thank them all, obviously.

M: Yes, yes.

S: But I was just on a cloud.

M: Of course. Well, you should've been elevated to the heavens.

S: Well, I felt like I was.

M: I knew that you'd done extraordinary things, but I didn't know all these details.

S: I had been working all of the time since the refusal. It's true. [Both laugh.]

M: That's wonderful.

The eighteenth of June. I'm going for early walks by myself all these days but not mentioning it. 'I worked at my desk most of the day. Krishnaji got up to do a video-recorded discussion with four students but had lunch in his room and spent the rest of the day there. Pupul rang from New York. She will come to Switzerland July one, two, and three. Harper and Row is publishing her book on Krishnaji.'

There's nothing of significance the next day, but on the twentieth, 'Krishnaji spoke to the whole school at noon. Dorothy is beginning to say, when asked, that she and Montague are retiring. At 2 p.m., a salesman came to take a tentative order for a turbo diesel Mercedes.' [S chuckles.] 'I drove to East Dean for a lovely tea and visit with the Frys and came back by 6:30 p.m. Krishnaji had walked with Dorothy. I went to a last bit of a meeting of the staff and students who are returning to Brockwood in September.'

S: Just to say, Krishnaji was being very supportive of Dorothy.

M: Yes.

S: Very, very supportive, supporting her retiring, but at the same time giving her all the emotional, psychological support that she was craving.

M: Yes, yes.

S: And I can remember, now that you mention this tentative order. The Mercedes salesman came out, and we went through all of the options, including all of the color things, so that if you were going to order, this is what would be ordered.

M: Green comes to my mind, of course that was what Krishnaji wanted, green.

S: Ah-ha. I think we have to end this as we're running out of tape.

Issue 85: June 21, 1985 to August 5, 1985

It seems correct to present frankly to you, the many readers of these memoirs, some factors that increasingly affect what you are reading. From the beginning, I tried to be as invisible in these memoirs as possible. This was relatively easy before I came into the story—my role up to that point had been simply one of asking Mary clarifying questions. But when I did come into the story, Mary kept telling me that we were "collaborating" in this project, and she wanted me to add my own memories. For the most part, these have been edited out as I didn't want to intrude in Mary's story; but many friends reading these memoirs have insisted that it is not only wrong to reduce my voice but also futile. As Mary's story increasingly includes me, I have accepted less invisibility. This is especially true for the period covered in the last issue and from now on as I also kept detailed notes of the events, and Mary increasingly asked me to contribute from those notes.

There is another factor that needs candor as it affects what you are reading. My first "living" of the events Mary discusses in her memoirs was my simply being present or hearing firsthand about them at the time. I "lived" these events a second time when Mary and I had the discussions that form these memoirs. The third "living" of these events is the very careful re-listening of the discussions to proof them and then the painstaking editing and presenting of these memoirs for In the Presence of Krishnamurti. Consequently, I am as deeply steeped in this third "living" as, I believe, it is possible to be.

To say that the first "living" was life transforming for me is an understatement; but the second and third "living" of that remarkable time and presence have also been extremely intense and impactful for me. I can only imagine that this three-times "living" has affected what you are reading, although I don't know what that effect is. Perhaps it is a tolerance for minutia (like an archeologist who can be absorbed in the smallest detail of a tiny pottery shard), or perhaps it is allowing elaborations of things that deeply moved me in my first two "livings." In any event, it seems only right to be candid with all of you who have accompanied Mary and me these last eighty-five weeks.

This is the first issue in which Mary says she wishes that our discussions would never end. The unstated obvious fact is that we both know our discussions, which had been ongoing by this time for eleven years, will soon come to an end, as Krishnaji's life is soon to come to an end. The poignancy for both of us, and now with this third "living," is almost unbearable.

Mary: We begin today with June twenty-first, 1985, and we are at Brockwood, but not much happened. My diary just reads, 'Rain all day. Didn't go out, but worked all day at my desk. I spoke to Erna in Ojai.'

The next day is similarly short. 'Packing. Mary Cadogan is back from holiday, and on the telephone I brought her up to date.'

Scott: Essentially this means, [chuckles] just to remind you, this means that Mary Cadogan was being told for the first time that the school of which she was a trustee had a new principal.

M: Oh, really?

S: Yes. Without Dorothy knowing. Without most of the school knowing. And without any of the trustees knowing. It was done on my birthday.

M: Oh, well, [chuckles] no wonder you remember it. Well, that's the way it should be. [S laughs.]

June twenty-third. 'Krishnaji and I had breakfast at 6:15 a.m., and we left Brockwood at 7:15 a.m. with Dorothy and Scott to Heathrow. Krishnaji and I flew on Swissair. Our departure was delayed because everyone had to identify their luggage laid out on the runway before boarding, a security protection.' They wanted proof that the owners of the bags were really on the flight, to prevent bombs—unless they were suicidal, of course, which in those days was not a problem.

S: Yes. Exactly. Yes.

M: 'One suitcase was unclaimed and the police took it away.' [S chuckles.] 'In Geneva we took a taxi to the Hotel des Bergues and our usual rooms. We rested, then walked across the bridge and had tea at Mövenpick.' [Chuckles.] Do you remember those? Sort of a food-dispensing place all over Switzerland.

S: Yes, supermarkets.

M: 'We dined in the Amphitryon. Krishnaji's hands were shaking, and it bothered him. In a window, he had seen a very small electric typewriter with a complete sort of display. It is made by Brother, and there's something similar from Minolta, and we wondered if it would make letter writing easier for him in India. Once again, the accustomed Swiss orderly rooms were pleasant. There was especially an enjoyment for me because of its associations with all one's summers coming here. It made me feel quietly very fortunate.'

The twenty-fourth. 'We went to a Mercedes agency to look at a Mercedes 300E-124 series. Then to Jacquet to order ties—six for Joe, three for Theo, and three for Krishnaji. We lunched in the Amphitryon then walked to Patek for the annual watch inspection and finally to buy Krishnaji a towel bathrobe at the Pharmacie Principale. The groove of our yearly errands has its charm. Hertz delivered a cream Opel Corsa, and we drove slowly along the lake and then up into the mountains. Krishnaji was not relaxed in the car as in the past; he is uneasy that we are driving too fast through the villages. He says to go forty kilometers an hour, so we creep through them.' [Chuckles.] 'Instead of a pleasant drive through the Swiss scenery, it all seemed to tire him. Both Vanda and Raman had arrived at the chalet, L'O Perrevoué.' That's the name of that chalet. Raman was cooking that year instead of Fosca, who had done it for so many years. 'They had arrived yesterday.

Krishnaji and I are downstairs in Friedrich Grohe's flat, which he has lent to Krishnaji. Vanda and I have rented the four-bedroom apartment upstairs where we will all take our meals. Krishnaji saw Grohe's flat last summer and said it was all right, but he is not pleased with it now.'

S: In my account, and I've been reading over my accounts of this time before our discussion, it says that Krishnaji's room was very dark.

M: Yes, it was dark.

S: It had only a little tiny window up high, and was partly underground.

M: Yes, the land was sloping.

S: Yes. Krishnaji called it "the dungeon." [Chuckles.] Raman, Dr. Parchure, and Vanda were upstairs.

M: Yes. Well, I can't remember if it was upstairs or if it was a chalet next door. It's funny that I have absolutely no memory of that place.

S: Yes. Everyone wanted you and Krishnaji to exchange with them, but Krishnaji didn't want to because he didn't feel right about putting someone else in "the dungeon." [Chuckles.] And everybody else wanted him to get out of "the dungeon."

M: That's right. Krishnaji had what was supposed to be the best room in the apartment, but it was just that the land sloped and his room was mostly underground. I had a room next to his, but it was not a dungeon. [Chuckles.] It was just a room.

S: Right. Yes.

M: June twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji slept well. I spent the morning getting settled. Vanda, Raman, and I lunched. In the afternoon, we took Raman to enter his driver's license on the Hertz contract so he could drive the rental car for errands. Then we did errands in Gstaad. At 5 p.m., Krishnaji and I drove past empty Chalet Tannegg to our old dear familiar walk. Our first of the season. Krishnaji went a little ahead into the wood, "To see if we are welcome," he said. We were.' [Both chuckle.] 'Friedrich came in after supper.'

The twenty-sixth. 'It was a clear morning, but it rained later. Scott telephoned. The Mercedes through the diplomatic corps could only be ordered in October. There's a hearing on the building permission for The Study tomorrow, which is a preliminary hurdle, but the final decision on getting building permission is delayed.' [Both chuckle.] 'Mary Cadogan rang. She'd seen Dorothy, who confirmed she is retiring. Mary told her something about Scott being the principal. She said it went fairly well. Dr. Parchure arrived.'

S: I don't want to intrude in your recounting of things, but my notes are a little different, and I think, accurate…[chuckles].

M: Say what you have; we're collaborators.

S: Alright. My notes specify that Mary Cadogan said that when she had this conversation with Dorothy, she told Dorothy that when Dorothy did retire that I would probably be the principal.

M: Oh. She softened it.

S: Considerably, so, it wasn't yet a fact, as far as Dorothy knew—it was only that when Dorothy did retire, this would probably be what would happen.

M: I see.

S: And [M chuckles], as we'll see later on, Dorothy didn't find out that she was no longer the principal until she was sitting in the International Committees Meeting.

M: Ouch. Mary Cadogan laid a bear trap for her by being so tactful.

S: Yes. I thought it was unfortunate.

M: June twenty-seventh. 'Vanda and I went to look at a chalet for next summer near Tannegg. It was rather large. Friedrich lunched with us, then he had a rest. Scott rang from Brockwood. The county hearing on the permit to build The Study went well. Krishnaji and I walked along the river across from the tent site, as the Tannegg walk was too muddy.'

The twenty-eighth of June. 'Vanda and I looked at another chalet for next year on the Wispile.' That's a mountain, but it wasn't nice. 'Friedrich came to lunch. Krishnaji and I walked in the late afternoon along the river by the airfield.'

The next day: 'I went to buy a tray for Krishnaji's meals. Friedrich Grohe came to lunch. He showed Vanda and me a chalet he has rented, Chalet Heidi. It's too small for us. Krishnaji had slight cold symptoms, so no walk.'

June thirtieth. 'Krishnaji is better. I worked at my desk in the morning. After the nap, Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, Raman, and I walked near the shooting practice range, and then along the river and the airfield.' All Swiss adult males are in the army and have to be ready to leap with their guns to defend the country, and they have to practice shooting. So that's where we walked. We didn't get fired at, but we were there. [Chuckles.]

July first. 'I walked down to the market. Pupul arrived in a government car to stay till Thursday. She has just come from the opening in Washington of the Festival of India and Rajiv Gandhi's first official visit. She and Kathy Forbes were at lunch. Krishnaji and I walked along the airfield. Krishnaji started having supper alone in bed or at a table downstairs.' What table downstairs?

S: Downstairs was where you and Krishnaji were, and there was a small place to eat, with a little table, and sometimes he would eat down there in the dungeon.

M: I really don't recollect that place. [Chuckles.] 'I rang Erna to tell Michael to come as soon as he can.' To cook, I guess.

July second: 'I went to Gstaad for juices for Krishnaji. Krishnaji talked with Pupul about things in her book. When I got back, Krishnaji and I set out for the airfield walk, but hay fever started in the car, so we came back.'

July third. 'I went for an early walk on the mountain on my own. Krishnaji had tried not taking his one-quarter Halcion tablet, so he slept only one-and-a-half hours. Pupul had breakfast with us downstairs and discussed India's perennial copyright complaint. She says that there are only two things that are acceptable to India and that they are: 1) Share the copyright, which is unacceptable to England as it is in the KFT's only asset and giving it up, even in part, would jeopardize our tax-exempt status; or 2) India publish a book every third year in the West, without vetting by England, and with any publisher they choose.' She always resented the KFT having anything to do with KFI books. 'Failing either of these, Krishnaji would have to decide, which he doesn't want to do. I got Mary Cadogan in London on the phone so they could speak directly about all this. I did this in order to make friendly relations with India, but all the concessions to India that have been made so far have not achieved that. Scott arrived last night. He came to see Krishnaji. Krishnaji slept from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. then came to lunch but slept again all afternoon. His stomach is not right. Friedrich, in Zürich to meet the Lilliefelts, rang to say that there is a huge fire in Ojai. Grand Avenue is being evacuated. I tried to telephone but couldn't get through. So I rang the Dunnes. Amanda said Miranda, who was a TV news reporter, had covered the Ojai fire yesterday for the TV news but was pulled off to cover another one in Baldwin Hills. While we talked, Phil got Miranda via her beeper, and she said she thought the Ojai fire was better by now. Erna and Theo rang from Zürich on their arrival here. I advised them not to fly back, which they asked me about.' They live on Grand Avenue, so it was, uh…

S: Yes. Exactly. I think more needs to be said about this, though. We need to have a little bit more of a discussion.

M: Please say.

S: Well, you don't really bring out how ugly this was, what Pupul was doing—

M: Oh, yes. Oh, yes.

S: It was just hideous—she had put an ultimatum to Krishnaji.

M: She did.

S: And she called it an ultimatum. And Krishnaji felt it was an ultimatum.

M: He said to me later, "She made an ultimatum to me," in that tone of voice. [Voice of shock and disbelief]

S: Yes. Yes. Which was really ugly because she was saying that either India gets what she wants or Krishnaji is going to have to act as an authority, which is something Krishnaji—

M: Yes. He didn't want to do.

S: —never wanted to do. He never wanted to be authoritarian. And so she was forcing him to do that.

M: Yes, that's right.

S: And it was really very, very ugly, and I think that created a real break between Krishnaji and Pupul.

M: Yes, it was. But in my mind—but this is just my recollection—I have a picture in my mind of this happening at Brockwood and not in Switzerland.

S: In my notes, I have it that it happened in Switzerland, and it continues in Brockwood afterward, but it started there when Pupul first came. The problem, of course, with the copyright issue with India was perpetual. It was always in existence.

M: It was always there—they always wanted the copyright and the right to do all the editing.

S: Yes. They thought their English was as good as anybody else's.

M: Yes. And it…[chuckles]

S: And it wasn't.

M: When this began, their English was very poor. It did improve eventually.

S: Right. Yes, but just to say this was a really big deal. And also, in my notes…I keep interrupting with things in my notes…

M: Yes, do!

S: …that Krishnaji really wasn't well. For this whole time.

M: No, that's right.

S: This was the first time he hadn't really enjoyed the drive through the Swiss countryside along the lake with you. I mention before that going out on several walks with him and you at Brockwood, he had more difficulty going over the stiles than I'd ever seen him have before. He was just slower. It wasn't, uh—

M: He also didn't like the rearrangement of his life in Switzerland.

S: Yes. The chalet didn't work for him, but I think that he just also wasn't well.

M: I think he wasn't. Hence the taking sleeping medicine. He took a tiny bit, but for him that was a big deal.

S: Yes. Yes. I know. Also, something else that was in my notes was that, on this day when I arrived—and it happened twice that summer that really horrified me. When I arrived, Krishnaji—for my advancing the building permission for The Study, when I first greeted him—Krishnaji shook my hand and bowed to me and thanked me, and I was horrified at that. That he should ever feel gratitude to me for anything seemed so wrong. I felt so indebted to him that it was awful to me. I was so deeply ashamed [chuckles] that he would have such humility when I have so much more reason to be humble, and wasn't. [Both laugh.]

M: Well, that's sheer egotistical assessment of facts.

S: No doubt, but the whole thing—it shocked me that Krishnaji should bow to me like that. It was just—it was wrong to me. [M chuckles.] I can still feel it now. And he said that because he knew what time the meeting was—the preliminary building permission meeting—and he said that yes, he'd paid attention during that time. [M chuckles.] And he said he knew it when it had passed.

M: Did he? Well, that, uh…yes.

S: So he was…yes, so he was…I always thought that maybe he was the reason we got the permission. [Chuckles.] Anyway.

M: Well, I would not contest that.

July fourth. 'Krishnaji slept nine hours. Pupul left in the morning. I went to Gstaad for a sleeveless cardigan for Krishnaji. Erna and Theo arrived with Friedrich from Zürich. The Lilliefelts have an apartment in Gstaad by the river and a rented car. They had news from Ojai. No houses had been lost. David Moody rang and said the fire came down through Horn Canyon, but was stopped. Ojai was safe, but the fire is heading for Carpinteria. Krishnaji had supper alone. He is hypersensitive. He said to me, "You're not paying attention. It is very serious. The body is under attack." He was very irritable that summer.

S: Yes. But he was right.

M: Yes.

S: I think it was just the cancer that—

M: Yes, I think so too. 'Scott came by later. In talking, Krishnaji was full of energy, and he talked till 10 p.m.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji slept well. I marketed in Rougemont, then worked at my desk. Erna and Theo came to lunch. My brother telephoned from the Vineyard about the Ojai fire. Scott came in the afternoon, and Krishnaji discussed with him, Parchure, and me about making the summer talks only at Brockwood instead of Saanen in the future; and whether to shift it next year or in two years. He wants to discuss it at the International Committees Meeting. Sathaye, the new principal of Rajghat, is here, and he walked with Krishnaji, Scott, and me in a light rain.'

S: To me, the way the canceling of the Saanen talks came about was so typical of Krishnaji. He was concerned about everyone but himself.

M: Yes.

S: He was concerned that people would miss the mountains. He was concerned that it would be too expensive for a lot of people on the continent to go across the English Channel to Brockwood.

M: Yes, the channel, for some reason, crossing the channel was a hazard to some people.

S: Yes, well, I think ever since the Spanish Armada, crossing the English Channel has been a problem for some. [Both chuckle.] Anyway, Krishnaji felt that people might feel that. And he was even worried about the local Saanen and Gstaad village people because it was such a moneymaker for them to have these thousands of people come every summer; and what would they do? So he was concerned about everyone else, even though it was really important for him to cut down his schedule; he was just thinking of everybody else's welfare rather than his own.

M: Yes. That's right.

S: And everybody else was saying no, no, Krishnaji. Let's stop them.

M: Our only leverage was that he had to be well enough to talk.

S: Yes. [Chuckles.]

M: July sixth. 'Krishnaji slept fairly well. I went to Gstaad for errands and saw Erna and Theo's apartment. On the way back to Rougemont, I stopped to see Dorothy and Montague, who had arrived in the Land Rover. Sathaye came to lunch with Krishnaji. I went to look at the tent. I walked with Krishnaji and Scott nearby.'

July seventh: 'I went on an early walk on my own. The weather is fine. I drove Krishnaji to the tent where at 10:30 a.m. he gave his first Saanen talk. The tent is bigger this year and it was full.' [Both chuckle.] 'Afterward, it was a quiet lunch with Krishnaji, Vanda, Friedrich, Raman, and me. He slept in the afternoon, and later Krishnaji and I walked along the river by the airfield.'

July eighth: 'I went on an early walk up the mountain on a beautiful morning, after which I did desk work. Vanda left for Firenze. Dorothy and Montague came with Jane Hammond for lunch. It was a cheerful lunch with Krishnaji telling stories, being charming and warm toward Dorothy. Afterward he, Dorothy, Jane, and I came downstairs to the little sitting room, and Krishnaji said he had something to say to Dorothy. It was his intention to speak to her about her retirement. She has told others she is retiring after the Brockwood Gathering, but she has never told Krishnaji. I knew he was undecided how to raise the subject, and part of the stories and gaiety at lunch were to skitter around that touchy subject. But the how of it came to him downstairs.' This acknowledged "retirement," which she had never mentioned to him.

S: Yes. Dorothy was forever saying to others that she was going to retire and then withdrawing it immediately. So this…

M: …was the first time she admitted it. 'Krishnaji said to Dorothy that, as she is retiring, we had felt that her sitting room with its new door connecting their bedroom should be furnished with whatever she would like as a present from us. The magic word "retirement" was in the open, said, and passed by in chatter about fixing her sitting room. Dorothy looked pleased. And Jane later said that, in the car going back to Saanen, Dorothy said it was the nicest time with Krishnamurti that she could remember. Krishnaji felt it went well too. Later we walked along the river by the airfield with Erna and Theo.' [Chuckles.]

The next day. 'Krishnaji slept very well. I went to Gstaad for another sleeveless cardigan for Krishnaji and some other errands. Friedrich and his son Christoph were at lunch. Jane reports Dorothy is happy at yesterday's lunch. I met Professor Oscar Beck, an Argentinian, and wife at the station, and showed the way to the chalet. Krishnaji gave him an interview. Then Krishnaji and I walked by the river and the airfield.'

July tenth. 'At 10:30 a.m. Krishnaji gave the second talk. Afterward we had a quiet lunch with no guests. At 4 p.m. he saw Nikos Pilavios, a Greek man who does children's television shows, and his wife. Then we walked between the river and the airfield. Scott came in the evening. He had spent the day with architect Critchlow and his assistant Peter Gilbert. Krishnaji spoke of dissolving the international committees.' I don't remember that.

S: I have notes on that. Essentially, the American Foundation had started several years ago having information centers all over the United States; the KFA had dissolved all of them because they were starting to go their own ways and—

M: They were interpreting, and we had no control over what there were doing and no way—because the country is too big. You can't go around monitoring what's happening.

S: Right. And the same problem was happening with the foreign committees. The KFT in England was having the same problem with the foreign committees. In fact, that year there was someone in Holland who had the Dutch mailing list and who was using it to solicit funds to start a school in Holland; but they weren't handing over the mailing list to the KFT or the official Dutch committee. Krishnaji felt that was very wrong.

M: Well, you're good on that because I don't remember that. I mean, it sounds right to me, but I haven't recorded it in my diaries.

S: Yes. But when Krishnaji brought this up with Mary Cadogan, Mary Cadogan said that the foreign committees do too much valuable work with book translations and distributing books in foreign countries to be dissolved, so—

M: Mary Cadogan, it should be pointed out, was sort of in charge of all those committees.

S: Yes.

M: And England was supposedly the mother ship, the parent organization.

M: And they—yes, she was running that. And they derived the right to do what they were doing from England.

S: Yes. So it was her baby, and she didn't want this stopped.

M: Yes. That's right.

July eleventh. 'Kathy, Scott, Friedrich, Keith Critchlow, and Peter Gilbert came to lunch. At 4 p.m. Krishnaji saw Shrinivas.' He was a student at Brockwood. 'We didn't walk, it was too late. Scott and Mary Cadogan, who arrived today, came after supper, and they talked with Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure joining after a while, and it went on till 10 p.m.'

S: Perhaps I should mention some of the things from my notes that go on in this conversation with Krishnaji, Keith Critchlow, and Peter Gilbert.

M: Yes, do.

S: Krishnaji had a talk with them about the proposed building, which left them really stunned. [Chuckles.] Krishnaji was asking questions like, 'Will the architecture make people want to dress nicely?' [Both laugh.] And how the sacredness of what this was all about was supposed to—

M: Yes, the architecture was to promote that.

S: Yes, exactly. "How is the architecture going to foster a sense of the sacred?" And all these things that left them just…[laughs]. They were enthused by it all; even if they were stunned, they were enthused.

M: Well, particularly Critchlow, because we knew he'd written on sacred architecture, so he was pegged as knowing something about this. [Chuckles.]

S: Yes. And also he knew something about Krishnaji's teachings and had a gratitude to Krishnaji. According to what he told me, Critchlow learned about Krishnaji's teachings through his father. When Critchlow's father was going through a hard time about something, it was the teachings that had really helped him. So Critchlow had a sense of indebtedness to Krishnaji. It was all a happy marriage of things.

M: [chuckles] I don't know whether it was at this meeting or previous meetings or subsequent meetings when Krishnaji laid out his wishes for the quiet room.

S: Oh, yes. I think it was at this meeting.

M: Because he describes something, um—

S: Yes, we talked about this already. Yes. Nothing above it, beneath it, next to it. Yes. [M laughs.]

M: July twelfth. 'After an early walk, I went to Gstaad on errands and to pick up Mary Cadogan, who I brought back. Dr. Parchure talked with her, Scott, and me about Indian publishing. Theo and Erna came, and we all lunched. Krishnaji talked at the table till after 4 p.m. about the ancient predictions of the manifestation of Maitreya Bodhisattva. There was only a short rest and we went for a walk at 5:40 by the airfield. Scott came too.'

The next day, 'I worked at the desk. Nikos Pilavios and his wife came to lunch. Krishnaji quite likes them. They are entertaining. At 4 p.m. Krishnaji saw Count Keyserling, the son of the more famous one, but quite ancient himself.' [Chuckles.] 'We walked as usual by the airfield.' I know the name Count Keyserling, but I can't remember now anything about him or his father.

The fourteenth. 'Krishnaji gave his third Saanen talk, after which we had a quiet lunch with no guests. We walked by the river and airfield. Krishnaji had supper in bed, but at 7:30 p.m., KFT trustees came here to discuss the proposed anthology and the copyright problem with India before tomorrow's meeting. I gave Krishnaji his dinner tray earlier so

I could walk over with Hugues, Mary Cadogan, Jane, Scott, and Friedrich to dine at the Hôtel de Commune.'

July fifteenth. 'All trustees in Saanen of KFT, KFI, and KFA came here for a meeting. There was a discussion of the copyright matters raised by India. Dr. Parchure and Sathaye are the only Indian trustees present. Dr. Parchure did a good job of putting forward KFI's position. The ultimatum of Pupul's, i.e., either share the copyright or let India publish what it wants un-vetted on the Western market every three years. There was objection to this. Except for the last book, when apparently Sunanda had help from someone at the Oxford Press who is no longer available, her editing and syntax is not good enough. Krishnaji wonders if only England should edit, a bombshell for India if he puts it to them. Also discussed was the anthology that Weeraperuma has been asked to do by Chetana'—that's an Indian publisher—'and looked on with favor by Mary Links. After thinking it over, I am not in favor. Some others were also doubtful. Short excerpts are envisioned on each of Krishnaji's subjects, so there will be a reducing of his teaching to capsules, a Reader's Digest approach, making it appear easy for those unwilling to really go into the teachings themselves. Even if they were to be done, I do not think that Weeraperuma is the one to make such choices. The next subject raised by Krishnaji was to move the Saanen talks to Brockwood, i.e., have only one European series and at Brockwood to make less travel for Krishnaji. He suggested we have one more year at Saanen, and then move the talks to Brockwood. The discussion went on until 1:30 p.m. Grohe and son were at lunch. After naps, we met Scott and walked along the river and the airfield. Krishnaji felt very weak on return. He said he wondered, "If my time had come," but he felt better and normal after eating supper.'

July sixteenth. 'Dagmar Lichti came at 10 a.m. and discussed Krishnaji's health with him, Dr. Parchure, and me. She stayed to lunch, and the Lilliefelts were also there. At 3 p.m. the Lilliefelts, Mary Cadogan, Hugues, and Grohe discussed the ownership of the Saanen land and the possibilities of the eventual sale of the land when it was not needed for the talks. Later, Krishnaji and I walked with Scott along the river and the airfield.'

S: Alright, there are some other slight elaborations on this.

M: Tell me.

S: Erna, who was ever-quick about money, put in a claim for half of the proceeds of the Saanen land, because the Saanen land had been bought initially with Rajagopal's…

M: A gift of $50,000.

S: Right. And because the KFA had inherited the things from Rajagopal…

M: That's right.

S: …she felt that it was only right that KFA should get half the proceeds of the Saanen land. But Krishnaji wouldn't have any part of that. He expressed that he was very unhappy with what was happening in America in those days, according to my notes. He felt that his time there wasn't being well used, that he was there for months and months and no one was finding people for him to talk with, that the school was losing too much money. I actually came to the defense of the school about this and said, Krishnaji, schools lose money. That's just what they do.

M: Yes, that's just the nature of them.

S: Right, but he was unhappy with things there. He was unhappy with the administration, which he felt wasn't good. He was…

M: You know, this summer was the beginning of manifestations of illness in Krishnaji. He was dissatisfied with almost everything.

S: Oh, yes. Yes. But it's just that Erna brought this up as a real issue, and Krishnaji quashed it, saying no, so these things got expressed. And, at least according to my notes, one of the reasons that Krishnaji was not unhappy with Brockwood—I mean, Brockwood was a mess, but he didn't feel his time there was wasted because the students were older, and he complained about the students in Ojai being too young for him to talk with, really.

M: Yes.

S: And he was tired of talking with the parents and tired of talking with the staff. One of the things that Brockwood had going for it was all the video equipment, and we had cooked up all kinds of projects: a videotape series of his talking with students, and others with different well-known persons, etcetera. So, in a way, he felt his time was being used…

M: Yes, he did.

S: …but he didn't feel that in America, and he was unhappy with it. But anyway, just to say that this all came up because of the Saanen land. Also, I'm sure we'll see in your diaries that there were a series of considerations about whether we just sell the land or whether we should build on it and then sell part; because we could build on it and keep a couple of apartments for ourselves…

M: Yes. That's right.

S: …to come in the summer. Krishnaji had a notion that a couple of people might come—

M: Yes, come on holiday, I think. Yes. I remember that.

S: [chuckles] Anyway, let's move on.

M: The seventeenth of July. 'At 10:30 a.m. Krishnaji gave his fourth Saanen talk. It began in a remote voice, which deepened and strengthened as he went to greater depth. It was a special talk.[1] "Self-centeredness is corruption," he said. It was the pure essential Krishnaji teaching to the world, coming through that fragile, gentle, utterly commanding figure as it has all these many, so many, years. There was a stillness of the audience at the end. And he made a gesture that he would get up and go only when they did. I could scarcely speak going to the car where I was set upon by the happy Fouérés…' The happy Fouérés were tiresome, to put it euphemistically. [Both chuckle.] They were a French couple, and he wrote all kinds of elaborate things about Krishnaji's teachings. 'I was set upon by the happy Fouérés wanting to come to present his newest wretched book. Not then and there, which would have been simple, but at the chalet—their annual demand. Krishnaji was far up the road when I finally caught up to him with the car. After we had passed through Saanen, driving slowly, his head fell on my shoulder in a faint, which has not happened in some years. I kept driving slowly, and he came to within a minute. David and Saral Bohm, who are here for five days, came to lunch. David is going to conferences that seem to be mixtures of science and—what to call it, philosophy? He goes to one with the Dalai Lama next week. There is a rumor, and Krishnaji raised it at lunch, that there is a rift between Krishnaji and David. Erna had heard it from Clayton Carlson.' Clayton Carlson was the Harper & Row editor that did the Krishnaji books. 'The conversation was, as ever, between them. I sat and talked a while with them after Krishnaji went for his nap. Saral feels the rumor may come about through Dorothy's critical talk to various people these past difficult years. Later, we met Scott at the river near the airfield and went for the walk. Krishnaji asked that we walk slowly. Slowness is now something he keeps asking for when I drive. Dr. Parchure gave him some back massage before he went to bed, saying his body is sore to any pressure.' He was sick, and sickening. That's why I dread the rest of this.

S: Yes. I know. I know.

M: I don't really want to finish this.

S: I know. I know, Mary.

M: Anyway.

S: Also on this, in my notes, I have it how often, for years now, Krishnaji would be weak or ill before his talks, but when the talks started, he would somehow get this enormous energy and be tremendously strong. He might collapse afterward, but he would have this tremendous vitality and energy when he talked. And this didn't happen this year, until this talk, talk four. And I said, and in my notes, that it is noticeable on the videotapes—you can even hear it in the audiotapes. That it's this talk finally, number four, that he gets that enormous charge, which was late. Also, that I'm giving him the hand and foot massage these days, every evening while Parchure is giving him the full body massage in the morning. But Krishnaji wasn't well.

M: No, he wasn't well. He wasn't well. I really look on the Washington talks as the last blaze of his strength, not the talking, but everything about him. [Pause.]

July eighteenth. 'Fortunately this had been planned as a day of rest, for in the night Krishnaji took a quarter tablet of Halcion, as a new pill given to him by Dr. Lichti had not put him to sleep. There was a cumulative effect of the two pills, and he was unsteady and weaving. Dr. Parchure had Krishnaji take tea for breakfast, which was enough stimulus to clear the pill effect. At 10 a.m. I went with Gisèle Balleys to a housing agent, Gerax, to look for a chalet for next year. We found quite a nice one, Chalet Bea, near the Park Hotel in Gstaad. Krishnaji had lunch in bed after massage. He is enthusiastic about the effect of tea, which he hasn't drunk for most of his life. Erna and Theo came in the afternoon to talk about the Oak Grove's new arrangement for Krishnaji's entrance and the seating for next year.'

S: This is at the public talks, obviously.

M: Yes. We walked with them plus Scott near Eggli, but it was too sunny for Krishnaji. Dr. Parchure had a long talk with Krishnaji about his regime, reactions, etcetera.'

S: My notes say that this was a walk that Theo had discovered and had thought was good. It was difficult to find walks because these days Krishnaji needed a walk that was level. And, of course, in the mountains, that's difficult. Secondly, it had to be shady.

M: Yes, shady was always a factor.

S: And thirdly, it has to not have a lot of people around it. And, of course, any time Krishnaji consistently walked someplace, people discovered it, and they would start accumulating there. So Theo had found this walk in the morning, and it was nice and shady. But in the afternoon, [chuckles] the sun had moved and it was in full sun.

M: I remember that. I can see the walk.

July nineteenth. 'There was the annual general meeting of all the International Committees held again at the Ermitage Hotel in Schönried. Krishnaji asked their opinion on moving the Saanen talks to Brockwood after next year. Then he spoke of Dorothy, her retirement as principal after this year's talks at Brockwood, and of all she had done. Juan Colell of the Spanish committee rose and thanked Dorothy. And there was strong applause. Then Scott's appointment was announced. There was a lunch at the hotel, but Krishnaji and I came back to Rougemont for a quiet lunch. In the afternoon after rest, he briefly received the old Spanish couple who each summer bring a gift of a thousand francs, and then the Fouérés, who brought their latest book. We walked with Scott along the river by the airfield. In the evening, separately, both Hugues and Jean-Michel telephoned to say that many committee people at lunch had said why wait another year, why not move the talks to Brockwood next summer. They want to see Krishnaji in the morning about this.'

S: Yes. That's what finally convinced him—that the committees had said this. But we have to go into more about this announcement of Dorothy's retirement because it was just remarkable. As you remember, there was always Krishnaji facing this roomful of committee members, and usually he would have a couple of people next to him. This year, on one side he had, I think it was, Dorothy right next to him, and then Jane, and then there was a horseshoe effect around and I was several people away, but enough in the curve of the horseshoe so that I could look directly at Krishnaji, Dorothy, and Mary Cadogan, who were flat on facing the committees. Krishnaji started by saying that it was important to announce—and I had no idea this was coming—that Dorothy was retiring and that I was nominated as the next principal. This was the first time Dorothy had ever heard that I had actually been nominated as the next principal. There had been a lot of rumors circulating that Dorothy had been usurped and was being pushed out, and it was important right now to quash that.

M: She said that?

S: No. When Krishnaji started, he began by thanking her and saying how wonderful she had been, etcetera, and everything she'd done, etcetera. Then he talked about these rumors, and, of course, Dorothy had been the one who had been telling a lot of people in the foreign committees these things, and here Krishnaji was saying that there was an orderly transition that he supported. When Krishnaji announced this, and I have it in my notes, Dorothy jumped. She was stunned. And I kept looking at her because I couldn't look at the audience—I was too…[chuckles]. Krishnaji also said that, back when she had her heart attack, that he had said to her, "If something happens, who would you like to take over?" And she had said, me. At this Dorothy began to respond, and Krishnaji put his hand over on her and just said, "Wait a minute, just wait, just wait, I haven't finished." So he stopped her from responding. And he continued. Dorothy had nothing then to say. So this transition was brought about slowly and quietly in one way back at Brockwood, but it was a shock in the sense that it was brought out publicly like that. It was clear that Mary Cadogan had said something to Krishnaji about feeling it was important to announce this and quash these rumors.

M: Yes. I can't remember—and it isn't reflected here—any discussions with Dorothy before.

S: No. No. I don't think there were any. A lot of the people on the foreign committees were about her age and were close to her. They saw her as the one who would let them come and stay at Brockwood, etcetera, etcetera, and she was a heroine to a lot of people. So for her to say that she had been usurped and was being pushed out was something they took seriously. And here was Krishnaji saying it wasn't so; this was an orderly transition that he backed. I think that was quite difficult for her.

M: Yes. Yes. Yes.

S: It was, yes. Also I mentioned that, before this fourth talk, it was also announced about The Study; that we were going to have a study center, and how important this was. In my notes I also mentioned that in this committee meeting a discussion occurs between Krishnaji and Jean-Michel. I think Jean-Michel was on Krishnaji's other side because I think he held Jean-Michel's hand during part of this talk. It was a conversation about what it means to study the teachings, and it was a very good discussion.

M: July twentieth. 'At 10 a.m. Hugues, Jean-Michel, Mary Cadogan, and Scott came and urged Krishnaji to begin the new program next year, ending Saanen this year and having one European series of talks at Brockwood. Krishnaji listened, and the decision was made. The announcement of it will be made tomorrow in the tent. This means less travel for Krishnaji, less getting used to strange chalets, and one set of talks in a place where he is at home. It also matches the new series in the U.S. and underscores Brockwood Park as the Krishnamurti center. Scott is confident we can figure out the logistics of housing, etcetera. Dagmar Lichti and Grohe came to lunch. She approves medically the new plan and made many other medical suggestions with Parchure. At 4:30 p.m. Mr. Mirabet came for his annual greeting and gift.' That's that nice man who once a year came and gave money, which Krishnaji immediately gave to the work…Brockwood, as a rule. 'We walked by the airfield. Krishnaji wants to leave here sooner than August twelfth. "I will never come back here." Asit's visit and Vanda's return weigh against leaving early, as Asit is somewhere unknown in Europe. We talked about this in the evening with Parchure and about Krishnaji's highly increased sensitivity. The room he is in bothers him. It is too small, dark, and a "dungeon."…"I cried the day I saw it," he said, but he refuses to move upstairs.' He did eventually move.

July twenty-first. 'Krishnaji's fifth and last Saanen talk. It was announced by Mary Cadogan and Hugues that Saanen was ending, but Brockwood talks would continue to be held, and next year they would be from July twentieth to August eighth. The rumor had spread through the morning queue outside the tent, so there seemed no surprise from the huge audience. The actor Richard Gere, whom Mary Cadogan had asked to be invited, came to lunch with a girl, Sylvia Martins, also Scott and Friedrich. Krishnaji talked at the table till almost 4 p.m. The stimulus of a new person seemed to carry him on with little rest. He still wanted to walk and we went by the airfield. We telephoned Vanda about the change to the Saanen talks. She is coming on the seventh or eighth, so we will not leave earlier for Brockwood.'

S: I have it in my notes—and I was quite surprised by this—Krishnaji had spoken about the story that the pandit had told to really very few people.

M: Yes.

S: And he talked to Richard Gere about it, which I was quite surprised by.

M: Well, Richard Gere became—

S: Oh, he was very interested in Tibetan Buddhism.

M: He was about to go from Saanen to the Dalai Lama somewhere. And he continues to have something to do with the Dalai Lama because I get things from that committee that he organized. I've given money to it for Tibet. He's not featured so much anymore, but he got that thing going.

S: Yes, but I was surprised that Krishnaji talked with him about that. And also that Krishnaji talked with him about creativity, which Richard Gere, you know, has some claim to knowing something about. But, of course, Krishnaji was knocking an artistic notion of creativity in favor of something much more profound. And Richard Gere listened and was attentive, which I thought that was really quite good of Richard Gere, actually. The girl, on the other hand, was just ridiculous. [Both chuckle.]

M: Yes.

July twenty-second. 'Krishnaji was tired, so rather disturbed. Clearly the small "dungeon" room is oppressing him. I got Parchure to help persuade him to move into the other flat upstairs where he would have light, a balcony, and a view of the great gray granite look of the mountain that rises above Rougemont. He agreed to move, so he and I are now in the upstairs flat and much more comfortable. Parchure and Raman are down in Grohe's one. While I worked on the over 100 written questions handed in for the three question-and-answer sessions, Krishnaji talked urgently to Parchure about India. His voice was agitated. It sounded almost crying. He eventually called me in. He said that in India, he trusts Sathaye, Upasani, Maheshji, but not Hiralal. He mentioned Rishi Valley, Radhika "probably," Mrs. Thomas, and Narayan. But at Vasanta Vihar he doesn't trust the three Patwardhans.' He turned against the Patwardhans very strongly.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: In a lot of his letters to me on his next trip to India, he was very critical.

S: Yes. Well, they were in many ways quite terrible.

M: Yes. 'He spoke of future schedules in India being one year at Rajghat and Bombay, alternate years Rishi Valley and Madras. I said it is not healthy to be in Bombay. "Oh, we would only go there for talks. Two weeks."' That was his reply. 'I asked if he planned to cut the total time in India. "No." I asked did he then want to spend three months in Rajghat? He recoiled and said, "I couldn't do that."' [S chuckles.] 'Then as he talked it developed that travel is too tiring, but he cannot stay too long in one place.' See, there were all these conflicts in his needs.

S: Yes.

M: 'He has become hypersensitive. He feels people are impinging upon him, focused on him. If he stays in a place too long, there is a pressure he cannot stand now, and he must talk or the energy will go out of him as he is here to talk. If not, he will weaken and end. "It wants to disappear," and he needs someone to challenge him. Bohm used to do it and it made Krishnaji go deeper, but Bohm can't now. Pupul can't. No one can. No one we know. It is what he needs. The paradox of his needing rest and needing not to let down is the dilemma. The new program of Brockwood as the only European talks, means he will be there for months. And finding a place to take him away from people's focus will be a puzzle, his physical needs and hypersensitivity increasing as they are. He talked at length, trying to find answers himself. I am learning not to say anything but let him talk in his present way, which is too often to state things well known, as if he were laying a groundwork of a known in order to come upon the new. The present situation, what is now has to be sorted out from what has been. Finally, at almost 1 p.m., he went for a quick bath. With Parchure and Raman, I began moving our things up. By 4 p.m. Krishnaji's room, sunny and in order, was ready, and he lay down. But then arrived one Hugo Brewster, a Canadian friend of Paola and John Cohen, and Krishnaji talked to him. He walked with Scott while I sorted questions for tomorrow. By now, tonight, we are settled in the upper rooms, and I think it is better. We'll see in the morning if he thinks so, but he stood a long time on the balcony looking at the mountains. That seemed to do him good.'

The twenty-third of July. 'Krishnaji slept well in his new room. It is an improvement. At 10:30 a.m. he held the first question-and-answer meeting in the tent and answered three questions in great depth. Then there was a quiet lunch. A letter of invitation came from Mr. and Mrs. Nikos Pilavios, the Greek couple whom he saw and who came to lunch here. It suggests visiting them in June on a Greek island and appeals to Krishnaji. Then we talked about it, looking up the island in the atlas. It is fun to think of it, but is there any shade on a Greek island?' [S chuckles.] 'At 5:30 p.m. we went back to our very dear and lovely Tannegg walk, where Scott's video crew lay in wait to videotape him walking on this favorite Gstaad walk. I spoke on the phone to Cohen, who says a draft of a settlement seems all right and is being sent to me.'

July twenty-fourth. 'Krishnaji held the second question-and-answer session in the tent. Krishnaji now says we should vacation here next year. At lunch there were Erna, Theo, Friedrich, Scott, and a friend of Paolo's, Hugh Brewster, a young Canadian publisher. Again a new person seemed to stimulate Krishnaji to talk, tell stories, and be serious too. At 4 p.m. he saw a Honduran boy, "Rivera," who begged him outside the tent for a brief word. Sathaye and Scott came on the Tannegg walk.'

July twenty-fifth. 'Krishnaji held the third question-and-answer meeting and the last ever of the Gatherings in Saanen. There was no goodbye, just a profound silence as he sat for a few moments and then asked, "May I leave?" I couldn't speak in the car, and we drove slowly.' [Crying.] It makes me cry to remember this.

S: Yes. Yes. Yes.

M: 'We drove slowly as he wants to now.

At 1 p.m. Krishnaji, Kathy, Scott, Raman, and I went to the Bon Accueil restaurant in Chateau d'Oex. Not too good. Sathaye walked with us in the Tannegg wood. Later I gave a dinner for Dorothy, Mary Cadogan, and the Lilliefelts at Restaurant Chesery in Gstaad.' Do you remember that nice restaurant?

S: Yes, of course.

M: 'It was a good dinner and cheerful, even though Mary and I were able to tell Dorothy that the Dutch are quoting her as saying twenty-five people have been sent away from Brockwood in the last year and new people don't care about the teachings.' How did we ever mention that to her?

July twenty-sixth. 'There was a long talk with Krishnaji in the morning about all the foundations. "It is watching," he said. He speaks as if that something is deciding what happens to him. "It" will decide when his work is done and hence, by implication, his life. He is disturbed by the divisions in the Indian foundation and their suspicion of the two Western foundations. He is disturbed generally by everything. The de Maurexes, Jean and Catherine, and Grohe came to lunch. Jean and Hugues are handling what we do with the Saanen land. Krishnaji likes de Maurex, has confidence in him. He liked his neat demeanor. Krishnaji talked to Stephen at 4 p.m. He didn't feel like walking but talked to me about KFA. Only the Lilliefelts and I are there, he said.

S: Meaning you and the Lilliefelts were the only active trustees living in Ojai?

M: That was true.

S: I had introduced the de Maurexes to Krishnaji, and one of the reasons that I knew that Krishnaji would approve of them—

M: Because he was neat?

S: He's very neat. And they're very well-mannered, and they're very nice people. But the clincher was that they had a brand-new Mercedes.

M: Oh, I was not aware of this salient fact. [Both chuckle.] Oh my, you concealed it from me.

The twenty-seventh of July: 'At 9:30 a.m. Erna and Theo came and talked most of the morning with Krishnaji and me. They stayed to lunch, and Topazia came. We packed things to go to Brockwood in the van. Hugues and Suzanne came by to say goodbye. Krishnaji talked in the late afternoon with Sathaye instead of going for a walk.'

The next day. 'Mary Cadogan and Gisèle Balleys came about Saanen Gathering matters. Mary stayed to talk to Krishnaji and me about her plans. Sathaye was at lunch. I went to look at rooms in a Rougemont Hotel for next summer's vacation. Krishnaji, Sathaye, and I went to walk near Tannegg. Krishnaji said to me, "You are responsible for Ojai more than the other two."'

The twenty-ninth. 'I drove Dr. Parchure to Gstaad to get various things for Krishnaji, then went to the bank with donations. Krishnaji, Sathaye, Parchure, and I lunched at the Hotel Caprice in Rougemont, and I saw rooms we could have for next summer's holiday. Krishnaji liked the place and said to settle it. It was cheerful. Krishnaji gave an interview to a Mr. Elkabir. Krishnaji rested instead of walking. The Lilliefelts left for Ojai.'

The thirtieth. 'Harsh came to see Krishnaji. I went to Gstaad on errands. Sathaye and Friedrich were at lunch. Renée Weber came to see Krishnaji about a book she is doing and was with Krishnaji for two hours. Sathaye leaves tomorrow for India.'

July thirty-first. 'Rain. Krishnaji talked at length with Claire and Harsh before they left for England. I changed the Opel at Hertz for a Volkswagen Golf and went to Gstaad on errands. In the afternoon, Krishnaji saw Gisèle Balleys at 4 p.m. and Jackie Siddoo at 4:30 p.m. He talked intently at lunch and after supper with Parchure, Raman, and me about how to bring about a religious center.'

The first of August. 'I worked at the desk all morning. Friedrich and his son, Christoph, came to lunch. At 4:30 p.m., Krishnaji saw Rupert Oysler and his wife. Scott rang from Brockwood Park. He said that we won unanimous approval from the county council to build The Study at the hearing today.'

There is very little the next day.

August third. 'I worked at my desk in the morning. Friedrich and his son Christoph came to lunch. Erna telephoned from Ojai saying that she has seen Cohen and is sending the text of an agreement. There was the Tannegg walk with Krishnaji. He asked me, "What would you do if you were responsible for Vasanta Vihar?"…"There is no religious center."…"Either I take charge or leave the whole thing." He upbraided Dr. Parchure and others in Rajghat for not objecting to Pupul about Hiralal.' You see, he was irritable.

S: Yes, but Hiralal was not a good person.

M: No, he wasn't.

S: He was Pupul's flunky and Pupul put him in, and other people should have objected, but they didn't because Pupul was a bully.

M: Pupul was…yes. 'We rang Scott about the name of The Study changing it to The Krishnamurti Teaching Center.

S: At this point I was in Monte Carlo.

M: You were?

S: Yes. I can remember this conversation clearly. [Both chuckle.]

M: What were you doing there?

S: Kathy and I were there vacationing, staying at the de Maurexes' flat. I remember having that and, I think, another conversation in which Krishnaji had new ideas of what we should call The Study Center. [Chuckles.]

M: And then it says, 'Tankha situation.' I don't know what that is.

S: That was Harsh Tankha and his wife Claire.

M: Ah, yes, their marriage. I do remember. Tankha, I thought of a tangka on the wall.

S: Yes, no [chuckles]…no such luck. [Both chuckle.]

M: There isn't anything of significance the next day, but on August fifth, 'I walked down to the post office and, after showing my passport, was given an express envelope from Erna of the latest draft of the settlement agreement with the Rajagopal case. It was felt to be acceptable by Stanley Cohen and the Lilliefelts. I read it to Krishnaji. We both objected to the word "amicable" describing the settlement. Rajagopal wants a statement on the settlement printed in the Bulletins, but we have pared down the language. I was uneasy about the language defining Rajagopal's restrictions on publishing and/or letting others publish Krishnaji writings in his, Rajagopal's, possession. I telephoned Erna later at 6 p.m., who sounded tired, and she suggested I speak directly to Cohen. I did ring, but he was out. I will ring tomorrow. I also telephoned Vanda, who will come on Friday.' This is written on Monday. 'At 11:30 a.m., Catherine and Jean de Maurex came in their Mercedes 190, of interest to Krishnaji, and drove us to an old-fashioned hotel up the mountain behind Vevey, a place where the old, infirm, and rich go for health somethings. Fossils are in the dining room, and a very long ordered-in-advance lunch. But the view from the restaurant was nice, and Krishnaji seemed to like the de Maurexes. He drove expertly, which Krishnaji observed, and so did not become nervous when going faster than he prefers these days. Catherine and Jean also put "serious" questions to Krishnaji at lunch, which he fielded. We came back via Aigle and the Col du Pillon. Rain began by the time we got back. In the evening, Krishnaji said that I should write a book, "even if only a hundred pages, about what it is like being with him, and what he said." And then he said, "I will teach you meditation before I go to India when you have a completely controlled body."' [Both chuckle.] He was irritated by gestures, and I use my hands when I talk and that annoyed him. [S chuckles.]

S: Okay. We have to end it there.

M: Okay.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] For the video of the talk of July seventeenth, 1985.

Issue 86: August 6, 1985 to September 23, 1985

The strain on Krishnaji of his unknown illness continues to show, and dramatic changes to his traditional speaking schedule are proposed. There is, despite Krishnaji's waning energy, an urgency he constantly expressed to make things "right" with his organizations which he currently does not feel are "right."

It seems extraordinary, with hindsight, that we didn't see his death galloping forward. Of course, we didn't want to.

Mary: Very well. We are beginning today's discussion with August sixth, 1985. Krishnaji and I are still in Switzerland, at the very end of our very last trip in that beautiful place we had enjoyed for so many years. 'I was awake at 2 a.m. I'm not sleeping properly these days. In rain I went at 10 a.m. to the Banque Cantonale for the annual meeting with Mr. Hans Liechti to review the Alzina account investments, the interest from which helps pay for Krishnaji's needs. While I was out, Michael answered a call from Asit, who is arriving Thursday night or Friday morning and asked if I would get him a room. Friedrich offered one in his place, but probably Asit will be better off at the Hotel Caprice. It was too wet for the usual walk. Cohen telephoned and, with Krishnaji there and at Krishnaji's instructions, I asked Cohen, as our friend as well as our lawyer, what he felt was the right thing to do. We want to settle this interminable affair, but are we, in the proposed settlement text, leaving Krishnaji, in any way that we could prevent, unprotected against some new nastiness from Rajagopal? Cohen said that if Rajagopal were to slander Krishnaji, for instance, in the future, we could still act legally. I said we objected to the word in the settlement agreement "amicable," and he said he would try to get it out. Also, he will try to improve the language in the publishing rights clause and also in protecting the original settlement agreement of 1977. I then told him that Krishnaji and I agreed to go along with the settlement if he could work out these things. Krishnaji had me send him his affection and said we look forward to seeing him in the spring for the pleasure of it and not all this legal business.' [Chuckles.] He was a nice man, Mr. Cohen.

Scott: Yes, yes, you've always said that.

M: When Krishnaji and I used to drive on the freeway by the building where Cohen had his office, Krishnaji would salute Mr. Cohen in the building and then say, "Mr. Cohen is an honorable man." I told Cohen that eventually. [S laughs.] 'I then telephoned Erna. I reported the Cohen conversation. She still sounded a bit low but says that everything is alright. "So we settled it?" asked Krishnaji. He said he would not show the text of the agreement to the other foundations. "It's really not their business." Cohen said Krishnaji could sign for them as no resolution had been demanded and Krishnaji is president of KFT and KFI. Tilly von Egmond can sign for Holland, and she's coming to the Brockwood talks. After supper, Krishnaji had me wash and give him my rudraksha and gold chain, and he put it on for the night. Then he said, "Now, every day sit quietly.

Don't lie down but sit upright with a quiet mind. Do it for five minutes, but every day." Then, "I've never told anybody this."'

The seventh of August. 'It was cold in the morning, and when the clouds and fog lifted, there was snow on the mountains above us. It reminds Krishnaji and me of the Maheshamurti in Elephanta.' What? How can the snow remind me of that?

S: Was it a shape?

M: You know, I have that photograph of Maheshamurti, the three…

S: Yes, the three-faced god at Elephanta, or maybe it was just the sense of it.

M: I can't remember. 'I had laid a fire in the empty fireplace, and it was cheery when Krishnaji came down to lunch. I had met Nadia Kossiakof at the Rougemont station, and she was with us. She had heard this morning that her mother had inherited some money, so a worry and weight was lifted for Nadia. She doesn't complain, but she has a difficult life. In the afternoon, Krishnaji had me note a memoranda about making Brockwood a religious place. "1: Look at trees, nature. Be aware of everything. 2: Study Krishnaji's teachings to know (even intellectually) all he has said. 3: Are you really interested in this? If not, do your job well, as well as you can, but ease out."' [S chuckles.] 'He also had me note things he wants to tell KF India trustees. "1: Hurt. If anyone gets hurt by what I'm about to say, they haven't listened to the teachings."' [Both chuckle.]

S: Well, that pretty much solved it all. [Laughs.]

M: That's right. That takes care of that. [Both laugh.] Oh, dear. '"2: Organization has swallowed the teachings. 3: Krishnaji will be ninety-one in a few months and will probably live another five to ten years. Before he dies, he feels it is absolutely necessary to have a religious center. 4: Trust. K. questions whether you trust him. You have often said that K. is influenced, etcetera"' They were often saying that.

S: Yes. They were always saying that whenever he disagreed with them. that he was being influenced. [Chuckles.]

M: Yes, they would claim he was influenced. Probably by you or me or by the whole long line of people before we turned up. '"5: Circumstances; pragmatism is not his way of action. 6: We—they. In publishing India considers it is separate from England." Later we walked in the Tannegg wood. The sky had cleared. The sun was bright. And the fresh snow on the mountains was a glory.'

Now I've added in just a piece of paper, which was paper-clipped to this page. I guess it's to me: These are quotes: '"You are responsible for Ojai more than the other two, Erna and Theo. You have been closest to Krishnaji. You must be sensitive to that. It will go with K. when he dies, I think. I might have to stay in India or Brockwood or Ojai, but you are responsible for Ojai. You can't ask for it. Just to be sensitive. Pay attention. I'm not going to correct you, the way you put your thumbs on the steering wheel.”’ [M chuckles.] ‘“When you drive me back to Geneva please go thirty-five miles an hour in the towns or it makes me nervous. Do you understand? This is very serious. You must keep the door open to That.”’

August eighth is very short: ‘We all lunched with Friedrich at Chesery in Gstaad and afterward Krishnaji had his hair cut by Monsieur Nicolas. Came back and he slept “heavily” for an hour before the now daily cup of tea before a Tannegg walk.’ That was prescribed by Dr. Parchure.

S: I can remember this tea regimen because Krishnaji kept up this tea after Parchure left. It was very mild tea, I mean really very mild.

M: [chuckles] Pale beige.

S: Yes, pale, insipid stuff. But he was so sensitive that on his walk afterward he would march along and he would say something like, “Boy, this tea is really powerful stuff” or “really great stuff.” He was all—

M: He didn’t say “Boy,” though.

S: No, he almost certainly didn’t. [M chuckles.] Perhaps it was, “By Jove, this is really…” [Laughs.]

M: [laughs] Yes, “by Jove.” Probably “by Jove.” Apparently, according to something I read, “by Jove” is very dating because nobody these days says “by Jove.”

S: Yes. Nobody.

M: This is what was said in the—

S: Yes, Victorian or Edwardian times.

M: Yes. [Both chuckle.] Yes, yes. ‘He slept heavily for an hour before the now-daily cup of tea before a Tannegg walk. Krishnaji likes the Volkswagen Golf. As we came into the wood, he asked, “May we come in?” Then, “Head up,” he keeps saying to me as I walked.

S: Yes. [Chuckles.]

M: All of my peccadillos, my shortcomings, and bad habits—he was bearing down on them.

S: I know. In my notes I have him not only telling you to keep your head up, but you had to be attentive to your posture, and all kinds of other things, and [chuckles] at one point, you said to him, "If I was doing all these things I wouldn't be able to walk." [Both laugh.]

M: Asit telephoned from London. He has to fly to Singapore Saturday so he is uncertain whether there is the time for him to come here. I got Krishnaji on the phone briefly and later Asit rang back to say he would come tomorrow. In the evening, Krishnaji told me that Erna and I must see that he has things to do when he comes to Ojai. He isn't going to just sit there. Then he came back and said I mustn't arrange for things for him to do just to please him. It must be something "you think is necessary…Are you listening? Do you understand? Otherwise I'll stay at Brockwood and just come for the Ojai talks." My replies only seemed to irritate him.' [S chuckles.]

S: Yes. I also had in my notes that at one point he feels that Erna and whoever in Ojai are arranging things for him to do just to placate him, not because they're really useful.

M: Yes. It wasn't very easy to arrange things for him.

S: No.

M: In fact, we'd run out of people for him to talk to there.

The ninth of August. 'In the afternoon, Vanda arrived from Florence on one train, and Asit came in on another from Geneva. He is staying at Hotel Caprice for one night. Krishnaji talked to him at length "about everything." Then the three of us went for a walk in the Tannegg wood. Asit used his new Sony video camera to film Krishnaji there.' Every time Asit turned up, he had a new camera. 'It was 7:40 p.m., when we got back and all of us, including Krishnaji, had supper at the table. Toward the end of the meal, Krishnaji asked the question, "Is humanity disintegrating?" and an intense questioning ensued on his part. "Is there some part of the brain that refuses this disintegration? If there is, will that turn it around? Something that will break the circle? Is there some part of the brain that rejects conditioning?…I am into something." The conversation went on till after 10 p.m.' He was strange in those days, wound up and…

August tenth. 'Krishnaji talked with Asit in the morning, and Asit left after lunch for Geneva and Singapore. He has told Krishnaji he will be through with his business by June or July of next year and wants to work for Krishnaji. Krishnaji did not ask him how, and now he wants me to ask Asit what he meant by that if he telephones. But it is unlikely that Asit will call. He will see Krishnaji in Madras. Vanda, who had not met Asit, said she liked him. "He listens well," she said. There was the usual rest for Krishnaji after lunch, then Krishnaji wanted to walk to get out of this house. "I'll be glad to leave this place the day after tomorrow. I can't stand this place. I don't know why the atmosphere is all wrong. I cried the first day we came here," he said. In the car going toward Gstaad, he said, "Probably it was wrong for me to ask advice…" from Asit "…and afterward, when I was washing my hands, I knew what to do." This was about the problems in KFI, and he said he couldn't say now what he will do, but it will come to him there.' In other words, in India. 'He will plunge in and know what to do. In the Tannegg wood he felt well and away from the wrong atmosphere of the house.' He really hated that house.

S: Yes, I remember.

M: 'On the way back he said, "The spirit has left Saanen. Probably that is why I feel so uncomfortable. It has moved to Brockwood." He looks forward, as I do, to getting there.

S: What you have just said reminded me of something: I can remember well, on one of our walks along the airstrip when Krishnaji—and it must have been after the talks were finished, because Krishnaji said—he was looking down the valley, you know, toward Gstaad—that beautiful long valley he liked. He'd often come out of the woods just to stop and look at that—look down the valley. And I remember him saying once something like, "The spirit is going. It's going from here. And it's going to Brockwood." I thought that was extraordinary at the time. But I wasn't there on this occasion that you just mentioned, so he obviously repeated it.

M: Yes. He did. 'In the car he also said that Vanda had told him that he should have a long rest. "Maybe I should just rest when I come to Ojai." I asked if he might feel like writing again. "Maybe," he replied. Mary has written that she and Joe have enough money from the change of the apartment to come to Ojai in April. Krishnaji wants to rent a car for their use with his Dodge money, which is now $12,000.' Miss Dodge left him a tiny little sum, but he never spent most of it, so it had mounted up to $12,000. [S laughs.] It was probably in the '20s or '30s when it was left to him. It was probably—

S: Yes. A good sum of money in those days. Yes.

M: I think it was $500 a month.

S: I think it was £500 a year.

M: Yes. I know that when I took it over from Rajagopal it was in dollars in securities in the Pacific Bank in Hollywood. It was deposited by the trust fund, Miss Dodge's trust fund. Anyway. It was nice in the 1920s or 1930s, whenever it was left; but it wouldn't buy him a pair of trousers at Huntsman now.

S: [laughs] I know.

M: 'We talked too about Cortina d'Ampezzo, suggested by Vanda for next summer's holiday instead of the Hotel Caprice here in Rougemont, where we have booked rooms. "Twenty-eight years in this valley may be enough. We can go to the French Alps or Italian mountains." And then, "While we are in Ojai, let's study Italian and French one hour a day." We agreed, and I am to get the cassettes.' You know, he liked those, um—

S: Yes. Foreign language cassettes.

M: Yes. 'He was more cheerful by evening. Action, learning, and driving in a new Mercedes are in this extraordinary brain at ninety.' [Chuckles.] He was never going to rest.

S: No. I know. [Laughs.] Fat chance. I was just thinking that when you were saying it. Yes. [M chuckles.]

M: The eleventh. 'Packed. A fine, warm late summer day. Vanda is a little bearish on the possibility of Cortina d'Ampezzo. She said it is not as comfortable as here, but Krishnaji is expansive. He would like to go to Venice, to Florence, to Rome. Vanda has made a mark in persuading him to have more time for rest and that today meant going to places other than Switzerland. When we came to the Tannegg walk, he said to the trees, "Goodbye. We'll see you in two or three years." And coming back through Gstaad and Saanen, it was, "Ciao, until a couple of years." He talks too about our using an apartment that may be built on the Saanen Gathering land; something that may not exist for five years. All this is music to me and lets in a blessed sense of ease and summer sunlight. He said he wants to telephone Asit in October and ask him if he would like to take over the running of KFI, the publishing, seeing to translations, etcetera, the business part—not the religious aspect, "though he could try that and see if he can."' [Both chuckle.] 'He said Dr. Parchure, whom Krishnaji thinks dislikes Asit for some "puritanic" reason, suggested the above for Asit during this morning's massage. At the end of the walk, I simply drove us back without wondering if we would ever see this valley again.'

August twelve. 'It was a warm, clear morning. Raman took Michael very early to a train for Germany and Dr. Parchure to one for Geneva as he is on an earlier flight to London than Krishnaji and me. We were ready by 10 a.m. when Catherine and Jean de Maurex came in their Mercedes. We said goodbye to Vanda and the Ortolanis, who were there. Krishnaji went with the de Maurexes, and Raman and I followed in the VW with the luggage. Near Morges, Krishnaji and the de Maurexes went off to the Route du Lac, and Raman and I continued on the autoroute to the Geneva airport. While Raman stayed with the luggage, I returned the VW to Hertz. Then checked Krishnaji and me into Swissair number 832 and had boarding cards and a wheelchair ready for Krishnaji when he arrived at 1 o'clock. Raman had gone off into Geneva and was on a later flight. Krishnaji and I flew at 1:45 p.m. to Heathrow. Rita Zampese met us at the door of the plane with another wheelchair, and we rolled past a huge queue at immigration. Dorothy, Ingrid, Ray, and Bill all met us. Dorothy's eyesight had caused concern, but she had insisted on bringing her car, so Krishnaji and I went with her. She said something to Krishnaji about this being the last time she would be meeting him. Anyhow I asked her to go slowly, and she did. We got to Brockwood at 4 p.m. Dr. Parchure was in the other car too. Brockwood is beautiful and quiet. Only Montague, Doris, and Dominic were out on the driveway to meet Krishnaji. It is very good to be here.'

S: In my notes—and I can't remember when it was for—but I was going with the two of you to the airport and Dorothy was driving, so it might have been on the way going to Saanen, but Dorothy's eyesight was so bad and her driving was so erratic that it was really dangerous. You and I had discussed telling her that she just couldn't drive Krishnaji anymore. But she did a few more times. It was really quite precarious, but it had meant so much to her…

M: I know.

S: …to drive Krishnaji. And Krishnaji didn't want to take it away from her, but it was really [chuckles] life-threatening.

M: August thirteenth. 'Scott arrived early in the morning. Krishnaji, he, and I talked most of the morning. Krishnaji came down to lunch. I went to Alresford in the afternoon and was back for tea and a walk around the fields with Krishnaji. In the evening, he was hypersensitive. I had trouble with the washing machine, and water came out on the kitchen floor, and in my efforts to mop it up, Krishnaji said I was not paying attention. "You start something and then you do something else. If you don't learn to change, you may not be able to be with K."' He was…

S: Severe.

M: 'Later he had me sit quietly for a while.'

The fourteenth. 'I took the 9:23 a.m. train to London, had my hair cut, and went to Harrods for some things. I was back at Brockwood by 5 p.m. Krishnaji rested and walked with Scott. The tent is going up in the field.'

The fifteenth of August. 'Mary and Joe came at noon, and we all sat in the kitchen and caught up on news of the summer. Krishnaji gave Joe six handsome ties from Jacquet. Krishnaji looked gleaming and well, full of charm and animation. Mary Cadogan was also here to speak to Dorothy about financial matters after her retirement in September. A pension was set up that would give her and Montague plenty of spending money, and Brockwood pays for all her car expenses including insurance, petrol, etcetera, all food supplies, etcetera. Dorothy is said to be pleased by all this. After the Linkses had left, Mary Cadogan talked to Krishnaji and me about this and also some benefits for Scott. He doesn't want an increase in salary. But we will take care of his car expenses, travel, and Krishnaji wants him and Kathy to have one weekend per month so they can go away somewhere and relax.' [Both chuckle.]

S: We never managed that, but never mind.

M: No. 'Krishnaji invited Kathy to come with him and me on the walk.'

August sixteenth. 'There was rain in the morning. The car went for its annual car inspection and a new battery cable. Krishnaji was tired when he got up and didn't do exercises, but he did get up for lunch. He slept, and then we walked around the lanes. While having what is now a daily tea, he mentioned that, "Since the end of Saanen," something is going on in him. He said that if something has decided everything that happens to K., it is something extraordinary." I asked if he thinks that all the foretelling that Upadhyaya spoke of is true. He replied, “I am skeptical.” I pointed out that he speaks of it as though it had impressed him. “I don’t know,” he said. The other day in a conversation with Scott, he had said in the very firm voice of stating a fact, “I am the World Teacher.”’

S: Yes.

M: ‘Today I mentioned certain changes in him lately, and wondered if he was aware of them.’

‘Krishnaji: “What changes?”’

‘Me: “The hypersensitivity and manner.”’

‘Krishnaji: “What manner?”’

‘Me: “A roughness that is unlike you.”’

‘Krishnaji: “Am I rough to others?”’

‘Me: “No.”’

‘Krishnaji “Just to you?”’

‘Me: “Yes.”’ Which he was.

S: Mm, hm. Yes.

M: ‘He said he never did anything he was unaware of. I was too hard to change, and so he had been rough. He was relaxed when he said all this, but it will recur whether through my own faults or other factors. Many things seem to be bothering him, notably the KF India situation. He wants the Patwardhans out, the publications done by the KFT, and Vasanta Vihar to be a religious center, which it isn’t with the Patwardhans in charge. All this is troubling him. I think he feels Brockwood is at last pulled together and out of its rut of trouble, but India is there to be changed. He wants to end discord and set all things right “before I’m gathered to my fathers.” And he seems to burn with this.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji slept till 7 a.m. and ate buckwheat for breakfast. This must have upset his stomach, for after the massage he began to vomit. He took his bath but was so weak he could scarcely get out of the tub. When he got into bed, I called Dr. Parchure. He vomited three times more. When Parchure was out of the room, he said, “I have to hold onto it. Death is always so close.” I am writing this as he sleeps, so frail, so extraordinarily beautiful. There is really no age in his face, only total beauty.’

Later: ‘He has awakened, and asked me how long since the last vomit. I told him it was one-and-a-half hours. “He mustn’t be seriously ill or it would be the end. No accident or it would be nip and tuck.”’

Written later: ‘In Rougemont the following took place between Krishnaji and me and Dr. Parchure discussing travel plans. It’s written in dialogue.’

‘Krishnaji: “It is not a physical effort of the brain. It is something else. My life has been planned. It will tell me when to die, say it is over. That will settle my life. But I must be careful that ‘that’ is not interfered with by saying, ‘I will give only two talks.’”’

‘Me: “Do you feel how much more time is given you?”’

‘Krishnaji: “I think ten years more.”’

S: Hm.

M: See, this is…he had only a few months to live.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: ‘Me: “You mean talking?”’

‘Krishnaji: “When I don’t talk, it will be over. But I don’t want to strain the body. Also, too long a holiday is bad. I need a certain amount of rest but not more. A quiet place where nobody knows me, but unfortunately people get to know me.”’

S: There is something about Krishnaji’s not knowing how long he was to live. In my notes, at one point I say to him, because I was quite overwhelmed—I was running the school and I was building and then starting this new adult study center—the first Krishnamurti Center. So I said to Krishnaji, “I really am going to need your help to start this. Are you going to be there to help me?” And what I was really saying, according to my notes, was, “Krishnaji, you have to slow down and take care of yourself because I need you to help me do this; and if you just expend all of your energy on…” and he assured me that no, he would be around to help me. But then, later on in India, when I asked him if he would be there to help me start the center, he expressed real doubts. So…there was a tremendous deterioration in his health in India. Just enormous.

M: Yes, but he had changed in a deteriorating way really for the last six months of 1985.

S: Yes.

M: Yes. Because in Saanen, as you can see from what we’ve been recording here, he was irritable and weak, and criticizing the house and the room, the dungeon, and all these things. He was ill.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: August eighteenth: 'Krishnaji is feeling all right again, but stayed in bed. "Thank god I'll have two months rest here," he said.'

S: Hm. Well, my notes indicate that he doesn't get much rest.

M: No.

The nineteenth: 'A card from Ortolani says that Fosca died August ninth or tenth. At 10 a.m. Krishnaji met the core group of Brockwood staff members upstairs in the West Wing. Apart from attending that meeting, I worked mostly at my desk. Krishnaji lunched downstairs and later he, Scott, and I took a short walk. We picked mushrooms and I cooked them for supper.' [S chuckles.]

The twentieth: 'It was a rainy day. Krishnaji stayed in bed. "He's had enough. If there were an illness or an accident, he would slip out. No one in all these years has changed. I want to give you a new brain. I will till I die," he said.'

There isn't much the next day, but on the twenty-second, 'It was a quiet morning for Krishnaji while I worked at the desk. Krishnaji lunched downstairs. My brother telephoned from the Vineyard. His wife, Lisa, has fever and is unable to eat. Krishnaji, Dorothy, and I walked around the lane. Dr. Parchure got clothes in London with Scott and then got all-new hearing aids at the Winchester Hospital. Krishnaji talked briefly with Carlos Silva.'

S: Let me just add something from my notes. Because Krishnaji was not so well, it was felt that Dr. P. would have to travel more in the West with him, and Dr. Parchure didn't have such good clothing. You and Krishnaji always looked just wonderful, and so Krishnaji wanted him to get new clothing, but Dr. Parchure resisted this.

M: [chuckles] Yes.

S: [laughs] Eventually he gave in, so Krishnaji wanted me to go off to London with him, and Krishnaji was very specific about where I was to take Dr. Parchure to get things.

M: Where?

S: Well, we had to go to Daks for trousers, and then we had to go either there or to Simpsons for the jacket. Shoes were a bit of a problem—Krishnaji didn't know what to do about shoes, but I found shoes. Then, of course [chuckles]—and this is just so typical of Krishnaji—Krishnaji felt that if I was going to all this trouble of getting these things for Dr. Parchure that I also had to get new trousers and a jacket [chuckles] for myself. All of which would be paid for by Mary Z. [Both laugh.] Yes, because Krishnaji felt that this was very unfair that I would be doing this shopping and not—

M: Oh, I think so, too. Mary Z. concurs. [S laughs.] Krishnaji and I were of one mind.

S: So when we came back, Krishnaji, of course, had to immediately see the purchases. But the jackets had to be altered so we couldn't bring them back right away. Krishnaji was very happy with the trousers—gray flannels, but from our descriptions of the jackets, Krishnaji had grave reservations. [M chuckles.]

M: What were the jackets?

S: They were tweeds, I think, I can't remember them exactly, but they were sports jackets, and Krishnaji had grave doubts. [M chuckles.] But then, when they came, he was very happy with them, and he thought they were absolutely right.

M: Oh, good. [Both laugh.]

S: This was the kind of thing that Krishnaji was very concerned with. It was very important to him.

M: Yes, one has to be properly dressed.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: Otherwise one doesn't show respect for anything.

S: Yes. But also the fairness aspect, that it wouldn't be fair if I didn't get something as well. [Chuckles.]

M: August twenty-third. 'Krishnaji spent the day in bed. People are arriving for the Brockwood talks. I went to Alresford on errands in the morning. Erna telephoned. There is now a need for flood insurance in Ojai because of the fire damage in the hills. Dr. Parchure talked to me about Krishnaji needing to give public talks.'

The twenty-fourth: 'At 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji gave the first Brockwood talk of the year. Afterward, we had a complete lunch upstairs, and then he went down to the tent for a little while before resting. He was quite full of energy as Scott came with us on the walk. There was a large crowd. There was rain early, but it held off later.'

The next day is the second talk, but I don't note much else until August twenty-seventh.

'At 11:30 was Krishnaji's first question-and-answer meeting, and he did five of them. We had lunch upstairs. We talked to Mary Cadogan and Scott about the next summer's Brockwood talks: six talks and two question-and-answer meetings from July nineteenth to August second.'

S: Yes. This was a change—again, this is from my notes—as the talks at Brockwood had always been the last weekend in August until the first weekend of September. But with no Saanen, it was felt that we should change it and slide something halfway in between what were the traditional Saanen dates and the traditional Brockwood date. And also have a slightly expanded schedule. There was also thinking of how to cure the kind of typical mess that had developed. These Brockwood talks had gotten larger and larger and larger, and also less and less serious. The house was more and more packed, and Krishnaji didn't like going down to the dining room with the house so full. Dorothy would put a bed in absolutely every single corner and cupboard that there was, and we had to eat in shifts. We had tables way out into the living room. It was ridiculous. It was also felt that we couldn't have the camping anymore because we had gone out of our way to make the campers more and more comfortable: providing tented cooking spaces, nice toilets, hot showers—and began to happen is that people would come just for the camping.

M: Yes, and not come to the talks.

S: Exactly, or one person in a family would be interested in the teachings, and they would attend the talks, but they would bring their husband and their children and their parents and their cousins, etcetera, and so you'd have twenty people there camping and using the place, enjoying the swimming pool and the tennis courts, and people were breaking branches off of trees for the campfire and trampling on the flowers. We had, over the years, issued statements that people couldn't bring their pets, but they always did, and dogs would soil everyplace. Someone even brought their pet goat one year.

M: Yes, I know.

S: So we really had to change the way that the Brockwood talks were going—make it much more serious. But if we don't have campers, where do we put all these people? So it was a big dilemma and a preoccupation in the planning for the next year. Anyway. Sorry, I'm filling in probably too much for your diaries, but—

M: No. No, it gives a picture of what was happening then.

S: Yes.

M: August twenty-eighth. 'There was a discussion after breakfast with Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, Scott, and me about Krishnaji's program for 1986. He feels he should give two talks on the East Coast of the USA. Boston? Krishnaji had lunch in bed but got up for a walk down the West Meon road at 5 p.m. I telephoned Erna about the above. She suggested speaking at universities, but Krishnaji later disapproved.'

The twenty-ninth: 'Krishnaji held his second question-and-answer meeting. After lunch upstairs, Krishnaji had photos taken by Barry Moore to go with Duncan Fallowell's Harpers & Queen article. A television crew covered the meeting in the morning. On the walk with Krishnaji was Dorothy, Elena Greene, and me. Erna telephoned. The settlement is ready for signatures.'

August thirtieth. ‘I awoke wondering how to bring about what Krishnaji has said is necessary: a set of talks on the East Coast in March or early April. He has rejected so-called sponsored talks (i.e., at a university), saying he didn’t want to talk just to students. That means finding a suitable hall in Boston or even Toronto, doing all the promotion, coping with the sound system difficulties, finding a place to stay, etcetera. All with the possible uncertainty of his being up to this after a heavy Indian tour. As it unfolded, when I called a meeting of Dr. Parchure, Scott, with Krishnaji on Wednesday to discuss’—this is written on a Friday—‘what he wished, the dilemma is, as he put it, the body exists to talk. If it doesn’t talk, the body will fade and that will be the end. But it needs rest too. What is the balance between these? He said speaking only in Ojai was not enough. He thinks little of discussions as people can’t be found to challenge him sufficiently. He seemed to accept the shape we worked out for Brockwood. June: arrive from Ojai, talk to students, and any other discussions. Rest in July till the Brockwood talks, beginning July nineteenth to August third. Go on holiday afterward. Return in September for an earlier school reopening. It was when I then brought up his Ojai winter that the extra talks came into it. Last evening I talked to Parchure, who is uncertain whether he will want such talks when the time comes. And then either he over-talks himself to fulfill the commitment or we have to cancel with all that that entails. Either would be a shock to Krishnaji.’

‘There was a heavy feeling all morning, and then after the massage, Parchure came to me and told me that Krishnaji had said he didn’t want the extra talks. It might be good just to rest in Ojai. Krishnaji lunched on a tray and called for Scott afterward. He wanted to discuss issues with the staff. After much talk, I asked him about Ojai, and he said no extra talks. So I telephoned this to Erna. She has just sent me two copies of the settlement agreement with Rajagopal for our signatures and that of Tilly von Egmond for the Netherlands. I have asked Tilly to remain here until the papers arrive. Krishnaji was tense last evening, irritable just below the surface. He came to my room, sat me down, holding my hand, and said he was looking at his irritability. “I am not talking to you, I am talking to myself…Either I am getting old or have fallen into a habit of picking at you. It is my fault, and it must stop. We’ve been together a long time, and I love you deeply. The body has become hypersensitive. Most of the time I want to go away, and I mustn’t do that. I’m going to deal with this. It is unforgivable.” Later he said of himself, “He’s had enough. If there were illness or an accident, he would slip out.” And then, “No one in all these years has changed.” And, “I want to give you a new brain. I love you; I will till I die.” Later he called me in: “Maria, I have a feeling it’s all been carefully planned. When the body goes, it may be tomorrow, it may be in ten years, but it is a strange feeling. It has all been completely planned.”’

August thirty-first. ‘I made an appeal for donations before Krishnaji gave this third Brockwood talk. Mary, Joe, and Anna Pallant lunched with us upstairs. At 3 p.m. I talked to a friend of Mr. Bocognano about the center in Bangalore. I walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy. Supper upstairs. Then Krishnaji, Parchure, Scott, and I had a discussion about a couple of troublesome staff members.’

The first of September. ‘Krishnaji gave his fourth Brockwood talk, which was very fine.[1] We lunched upstairs. I talked with Kathy and various others. The walk was with Krishnaji, Dorothy, me. There was a discussion in the evening with Krishnaji, Scott, Parchure, and me about the troublesome staff and how to arrange next year’s Brockwood Gathering.’

September second: ‘At 8 a.m. there was a meeting upstairs with the core group. Krishnaji had breakfast afterward. I went to Petersfield on errands in the afternoon. The settlement came for our signatures. Tilly von Egmond, who stayed till it came, signed for Holland. Krishnaji will sign for himself, KFT, and KFI. He had been in bed all day but saw Alfonso Colón at 4 p.m. It rained too much for a walk.’

The next day, ‘Krishnaji signed the settlement agreement. Tilly left for Holland, and Dr. Parchure left for India. I mailed the signed settlement papers to Erna and telephoned her that I had. Krishnaji, Scott, and I walked. The house is becoming quiet and is almost empty.’

The fourth. ‘Krishnaji and I took the 10:23 a.m. to London. Joe met us and took us to Huntsman, where Krishnaji had a fitting, bought a cardigan, and ordered a lightweight suit.’ You eventually inherited that, didn’t you?

S: Yes, I did. I went in and had the last couple of fittings of it. I was close enough to Krishnaji’s size that I could wear his old suits, and this one only needed some changes.

M: ‘We went by taxi to lunch at Mary and Joe’s and had the first glimpse of their house at 8 Elizabeth Close, where they now live. They took us to Waterloo and the 5:43 p.m. train back.’

Now, for the next five days I don’t write much, partly because I had a cold, it seems. I don’t go on walks, but you do, and Krishnaji talks with me about an empty mind. I continue to work at my desk. Then on September tenth, ‘At 11 a.m. Krishnaji gave an interview filmed by ITV for the program “The Human Factor” to be broadcast nationwide December first. The interviewer was Sue Jay, and it was shot on film in the drawing room for one-and-a-half hours. In the afternoon Keith Critchlow and Peter Gilbert brought floor plans for the center part of the study. Very good. Krishnaji walked with the Dorothy and me.’

On September eleventh, ‘I went to London for a haircut and errands at Harrods. I was back to Petersfield in time to buy plants. I met Krishnaji and Dorothy on the lane. All the Brockwood staff returned from their holiday. It was very warm weather.’

The next day. ‘At 9 a.m. there was a meeting of Krishnaji and the core group about the couple of troublesome staff. The walk was with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Scott. It was a warm day again.’

M: September thirteenth. 'Krishnaji and I took the 10:23 a.m. train to London. It was a warm, soft late summer morning. He looked not over forty, standing in immense elegance at the Petersfield station: young, attractive, with a dignity that is both aloof and intensely unassuming. He told me that Scott had asked him if he knew how long he would live. And he said that, yes, he did. But that he would not tell Scott.'

'Me: "Do you really know?"'

'Krishnaji: "I think I do. I have intimations."'

'Me: "Are you willing to tell me?"'

'Krishnaji: "No, that would not be right. I cannot tell anyone."'

'Me: "Could one at least have some vague idea of time?"'

'Krishnaji: "Scott asked me if I would still be here when the study is built at Brockwood." Krishnaji laughed, and said he would.'

'Me: "Is one to live thinking that at any moment you might leave?"'

'Krishnaji: "No, it's not like that. It won't be for quite a while."'

'As it is a hot day and we would be returning late from London because of his 4:30 p.m. dentist appointment, I suggested we get first-class tickets costing £18.60 each.' [Both chuckle.] 'They turned out be a huge increase, and when we bought them there were only two seats left and in separate compartments. To make it worse, the one Krishnaji took was a smoker.' [Chuckles.] 'Joe met us and drove us up to Huntsman. Krishnaji ordered a lightweight gray worsted suit and a pair of flannel trousers in a subtle color of vaguely greenish gray. Very smart. We went to Ferragamo, where I spent a credit I had on a large calf handbag. Just what was looked for.' Where did I get the credit for Ferragamo? I have the big handbag.

S: Yes, you probably took something back that you bought.

M: I don't remember, but I got the handbag with the credit. 'We met Mary L. at Fortnum's and she lunched with us. Krishnaji fell to talking of India and the fact that when he tries to make a change there, some of them, Pupul and the Patwardhans, claim that he has been influenced and dismisses what he has just been saying as not his own views. He doesn't like to quarrel with them or to assert his authority, so he says, "Very well," and lets it go. But now he says he feels this time in India he must put his "house in order" and insist that what he thinks is right be done. He talked at length about this, not wanting any comment from Mary or me, in fact refusing any comment,' [chuckles] 'but as if his own talking helped to explore it in his mind. We went to Hatchards and bought some books. Then at 3:30 p.m. to Truefitt for his haircut while I hurried up Bond Street to Heaton, where I bought the smallest Sony microcassette dictating machine to carry with me for notes and memoranda. I rushed back to meet him and we found a taxi for his appointment with Mr. Thompson. His teeth are in good shape. Joe came there at 5 p.m. and drove us to Waterloo, where we got comfortable seats back to Petersfield.' [Both chuckle.]

The fourteenth: 'After breakfast, Krishnaji talked to me about Ojai. He feels the Lilliefelts and I have driven ourselves into a corner. There is no one we wholly trust to carry on, and we are all getting old. So what is going to happen there? What is he going to do there for three-and-a-half months? He is afraid that for that amount of time he will wither there. It is out that he will go elsewhere to talk. He can't go on perpetually talking to the Oak Grove staff who don't understand. He is sure he will settle things in India. Should he then return to Brockwood and stay there until the Ojai talks, even though it is winter? Ojai doesn't attract people. They come for him. He asked, what if, after the rest, he were to hold open discussions every weekend for anyone who wants to come? He cannot, and will not, do nothing. "I am for it." He wants to be in our own place, not elsewhere. At noon, I telephoned my brother in New York. Lisa returns from the hospital today. The lymph specialist, who was asked by Lisa the prediction if she does nothing, said the worst would be death in one to two years. Today also I had a letter from Daisy saying that her mother has three brain tumors and possible spine involvement. Later I telephoned Erna and told her what Krishnaji is thinking of and of the above discussion. She pointed out all the difficulties, which, when I reported them to Krishnaji, he found to be a sign that the teachings come second to organization. Walk with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Scott.'

The next day, Krishnaji held a discussion with all the staff at 11:30 a.m. And the day after was a rest day for Krishnaji.

The seventeenth. 'Mary Cadogan came and Krishnaji talked with her, Scott, Dorothy, and me about next year's Gathering, publications, the international committees, and about the Brockwood Gathering next year: There will be no camping, but we will supply caravans, have only a normal number of house guests, get the meals catered, no swimming pool or tennis court use, no children or animals. There will be less advertising and the changes will be explained in the Bulletin. We also discussed the Holland and Puerto Rico problems. In Holland there was a mixing up of the Stichting and the "Leer Project," which is a school that Hans Vincent is pushing using the Stichting mailing list. Mary Cadogan is to ask all committees to give their mailing lists to Krishnamurti Foundation Publications. Krishnaji is thinking of telling India that all talks, including Indian ones, go to KFT for editing. And the best-of-all-that-years talks will be published by it. India may do Indian discussions for India. He has not yet but will make a decision. From us he wanted only factual memoranda and not advice, as India has the insulting habit of rejecting what it does not like by saying, "You've been influenced, this isn't your opinion." After lunch Harsh and Ingrid joined us for a budget meeting. Krishnaji went for a nap and then later a walk with Dorothy and me. I had a message that Mark Lee had telephoned, so I rang him back.' He didn't have anything to do with the Oak Grove School by then and was Erna's helper. 'He explained a plan for Krishnaji to speak on three weekends two weeks apart with educators in March and April, with twenty-five to thirty educators in each group. Also Mark suggested video interviews videoed by someone other than Mendizza. I reported all this to Krishnaji in the evening, and he was irritated by the two weeks apart. "Are they just trying to fill my time?…What do you think?" in a hostile voice.'

September eighteenth. 'At 9 a.m. Krishnaji met the core staff group in the West Wing. The topic was leisure and space without discussion or occupation. It was felt we keep out something by being constantly occupied. Krishnaji said, "I have complete leisure." He urged us for a week to write down "Everything, every thought, etcetera." He said he used to do this, and Rajagopal tried to find the papers but never did: Krishnaji put them under a stone outside.' [Both chuckle.] 'It could take me twenty-three hours of the day to do all this, but this seems as good a place as under a stone to give it a try, so here it goes.' [Both chuckle.] 'I look on today as a sort of shelf wherein it was mercifully quiet. I ache for quiet, space apart from the violence of the public news, cancer, presence of death, Krishnaji's discontent and irritability. I could come into my room and do the simple, ordinary things, the luxury of small matters instead of cataclysmic ones. Hugues, Scott, and Mary Cadogan went off to see a lawyer about a pension fund. The house was empty and quiet at lunch. Krishnaji motioned to me that I was putting out my tongue, another lack of awareness of what I am doing. He now calls for deliberate action by will as general awareness doesn't seem sufficient. I feel like a robot at times but realize this is a defense.' [Both chuckle.]

September nineteenth. 'It was a quiet day. A man came to fix the Miele washer, and finally I was able to put everything back in order, which gave that small but appreciated sense of one's atom of life being tidy and normal.' [Both chuckle.] 'After lunch I wrote to Daisy, who had asked me how I would meet her situation (i.e., with her mother dying of cancer and three brain tumors). My brother may be coming to a parallel of that with his wife Lisa—meeting death. One's own or someone else's seems never far away these days. I don't feel a shrinking from my own, as far as I can tell, but Krishnaji had admonished me over and over, "You must outlive me" to look after him, and each of us urges healthful things on the other. Krishnaji's tireless movement toward and in life is behind his present irritability: his not suffering fools gladly, his effort to right India, Ojai, the staff group here. Today he said to Scott and me during the tea in the kitchen before the walk that the unifying factor should be intelligence. "To be free in the real sense, that freedom is intelligence. Intelligence is common to all of us and that will bring us together, not organization. If you see the importance that each one of us is free and that freedom implies love, consideration, attention, cooperation, and compassion—that intelligence is the factor to keep us together." Walked with Krishnaji and Dorothy and Scott.'

The twentieth: 'I finished the letter to Daisy and took it to post in Alresford. There was the familiar smell of wood in the Mercedes garage and leather in the twelve-year-old car. I filled it with petrol and drove through Woodlands to Alresford. Again, the awareness of the small and familiar, the gentle and orderly, the simple face of life, which is so very precious. I did small errands: I bought a teaspoon, the vehicle tax had to be paid at the post office and put in the car for coming year. That is in order, come what may in the coming year. I found the first Cox apples of the season for Krishnaji in the market, four nice plums, and some new cheese. I also ordered for Doris a small refrigerator for her new room upstairs next to Dorothy and Montague. It was rather expensive, but I want her tiny world to be as comfortable as possible. All these and so many similar things are like a squirrel (we saw one on the walk) filling his hollow tree with nuts against the winter. Am I afraid of the winter? I think I'm not shrinking from whatever comes, and the possibilities, these days, are wider than we know. But I cherish the sweet and simple face of life. The soft mist today, the silence in the fields as we walked. The smell of the just-cut hedgerows, and, most of all, to be able to see Krishnaji across the table when we had our tea before the walk, and the sight of him in his jeans and anorak buoyantly and quietly walking in the lane.'

S: Mm, hm. Yes. Yes. I can see it as you say it.

M: 'At 4 p.m. Krishnaji gave two interviews to Duncan Fallowell for the Harper's & Queen article. We walked on the West Meon road, and Dorothy joined us.'

The next day. 'At 9 a.m. Krishnaji met the core staff group and asked one of those seemingly impossible questions: "How do you instantly, without time, make the students see that self-interest is the root of conflict?" He was talking about intelligence. If each one of us is intelligent, in the sense that he means (i.e., sensitive, loving, compassionate), then that intelligence, which is neither yours nor mine, is acting, and, therefore, though we are separate physical bodies, we act as one. And can you make the student see this? Not only see it but instantly be transformed? Then he mentioned that out of all the hundreds of students who have passed through Rishi Valley, not one has been different. This always twists at me, although he has said he doesn't look at results. It seems painful to me that he should work tirelessly, endlessly, patiently all these very many years without seeing one human being changed. After the meeting in the room, I said that if no student in all these years had changed, one may ask what is the point of them? If no one, with all his effort, has changed, how can the rest of us, who apparently haven't changed, expect to bring this about in others, the students? If you haven't done it, is there any likelihood that we can change others? "I don't know," he replied, but it was said a little jokingly, not wanting to go on with a serious discussion. In the afternoon Krishnaji spoke for over an hour with a Mr. Arnold and Dominique Conterno, who had been put off when they came on the seventeenth of August because Krishnaji was ill that day. A pretentious man, Arnold, said Krishnaji later. On the walk with Dorothy, Krishnaji told us both to walk with the right foot turning out. Another thing to pay attention to. This writing seems to be more about what happened in the day than the "every thought" recording.' [Chuckles.]

September twenty-second: 'Krishnaji spoke to the whole staff in the sitting room at 11:30 a.m. He went slowly into freedom of mind in the approach to students: freedom from problems, not adding to the students' problems. This was supposed to bear on the question Scott said the staff could not decide on: the pairing of students. Krishnaji pointed out the dangers involved, the isolation from others, sex, etcetera but dwelt so much on not adding to students problems that, to me, it presented confusion. I found it torturous and myself wanting to come to the point. It seemed it would prolong the slow-motion inability to act on the part of the staff. Krishnaji seemed unaware of time. It was after 1 p.m. when he was slowly, slowly approaching the denouement. I got impatient and found it confusing. Finally I said it was 1:15 p.m. The Digbys had come to lunch and were waiting. George is writing some book, I think a sort of memoir, and wanted to mention it to Krishnaji. In the afternoon I telephoned Mark Lee that Krishnaji agreed to hold meetings with the separate educational groups of twenty-five to thirty people on three successive weekends in March but doesn't want to speak at UC Santa Barbara. Scott brought a new music teacher, Gilbert, to play the guitar for Krishnaji. He played very well for one-and-a-half hours in the West Wing. I asked Dorothy with Kip upstairs for tea. Then we walked in the soft autumn air on the West Meon road. Krishnaji came to me in the early morning while I was doing my exercises and wanted to see what I do and corrected everything. He is a very demanding exercise master.' [S chuckles.]

September twenty-third. 'Krishnaji again came in the early morning and taught me exercises and breathing. A hard taskmaster, but very touching. Around 10 a.m. my brother rang from New York. They just spoke to Dr. Scheef who said they must come immediately, so Bud and Lisa fly to Bonn tonight. She said she will have three-and-a-half weeks of intensive therapy, then two weeks rest, and again three-and-a-half weeks of intensive therapy. I said I would go to Bonn to see them when Krishnaji goes to India. I asked about Carol, Bud's second wife and the mother of Daisy, and Bud said she is in the Presbyterian hospital and not expected to live long. One hopes a compassionate doctor will not prolong it. Krishnaji came in as I was talking to Bud, and he suggested I go to Bonn and then come back here before he leaves and then go straight to Ojai. I explained that I wanted to stop briefly in New York to see Daisy and Philippa. He then thought that he would like to come to Bonn with me on the way to Frankfurt and Delhi. We could both see Dr. Scheef, he said, after I said I thought that if I were there I should be checked by Scheef. Krishnaji seemed to be for that. And when I said it would be good for him, too, he said, "Oh what for? I'm too old and on the way out," but agreed he might see him briefly. He had me telephone the West German consulate to learn of the visa requirements. A very abrupt woman demanded to know the reason for the Indian citizen's trip to Bonn and said he should get a statement from his doctor that he was going there for medical reasons. "We'll talk about it," said Krishnaji after I also found out that Rita Zampese is away for a week and hence no rearranging of our Lufthansa tickets today. Scott presented ten new members of staff to Krishnaji. Then Krishnaji, Dorothy, I, and Scott went for a walk toward West Meon. Friedrich arrived by teatime and said that it is still hot in Switzerland, more than here. But it is so warm in Hampshire it is as if it were a full summer, a lovely prolongation, an island, a minute island in time on which I stand incredulous and humbled to have been so lucky. The horror of other lives is out there. Mexico has just had three devastating earthquakes. In Mexico City thousands are dead. Unknown numbers are buried, still alive or dead under fallen buildings. The country is in economic ruin too. In Beirut they cannot stop shooting each other. To be walking with Krishnaji down a lane under the beech trees past the big sequoia and the flint farmhouse is a blessing beyond measuring.' [Crying.] 'Walk Krishnaji, Dorothy, Scott, and me on the West Meon lane.'

S: Mm. I know, Mary. I know. That's enough for today also.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] For a video of the fourth Brockwood talk of 1985.

Issue 87: September 24, 1985 to October 14, 1985

In this issue Krishnaji is preoccupied with his negative views of the Foundation in India and its key players. This was very unlike Krishnaji who would usually be totally absorbed in the place where he was, and more accepting of people's foibles and shortcomings. We also see Krishnaji's irritability increase (which, in hindsight, Mary and I could see was from his undiagnosed illness). This combination does not bode well for Krishnaji's health and his upcoming trip to India, and Mary lightly touches on her regret at not going with India the coming trip.

Mary: We begin today's discussion with September twenty-fourth, 1985, and we're at Brockwood. 'Krishnaji gave me another lesson in breathing and neck exercises. A severe teacher.' [S chuckles.] 'He also asked me to note, "Independence without freedom is meaningless. If you have freedom you don't need independence." This was a day for our going to Wickham for lunch. Krishnaji went with Friedrich and Scott in Friedrich's new VW, with Scott driving. Dorothy and Kathy came with me, and we had a very nice lunch at the Old House Restaurant. I had ordered a vegetable coulibiac.' What was the coulibiac?

Scott: It is normally a puff pastry, which is rolled with fish and vegetables and, I think, a white wine sauce. But that restaurant used to do it for us with just vegetables so it was vegetarian. It was very good.

M: Ah, yes. It was. I remember it now. 'I'd ordered a vegetable coulibiac ahead of time, and Krishnaji liked the cauliflower soup, which had a little white wine in it. He stared out at the garden during lunch—a faraway look—luckily not seeing the steak-eating group at a table behind him.' [Both chuckle.] 'The VW car came straight back on the A32, but I drove through the small back roads and we came out rather surprised in Cheriton.' Cheriton was overshooting Brockwood. 'A rather defensive letter had come from Erna after my telephone to her conveying Krishnaji's thoughts about not just resting in Ojai—that unless he had something to do there he might come only for the May talks. Erna laid out all that had been accomplished in the U.S. Krishnaji wants to telephone and tell her that it wasn't just Ojai, but he felt the same way about all the places. There wasn't one person to carry on when he is dead, and he had felt like "going away" from all of it. "Organization has become more important than the teachings." After a rest, we had tea and went for the West Meon road walk. I ate no supper after all that lunch. Krishnaji has decided not to go to Bonn with me. "It is too much before India. I couldn't do it." The news of the Mexico earthquake continues dreadfully. People are being found still alive after five days in the rubble.'

September twenty-fifth: 'Krishnaji again went over my exercises with me, especially my breathing ones. Mary Cadogan spoke to Friedrich on his phone and then asked for me. Friedrich politely closed the door when I was speaking to Mary C. so no one could find me when Bud rang from Bonn, as they didn't think to look in Friedrich's room.' [Both chuckle.]

S: How very correct.

M: Yes. How tactful everybody was. 'I was upset and Krishnaji took that moment to point out that I hadn't finished the breakfast dishes.' [Both laugh.] 'I felt harried by his constant criticism of me "not paying attention." And "Will you kindly listen," followed by a slow reiteration of what you have heard and understood is wearing. He asked a question, but if you answer it too quickly, this happens.' [Chuckles.] 'He seems to need to say all his criticisms at length and get them out of his preoccupation. I was finally able to tell him that Mary Cadogan reports that Harper's Clayton Carson wants an introduction by David Bohm to round out the next book, which is only two dialogues long, and Krishnaji agreed to it. All the students are beginning to arrive today and were at lunch. I fell asleep exhausted after lunch. Then Bud rang back at 4 p.m. Lisa is in the Strahlenklinik in Bonn to have two, probably three, courses of intensive radiation and chemotherapy lasting probably till Christmas. Lisa's morale is much higher since she talked to them in the clinic. She will have to be checked twice a year and will resign from the museum, but she is thinking of the much better life they will lead. I said I would come to Bonn after Krishnaji goes to India.'

'Krishnaji kept coming in while I was talking as it was the time we had said we would telephone Erna. Her letter made him want to reassure her, and so I rang, relayed what he was saying while he was standing beside me, including, in confidence to her, that he knows, more or less, when he will die and wants to put all the work in order—not just Ojai, but especially India, and Brockwood too. He spoke directly to her after I had repeated all this and reassured her that he was not denigrating all that had been done in Ojai. He told me separately, when I asked how long he had known the time of his death, "Oh, about two years." I was able to reach Mary Cadogan and give her instructions of what to say to Pupul, if Mary talks to her before Pupul comes here Saturday, that Krishnaji has told us that he's going to meet all the Indian Foundation members and he will decide the publications and other matters. And he has asked us, KFT, not to make any decisions on publications but leave it to him. He wants Pupul to know before she arrives that he will decide only later and that he "has become very serious." We had a quick tea and then a walk around the lane, Krishnaji, Dorothy, Scott, Friedrich, and me. Supper on trays in his room, as is now customary.'

September the twenty-sixth. '"Did you sleep well? Did I bully you too much? We'll have a nice quiet day today," he said.'

'I replied, "It doesn't matter. Will I see you again after you go to India?"'

'Krishnaji: "Why do you ask?"'

'Me: "I don't want to be apart from you. You said yesterday you knew when you would die."'

'Krishnaji: "Yes, more or less, but it is not right away. If I'm going to die, I'll telephone you, and you can come. I won't die all of a sudden. I'm in good health. My heart, everything is all right. It is all decided by someone else. I can't talk about it. I'm not allowed to. Do you understand? It is much more serious. There are things you don't know, enormous, and I can't tell you. It is very hard to find a brain like this, and it must keep on as long as the body can; until something says, 'enough.' If I die, you mustn't mourn. We've been very close, but you are beyond all that and you mustn't mourn as you would have in the past."' You see in this he mentioned "someone" and "something."

S: Yes.

M: Mary Links, I think, pointed that out in her book.

S: Ah, yes.

M: Who knows what the explanation is. But in one conversation he used those two words: "someone" and "something."

S: Yes. At other times he talks about something like a group of things, a committee.

M: Yes, he talked jokingly about "the committee." I don't know, obviously, but my thoughts tend to go toward a group of something because of a strange dream I once had.

S: What dream was that?

M: I was being judged in the dream by a group of beings, and it wasn't…it was just a sort of brief dream, but it was very vivid. It woke me up, actually. And what I felt at the time, and, I don't know, the whole thing was a dream, so I don't know what it was, but what I felt and probably still feel was that I was being judged whether I was suitable to be with Krishnaji and do things for him and be useful to them. Because I always felt if there's something protecting him that thing has to have an instrument or instruments.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: There has to be some human being who can do things for him. That was my interpretation of the dream. It may all be…

S: Mm, hm. Well, who knows? But it is interesting that Krishnaji talks about—it's personified and it's non-personified.

M: Yes.

S: And then it's a group of personifications.

M: Yes. Yes. And sometimes he speaks, as in this, "it is serious," and he can't talk about it. And other times when he uses the word "committee," it's sort of joking.

S: Mm, hm. Yes.

M: 'This conversation took place in the early morning when I brought the nettle tea. I went to my room and wept. Then the day carried on and we went to London on the 10:23 a.m. train. Dorothy was on the same train en route to a dentist. Mary and Joe met us at Waterloo and took us to Huntsman. Mary and I walked to Hilliard's about my tweed coat and stopped at Hardy Amies, where there was nothing for me. Then we returned to Huntsman where Krishnaji had had his fitting, and we walked to Fortnum's for our usual lunch with Mary. There I also bought peanut butter, tea, and coffee. We walked back to Hilliard's to fetch the coat and found a cab back to Waterloo, just able to catch the 3:48 p.m. train. I felt exhausted and slept on the train. Krishnaji, more alert, got us off at Petersfield, and we found Dorothy had been on the same train. Got Krishnaji back to the haven of his clean room and a bath. The students are all here. We saw Scott's office newly fixed. Krishnaji and I had supper on trays with the 7 p.m. news and now early to bed.' Which was your new office, downstairs?

S: Well, in my notes—and I'm deliberately not putting in a lot of things from my notes, but because you mention this office, I'll add this which I think was interesting. I had taken over Dorothy's office, but I felt it had to have an entirely new atmosphere and feel to it. So I knocked a hole in the wall between…

M: Oh, yes.

S: …what was to be the school's secretary's office, which had been Ingrid's office, and my office, so that there could be connection between the two offices. In Dorothy's time, people wanting to see her had to wait in the corridor.

M: Yes, that's right.

S: And I got rid of Dorothy's old curtains and put up blinds, had that corner desk built in, got new chairs, new carpet, new paint color on the walls, and everything so it would have an entirely new feel. While all this construction was going on, when Krishnaji would come down for lunch, he would often go and look at the changes.

M: Would he?

S: Yes. Dorothy always used to sit in her desk chair, which she would just swivel around to talk to whoever was sitting in a couple of chairs in the back of the room. I had three equal chairs for sitting so that I could talk with parents and staff members and students, and we were all on equal chairs and sitting in a little clump. And as soon as the office was finished, and the furniture was in there, I wanted him to see it and present it to him. So he came in, and he sat down in one of the chairs, and I sat in another one facing him, and he just wanted to sit there. And I say in my notes that I could feel he was doing something to the room. And he came down on several subsequent days, and every time he and I would just sit there, and I could feel the room changing. Of course, you know, one can say it was just my imagination, and who knows? But to me, he was obviously doing something to the room. It's not that he was only just sitting there, and perhaps doing something—no, he was obviously doing something sitting there—he wasn't saying anything, but you could feel something happening. [Chuckles.] He did this for several subsequent days. I think he said something too, but I can't remember. It might be in my notes. I can't remember, but it did really change the whole feel of that room.

M: Mm. I believe it.

S: So it was rather nice.

M: Yes. That's very nice.

The twenty-seventh of September. 'Krishnaji slept fairly well. Feeling tired but better. He thinks that an extra dose of magnesium phosphate, which he's taking at Amanda Pallant's suggestion to help the tremor in his hands, is causing his stomach to be upset. He stayed in bed all day but got up for a walk. I went to the school meeting. I did some business things with my broker, got houseplants, and was back for tea, a new one called Pelham Blend suggested by the Digbys. Then Krishnaji, Scott, Dorothy, Friedrich, Christina, Gary, and I went to the grove about planting there and then across the field and back by the driveway. Another gentle mist of an Indian summer day. Before supper, Krishnaji had me sit quietly, with him touching the back of my head. "I am trying to reach your brain but you keep slipping back. You have a habit of eating too fast. Pay attention."' It's weird. He thought I ate so fast, and now, 20 years later, I can't keep up with all of you.

S: Well, I can just speak for myself, and I eat much, much too quickly. But I can remember Catherine and Jean de Maurex who were so genteel with old-style European manners; so they would pace their eating to Krishnaji's. And they commented to me that they'd never eaten so slowly in their lives.

M: [chuckles] I know.

S: They were astonished that anyone could eat so slowly.

M: Yes. I know. [Both laugh.]

S: So Krishnaji saying that you eat quickly is not really very much of an indication of anything. [M chuckles.] But one of the things you have just reminded me of, and which I had completely forgotten was that when I became principal, I took away the overall responsibility for the gardens from John Porter and I gave it to Gary.

M: Mm. Good.

S: Krishnaji had been unhappy with John Porter's over-planting of the grove.

M: Yes. He put up the wrong trees and too many things.

S: Yes, it had become overcrowded. So this trip through the grove that you mentioned in your diaries, it's also in my notes. And it was Krishnaji wanting to open up spaces again for alleys and really undoing a lot of the things that John Porter had done.

M: Yes, and he put those trees—I can't remember names of things these days…sort of pine trees, but not pine trees. It's a very common tree, and there were too many there already. Anyway.

S: Yes. Yes. So Krishnaji was very happy to be having a positive impact on the grove.

M: Yes, he was. 'That evening, as Krishnaji did my leg, as he has most evenings since Dr. Parchure left, we heard the news that a very large hurricane has hit the East Coast of the U.S.'

The twenty-eighth of September. 'Krishnaji supervised my breathing and other exercises again. Pupul arrived by car at 11 a.m. to stay till Monday.' This was a Saturday. 'I gave her tea in the kitchen and then left her and Krishnaji to talk almost till lunchtime. I had a rest after lunch and after coffee.Erna telephoned. The attorney general wants two weeks to consider whether to sign the settlement agreement, so Avsham has asked us for a thirty-day extension of the date by which the agreement must be complete (i.e., the end of October). All had tea, including Friedrich, and then Krishnaji, Dorothy, Friedrich, Scott, and I walked around the block. Pupul had supper on trays with Krishnaji and me in his room, and afterward Scott came up and I invited Friedrich to come and sit and talk till 9 o'clock. Krishnaji was relaxed and animated. Perhaps glad to have said "everything" to Pupul earlier. He told me that he had pointed out what it had meant for her to give him an ultimatum about the copyright and publication matters when she came to Switzerland. He said the Foundations are one body to him, but India had made trouble over publications for thirteen years, and he was now going to settle it. He was thinking of England choosing and editing the best of all the talks in each year and publishing them in the West. India might, but this must be discussed with KFT and publishers here, have the right to publish these books in India and its territory. He said he would make the decision after talking to everyone, including all KFI members, at their next meeting in Madras. He said he told Pupul he had known for about one-and-a-half years how long he would live. That he wouldn't tell anyone what he knew, but wanted to settle the future of everything before he died. He made Pupul listen, and told me that he said "everything" about India to her.' That's what he reported to me.

September twenty-ninth. 'Early, Scott came in and talked to Krishnaji about the school.

S: There's another thing, too, that I wanted to add that is in my notes. All this time that Pupul was there on that trip, Pupul was insisting to Krishnaji about the importance of structure. And Krishnaji was dead set against that. He kept saying that structure is not what's going to hold us together—it's intelligence. And despite the fact that he told you he had said everything to her, she was still maintaining something that was very antagonistic to what Krishnaji was feeling.

M: Yes. Well, that was sure.

S: So there was not a clearing of the air and getting everything out. She remained resistant. I think that in these thirteen years of conflict with the Indian Foundation, Krishnaji, as we said yesterday, had finally lost his patience with a lot of the shenanigans and the limitations of the Patwardhans. But Pupul was largely behind the conflict about the copyright. And I think that she saw, from what Krishnaji had said to her on this trip, that the Patwardhans were…

M: I never understood his sudden, at least sudden surfacing, of his criticism of the Patwardhans. He said they had not made Vasanta Vihar a religious place, but I didn't know what they had done.

S: Well. They had turned Vasanta Vihar into a little fiefdom.

M: Well, the whole Indian Foundation was a little fiefdom.

S: Yes, the whole Indian Foundation was like that, and really it was Pupul and the Patwardhans in concert who had done this.

M: Yes. The Patwardhans got the blame, though.

S: Yes, but they were the ones who were the administrators. They were the ones who were nominally in charge, although Pupul was the vice president of the Foundation. On this visit, Pupul saw that the Patwardhans were going to come in for a lot of criticism, and I think she shoved all of the blame for the copyright arguments onto the Patwardhans at this time, but she…

M: Now what makes you say that?

S: Because Krishnaji then started blaming the Patwardhans for the thirteen years of copyright conflict, but Pupul was behind it.

M: Of course.

S: But also, it was enormously incompetent, what Pama and Sunanda had been doing. Enormously incompetent. Everything—the sanitation at the place, the treatment of the archives, the property, the way they didn't look after the video equipment and tapes. All—really a catalog of incompetence. And then, of course, Sunanda claiming that she could edit the books and her English was just not up to it. And their pretentious sense of religiousness, well, there was no sense of religiousness there.

M: No, well, there wasn't to me in the whole of the Indian setup.

S: Exactly. So, but they had more or less—

M: They were responsible. And they were the ones within KF India that had the power, because a lot of the trustees of that Foundation just came to yearly meetings.

S: Yes, and they just rubberstamped whatever was said. And it had really been made into an extremely nonreligious place, very privileged and like an elite clique. So it did feel dirty in many ways, and they were responsible. Also, they and Pupul were arch-politicians; always manipulating people, always looking for advantage, always doing all of that kind of thing. So, it was sordid. If Krishnaji can be blamed for anything, it's waiting too long. But Krishnaji had enormous patience.

But this is another matter, which I know you and I have discussed, but not on tape. Why didn't he blame Pupul more? Why did he put up with such appalling behavior from Rosalind? Why did he put up with really…

M: And Rajagopal.

S: And Rajagopal. But I'm talking about something else here. Also Vanda. He put up with things from her that I wouldn't have imagined he would have put up with from other people.

M: Like what?

S: Well, just her weirdness…her often bringing people in who were completely inappropriate.

M: Well, they came to lunch, but…

S: For lunches or just to meet Krishnaji. Anyway, here's my theory, which may be completely wrong. But anyone who looked after Krishnaji during "the process," as did Pupul and Nandini, Vanda, Rosalind, and you took on a terribly important role, and with people who did that, Krishnaji had more tolerance, more forgiveness, and more acceptance of them and their actions than, in my view, he should have. He gave them extra margin, and you and Nandini are the only ones who, again in my view, never abused that. And I think that's why he never really called Pupul on the carpet the way he wanted to.

M: Well, if he said these things that I just read you, he was upsetting that applecart. But I don't know.

S: But hardly at all, I think. Hardly at all. I'm sure he criticized the KFI to Pupul, but I doubt he criticized her directly, the way he did to the Patwardhans. And you will remember, and we'll see it later on, I'm sure, that when he goes off to India, he comes to me and asks me if he has enough money to stay in a hotel.

M: He asked me that, too.

S: Yes, exactly. I mean, and he…

M: I used to put traveler's checks amongst his travel documents, which he didn't want, and he never cashed any of them.

S: I know. So he traveled around forever with these same traveler's checks.

M: Yes, the same traveler's checks. I had to go to the bank here when he was dying to cash them in.

S: Yes. I'm sure that we'll come to this. But, here he was, and the idea of going to stay with Pupul was so distasteful to him that he was nervous of how he would get away and stay in a hotel if he had to. And yet, he still went to stay with her. So, this is what I'm saying: he gave the people who looked after him during "the process" such extra margin. Why put up with all that idiocy from Rosalind? It's just, it's unimaginable.

M: What he put up with from Pupul is minor compared to what he put up with from the Rajagopals.

S: I know. I know. But I think that Pupul did not come in for the amount of direct criticism that he would have given her and should have given her, in my view, had it not been for the role she played in the 1940s during one of his experiences of "the process." And in India, when I was there that winter, you could see all the blame going to Pama and Sunanda, and Pupul was standing calmly on the margins, as though she had nothing to do with it. So she was letting all the fault slide over to them instead of admitting that she was part of the thirteen years of conflict with the KFT and KFA.

M: This is true.

S: So she let it all slide over to them. And I think that it began here during the period at Brockwood that we just covered. She could see that the Indian Foundation was going to come in for some heavy criticism, and she diverted it from her.

M: Yes. But let me continue reading for the twenty-ninth. 'At 11:30 Krishnaji spoke to the school. "Why do we need to study academics? What should we learn beyond that?" Etcetera. After lunch in the West Wing kitchen, Krishnaji talked to Pupul with me there on the Foundations being, in his mind, one body. Saying that India had caused disagreement for thirteen years over publications, and that before he died he wants everything put in order. Pupul reiterated her position of every third book being submitted by India to Western publishers directly, not via KFT.'

S: You see.

M: Yes. 'Krishnaji had earlier, to her, brought up KFT editing and publishing talks and now said he was saying to everyone that what is right is what must be done. Only in that spirit will it be right and not through formulas. Pupul reiterated that the present generation gets on, but those that come from the next generation (i.e., Radhika, Asit, etcetera) will not accept England having predominance. Krishnaji was tired and shaking and very serious, and insisting that we must do what is right, and he would not tell us what that is. Later he told me to talk to Pupul. So while he spent over an hour at 4:15 p.m. with Natasha, I made tea and asked Pupul what she thought of Krishnaji's suggestion that each year a selection of the best of all the year's talks be made and edited by England. She countered with India selecting the best from India. I said it seems to me that it should be the best of all the talks, not a quota from each region, though any region might suggest what seemed is its best. The decision should be by the Publication Committee. Pupul wants Indian rights to do a cheaper Indian edition. I said we'd have to find out the Gollancz and Harper position on that, but it was surely discussable. Pupul is lunching with Mary Cadogan on Tuesday and will talk about it. But Krishnaji wants a final decision after he has talked to all the Indian Foundation members. Harsh and Scott joined the tea scene. And later, while Scott and Dorothy and I walked, Pupul and Harsh had a long talk. Krishnaji's talk with Natasha about her education was long. Her plans were vague but generally to complete her bachelor of science and then work "as a journalist" in India. Then study for a PhD, preferably at Oxford. We had supper on trays, Krishnaji, Pupul, and I. Krishnaji was tired and edgy as well he might be after such a day.'

September thirtieth. 'My brother telephoned from Bonn. I spoke briefly to Lisa. Just then Dr. Scheef came in, so Lisa hung up. Mr. Jose and the embassy car came for Pupul at 10 a.m., and she left for London and goes to Delhi on Wednesday. I rang Mary Cadogan with Krishnaji sitting beside me and reported what had been said with Pupul about publication problems. Krishnaji correcting me, very tense, very irritable. It was a difficult conversation. Then he said to me, when I'd hung up, "I am watching for you. When I'm in India, your brain will go unless you watch. Pay attention. You're not paying attention. You do too many things. You are careless, you are not listening. Write down what I tell you." He stayed in bed till walk time. He spoke of Pupul, and of her saying that she had become famous—he is shocked by this. "Is this what it has come to, fame-power?" It kept coming into his conversation all day. It rings me. He is looking around him after ninety years of pouring out his teachings and sees nothing but mediocre minds. It is as though all of us, but him, poison the life we are given, are blind and indifferent. I want to weep and the weeping seems a tawdry self-indulgence. He was more relaxed at tea and on the walk with Dorothy, Scott, and me. I went to the school meeting and so did Dorothy. It was Kathy's birthday. She and Scott went to Wickham to dinner with ten others who are there to surprise her. Krishnaji "did" my leg and went to bed.' That's his healing. 'I sat up to speak to my brother at the pension where he is staying. Lisa has begun five days of intensive treatment radiation and chemotherapy and hydrotherapy. So far it hasn't made her sick but may. My brother said Dr. Scheef is fairly confident that Lisa can be completely, permanently cured, as it has been got at fairly soon. She will have to go to Bonn twice a year to be checked and will, of course, give up the museum. Daisy was not with her mother Carol when she died. Daisy had gone home for the night. Eddie Collins was with Carol. Daisy inherits whatever Carol had, including the apartment, which Daisy will sell to have some financial security. She is on her way to Bonn to be with Bud.'

The first of October. 'Krishnaji came in just after I woke up. He sat quietly with me. Without saying it he seemed to want to be gentle after yesterday. But Pupul's "I am famous" line continues to shock him. "I'm not going to hold discussions with her in India." He came into the room a few minutes ago, stood looking out the open window for it is a warm summer day, and said, "I feel it is ugly." He was going to lunch in bed but came down at the last minute. At Doris Pratt's request he saw her for an hour at 4 p.m. He said she was aggressive and confused. Friedrich brought a cake from a nearby farm, and he, Scott, and I had it for tea. Krishnaji joined us when he was through with Doris. And then, with Dorothy, we walked around the lane. After supper, Scott said that his father has offered to supervise the building of the study center. He could do it, as that has been his work—has been building huge refineries, power plants, etcetera, all over the world. Krishnaji is for it. Scott is tentative because it is his father.'

S: Yes. [Laughs.] Well, this is how it happened. My father had been project manager for lots of huge projects like chemical refineries and power plants and things like that. And Dad called me up and said, "Look, son, you've never project managed anything like this. I'll come over and help you." Well, the idea that my father would be working under me was just, it was—my brain couldn't deal with that—it was impossible. [M chuckles.] I just couldn't deal with that. I didn't refuse him. I just said, well, you know, I'll get back to you on this. And [laughs] I mentioned this to Krishnaji, and Krishnaji had always been very nice to my parents, and he asked me how I felt about the suggestion. I fumbled around with something like, 'Well, Krishnaji, it's my father, I can't, you know," [chuckles] "this is, I can't…' And Krishnaji said, "Now wait a minute. You have a man who is expert in this and he is offering to do this for free, and you need the help. And you are refusing because he's your father?" [Both chuckle.] Krishnaji said, "You don't have a right to think about it like that. This project is too important. You have no right to think of it like that." [Laughs.]

M: So what happened?

S: So I invited Mom and Dad over and rented a flat for them in Winchester.

M: Yes. I remember their being there. They enjoyed it, as far as I could tell.

S: They loved being there. And my father was absolutely brilliant. He really taught me a lot, but one of the things that he taught me early is that you don't make anything personal. So he acted without any problems with me as the boss. No hesitations, no problems. It was just not an issue for him.

M: [chuckles] He acted as Krishnaji would have acted.

S: Exactly. And he really did know his stuff. And, of course, because he'd been in charge of building such huge things—he was at a level of professionalism that was beyond the architects and beyond the builders we had. So they all respected him. He would sit quietly in the meetings and he would only say something when he was called upon, usually. And his remarks were always tremendously important and to the point and very helpful, and both the architects and the builders looked to him for certain things, and I certainly did. I remember him telling me, "Son, you have to learn how to be a good client." Because I was the client—

M: Yes, you were the client.

S: I was. I was the client of the builders and of the architects. And learning how to be a good client is not as straightforward as one would think. So, really, a lot of the success of the center was due to him. The builders themselves said afterwards, and the architects felt the same, that the building should have cost twice as much as it did.

M: Good god.

S: We had this strange arrangement that Brockwood would pay for all of the materials as they came in and all the labor costs plus ten percent. And Dad helped tremendously smooth that process out, so that materials would come onto the site when they were needed, not a lot ahead of time. Apparently, project management of huge chemical refineries and power plants really means you have to have a constant flow of materials and there was something he called "the critical path" that he was always talking to me about—something which has to happen so that the next thing can happen. So one has to be aware of and plan all that and build in margins for that entire work flow so materials things aren't waiting around, being ruined in the weather, which happens a lot in England, and workers don't come to do work but the materials aren't there for them, which also happens. Anyway, this is a long aside, but essentially, Krishnaji was absolutely right.

M: Well, that's lovely.

So now we go to the second of October. 'Krishnaji did not have a restful night. At 9 a.m. he held a meeting upstairs with the small staff group and asked about leisure, what they do with it. What is their relation to nature or not putting up with things? For Krishnaji, who has put up with appalling things in his lifetime, this question was curious. Perhaps not putting up with Pupul and other people's shortcomings is preoccupying him. Mary Cadogan telephoned about her lunch with Pupul yesterday. Pupul is sticking to wanting every third year an Indian international publication un-vetted by England. She also alarmed Mary by saying she was publishing in her book a letter she has from Krishnaji written in 1968 telling India that England is to have the copyright and something about the Indian resignation will be an intelligent action. Mary had never heard of such a letter and neither have I. Krishnaji doesn't remember. It dates from the time when Naudé was secretary, and we have no copies. Pupul is insistent on including it as an example of Krishnaji's inconsistency or something. Mary urged Pupul not to publish it. It is a very divisive thing and harmful to Krishnaji. But Pupul paid no attention. Mary is coming down Monday and wants to report in detail out of fairness to the whole conversation. But she and Mary Links are wondering what other letters of Krishnaji's Pupul is using. After lunch in bed, Krishnaji dictated to me a letter to Pupul saying he wished to see any letters of his that she intends to publish. He had me read it to both Marys. Mary Links agrees with the letter but hopes Krishnaji will wait for Mary C.'s report before sending it. He will. And Mary L. felt constrained by her own book in which she used some of his letters, but she had written the biographies at his request. Hers were authorized books. She doesn't know if Krishnaji gave a similar authorization to Pupul. Krishnaji doesn't think so, but Pupul may say that he has but has forgotten. I remember being present when Pupul told Krishnaji that she was going to write a sort of memoir of "K in India." She didn't ask for any approval, but just said she was going to do it. Krishnaji is disturbed by all this. She's becoming antagonistic. He wants to take enough money to India so he can go to a hotel if necessary in Delhi or to Murli Rao's place if he feels uncomfortable in Pupul's house. Her feeling of power and being famous is a rising disgust for him. He spent one-and-a-half hours mulling over it. These things trouble him almost obsessively these days. They tire him. He had tea with Grohe, Scott, and me and a walk after around the lanes but was tense, troubled, and edgy in the evening. He said, "I may do none of these things, it's not my business. I'll see." Doing my leg, he would stop as though thinking of something else then go on. He is troubled and I am heartsick. E. B. White died yesterday of Alzheimer's disease, the paper says. How piteous and sad that such a fine human brain should dissolve with that.' Then these seem to be things that he said to me and I wrote down on little pieces of paper.

This one says: 'One: "To think simply and clearly." Two: "To clear the brain of agreement and disagreement."' And then it says, '"Simplicity."' Then, in the same writing, so I guess it's at the same time, is: 'One: "Deliberation, to deliberate." Two: "Decision." Three: "Execution."…"No political activity. Political equals to power seeking. No maneuvering for better power or salary. There is no climbing to higher positions or authority, for Brockwood represents not authority but the teachings. The captain of the team could be, can be, and should be replaced if he is not moving in the right direction." "Samadhi—thought when necessary operates, otherwise the brain is quiet. K—quiet equals no association, recognition, reaction, planning, no time in sense of remembering. Maybe I may change it. It is a state that is always deep but has no depth."' These are the kōan type of Krishnaji comments.

M: Now this is a totally different note: '"There are two kinds of energies in those who are committed and those who are not committed and are therefore free. The committed—missionaries, priests, monks—their energy becomes committed and therefore is limited."'

This seems to be different; this is about India: 'Before he dies, he feels it absolutely necessary to have a religious center. The trust. Krishnaji questions whether you trust him. You have often said Krishnaji is influenced…' This is what he's going to say to them.

Then this is also a different piece of paper. "Scott must have his own contact, not through K., something that will operate all the time and is not dependent on K. He should be with K. as much as possible. Anyone who wants to come in contact with that must have no bones, no pull. It's all so ordinary."'

The third of October. ‘Krishnaji got a little more rest. When I brought in his breakfast, he said he had just had a remarkable meditation. Perhaps that will wipe away some of the sense of problems that have harassed him. The soft Indian summer has fled, and a strong wind is flailing the trees, rushing in from the Channel. Krishnaji has just gone down for the first meeting of the term alone with the students.’

‘Later: Evelyne Blau rang from Los Angeles about the possibility of Krishnaji speaking in Toronto. He doesn’t want to. She talks of getting Norman Cousins, who didn’t accept last year, to do a video discussion with him, or Arthur Clark, who lives in Sri Lanka and didn’t try to speak to Krishnaji when he was expected to the year Krishnaji was in Sri Lanka, or Alvin Toffler, who is unlikely to be interested. She also spoke of doing video instead of film of Krishnaji answering questions. Krishnaji was very noncommittal when I reported all this at teatime. We walked in a light rain, Krishnaji, Dorothy, Friedrich, Scott, and me. After supper Krishnaji again said to me in a most serious voice, “Will you listen? I am watching for you, but you must pay attention on the walk. You are not walking on the sides of the road.”’ Then I put in parentheses, ‘(my shoes had picked up a lot of dirt).’ Then, ‘“You must watch everything you do.” It is at the end of the day when he is most tired that the least thing seems impossible to him. Things seem black and white. The least thing is irritating, seen as part of larger wrong things. I spoke to my brother in the evening. Lisa is beginning to feel nausea. Tomorrow is the last day of this course of treatment. Daisy arrives in Bonn tomorrow.’

The next day, ‘There was rain in the morning, but I went anyway to Alresford on errands. Dr. Rahula and friends came to lunch. At 4 p.m. Krishnaji gave an interview to a Lella Russell Smith for articles in the Friends Journal, a national Quaker magazine in the United States. Then tea and walk.’

October the fifth. ‘At 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji talked alone with the students. I ran three videos we made a year ago of half-hour sessions of Krishnaji answering one basic question each. One was on conditioning, one was on fear, both with me as the questioner, and one was on what is religion with me and Ray McCoy doing the questions. Keith Critchlow and his wife Gail came to lunch. Critchlow gave a talk to the school at 4 p.m., which Krishnaji attended. But after tea upstairs he was tired and went to bed. I walked with Dorothy. It was a bright beautiful afternoon with cool air and a light breeze. Krishnaji had turned on the lights when I brought his supper tray and said he wasn’t tired. After supper he said to me, as long as we live together he will point out things to me. After that, it is up to me. We watched a Paul Daniel’s magic show on TV, which Krishnaji enjoyed.’ You see, he was…

S: He was ill at ease because he was ill.

M: I know, and I was the main person around him, and everything was irritating.

S: Yes, but you were also the person with whom he was freest, too. So he could express his irritability more with you than with other people. But I have to say, he was not irritable with me, and that’s not because I was somehow better or anything else. But I think that he was just not as free to express his irritability with me because I was not as close and I had so much on my plate. So, I don't think he was trying to do as much with me as he was with you.

M: Well, he was cooking you all those years.

S: Oh, boy. I know that. And I was doing yoga with him during every morning during this period, and you haven't mentioned this.

M: Yes.

S: I would come over at 6 a.m. Wait for him to wake up. Make his nettle tea and sit with him when he drank it. And then it was an hour to an hour and a quarter of doing exercises with this man who was ninety years old and who I could barely keep up with.

M: And he wasn't irritable with you about not doing it just the way…

S: No. He was very, very demanding, and he would sometimes chastise me, but very gently, that here he was, ninety years old, and he was far more flexible than I was. And he was very exacting, especially with the breathing exercises, but he was never irritable.

M: Yes. Well, he wasn't irritable with me when he supervised my exercises. At least my diaries don't say so. [Both chuckle.]

October sixth. 'At 12:15 Keith Critchlow showed Krishnaji, Friedrich, Scott, Kathy, and me more detailed plans for the study center and continued with that after lunch. Tea, walk in the rain.'

The seventh of October: 'I had a long talk by telephone with Daisy in Bonn. She is still in some sense shocked at Carol's death, which was sudden to her. Mary Cadogan came, and at 11:15 a.m. Krishnaji, she, Friedrich, Scott, and I discussed the Saanen Gathering Committee proposing that Jean de Maurex becomes the secretary-treasurer of the committee instead of Gisèle Balleys. Krishnaji decided not to send the letter he dictated last week to Pupul, but to approach the situation through her daughter, Radhika, when he sees her in Benares. He asked what would happen if he resigned from the KFI. He feels uncomfortable at being Pupul's guest in Delhi if he has to confront her while he is there. He asked me earlier to see that he had money with him to pay for a hotel if necessary or he would go to Murli Rao's. He asked if Gollancz would agree to India publishing in India and its area one annual collection of the best of the year's talks, which will be edited by England. He agreed that a question-and-answer section of meetings belongs with the talks. Krishnaji may ask India to publish this annual book and see to its translations into Indian languages. Mary Cadogan reported carefully on her meeting with Pupul last Tuesday. Pupul insisted administration is separate from the teachings' [chuckles] 'and we should settle such matters without Krishnaji.'

S: [chuckles] Yes. Now that she sees how Krishnaji is going to decide, she wants not to have him decide.

M: Yes. 'She tried to get Mary to say what she would agree to, but Mary said it was out of her hands, as Krishnaji is going to make the decision, which Pupul had originally suggested. Pupul would like to wriggle out of this now, and will not admit the teachings are at the heart of this. She insists it is a matter of structure only. She insists that the next generation in India will not accept restrictions. Mary said Pupul voluntarily admitted that she has a remnant of anti-British feelings from the Raj days. This came after Mary said that some Indians say the British are racist.' [Chuckles.] Quite a conversation they must've had. [Both chuckle.] 'About Pupul's book, Mary is concerned by Pupul's including a Krishnaji letter written in 1968 making England responsible for things. We do not know in what context the letter was written or how Pupul wants to use it. Possibly it reflects feelings at the time when India didn't want Krishnaji on their board'—which they didn't—'but they had Rajagopal on it, and kept Rajagopal on the board for two years after Krishnaji had disassociated himself from Rajagopal. Mary said Pupul is not antagonistic to Krishnaji, is devoted, but Mary feels she is somewhat arrogant in writing to explain Krishnaji. Krishnaji may ask to see all letters of his that Pupul wants to publish and review them after his return to Ojai. It was agreed that the Brockwood talks next year will have caravans to rent but no camping. We discussed Brockwood's building needs: re-roofing with lead and exterior plaster on top of the basic brick, which needs to be redone. We talked about indexing and a report on the subject by Harsh. We discussed a telephone conversation with Bill Quinn in which he said there is a feeling that Albion's excerpting is similar to an anthology, which we have rejected. What is needed is a straight index in subjects, computerizing it, possibly. We suggested asking Jane to coordinate this. We discussed changing the dates of the annual audit and the annual general meeting of the KFT board.'

'Krishnaji rested after lunch but rejoined us at 4:15 p.m. We had tea, and there was no walk. Krishnaji asked us how to bring about trust in the Indian Foundation. He said they do not trust each other or him, and he has been unable to change this. He spoke again about the teachings being put second to structure in Ojai, India, everywhere. I said that was an unfair indictment, and it was a damning thing for anyone who has been close to Krishnaji to put the teaching second to organization. Krishnaji said he was not making an indictment. I say he may not have meant it to be, but to me it would be a shocking fact or act to put the teachings second to anything. I said some people (by implication Ojai) had situational trouble, which they had to cope with, but it didn't mean they felt the teachings were secondary. It was then 6:15 p.m. and school meeting time. Later, when I came up with Krishnaji's supper tray, he said I should not have made him defend what he said. What he said was that the teachings were not flowering. I said that we see that but do not know how to bring it about. This is not caused by denigration of the teachings. I felt exhausted by all this, and Krishnaji was tired. He said it was too much to do a video question/answering session with Scott and me tomorrow. He had talked too much today, "I am too old to talk again tomorrow."' God, it was a terrible time.

October eighth. ‘Krishnaji oversaw my breathing exercises but then went back to bed for the rest of the day. Friedrich Grohe left for Switzerland. Dr. Reilly came at 12:30 p.m. and gave Krishnaji, me, and Scott flu shots, and said he would come by Friday to remove a small cyst in the center of Krishnaji’s forehead and give him gamma globulin before India. I walked later with Dorothy and Scott.’

The ninth of October: ‘Krishnaji, in the elegance of one of his blue suits, and I, in my tweed coat that is descended from an old favorite brown one, went to London on a bright autumn morning and on the 10:23 a.m. train. Both Mary and Joe met us at Waterloo and took us to Huntsman for Krishnaji’s fitting. Then Mary came with Krishnaji and me to Fortnum’s for a leisurely lunch. We bought some Russian and Polish vodka for Dr. Reilly, who is said to have a little glass before dinner every evening’ [chuckles] ‘and who never sends us a bill when he makes house calls. We stopped at Hatchards for books and took a taxi to Waterloo. A simple day in the warm, gentle mold of so many almost identical ones. I rode down White Hall with Krishnaji holding my hand in a haze of happiness. The clear country air was part of it when we came home, and a circle against the current world where race riots trashed Brixton and Tottenham, and four Palestinians have hijacked an Italian cruise ship in the Mediterranean, shooting an American who was a Jewish man in a wheelchair and dumping him overboard.’

S: Yes, I remember that.

M: ‘Krishnaji was tired by the time he got to bed.’

The next day. ‘Krishnaji reviewed my exercises. A Marine sergeant is he.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘At 11:30 a.m. he spoke alone with students. Jane came to lunch and I asked her if she would coordinate the index project if we can ever all agree on how it should be done.’ [Chuckles.] ‘Walk around the lanes with Krishnaji, Dorothy, Scott, and me.’

The eleventh of October. ‘Somehow I look forward to today. Part of the simple-order preoccupation that seems somewhere in each day. I took Kathy Forbes and Ray McCoy to Petersfield and the 9:23 a.m. train. In London I went by tube to Piccadilly and did a wandering list of errands. One, a cashmere dressing gown for Lisa. Expensive but a present she may like, I hope. At 12:30 p.m. I went to have a sandwich with Mary and Joe chez eux, and stayed there for a meeting of the Publications Committee at 2 p.m. In attendance were the two Marys, the two Hammonds, Kathy, and Ray. Elena Greene was discussed as an addition to be added, perhaps after she has done some editing. On indexing, Ray is to draw up his suggestion of a simple method and present it to everyone. Joe put out a nice tea, and we went on till 5:40 p.m. Mary Cadogan, Ray, Kathy, and I took the tube to Waterloo, and reached Brockwood at 8 p.m. Catherine and Jean de Maurex had arrived for the weekend and are in the West Wing. Krishnaji had the small cyst removed from his forehead by Dr. Reilly and also a gamma globulin shot. He seemed in good spirits and was glad I was with Ray and Kathy coming home after dark.’ [Chuckles.] Dangerous after dark.

October twelfth. ‘I talked to Bud in Bonn. Daisy left for New York. Lisa is feeling all right so far, with few side effects after the first five-day course of radiation and chemotherapy. At 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji spoke to the whole staff. In the afternoon Jean de Maurex reported on the progress in getting permission, etcetera to build on our Saanen land for eventual sale. It will be slow and very Swiss, but probably sound. After tea in the kitchen, Krishnaji, the de Maurexes, Dorothy, Scott, and I walked.’ [Both chuckle.]

The next day. ‘Krishnaji checked my exercises in the morning. Rita Zampese came to lunch and brought Krishnaji’s Lufthansa ticket for India. Tea with the de Maurexes and Scott, and then a walk that included Dorothy.’

The fourteenth. ‘In the morning Krishnaji, Scott, and I did a video-recorded discussion on what brings about change in people. The de Maurexes left after lunch. I am not sure how these video discussions will appear to the uninvolved. Apart from what Krishnaji actually says, they may actually be a little different to the others. Perhaps less formal. We’ll have to examine this with a cold eye.’ [Chuckles.] ‘At 4 p.m. Mrs. Barbara Jackson brought the venerable Ananda Maitreya and two “attendant monks” to see Krishnaji. They brought a nice plant offering, too, appreciated more by me.’ [Chuckles.] ‘It seems the venerable Ananda Maitreya has also arrived at ninety years and seemed to wish to share this eminence. I provided tea. They do not take milk. I don’t know if this is to taste or some Buddhist proscription. Krishnaji was charming and joking, but impaled the venerable with the question, “What did the Buddha really say?”’ [Both laugh.] Oh dear. I hope you appreciate my reporting.

S: Yes, I do. I do. [Both chuckle.]

M: ‘He went on to enlarge on the fact that no one really knows. The venerable giggled a bit’ [chuckles] ‘but gave nothing much in return.’ [Both chuckle.] ‘The attendant, Mrs. Jackson, seemed to enjoy this. “He needs to be talked to this way,” she said. Krishnaji let them stay so long that there could be no walk.’ [Chuckles.] Oh dear, we did lead an odd life.

S: Now before we go on to the fifteenth, there’s something in my notes about all of this that one should say. From the moment the de Maurexes arrived, Krishnaji tried to persuade Jean to come to India.

M: Oh.

S: And my notes say that I was surprised at how strong Krishnaji was.

M: Pushing him.

S: Yes. But Jean just didn’t feel he could go or wanted to go. And when Jean finally refused fully, Krishnaji somewhat pulled back a little bit. He was really wanting Jean to get involved.

M: Yes. Would that he had.

S: And to perhaps help with the Indian mess. And I was so sorry that he didn't, because I think really Krishnaji wanted his involvement in the whole thing. And Jean and Catherine had second thoughts later, but it was too late.

M: Oh? And since Krishnaji didn't live much longer that must have added to their regret.

S: Yes. Yes, it did.

M: Of course.

S: Because until I got to India, Krishnaji was just at the Indians' mercy.

M: Yes, he was beleaguered there.

S: He was beleaguered and it was terrible. It was just terrible. So Jean being there would have made a big difference.

M: Yes. Yes, it would. I wished…I should have gone that year, but he told me he didn't want me to go.

S: No. He didn't want you to go.

M: He didn't want me to go.

S: I think we should probably stop here. We've run out of tape again.

Issue 88: October 15, 1985 to December 31, 1985

For many months I have wrestled with how to deal with Krishnaji's last trip to India. As Mary was not in India, she has very little information other than documenting Krishnaji's itinerary. And yet his last trip to India was momentous in many ways, not least of which was Krishnaji's health. Krishnaji comes to Ojai after India a completely different man from the one who went to India, and I can only imagine that anyone really interested in his life would want to know about this intervening period. I went to India that winter, and I made extensive notes. Those notes will fill in what Mary could not record. My notes go on to the end of Krishnaji's life, but I will cease using my notes when he returns to Ojai and we are able to follow Mary's record again. This is, after all, Mary's memoirs, not mine. I am encouraged in doing this by Mary often asking for information from my notes that have appeared in the last three issues. This is, therefore, only an extension of that.

These notes have not been changed since they were originally written twenty-eight years ago.

Mary: Today we begin our discussion on October fifteenth, 1985, and Krishnaji and I are at Brockwood. It is just before his trip to India. 'Krishnaji stayed in bed resting all day but came into the kitchen for tea and talked to Scott and me about trust. Are there a few we trust to carry on the work and to protect the teachings? He spoke of there being virtually nobody in Ojai except the Lilliefelts and me. India is pulling away and is still a concern to him. Who? Who?—everywhere—to protect this precious jewel. Later, Scott, Dorothy, and I walked; and when I returned, I telephoned the Dunnes. There is a fire again in Malibu, but it is receding and their place is safe.

Scott: If I may elaborate on that small discussion, because I have quite a few notes on that.

M: Good.

S: Also I remember it so vividly. I remember where we were sitting in the kitchen, and I remember the conversation. I also had a subsequent conversation with Krishnaji on the topic of trust. One of the things I asked him was, "Krishnaji, who do you trust?" And he only mentioned you. He didn't mention the Lilliefelts. So, I asked the Lilliefelts, Pupul, and Mary Cadogan, and his response was no, no, no, none of them. So I asked, "Krishnaji, what do you mean by 'trust'? Because you're using it in a very special way. Obviously you're not worried that Cadogan or the Lilliefelts are going to run off with the money or something." He said, "No, that's not it."

M: It was the teachings…

S: Yes, and he reiterated this; he meant by "trust" keeping the teachings clean and taking care of the land. It was those two things. And I said, "Krishnaji, even Mary…you can't trust her, for instance, to fly an airplane if you were going to go someplace." He said,

"No, that's not it." He didn't mean that you could do everything, and also he didn't mean that you can't make mistakes, but that it was somehow, as I—

M: I used that same example, the airplane thing…about—I forget whether it was trust or what it was—but, you know, he could do all these things. But I said I wouldn't want to fly in an airplane if he was the pilot.

S: Yes. Yes. [Both chuckle.] Well, for Krishnaji this trust seemed to have something to do with the basis for judgment; whether the judgment was coming from something like self-centeredness or from some alternative motive, or some…or whether it was coming from an understanding of the teachings, and even if the judgment was wrong it wouldn't matter. It's where it was coming from—the trust he was speaking of was something about that. And I also asked him, "Krishnaji, do you trust me?" And he smiled and he said, "That's not a question you should ask." [M chuckles.] And he said, "You shouldn't have to ask it. You should just see." And [chuckles] I felt duly chastised. But this issue of trust was something that he had been carrying on for some time, and, as I remember it, it had even found its way into some of the discussions with the small staff group or perhaps the staff as a whole; but this issue was a very big thing. I remember when I got to India, and we were in Madras and there were the KFI trustee meetings—Krishnaji was telling them that he didn't trust them, and then—and I didn't know about this till afterward—he made the great difficulty for me of saying that he trusted me. Which just, of course, rubbed all these people up the wrong way.

M: [chuckles] They must have growled at that.

S: Yes, and I was surprised that he said that, but this was something that he was very preoccupied with for quite a while—he kept speaking about trust in such a deep and profound way. I've often thought back on this notion of trust. It's not that trustworthy people can't make mistakes. It's not that he would trust you to fly an airplane; and it's not that he would worry about Cadogan or the Lilliefelts running off with the money or the property. That's not the point. It was the basis a person has for decisions or the basis for judgment. It was something like that. But, he reiterated, "to keep the teachings clean and to take care of the land."

M: [chuckles] It's interesting that the land is in there because obviously the teachings are everything. But the land…

S: Yes, I was astonished by that, and I remember talking to Gary and Christina about this very quote. Because, of course, taking care of the Brockwood grounds was their bailiwick. But he was absolutely clear.

M: Well, think, just subjectively, if you didn't even know him, he had more people not to trust around him from the beginning than anybody I can think of.

S: Yes, from the beginning, the very beginning.

M: With the crescendo of Rajagopal's betrayals.

S: I know. Just thinking of Leadbeater, a self-centered, corrupt basis for judgment if ever there was one, and then of course…

M: He trusted Mrs. Besant.

S: Yes. He did.

M: He never said, "I trust Amma," but from the way he spoke of her; it was with veneration and affection, and in that there was obviously trust.

S: Yes. Yes. Yes. Yes.

M: Even if she would get gaga—which she did later on.

S: Absolutely.

M: Yes.

S: Annie Besant was someone who stood out.

M: Yes. Really Arundale and all those…they were all wanting to use him for their own purposes.

S: Yes, and that, incidentally, has always been my reluctance to put anything in print about Krishnaji. Because I see so many people writing things just for their own self-promotion.

M: That's what worries me about all this.

S: I know. But you can't use that as an excuse, you see, because Krishnaji told you—[laughs].

M: Well, he told me to write. [Chuckles.] But then I have to be trustworthy in what I write or talk about.

S: Yes, you were meant to convey as fully as possible what it was like to be with this extraordinary being, as he kept saying. And I think you are doing that.

M: Well, he also talked about what I should do after he was gone, and it was to guard the teachings.

S: Yes, absolutely.

M: And I've said this to various trustees in both Foundations I've been in. I've said this is what I feel my function is because this is what he told me he wanted.

M: And then I point out whatever I have to say. But I've always made this clear to them, because I don't do anything for the Foundations. I don't raise money, I—

S: No. But you do the more important thing, which I think is this.

M: Yes. And I've used it recently. Somebody had an idea, which I thought was something he wouldn't like and said so.

S: Yes. And that's important.

M: October sixteenth. 'At 11:30 a.m. Krishnaji talked with the small staff group upstairs. Tea and walk, Krishnaji, Scott, and me. Telephoned Amanda. The fire is still in Malibu but has moved away from them.'

The next day. 'I telephoned my brother in Bonn and said I would come on November third to see him and Lisa.' If you'll remember, she was undergoing cancer treatments there with Dr. Scheef. 'I made Lufthansa reservations via Rita, then went to Alresford while Krishnaji talked alone with students. He sat with them at lunch at one of the other tables for the first time. I telephoned Erna about my arrival in Ojai on November eleventh. After tea, Krishnaji, Scott, and I walked in the gray and misty late afternoon.'

S: So, for any of those who might not understand this seating arrangement in the Brockwood dining room…

M: Yes. [Both chuckle.]

S: Krishnaji always sat at the first table, the head table. The tables were big, long refectory tables lined up in rows. Krishnaji sat at what one would think of as the head table. The first table. He sat in the middle, facing everybody so he could see the entire dining room. There was a seat that, when he was at Brockwood, no one else sat in.

M: Yes.

S: It wasn't formally announced or anything like that. It was just the tradition. So for him to sit at one of the other tables was unusual for the students.

M: Well, it was, you see, after talking to the students; whatever happened in that. Of course, we might point out that you and I and all the rest of the adult people in the whole place did not go to those talks.

S: We did not go to the talks, and in fact it was only in the last year, I think, that I even could get the students to allow us to record them. They had never been recorded, but I finally persuaded the students [M chuckles] to let us record them but that no staff would listen to them.

M: Oh, really?

S: Oh yes, it was very important that no staff would listen to them. They would just go right into the archives.

M: Really. [Chuckles.] I didn't know that promise.

S: Oh yes, I had to promise that because they wanted to feel that they could complain about the staff and they say all kinds of negative things. And I said absolutely they should.

M: That's right. It was confidential, what they were saying.

S: It was confidential, and I felt they should say what they wanted to say, but history still should know the way Krishnaji talked with them.

M: Yes.

S: I don't know if anybody, still, has ever listened to them. But I think the promise was that no one would listen to them as long as any of those students were there still at Brockwood.

M: Yes, you have to have some clause in there, otherwise they'd just sit on a shelf forever.

S: Yes. Yes. [Both chuckle.] Anyway, yes, the explanation of the seating arrangement.

M: October eighteenth. 'At Scott's suggestion, Krishnaji, he, and I made an audiotape about what Pandit Jagannath Upadhyaya had told him about the ancient text that the Pandit had been told by his teacher to find and which, after decades, he found, foretelling a World Teacher manifestation. After Krishnaji described it, he said, "I could probably investigate this, but I don't want to. It wouldn't be right." Mrs. Alexander, wife of the Indian high commissioner, came alone to lunch. She is a nice woman, interested in the school, and had been a Montessori teacher. Her husband is so busy in the aftermath of Rajiv Gandhi's brief visit to London and the heavy security due to Sikh plots that he couldn't come. After tea, Krishnaji, Scott, and I walked. Erna telephoned from Ojai. The attorney general has refused to sign the settlement agreement with Rajagopal. An addendum to it is being drawn up to state the settlement is accepted without the attorney general. But it has to be signed over here by Krishnaji, me, and Tilly Von Egmond. How to get it here before Krishnaji's leaving for India next Thursday?' I think Erna flew over. I don't know.

S: Yes. She flew over.

M: Do we have to explain why Tilly also had to sign for Holland?

S: Yes. Holland was one of the early Krishnaji organizations and was party to all these things in the case. They even owned Vasanta Vihar in Madras.

M: Yes. That's why.

The nineteenth of October. 'At 11:30 a.m. there was a videotaped discussion with Krishnaji, Scott, and me on what is the ground of a religious place—of something sacred in a center or a school. He turned the question back on us. What did we think it was? It went backward and forward a bit. I said our answer would be in what we did in the future, but he is here and what is wanted now is his envisionment of what should be. He finally said, "It should be a religious center. A center where people feel there is something not cooked up, not imaginative, not some kind of 'holy' atmosphere; a religious center, not in the orthodox sense of that word; a center where a flame is living, not the ashes of it. If a flame is alive, and if you come to that house, you might take light, that flame with you; or you might light your candle and be the most extraordinary human being, not broken up; a person who is really whole, has no shadow of sorrow, pain, and all that kind of thing. So that to me is a religious center." The Bohms and Mark Edwards were at lunch, and afterward Mark took photos against the light background of my room of Krishnaji and David for the next book'—he wanted a white background, that's why it was done there—'The Future of Humanity, which is edited by Mary Cadogan from the last two dialogues that Krishnaji and David did some time ago. Erna telephoned, saying the only way she can get the papers here for signatures is to bring them herself. She arrives Tuesday. After tea, Krishnaji, Scott, and I walked.'

The twentieth. 'Three computer experts doing research on artificial intelligence came to lunch, and they want to do a video discussion with Krishnaji in June. I telephoned Tilly Von Egmond in Holland, and she agreed to come here at KFA's expense to sign the papers Erna will bring. I called Erna to tell her this. Krishnaji spoke to the small staff group upstairs. A late walk: Krishnaji, Dorothy, Scott, and me.'

S: Just to say that, according to my notes, Krishnaji was very pleased with these three artificial intelligence experts, and he had a great discussion with them.

M: At the lunch table.

S: Yes, at the table, and wanted to continue it at some other time. It was really about what's going to happen with the human brain with the development of these computers and all of this. One of them was a real Krishnaji enthusiast. Another had just read some books. And the third didn't know anything. But they were all three interested in pursuing this conversation with Krishnaji. They enjoyed it too, and felt that really important questions were being asked that needed to be explored, so…

M: Two things occurred to me to add to what we're talking about, and one is about computers. The moment computers appeared in the world, he immediately saw the implications of it.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: What it would do to the human life and mind and so forth. And the other thing is that I meant to say when we were talking about where he sat at the school dining table, he not only sat there and could see the whole room, but he knew what was going on just by watching the children.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: He knew. He just sat there quietly and talked to people at the table a little bit, not all that much. But he was aware of everything, with a hundred people in that room.

S: Yes. Yes. He picked up what was going on in the school tremendously.

M: Yes. Just from eating lunch, watching everyone.

S: Yes.

M: It was quite extraordinary.

S: Yes. And his watching was not staring or glaring.

M: Oh no.

S: It was almost like surreptitious watching.

M: He was very subtle.

S: He was very subtle and just seemed to occasionally look up but tremendously observant. Yes.

M: Yes.

The twenty-first of October: 'Krishnaji said he had slept well but was vague and "wooly" at breakfast. He had difficulty with balance, doing his exercises with Scott. And then with buttoning his clothing. I was getting the car and Scott found him struggling with buttons and had to help him.' He would get rather flustered when he had to hurry. He didn't like that.

S: No, he didn't like having to rush. But I have in my notes about helping him pack before a trip.

M: Yes.

S: He would get up hours before he had to leave. But then he would dawdle. [M chuckles.] He would just do things very…it was almost like a child who was reluctant to go do something. He was just almost killing time, but not quite, and then, at the last minute, there was a rush.

M: It was like doing homework.

S: Exactly. Exactly. And at the last minute there was a rush, and it was very difficult. Yes, he would get a little flustered, but also, I noted, that he never forgot anything. He was remarkable in that. When I am rushed and flustered and trying to go somewhere, I always forget something. It's guaranteed I'll forget something.

M: Mm. Well, think how much traveling and packing he had done in that long life.

S: Yes. And, of course, I also have notes about the extraordinary technique he had for packing.

M: Yes.

S: It was quite remarkable. Quite remarkable.

M: Yes. [Chuckles.] He never wanted me to do the packing. Because I had to do my packing.

S: Yes.

M: And he was also extremely punctual.

S: Oh yes.

M: I know that when I was driving him to the talks in Saanen, I had to have the car in front of the door—and I thought out part of this, but this is the way it worked smoothly. And I would be in the car for ten minutes before we were due to leave, and it had to be right in front of the front door. That he wanted. And I used to open the car door so it would be open, so he would come out of Tannegg, closing the door behind him, walk so many steps, get into the car. I would have the motor going so that we then went down without hurry, so that he got to the tent enough ahead of time. Driving fairly slowly—not slowly, but not hurrying. And it was like a ballet, it was all…

S: Yes, yes.

M: And that was the way he wanted it.

S: Yes. And then you would leave him in the car and go take your place in the tent.

M: Yes, that's right.

S: And if the weather was warm, he would sit in the car with the door open. And if it wasn't, if it was cold or raining, he would sit in the car with the door closed. I would wait by the entry for him, his entry, and then he would come and stand next to the video van, which had a little tarpaulin over it.

M: Mm, hm.

S: He would hear the announcements, and when the announcements were finished, he would say things like, "Is it time to go?" or something like that. [Chuckles.]

M: And then, afterward—we might as well describe all this since we are doing this.

S: Yes, we might as well.

M: After talking, he would, well, he would sometimes say, "May I go?" or something like that to the audience. He would then pick up his watch—his pocket watch, which he had open on the stage so he could see it—and he'd go, heading for the path along the river.

S: Yes.

M: And he's a fast walker, so he would stride up the road toward Gstaad and, of course, the audiences would trail after him. I would have to weave my way—

S: Through the crowd.

M: —without hitting anybody through these bemused people who didn't see the car or anything, creeping through the crowd of his followers, literally following him up the road, and try to pick him up before [chuckles] he got to the river. Then he'd get in, and off we'd go. Sometimes he didn't want to go right back to Tannegg; he wanted to unwind a bit, so we'd drive to Gsteig or go somewhere.

S: Yes. And the variation for that when we were at Brockwood is that we had set up behind the platform a little area that was about two-and-a-half or three feet wide and as long as the platform. And there was a mirror back there because he would walk from the West Wing to the tent to talk—

M: Yes, like a little dressing room.

S: Yes. Just because it was often windy, and his hair would get messed up. So he would come with one of his metal combs. I don't know where he'd gotten the first metal combs, but when he wanted some additional ones, he couldn't find them anymore.

M: I got the first ones, I think.

S: Ah, you got the first ones, I'm sure, but then they couldn't be found anymore, and so I had to get them from Sweden.

M: Sweden, I know. I know. I still have some of his combs.

S: The gold ones or the silver ones?

M: The silver.

S: Oh. Those are the original ones. The second ones were not as good as the first ones. Anyway, he would then hand me his comb after straightening his hair, so it wasn't in his pocket. And also, some years ago, there was some nut who had gotten into the West Wing. You and I have covered this. Anyway, as a consequence of that, he would lock the West Wing before leaving it, and in that little space behind the platform he would hand me the keys as well as his comb.

M: Mm, hm. Oh.

S: He would come back to that space after the talks and just stand there for a minute to kind of unwind, or come in for a landing, I used to think of it. And then I would walk back with him, often just behind him, so people could greet him if they wanted to. But I was on what I called "nut guard." And then, when we got near the house, I would hand him back the keys so he could get back into the West Wing and his comb.

M: [chuckles] It's funny, all these details, which are so vivid.

S: They are very vivid. Very vivid.

M: Yes. [S chuckles.]

So back to October twenty-first and our trip to London. 'We were ten minutes late leaving but made the train at Petersfield. We had a second-class ticket but sat side by side in first class because second class was so crowded. Though there were others in the carriage, he quietly felt for my hand, saying in a low voice, "I need to hold a hand," and after a minute he nodded to me and said, "I'm alright now." He was somewhat not there; distracted. But whenever I would glance at him he would nod to show that everything was alright. Joe and Mary met us at Waterloo and dropped us at Truefitt, where he had his hair cut. I went up Bond Street on some errands, and when I came back, he had just finished and was there smiling. I showed him some shoes in the Chanel window, and he thought they were nice, and said I should get them.' [Chuckles.] 'We walked down to Hatchards, and he looked at books. Then he needed a bathroom, so we went up in the lift, and when we came down again to the basement where the paperbacks are, where he had been so many times, he couldn't make out where he was. I had to show him the stairs we always used. And then he said, "Yes," he knew now where he was. We found the books he wanted—thrillers by Charles McCarry, who he says is good. Then we joined Mary for lunch. A pleasant lunch, but, as he does so often these days, he asked what would happen when he is gone. Who will decide about publications? Mary said we would decide together. The thing that is worrying and is on his mind so much at this time is India's inability to feel part of one thing. They feel rather defiantly separate, and this is on his mind. We went to the dentist quickly and quite terrifyingly as he darted across Piccadilly to catch a taxi. Mr. Thompson didn't do very much, and a radio cab was called. We thought we had missed the 4:20 p.m. train, but it was there. He sat opposite me in the second-class section.' He didn't want to be in first class anymore. He [chuckles] once—I think he didn't know what it cost—and at one point I think I gave him the money while I parked the car.

S: Yes, we have discussed that. And he bought second-class tickets to save the money.

M: Yes, and that's when it dawned on him how much first class was, as compared to second-class. [S chuckles.] And from then on we went in second-class. [S chuckles.] 'He sat opposite me in the second-class section, which was crowded and noisy, and though he was tired, he didn't look tired. He was alert, bright, watching everybody, and looking extraordinarily young and vulnerable, aware of everything and infinitely extraordinary. I try not to think of things that may happen, can happen. Every inch of each day is so precious that I can't speak of what I feel about him. He was tired when we reached Brockwood and went right to bed. When I brought his tray, he didn't touch it at first, but then he did and ate slowly. I worry. The other day, when we were walking, he said suddenly, "I wish I could see a deer looking at us."'

S: Hm. [Pause.] You mentioning his going to Truefitt just reminded me of one other thing that should go in here. I went in a couple times with Krishnaji to Truefitt, and the routine with Truefitt was something so special. You would always give him a new—I don't know whether it was a £5 note or a £10 note. Whatever note it was, he would keep it up in his…

M: He never carried money.

S: He never carried money, so he would keep this in his upper jacket pocket.

M: Yes.

S: And, of course, the men who worked in Truefitt were all wonderful to him, and there was a special man to brush off people's jackets before helping them back on with their jackets after the haircut.

M: That's right. And he had to be tipped, too.

S: Oh yes. So Krishnaji would hand this note—he would reach in and hand the note, still folded, just as it had been in his pocket, to the head barber and say to please take a tip and also take a tip for the man who brushed off his jacket. And then, whatever change he was given, he didn't look at it. He would just put it right in his pocket. And then, as soon as we were out of the shop, he would hand me all the money. [Both chuckle.] As though somehow this didn't—

M: He didn't ever carry money; he didn't want to carry money.

S: Yes. Yes. It was just so funny. It was minimum contact with this money.

M: Also, when he went off and I wasn't flying to India with him, he didn't want to carry any money. There was that well-documented time when his plane came down in Athens and he had to spend the night there, so I said that he mustn't go around the world with no money. I got him to carry traveler's checks and explained how they worked, but he never cashed any.

S: I know.

M: But he did want to take…how much was it? It was in English pounds sterling; I've forgotten what it was, but it was to tip the barber who cut his hair at Rishi Valley.

S: Aha.

M: He would take that in cash. I would put it in his passport.

S: In pounds.

M: It was in pounds, yes.

S: To tip the Rishi Valley barber. [Laughs.]

M: I don't know how the barber coped with the pounds, but I'm sure there was a nice black market somewhere.

S: Yes. [Chuckles.] Yes.

M: October twenty-second. 'In the early morning, when I went in to see Krishnaji, he asked me to lie down quietly, and I did for a while. When I got up, he said, "I'm glad you lay down. It calms the body."' I just lay there, and the presence seemed to do it.

S: Mm, hm. Yes. Mm, hm.

M: 'When he falls asleep, not at night, but when he does during the day, what he calls "shouting" comes upon him. He cries out, and it wakes him with a start. He had been doing that, and apparently my lying quietly calmed and quieted him. But he was tired.'

S: Yes. Yes.

M: 'I drove to Heathrow and met Erna bringing the addendum to the settlement agreement for our signatures. We talked about everything on the way back and reached Brockwood by 2:30 p.m. We had a late lunch in our kitchen. Krishnaji was with us and talked with us, and later we all had tea and walked—Krishnaji, Erna, Dorothy, Scott, and me. Tilly Von Egmond arrived from Holland to sign the papers, too. Krishnaji, Erna, and I had supper on trays. Erna had gone to bed when a message came to telephone Stuart Comis.' He was one of our lawyers, which Cohen was head of. 'I got Erna up, and we both telephoned Comis. Erna took down carefully in shorthand the text of the changes in the addendum, and it was almost an hour's conversation. She then retyped the whole thing on my typewriter at 11 p.m. while I fell asleep.'

The twenty-third. 'I woke up, still in my dressing gown, and went to call Erna at 6 a.m. for another telephoning to Stuart Comis. First to learn if Rajagopal was in agreement with the changes he had demanded yesterday and which Erna typed last night. Because of the eight-hour difference in time, it was last night in California when we rang this morning, and Comis was to have heard if Rajagopal still agreed after he had seen, in writing, what he had demanded. Predictably, he wanted more changes. And so Erna again typed it. Finally, Krishnaji, I, and Tilly all signed this. And Tilly returned to Holland. Friedrich arrived from Buchillon. Mary Cadogan came down. Keith Critchlow came with more detailed plans and samples of building materials we might use. It was a day of meetings. Mary Cadogan, Erna, Ray, Scott, and I discussed indexing plans while Krishnaji looked at the center plans. Then Scott, Erna, Mary Cadogan, and I discussed video jurisdiction matters. We all had tea and went for a walk around the lanes. Krishnaji, Erna, and I had supper on trays.'

S: One of the things that might be interesting to include in this record is Krishnaji's picking of the materials for the center. I had samples of every single handmade red brick and every handmade gray brick available in England because the center was going to use both. Also every handmade roof tile. So that Krishnaji could pick the ones that he liked. And that's what that meeting with Critchlow was.

M: Mm, hm. That's what he was doing.

S: That's what he was doing. But, of course, [chuckles] there is a story about the red bricks. Do you want to hear that little story?

M: Yes, tell me.

S: Well, when the chosen red bricks finally came six months later, when we were building, they didn't look like I remembered them because they didn't have the mauve-ish tinge that was so distinctive. So I told the builder that they didn't look like the red brick that Krishnaji had picked. He checked the name, and it was right, but he passed on my complaint to the brick maker.

M: I know about red bricks because I went through that with Sam to build our house in Malibu.

S: Right. Bricks can be very different. So the brick maker said, "Oh yes, I know exactly what you mean. Those mauve-ish results only happen on the edge of the firing, and there's only certain bricks that come out like that. Those are freak bricks, and unfortunately we sent one of those to you as a sample." So we asked if there was anything he could do about this, because that was what was picked by Krishnaji, who by then had died. So it was either Critchlow or the builder who worked with the brick maker to change the way the bricks were fired so we could get bricks like the one Krishnaji picked.

M: I remember this now as you're telling me. That's marvelous. [Chuckles.]

S: Yes. But that was Krishnaji, just [laughs] guaranteed to pick the one that was—

M: Rare.

S: That was the rare, right. [Both chuckle.]

M: Oh, goodness.

October the twenty-fourth. 'In the early morning Krishnaji checked my breathing exercises. Erna left by taxi for Heathrow and Ojai. Krishnaji stayed in bed while I and Scott packed his luggage. He had lunch on a tray in bed and got up only in time to leave for Heathrow at 4:30 p.m. To me he said, "I'll be back." I had asked him, as he didn't want me to go to India, "Will I ever see you again?" And it was to this he replied, "Yes. I'll be back." I drove him in the Mercedes with Dorothy and Scott. Friedrich, who is accompanying him to Delhi, went in his car with Stephen. We were silent in the car, which seemed to move smoothly because it was carrying him, its raison d'être. Life was full because he was there. There is only that intact, in control, and the road to navigate safely. A dull brightness came from the west, slanting between the clouds. Some seagulls so far from the sea were over the chestnut-colored plowed fields, and I felt as if they were flying through me. Rita met us at the Lufthansa counter. There was some fuss, which I hardly saw because I was with Krishnaji, which apparently was brought on by Friedrich's insistence on carrying on board all of his luggage, two huge backpacks. Rita later told me he had wanted to carry on his luggage because he thought he would be left to find it at the Delhi airport and not be able to go in the car with Krishnaji. I had told him how everything is taken care of there, but he evidently didn't believe it. Krishnaji didn't want any book at the airport. He had some with him. I went as far as I could with him, and with a look back, he disappeared into immigration. The whole meaning of life is in that small, elegant figure in his overcoat, shoulder bag, moving on his route, beautiful and extraordinary beyond any describing and more dear than any human being. Rita escorted him and Friedrich onboard, and they flew on Lufthansa number 037 to Frankfurt. At 7 p.m. she had arranged for an electric cart to take them to the continuing fight, Lufthansa 604, leaving Frankfurt at 9:20 p.m. for Delhi, where they are due to land in the morning at 10 a.m. This flight has a single seat, the one Krishnaji likes on the right side forward. It is a nonstop flight. One tries to arrange all these things in this day of terrorists and all perils. Scott went with Stephen, and I drove Dorothy through the dark roads back to Brockwood. I will be here until November third, when I go to Bonn to see my brother and Lisa.' That's the end of my large diary.

S: There's two things I would add to this account from my notes, if I may.

M: Yes, please do; you are part of what we're talking about.

S: Well, one of the things that Krishnaji had been saying to me, because he felt that the Oak Grove School was still in a mess, he wanted me to come and spend time in Ojai as a kind of consultant. Now, this was my first year of being principal of Brockwood. I was starting the first Krishnamurti Study Center and finding the money for that [chuckles], and he wanted me to go to India, and then I was supposed to add Ojai? [Laughs.] But Erna and I always locked horns because of the video, and she was always insistent that I didn't look toward any Americans for all the money that was needed for the various projects. On this trip of hers to Brockwood I can remember we were sitting in Krishnaji's bedroom, and obviously Krishnaji had been giving her a hard time because she also asked me would I please come look at the school and the whole situation and suggest what I thought should be done. This was clearly, to me, her going along with Krishnaji. [Chuckles.] I had said that I couldn't make any promises, but if the opportunity arises, etcetera, etcetera. When I did, in fact, come to Ojai with Krishnaji after India, even though he was ill, he wanted me to go spend time in the school. This was before he went into the hospital. I spent time at the Oak Grove School and talked with teachers and talked with parents and talked with everybody. And I made the report back to Erna and Theo at the foot of Krishnaji's bed. You were there, too. I said, "As far as I can see, the greatest problem that the school has is you, Erna. It's really because everyone sees you as the person who's in charge, so they don't treat David Moody and they didn't treat Mark Lee as the person who was really in charge because they didn't see those people as being in real charge. They see you as being in charge. You make the financial decisions, and you're not an educator."

M: Yes. Yes.

S: And this undermines the authority of whoever is running the school, and it also undermines the educative nature of the school because it's run like a business. I went into all this in some detail as this was really the sum of what everybody was saying. And there had been so many years of unhappiness with the school administration.

M: Yes.

S: People really didn't see the school being run by and for educators.

M: Yes. Yes. That makes a tremendous difference.

S: A tremendous difference. The other thing that I would mention is that, on this drive to the airport, you just mentioned when you were driving the Mercedes. Of course, it's a right-hand-drive car.

M: Yes. Yes.

S: Dorothy was sitting up in the front with you, and Krishnaji and I were sitting in the back.

M: Yes.

S: Krishnaji was sitting behind you on the right-hand side. In my notes I have that as we approached the airport, Krishnaji reached over with his gloved hand and held my hand [M chuckles] as though, I felt, he was trying to put something into me, you know, do something. Somehow it wasn't working with the glove, so he took off the glove and then held my hand.

M: Yes. [Chuckles.]

S: And it was…well, it was inexplicably dear.

M: Yes.

S: And loving and, um…I wish I could…, yes.

M: He communicated through his hands very much.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: Healing with hands. And he would often emphasize to somebody something he was telling them by putting one of his hands on their arm or shoulder or something. As though the current of communication was also physical.

S: Yes. Yes. Yes. Yes. Absolutely, and I—

M: He may have been explaining something ordinary, but it, um…

S: There's a communication that's somatic.

M: Yes.

S: And I can, [chuckles] I can remember vividly on several occasions driving him. You would be in the front seat, and he would be in the back seat, and if I would go too fast, there would just be a finger that would touch my shoulder. [Both chuckle.] That's all, just a finger, [laughs] which communicated volumes about how I was driving.

M: It's true. Yes.

S: Also, sometimes also after the talks at Brockwood, when he would come back to that little quiet space behind the stage, he would sometimes stand there with his hand on my shoulder and there was communication—I don't know what it was. I never talked with him about it, but he communicated somatically with this. Through the body, kinesthetically. I don't know anything about all this. [Chuckles.]

M: Well, until Krishnaji gets back, my diary entries are very brief. October twenty-fifth: 'Krishnaji is due to have landed in Delhi at 10 a.m.'

We should really skip over most of the next couple of months and really only talk about things that pertain to Krishnaji or the work.

S: That's fine.

M: On October twenty-sixth, 'Erna phoned me to tell me that Rajagopal has reneged on the settlement and wants "philosophic" changes in the agreement. Erna is to see Cohen on Monday.'

On the twenty-ninth, 'Erna rang again after her meeting with Cohen, who says that Rajagopal wants us to defend him against any questions the attorney general might raise against him,' [chuckles] 'which Cohen says is impossible. I gave my first letter to Krishnaji to Jean François, who is flying to Benares tomorrow.'

On November second, 'Krishnaji should be flying from Delhi to Benares.'

The next day. 'I flew to Bonn to see my brother and his wife for a week, and to have Dr. Scheef look again at my bad leg. Dr. Scheef also gave medicine for Krishnaji's hand tremors.'

On November eleventh, 'At 6:30 a.m. Bud trundled my two bags on a little trolley down to the train station. At 7 a.m., on the Lufthansa Airport Express, I left Bonn. I was served breakfast and reached Frankfurt airport at 8:40 a.m. Took the 10:40 a.m. Lufthansa nonstop to Los Angeles business class. Arrived at 1:30 p.m. Alan Kishbaugh met me and drove me through Malibu to Ojai. One-and-a-half inches of rain had fallen. The Moodys brought me supper.'

November thirteenth. 'There is now a library of Krishnaji's books at Arya Vihara, and Vivian Moody showed me how it was set up, and I took charge of it from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m.'

On the seventeenth, 'I telephoned Dr. Lichti about the medicine for Krishnaji suggested by Dr. Scheef.'

Oh, then I seem to be taking computer lessons from the computer teacher at the Oak Grove School.

November twentieth. ‘Rajagopal telephoned Erna about his anxiety that the attorney general might accuse him.’ [Both chuckle.] And it looks like I’m working at the Arya Vihara library every day from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m.

November twenty-third, ‘The first letter from Krishnaji arrived, written October twenty-eighth to November eleventh in Delhi, Benares, and another letter from Dr. Parchure reassuring me about Krishnaji’s health. Earlier, I spoke to Scott at Brockwood.’

On the twenty-fifth, Krishnaji went back to Delhi. One has to fly to Delhi to get from Benares to Madras.

November twenty-seventh. ‘The Moodys left for Brockwood and India. Krishnaji arrived in Madras.’

Two days later. ‘Erna received $25,000 from K&R Foundation for KFA with a letter from Rajagopal, a copy of which he wants sent to Krishnaji.’ That was an unusual event. [Chuckles.]

December first. ‘Scott rang me from Brockwood about Bill Taylor staying in Ojai.’ Presumably that was to aid with arrangements for Bill.

December third. ‘The first audiotaped letter one from Krishnaji arrived.’ This is where he was…

S: Sending you audiocassette recordings. Yes.

M: ‘He dictated it November three through ten. It was wonderful.’

And the next day, ‘Another tape arrived, number two, from Krishnaji dictated from November eleven to seventeen.’

December eighth. ‘I gave a tea party here for the Oak Grove School staff, the office staff, and the volunteers.’

And the next day. ‘I brought Bill Taylor, who arrived last night from Brockwood and is staying at Oak Grove School, over here to visit Pine Cottage and the office.’

December tenth. ‘There is a conference of all of Krishnaji’s schools in Rishi Valley, and representing Brockwood were Scott, Colin, Gary, Christina, Stephen, and Wendy; and they flew off to Madras today.’

SF Notes #1

I met Krishnaji on December twelfth in Rishi Valley. As soon as I arrived, I went to greet him. He was in his bed having lunch, with only Parameshwaran there. He was, as always, warm and friendly; concerned about how I and the others were, and curious about the details of our trip. He insisted that Parameshwaran get a tray for me, so I joined him for lunch that first day. He began right away telling me much of what had transpired since he arrived in India, but he gave me only a summary sketch. He was too tired to do more. It was his tiredness and weakness, frailty, and the fact that he had lost weight that most struck me. His hand when he shook mine had nothing of the strength it had had before, and it was thinner and unusually cold despite the warm air temperature. His health had suffered terribly since he left Brockwood a month and a half before, and I agonized at seeing him. He ate slowly and without relish, eating only for his well-being.

He told me that all the time he was in Delhi—which I believe was for about five days—he couldn't eat and he couldn't sleep. He didn't want to go to Pupul's, but he felt he had committed himself. In fact, before he left for India he said, "I don't know if I will be able to stand it there," and he asked me if the sum of money he traveled with was enough for him to check into a hotel. He had some traveler's checks that were bought for him many, many years ago so that he would have some money in an emergency, as he often traveled alone. But he never spent it, and he didn't know if it was a sufficient sum for him to check into a good hotel should he have to. I assured him it was, but said also that Friedrich Grohe would be in Delhi and could take care of anything like that. The problem was the atmosphere that Pupul was generating, and he didn't know if he could stand being in that. As it was, he stayed there, but he didn't eat or sleep for five days.

When he got to Benares, which is where he went after Delhi, he was in such a weakened condition that, on at least two occasions that he told me about, his legs couldn't hold him. On one occasion he had to crawl up the stairs to get to his room. Obviously help was offered, but he refused it. He felt that if he allowed himself to be carried, it would not encourage the body to get its strength back. At another time he just collapsed on the ground outside after a short walk, and he just had to sit there until his legs got some strength back. He still had the surprise of it in his voice when he told me about it.

By the time I saw him in Rishi Valley, he had already begun to have an occasional fever. It was not very high at that point, but it seemed to come and go, regardless of Dr. Parchure's efforts, and showed an unusual persistence.

He was extremely upset by all the conflict with the Indian Foundation. For months before he left for India, he talked frequently about it. He had a marvelous capacity for not thinking about a place when he wasn't at that place and being fully occupied with the place where he was. He would come to Brockwood, for instance, and he would give his full attention to Brockwood; being absolutely full of the place, with its problems, its projects—even noticing very small changes in the gardens, etcetera. He would then go off and be somewhere else and not think about Brockwood at all. It was a really wonderful capacity to be completely where he was and to give it his full attention. But ever since he arrived at Brockwood from Ojai the previous May, he had the Indian difficulties on his mind.

During that first meeting in Krishnaji's bedroom, with Krishnaji obviously ill and weak, he began summarizing the events since his arrival in India. He reported things with a conciseness, completeness, and lucidity that I am sure he often wished I had when he asked me to report on things. Most of what he told me about was really not any of my business, but for some reason he felt the inclination to inform me of everything, and I interrupted only to ask questions and clarify certain matters.

He was obviously avoiding being completely frank to Pupul, as that was only going to cause a conflict, which he always tried to avoid, but he had said hundreds of things to her which—had she been sensitive—she would have picked up and probably been quite devastated by. But she wasn't, and so the need to be more conflict-oriented to make himself heard remained. He was setting the meeting with the trustees in India as the date when he would finally have to say some things. Basically, he wanted all the copyright and the editing of his books to be done in England, and he wanted not only to withdraw from the Krishnamurti Foundation of India but also even to withdraw his name. Krishnaji was weak, ill, alone, and having to struggle with some very powerful, entrenched, personal interests. I listened, barely eating, and felt a remorse beyond words at the injustice of the situation. Krishnaji had no self-pity or depression in his voice. He was just bravely, steadily meeting it with the meager resources he had left.

One of the things that Krishnaji was very upset about was all that happened to Sathaye and that resulted in Sathaye having to leave as principal of the Rajghat school. He felt that Sathaye had not been able to handle a very difficult circumstance, but it was clear that Sathaye was up against some very difficult obstacles in the form of Pupul, who never wanted him to be the head of Rajghat, and Hiralal, who Pupul had installed at Rajghat and who had done a great deal to stir up trouble against Sathaye. Krishnaji said at one point that perhaps Sathaye had been ruined by coming to the West, which he had done the previous summer; yet the previous summer Krishnaji had been very enthusiastic about Sathaye's being at Brockwood and Saanen and seeing something of how things were there. But as a result of all this terrible business with Sathaye, Krishnaji had found someone else for the Rajghat school about whom he was very enthusiastic, and this is Dr. Krishna. Krishnaji told me, with what seemed to be some surprise on his part, what he had done and how he had really just seen Dr. Krishna (although he had met him on one or two previous occasions), and that he pretty much just asked him to run the school, right out of the blue.

He told me to come and see him often, every day, and to just come in. I had hoped that this would not cause difficulties or hard feelings with the people in India who were responsible for looking after him, and rightly keeping people from doing just what Krishnaji had asked me to do, which was just walk in. Eventually, in Madras, it did cause some trouble, but since it was something that I was doing at his request, it was not something they felt they could bring up with me, I suppose. He told me to come for a walk with him that day and every day, so after finishing our meal, I went to find the others from Brockwood and to find my room. That afternoon when we went for a walk, two or three other people from Brockwood or Ojai joined us as well as did several people from the Indian schools. I can't remember who they were. I believe it was David and Vivian Moody. Radhika and I always went on these walks, and Krishnaji asked me to invite on a rotational basis different people from Brockwood and Ojai to come on the walks so that everybody would have a chance. It was very nice: he would walk with one and then he would walk with another, and by the end of the walk he had walked a bit with everyone.

The walk that we went on was almost the same every time. He didn't walk every day, because he was sometimes too tired, but when he walked he usually began by greeting people at the bottom of his steps at the front of the old guest house. These were people, generally, who had come to do namaskaram and to have what they thought were the blessings of his look or returned greeting. He would then walk down the main drive past the assembly hall and out the front gates, down the road, turn left up the drive to the rural school, and walk past the rural school, turn left through the wheat fields—which had in wetter times been rice paddies—and walk past the large open well, go through the mango grove, and then past the banyan tree, which the school used as a setting for theater and which is reported to be one of the largest banyan trees in India and also to be one of the reasons why Krishnaji chose that site for the school, though that may be just a story. From there he would walk up to the farm buildings and left along the road past the laundry and back to the old guest house.

There were sometimes small variations on this so that Krishnaji could see different things, which he felt it important for him to see. On one occasion he went to see the dairy, and on another he went to see two locations for the study center he was asking to have built at Rishi Valley. But the variations on the walks were out of necessity and not really out of a joy and enthusiasm to see different parts of that beautiful place. In fact, there was very little joy and enthusiasm for the walks compared to the way I had always known him before about walking. It was really a kind of medicine, something he was doing because he knew it was good for him, not because he was taking joy in it.

At one point along one of the walks, I noticed while walking behind him that he was leaning slightly to one side. He always walked so bolt upright and with such a straight back, and I was worried about him because this meant that his balance was off and that he could fall and hurt himself. When I told him he was leaning to his left (and it wasn't by very much), he corrected it and asked me to keep an eye on it and tell him. This I kept doing and noticed that it was a consequence of his exhaustion. It would get worse as his tiredness got worse and would disappear when he was under less strain and more rested. But from then on, through the rest of my trip in India and during all the walks, I would occasionally drop back and walk behind him to check on the straightness of his back, and I would make a small sign to him when he wasn't quite straight.

The educational conference was scheduled to begin soon after our arrival. This was the first conference for all the Krishnamurti schools, and there was a sense of it being something very special and of our beginning a new unity and working together. After discussing the agenda of the meetings and the topics with some of the people from Rishi Valley, Oak Grove, and Brockwood, it was decided that we would begin with the different schools, discussing "What is a Krishnamurti school?" Krishnaji was not scheduled to come to this conference, as it was recognized that he was really ill, and it was felt that he should be resting up and trying to recover before the strain of the Madras talks and the trustees' meetings there.

On one of the walks—I believe it was the day before the conference—Krishnaji, Narayan, and I (and someone else, but I don't remember who) were talking about the opening topic (What is a Krishnamurti school?), and Krishnaji was wondering whether he should be there, because he obviously wanted somewhat to hear. Narayan and the other person were very reluctant and hesitant to have Krishnaji present while we were all expounding on what a Krishnamurti school was, and suggested that if Krishnaji did come it should be at the end and he should talk instead of just listening. I was actually very much in favor of our expressing openly in front of him what we thought a Krishnamurti school was, as we had no hesitation in doing so when he wasn't present, and that we should be willing to have what we say examined by the only man who knew if what we were saying actually made any sense. Krishnaji was amused by this and felt it was quite right, and I think he was rather looking forward to us all making idiots of ourselves. He left it open whether he would come or not, but he did definitely say he didn't want to come and give a talk.

The next day he thought that he was well enough to come and listen at the conference, and so he came and sat on the side and listened to what seemed to me to be a very boring series of discourses. Luckily, toward the end, he decided to put us out of our misery and asked if, as a member of the audience, he could ask some questions. As usual, it was lovely, searching, and poignant. He wanted to know why the schools had not brought about a different human being. I believe it was during this discussion that Krishnaji asked, if one took the name "Krishnamurti" out of the school, how would it be different from other schools?

On the third and fourth days of the conference, Krishnaji again participated, which, of course, made all the difference. He asked about the nature of mind and brain and what the schools were developing. He talked about flowering in goodness. It was painfully obvious that none of us were living up to the task.

All through the time at Rishi Valley, Krishnaji was extremely cold. It was colder than on any of my previous visits to Rishi Valley, but Krishnaji simply could not get warm and often had blankets on top of blankets, and he really suffered miserably from it. Toward the end of his stay at Rishi Valley, he was very much looking forward to the period in Madras, just so he could get warm. I kept wishing they could do something to heat up the room or have a good electric blanket.

The people at Rishi Valley were very conscious of his frailty, and all the students and staff were very gentle and cautious with him. There was a sense of foreboding in the air. People were not openly speaking about it—at least to me—but there were lots of broad hints that they did not expect Krishnaji to ever come back to Rishi Valley. Krishnaji must have been preparing the people for this, because gradually it became accepted that he would probably not come back to India.

Radhika was playing hostess to everyone, running this conference, and trying to take care of Krishnaji, as well as meet her continuing responsibilities in the school. I remarked several times to myself that she did this very well and was handling a very, very difficult situation as well as it could be done.

In Rishi Valley, there was a bird with which Krishnaji formed a most peculiar relationship. It was a hoopoe bird, a rather funny-looking woodpecker-like bird with a short tail, a very long beak, and an exaggerated crest. When I first came into his bedroom, the bird was on his windowsill looking in through the window and pecking at the glass. Krishnaji's windows were the only ones I know of in Rishi Valley that had anything like a screen or glass in them. Krishnaji was saying to the bird, "All right, all right, we will talk later." He told me he would talk with the bird and that one time the bird had managed to get in. He had told the bird he didn't mind sharing the room with him, but that once he (Krishnaji) had left, the room would be shut up and he wouldn't like being in there at all. The hoopoe bird would stick his beak in the screen and try to pry it off. It was really most peculiar to see this bird working so hard to get in, and yet Krishnaji never fed it and it had no motives in our common understanding of birds for wanting to be in there. But Krishnaji said that they were friends, and that he would talk with it and that it liked the sound of his voice.

To my knowledge, Krishnaji hadn't been eating in his private dining room in the old guest house the way he always had before when I was in Rishi Valley, and which served as a way for him to meet people and speak with them less formally than in an interview. He certainly never did that when I was there this year. He took all his meals in his bed. Occasionally he would ask someone to join him, and they would have a tray of food at the foot of his bed.

On several occasions he would say to me when I was eating with him, "This is the same food everyone else is getting, isn't it?" as he didn't want to have better food than other people were getting. I would always agree with him, although it was only partly true, because it was nothing that could be changed, and I didn't want Krishnaji to have less than he was having. The fact is that Parameshwaran cooked personally for Krishnaji and couldn't do much more than just direct the cooking for the rest of us, and although we were having the same menu (and the food for all of us was excellent), the difference in the actual dishes was enormous. The food Krishnaji received from Parameshwaran was absolutely extraordinary, and he would always have a few little extra things as well that Parameshwaran would prepare for his health. This is only worth mentioning to indicate how keen Krishnaji was to not have more than the other guests who had come to Rishi Valley. Krishnaji was well aware of how difficult Western visitors often found India, and he was very concerned with their comfort and their well-being. It was really very touching.

As usual, when Krishnaji was at Rishi Valley, there was a performance of classical Indian dance by the students, at which he was the guest of honor. Also as usual, he would refuse any chair and would insist on sitting on the ground with the younger students. Knowing that he would do this, people would put a blanket on the ground for him to sit on, and, as usual, Krishnaji wouldn't sit on it but would sit just off the edge and encourage students to sit all around him, so that it was students who would be sitting on the blanket and Krishnaji who would be sitting on the hard ground. This year, for the first year in my experience, the performance was not under the banyan tree but in the assembly hall. Krishnaji said he would not stay all the way through it, as it was too late, too cold, and he was too weak, but he did sit through it.

There was also a performance of students doing some of the classical chants that Krishnaji liked so much. The venue was to be the assembly hall, but it was changed to the small open meeting hall (upstairs in the old guest room) between Krishnaji's bedroom and the dining room. It was absolutely packed with students, staff, and visitors, and the chanting was led by Vikram, Dr. Parchure's son, who had been working with the boys on their chants. As always, Krishnaji joined in when and as he could, and when they had exhausted their repertoire, he asked for chants that he remembered and that only some of them knew. Eventually, there were chants that only he and Narayan and Vikram knew. It was an occasion that Krishnaji enjoyed and it was lovely seeing him have a good time.

Krishnaji was encouraging Rishi Valley to build a study center, and they had received a donation to do so from Friedrich the year before, but there was a great deal of discussion about what a study center was for. Krishnaji would talk to me about the Brockwood Center, and then he would talk about the way it was being considered at Rishi Valley and at Rajghat (there was to be one there as well), and what he was saying to people about it and what they were saying to him about it, and what they thought it should be. At one point, he asked me to have a talk with Radhika and Mahesh in his presence (Friedrich was also there) about the center at Brockwood and the idea of a study center in general. He prompted me before the discussion, and then during the discussion he used me as a foil and played a little bit of devil's advocate. He had done this at another time but never so openly. He wanted the discussion taped, which it was.

The general idea in India was that they would build something that could be used for a variety of things but that essentially was useful for the school, for school activities: for putting up parents, for having seminars, but that could also simultaneously or at other times be a place for people to come and study Krishnaji's teachings. The Study Center at Brockwood was to be used for nothing but studying the teachings, and was for no one other than those who came to study the teachings, which is what Krishnaji had always been saying to me about it and which he was saying to me even then. After this discussion, when I was quite strong about the unique nature and function of the Study Center (and the confidence I have in this had obviously come from long discussions with Krishnaji about it), I heard Krishnaji on several occasions say to people, "Listen to this tape. Listen to how strong Scott is about this."

There was an Indian architect from Canada at Rishi Valley who was being asked to give some ideas for the overall design. Krishnaji asked me to talk with him about what we were doing at Brockwood and about the kind of things that Krishnaji had asked for at Brockwood.

Soon after my arrival in Rishi Valley, Krishnaji began asking me if I would accompany him to California. It wasn't certain at first whether he would give the talks in Bombay, but they were certainly being questioned in his mind. It was clear, and he talked with me about it openly toward the end of our stay at Rishi Valley, that he would never return to India. By the time we left Rishi Valley, which I believe was on December twenty-first, Krishnaji had decided that he was going to skip the Bombay talks, and that he wanted to fly directly to California without stopping in England as soon as the trustees' meetings were over and he could leave.

He asked me if I was able to change his and Dr. Parchure's tickets and get a ticket for myself so that we could fly across the Pacific. He obviously felt an urgency in getting to California and he must have had some sense of just how precarious his situation was. I could see how ill, frail, and weak he was, but through a combination of ignorance, insensitivity, and wishful thinking, I did not suspect that he had such a short time to live.

Several days before leaving Rishi Valley, he asked me if I would find out as soon as I got to Madras what flights there were across the Pacific that didn't stop over anywhere, and if I would get the required tickets. He was obviously saying this to me with some secrecy and not going through the normal channel, which was to have Pama make his travel arrangements. He didn't want people in India to know his intentions until it was a fait accompli. Presumably they would have tried to dissuade him, which, in fact, they did.

The thirteenth. 'Rajagopal rang Erna and said he would like to talk to her and me.'

December seventeenth. 'There was a letter from Krishnaji written in Rishi Valley.'

The twentieth. 'I sent Krishnaji an air ticket for Mrs. Parchure to go to Brockwood.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji was scheduled to go from Rishi Valley to Madras.'

Pama and Sunanda were not going to be ready for all of the visitors staying at Vasanta Vihar immediately after Krishnaji's arrival, so everyone was politely invited to tour different parts of India for a few days after Krishnaji's departure from Rishi Valley and before they were expected at Vasanta Vihar. An exception was made for me, presumably at Krishnaji's request, as that had not originally been anticipated.

Very early in the morning, at around 5:00, we set off in two cars for Madras. In one car were Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and—I believe—Narayan. In the second car were Parameshwaran, Lakshman Rasiah (who was not staying at Vasanta Vihar), and myself. As usual, a group of people assembled to see Krishnaji off. It was half-light when they started arriving, and while this has never been a happy event, it seemed on this occasion to be unusually glum. Most people knew—I think—or perhaps they only suspected, that he would never return. I knew from what he had said that this was true, and as we drove down the road past those huge boulders and those bare, rounded granite hills that he talked about so often and that he seemed to love, it was moving to think that he was probably saying to himself that he was seeing them for the last time. Halfway to Madras we stopped beside the road next to a crop of ripe sugar cane and had our breakfast all together. Parameshwaran had prepared a marvelous picnic basket of idlies and half a dozen different other things.

Krishnaji immediately went to bed after arriving at Vasanta Vihar. He still had a fever and he was tired after the long drive, which is about five hours long. Krishnaji had asked me to find out as soon as possible about flights to Ojai, and I had wanted to do that immediately upon my arrival in Madras. However, Krishnaji had also told Pama to help me get some shirt and trouser material and I found myself on that first day shopping with Pama, who was kind enough to offer to help. This did mean, however, that I couldn't very well be looking for plane tickets, and I was somewhat anxious to get started on that during the next day. This was very difficult because I didn't want to be clandestine in what I was doing, and yet I couldn't very well be open, either, as Krishnaji didn't want his intentions to be known until they were set.

Krishnaji was extremely upset at the way he found Vasanta Vihar. He felt that there was something very wrong with the atmosphere. About two weeks later, he was to say emphatically some quite terrible things about Vasanta Vihar and about Sunanda's and Pama's influence on the place.

When I got to Vasanta Vihar, Pama told me that the Foundation would like to pay for some clothes for me, which they had done years before when I had collected all the money for their video equipment, brought it over, set it up, and trained people how to use it. At the time I had thought, well, all right, fair enough, I've done a good piece of work for them and if they wish to repay me in this way, then all right, I accept it. But I did not want them to pay for any clothes for me on this trip. I didn't feel it was right and obviously they were only offering this because Krishnaji had told them that they had to. Anyway, I refused, and I went up and told Krishnaji that it really was not right. But Krishnaji insisted that I take it. I didn't want to and felt that it was establishing a wrong relationship; they would only resent it afterward, even if they were going along with it now. I also felt that the money that was being raised for his work should not be spent on clothing for me. But Krishnaji insisted more strongly than I could that I take it. It had something to do with what Krishnaji was doing with Pama; he was trying to show them something, or I don't know what it was, but it was clear that he was going to insist—he did insist. So, finally I accepted, and Pama—although it never sat very well with him—did it as graciously as he could.

Whenever I went out shopping for material, Krishnaji wanted to see what I had bought. He had the most marvelous eye and memory for material of anyone I have ever known. He would always feel it and he could tell immediately the quality of it. When I got back that afternoon, he wanted to see my purchases and he asked me about the flights. I had to respond that I couldn't do anything that day about the flights and would have to wait.

December twenty-third. 'The Moodys telephoned me from Bangalore. Krishnaji will decide after the first Madras talk on the twenty-eighth whether to cancel the rest of India and return here with them and Parchure on the tenth of January. They will telephone again Sunday morning. I am to keep this information secret meanwhile, except from Erna and Theo. Erna brought me the third and fourth audiocassette letters from Krishnaji in Rajghat and Rishi Valley.' Well, she picked up the mail, I guess. 'I listened to them most of the day.'

The next morning I found out when the flights were, and I did manage to get three first-class reservations. There were only three a week from Madras considered direct, and these changed planes at Singapore, stopped in Tokyo, and then went on to Los Angeles. I came back to report to Krishnaji what the possible dates were, and he selected the seventeenth of January as the day he wanted to go. I tried to persuade Krishnaji to stop along the way someplace, just a couple of nights someplace warm. I thought it would be easier for him, but he didn't want to stop anywhere. That afternoon, I returned to get all the tickets and finalize the arrangements. Krishnaji had given me his ticket and had told Dr. Parchure to give me his ticket. Luckily, I had an American Express card and I could pay the difference required for their two tickets and purchase myself one. When we were in Rishi Valley, Krishnaji had also invited the Moodys to travel with him, and there was some concern over whether they could alter their flight arrangements.

Krishnaji had begun saying to me, "Sir, can you get me out of India?" and "Can you get me to Ojai?" I always responded positively, but he asked me on enough occasions and with enough concern to show that he was quite worried about being able to leave.

When people found out that Krishnaji had made arrangements through me to leave, they were furious with me, but there was not very much they could do about me directly. (Krishnaji had, previous to our arrival, lambasted them about their treatment of foreigners and, I think, about me in particular, as I was now being treated with a consideration that was really very new and very different to what I had known previously.) Pupul tried to persuade Krishnaji to stay and give at least one talk in Bombay, and then leave early from there if he still wanted to at that time. Pupul also tried to convince me that it was a terrible way to get to California, that she knew all these people who traveled all the time and that going across the Pacific was the worst way of getting to California, and that the flight was much longer (which, of course, it wasn't), etcetera, etcetera.

Krishnaji was scheduled to give talks on the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth of December, to have question-and-answer meetings on the thirty-first of that month and on the second of January, and to give the last two talks on the fourth and fifth of January. Two days after that there were scheduled to be—I believe—six days of meetings with the Indian trustees. Not long after arriving in Madras, this speaking schedule began to be questioned. A doctor was called, who was supposed to be a marvelous doctor, to examine Krishnaji and determine whether Krishnaji could speak. Krishnaji didn't want to say anything to people, but he didn't like this doctor at all and didn't want him touching him. Krishnaji was always extremely sensitive, and the doctor's contact with him left him shaking for quite some time. The doctor did, however, say that Krishnaji must have at least two days of rest between talks and that the day before a talk he must be absolutely quiet and conserve all his energy. Krishnaji felt that since the advertising had gone out for him to speak, he was obliged to do so. So it was decided that he would start off giving the first talk and would see how he felt, and that if the schedule was to change it could be announced at the talk.

Almost every day, as we waited for the day of the first talk, I would meet Krishnaji very early in the morning. I had the room that was closest to his quarters, and separated only by a veranda that was on top of the portico of the front door. I would watch the sun rise in the most extraordinary colors, with the coconut and tamarind trees in the distance and all the trees a dull, smoky blue, and Krishnaji would appear and come out to join me. There were hoopoe birds, like the one in Rishi Valley, parrots, small owls, others birds of marvelous color, and, of course, crows. There was a very small pond out on the front lawn just below, with water lilies that opened up in the morning, absolutely lovely. It was a marvelous time of the day, and I found myself looking forward to getting up and meeting Krishnaji and looking at the new day with him. On the occasions that he didn't appear, I would go looking for him, as I knew that if he wasn't up it was because he wasn't feeling well.

My access to Krishnaji was a bit troublesome to some people in the Foundation. Krishnaji had asked me to come and see him often, even when other people were there, and if he was busy talking with them about something personal, he would ask me to leave, which he did on a couple of occasions. It is understandable that this was difficult for people who previously had been the only ones in India to have this privilege and who had been responsible for determining who else would see Krishnaji and when.

Usually during the morning, people would come to see Krishnaji in his bedroom. At lunch Nandini would eat with him in his bedroom. After lunch he would take a nap and then he would again see people until his walk in the late afternoon.

Sometimes more than one car would be taken for the walks, but Krishnaji asked me to come with him in the car that took him to the beach where the walks occurred. We would drive through the Theosophical Society grounds to Radha Burnier's house. Her house is on the beach, almost exactly opposite the place where Krishnaji is purported to have been found as a boy. Nandini, too, was almost always in the same car. There was room for one or, with a squeeze, two others, and they varied from day to day. As we came around the side of the house from the back where the cars were parked, past the flowering trees, Krishnaji would greet the people on the veranda who were waiting there either just to greet him or else to come on the walk. As tired as he was, Krishnaji often found the time and the energy to go into the house for a few minutes and put his hands on the eyes of Radha's niece, who teaches at the Bangalore school and who was losing her sight. She said that her sight had improved. I don't know whether it was an improvement that lasted.

As the Madras talks were scheduled at the same time as the Theosophical convention, there were thousands of Theosophists on and around the Theosophical grounds. Many of them would wait on the beach for Krishnaji just in order to greet him and say namaskaram or perhaps shake his hand. Usually we went out to the small tarmac path on the beach and turned right, walking down as far as the edge of the fishermen's village, and then turned around and walked the other way north out onto the broken bridge over the Adyar River. The sun was usually setting and the extraordinary colors, the smell of the sea air, and the sound of the waves produced quite a lovely effect.

On one walk along the beach, Krishnaji and Radha were talking and Radha made a remark about the modern Indian having no sensitivity at all toward nature, and Krishnaji said yes. Radha went on to say that that indicated a civilization in decay, and Krishnaji said yes, absolutely. At one point I went to Mahabalipuram, a lovely place along the beach, where there are extraordinary carvings in the granite around the temples there made in the sixth or seventh century that showed such affection and love of nature. Thirteen or fourteen centuries later, they were still extraordinary and moving and unusual. Something had indeed been lost in the ensuing time.

There was an old man from Argentina who was a Theosophist and who would do namaskaram to Krishnaji every time he would see him on a walk. On one such walk he stopped Krishnaji and said in faltering English that he had heard Krishnaji speaking in Argentina. Krishnaji responded to him by saying, "Oh, poor chap," which the man didn't understand, but he was delighted to have had a word from Krishnaji. I said, "Krishnaji, really, how can you say that kind of thing to someone?" and Krishnaji said, "Well, I don't think he understood it, so it was all right." Then Krishnaji said, "Do you think he did understand?" but it was fairly clear that the man hadn't. It was really quite humorous, but Krishnaji then said that perhaps he shouldn't joke.

Several times when the wind was strong and while walking on this broken bridge, which in effect formed a jetty out over the river, Krishnaji held onto my shoulder as we walked. After one such occasion, he told me that sometime before, when the wind had been particularly strong, he had had to crawl back on his hands and knees. He said that he was afraid that if he fell he'd hurt his watch.

The walk then concluded by returning to Radha's house and the waiting cars. On one of these walks the sun was setting as the full moon, immense and silver, came out of the sea. It was quite breathtaking and quite special.

Krishnaji insisted that I get a lot of shirts and trousers made, and so I was frequently out shopping, and Krishnaji always wanted to see what I had bought. Often he would say to me with the most hesitant, boyish expression something like, did I think I could get some more of this or that, and off I would go to get enough for another shirt or another pair of trousers.

I had a small radio, which Mary had lent me, and on which I could hear the BBC World Service. Since Krishnaji regularly asked me what the news was, I was able to tell him, thanks to this. I would also get Time and Newsweek magazines, which Krishnaji would read through quickly.

Sometime—I believe it was before this first talk—Krishnaji said to me that he didn't want to have so many trustees' talks, that he wanted to resign from the Foundation, and that he wanted to settle the publication and copyright business once and for all, and then leave. He suggested that we leave on the twelfth of January, which was the flight closest to the seventeenth but prior to it and direct to Los Angeles.

Krishnaji had obviously mentioned this to people, and as I was on my way out to arrange this, Sunanda came to me, pulled me aside, and wanted to talk, saying that perhaps I should wait until Pupul returned (she had left for several days to do her business). Obviously, there was a sense that Pupul would talk Krishnaji out of it, and that I shouldn't do anything because it would only be more difficult. I thought that this was quite a dirty trick that was being played on Krishnaji, because it was a kind of conspiracy not to listen to or give Krishnaji what he wanted, and because I was there and not playing this game, Krishnaji was getting what he wanted.

I went upstairs to put to Krishnaji, as objectively and neutrally as I could, that people wanted Pupul to return before his travel plans were changed. Pama was there when I spoke with him, and I tried to present it as an even and reasonable suggestion, but Krishnaji got angry and said, "What does Pupul have to do with this? I can make my own plans and I can leave on the twelfth." So, of course, everyone completely agreed that, if that's when Krishnaji wanted to leave, then that's when he could leave, and that it was really up to Krishnaji when he came and went. When Pupul returned, she was upset and I began to hear stories about my persuading Krishnaji to go and that his leaving was all my doing. Since then I have heard stories about my taking Krishnaji out of India against his will. But I can still hear Krishnaji asking me, "Can you get me out of here? Can you get me to Ojai?"

When Pupul learned that Krishnaji wanted to resign from the Indian Foundation, she said to him that if he didn't resign from the other Foundations as well, then she herself would resign. Krishnaji told me about this with a little laugh, saying that when she said this he didn't say a thing; he didn't discourage her from resigning, he didn't do a thing. She quickly withdrew the threat when she saw that Krishnaji was not going to buy it.

The twenty-seventh. 'I got a letter from Dr. Parchure about Krishnaji's health written on December eleventh.'

The next day. 'Jean François rang from Brockwood. He brought a letter to me from Scott, which he was told to read on the telephone to me. Krishnaji's weakness. Scott had spoken to Kathy on Christmas to tell me Bombay is canceled, and he, Scott, will accompany Krishnaji on the flight here via Singapore, but it is not yet decided which date. Krishnaji wants to give two Madras talks (today and tomorrow) and one question-answer and two days of KFI trustee meetings.' And then it says: 'Krishnaji gave his first Madras talk on this date.'

Editor's Note: These memoirs have only given links to talks or question-and-answer meetings that Mary remarked on being particularly good. We are making an exception here. In an audio-taped letter to Mary, Krishnaji said of this talk, "All day I was left alone, which was very nice. And there was a talk in the evening at five-thirty. An immense crowd; they said six thousand. The largest crowd they ever had here – that is their comment on it. Immense crowd; the lawn in front of the house was full and all around. My god, I've never seen such a crowd. I don't think they understood what I was talking about but I don't know… And there was full of energy and there was nothing, no feebleness, no sense of old age…New ideas and so on or new expressions." From this comment about the talk, it seemed right to break our tradition and present a link [1] to a talk not admired by Mary.

On the day of the first talk, the twenty-eighth of December, Krishnaji was still running a fever. He had fallen down a day or two before while getting up in the middle of the night, and he had hit his head against the wall. He said that he must not fall again. Parameshwaran slept on the small covered walkway very near Krishnaji's bed so that he could get up easily and help Krishnaji or be right there should Krishnaji need anything, but Krishnaji didn't like calling out. Therefore, a small buzzer (a button attached to a bell) was rigged up next to Krishnaji's bed so that Krishnaji would only have to press a little button to get Parameshwaran's attention. But Krishnaji didn't like to use this because he felt it was treating Parameshwaran too much like a servant, even though Parameshwaran was a servant to Krishnaji. Krishnaji never liked the way servants were generally treated in India, but Parameshwaran was beside himself because Krishnaji would struggle with things rather than ask for the help that Parameshwaran so much wanted to give. After that fall, Parameshwaran slept right at Krishnaji's door, which was a screen door, so that he would know when Krishnaji was stirring.

Krishnaji was weak from falling and from his fever, and it was decided that he would say after the first talk was over whether he felt he could speak the next day or whether the schedule should be changed, and his next talk be on Wednesday, the first of January. As I was sitting, waiting for the talk to begin and worrying, Narayan came up to me and said that he would accompany Krishnaji to the platform, but that Krishnaji wanted me to accompany him back to the house after the talk. My first thought was that this would not add to my popularity, but of course I would do it, although I couldn't see why he would have asked me.

As the talk was drawing to a close, I got up from my seat and moved to a place close enough to the stage so that I could get to him as soon as the talk was over and before the crowds swelled around him. The Indian crowds have always been terrible in their insistence on crowding around him and even touching him, despite all his admonishments and pleas not to do so. As Krishnaji was trying to get up from the platform, he was completely surrounded, with people touching his feet, and he became quite upset. He kept on repeating to everybody to stop it and to go home. He sat there for quite some time saying that he would not get up until people left, but this only delighted them as they were happy to stand there and look at him for hours. There was such a total insensitivity to him, and such a deliberate ignoring of what he wanted. It was only what they wanted that mattered to them. This dreadful scene was to be repeated after every talk. Eventually, he would get to where his sandals were and put them on and we would start walking back. But after this talk he was especially delicate, and he was angry and almost repelled by the crowds—not exactly fearful, but wanting desperately to be out of reach. I had never seen him like that, and I had never before seen the expression on his face that I saw then.

I would say, "Please clear the way," and we would just walk our way through. Krishnaji's hands had trembled so much that he had had, I think, a bit of trouble getting his dhoti on. It dragged a bit because he had just stepped on it, and he said, "Someone's holding me, someone's holding me," but it was pitch dark. One couldn't see because the crowds were all over him, which meant that the lighting that there was didn't get down to one's feet. There were lots of roots in the ground. He would occasionally trip over them, and he had to hold onto my shoulder walking behind me. I was walking ahead saying, "Please clear the way, please clear the way." It was a terrible struggle in the dark, with the tree roots, the relentlessly pressing crowds, and Krishnaji's dhoti, which had by now almost got to the point of unraveling. As we were walking around the perimeter of the crowd, Krishnaji suddenly, with his hand on my shoulder, directed me to turn right and to walk straight through the crowd and straight to the front door of Vasanta Vihar. He was thinking far more clear-headedly than I was, because obviously the crowd was forming itself around him wherever he was going so that it wasn't possible to walk around it. Parameshwaran and Narayan were also there in back of Krishnaji trying to keep people away, and Krishnaji was trying to tell them not to be rough or insensitive with people. He was later to tell me that I wasn't to say as repeatedly as I did, "Please clear the way," but only to say it once in a while. I think the Indian crowds are used to being pushed and shouted at and manhandled, and Krishnaji didn't want anything like that associated with him. From then on, I carried a flashlight so that I could shine it in front of Krishnaji's feet so that he could see the roots and where he was going.

After the talks last year, apparently he would sit down on the steps of Vasanta Vihar and people would crowd around him, so when we got to the steps this time, of course, there were people already in place. He said, "No, I can't sit this year, I can't sit this year." He didn't go for walks after the talks this year; he just went up and as usual washed from all these people touching him, and went to bed.

We made our way upstairs, with me walking behind him to catch him should he fall. Several people came up to discuss whether there should be a talk the next day. Krishnaji said that whatever it is that sometimes happens when he gives talks happened, and that he felt full of energy. Some people took this to mean that he could do another talk the next day. I pleaded that he not give another talk, and Dr. Parchure also suggested the same. Krishnaji finally decided that he wouldn't give another talk even though he was full of energy, and so it was announced to the waiting crowds that the program had been changed.

The days in between the talks were all pretty much the same, with Krishnaji needing to rest and wanting to rest, but feeling he could not say no to people who wanted to see him and other people not willing to say no on his behalf. Dozens of people wanted just to come into his room to say namaskaram, which is something like getting a blessing from Krishnaji and which everyone thought took nothing out of him since it only took a minute, and most people had a curious capacity not to really be very concerned with Krishnaji's well-being, but more concerned with what they could get from him—and he was so frequently telling people to be selfless and they would, by their actions, respond, "Yes, yes, tell me more, give me your blessing so I can get more, give me more." On one of the days before either the second or third talk—days when he was not supposed to see anybody and have complete rest—I counted twenty-three people who had come in to see him, and I hadn't been hanging around watching all day, so there could have been many more. That evening, when Krishnaji was having supper in his bedroom with Nandini, I came in and said to Nandini with some gentle chiding in my voice how wonderfully good Krishnaji had been that day, how he had been following the doctor's orders and not seeing anyone, how he had been looking after himself so well and resting up, etcetera. Krishnaji quickly caught onto my chiding him and started looking up to heaven with his large eyes and long eyelashes, exactly like a little boy trying to get away with something, and, in fact, his face looked so young and so boyish it was quite remarkable. At first Nandini didn't understand what I was saying because she knew that many people had come to see him, but when she looked over and saw Krishnaji playing the naughty boy and carrying on my joke, she laughed. He then continued by saying, yes, how good he had been. The situation really was hopeless. At one point I had suggested to Krishnaji that he simply close the door of his veranda so that people wouldn't disturb him, but he felt that it was not right to do that, and that it was not his role to refuse people for the sake of his own well-being, and that it would be impolite, or that some people might take it amiss. He actually practiced the selflessness that others so noisily and greedily tried to acquire. Eventually, on two occasions, someone thankfully did close his door for him, but it wasn't frequently enough for him to really rest.

More than a year before, I had asked Krishnaji to please measure out his life's energies carefully enough so that he would be around at least long enough to open the new study center we were going to build at Brockwood. I had had the sense from several things, including things that Krishnaji had said, that the length of his life would be determined by how much energy he used—that he could use himself up quickly or slowly. After all that Krishnaji had said about the center and after all that he had wished of the center, it seemed too large an undertaking to me and one that I didn't feel we could begin rightly without him. At that earlier time he had responded by saying certainly he'd be around. Now, I asked him again and pleaded with him to take care of himself so that he could begin this, and he responded by saying, "Old boy…" and shaking his head as though it was very uncertain indeed. He was combing his hair at the time, and I think it must have been just before going out for the daily walk. It was the first tangible support for the terrible sense of foreboding that existed.

At some point in between the first and last talk, Krishnaji decided to again move up the date of his departure, this time to the tenth, which really was the soonest that he could leave if he was going to talk to the Indian Foundation at all before he left. Again, he just asked me to do it, and without reference to anyone, I did what he asked. There were now no comments made directly to me. Asit, who was going to fly with us as far as Singapore, told me that since he was only going to be on part of the flight he would like to sit next to Krishnaji because I could sit next to him for the remainder of the journey. It seemed so typical; there was no sense that Krishnaji should choose who he wanted to sit next to. So before I booked the seats I asked Krishnaji if there was anyone he wanted to sit next to and suggested that perhaps he could sit next to Asit, as Asit would only be there for part of the flight. Krishnaji rejected that and just said to book us all together and we would decide later.

Throughout the time that he was in India, he had been making very strong criticisms of the entire Foundation. He only expressed confidence or trust in five members: Dr. Parchure, who was disdained by the powerful people in the Foundation; Upasani, who was wanting to retire from active participation in the Rajghat School; Radhika, whom he was afraid might be too much under the influence of her mother, Pupul; and Dr. Krishna and Mahesh, who were completely new to the organization and may not have had an understanding of the problems in the Foundation and a strong enough standing within the Foundation to do something about them. (He thought that Dr. Krishna and Mahesh might be able to help Radhika stand up to her mother. Dr. Krishna didn't think that she could.) When Krishnaji knew that he was going to die, he wanted those five people, and only those five people, from India to be there.

He was appalled and angry at how Vasanta Vihar had been misused and how the most powerful people in the Foundation after so many years had created the situation that existed. The constant squabbling about copyright he saw being entirely of India's making, and the ultimatum that Pupul had given him the summer before in Saanen that either India was to be given what it wanted by the English Foundation or that Krishnaji would have to step in and solve it, had quite determined him to solve it and to solve it for good. I wrote down a few of the things that he said to me about Vasanta Vihar because I was so disturbed by them, and I wanted to record it accurately so that I could think about it with more time.

The things that he said are as follows: “For the first time in my life, I feel this house is completely empty”; “I feel Brockwood is good and I feel Ojai is all right”; “I said to Sunanda that I have been here for a fortnight and there is still nothing in this place. You have killed it.” He also insisted several times that Vasanta Vihar is not theirs (the Indians’); it doesn’t belong to them. It was built by American and Australian money, and only a little bit of Indian, and it was built for his teachings and for him. It was not the Indians’, not for them to do what they wanted to do. He was surprised and disgusted that even his presence there for over two weeks did not bring something alive as it always had done in the past. “No, it has completely gone. For the first time I am glad to leave this place.” I can’t imagine a more biting indictment or a worse thing to have done than what he was saying had been done. He was referring to something sacred, to “the other.” People will and undoubtedly have dismissed these things that he said as being just exaggerations on his part or things that he was saying for effect, or worse, that he was being demented or duped or foolish. All through Krishnaji’s life there had been people who have taken the convenience of dismissing things that he said that they didn’t like as the utterances of a fallible, influenced, foolish man, and maintaining that the things that he said that they did agree with were the utterances of some sacred intelligence. As Krishnaji was saying now more and more that was unpalatable, I began hearing more and more of these kinds of noises. For years Krishnaji had been saying things gently and trying to slowly get people to understand. He now knew that he had no time left to go slowly. He also knew that people would try and dismiss what he said. It seems impossible that he could have imagined, to even a small degree, how adamantly and how frequently people would engage in this self-deception.

While these heartbreaking and often hostile events were unfolding and the talks were going on and people were coming in and out (the older associates often with a tragic sense of their having failed or ruined something, new associates or people he was just casually seeing with the sense that the most wonderful thing in their lives was occurring), Krishnaji would still occasionally look at shirt and trouser materials with me and talk with Kannon, the man who looked after Krishnaji’s tailoring and mine. This seemed to be the only real play and bit of fun that Krishnaji had. At one point, Pama had come to Krishnaji with samples of trouser material for Krishnaji to choose from. Later on Kannon and I went to the shop where these samples had come from and found them all to be mixtures of wool and polyester, of course much cheaper than all wool. Kannon was convinced that the Foundation just didn’t want to spend the money for pure wool for Krishnaji. He saw the materials that I had brought back that were all wool, and he couldn’t believe it and asked, “Where did you find them? Where did you find them?” So I went back and got some more for Krishnaji.

He had someone write off to Upasani, who was coming, to get some more of a special blue silk, etcetera. But when it finally came time to making up the garments, he had almost none of them made up for himself. They were almost all for other people, and it was typical of him to think of others and to want to give things to others. He, of course, wanted lovely things for Mary.

I was always trying to find something that would be fun for him, but it was quite difficult. I would come in with stories, make small jokes, find small things. At one point I bought him the most current National Geographic magazine that was on sale (from the previous month, I think) because it had a small hologram on the cover and I thought he would be amused by the hologram, which he was. I believe he mentioned the hologram in the talk right after he saw it.

The twenty-ninth. 'David and Scott telephoned from Madras. Krishnaji is arriving here January thirteen on Singapore Airlines with Dr. Parchure, Scott, and probably the Moodys. He is giving three talks in Madras, then attending KFI trustee meetings, then he leaves. Bombay is canceled. I telephoned Kathy in London to tell the others there.'

That takes us to the end of the year.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] For the video of the talk of December 28, 1985.

Issue 89: January 1, 1986 to February 2, 1986

In this issue, as in the last, there are my notes indicated by SF Notes to supplement Mary's diaries as she was not in India. Although my notes continue to the end of Krishnaji's life, my notes will end in these memoirs when Krishnaji rejoins Mary and her narrative of Krishnaji's life can continue.

Mary: We begin today's discussion on the first of January, 1986. I am in Ojai, and Krishnaji is still in India. 'I went for an early walk then spoke to my brother in New York. I went with Erna and Theo to the movie Out of Africa in Oxnard, after which we had an early supper at a Mexican restaurant. Krishnaji was to have given his second talk in Madras[1] today.'

Editor's Note: These memoirs again have links to a talk that Mary had not commented on as being special because she wasn't there, but Krishnaji comments on it. He says to Mary in an audio-taped letter,"It was a very strong talk, even though I say it. K was all there. An hour and ten minutes or a quarter. Enormous sense of energy and power in his voice."

M: January second. I continue to go for early walks, but I'm not going to keep mentioning it.

Scott: That's fine.

M: 'I worked at my desk all morning, then after lunch, from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m. I manned the Krishnaji library in Arya Vihara. The house painter began work on the decks and trim outside the cottage. At 6 p.m. I went with Erna and Theo for dinner at the Ranch House Restaurant with the Hookers.'

Editor's Note: The date of the first Indian trustees' meeting of the year is established in Krishnaji's audiotaped letter to Mary. Not all the trustees were there, and it took place in Krishnaji's bedroom in Vasanta Vihar with Krishnaji resting in bed.

I believe it was the first meeting that Krishnaji had with the trustees and at which not all the trustees were present when Krishnaji resigned and where he even said that he wanted his name withdrawn from the Foundation and schools. The meeting took place in his bedroom. Before the meeting took place, Krishnaji had told me what he wanted to say, and he said that he would be saying that he would withdraw from all of the Foundations. However, he was saying this at this time to make it more palatable to the Indians and that he did not intend to resign from either the American Foundation or the Foundation Trust in England. He said that there were certainly legal reasons why he couldn't resign from the American Foundation with the ongoing court case against Rajagopal and that he was sure that there was some reason why he couldn't resign from the Foundation Trust (maybe the copyright question—or we would come up with something), so I mustn't get alarmed. The Indians accepted his resigning since he was going to resign from the others, but they didn't want his name withdrawn, and they were very adamant about that. After this meeting, I felt I had seen something and I told him that even though, for selfish reasons, I would not want his name to be removed from the trust or from the school, I did see the beauty of disappearing without a trace. He responded with his emphatic "Yes, sir," but accepted that it probably couldn't be done.

He obviously had been telling individuals what he was going to tell the trustees in general concerning his wish that all editing be done by the Foundation Trust and that they exclusively had his copyright and that the Indian Foundation concern itself only with the translation of those works into the Indian languages and the distribution of the Foundation Trust's books. He apparently had encountered some opposition on the grounds that Gollancz, the normal English publisher, could not ensure good quality and inexpensive editions for the Indian market. Therefore, he asked me to call Mary Cadogan, who was to call the head of Gollancz to receive a direct and personal confirmation and reassurance that Gollancz could ensure these good-quality, inexpensive editions for India. This Krishnaji seemed to feel would answer the Indian Foundation's chief rebuttal to his request. He insisted that Mary not just say what she knew to be true but that she actually talked with the head of Gollancz and then called back so that he could say that he had just been assured that this was so, directly from Gollancz. This obviously had nothing at all to do with the central issue, which was copyright and editing, but it was apparently something that was being presented to Krishnaji as a reason why he couldn't have what he wanted.

During the first full trustees' meeting, when Krishnaji made his wishes known to everyone, there was not a great deal of opposition, so presumably they had accepted the argument and swallowed the bitter pill. I believe it was also at the second meeting that Pama and Sunanda's resignation was announced. (This was obviously going to come as especially difficult to Sunanda, as her intention had been—as she even stated to Krishnaji—that she would write and give lectures and seminars, obviously talking about Krishnaji.) At this meeting and at Pundit Upadhyaya's suggestion, it was stated that Vasanta Vihar would be used as a place for scholars to do translations of Krishnaji's work. Asit wanted to turn it into a high-powered school doing the International Baccalaureate, even though it would probably mean that an interest in the teachings would be second. He saw himself as running this school, as he was rather thinking that he would be in charge of whatever happened at Vasanta Vihar.

He was so violent in the meeting when I crossed him about this that Krishnaji—who thought that maybe Asit could be in charge of Vasanta Vihar—began to change his mind. It clinched his changing his mind when Radhika came to Krishnaji after this meeting and said openly that she didn't think Asit was ready for doing anything like that. He was too violent and too hard in pressing his ideas, which is exactly what he was. Krishnaji agreed completely, and added some other reasons for not wanting to give Asit any responsibility that I knew nothing about, but, of course, I had seen his violence, bullying, and attempts to intimidate people at meetings. Krishnaji seemed quite pleased that Radhika had been so honest and frank with him, even though Asit is her cousin. I believe it was one of several rude awakenings for Asit that, not only was his suggestion not followed up by Krishnaji, but he was not given responsibility for Vasanta Vihar as he thought he would be given. In Ojai, Krishnaji said, let's see for a year or two how he is as a kind of trial period, and if he's good during that trial period then maybe he can have some responsibilities. Krishnaji went from being fairly "for" Asit to really feeling that Asit shouldn't have any large role in the work.

M: There's nothing much on the third, but then on January fourth, 'There is rain. The Moodys are to arrive tomorrow. Krishnaji should have given his third Madras talk in Madras, completing the talks in India for this year. He will hold KFI trustee meetings on Wednesday'—this was written on a Saturday. 'I marketed for the Moodys and made soup for all in Arya Vihara tomorrow. Ivan stood in for me in the library.' That means Ivan Berkowitz.

The fifth of January: 'Scott telephoned from Madras. Krishnaji, he, and Dr. Parchure are arriving Saturday instead of the following Monday. I went to Arya Vihara at noon. Cleaned the kitchen and had my last day at the library. David and Vivian arrived at 7 p.m. from Madras, coming via Europe. I brought them supper. Vivian may have chickenpox, the reason for their earlier-than-expected departure from India.'

January six: 'Alasdair planted new flowerbeds off the north terrace. The Moodys' doctor says Vivian does not have chickenpox. She brought to me four audiocassettes from Krishnaji and some audiocassettes of the educational conference held at Rishi Valley. Krishnaji has resigned as president of KFI. Michael Krohnen arrived from India and Germany.'

There is nothing much on the seventh except that I listened to the tapes I received yesterday.

On January eighth, 'I drove to Malibu listening to the audiocassette of January second, when Krishnaji met KFI members about not using his name. I sat with Amanda, whose eye is still in a patch. Philippa and Phil were there. Then Philippa and I went to town and lunched in Beverly Hills. We both went to get cheese, croissants, etcetera. I dropped her at Amanda's and drove home.'

SF Notes #7

The final meeting that involved the trustees was really a discussion that Krishnaji wanted to have with the Pundit concerning some rather peculiar and special aspects involved in Krishnaji's birth and the nature of who he is and which the Pundit felt he had learned something about. Soon after the discussion began, however, Pupul entered into the discussion and then others, and the discussion changed direction. It was a very good discussion at the end, but it was not the discussion that Krishnaji had wanted to have.

When this discussion was over, Krishnaji asked me to get the master tape for him to bring with him so it could go to Brockwood. For some reason, he didn't trust the Indian Foundation with this tape, and he didn't want it to appear in Pupul's book. Again, I didn't understand it, but simply tried to do as he asked, which proved somewhat difficult. They couldn't seem to believe my request and in fact two or three different people had to ask Krishnaji directly before what he was asking for was accepted. He must have said to one of them, if not several of them, that he did not even want them to have a copy, but this I didn't know, and it was only when I was in Ojai that I found out that they didn't have a copy. I thought Krishnaji was just bringing back the master tape.

Krishnaji never went back on to the board of governors, although he did relent on his name remaining in the Foundation and schools. He told me several times and he told other people that he was "out of it," and he said it with relief. He also said to some people who wanted to ask him about things, that they had to decide since he was no longer on the Foundation. Pupul was automatically going to become president, but at the end I was told that she would not become president but only remain vice president, and that there would be no president as long as Krishnaji was alive.

Sometime during the last week or so of my stay in India, drawings of the new center at Brockwood arrived from the architect. I was happy to be able to show them to Krishnaji as well as to the Indian trustees. Krishnaji wanted me to show them to Pupul, but when I did, it was hard to get a word in edgewise with her telling me about the wonderful Indian architects and wonderful Indian architecture and the wonderful Indian building traditions. After several attempts, I finally was able to explain something to her about the center. Apparently, she went up to Krishnaji afterward and told Krishnaji that she didn't like it, and from then until the final days of his life he would occasionally tell me that Pupul said—and here he would do a small imitation of her, and he seemed to enjoy doing it—"I don't like it." For some reason, her saying this and the way she said it conveyed something to him about her, and whenever he did this little imitation, it was by way of making a comment about her.

In the last few days—I believe—of Krishnaji's stay in India, Dr. Krishna asked Krishnaji if he would please go to see Rukmini Arundale, who for the last sixty years had been beastly toward Krishnaji. Dr. Krishna is Rukmini Arundale's nephew and Rukmini was dying of cancer, and Dr. Krishna did not want that long association to end on the bad note that it had been on for the last sixty years. So, Krishnaji agreed to stop by and see her for a few minutes on the way to his beach walk, since he drove by her house on the way to his walk every day. He told me to come with him, but since I could see that he didn't want to go, I tried to dissuade him. However, he said, "No, I have already committed myself," and he simply resigned himself to doing it. Afterward, he told me that it had been a mistake. He was trying to encourage Dr. Krishna, who was new. Dr. Krishna, Nandini, and I accompanied Krishnaji, and the atmosphere in that place was awful. We sat around for four or five minutes exchanging pleasantries.

As Krishnaji was preparing to leave, there was a real sense of his winding things up and it was quite clear to everyone that he wouldn't be coming back. He was still ill and running a fever (and at one point he weighed only ninety-seven pounds). He wanted to settle a pension for Dr. Parchure (who had been living on a pittance) and for Parameshwaran (who would be retiring), both of whom he suspected would probably not be looked after in his absence as well as he would have liked. None of the trustees wanted to discuss at the meetings when Krishnaji was there just what they would give them, but they all said yes, yes, yes, we'll give them more and passed over it. I don't know what was resolved.

He also didn't want to leave any of the good clothing that he had in India, because he was sure it would be commandeered by those who were left in charge, and he didn't want that. Consequently, when we were packing, we went through all of the cupboards and packed all of the good articles that he had. This he did even though Upasani and Mahesh had assured him that they would look after his things as he asked them to do. He had told them that they could have his things if he didn't return, but Mahesh was not going to take charge of the Foundation until the first of April, and Krishnaji did not trust what might happen in the intervening period. When I look back at this episode, which I remember quite clearly, it encapsulates so well for me what he seems to have felt about the people in power and the KFI. It was quite tragic and yet it seemed to be quite unarguable.

The ninth: 'It is Erna's seventy-fifth birthday and a warm day. A new doorbell is installed, the house painting continues, the copper gutters on the roof are fixed, and the windows were washed. In anticipation of Krishnaji's arrival, I went to Ventura for houseplants and other errands. Mary Cadogan telephoned from London. Kathy rang from Brockwood. I listened again to Krishnaji and the KFI members' discussion on January two.'

Just before flight to California

The flight to California involved a two-and-three-quarter hours stopover and change of planes in Singapore and a forty-five-minute refueling stop in Tokyo. Asit wanted Krishnaji to come to his place in Singapore for breakfast, and he assured us that it was possible to get off the plane, get through immigration, get to his place, have breakfast, get back to the airport, check in, and board the plane on time. I had my doubts that this was feasible but was willing to give it a try. The day before we left, I suggested to Krishnaji and after his agreement to Asit, that if our plane was more than one half hour late in arriving in Singapore, that we would not attempt it. Even with the full two hours and forty-five minutes, it seems that it would have required Krishnaji rushing around quite hard, which I didn't think he was in a condition to do, and from which I didn't see him deriving much real benefit. Krishnaji seemed to be quite relieved at the very large possibility of not having to do this extra bit of rushing around on what was already going to be a taxing voyage.

January tenth: 'I made final preparations of the house for Krishnaji's arrival with Dr. Parchure and Scott tomorrow. The house painting is completed, the house cleaned, the garden planting is all done, and everything is put in order. It is a warm day: eighty-seven degrees.'

Our flight from Madras was to be at about midnight. All that day people were coming to say goodbye. There was a definite sense of things ending. Krishnaji went out for his walk as usual, and he also drove through the grounds of the Madras school to say goodbye to it all. That evening he went to bed at his usual time, and he was going to be awakened and driven to the airport when it was time. Arrangements had been made so that he would not have to check in and go through the normal immigration and security formalities, but that he would be picked up in a car at Vasanta Vihar and driven directly to the stairs of the airplane. I was to go ahead of time with Dr. Parchure and take care of the luggage, immigration, and security procedures. There was also traveling on the same plane a girl from California who was a friend of the Moodys. Asit was going to come later. When Dr. Parchure and I got to the airport and began checking in the bags and checking through, I discovered that the airplane was going to be two hours late. This still gave us forty-five minutes to change planes, but it did cut things rather fine. I couldn't bear the idea of standing around the airport for an extra two hours, since I was there two hours early in any case, so I left the bags checked in and decided to go back to Vasanta Vihar, which turns out to have been a very lucky decision to have made. When I got back to Vasanta Vihar, all of the senior members of the Foundation were still there, and it seems that Pupul, Asit, and perhaps some others had decided that Krishnaji would not fly on that plane, because with only forty-five minutes for the transfer they felt that he might miss it and that he would have to then spend the night in Singapore, and he had not wanted to spend the night en route anywhere. They had decided that he would take the flight on the twelfth, which was the next plane. They had not woken him up to tell him this, and they had made no moves to inform me or Dr. Parchure in the airport. In the normal course of events, we would have checked in, boarded the flight, and waited for Krishnaji to arrive, and he never would have come on, and we would have not been able to do anything other than continue the journey without him. A certain amount of outrage was probably discernible on my face and in what I said. I insisted that Krishnaji know immediately what the situation was, and have him decide what he wanted to do. He was awakened, and despite the attempts to dissuade him from going, he decided that he wanted to go. Dr. Parchure and I and the girl from California went back to the airport several hours later and continued through the different formalities. The airport officials had not been informed of this special procedure with Krishnaji, and I had no small amount of difficulty explaining why I was taking the baggage and ticket of someone through these formalities without him being present. The security, in fact, having had some difficulty with some terrorists, would not let me through. Asit eventually arrived and went through. Eventually, the security police decided that they would have the car with Krishnaji stop outside the departure lounge, and that when they could determine he was in the car, then I could go. When the car with Krishnaji did arrive, I grabbed Dr. Parchure, got into the car with him and Krishnaji, and the three of us drove to the foot of the plane. There we were, the first three on the plane, and Krishnaji asked me to sit next to him. It was the start of Krishnaji's long and somewhat difficult final flight.

The flight for Krishnaji was difficult right from the beginning. It wasn't as though he suffered because of the flight, but he had been driving himself so hard and for so long with all of the nonsense in India, and when he got on the plane, he was so happy to be leaving and said so, and he began to relax and all the consequences of his exertions began to come out.

The flight to Singapore was approximately four hours long and uneventful. Dr. Parchure and Asit were asleep behind, but I don't think Krishnaji or I slept, although I can't remember what we did do, but he was very weak and he was cold.

When we got to Singapore, there was a wheelchair waiting for Krishnaji. The departure of the next flight was in forty-five minutes, and I rushed to the check-in desk to book onto the next flight. As it was, there was a transfer check-in desk just at the end of the ramp from our airplane, and the ramp to the next airplane was right next to that, so that our forty-five minutes was more than enough time. We said good-bye to Asit and continued our journey.

We were flying first class on Singapore Airlines, which essentially means that we had wonderful service and extraordinary food almost continuously. Krishnaji ate, what was for him, a lot and he frequently commented on how good it was and on how lovely the service was, although he seemed frequently daunted by yet another meal arriving, having seemingly just finished the last one.

I don't know why he wanted me to nurse him when Dr. Parchure was there, but he did, and I didn't really know how to do it well, but I did what I could. Krishnaji said that Dr. Parchure was too Maharashtrian, but I had no idea what that meant. Krishnaji was frequently having to go to the toilet, but he was so weak that he couldn't get there back and forth by himself, and I had to help him a great deal. He was also extremely cold the whole time, and on the last part of the flight, when he'd pretty much stopped eating, he was lying down tucked under masses of blankets that I had wrapped all around him, and eventually he would get warm. But every time he would have to go to the toilet he would get cold again and he would shake, and I would try to warm him up and stop him from shaking. He began during the flight asking me to do something that he was later to ask for, which was to press down on the base of his liver where the head of the pancreas is and then after a while to move the pressure across his stomach to his left side. There were two other doctors on first class coming from a conference in Japan and asked me if I needed help and whether I thought Krishnaji would make it. They didn't know who Krishnaji was, but they could see that I was taking care of him.

When we arrived in Tokyo, we decided to have just a little walk around the airport to stretch our legs. Krishnaji couldn't walk without my holding his elbow and supporting him a bit, but he wanted to walk. As we were walking around the departure lounge, a Japanese man saw us and came up to Krishnaji and said, "Are you Mr. Krishnamurti?" Krishnaji said yes and shook his hand courteously, and this man then explained that he had found out from friends in Madras what flight Krishnaji was on and had booked himself a first-class ticket on the same flight to Los Angeles from Tokyo, just so he could have a chance of meeting Krishnaji. I tried to explain that Krishnaji was quite tired, which this man was sensitive enough to see, and he asked if he might be able to see Krishnaji in Ojai. We gave him a telephone number and said that we would see him on the plane.

The flight continued with Krishnaji becoming increasingly weak and with it becoming increasingly difficult for him to keep warm. Even after Krishnaji stopped eating, he took interest in what I was eating and asked me about everything, but eventually even watching me eat became too much for him and he asked me to stop, but not until I'd eaten far more than was decent.

When we arrived on the eleventh at Los Angeles Airport, Krishnaji was supposed to have a wheelchair waiting for him, but there wasn't one there, and we had to wait at the end of the ramp to the airplane for a very long time. This was very difficult for Krishnaji because there wasn't even a place for him to sit down. I made a fuss with several people and even suggested to Krishnaji that we just sit on the floor because his legs were not very strong, he having traveled for twenty-four hours and being quite ill. I could tell from the way he didn't want to do it that he felt it wouldn't have been dignified, which indeed it wouldn't have been, but I was more concerned with his well-being at that point. Eventually, a young girl came with a wheelchair. She was very nice, very good, and very American.

We went quickly through passport control and I insisted that Dr. Parchure be with us, so we all pushed through together. Krishnaji was also making motions and insisting that we all be together, and immigration took us all through quite quickly. As soon as that was done, I told the girl that there would be someone waiting for Krishnaji at the exit and that she should just take him straight out. I wanted Dr. Parchure to go with him, but for some reason that didn't occur, so Dr. Parchure and I stayed to pick up the bags, and I didn't see Krishnaji again until we got back to Ojai.

By the time we got there, Krishnaji was already in bed. He was very tired and quite weak but extraordinarily happy to be finally in Ojai. It was quite warm, but he had a fever and was afraid of being cold.

January eleventh. 'I left at 7 a.m. for Los Angeles airport and met Mark Lee there. Krishnaji's flight from Singapore and Tokyo arrived at 9:30 a.m. He came right out in a wheelchair looking very frail and very, very thin. Leaving Scott and Parchure to cope with luggage and customs, Krishnaji and I drove in the green car, which he had asked for, to Ojai. Krishnaji was home and in bed by 1 o'clock. It was a warm sunny day for him. He looks very fragile and tired, but stood the trip well, particularly with Scott's help. Krishnaji wanted to be out of India and Scott got the tickets and got him out over the efforts of Pupul, Sunanda, and Pama to keep him there. As soon as we were alone in the car—Scott and Parchure came with Mark Lee—he told me that for two to three days I must not leave him, even for a moment, "Or he may slip away." He told me that in India he had said to himself, "I mustn't be ill because then I wouldn't see you again," and "'It' doesn't want to inhabit a sick body, one that couldn't function. We must not have an accident because if I were hurt that would be the end." Later he said to me, "While I am here I want to share my meditation with you. I've never said that to anyone"…"I came back to see you and to die. If I die, it's alright. If I live, it's alright. But one must not invite death, and I don't. I came back to be taken care of by you." I stayed with him constantly, sleeping on cushions on the floor by his bed. In the evening, his fever was 100.9. He slept fairly well that first night. But his fever went to 101.6, so Dr. Parchure gave him aspirin and it dropped to 98 by evening. He remained in bed. Scott helped unpack his things.'

The next day. 'Krishnaji slept fairly well and remained in bed all day. I couldn't reach Dr. Deutsch but arranged for him to see Krishnaji the next day, Monday the thirteenth. Scott continued to help unpack Krishnaji's things.'

Thirteenth January: 'Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, Scott, and I drove to Santa Paula where Dr. Deutsch examined Krishnaji at 11 a.m. He found Krishnaji's prostate to be soft and thinks that's a possible site of the infection behind Krishnaji's fever. Krishnaji's blood sugar count is 243. He doubled the dose of Rastinon to bring it down, and prescribed Bactrim…' I'm startled by that because Bactrim was the antibiotic that made me so sick.

Scott: Aha.

M: '…for the infection. And Restoril instead of Halcion for sleep. We went to Santa Paula hospital for blood chemistry, etcetera, and were home by 1:30 p.m. for lunch. Krishnaji had some energy for the trip and then slept all afternoon.'

January fourteen: 'Krishnaji was weak and drowsy, with a fever of 101.4. He's taking Bactrim. I stayed by his bed constantly, as I have right along, and it was a difficult night, with him needing to get up many times.'

Wednesday the fifteenth. 'Krishnaji seemed as if over-sedated. Either the new sleeping tablet, Restoril, is affecting him too much, or his body is not excreting it in the time it should. Dr. Deutsch gave partial findings of the blood chemistry and said that Krishnaji is anemic. The white count is up. There is some liver impairment, which is the cause of the sleeping medication not being thrown off. He wants a sonogram of Krishnaji's liver, gallbladder, and pancreas. Krishnaji saw the Lilliefelts for the first time. They have had a cousin of Theo's staying with them, and Krishnaji talked of problems in India, his distrust of Pupul, Sunanda, and Pama. He says he has confidence in Radhika, Maheshji, who is now secretary of KF India, Upasani, and the new Dr. P. Krishna, first cousin of Radha Burnier, a physicist teaching at Benares Hindu University and who is now both a member of KFI and principal or rector of the Rajghat school. Krishnaji wants a group of two or three trustees of each of the three Foundations to be responsible for holding the Foundations together when he is no longer here to do it.'

January sixteenth. 'Krishnaji had a very interrupted night, needing frequently to get up, though he slept in between. His temperature at 5:45 a.m. was 99.4, at 7:30 it was 100.4, at noon it went to 101.7, and at 1:45 it went to 102. Parchure is measuring fluids in and out. Krishnaji drinks Perrier in between meals.'

The seventeenth: 'At 6 a.m. Krishnaji's temperature was 100. Dr. Deutsch wants a sonogram done in the Ojai hospital Monday. I stayed close to him. "I need protection," he said.'

The next day. 'Dr. Deutsch recommended lots of fluids, and Krishnaji took in forty-nine ounces during the day. His fever was 99.6 by 6 p.m. Dr. Parchure did a blood sugar test on Saturday morning and it was 183. His night again was disturbed by needing to get up frequently. During the night, at 1:30 a.m., he had some stomach pain, which a Phazyme tablet relieved.'

The nineteenth of January: 'Krishnaji had forty-two ounces of fluid. At 6 a.m. his temperature was 99.3, and at 5 p.m. it was 100. He took Halcion and slept from 8 to 1:30 a.m. In the day, Krishnaji dressed, and walked slowly down the drive to the gate and back to the pepper tree where he sat and rested.'

The twentieth of January: 'Krishnaji had stomach pain again at 1:30 a.m. His temperature was 99 at 7 a.m. Krishnaji had a sonogram in the Ojai hospital. Dr. P. Miller there reported to Dr. Deutsch a mass in Krishnaji's liver. He couldn't see the pancreas well enough, and there is sludge in the gallbladder, possibly gallstones. Dr. Deutsch says he cannot tell if the mass is malignant or benign and wants a CT scan on Wednesday, which should tell.'

The twenty-first of January: 'Krishnaji finds the food uneatable and blames it on Michael's cooking, but it isn't that.' Michael was cooking so delicately, I remember. Do you remember?

S: Yes. I remember it well. Krishnaji felt the food was too heavy…

M: Yes, and too rich.

S: …and too rich, and that was even when Michael just boiled some vegetables in water.

M: Yes, or if he had just a little broth of vegetable water.

S: Yes. So it was clearly not the food.

M: No, it wasn't.

S: But Krishnaji's system just couldn't take it.

M: No. Well, as we'll see, Krishnaji was getting that blockage.

S: Yes, I remember.

M: 'The new medical scale I purchased'—that's the one in there, which I had gotten for him—'says Krishnaji's weight is ninety-four pounds. Krishnaji got up and looked at the new rose garden. Then he walked with Dr. Parchure and Scott to the end of the drive, and Krishnaji wanted to go on. So they went up McAndrew and into Arya Vihara, resting on the way. Then across the new stones in the drain are of the orchard and to the pepper tree. Krishnaji rested, and then he entered the house. Scott rented Pale Rider, an Eastwood film, and Krishnaji watched it in the evening.

S: [chuckles] There are some more things to elaborate slightly. There's—

M: You must interrupt because you were—

S: I have lots and lots of notes on all this, but I don't want to elaborate too much, otherwise I'll just be interrupting all the time.

M: Well, we must add to this account.

S: Alright, a little bit, like, for instance, the sonogram event. Krishnaji was so interested in the technology. He was much more interested in the technology than what it was actually finding. [Both chuckle.] And he was interested in the kind of gel they put on his stomach to do it. What was that? He wanted to know. He was just full of curiosity about the technology [chuckles], and then also the rose garden he went to look at that you mentioned was the rose garden that you had planted for him as a surprise. And Krishnaji was delighted by it.

M: Yes. He always wanted more roses. And that little patch in the back was the first one. But then I put some more in.

S: Yes. And Krishnaji was delighted by that. And then also the first walk that we took; he, you, and I took it down to the end of the drive. Dr. Parchure actually met us at the bottom of the drive, as he was being driven back from somewhere. And he met us there and carried the newspapers back. This was a Sunday, so those were the Sunday newspapers, and Krishnaji was critical of the newspapers, so heavy and so…

M: Yes, they're terribly heavy.

S: And there was also the last walk. This…

M: Yes, around.

S: It was Krishnaji's last walk.

M: I know. I know.

S: He never went out for another walk again. And it was lovely to go out with him, and it was surprising that he decided to turn up and go toward Arya Vihara!

M: Yes. It's a long walk.

S: I was astonished, and Parchure was astonished.

M: He walked around the building.

S: Yes, he wanted to walk around Arya Vihara, and I can remember he was hoping he wouldn't disturb anybody if he walked around. So we went around to the back, and of course…it's poignant. That's where Nitya died, and the last place Krishnaji saw Nitya. And then coming back, and sitting underneath the pepper tree again. That was Krishnaji's last walk.

M: Yes. [Said in a whisper.]

January twenty-two. 'Krishnaji began to have pain across his upper abdomen, which woke him at 2 a.m., but though I asked, he denied it till 4 a.m., when he accepted a Tylenol. His temperature at 5:30 a.m. was 98. At 7:45 a.m. another Tylenol, but he still had no relief. At 8:45 a.m. he vomited stringy mucus and something brown, possible blood. I rang Dr. Deutsch, who said he needs Krishnaji to be in the hospital. With Dr. Parchure, Scott, and Erna, and I explained this to Krishnaji, who agreed to go.'

Well, I think I've said it somewhere else in all this long discussion we've had, but Krishnaji used to say to me when I first was with him to never let him go into a hospital. He always said, "I'd rather die at home," was the way he put it. And I used to say, "Well, Krishnaji, what if you break your leg? I mean, to fix it might involve going to hospital." And, now, this was not the first time a hospital was needed, because he'd been twice to the hospital for those operations. And I always said to him, you're deciding this; I can't decide it. Naturally. So we all explained why he had to go to Santa Paula. You probably remember that.

S: I remember it well.

M: Dr. Deutsch had said that he needs the equipment in the hospital. He said he can't handle it at home.

S: Yes. And so Krishnaji did accept going to the hospital but on the proviso that he come back.

M: Yes. Yes.

S: And this was a very big thing. So the five of us went, with Erna in the front seat with you, and Parchure in the back seat with Krishnaji, and he had a bowl with him because Krishnaji kept bringing up small amounts of liquid. I came in the green Mercedes behind because it was thought we would need two cars, which, in fact, we did.

M: Yes. At the Santa Paula Community Hospital, Krishnaji was put into intensive care. He was given Demerol and an IV. X-ray and blood chemistry were begun. Dr. Deutsch came to meet him. The X-rays showed a bowel obstruction. Krishnaji agreed to a tube through his nose into the abdomen to pump out the fluid and relieve the pressure. Rocephin and high alimentation were given intravenously. Krishnaji is severely undernourished. I spent the night on a reclining chair by his bed.'

S: Let me just say something about this.

M: Yes.

S: They normally don't allow people to stay with anyone in the intensive care unit, but they were very nice with us.

M: Yes, they were.

S: They brought in a *very un*comfortable chair, kind of a reclining…well, somewhat reclining chair…

M: Something like that.

S: …that was covered in a vinyl imitation leather material. And the reason that this was memorable is because it squeaked terribly when you moved.

M: [chuckles] I don't remember that.

S: So, [chuckles] we would both lie there when Krishnaji was sleeping, trying not to move for fear of making a squeak, [laughs] which would wake him up.

M: Oh, yes. I do remember that now. All this will be revealed, but we take turns staying overnight with him.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: The twenty-third of January: 'Dr. Cooley, a surgeon, examined Krishnaji, who was very weak, and said that he'—the surgeon—'advised against any surgery. There is a complicated picture of the mass in the liver, the gallbladder sludge, and an unknown pancreatic situation. Dr. Slater, a colleague of Dr. Deutsch, examined Krishnaji, and ordered batteries of blood and other tests. Mark Renneker'—who you know specialized in cancer—'telephoned me in the afternoon, having talked to Deutsch, and was optimistic. He says liver cancer is rare at Krishnaji's age and that Krishnaji has resources in his body to dominate illness.' Mark was always trying to, I think, bolster my state of mind by saying that Krishnaji has extraordinary reserves—that he's not an ordinary patient. And I remember his saying that Krishnaji was in control of his body.

S: I have records of this time when Krishnaji was going into the hospital, and Krishnaji was trying to explain to Dr. Deutsch something of who he was and that his was not a normal body. He was putting it very gently, but he was trying to explain, not as a point of pride or anything like that, but just trying to say something of what Dr. Deutsch was dealing with, that he was dealing with something a bit bizarre.

M: Yes.

S: And Krishnaji was very pleased when Dr. Deutsch told him that he, Dr. Deutsch, had gone to some of the Ojai talks, because Krishnaji felt, oh, well then he has some greater possibility of understanding this…

M: Yes. 'I telephoned Vanda in Florence to let her know Krishnaji was sick and in hospital.' I thought she should know and she might want to come. I thought she would come, but she didn't do that. 'Scott was in touch with England. He and Parchure are concerned about the exhaustion in me, so Scott stayed the night with Krishnaji, and I slept at home.'

'Late in the afternoon, Parchure had told Krishnaji that he might die. I had wanted to wait till the CT scan on Monday, but Parchure said he had long ago promised to tell Krishnaji if medically he, Parchure, saw a danger of death. When I came in after Parchure told him that, Krishnaji said to me, "It seems I'm going to die," as though he had not expected it so soon but accepted the fact.'

S: But this thing also…it's in my notes, too…any piece of moderately hopeful news, you and I would grasp and emphasize, and anything that looked bleak we would… So there was an awful lot of up and down.

M: Yes. Yes.

S: Again, just a couple of comments on this: You had spent the first night there.

M: Mm, hm.

S: And Krishnaji didn't want you to spend more nights there. He felt it wasn't good for you, it was…you still did, but he wanted you to go home and to have a good night's sleep, so he wasn't happy with your staying the night. He was looking after you, and you were looking after him, [chuckles] but he was really looking after you. Also, when Dr. Parchure told him that he was probably going to die, you and I were—

M: Horrified.

S: —horrified that he was saying that.

M: Yes. But he had promised.

S: Yes, he had promised Krishnaji—well, Krishnaji made him promise that if Parchure ever thought Krishnaji was dying he would tell him.

M: Yes.

S: And I also recorded that when Parchure was telling him this, Krishnaji kept saying "What? What? What?" in a louder-than-usual voice, as though he was astonished to be hearing this. At the same time, he said later on, "I thought the going had begun." But he was surprised about the cancer, I think. But he seemed to be most surprised because "the other" hadn't gone. He kept saying that if his life had come to an end, if he had cancer or something like that, and he was going to die, "the other" would leave; and I think that what surprised him, what confused him—was that it didn't leave him.

M: It never left him. Yes.

S: And so he thought, well, this couldn't be death because "the other" is still there; but he was being told it was death, and that seemed to be what really surprised him. And yet, he still said to me, and in a couple of different ways, that he felt it, in India, he felt it start in India. "The going had begun," were his words.

M: Yes, and that hastened his wanting to get back here.

S: Yes. Oh, yes. In fact, he kept on changing the date of departure, and he didn't trust the Indians to get the tickets for him.

M: No, no, he didn't. I think I get to that in here somewhere.

S: Yes, and then also he kept on asking me to change my dates of leaving Ojai, because I had originally planned to only be here for a couple of days. And then he said, no, can I stay a little bit longer? And then again, it was can I stay until the sonogram? And then when it was cancer, he asked if I would stay until…the body was gone, he said.

M: Yes. January twenty-fourth. 'In the morning, around 6 a.m., I telephoned Mario about his letter saying Filomena was in the hospital, and he told me on the phone that she had died last Monday, the twentieth, in the hospital. Only later did his telegram reach here.'

'On the way into the hospital in the morning with Dr. Parchure, he told me in the car that he had noticed jaundice beginning in Krishnaji and feared a hepatitic coma. But when we got there, Krishnaji's vital signs were better and the bowel obstruction situation was improved. He was given one pint of blood in a transfusion. The surgeon, Dr. Cooley, tried to put a larger needle, a sort of catheter, into a larger vein in Krishnaji's neck as the small ones in his hands are deteriorating; but it hurt him, the vein in his neck proved too deep to reach, so he had to close that incision and make one under the clavicle, which worked. Krishnaji bore all this with Novocain and patience. His jaundice is lessened.'

S: Putting that tube under Krishnaji's clavicle, to me, was like a hammer blow. It seemed somehow more permanent than just something in the wrist. It seemed more…that Krishnaji would never be free of these tubes. I remember feeling awful about it. When Krishnaji had to have the tube put in his nose, he said, "I just have to accept this. I've had to accept so much in my life."

M: [sorrowfully] I know.

'I telephoned Vanda and Mary Lutyens and said it was uncertain how long Krishnaji could live. The latter is coming when she can get a visa. I told Vanda the uncertainty of how long Krishnaji might live, but Krishnaji seemed better by evening. Scott stayed with him again, and I slept, exhausted, at home.'

S: Yes. Let me just add some things to this.

M: Yes, do.

S: When Krishnaji was told that he should have some blood transfusion, Krishnaji asked the surgeon whose blood it would be. Of course, the surgeon didn't know. And then he asked, would it be someone who ate meat and drank alcohol? And [chuckles] the surgeon said well, probably it will be. You know, almost certainly it will be.

M: Yes. Yes. I know.

S: All of us volunteered to give blood, but we couldn't because—

M: No, it was wrong type.

S: No, it was that Krishnaji didn't need whole blood. I couldn't donate because I had had hepatitis, but there were a lot of people around Ojai who would have happily donated, but Krishnaji needed a processed blood product and it would've taken over a week, even if they'd rushed it, to get out of the blood what it was that Krishnaji needed. I don't know what that was.

M: Yes. Yes. Yes.

S: So there just wasn't time.

M: No.

S: And Krishnaji asked the surgeon what he would recommend, and the surgeon recommended that he should have it. So Krishnaji did.

M: Yes. And Asit, later on—do you remember?

S: No, but…

M: We'll get…I don't know if it's in my diaries as at some point I had to stop writing. Asit, later on—it was at Brockwood, I think—said that Krishnaji was no longer the World Teacher because he'd accepted a transfusion of blood.

S: Oh, that is just, you know—

M: I could have—

S: I know. And Asit did all kinds of things at the end of Krishnaji's life that Krishnaji didn't want done, but anyway, that's just…

There's just one other small thing that we can mention, and apparently you experienced the same thing. When we were staying in the hospital, we would be asleep on that awful chair.

M: The squeaky chair.

S: On the squeaky chair. And as soon as Krishnaji needed something, even just help turning over—I will just speak for myself—I would go from fully asleep to fully awake without him having made a sound. Krishnaji would say things like, "How did you know I was…" or "How the devil did you do that?" Because he would wake up and want something, and he would try not to make a sound. And we'd just be instantly awake. Which is a very strange experience…

M: Yes. Yes.

S: …to go from completely asleep to completely awake. And he was always surprised and kind of joking; he would say something like, "I was trying to be quiet." And I'm sure he was, but there was something else that was…

M: Yes.

S: And then, when I would come back to Ojai from the hospital just to shower and shave and have something to eat before going back, he was always incredibly interested in what I had to eat. [Chuckles.] Oh yes, he wanted to know. And one time I stopped at the corner to have pizza just because that was the closest thing. Krishnaji was amazed, and he wanted to know, what did it taste like and what was on it? Finally he said, "The next time you go, maybe you could bring me a piece." And I knew I couldn't, and he saw it in my eyes and…

M: Yes.

January twenty-fifth. 'I took Dr. Parchure back to the Santa Paula hospital. Krishnaji had slept better, in spite of heart fibrillation, probably due to the blood transfusion, said Dr. Deutsch. As there is no longer the bowel obstruction, the tube from his nose was removed. Krishnaji said, "I feel like a new man."'

S: Yes. Yes. I have that in my notes, too. Yes.

M: 'Deutsch and Parchure reviewed all possible reasons for what has happened. The CT scan on Monday will answer much. I prepared for Krishnaji's return home on Wednesday. Mary Cadogan arrives tomorrow. Pupul and Asit Thursday, probably. I spent the night with Krishnaji.'

S: Well, there's an important part that's been missed out here. Before going into the hospital, things were obviously not well, and Krishnaji wanted to set up an international committee, although he didn't like the word "international." It was to have seven people on it, with two from each Foundation and then one other, and maybe the other would be a rotating one, but Krishnaji didn't like that idea. He wasn't sure what to do, but there were three youngish people from India that he wanted really to be running things there.

M: Yes, he wanted the young ones.

S: And those three were Radhika, Dr. Krishna, and Mahesh.

M: Yes.

S: And he wanted those people to be appointed. He didn't want people to be elected by the Foundation because then they would just elect Asit…

M: Themselves.

S: Yes, Asit and Pupul and…

M: Yes.

S: …and Sunanda or something, who were exactly the people he didn't want on it. So he asked me to call to India and have those three come because he wanted to establish this.

He also wanted Upasani to come—not that he wanted Upasani on this committee, because Upasani was too old—but somehow he trusted Upasani. Upasani was somebody who was honest and was good—and so I called India and passed on that message. Of course, Pupul assumed…

M: Who did you pass it onto?

S: I can't remember. Maybe I called Krishna. I think I called Krishna. But Pupul, of course, and Asit, of course, assumed that I was just playing politics and that this choice of those three was mine and not Krishnaji's. And so, of course, Pupul and Asit had to come, even though that was not what Krishnaji had wanted.

M: Yes.

S: So, this already caused a little ripple, and that's why Asit and Pupul were showing up. But, in fact, it was only those three plus Upasani that Krishnaji had really wanted to come.

M: Mm, hm. Yes, that he wanted. Upasani in the end couldn't come because he couldn't get a visa.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: The twenty-sixth of January. 'I spent the night with Krishnaji in the hospital. He had many awakenings but spoke of meditation having been present. I barely dozed, waiting to help him, watching the pattern, like Sanskrit, of his heartbeat on the monitor. Life becomes that beat. The rise—sorry, this is…[unable to continue]

S: Yes, let's just stop for a minute.

[Tape stops, then restarts.]

M: [voice trembling throughout this reading] 'Life becomes that beat. The rise and fall of his breathing. He is alive and so all the ugliness, the violence, the wretchedness of the world seems held at bay by that small body and its vastness of spirit. He is, as always, infinitely beautiful. He turned his head this morning and looked out the window where he could just see the hills, and his face seemed suddenly thirty years old. Dr. Deutsch found him well this morning. The jaundice is gone and he has gained two-and-a-half pounds on the IV hyperalimentation. Scott brought Parchure in the morning. I drove Parchure back to Ojai at lunchtime while Scott stayed with Krishnaji, and then I drove him back to the hospital and he stayed with Krishnaji for the night. Krishnaji had a 100.8 fever. Parchure stayed for the night while Scott and I returned to Ojai and had supper at Arya Vihara, where Mary Cadogan had arrived. She is staying with Erna and Theo. Yesterday, Krishnaji said almost to himself, "What have I done wrong?…I've tried to take care of the body," which tore me apart as if it was his fault. How can life be so cruel to this man? Later he said that he'd had a long meditation in the night.'

S: Just another small aside. I also record that in the mornings, when he has these meditations…I don't want whoever hears this to think that it is just your interpretation that his face looked thirty years old. It really did.

M: Yes, it really did.

S: He was radiant. I record as both timeless and extraordinarily young with his face, and his eyes were bright and clear, and…

M: He turned his head that way, and he looked out, saw the hills and those…

S: Yes. Yes. His face really did…It's not some romantic fantasy. It really did look extraordinary.

M: Well, he had a face that, that did things like that.

S: Yes. Yes. Yes.

M: January twenty-seventh. 'To the hospital early. Krishnaji said to me, "I want to tell you something. It is hard to find words. You must have an insight into it. I will die, and I want to leave you something. In India they are too quick to think they understand these things. I am skeptical. One must be. But Americans are immature. You must just listen without trying to understand. I feel it is something more vast than one can ever put into words."'

'Krishnaji had a CT scan that showed a three-inch mass in his liver but cannot show if it is malignant. Dr. Deutsch wants to do a liver biopsy tomorrow. Krishnaji is still running a fever and is on antibiotics and hyperalimentation. Mark Renneker telephoned and we had a long talk. He is in touch with Dr. Deutsch. He says Krishnaji is still in control of his illness. Parchure stayed in the hospital with Krishnaji. I slept at home.'

The twenty-eighth of January. 'I telephoned Vanda and Mary Links before going to the hospital. The latter is coming with Joe on Friday. Krishnaji is feeling stronger, and he talked to me most of the morning about how I should live when he is gone. He says he will probably live until the end of February. "You must not grieve as you did before. You must be strong. You have a lot of work to do. You reflect me." All the tests so far indicate cancer, but not exactly where. Around lunchtime a liver biopsy was attempted but failed. It was thought it would not be painful, but it was. Krishnaji winced, and the needle missed the tumor and was discontinued. It was a mistake and should not have been done, as he was disturbed and restless afterwards. He had been so much stronger in the morning. I stayed with him till late, but he insisted I sleep at home. "It is alright. The pain pushed 'it' ('the other') away but 'it' wants to come back. It is beginning to come back." I said to him, "You told me this morning do not let him slip away." Krishnaji replied, "Nothing will happen tonight. I know what I'm talking about. You must rest. When I'm home, you will have a lot to do. I don't know why 'it' wants to come back."'

'In the morning he had also said, "It is strange: 'the other' doesn't want to let go of the body. The last two nights 'the other' has taken control." And then he said to me, "I want you to live as when I was your companion. Go to Brockwood. The West Wing is yours. I have said this before." And in the afternoon, he said, "I wonder why 'the other' is not finished with the body." And then, with humor, he said, "Who was it that said, 'I cannot imagine a world without me?'" It was Scott's turn to spend the night in the hospital.'

S: Yes, we should just add what you and I had discovered, which was that because Dr. Parchure was hard of hearing, he didn't respond to Krishnaji's wanting things, so he just slept right through the evening, so it was very unsuccessful, so that was…

M: Yes. Yes. I remember that.

S: There was also…some—I don't know.

M: Hm? Also what?

S: Never mind. [Pause.] Well. [Pause.] On the flight from India back to California, Parchure was there, but Krishnaji insisted that I look after him. And there were two other doctors on the first-class flight who came up and asked if they could help because…but Krishnaji didn't want Parchure to look after him. He said he was too Maharashtrian, which I didn't and still don't understand what that means, but I didn't care either. If this was what Krishnaji wanted, fine. But it was…as wonderful as Dr. Parchure is with some things…at some point he didn't…well, I don't know. Anyway. There we are. Who knows?

M: Yes.

S: One other thing that I have in my notes is that Krishnaji said—and maybe you weren't there at the time—but he speculated a couple of times that perhaps "the other" wasn't going because other people didn't want it to go. And I, at one point, felt it was cruel that almost we were…

M: No [chuckles], I want to believe that "the other" would never have said that.

S: No, that's what Krishnaji speculated.

M: I know.

S: Yes, I also don't think it ever would have left him.

M: There was also that awful speculation that he was somehow to blame or…

January twenty-ninth. 'Krishnaji had a restless night. Dr. Deutsch gave him a steroid for strength and talked to him about what he, Krishnaji, wanted. It was a bad day. Pain came again. Krishnaji asked, "Can I last till they come?" meaning the three he has sent for from India, Dr. Krishna, Radhika, and Maheshji. In the evening, Dr. Deutsch persuaded him to try a catheter and then he slept undisturbed all night. Both Scott and I stayed in his room. The pain had stopped. Deutsch said that…some test C19?…' And I have a question mark next to that. I didn't quite know what that test was.

S: I think maybe that was for antibodies. I think he was looking for antibodies.

M: Well, 'the results just received show that the pancreas is the likely primary cancer.'

S: Mm, hm. Yes, they talked about "cancer flags" in antibodies or something like that. I can't remember.

M: The normal reading of this test is 0 to 40. Krishnaji's is 105,000. That is the final piece of knowledge. Krishnaji will go home tomorrow. He said to me, "There is so much love and so much pain in the air."' That was the deciding day. That was the end of the hospital. Nothing could be done. He could go home.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: January thirtieth. 'Krishnaji slept without pain. I left the hospital at 4:30 a.m. to be home when the day nurse arrived. Mark Lee has lent his hospital bed and assembled all necessary equipment in Krishnaji's room. It now has a hospital setup. Krishnaji came home in an ambulance through heavy rain. Scott was with him, and the two ambulance men carried in the stretcher with a large, white plastic covering Krishnaji. "I feel better here," he said when he was in his room again. And soon he began to read in his Golden Treasury. And then Paul Theroux, The Consul File.' They're both where he left them.

S: Yes, yes.

M: 'He wanted something to eat, and I brought him some clear soup and a little homemade ice cream. Later he had tea and asked for a sandwich, "with a little green," meaning watercress and "something tasty," tomatoes. But it was a mistake and later there were gas pains. He asked too for music, "something gay." Pavarotti singing Neapolitan songs was chosen, and for a bewildering time the house rang with Napoli. In the afternoon, he talked a little with Erna, Theo, Scott, Parchure, Mary Cadogan, Evelyne Blau, and me about a responsible group to hold the three Foundations together and see to the teachings. Later, there was pain again in his stomach. It was a hard night until 2:30 a.m., when he slept. He had said to me, "Don't be unhappy" and "Maria, will it be this all night? I want to go."'

January thirty-first. 'Krishnaji was in almost a stupor when Dr. Deutsch telephoned. He thought it was the effect of the morphine and came at 2:30 p.m. to see Krishnaji and counteract the morphine. Krishnaji was better. Dorothy, Jane Hammond, Mary, and Joe arrived from London. Mary and Joe are in the guest flat. Jane is at Evelyne's, and Dorothy is at the Hookers'. Dr. Krishna is at Arya Vihara. Indira and Chandra Mauli'—oh, they came—'are at Mark Lee's.' Do we know who they are?

S: Ah, no. You had better say.

M: Well, Indira was a niece of Krishnaji's, related to Narayan.

S: Aha.

M: And Chandra Mauli was her husband.

S: Oh, yes.

M: And they ran a school somewhere in the east. 'In the evening Pupul, Radhika, and Asit arrived at Arya Vihara.' Now the big diary stops until the sixth of February.

The first of February. 'Krishnaji was weak, sleeping most of the morning. He barely spoke when Pupul, Radhika, Asit, and Dr. Krishna came in briefly in the morning. But he was free of pain and very lucid at 2 p.m. when Deutsch came, and Krishnaji then saw Radhika and Dr. Krishna, two of the four he had summoned. Deutsch answered Asit's questions. All are in agreement for giving whatever Krishnaji wants to help the pain and sleep. In the evening Krishnaji slept without morphine or sleep medicine. Earlier I telephoned Vanda in Florence.' There was one male nurse who was very good, Patrick.

S: Patrick. Yes. I remember him.

M: Yes. Yes.

The second of February. 'Krishnaji slept without morphine or sleep tablets and was alert and without pain all day. He talked to me about being strong when he is gone; that I reflect him; and that I must live the way that I have lived with him. Deutsch came to see him in the morning, and Pupul came to meet Dr. Deutsch. Krishnaji saw, in the course of the day, Pupul, Mary Links, Radhika, Dr. Krishna, Asit, Mary Cadogan, Erna, Dorothy, and Jane Hammond.'

S: Mary, I'm inclined to do the rest of it tomorrow…

M: Alright.

S: …rather than continue. Because we'll finish it all tomorrow…

M: Yes. [Barely audible.]

S: …and I don't want to have a little bit hanging over. And there's also a lot that can be added to your diary entries about what Krishnaji was talking to people about and things like that.

M: Mm, hm. Yes. Okay.

S: We'll continue tomorrow, starting with February third.

Issue 90: February 3, 1986 to February 17, 1986

Writing an introduction to an ending could seem a contradiction, yet there is so much that can and should be said about the ending of this narrative (Krishnaji's life) and this ending of Mary's memoirs (which started twenty-and-a-half years ago with the first discussion she and I had to begin In the Presence of Krishnamurti: The Memoirs of Mary Zimbalist).

For almost twenty-nine years now, and for untold hours, I have contemplated Krishnaji's death. While all of us would have wanted Krishnaji to have avoided the pain he experienced, there was an aptness to the manner of his death. Krishnaji's decline was slow but unalterable, and it allowed him to put all of his work in order as nothing else imaginable could have. He had brought in a new head to the Oak Grove School. He completely changed Brockwood and started something new there—the Krishnamurti Study Center. He ended Saanen gently and permanently with everyone agreeing. He ended the thirteen years of struggle between the Krishnamurti Foundation of India and the other two Foundations, and he completely withdrew from India, but not before putting in a new head of Rishi Valley and Rajghat. When incurable pancreatic cancer was discovered as the base of Krishnaji's illness, medical interventions to cure him were stopped. He saw the people he could, said his goodbyes, and left, with nothing more to do and nothing left undone.

While there is an inescapable sense of incalculable loss, there is also a sense of joy in this issue. With this issue, Mary has finished meeting her promise to Krishnaji to tell the world what it was like to be with him; and I have met my promise to Mary to help her do just that. There is also the rounding out, the completion of the most extraordinary life of which we have any real record. There is a sense the gods are cheering.

Mary: [chuckles] It's my first necessity, when I wake up in the morning, to figure out what day it can be. [Both chuckle.] And I guessed wrong this morning.

Scott: Well, today is September twenty-three, 2005, and we are beginning on February three, 1986.

M: Very well. [Chuckles.] 'Krishnaji was without pain. He held a meeting on publication matters with representatives of all three Foundations. Only England is to correct his works. Pupul was not there, but her certain opposition was expressed. Krishnaji has energy but wants "to go." He said he had a marvelous meditation in the night. In the afternoon, in a wheelchair, we took him outside, down the path to the pepper tree, where he could see the hills. He asked to be alone there and sat motionless and silent and then asked to return indoors. Kathy arrived from Brockwood.' Now you must describe this more fully because I remember that you left him alone, but you stayed behind him in case.

S: Yes, but first of all, it wasn't a proper wheelchair. Mark Lee had not gotten a proper wheelchair like he was supposed to.

M: Oh. What was it?

S: It was a wheeled walker, one of these things that you walk behind.

M: I know all about them.

S: Yes, but this one also a seat, a canvas seat that you can sit on if you get tired of walking. So, it has very small wheels and, of course, it's inherently unstable, so it's not really a substitute for a wheelchair. Plus the fact that if you're sitting on it, then your feet are resting on the ground, so that you can't really be pushed in it because your feet would be dragging along the ground.

M: That's peculiar.

S: So, as we had nothing else, having done yoga with him, I suggested to Krishnaji that if I raised the seat as high as possible and if he sat cross-legged on the seat…

M: Yes.

S: [chuckles]…then we could make it somewhat work. And there was a rack on the back for holding his bottles and things. So that's what he did. He sat cross-legged in a semi-lotus position, and we bundled him up in blankets and bathrobes and everything else to keep him warm. At first we just brought him out onto his little porch here, off of his sitting room.

M: Yes.

S: And he was looking at the camellias. You and Dr. Parchure and I were there.

M: Yes. And then we lifted him down.

S: And he said he wanted to look at the mountains, so we all carried him down just those two or three steps there, and I wheeled him down. I positioned the chair really almost exactly where the pepper tree now kisses the driveway.

M: No. He was on the path, wasn't he?

S: No, he went down farther.

M: The driveway?

S: Yes, he went down farther.

M: I don't remember that. I remember him being on the path about half or three-quarters of the way down.

S: He said he wanted to be alone, but I was incredibly afraid this precarious contraption could tip backwards, so I sat on the wall surrounding the pepper tree, where I watched him like a hawk and could rush to catch him should he start to tip.

M: Yes, I remember that.

S: I was just about a meter or a meter and a half behind him. And I was sitting on the wall, as I remember it. I think all of us did initially go halfway down the path.

M: Yes, the rest of us stayed back.

S: Right. I can remember looking up the path and seeing all of you. You were all up the path a little bit. And I was sitting on the stone wall. And I describe in my notes that to me it was absolutely as clear as daylight that Krishnaji was saying goodbye to the hills, goodbye to the mountains.

M: Yes. Goodbye to the whole valley.

S: Yes, goodbye to the valley. He wasn't making a motion. He wasn't saying a thing, but to me it was absolutely clear, because I remember watching him saying goodbye to Rishi Valley in the same way. And saying goodbye to the beach in Madras and the Adyar River. It was just, it was just something that spoke so fully and so eloquently with not a gesture, not a word. But he was saying goodbye. And he was very happy, and then he had been doing that for a while, just sitting there quite happily, and then suddenly Asha Lee and her daughter steamed up the driveway and saw him there, and he was so disappointed that his solitary goodbye was interrupted. And yet, of course, he was enormously courteous. I think they were going into the office down here, but he called them over to greet them. But I remember thinking that the spell was broken, this moment was broken, and then we brought him back up.

M: Yes. I remember his sitting in something, but I don't remember the vehicle.

S: That was the vehicle. And I think it had either the seat or the metal parts were red.

M: That's…well, anyway.

February fourth: 'Krishnaji slept quite well. Dr. Deutsch came to see him and they talked at length.'

S: Oh, let me, can I interrupt here? There's something else that I remember.

M: What?

S: Well, Kathy was having to come here because there were things about the drawings for the center that I had to approve in order for construction not to be delayed. So she was coming over with the latest drawings and specifications that I had to look at; and Krishnaji was very interested in what flight she was coming on and when she would arrive, etcetera, and he would say to me, "She's taking off now," and "She's in the air," and then "She's coming in for a landing now." So Kathy was just in his—

M: In his consciousness.

S: In his courteous, thoughtful consciousness.

M: Yes, he—he had a sense of where people were…

S: Yes.

M: I remember the first time I saw this was when he and I were walking around the reservoir in New York's Central Park. We were staying at my brother's flat, which I'd taken for Krishnaji's use, and Alain Naudé was with us. Naudé had gone up to either New Haven or Boston about Krishnaji speaking at Harvard or Yale, and we'd gone all the way around the reservoir, and we were just about to cross Fifth Avenue because the apartment was right opposite, and just before we got to the place across, he said that Naudé is arriving. And he was. When we crossed the street, Alain was paying the taxi. [S chuckles.] And you know, he couldn't have seen him—we were too far away.

S: Yes. Yes.

M: And frequently when I would go to town when we lived in Malibu, to do shopping and this, that, and the other thing, he'd know when I was arriving and come down to the gate to wait for me. He would say, "I knew you were coming."

S: Yes. Extraordinary.

M: Yes. So, anyway, the fourth of February: 'Krishnaji slept quite well. Dr. Deutsch came to see him, and they talked at length. Deutsch says he is in an upswing, a possible remission. He said that Krishnaji could be the way he was for some time—possibly be able to write or dictate, but that if he worsened, he would not let Krishnaji be in pain. He got him up into that kind of wheelchair and into the living room. After Gary left, Krishnaji decided to walk on his own back to bed and did.' I remember that. He was shivering afterward. 'Parchure massaged his legs and feet.'

S: The shivering that you just mentioned. He would sometimes shake—what I called shaking—from things, like from pain or from cold.

M: And weakness, too.

S: And weakness. And in the airplane, when he shook I would hold him. Then when he had that terrible liver biopsy, he shook for the entire next day. It was just too much for his body, and so the body was just shaking.

M: Yes. It's a weakness and also with him it's much more exaggerated…

S: Yes. And also from overextending himself. This walk back was overextending himself, and he just shook from that.

M: I know—I mean, I can't say I know what he had because of what I have—but I've had that happen a lot when my hand shakes so much. Still my handwriting is sometimes normal, and sometimes, most of the time, it's not. It's a kind of a weakness of…

S: Of the body, yes.

M: Yes, the body's weak. And walking, I have to have a stick or I'd fall. Your body doesn't do what it used to do.

The fifth of February. 'In the morning Krishnaji spoke to a group: Pupul, Radhika, Asit, Krishna, Maheshji (just arrived), Dr. Parchure, Mary L., Mary C., Jane Hammond, Erna, Theo, Mark Lee, and David Moody. Scott recorded it. "As long as the body lives, I am still the teacher." He wept. In the afternoon, he spoke alone with Dr. Krishna and Maheshji and recorded his wish that no one be president or secretary of the Foundations who is not doing that primarily—not people who have other jobs. He walked from the bed to the living room. On the sofa off the fireplace, he sat for half an hour and walked back unaided.' And, if I haven't recorded it or haven't read it, you were wonderful in keeping a fire going in that fireplace all the time. And that was wonderful because when we took him in there, he'd watch the…

S: The flames.

M: The flames and the sparks and the action, the beauty, the everything of the fire. But also, it's a lovely living thing. A fire, to me, a fire in the fireplace is something wonderful.

S: Yes. And Krishnaji enjoyed it so.

M: Yes, he did.

S: And I can remember, when I'd put on a big log, he would say things like, "Oh, lord," always commenting when it was a big log and…

M: Yes. I don't know whether we've recorded on this, but even if we have, I'll repeat it. You, in those days, were sleeping in the living room on the long sofa.

S: Yes, that's right.

M: And I think you and I shared my bathroom.

S: Yes, I think so. But then when Kathy came, after the Linkses had left, because they were staying in the upstairs guest flat, Kathy moved there, and then I moved there; so I left your bathroom.

M: But during this early part, you…

S: I slept on that couch there.

M: …slept on the couch. And I knew from sleeping on the couch myself, when Krishnaji and Alain came at first to Malibu, I didn't have a guest room. I later built one. So I slept on the long couch.

S: It's very comfortable.

M: It's very comfortable, and I know just how to put a sheet on it. You drape it over the back and then over the seat [S chuckles] and a pillow and then blankets.

S: It's very comfortable. And I think you could get about three people lengthwise on that couch.

M: [chuckles] Yes, it's twelve feet long. [S chuckles.] I know exactly because I had it made to fit the space in the Malibu house, in front of the long window at the end of the room.

S: Yes. Right.

M: So I know.

S: Let me go back and just comment also on this meeting that Krishnaji wanted and which was recorded. All the things that I recorded were things he asked to be recorded. I never recorded anything that he didn't ask to be recorded. But this was his putting his final foot down on the publications matters. And on everything else as well. And to me—just as an aside, if you want to look at what Krishnaji wanted with copyright and things, it's there.

M: Yes. He was telling them.

S: He was telling everybody.

M: And all the people involved were there.

S: Yes. So he was really…and I'm glad that also he said that as long as the body lives, he is still the teacher. And in my notes, it says, "just like on the platform." Because of the many idiocies of what people later said of…

M: Yes. Well, he must have known that…

S: He must've known that people would say that he was no longer the teacher when he said certain things.

M: …some people would say that. People like Asit or something.

S: Yes. And Pupul, too.

M: Pupul, too. Yes.

S: Because, if Krishnaji contradicted her on her wishes for the publications matters, which he did, then obviously he was flawed. [Chuckles.]

M: He wasn't the teacher anymore.

S: He wasn't the teacher anymore. It's…

M: And Asit was the one, I told you yesterday, who said that because he'd had a transfusion that he was no longer the teacher…

S: Yes, and that's just monstrous.

M: February sixth. 'Krishnaji slept through the night but had nine awakenings during the evening. He talked to me in the early morning, "Who are your friends? I want you to be looked after when I'm gone. K has protected you, but he can't when he's gone. I love you and want you to be protected. You must be careful. You must drive as if I was sitting beside you. Who will go to Huntsman with you?"' [S chuckles.] '"Will you and Mary lunch at Fortnum's? I have been your companion. We've done things together. I want you to be looked after. You must go to Paris, the Dordogne, on holiday to Switzerland. You must use the money in the Teacher's Trust, it is yours. I give it to you to use as you choose. Have you enough money? You mustn't go to India anymore. India is bad for you. Go with Scott and his wife to Paris and the Dordogne. I love you, and K loves you. That is why I'm telling you this."' Well, what money there was in the Teacher's Trust, that was money given to him to do with what he wanted. And, of course, he used to only give it to Brockwood or give it to this or give it to somebody else.

S: [chuckles] I know. He never used it on himself.

M: No. So of course I didn't keep it [both chuckle], but, well, anyway. 'His voice was high, and he cried when he said some of these things. I couldn't control a rain in myself. A little later he saw Mary and Joe alone and apparently asked them to look after me. Pupul and Maheshji sat in the living room, she waiting to see Krishnaji. But after his bath, he wanted me to clean his hair with a hot washrag, dry it, massage in it the Biokosma lotion'—that's his hair tonic. I've got some in the closet there; it's Swiss—'which he rubbed in himself. He is caring for his hair as he always has, but he said, "I'm becoming a zombie, having to let people do all these things for me."' I remember how I washed his hair. He had a hospital bed, and so I could stand behind it, and I figured out that with a big black plastic bag I could have water and not wet anything. I forget just how I did it, but it worked.

S: Yes.

M: 'Pupul had gone when all this was done. I am sitting by his bedside. It is around noon, and he sleeps. Earlier he spoke of walking such a short time ago in Madras. 'I like to see air,' he said. I asked or said that perhaps one of these days we might be able to drive to the beach in the car early in the morning. He said, "I have been watching the dawn, a new day beginning. It is good to watch the dawn." Around 2 p.m. he said to Scott, "Mary and I have been companions, and when I am not here, I charge you—do you understand what that means?—to look after her, you and your wife."'

S: That he was charging me to look after you, yes. Which, I have to add, I haven't done at all. It's always you who looks after me. [M chuckles.] So I have failed totally in my—

M: Interruption. This is totally untrue.

S: [chuckles] Yes, it is true.

M: 'Later, lying on his side, looking out at the sunlight and wind in the trees, he said, "What a beautiful day." The large eyes seemed all-seeing as always for a few minutes then folded, with the long dark lashes covering them."' He had extraordinary eyelashes, and I go on about it because I once asked him, "Krishnaji, don't you need dark glasses?" And he said "No." He said, "I can't wear them because my eyelashes are too long." [Chuckles.]

S: Yes. Yes, he had the most extraordinarily beautiful eyelashes.

M: Yes, and he always said they're wasted on him. They should be on a woman.

S: Yes, yes. They were beautiful.

M: Yes. [Both chuckle.] 'At 3 p.m. Mary and Joe have just come to say goodbye.' I was writing while sitting with him. 'They fly back to London tonight. Krishnaji's nephew, Narayan's brother, Krishna'—that's the name of Narayan's brother—'came to see him briefly. Then around 6 p.m., unexpectedly, Gary Deutsch came soon after Krishnaji had wanted to walk to the living room but had been too weak, so we took him on that wheelchair. He sat by the fire in the living room for about forty-five minutes. Gary found him weaker and ordered full Surex for sleep instead of a half-dose. He may try an internal catheter on Saturday.' I don't seem to have written it here, but when Mary and Joe said goodbye and went to the car and I went with them to wave them goodbye—when I came back, Krishnaji wanted to know what kind of a car it was.

S: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. Always. He had me running out several times to find out what kind of a car [chuckles] people were coming and going in.

M: Yes. Cars were important.

S: Exactly. Also, just small additions to the things that you've written there. Krishnaji's, I guess, nephew…

M: Yes, he was a nephew.

S: Well, Krishnaji's shoes fit him, which is quite remarkable, because Krishnaji had unusually small and thin feet.

M: Yes, I'm wearing one shoe now.

S: Yes. So Krishnaji gave him several pairs of his bespoke shoes.

M: Yes. That's true, I'd forgotten that. He was giving away—everything.

S: Yes, he was giving away everything. Also, one should say that when Krishnaji had so come to like Gary Deutsch, that when he knew that Mary Lutyens was coming to visit—this was before Kathy had made plans to visit—he wanted to give Gary Deutsch the Naviquartz that was at Brockwood.

M: Mm, hm. Yes.

S: So he had Kathy bring it to Mary so that Mary could bring it.

M: Oh, so Mary could bring it.

S: Yes, because we didn't know, at that time, that there was going to be this last-minute crisis about the center—Kathy hadn't planned to come.

M: Yes. Oh, that's right. I'd forgotten. I remember it now, yes. And Gary was sort of embarrassed or…not embarrassed…

S: Gary said that as a doctor he can't accept any gifts. But he said that if it's from one friend to another, he could—which is exactly how Krishnaji had wanted it.

M: Of course. He really gave away almost everything. And the clothes that he left I've given away since. The only thing I kept, of course, was his steel watch and the chain, and I kept that by his bed for a long time, where it always sat when he wasn't carrying it.

S: Yes, I know.

M: Until we built the reading room in the new archives, and you've seen…

S: Yes, it's very nicely displayed.

M: Yes. I don't think people notice it.

S: I don't know how they could not.

M: But every time I go in the room, I—

S: Every time I immediately see it, yes.

M: Wendy asked, "Should we wind it, should we do these things?" and I said, "No." I've wound it always, but I've never wanted it handled by other people. And I think it…

S: Yes. Yes. Quite right. Quite right.

M: So there it is.

S: Yes. One other thing that is in my notes is that when Krishnaji [chuckles] and I were watching the fire in the fireplace, I noticed that I would tend to watch the big dancing flames, but Krishnaji would always call my attention to a little tiny flame. Something that was just beginning—maybe it wouldn't make it, maybe it would grow. But he would watch these little flames—he was always calling my attention to those: "Do you see that one…?" and then he would watch it grow or not.

M: Yes, yes. Whenever he was anywhere, really, he would see encyclopedically. [Chuckles.] There's probably no such word, but he would notice, be aware of everything.

S: Yes, and the most extraordinarily small things.

M: February seventh. 'Krishnaji slept with a full Surex pill and only three awakenings in the night. He watched the light on the hills. He said, "A fresh new morning. I looked for the old brain."'

'Then I said, "Did you find it?"'

'He replied, "Only a little."'

'Me: "Did meditation come in the night?"'

'He shook his head. "The sleep was too deep," he said. Later he said, "You have been very sweet to me. You are the only person very close to me. You must be with me till the very last, till they put the body in the incinerator, with me till the end of my life." His voice was weak. Asit, Dr. Krishna, Jane, and Dorothy are leaving today. They came to say goodbye. Krishnaji has begun to have pain. Morphine relieved it. He spoke on the cassette to Scott and me about the energy and intelligence that has gone through the body for seventy years.' That was that day. 'He was too weak to get up in the afternoon.'

The eighth. 'Krishnaji at 4:30 a.m. told me I must walk, so I went around the block at 6:30 a.m. with Erna. Dr. Deutsch came to see Krishnaji, who talked to him at some length, "as a friend, not a doctor." Higher alimentation with a pump machine was started. Krishnaji saw Sarjit Siddoo briefly, Pupul, and Radhika. Pupul is not leaving tomorrow but is moving to Grohe's. Krishnaji woke up five times in the night. Scott and I both slept on cushions by Krishnaji's bed at Krishnaji's request.' I couldn't write anything more in the big diary until February twelfth.

S: Just to say, also, Krishnaji wanted everybody to leave. He told everybody to go.

M: Yes, I know, he told them to go.

S: And he was so very disappointed that Pupul wasn't leaving.

M: I know.

S: One should say all that.

M: Yes, she again wouldn't do what he wanted.

S: She, yes…

M: February ninth. 'Krishnaji saw briefly Mary Cadogan, then Pupul, Radhika, and Maheshji. Radhika later left to see her daughter, Sunanda. Gary Deutsch came around lunchtime. He gave Krishnaji a more permanent catheter, and Krishnaji then wanted to go in the living room, so we brought him in that little contraption, his wheelchair. We sat by the fire all afternoon till it was dark. Mary Links telephoned from London earlier and I spoke to my brother in New York.'

The tenth. 'Krishnaji slept better with the catheter. He sent me on an early morning walk. Pupul, now staying at the Grohes', came with Maheshji. Krishnaji was in the living room on the sofa. She stayed briefly. Krishnaji was able to stand and to get in and out of the wheelchair. He spent the whole day in the living room. At 10 p.m. he had pain and morphine.'

The eleventh. 'Krishnaji slept but restlessly. After a bath, I washed his hair in bed…' That's the time I washed his hair.

S: No, you did it several times.

M: I did?

S: Yes.

M: '…then he wanted to go into the living room, where he stayed all day. Pupul and the Grohes came by briefly. Also Maheshji. Lailee telephoned. I rang Vanda. Dr. Deutsch came in the afternoon and stayed a long time and took blood samples. Krishnaji had only one morphine in the night at 7 p.m.'

S: Just to say also on this: When Magda and Grohe came, Magda went over to say something to him, and when he responded, he was a bit weepy.

M: Yes.

S: And he turned to me afterwards and said that people have too much emotion and it's not good for his body. So the impact of other people's emotions was something he felt deeply, and he didn't have the strength to withstand it anymore, and so he would break down and cry.

M: Well, I think I told you the other day when we were doing this that he felt the two people who were under the pepper tree—one was Tara Singh and the other was Priscilla Thierry. Not together but separately. Krishnaji asked me to ask them to leave. And when I finally went out, Priscilla was crying, and he felt that presence.

S: Yes. Yes. Yes, he couldn't have seen them from there.

M: She was very shy—she still is. She is living somewhere in a home here, and she was very withdrawn. I used to run into her in the post office, and she always would sort of start for fear I'd say something. I mean, I would say good morning to her, but that's all. But I felt she didn't want human contact. She was a very nice woman, but…

February twelfth. 'Last night Krishnaji had pain. At 7 p.m. he took morphine, which quieted it, and he slept the rest of the night. The nurse, Patrick Linville, said he was amazed at Krishnaji's strength in being able to stand for moments. This morning Krishnaji was clear, maybe because of no Surex sleeping pill. He asked me to file his nails. He did his teeth and face. A new nurse came at 7 a.m. but appeared incompetent and gave Krishnaji a poor bath. He wanted to be in the living room again, so Scott, Parchure, and I moved him in there, but within minutes his stomach bothered him and he had to come back to bed. He vomited some blood, which Parchure thinks indicates a hemorrhage. His fever went to 103, but Tylenol brought it down. By phone, Deutsch ordered a resumption of Rocephin, the antibiotic, but because the nurse got the order relayed by Scott, she didn't give it until the night nurse arrived later. Krishnaji was too weak to see Pupul when she came from Grohe's with Maheshji. Later Krishnaji told me to tell her, "Don't wait around, he has gone for a walk in the hills." Erna told it to her.

S: [chuckles] I remember this, as I was there when he said this, and I remember thinking that it was quite dismissive of Pupul, which was unusual for him to be so…

M: Well, it could have a double meaning.

S: Yes, this is just it; this is what I want to mention because this message was just relayed, and she took that forever and repeated it, and repeated it until the end of her life, as some great mystical message that he was giving her.

M: That's right.

S: And he was just telling her, look, I can't see you, I'm…

M: Yes. [S chuckles.] She, of course, interpreted it her way; but it was a rather poetic way of dismissing her, I thought.

S: Yes, it was poetic, but it was still dismissing her.

M: 'Gary Deutsch came in the afternoon. He, Scott, Parchure, and I talked of what should be done. Krishnaji had said half an hour earlier to me, "I want to go. I want to die." And when I could only say, "I know, I know," he said, "You say you know, but you don't do anything."' I didn't know what he meant by that.

S: I know, because he said things like that to me, and I asked him if he wanted help to go more quickly, and he thought for a while and said, no, that that wasn't right.

M: It wasn't right, yes.

S: It wasn't right. And then he asked Gary Deutsch, I think perhaps at this meeting, what would happen if all the tubes were removed. And Gary Deutsch said, well, you'll quickly become dehydrated and then different organs will fail. But even that Krishnaji thought was too violent. He didn't want anything done to prolong his life while at the same time he didn't feel it was right to hasten the end.

M: Yes. '"You don't do anything,"' and then I write, 'If he gets antibiotics now, it only prolongs his time a little until the next fall in the state of his body. I suggested Deutsch talk to Krishnaji, who was quite lucid, and ask him his wishes. This he did.' Well, that's what you just talked of. 'Deutsch came back to Scott, Parchure, and me and said that Krishnaji had understood. He doesn't want to go on as he is and said, "Do what you think is right." So what seems right to all four of us was not to bring all extreme ways of medicine to prolong his life, with death inevitable, but to continue the IV feeding, relieve pain, fever, nausea; then the natural death that Krishnaji had spoken of earlier will come about on its own time. Krishnaji seemed satisfied when told this. I sat holding his hand a long time, and he had me press my hand on his stomach in the evening.' He felt it relieved the pain somehow.

S: Yes. In my records, I record it as the first time he also asked me to do that, as he had on the airplane.

M: 'He asked what was going on in the world, "What is the gossip?" and we turned on the evening news with Dan Rather. Sharansky has been freed by the Soviets and was tumultuously welcomed in Israel. “The Soviets are cruel people,” said Krishnaji. Deutsch had said the results of the blood tests yesterday do not show much difference from when he was in the hospital. I told Pupul this on the telephone, as talk of a hemorrhage in the morning had alarmed her. She said she has decided to leave on Sunday. Asit and Radhika, who are returning here, will do the same. I telephoned Mar de Manziarly, and she entirely understood why it would tire Krishnaji if she came to say goodbye. Those who most care about him seem to feel this way. It is the egotists, Blackburn, for example, who push to see him. A good nurse, Bea Epping, was on in the evening. Krishnaji had morphine.’

The thirteenth. ‘There were two-and-a-half inches of rain in the night, and it began again in the afternoon. Krishnaji had a second morphine around 11 p.m. last night, but it failed to help with sleep, and the nurse gave him Surex at 1 a.m. I got up soon after 3:30 a.m., and when he was awake, I did his teeth cleaning. The male nurse, Patrick, Scott, Dr. Parchure, and I carried him in a hammock of sheets to the couch in front of the living room fire. Scott had turned the center sofa so that Krishnaji could lie stretched out facing the firelight. Maheshji, Pupul, and the Grohes came briefly to see him. Krishnaji told Pupul he was sorry he didn’t see her yesterday. “He was off in the hills all day.” He looked all beauty lying there. He had me read to him from the Paul Theroux’s story.’ That book’s in there. I forget what the name of it is.

S: First Council, or something like that.

M: ‘He had me read him Paul Theroux’s story but then switched to the newspapers. He had a fit of shivering, then fever. Tylenol broke the fever, and then there was sweat. We carried him back to bed. Parchure massaged him, and he fell asleep. In the living room he had suddenly said, “Do you remember the place in Holland? The ducks. How each day there were fewer of the baby ducks.”’ That was when we were first in Holland and we used to walk in a kind of a park that was privately owned and had streams running through it. We used to go for the afternoon walks there, and there was a mother duck with little ducklings behind her. That’s what he was remembering. ‘He was thinking of the place where we used to walk near the thatched farmhouse in 1967. A very happy time. Later he said, “I am very fortunate.” Yesterday he asked me obliquely—the nurse was present—“I suppose you haven’t heard from that person.” Meaning Rajagopal. We never heard one word from those people.

S: No, of course not.

M: Really ugly.

S: Yes. I just wanted to add a small thing here; that the reason that we carried Krishnaji to the living room was that it became too tiring for him to get in and out of that ridiculous not-quite-wheelchair thing. It was also tiring for him to sit upright on the couch as he had. So that’s why I’d moved the couch sideways, so that he could lie on it and look over his feet at the fire.

M: That's right.

S: And then we came up with the idea of making a hammock out of his bottom sheet.

M: We just took the bottom sheet.

S: Yes. And he was delighted with that, and he was also terribly amused at suddenly seeing this path through the house that he had known so well but, of course, never seen it from the ceiling point of view. [Laughs.] I can well remember his delight and his being amused by being carried like that, almost as if it was an amusement ride. And, of course, he weighed almost nothing then.

M: Yes. February fourteenth: 'Krishnaji slept without pill or morphine till 2 a.m., but at 4 a.m. the pain returned. A new nurse, Peggy Levine, gave morphine. In the ten minutes it took to work, he had me press on his stomach. "Too good to be true. Sorrow, I thought I'd lost you." The high voice groaned with pain and the low voice came in, "Don't make such a fuss about it." At 4:20 a.m., he said the pain was gone and I must go to sleep another two hours.' At one point, when he had me press on his stomach, I must have said, "Can't you heal yourself?" you know, the pain. And he said, "Put your hand, and I'll put my hand on your hand," so mine gave the pressure, and his hand would do whatever it did. Of course, it didn't work for the pain. 'We took him again in a hammock of sheets to the living room, where the fire burned beautifully and outside the heavy rain fell. We were having a big, big storm, and I was afraid we would lose electricity, so I have rented generators and rigged them so that if there was a power failure he would still have light and warmth in his room, and the infusion pump to his vein will carry on. Scott and someone else worked at this. We had carried him back to bed when Gary Deutsch came in to see how he was and to bring him a bunch of Clint Eastwood films he had taped. He ordered light morphine, one milligram, to be given routinely while Krishnaji is in pain because Krishnaji admitted to me this morning that the pain doesn't come all at once but builds up before he lets us know it is there. If this amount is insufficient and pain occurs, more can be given. He also changed the sleeping prescription from Surex to Restoril. This Krishnaji took at 8 p.m.' See, he never would complain.

S: I know. I have that in my notes, too—he would wait until it got really bad before saying anything.

M: Yes.

S: But just to note here also that Krishnaji thought it was a wonderful discovery when he realized that Dr. Deutsch was a Clint Eastwood fan as well. [Chuckles.] Krishnaji and I would watch the movies; you would only come in, look, and then walk out again.

M: Yes.

S: And something else. It was Vivian Moody who had gone out and found the two generators.

M: Did she? I was wondering where I got them.

S: Yes, it was Vivian Moody, and they were hard to find because other people were—

M: Were doing the same thing.

S: —everyone was wanting the same thing because this was a terrible storm. And it was Ivan Berkowitz who helped me hook them up.

M: Oh. Did he?

S: Yes. We took one line down to the basement to run the heating system.

M: The heat, yes. In the old part of the house, one must explain, there's a basement.

S: Right.

M: And there's a regular hot-air furnace.

S: Yes. So we hooked the first one up to run that. And then for the second one I brought a line in through the window to run Krishnaji's equipment and his electric blanket…

M: Yes.

S: …because we couldn't have the pumps and all the monitoring equipment go off, and Krishnaji needed the electric blanket to stay warm.

M: Yes.

S: But it was Ivan who helped.

M: It's good to be clear about these details. 'I got the nurses in and out of Ojai.' I called the police, as they were stopping people driving in or out because of mudslides, and I called the police and said that there is someone who is seriously ill, and we need the nurses to get through. Will you let them get through? And they did. 'Deutsch came and talked alone with Krishnaji about his illness.'

The fifteenth. 'Krishnaji slept through the stormy night. When the 11 o'clock nursing shift change approached, the highway control had made the roads impossible. I talked to a woman there who was more resourceful, checked with the men in the field, and worked out a route. The nurse got here by 11:30, and Patrick Linville, the male nurse on duty, was able to get out. Today the rain has lessened. The roads are clear, and there have been no bad mudslides. Pupul and Asit came in the morning while Gary Deutsch was here. Deutsch came with slides of Yosemite for Krishnaji to look at. For a while he did but fell asleep, and Deutsch left, not before talking to Pupul, Asit, Erna, and Theo. Pupul leaves tomorrow morning. She saw Krishnaji in the afternoon, and so did Radhika, who had arrived this morning from Philadelphia. She, too, leaves tomorrow for India. Asit asked me if it was all right for him to stay for as long as Krishnaji lives. He will stay at Grohe's. He said he felt he could no more leave than if his father were dying. I said of course; he should stay if he wished and is welcome to come to the house whenever he likes. Also he can use the gray car. All this goes on, and I keep moving, but there are times when I want to cry until my eyes are washed away and my heart dissolved. Krishnaji asked me to wash his hair; clean it with a hot towel—a hot washrag, brush it, and in the evening massage almond oil into his scalp. This evening I stood doing this, behind the top of the bed, holding in my hand, this warm, beautiful…' [Pause.] I'm sorry, wait a minute.

S: Yes, Mary. It's alright.

M: Turn it off.

<Tape cuts out and resumes>

M: 'In the evening I stood behind the top of his bed, holding in my hands this warm and beautiful head that holds the brain that is the light of this world. It is there, alive, marvelous, beyond any knowing. The source of his teaching is an endless giving. My hands, when he said the massage was enough, held the scent of his aliveness, a perfume. Have I said in these scribblings that for a while, the last time Deutsch was here, that they were talking alone and when we came in, Krishnaji was telling him about knowledge, intelligence, compassion, and what love is. His voice was rather high, and he paused with the effort. But he kept on. It was his last teaching.' That's the end of the big book.

S: Hm.

M: Yes. And as Dr. Deutsch had said, he felt he was Krishnaji's last pupil.

S: Yes.

M: He was.

S: I remember that. I made notes of it. I was in the room when Krishnaji had this talk with Deutsch. It was the most brilliant encapsulation of Krishnaji's teachings. It was remarkable—absolutely astonishing. It was a condensed version of the teachings, with nothing left out. I remember being astonished and thinking, if only I had recorded this. But Krishnaji didn't ask for it to be recorded, so—but it was remarkable. The clarity and the depth at that late moment. One other thing that I would add, before Asit asked you if he could stay, Pupul had begged you to allow him to stay because she had said people in India wouldn't understand if an Indian wasn't there.

M: Yes, I remember that.

S: But, of course, Maheshji was going to be here, and Parchure. But somehow Parchure and Mahesh, who was the secretary of the Foundation, didn't count as much as…

M: Pupul's nephew.

S: Yes, Pupul's relatives. [Chuckles.] Oosh.

M: 'Krishnaji didn't want to go to the living room. He remained in bed and watched part of an Eastwood movie brought by Gary Deutsch but was tired and stopped it and slept by 8.'

February sixteenth: 'Krishnaji woke at 3 a.m. with pain in the abdomen. Morphine was changed to a drip. In spite of the morphine, Krishnaji was clear. Pupul came to say goodbye before lunch and left after for a flight to London. Radhika had left earlier in the morning. Deutsch thought there was a hemorrhage in the liver that was causing the pain. Restoril for sleep was taken at 7 p.m. The pain lessened, and Krishnaji slept, but it became a coma. Deutsch came at 11 p.m. and Krishnaji's breathing…he was breathing only three times a minute. That's the end of the…I didn't write anymore about that.

S: Yes, Mary, yes.

Editor's Note: While there have been no SF notes during the time that Mary was with Krishnaji, it has to be acknowledged that Mary was by now depleted, exhausted, and unable to write her daily journals fully as she always had. The ending of this extraordinary life also merits whatever attention we can pay to it. Therefore, I am including my notes.

SF Notes #10

That evening, at about 7:15, he was given a sleeping pill to go to sleep. He wanted to hold off on the sleeping pill and not take it too early, although we had encouraged him to take it early so that he could sleep, because he had had a terrible day of pain and he was absolutely exhausted by it. I am almost sure he knew that he would die that evening.

When he washed down his sleeping pill with a small glass of water that Patrick, the French nurse, helped him with it, Krishnaji made a joke to the nurse and said, "Ce n'est pas de Bordeaux." And after taking it, he said to me, "Now what am I supposed to do?" and I replied, "Well, just sleep, sir." And he said, "All right, if that is what you all want." It was most peculiar the way he said that, and I felt something terribly ominous. He then turned to me and said, "I have complete security on you, no, in you." And I said, "Please, sir, just go to sleep, you're tired." I didn't think anything of it; I didn't think it would be the last thing that he would say to me.

Just then, Mary came in, and I stepped a short distance away, and he said something like, "No, I have never had any security," or something like that. He was changing the use of the word. He had said goodbye to me, and he had said it so beautifully, and it was so moving. I don't take it in any conceited way, I hope, but he had reached up and taken hold of my arm, and I can't put it into words, but it was sweet and kind beyond anything I feel was really merited.

To Mary he was saying, "Goodnight, darling, goodnight, go to sleep, go to bed, goodnight," and he repeated it many times, and he said it for a long time, and it was absolutely beyond any doubt clear that he was not saying goodnight but goodbye. He shooed us all out of the room as he began to drop off, telling us to go to bed, but it was far too early and there was too much of a sense in the room of something momentous occurring. We stood just in the doorway for a few minutes as he fell asleep, but his eyelids only half-closed, and his eyes rolled back, showing the whites.

I came back into the room and sat on the floor against the wall to Krishnaji's right. Mary came in and sat next to me. We had our backs to the cupboard doors to the right and left of his bathroom door, and we waited. After about five or perhaps ten minutes, Mary got up and sat next to his bed by his left side. Five minutes after that, I got up and sat by his right side. It didn't wake him. It was clear that this was no ordinary sleep and that it was very deep. Dr. Parchure was also present, but in my memory he wandered in and out of the room and eventually sat for a long period of time in Krishnaji's sitting room. He, more than Mary or I, was aware of what was occurring.

Soon after Mary and I got by his side, with his eyes still rolled back and his eyelids half-open, he said softly, "O, quelqu'un." It was partly a plea, as though he was asking for, "Oh, please, someone"; it was partly a remark, as though he was saying, "Oh, someone is there." It wasn't urgent or startled, but it had a very peculiar quality to it. Perhaps he was calling to the French male nurse; perhaps he just had French on his mind because we had so often spoken French over the last several weeks. I have no idea what it meant or why he said that.

From then on, Krishnaji's breath and his heart rate gradually slowed. Mary remained by his left side, holding his hand for most of the rest of the evening. I didn't move from his right side and held his right hand.

At about 11:00 p.m., Dr. Deutsch arrived. Together, Dr. Parchure, Dr. Deutsch, the male nurse, Mary, and I watched and waited.

There was a very clear sense that Krishnaji was present, and even when I first picked up his hand shortly after sitting by his side and when it didn't wake him and it was clear that he was in a coma, he was there, and that presence was not unhappy. In fact, at one point, I had a sense there was laughing, as Krishnaji laughed. But there was nothing on his face, of course, to indicate that—and it could easily be my imagination. But it's what I sensed at the time.

At some time around 11:30 p.m., Mary had gone into the kitchen with the male nurse. He had extended his shift in order to be with Krishnaji at this difficult time, but as he had had nothing to eat for eight hours, Mary took him into the kitchen to help him get some food. While Mary was there, I thought Krishnaji was going and sent Dr. Parchure quickly to get her. Somehow she didn't understand the urgency, and she didn't come, so I asked Dr. Deutsch to get her because I didn't want to leave Krishnaji alone, and I knew that she would want to be there when he died. Dr. Parchure remained in the kitchen with the male nurse until after Krishnaji died. He was keeping the male nurse away from Krishnaji's bedside, as he knew what a private occasion Krishnaji wanted his death to be. It was typical of the thoughtfulness and the selflessness that Dr. Parchure had throughout.

Krishnaji was breathing three times a minute and his heart rate was very low. In my confusion I kept mis-multiplying the pulse beats that I was feeling, which were so faint anyway, and I kept on getting it wrong. Dr. Deutsch could not get over how strong Krishnaji's body was. Normally what happens when the body slows down in a coma is that the heart rate goes up and the blood pressure goes awry in order to make up for the lack of oxygen. But Krishnaji's pulse stayed steady, and his blood pressure stayed steady. The doctor's comment at the time was that Krishnaji had the heart of a racehorse.

At around 11:40 p.m., I suddenly realized that Krishnaji was gone. The heart was still going, the body was still breathing, but there was the most dramatic difference in the overall presence. I can't explain it other than saying that Krishnaji simply was no longer there, and what was there was like a machine or like an animal that was pushing, driving, but that had lost contact with something greater than the mechanical or the animal. It was just the purely physical that was going on. I don't think I will ever stop seeing that face. It was drawn and ashen gray, and it was driving hard three breaths a minute, then eventually two, then eventually one, and the pulse became slower and fainter.

At 12:10 a.m. I couldn't feel his pulse anymore, and I put on the doctor's stethoscope and listened to his heart, and there was nothing. Still, the body took another breath, and I said to the doctor, "What's that?" and he explained that it was just a reflex and that it often happened. Mary asked me what time he had died. I said it was 12:10 a.m. Mary had a large, luminous clock behind her back, so I am quite sure of all these times. She told me that he had been born at 12:30 a.m. The body took one final breath, and I looked up at the clock, and it was 12:12 a.m.

M: The seventeenth: 'With Dr. Deutsch, Scott, and I beside him, Krishnaji's heart stopped beating at ten minutes past midnight. Scott and I and Dr. Parchure bathed his body, wrapped it in a cadi silk and an Italian embroidered linen sheet. He lay on his own bed which was in his sitting room till 8 a.m. when I rode beside him to the crematorium in Ventura.'

S: Yes. Thank you for all this. [Sighs.] I'm sorry today has been so difficult, Mary.

Mary Zimbalist’s Unfinished Book

Section One

PREFACE

Krishnamurti asked Mary Zimbalist to write a book about what it was like to be with him, a task for which Mary was uniquely suited. Mary started to write this book in 1986, soon after Krishnaji's death, and she worked diligently at it until about 2007, twenty-one years. In 1994, after eight years of writing, it was clear that Mary was struggling to convey all that she wanted, and she was worried that she would never finish her book and would therefore fail to meet Krishnaji's request. Consequently, in 1994, thinking it would help her, I suggested that she and I discuss our memories of Krishnaji, and I would record these discussions on audiotape. She liked this approach to conveying her memories, and to my surprise, she began to read out to me the daily diaries she had kept as a basis for our discussions. The diaries had always been kept strictly private. Our discussions continued almost until she died in 2008, and their transcription form her memoirs that most of you have already read.

Mary wanted her book to be titled In the Presence of Krishnamurti, so I added the subtitle The Memoirs of Mary Zimbalist for her memoirs. It seems only correct to use the title she created for her book as well, so we are calling her book In the Presence of Krishnamurti: Mary's Unfinished Book, and hope that it doesn't cause too much confusion.

Mary stopped her writing partly because she felt our recorded conversations made her continued attempts to write a book unnecessary, but also because she was by then ninety-two years old, and writing was a strain; however, it is a pity she never finished her book. Our conversations are indeed more detailed than her book—what Mary called the first two chapters of her book cover seven pages, and the same material in her memoirs requires thirty-seven pages. But the differences between Mary's memoirs and her book is not just a matter of details, and elucidating the differences may explain why I believe both Mary's memoirs and her unfinished book work well together to fulfill Krishnaji's intention: conveying what it was like to be with him.

Mary's Unfinished Book is clearly intended for a general audience of people who had met neither her nor Krishnaji. Mary's memoirs, on the other hand, are her discussions with a close friend who was familiar with most of the people in the story. Consequently, there is an intimacy in the memoirs that is not present in her book. But the greater objectivity carries some advantages.

Mary's Unfinished Book also does not have the intrusion of an interviewer; it is really just Mary talking to her audience, and that is valuable. My participation increased as Mary's memoirs progressed, as Mary wanted me to contribute to our discussions of events at which I was present; she was adamant that our discussions for her memoirs were collaborative in nature. Mary's Unfinished Book, however, is blessedly free of any voice other than Mary's, and so her narration has a flow and continuity that a collaboration doesn't allow.

Another difference between Mary's memoirs and her book is that, in our discussions, Mary would frequently say things and then add that what she had just said must be edited out of any public version of these discussions until people had died and could therefore no longer be hurt.

These sections were edited out of her memoirs, but this gives us a clue to a difference in purposes that Mary saw between her memoirs and the book she was writing: The memoirs are the full historic record, the complete "warts and all" presentation of what Mary witnessed. When all of us in the story are dead and gone (which is not so far away) and our feelings can no longer be hurt and our self-images no longer need protecting, then the full account of Krishnaji's last twenty years will be there for the world. Mary's Unfinished Book was not for that.

There is also the inevitable difference between what is spoken and what is carefully written. Mary's writing is very beautiful and very evocative, and in her writing she takes the time to describe events, places, and things. Unfortunately, all we have is Mary's first rough draft, and we can be certain that had she had the energy and time to finish and polish this work it would be even more beautiful and evocative. Nevertheless, it seems only right that people who are interested are able to see the result of Mary's efforts, unfinished and unpolished though it is.

Of course, readers already familiar with Mary's memoirs will recognize the people, places, and events Mary describes in her unfinished book, albeit in abbreviated form, but this will probably suit many people who didn't want all the details of her memoirs. I'm also sure that as her unfinished book is just Mary's own sweet voice, many readers will feel that they come to know her better, and that is wonderful in itself.

This is something I never planned to write. Then, one day, in the spring of 1972, Krishnamurti asked me to put down notes each day on "what it was like to be with the man from Madanapalle,"[1] and later, through the years, he repeated this instruction. I had kept, on and off since first going to India in 1965, a record of events and things he had said, and this I continued as long as he lived. Afterward, for a time, to write about him seemed an overwhelming task; the extraordinary privilege I had in being with him did not seem mine to use in any way, and I was reluctant to bring myself into any account, but slowly I began to see that the same privilege was not mine to keep; that the history of lives or events is a mosaic of the testimony of witnesses or participants in happenings that have filtered down through time. And there is also the compelling fact that he asked me to write.

A further clue came on a later day when a guest at the lunch table asked me how I had met Krishnamurti.I described how it had come about, and Krishnaji, sitting across the table but not part of the conversation, suddenly said: "That's where you start your story." So I do.

It begins in 1944 in Los Angeles. I had stopped by to see a doctor, who was also a friend, and with whom I had often discussed psychiatry, and psychoanalysis in particular. That was not his field, but it interested him, and, as I had just finished a long analysis, we used to talk of things of the mind. On this particular day he had just returned from visiting a colleague, also a doctor, who, on finding that he had serious heart trouble, had startled his family and friends by going to California "to learn how to die from a man named Krishnamurti." Wondering what this was about, my friend had driven up to Ojai and, while seeing his friend, had met Krishnamurti. "He is the most extraordinary man and knows more about the human mind than anyone living or dead," my friend reported.

I must have read something about him, for the name Krishnamurti was known to me, but it meant little more than a story of a boy in India, discovered and brought up to be a sort of messiah, but who later renounced it all. Shortly after this meeting with the doctor, by a coincidence I heard that this same Krishnamurti was to give a series of public talks in Ojai, and out of sheer curiosity I went. The meeting was in May and held outdoors in a grove of oak trees. A fairly large audience sat on the grass. Presently appeared a man who seemed to move quietly, simply, with grace, great dignity, and silence about him. He stood facing the crowd, looking at the faces for a few moments, and then began to speak. He held no notes. His accent was English but with a cadence of his own. His words reached deeply into one's attention. I now remember little of that long-ago talk except his saying that self-knowledge is the beginning of wisdom.

I bought some printed talks, took them home, and spent the next few days arguing with them. My psychoanalytic conditioning was challenged, but fortunately it soon dawned on me that if I wanted to understand what Krishnamurti was saying I should go to listen to him. At the weekend I went again to Ojai, listened, and came away with what has been ever since the central interest of my life.

I learned that Krishnamurti sometimes saw people in private interviews, and after writing to request one, I was given an appointment. The address was a house in Hollywood, and when I rang the bell, the door was opened by Krishnamurti himself. I gave him my name, and he nodded with a slight bow and grave courtesy. He sat opposite me on a straight chair and waited for me to speak. I do not remember now how long I was there, but his quality of total attention made it possible for me to lay open my life. His perception went further, deeper, without needing to ask many questions, and when I left I felt as if my head had been emptied and put back in proper order.

Krishnamurti's teaching came at a moment in my life when psychoanalysis had untangled many things, but now I felt a need to understand wider and more fundamental questions: What is human life? What lies beyond one's individual perception? Is there something real that is not a projection of my own or someone else's projection? Growing up, I had been drawn by what seemed religious feelings but was unable to accept the beliefs of formal organized religion as set forth in the church. I think what drew me initially to Krishnamurti's teaching was his sweeping iconoclasm. It seemed he totally pulled the rug out from under all the comfortable certainties on which we live and depend. This seemed marvelous and exhilarating.

In the time that followed, I was invited to join a small discussion group to which Krishnamurti occasionally came. Once or twice I sat next to him at dinner at some friends' house but knew him really not at all. He was silent, very shy, and very polite but remote at such times. I continued to attend his talks when I could, but my husband, who had come to some meetings more out of my interest than his own, was very busy in work both in California and abroad, so it was through the published works that I kept contact with Krishnamurti's talks.

Some years later my husband died very suddenly of a heart attack. It was a death for me too, but somewhere in the shock of pain there was something insisting, as if trying to be heard through the finality of death, telling me, showing me that there was a task I must do, a single importance—to see, to understand the reality of something nameless I had sensed in Krishnamurti's teaching. The insistence was curious, as if knocking on a door, brushing past personal emotion.

The conviction of this remained, but I was wary of doing something out of reaction or seeking a refuge. I must come to terms with what I felt and not turn away or look for help. This meant not going crippled to listen to Krishnamurti, but only when I was capable of listening with understanding.

In 1960, after not speaking in Ojai for several years, Krishnamurti returned to give a series of talks at the end of May. Eight talks had been announced, but at the third it was said that there would be only four because of his physical condition. In spite of this, he had agreed to give a limited number of personal interviews, and my own request was one of them. Death was the subject, and he seemed to understand how far I had gone in seeing that grief can be self-pity for one's own deprivation, and that the need to understand death was not only out of personal loss. What ensued was an extraordinary conversation, but the essence of what he told me was that dying must be part of living, that one must die to everything each day. Only then does one live wholly, anew, and fresh each moment.

Krishnamurti did not return to Ojai, so to hear him speak again I went in the summer of 1964 to Saanen, Switzerland. It was for me an intensive time. Krishnamurti gave ten talks, followed by eight daily discussions with the audience that had attended the talks. All these took place in a large Buckminster Fuller geodesic dome of a tent placed in a field along the gray, swift Saanen River. I walked a great deal, immersed in what I was hearing and the beauty of the Alpine summer. One day, a friend, Iris Tree, took me to call at Chalet Tannegg, where I met for the first time Signora Vanda Scaravelli. Krishnamurti, who had known her for many years and stayed at her family's home in Florence, now was her houseguest in Gstaad while he gave his talks in nearby Saanen. I remember her grace that day and quiet eyes.

I was to come to the chalet a few days later after being told that I would have an interview with Krishnamurti. It was for me, again, an intense exploration, untangling and discovering, and at the end, after an hour and a half, he asked if I were leaving after the talks, saying that there would be private discussions for a few people, which I could attend if I could stay on in Gstaad. There were eight of these with about thirty people meeting daily. These discussions were tape-recorded, as were all the public meetings, and when some in the group said how much they would like to review them, I offered to have them transcribed. Word came back to me that Krishnamurti could not give permission for this, that only Mr. Rajagopal could do so. This seemed startling, but I said no more until later, when I returned to California.

I had met Rajagopal some years earlier, as he had been part of the small discussions I had first attended in Los Angeles, and he was also a friend of friends of mine. He had been for many years an associate of Krishnamurti and in charge of the organization called Krishnamurti Writings, Inc., which did all the arrangements for talks, publishing, raising money, and generally looking after business matters. I wrote to him that I had attended the meetings in Switzerland and would very much appreciate being able to listen to the recordings of the discussions in which I took part. At first he told me that it would not be possible, as everyone would want to hear them and he could not allow that. Then, after several telephone conversations, he said that if I picked one of the eight discussions he would run it for me, but I must come on a day when his neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. Vigeveno, would not be in Ojai and I should park my car so that if they returned they would not be able to see it. Also, I must bring any notes I might have made, and I must not reveal to anyone that I had heard the tape. This rather odd arrangement took place in the presence of Rajagopal and his wife Annalisa. Afterward it occurred to me that his curiosity was at work, for although he recognized some of the voices on the tape, he wanted me to identify others.

I had decided that in the following year, 1965, I would follow the whole program of Krishnamurti's talks, starting with the European ones after his return from India. I had enquired of Rajagopal where these would be held, and he said he did not know. For reasons not explained, these public talks seemed kept secret, but eventually I learned they were to commence in London in late April. I went to the first one, which was held in a small hall in Wimbledon. Afterward Krishnamurti stood for a short time outside greeting people he knew. Also there was Alain Naudé, whom I had met the previous summer in Saanen. A talented pianist who had given many recitals in Europe and in South Africa, where he was born, he had been drawn to religious enquiry, and after hearing Krishnamurti in Switzerland he had gone on to India. In January of 1965 he had become Krishnamurti's secretary and would now accompany him on his travels. A few days after that first meeting in Wimbledon, Alain lunched with me, and when I dropped him in Wimbledon, I was invited to lunch the following week.

The house in Wimbledon where Krishnamurti was staying was a temporary rental in the charge of Miss Doris Pratt, who was the secretary of the English office of Krishnamurti Writings. There to help was also Miss Anneke Korndorffer from Holland, who had been part of the work in Holland from the early days in Ommen. I was meeting both of them for the first time. During lunch, Krishnamurti plied me with questions about the United States: What was the present American mind? What was the mood of the country? It was the time of the civil rights struggles, and he was interested in my description of having gone to Alabama to join in Dr. Martin Luther King's march from Selma to the state capital, Montgomery. At the end of the lunch, when I said goodbye, Krishnamurti suggested that it might be nice if the three of us—he, Alain, and I—went to a cinema, and I should choose what to see. I drove back to London, wondering what in the world would be suitable for such a man, but that changed the next day when Alain telephoned to say that Krishnamurti would rather go for a drive in the country. Again it was up to me to decide where, and again I hadn't the least idea, but after a little research, I went to reconnoiter, driving first to Kew Gardens and then to the Royal Horticultural Garden at Wisley, deciding on the latter.

After exchanging the smallest rental car for a better one, I arrived on the following Monday at 3 p.m. Krishnamurti, with Alain, got in the car. "Where are we going ?" he asked expectantly. I mentioned Wisley very tentatively. "Oh, Wisley!" he said happily. Apparently he knew it, and off we went, but not before Miss Pratt told me quite severely that I must have him back by 6 p.m. sharp, as he had an appointment.

Wisley was a success. It was May, with a splendor of flowers, and it seemed to me that Krishnamurti saw every one of them. He walked with the vital stride I was to come to know so well and with a freedom that seemed part of the stretches of growing things and beauty. When we finally came back to the car, he said, “Let’s drive somewhere else.” Luckily I remembered we were in the direction of a place I had been to—Box Hill. So we went there and for a time looked out over southern England before turning back. By now 6:00 was approaching, the traffic was thickening, and I was not entirely used to driving on the left, but with concentration, I got to the Wimbledon house at exactly 6:00. Krishnamurti thanked me most courteously, and I returned to London where, once in my room, the enormity of the responsibility in driving Krishnamurti for the first time shook me so that I had to cancel a dinner engagement.

From London the talks continued in Paris. Soon a telephone call came from Alain saying that Krishnamurti would like to go for another drive in the country. Having learned that he thought highly of Mercedes cars, I hired one, and again the three of us drove to Versailles, where we walked in the forest and did the same at Saint-Germain. A week later, we drove to Chartres and went carefully through the cathedral, where Krishnamurti was visibly moved by its beauty. We lunched at a nearby restaurant and drove to Rambouillet for another forest walk. On these expeditions he seemed entirely relaxed, sometimes a little far away but enjoying himself, observing everything quietly. Alain was a congenial companion, and though at times the conversation was serious, we laughed a lot.

After five Paris talks, it was time for Switzerland. I went alone by train to a small hotel in Gstaad but soon rented an apartment in a building called Les Caprices. Krishnamurti reached Geneva, and Alain phoned me saying it would be nice, since I had a car, if I could drive them up to Gstaad. I lunched with them at the Hôtel du Rhône, and Krishnamurti noticed my studying the menu. I had become a vegetarian only a few days earlier. He asked, “What have you been living on in the hotel?” It had been cheese omelets, and I had begun to wonder if the rest of my life would be an infinity of cheese omelets. “We will teach you what to eat,” said Krishnamurti, rather firmly.

In Gstaad, they were at Chalet Tannegg, rented as in past summers by Signora Scaravelli for Krishnamurti’s use. She was not there but had sent a cook to look after things. It was early June and quiet in Gstaad. The talks would not begin until July. With my car I was able to ferry them up and down the mountain to places for the afternoon walk and more often than not was invited to meals. There was talk of the coming winter in India, and when Krishnamurti learned I was going to be there, he said to Alain, “We must look after Mrs. Zimbalist.” He thought that Alain and I should rent a house in Madras so that we could cook our own meals. It would be healthier, he said.

One morning, I went up to Chalet Tannegg, and there in the driveway was a small, silvery two-seater Mercedes. An old friend of many years, Enrique Biascoechea, of Puerto Rice and a former Theosophist, knowing Krishnamurti’s Mercedes liking, had donated this bright, new one to the Saanen Gathering Committee for his use. Krishnamurti showed it to me in great detail and then took me for a drive to nearby Chateau d’Oex. He wore driving gloves, looked very elegant, was expert at the wheel, and dusted the car carefully on return. From then on, whenever the car went out, he washed it himself afterward, and not only the exterior but the engine too was wiped with great care.

Krishnaji with his Mercedes (Copyright Mary Zimbalist)

Both Mr. Biascoechea and his wife Isabel were staying down by the river in Gstaad. One day, when Krishnamurti was there for lunch, they brought out a photograph of him and his little brother, Nityananda, taken when they were both very young. Krishnamurti kept looking at the picture, absorbed in it. Of himself he asked, "What made that boy that way? What kept him empty?" He spoke of those days: how the boy was vague and dreamy; nothing seemed to leave a mark on him. Why? Later, when I drove him up the hill, I asked him what in the photograph had caught his interest. "If we could know what kept the boy that way, perhaps we could help young people now to be less conditioned," he replied.

It was Krishnamurti's custom to take his daily walk in the afternoon on awakening from a nap and when the sun was less strong. Sometimes we would drive to places along the river, but more often we walked up the hill behind Chalet Tannegg, across the field, and into the woods. On one of these, with several people accompanying him, he dropped back beside me and asked rather shyly, "Did I ever know you in California?" He had, of course, entirely no memory of the first interview years earlier that had been a milestone in my life. This both amused and pleased me. It was entirely fitting.

On July fourth, Signora Scaravelli arrived at Chalet Tannegg, and, as there was no room for Alain, I offered him an extra room at Les Caprices. Around this time, the well-known teacher of yoga, B. K. S. Iyengar, came to Tannegg to oversee Krishnamurti's exercises and also those of Yehudi Menuhin, who had a house in Gstaad. Vanda Scaravelli was an old friend of Iyengar's and very advanced in her own yoga. I began lessons for the first time in my life.

In addition to his public talks, Krishnamurti held a series of discussions with young people. In this Alain had been very instrumental, caring that they should come in contact with Krishnamurti and his teachings. It was a time when tides of young were moving around in search of new understandings and new enthusiasms, and they crowded the tent where Krishnamurti spoke. After ten talks and five daily discussions, the public program was over. Krishnamurti then held some small group discussions, which Professor David Bohm and his wife, Saral, attended. There were six of these, and the days passed with yoga lessons, walks, a drive with Krishnamurti and Naudé to Geneva for dentist visits, and often meals at Chalet Tannegg through Signora Scaravelli's warm hospitality. On September first I left for the United States.

On October twenty-sixth, I flew to Rome, where a friend met me and drove me to my hotel. That afternoon I went to the house on the outskirts of Rome where Krishnamurti and Alain were staying with Signora Scaravelli. We talked. Alain made tea, and at 5:00 about thirty people came for the last of three discussions with this group. Krishnamurti spoke of the unconscious and how it can be seen totally but only after much self-knowledge and the discipline that comes without motive and without the action of pleasure. Pleasure is usually the seed of the unconscious.

The following day at lunch, Krishnamurti again plied me with questions about the United States, California in particular, and asked about yesterday's discussion. Did it sound to me like sanity or insanity? What did I think it would mean to a US college audience? Would it have any meaning? I wondered at the seeing of the unconscious he had described in contrast to the view of it that was prevalent in psychoanalysis. He asked again what the United States would understand of that and nodded when I suggested it might depend on whether they could be brought past trying to relate what he said to fit into the pigeonholes already in their minds.

The conversation switched to the subject of a proposal made to him by someone who wished to provide a central place for him to live when not traveling, which could also be a place for meetings of small groups, and a place to live should he ever retire. Where could it be? England and France were considered. Not Italy, because Signora Scaravelli's would always be his residence there, and the church might be unfavorable to it. England was too cold and dark in winter, so France and the region around Saint-Paul-de-Vence was a possibility. A house could be found, and the donor had agreed to run it. "I want to involve you in it, if you will?" he said to me. Would I be on a committee in whose name it would be held and be responsible if the donor should not want to run it? I said I would, of course, if he wanted it, though to myself I couldn't see what I could do in this.

On November first, 1965, with Krishnamurti and Alain Naudé, I flew from Rome to New Delhi. On boarding the flight, Krishnamurti, who was in first class, while Alain and I were in tourist, came back and tried to persuade me to use his seat, which I could not accept. We landed at noon in New Delhi on a hot, bright day. Mrs. Shiva Rao and Mrs.

Pupul Jayakar—friends he had known for many years—were there, and we were whisked through customs to Mr. and Mrs. Shiva Rao's house, where Krishnamurti was staying, then to India International Centre, where Mrs. Shiva Rao had kindly engaged a room for me. I bathed and changed, and then was fetched by Krishnamurti, Mrs. Jayakar, and Alain to go for a drive. Krishnamurti was now dressed in his Indian clothes—a starched white cotton shirt called a kurta, white cotton trousers called pajama trousers, and a dark cream sleeveless jacket called a bundi. They were beautiful clothes, like those of a Christmas angel.

Krishnamurti's first talk was held a week later in the garden of the Constitution Club. Red and blue rugs were spread on the ground; under a brightly colored canopy was a small platform on which was placed a white-covered low table for him to sit on. The Nagra tape recorder was placed on the ground by the edge of the platform, and Alain and I sat there, shoeless and cross-legged. The audience was large, with more men at these meetings than in Europe.

At 5:30 p.m. Krishnamurti came in through the back of the canvas. Sliding off his sandals, he sat cross-legged on the table and made the palms together—namaste—gesture of greeting, which the audience returned. In his usual silence, he looked slowly around. Sitting this way in immaculate cleanness and utmost grace, he was a totally beautiful human being. Beautiful is not an odd word to use of this man and a man of seventy; it is the only word. Sex and age had no meaning. It was human beauty so essential that any qualification was irrelevant. As he began to speak with an intensity of precision and almost passion, there was about him an authority, a majesty, as if he had entered into the historic state of the great teacher, seen only rarely through the centuries.

He spoke on war, violence, and order. He softened nothing. To a country then close to war he said: "There is no righteous war." He spoke of the reason behind violence, which is fear; that there is no security and its pursuit is futile; that only through an awareness of that fear, that insecurity, can one come to a condition where there is peace and order. Then a total revolution can take place in the human being.

After a visit to Agra and Jaipur with Alain Naudé, Krishnamurti asked me to come to discuss the place in France, but first he asked about the Taj Mahal—was it so romantic, so beautiful, and then about the poverty of the villages. To the first I tried to describe the strange, snowy apparition that seemed more a thing imagined than a building, legendary but far beyond any preconception. It floated in the moonlight, a disembodied eloquence of beauty. The long, dusty drive back to Delhi was through villages of total squalor, dirt, smell, diseased children, a ghastly sight—blindness and deformities was the numbing other reality in this tremendous country. Krishnamurti listened and nodded to it all.

He talked then of the various factors around a house in France. Possible difficulties in relation to Krishnamurti Writings, Inc. (i.e., Rajagopal). We had a long talk about this. He planned to go to Ojai in the autumn, and the upkeep of such a place would come up. Did I think it a good plan? I said it seemed good to me because there should be a place for him to go to whenever he wished, an alternative always there if he were tired or didn't feel like talking or traveling, and that it seemed the responsibility of KW, Inc. to contribute to the upkeep, but that we would raise the money for it if there were difficulties. There was a long talk about this, and later it kept going through my mind that there seemed little love or true care for this man in so many around him. Or that they cared for him, but only in the way that they thought he should be—without sensitivity to him.

On November twentieth we all flew to Benares, and in the airplane, Krishnamurti pointed to the peaks of the Himalayas, snowy pink in the early morning light, the tremendous height of them, ageless and austere. Krishnamurti ate his porridge, carried in a jar, then read Time magazine—hard to come by then in India—about the large power failure in New York City. In this way we flew over the parched landscape of central India.

Members of the Rajghat school were at the airport to welcome Krishnamurti, garland him with marigolds, and whisk him away. The rest of us followed by bus over the rough road. As we moved, I felt a stronger sense of India than in Delhi. People, animals, chickens, ducks walked intent on their own purposes; women in brighter saris effortlessly balanced brass water pots on their heads, scraggy goats foraged for anything edible. There were lumbering buffaloes and other women crouched by piles of buffalo excrement, affixing patties of it on walls to dry. Vividly painted lorries crowded each other, honking their way; the air was filled with frying smells and diesel exhaust. Life seemed to throb with all of this.

At Rajghat, Frances McCann and I were assigned to rooms in Krishna Ashram at the head of a cliff overlooking the Ganges, sharing a large room, a small room, and a bath. It looked as if they had been unoccupied for a long time, for a desert of dust was on the floor, and the only furniture were wooden bed frames laced with rope without mattresses. People came and went, expressing surprise that the rooms were not in order. Mr. Madhavachari, who was in charge, came and also expressed surprise, gave orders, but nothing happened for quite a while. Eventually, sweepers came, poured buckets of water on the floor, and one was set to scraping the washbasin, which was of a singular blackness that I could only imagine achieving by pouring tar on it. The luckless man scraped with a razor for four hours that day and was still patiently scraping it when we left three weeks later. A table and some chairs came, and later mattresses, two sheets, blankets, and eventually mosquito nets. Suddenly, there was a tapping at the door. It was Krishnamurti, who had a report from Alain about the conditions and came over. He was distressed, and we were distressed that he should be involved. The school people were convulsed at his coming to see to the welfare of his guests. A papal visit in Rome could have brought no greater commotion. He was enormously thoughtful, and came three times more to check. By nighttime we had our luggage and some order. Even a blue rug was sent by the principal at Krishnamurti's command.

Rajghat covers some hundred acres above the river and downstream from the city. The Ganges, wide, green and slow flowing, had an ancient air, moving, it seemed, through centuries and the legends of its people. In the early morning, small fishing boats floated on its vast surface, casting nets in silence until goods trains came clattering across an iron bridge.

On November twenty-second Krishnamurti gave his first public talk in a large hall with rugs on the floor on which all sat—students and adults. He spoke of nationalism, religious sects, and war—the dividers of humankind, destroyers of order and peace. What was our response to this? A question from the audience asked, "What is the use to talk of truth?" He said you cannot use it; it serves no utility. It is like the wind; you cannot catch it and hold it in your hand. He asked, "How is a human being who has listened for forty years with a dry heart, without a tear in his eye, who sees all this and does not do a thing, whose heart is broken up, whose heart is empty, whose mind is full of words and theories, full of himself—how is he to make his heart alive again? That is the real question."

Krishnamurti was concerned about the schools. He called Mr. and Mrs. Moorhead and Mark Lee from the Rishi Valley School and Alain Naudé and me to talk about what should be done at Rishi Valley. "I am going to talk very frankly." And he did, bringing up every criticism of it and saying that if people in Europe were to provide money, "What are you going to do at this end? You must guarantee a change. I have never asked myself whether there is any point in my continuing to come and concern myself with the school, but I am asking that question now. It is the twenty-fifth hour."

The following day he called us again and pounded us with questions: what the school was about or should be, and he said that a manifesto must be drawn up and upon which the school should function. The children were to flower in goodness, with a religious spirit in relation to people, to life, to learning, etcetera. He kept me afterward and showed me a letter from the School for Social Research in New York, inviting him to give nine talks there starting in September. "Should I accept?" he asked. I said that all I knew about the school was that Paul Tillich had joined the faculty a year earlier and that made me feel it was a serious school, and that I thought he should accept. "Then I will." he said. "I will stay with Mr. Pinter. What do you think about Naudé?" I said my brother and I would look after him.

He continued his talks. He spoke of conflict, sorrow, death, and love. My notes record: "Only in the understanding of sorrow can one learn, only in dying to everything can there be love. Only when conflict is not tolerated, but is seen, understood, and therefore dissolved in one action can there be emptiness, stillness, and truth. The only total action we know is death." His words were like a river flooding all levels of one's consciousness. He spoke of the sorrow of time: "The admittance of time is the greatest sorrow." And "a mind in sorrow can never know what love is." And "when a mind has no problems, no tensions, no direction, then such a mind is in a state of love; and when there is love, there is a sense of beauty, and in that vast space there is creation." And "to understand love you must begin very near—which is yourself—and that first step is the last step; then you can go very far, much farther than rockets to the moon or to Venus or to Mars. The whole of this is the religious mind."

For me there were expeditions into Benares where I came to feel that one has not been in India unless in Benares itself. It seemed a torrent of people, swarming bicycles, buses with impatient horns, wandering cows, ponderous buffaloes, sometimes a camel, and even an elephant. On foot, rounding a corner, I barely missed a collision with a thin, cloth-wrapped corpse across the back of a bicycle being taken to the ghats. There the smoking pyres fed that ancient destination of the pious.

One afternoon Mrs. Shiva Rao took me with her when she went to buy bridal saris for the Cottage Industries in Delhi. We walked through filthy alleys with open drains to a Muslim silk place. Inside what seemed a fortress were whitewashed corridors, tiny rooms where weavers sat cross-legged at their looms in semi-darkness. We sat on cushions while saris of exquisite delicacy were thrown before us. Beauty and meticulous workmanship were produced in the surrounding squalor. All things seemed to live side by side—human misery and soaring beauty, and always very close, death and life.

Krishnamurti held meetings with the children of the Rajghat school. He spoke with them as if together they were sharing questions, as friends. He spoke of nationalism, of what they would do with their lives, and that they should do what they loved in life. He asked about their relationship with people, with animals. In other meetings in the big hall, the children chanted with Krishnamurti sitting in their midst and joining in the chants.

Frances, Alain, and I were invited to lunch in Krishnamurti's dining room with him and Mr. Madhavachari. The food was delicious and delicate, cooked by his South Indian cook, R. Parameshwaran.

There were further small group discussions with about fifteen people. In one he questioned the value of what had been seen or written in the past. He said, "I am not concerned with that, I haven't got time for that. I need to find out immediately. If I am in conflict, I ask how can I end it immediately; conflict is deadly." At one point he asked Achyut Patwardhan why he had brought up something about the Buddha. It seemed as if his dismissal of knowledge and past teachings were part of the fact that learning was a constant process in him; that to heed what has been written or said was to be diverted from living perception. He spoke of seeing the totality of things, of hearing in the night the call of the fishermen on the river—the beauty of it. And in my notes I wrote that I felt I knew something of this experience of beauty "with love," as he put it. But what is seeing the totality of suffering? What would have been total seeing of that dying child in that village in the Punjab? I was hit by pain, horror, and compassion until it was too much, and I closed my eyes.

One late afternoon I walked down to the small stream, the Varuna, that flows into the Ganges, crossed the teetery bridge and went up and along the bank to the small village. There was a pale misty light; the little huts were the same sand color as the ground and seemed to have been made by children's hands, like sand castles: the walls not perpendicular or squared, the windows here and there, and some were decorated with crosses or dotted in white as if a child were playing. I soon had a queue of real children behind me. “Namaste! Namaste!” was all we could understand of each other, but laughter and gestures were language. In open eyes and faces one could find the child.

One afternoon Alain and I went into Banaras by rickshaw to buy sticks for Krishnamurti to carry to ward off rabid jackals. A student at the agricultural college had been bitten, hadn’t taken the Pasteur treatment, and had died. We found strong sticks. On return to the school, Krishnamurti sent for Frances and me to come while he did Vedic chanting with the music teacher, Mr. Sarmon. We sat on the floor in Krishnamurti’s room, listening to him and Sarmon chant—beautiful, ancient, austere, and deeply moving. His chanting was deep and knowledgeable. Sitting cross-legged, he sang, eyes closed, with extraordinary beauty of face and gesture, and laughing at times. “There is even one on drunkenness!” he said. His room had emptiness, austerity, and perfect order: a handsome wooden bed, immaculately made with a towel across the pillow, the mosquito net pulled tight and neatly as the sail on a ship. There was a folding travel clock on the bed table, flowers across the room, a metal cupboard, the Nagra tape recorder on a chair, and little else but the rug on which we sat. The chants seemed to reach back in time in one’s mind to something known, forgotten, and extraordinary.

On December fifteenth, Krishnamurti and the rest of us left Rajghat for New Delhi. Waiting at the airport, some of us were put to intercepting a woman who, for twenty years, had had the delusion that she was Krishnamurti’s wife. She had been at the talks in Rajghat and made rushing attempts to touch him. She came very close at the airport and he said, “Do not touch me.” Later he described her meeting him once on a Bombay street when he was alone. He tried to walk faster but she kept up. He said, “If you don’t leave I will call the police.” She said, “Go ahead, I’m your wife!” Just then he saw a streetcar, jumped on it, and escaped.

On the flight to Delhi, Krishnamurti sat looking stately and majestic as a saint, reading a Perry Mason novel. Mr. and Mrs. Shiva Rao and Mrs. Jayakar met him at the Delhi airport. Alain and I went again to the International Centre, and Mrs. Shiva Rao kindly invited me to take my meals at their house.

During the brief stop in Delhi, on a walk Krishnamurti spoke very seriously about what would carry on the teaching when he died. What could he do to hasten change in Alain and me? He wanted to talk to us about this in Madras, and that Alain must remember that the people around “K” in India would not listen to him. They would resent Alain, and he should speak elsewhere.

On December eighteenth we flew to Madras. In the Delhi airport waiting room there was a round bundle of a man in stocking cap, woolen shirt, and baggy coat. A Brahmin with forehead covered with ashes. Elegant, exquisitely dressed Krishnamurti circled the room observing the startling sight and came back, saying, “I give up!”

The air in Madras was warm, tropical, and soft after the arid, dusty north. Friends with garlands met Krishnamurti. Mr. Madhavachari and others took him off to Vasanta Vihar while Alain and I were met by a quiet tall lady of great dignity, Mrs. Jayalakshmi, who at Alain's request had rented a house for him, Frances, and me. She drove us to see it, a very clean, whitewashed house in a small garden. Not only this but also she had rented all the necessary furniture and equipment for it, and was lending temporarily her Brahmin cook. I was astonished at such hospitality and kindness.

After tea Mrs. Jayalakshmi drove us to Vasanta Vihar, a quite large formal house. Krishnaji showed me through it. There was a very large room on the ground floor where meetings were held and various other rooms and offices off it. His quarters were upstairs, which consisted of a large bedroom, a bathroom, and another room in which a straw mat and pillow were laid on the floor. "I sometimes sleep on it. You get used to it after two nights." He said that Rajagopal had bought sixteen acres in the early '30s, "when they put us out of the TS." He had thought of two small houses, "but then they built this." He was restless and wanted to go for a walk. "Do you like this climate?" I did. Mrs. Jayalakshmi drove us to a park where we took a vigorous walk, seeing shy-eyed spotted deer. Krishnamurti peppered Mrs. Jayalakshmi with questions as he seemed to do whenever he first met someone after a long absence. Questions on war, fears, interest in real religion.

Soon Krishnamurti commenced his public talks, which were held in the garden of Vasanta Vihar in the late afternoon under the tall trees. The audience began to arrive early, walking up the driveway to sit on the ground as near to the speaker as possible. For the Madras talks, Krishnamurti wore a dhoti, walked with immense dignity from the house, climbed onto the low dais, made the palms-together greeting, which the audience returned, and after sitting a short time in silence, he began to speak.

There were small group discussions in the morning. I was invited to these, but became unable to attend all of them, having fallen ill with flu-like symptoms. I stayed in bed except for essentials of the house. In the middle of this, the police arrived to arrest our bearer for allegedly stealing a baby goat on Christmas Eve. I wrote a note on his employment but could do little else. Alain finally had to go to the police station to untangle the goat story.

The morning after this, my fever broke, and I felt weak but better. Alain went off to Vasanta Vihar as usual but came back saying that Krishnamurti wished to see me immediately. I was startled but jumped into clothes and a taxi to Vasanta Vihar. Alain said Krishnamurti had asked how I was, and when told the fever had broken, he had said, "Bring her to me. I want to cure her." I went in, and he said, "You know, all my life I've been able to do this; sometimes it works and sometime it doesn't." He pulled out a chair for me and stood behind, placing his hands very lightly on my shoulders. "You must relax," he said. I had shown him the area of pain under both cheekbones, and very, very lightly he put his fingers there, held them a few moments, and drew them away as though brushing away the pain and illness. He did the same with my eyes, touching them very lightly, quietly; then one hand over an eye and the opposite at the base of the neck, then with both hands drawing across the shoulders. Then he was gone, going into the bathroom and reappearing in a few seconds to ask if it had helped. I had felt the pain wiped away and said so. "Good. Come back tomorrow and I will do it again," he said. I felt almost in tears at his kindness.

The talks and discussions continued in Madras until January thirteenth, when Krishnamurti left for Rishi Valley. Frances, Alain, and I followed in a rented car with a driver. It was four in the morning but nevertheless hot and sticky. We drove through the misty night westward, passing plodding bullock carts piled with vegetables for the city. Krishnamurti had told me to watch for the Southern Cross, which I had never seen. Our car fell behind at some point, and when it became light we came to a barrier where it was found that our car lacked proper papers to proceed. We had to drive back to the nearest town, Vellore, where we hired another taxi and finally reached Rishi Valley. Krishnamurti was outside the guesthouse, having had a picnic breakfast by the side of the road, where they had waited for us in vain.

The valley was very different from Madras. Gone was the tropic sultriness; the air was clear and dry; the hills on either side rose like shoulders, not very high but curiously topped with large boulders that seemed to have been placed there, as if some giant child had been playing and left his toys behind. The floor of the valley was flat with the road running through it and fields on either side; villagers passed singly or in pairs, and a boy was herding a flock of goats. There was something ancient and quiet, far from the rest of the world.

We were given rooms on the ground floor of the guesthouse. Frances and I shared a rather large bathroom where the skill acquired at Rajghat of bathing oneself and doing hand laundry with one bucket of hot water was easily done. The poured water ran out through a hole in the corner and there was the possibility that something else could come in the same way. The possibility of a cobra in the night made it prudent to turn on the light before entering.

Krishnamurti's rooms were on the floor above. There was a small kitchen and dining room where he took his lunch, and we were often invited. As elsewhere, he took his walk in the late afternoon, when the sun had faded, and here too I was sometimes included. The school lay in more or less the center of the valley, with small villages here and there. I climbed the hills some days, lay in the sun, feeling suspended in the peace of this far-off place. In the later afternoons, the students clustered on a small hill to watch the sun set behind the mountain, Rishi Konda rising at the end of the valley, where once upon a time a hermit lived near the summit. Krishnamurti was moved by its presence and felt something sacred was there.

There were talks with the teachers in which he spoke of the need to create in the children a sense of both total freedom and discipline. In certain school assemblies, the students chanted with Krishnamurti. The beauty of the sound joined the young ones with the erect figure sitting cross-legged among them.

On January fourteenth there was the festival of Pongal. Cattle decorated with flowers came with villagers who danced to flute and drum. The school children joined in, and Krishnamurti came to watch, standing under his big sun umbrella. He asked me to join him on this walk with his nephew G. Narayan, but rains came and we had to wait in the assembly hall. Krishnamurti was wearing new chudidars, a cotton trouser that is very tight around the lower leg and that he thought might shrink if wet and have to be cut off. Alain went for a pair of loose Panama pants, and we went to see a newborn calf coming back in the dark past the giant banyan tree.

On January twentieth Krishnamurti talked to the students. Afterward he told me to come for a treatment. In the temperate dryness of Rishi Valley, my Madras illness had faded, but he was watchful, and this time told me to come in the future without waiting for him to ask me. In the evening Alain and I listened to records of Mozart and Richter playing a Bach double-piano concerto. Krishnamurti looked in during the Bach, stood listening, then bade us goodnight and said he would hear it upstairs in his room.

One evening I had cocoa with Narayan and his wife, Shakuntala, and was shown some early photographs of Krishnamurti. Narayan told me of being taken ten years earlier by his father, who was Krishnamurti's older brother by three years, to see him in Madras. When they met, the father said to Krishnamurti, "Do you know who I am?" Krishnamurti said he didn't. "Kitu, I am your brother."

On January thirtieth Krishnamurti gave to the teachers what was to me an extraordinary talk on how to bring a child past conditioning to see fact through sensitivity and intelligence; and to prepare for the world in which computers would give enormous leisure to human beings. Would he or she reach for forms of entertainment or instead become aware of the waste of such action and thereby open to the possibility of something real? "The total development of man is to uncondition the mind. To become unconditioned is attention; seeing, hearing and therefore learning not in terms of conditioning. It takes place instinctively, instantly, when one sees the movement (inward and outward). The image is the movement."

I had asked Krishnamurti if I could have another interview, and it took place on the following day. He asked if I would prefer his healing treatment before speaking or afterward. I said afterward and apparently had chosen rightly as he nodded and motioned me to a chair. I felt very relaxed in this interview in contrast to previous ones. I said I wanted to talk to him about relationship, specifically human ones and questioned whether, in some cases where there is very little contact, there was in fact any relationship at all. He asked if I could be more specific and give an example. I spoke of a child about whom I was concerned but seldom saw, and described the circumstances. He asked a few questions and said in effect that since there was little I could do to alter things, that no, I had no relationship. But where there is communication there can be a continuing relation. We talked of relationship in marriage, which he said was infinitely more complicated, and finally he said that there is relationship only when you have no image of the other person. Then there is direct and real relationship. As long as there is an image, you are trying to approximate something to fit an idea and hence unreality and conflict. I asked also about relationship to the sick children I had seen in villages in India, and he told me of a sick and starving man on the steps of a building in Bombay. He asked someone if something couldn't be done, and the person took K to the slums and showed him uncountable people in similar misery. Nevertheless the man was put in a hospital, and when he was well, the man went back to sit on the steps of the building where K had seen him. “What can you do except be sensitive and not close your eyes.”

We spoke of various things, and I mentioned briefly his own telling me years earlier in the Ojai interview about death and dying to everything every day. He, of course, remembered nothing of it, and I said that, as he had forgotten all that I had told him, I had felt that since I seemed to have become more of a fixture around him, I should somehow open my head for him to look into if he chose. Also that, if in the course of things he observed things I should know, would he please point them out to me? He smiled and said he was shy about saying something that way. I said that I was shy too about knocking on his door and asking; that I had not come to him since two years before in Saanen because I had no crisis and did not want to take his time and energy unless I needed them badly. He said, “Well, now we have talked this way and know each other better, it will be easier.” He added, “May I ask you something? I said, “Anything.” “Do you feel a core at the bottom of all this?” I said that I had been in a state of change since two years before in Saanen, and that I had deliberately not tried to assess and measure it because I had a tendency wrongly to ask where I was going and where I was and therefore had gone with things without measuring. “Do that,” he said. But I added that I distrusted certain things: one, the longing for change, at which he nodded, and also the mental equation that there must be problems or I would have changed more. He smiled and asked if I feared things. I said that I didn’t consciously and distrusted this and so made a sort of fear of not fearing. “No, don’t,” he said. “Just leave it alone.” There was more in the hour and a quarter I was there, and, as before, one knew when it was over. He glanced at the folding clock on his bedside table. I instantly got up and so did he, pulling out the desk chair for me to sit on. He went to the bathroom to wash his hands and came back, and after quite a long pause put his hands lightly on my eyes.

In days that followed Krishnamurti spoke to the students about what the computer would do to their lives and how they would use the leisure it would bring. A young girl asked what he would do with all that leisure. “I would do just what I’m doing now because I love it; when you love something you do, it is leisure.” On another morning he spoke with teachers on images and relationship, and I felt the echo and depth of what I had learned in the interview.

One evening the children gave a puppet show about Odysseus and the Cyclops. Huge papier-mâché puppets had been made. Shakuntala Narayan had lent me a white sari, helped me to put it on, and we went to the puppet show, where we were seated in the front row. Krishnamurti entered, immediately noticed my wearing a sari and raised his eyebrows in amusement. Later, as he bade goodnight, he said to me, “I see you have a new dress.”

There were long walks and climbs in the hills where I lay in the sun above the quiet valley; the only sound sometimes was of a boy on his flute while he tended his flock of goats. Time seemed suspended, and the core of the world seemed centered there—a sense of presence. Sometimes I walked in the late afternoon and would encounter Krishnaji on the road and walk back with him in the still, clear light, the sky lemon-gold behind the western hills. He spoke, as he often did, in French: “Vous avez l’air rajeunis. Ça vous fait du bien ici.”

On February ninth we left Rishi Valley. I was up at 5 a.m. and standing outside my room when I heard half-gasps, half-cries from Krishnaji’s room above. I found Alain and told him it sounded worrying. He said not to pay attention, as it often happened. This was my first awareness of the curious fact of what was called the “process.”

At 6 a.m. Alain and I left by car for Bangalore. The sky was still dark but pale behind the eastern mountains. All the girl students in white dresses were running along the school road, calling “Goodbye!” with fluttered hands through the car window. The valley was infinitely beautiful and peaceful. We drove through Madanapalle, where Krishnamurti was born, and on through rocky desert country. It was good to be moving again.

In Bangalore we met Krishnaji at the airport. Earnest followers tried to put an enormous garland of yellow marigolds around his neck, but he deftly switched it to the neck of a devotee, who looked stricken and ducked out of it. A VIP room was provided for K, and we all sat there. “The monkey has escaped,” he said. “When I used to travel with Amma (Mrs. Besant), sometimes I would lock myself in the bathroom.” He said it with satisfaction.

Section Two

I was invited to Pupul Jayakar's house two days after arriving. Krishnaji met me in the hall, inquired after my health, and took some of my things for safekeeping. He asked about the hotel where I was staying. "What's it like? How awful the city is." He took his walks in a park but found it ugly. I mentioned Elephanta, where there is the Mahesh Murti, the great carving in a cave of the three faces of Shiva, and he said, "I would like to see it again." I suggested a fast boat to take him to the island where it was, but he said that would be too long and tiring. I said perhaps we could find a helicopter, but he just waved his hands. I was able to find one a few days later, but he decided it would be too tiring. I went instead with Alain, an hour by boat across the huge harbor past ships lying at anchor. It was hot climbing to the caves, but, in spite of noisy, inattentive crowds and children with transistor radios to their ears, we stood a long time in front of the great brooding, absorbed three faces of Shiva. All human life seemed mirrored there and something far beyond.

That afternoon I went with Krishnaji, Madhavachari, and Alain to walk on the small park on Malabar Hill. We talked of Elephanta, the beauty of the carving, the noise of crowds. "I don't know what this country is coming to," Krishnaji said, indicating a man and girl on a bench with arms carelessly around each other. "You never would have seen that a short time ago." We talked about his first talk in Bombay, and he asked me if I think people had understood it or was it over their heads? What did I think of the audience, etc. There was a brilliant sunset, and crows flew about the flowers and topiary hedges. The sky was ivory when we left.

On February eighteenth Krishnamurti held the first public discussion at 8:30 in the morning at Khareghat Hall. Afterward Alain, Frances, and I went with Krishnaji to discuss the house-in-France project. Alain was to go look for a place. Krishnaji wanted it to be owned by Krishnamurti Writings but to be controlled by a committee of Alain, Gérard Blitz, Frances, and me. During the discussion Nandini Mehta's little granddaughter dashed in and flew to Krishnaji, who jumped up, kissed her on both cheeks, and lifted her high in the air.

The following day there was the first private discussion at Pupul Jayakar's house. About fifteen people attended. It was asked what an individual can do in the face of the disintegration of society. Krishnamurti took it up, saying that change of each individual by another is impossible; change by evolution, by social action hadn't done it and implies time. He then asked if there were something totally different. He made the distinction between the individual and the human being, i.e., the individual has his own separate conditioning, but the human being has the conditioning of the whole human consciousness. He posed the question and then veered back to stressing the futility of other ways. Often in discussions he made a large step forward, giving a hint, a glimpse, and then someone would say, "But, Krishnaji, we don't see that." Then there would be a catalogue of all our shortcomings, and so it was that day.

On the twentieth he gave his third Bombay talk, mostly on time and thought leading to conflict and sorrow—a tremendous talk given with utmost power and an energy that seemed to come at the most intense times of his speaking. An extraordinary sight, too, a majesty of look and gesture.

Another side was at the next private discussion, when he was slightly late, as he had been talking to a guru. He came in laughing, as though he had escaped from something. "The guru accused me," he said. "He said I was haughty to say gurus were harmful." He wore a cotton kurta that made him look in some ways like a child. He had the slender hands and wrists of a young boy; even his way of sitting on a chair, slightly pigeon-toed, was the stance of a boy. But that day he sat cross-legged on the floor and spoke again of thought being in time and therefore not outside of consciousness. If one sees that as one sees that a road doesn't lead to one's home, then one stops and no longer goes on that road. In the same way, when one sees that thought and time lead only to conflict and pain, then one is silent. Here I must have looked uncertain, for he said, "What do you say, Mrs. Zimbalist?"

I said that the enormity of seeing this made most minds retreat.

"Why do you do anything when you see it?" he asked.

"Because the challenge confronts you," I responded.

"Why are you challenged?"

"Because the implications of that seeing are so overpowering that the mind sets all its defenses against seeing." It was here that I felt the goats separate from the sheep. His seeing had to be total and therefore action. For me, even the glimpse in perception so threatened the thinking mind that it closed. It could not be open to it because it meant its own complete destruction. I felt that as we are organically against death and have confused this with thought, perception snaps shut, the contact is broken, and what was momentarily perceived is safely sifted into thought as an intellectual concept. It seemed to me that, for Krishnaji, perception opened a door, and the opening of the door was the going through it. For others, the open door is so threatening to the thinking process we hold as vital as breath that we slam the door shut. There is an abhorrence of a vacuum. A mind may stop for an instant, but consciousness not moving into a different state and unable to exist in a vacuum falls back into its old mechanics.

Time ran out for this meeting, but the discussion was resumed the following day. It got into a metaphor in which I was walking down a road that led nowhere (thought) and nevertheless could not stop walking (thought cannot stop). "Then keep walking," he said. "Why stop?"

"Because it results in pain."

"Why do you insist you cannot stop?" Throughout this exchange, which was rather long and took most of an hour, there was a curious sense of communication going on at a different level. I was sitting directly opposite him, and when he would say something or ask a question, I kept feeling he was continuing to talk to me wordlessly in a look.

When the discussion was over, I spoke to him, saying that I had heard there was some uncertainty about the house-in-France project and begged him to consider it. "Come in, come in," he said, and when I went into his room he said, "You didn't mind my pounding you just now?" I said of course not. About the house he was concerned about the expense. "When can we talk? Come on the afternoon walk." So I did and sat waiting with Pupul and Nandini. When he came in, he teasingly put his hand on Nandini's head, rumpling her hair slightly. He said to me, "You see, I've known her twenty years. When I've known you twenty years, I can do the same."

"What you don't know, sir, is that you have known me twenty years."

"I have?" he said and advanced as though to do the same. I pulled back and added, "But you have to know that you've known me that long." On this joking note, he, Alain, Madhavachari, and I drove to the Hanging Gardens and walked around and around. Then he asked me again my impression of the audience at the talks.

"They sit so quietly," he said. "May I ask what all this means to you?"

I spoke of a process of change and a reluctance to assess it, but looking back I saw a different past. He nodded, and we walked on. After a little while, he said that he had never owned anything—a chez-soi—but had always been a guest. Why did I feel he should accept this offer in France? I reiterated the reason of his having an alternative to his past schedule—a place to be there for his convenience, if and when he chose to use it. He said he could go to a hotel but quickly agreed he wouldn't like that. I spoke of my own surprise at Krishnamurti Writings not providing this; that Rajagopal should support it, especially as it would be a large addition to KW Inc.

"What if Rajagopal refuses?" he asked.

"Then I hope you will accept it anyway and we will manage it differently."

He seemed to enthuse and spoke of Alain finding a place, and then he, Vanda, and I should go to look at it. We walked on, and a young man fell into step with him and asked some questions. After six laps, we stopped and drove back to Dongersey Road. "See you in the arena tomorrow," he said.

The city of Bombay was for me a withering contrast of human conditions. More than in Benares, where life seemed a seething whole, here there were the Western symbols of wealth in towering modern buildings, and on the pavement below a piece of tarpaulin over two leaning poles was the living place of a family. A friend in Rome had given me some money, asking that I give it directly to someone in need in India. A ragged young man was lying asleep on a street near the hotel. On impulse I placed the money beside him, but then, thinking it might be stolen from him, I touched his shoulder and handed it to him. He awoke with a look of bewilderment and fright, so I went away toward the main avenue, where misery was everywhere. A leper beggar lay in the road, blind, without arms, propelling himself by rolling over and over in the gutter.

On March third there was the sixth and final private discussion. It returned to the eternal snag of being unable to let go of thought, of listening interminably, seeing intellectually that thought is the source of conflict and misery, but it remained superficial. Any effort out of thought was only its continuation. K asked when was one conscious that one was thinking? I described it as an activity that constantly measures the self in relation to everything in every waking moment and even in sleep. He ignored this and asked the question of someone else. He used the metaphor of a drum that is in tune when it is silent, but thought is the un-tuning of it.

"What happens when you put thought aside, turn your back on it?"

I replied that I couldn't do it; how does one turn away from it, even when its futility is seen?

He said, "You are in thought and you can't get out; why do you insist on that?"

At that point I could only see a wall of thought behind which I was hopelessly trapped.

All of a sudden he said to me, "Mrs. Zimbalist, is beauty thought? Is thought operating when there is beauty?"

"No, sir."

"Then you have known beauty, moments not of thought. Why do you say that?"

And I saw and said that beauty is outside of thought and strong enough to break through the prison of thought. And though I didn't say so, love, which is perhaps the same as beauty, has this strength, too.

"So," he said, "can you see the beauty of the drum, empty, tuned, and that out of that action comes?"

I saw. There was a little bit more with others, and then the meeting was over.

"See you tonight," he said when I left. "And hold onto that drum!"

That evening Frances, Alain, and I dined with Mrs. Mehta, mother of Pupul Jayakar and Nandini Mehta, a family gathering with Krishnamurti there; an attractive dinner with delicious food, flowers, incense. He was relaxed and enjoying it.

On March sixth I went to collect the things I had left for safekeeping with Krishnaji. People were seated in a circle on the floor with a dark bearded minstrel who held a one-stringed instrument and castanets. In a moment, Krishnaji came in and the music began—haunting, sad, and lovely songs. At the end, Krishnamurti thanked the singer and placed a gift of clothing on the floor next to him. Later he told me he had heard the man singing in the street. "The rich people around here don't listen; only the servants give him some money. He's from the south, speaks Telegu." He had called the man in to be heard.

That night Krishnamurti and some of us were to leave India for Rome, but the flight was delayed to 4 a.m. Devotees had come to the airport to see him off; in a special waiting room they sat, staring at him intensely. He finally got up and went out. The Parsi lady we called "Moonlight" shot out after him, and I went too, staying between him and her until Madhavachari intervened. He said to me, "I can't stand sitting there and being stared at." We took off at 4:30 a.m., Krishnaji in first class and Alain, Frances, and I in tourist. He kept coming back to visit us—"visiting the poor," he said.

It was exhilarating to be in Rome again. Krishnaji was staying with Vanda Scaravelli, as was Alain, and I in a small hotel off Piazza Navona. I dined with a friend the first night in a restaurant where everything seemed both familiar and amazing, gleaming and full of good smells and warm colors. The restaurant cat regarded me with an equal's eye. It was a prosperous cat, not a starving misery. Lovely food brought well-being, and inside there was the shining sense of what Krishnamurti had said a few days earlier.

I remained in Rome two days. There were errands to do and then to Via del Casaletto to lunch with Vanda Scaravelli. Krishnaji was now wearing gray trousers and a blue shirt but was still in his Madras sandals. In an energetic mood he asked me to sum up my impressions of India and "that man who talks." He then began an imitation of the way someone might describe his talks: "Oh, it was marvelous! Everybody just sat there. It was so extraordinary. What dignity! Of course, I can't tell you what he said, but it was marvelous, and I understood."

The following day, after lunch, we all went to the cinema—a James Bond movie. The plot took such turns that Alain, who had read the book, had to keep explaining what was happening. "What trouble and ingenuity they expend to entertain us," said K during some underwater scenes, and, "Oh, Lordy," in disgusted tones during some amorous ones. He noticed all the cars and, I think, liked the gadget parts of the film. Coming back in the car near Piazza Navona, when the traffic light turned red, I jumped out, and they waved goodbye, saying, "Be well, come back soon." I flew to Paris and on to the United States.

Krishnamurti was to speak in London on April twenty-sixth. I returned there from the United States the day before, and Alain telephoned the place where I was staying, asking to meet K and him at Huntsman, Krishnamurti's tailor. This made me laugh because the previous summer in Gstaad I had been asked to lunch by Mme. Scaravelli and was seated next to K. A friend of his on my left was wearing a suit made by a tailor in London recommended by Krishnamurti, and they talked across me about its fit. After a bit of this, I said, "You are speaking of Huntsman, aren't you?"

"Huntsman—what do you know about Huntsman?" said Krishnamurti, very surprised.

"My husband went to Huntsman," I replied. Krishnamurti looked at me as if I had just swam into his field of vision. Later he politely took me to my car, and as I drove away, he raised his hand in a sort of salute and said knowingly, "Huntsman!" I felt I had just acquired an identity for him—a woman who knew about Huntsman.

Earlier I had bought a new car, and when I drove near the Kingston By-pass, where Krishnamurti, Alain, and Anneke Korndorffer were staying in a rented house, Krishnamurti saw the car from the window and came out to inspect it. It was not a Mercedes, so he said little.

That evening he gave his initial London talk at the Friends Hall on Euston Road. The next day I drove him and Alain on a round of appointments. In the car, talking about miscellaneous things, at one point he said, "Do you mind if I say something serious? I was thinking this morning—it was quite extraordinary—meditation can be marvelous when you know how to do it—what is humility? It is without content, without any movement toward anything."

On another drive to London, he began quite soon: "Do you mind if we talk seriously? Does it interfere with your driving? I want to discuss what is seriousness. What is it to you?" I said that to me it was without withdrawal; a commitment that would not be withdrawn when self-interest was threatened. He said there was decision in it, that the day before, David Bohm had said he himself was not decisive enough, and that word had struck him. Naudé quoted something Krishnamurti had said three years earlier about seriousness, but K brushed it aside. He was seldom interested in his words being repeated to him. His attention seemed on the fresh action that was alive in his mind. He suddenly asked me if I thought someone we both knew was serious? I paused quite a while before saying no.

"Why?"

"Let me answer by saying what I feel is unserious: to be unwilling to go all the way with something, wherever it leads, not to choose out of self-interest, not to be divided."

"Why do people do that?"

I said that I thought it was partly a fear of putting all one's eggs in one basket. Multiplicity seemed safer.

He said, "But actually people would have much more, but they don't see it. Would you be serious if you married—God forbid—and had a family?"

I said it depended on the marriage, the relationship.

“But people say they are serious about work, about the people they marry. I am serious about the suit I will fit. Have you self-interest in this car?”

I said yes, but were these things the measure of seriousness? Or was it what such a thing meant to me?

Through all this conversation, he was directing me in the traffic as he had directed the fitting by the tailor, the choice of materials. The latter was clearly an enjoyment to him. I lunched later with him and Anneke. Conversation at the table was mostly about diet, LSD, and cats we had known. Anneke brought up the LSD topic, remembering we had discussed it the year before. Krishnaji, who had forgotten this, expressed surprise that I knew about it and told us again about soma in ancient India. He said Aldous Huxley had told him: “LSD wasn’t quite the real thing—the experience of truth—but was like it.”

“I can’t believe that,” said K. “It can’t be like the real thing; that cannot have a shadow.”

In the morning on April thirtieth, Krishnamurti gave a talk in the Wimbledon Town Hall. In the afternoon he felt like getting out into the country, and we drove in warm sunlight toward Wisley, where we had gone the year before, but the parking lot was crowded, and he said, “Let’s drive on,” so we headed south, deeper into the countryside. He spoke of Mary Lutyens and her husband, Joe Links. He had known her since she was a baby, the youngest of the Lutyens family, which became a second family to him and his brother when the two boys first came to England. The Linkses had a house near Haslemere, so we headed in that direction, passing through the loveliness of England at that season. In Haslemere we enquired the way, and through winding roads we found the house, but no one was home. A farmer said they would be walking, so we too walked along the road and came upon them both. Krishnaji looked very pleased at the surprise, and I had the pleasure of meeting for the first time two people who became close friends. We all walked back through woods of bluebells and had tea, or rather Alain and I had tea, and K, as usual, only water. It was a relaxed and very pleasant time, and he seemed exhilarated to be seeing old friends.

On such drives Krishnaji remembered places he had stayed all over England. He spoke of never being left to go out by himself when he was young. He would give away any money he had, and Mrs. Besant said, “For God’s sake, don’t let him go out alone.”

“My brother never left me,” he said with what seemed appreciation. In the car coming back, he referred to the morning’s talk in Wimbledon and asked what the observer and observed meant to us and from that to whether love is a matter of thought. So we came back to Kingston in what seemed a short time. The car performed efficiently, and Krishnaji seemed to enjoy it. Anneke had supper waiting, and so ended a happy day.

On May second, another clear, warm day. I went to Kingston equipped with maps and an itinerary for a drive to the Cotswolds, but that seemed too far, so we went toward Winchester, passing unknowingly the place that was in a few years to become the school at Brockwood Park. We lunched in Winchester at the Wessex Hotel and visited the cathedral. We drove on through the Wallops, where we stopped and, in a field of deep green grass, spread a large, red blanket, and all three took a short nap. A clean, clear summer wind blew across the land and trees. We went on to Stonehenge, to which Krishnaji had never been. The great stones kept their silence in spite of camera-snapping people.

In the car coming back, K said a question by some young people came back to him. He said that time is like a river flowing, but we divide it into past, present, and future. Instead, one should see the whole of it, and when one does, time must have a stop. "Yes, I see!" he said. "But I mustn't talk about it now." All the way back in the car, his mind seemed to go to it, but we didn't question him for fear of taking the edge off it for the morrow's talk. The spontaneity of perception seemed an intrinsic part of his speaking.

He said suddenly, "When my brother died, this person fainted, went into a coma for several days—so Shiva Rao told me—and when he came to, they all assured him he was all right, but though he cried out and it was a great shock, he never moved from that fact to say, 'What does it all mean?'"

He was intense and elated by the perception of time and said, "I wish I could give the talk right now!" and when we later sat down to the supper Anneke had prepared, he said, "I'm ready to talk right now!" We were concerned that it would be hard for him to sleep in such a mood, especially as he hadn't had enough sleep the night before. We watched television as a soporific. It was, and I said goodnight and went off to London.

On May fourth I met Saral and David Bohm in London and drove them to Krishnamurti's for a discussion. In this he made the statement that there is in effect nothing to do but listen—listen with affection. If a statement is made that is true, it has its own action if you listen. He illustrated this with a story he liked: A family of robbers was passing a teacher and closed their ears to avoid hearing him. The youngest stepped on a thorn, dropped his hands and heard the words "stealing is evil." Later he could no longer steal. We then all five went for a walk in Richmond Park.

The following morning I drove Krishnaji and Alain to London for fittings, and on the way K spoke of the discussion. I asked if there is no action but listening. "That is all one can do," he said. Suddenly, he said, "When this person was a boy, he was vague, stupid, a moron with no capacity to study when they found him. You know, the Theosophists said they saw an aura, that this boy had the least self. He was dirty, with lice in his hair, in his eyebrows; they had to shave his head. He was taught, and yet none of it changed him. Why wasn't he conditioned?"

The talks continued in Wimbledon, and there were walks each day in Richmond Park. On a Sunday, though it was raining, we took a picnic lunch and drove off toward Haslemere, where we had been invited by Mr. and Mrs. Links. We drove as much as possible on small country roads and stopped in a lane for our picnic. Alain had cooked a ratatouille, and as it was too wet to leave the car, we ate inside, feeling relaxed and joking about various things. The rain paused when we reached the Links', and we all went for a walk and came back to a pleasant tea.

Krishnamurti gave his fifth and final London talk on May tenth. On the twelfth I arrived at the house in Wimbledon at 7:30 in the morning and, with Alain, packed all of our luggage in the car. The three of us drove to Lydd on the Channel and flew the car and selves across to Le Touquet. We felt elated to be in France and drove off southwest under a clear sky. Krishnaji slept and twice awakened with that cry that had alarmed me in Rishi Valley. From Rouen we went south to Louviers, then to a small place I had found in the Guide Michelin called Vironvay. I had booked rooms for us at Les Saisons, which turned out to be a converted farmhouse with small cottages around a sweet-smelling garden. We went for a walk, and, as the cottage I was in had a little sitting room, we had dinner served there in front of an open fire. Krishnaji seemed pleased by it all.

CHAPTER 6

The following day, May sixteenth, the sun was shining, everyone was feeling very well, and we left Vironvay about noon. In the car Krishnaji again talked about "that boy," himself as a child; how he was beaten in school for dullness, how all the training and education he received after Mrs. Besant adopted him somehow didn't condition the boy in a psychological sense; how he was very late in maturing. He told us the story of being in the south of France, in the charge of an American who was "chasing girls," leaving him alone in the hotel. In the dining room a couple at the next table had been quarreling; the husband had been drunk and passed out, and the wife had begun to speak to the boy, taken him to her room, locked the door, and tried to make love to him. "I didn't know what it was all about." She had seen this, said she was sorry, and he had left. "Can you imagine what would have happened if the husband appeared?" Mrs. Besant was horrified, and he was never left alone again; always devotees went with him, preferably two. I asked if in Paris he ever went to museums, theaters, or just wandered about?

No walks; the Louvre, yes; some opera; often concerts; but always he was "taken." He seemed to have gone to tea with people in immense formality with no freedom.

We arrived at lunchtime at the Coq Hardi, where I had booked a table in a garden banked with pink hydrangeas. The management took vegetarianism in its stride, and we ordered from an enticing list of possibilities. Everything was good, and I had the pleasure of seeing them enjoy it. Krishnaji's appreciation of the best and interest in it all were fun to see. He discretely eyed the other guests and speculated about them. He seemed to have the interest of a boy who seldom goes out in the world. We had wild strawberries and melon, then salad, then asparagus Hollandaise, artichoke hearts, cheeses, and finally Krishnaji had a tarte au poire. Alain had oeufs à la neige, but I gave up. When the bill came, they were appalled. Did I know it would be that expensive? I did, and paid it with satisfaction for the enjoyment it had been. "Good God, Madame!" K kept saying. We drove on to Paris and to Avenue de La Bourdonnais, where they were staying with M. and Mme. Suarès.

Krishnamurti began his Paris talks on May sixteenth in the Salle Adyar. There was shopping to be done, and then daily walks in the Bois, and at Bagatelle, where, as on other expeditions, K suddenly began speaking again of "the boy." He told us about Leadbeater's discovering him; how another boy had been chosen and was being educated to be the World Teacher. K's father had asked for a job at the Theosophical Society and was accepted but lived outside Adyar. K and Nitya went to a school, where K was beaten. The brothers went to the beach, where they were seen by Leadbeater. Here K explained the theory of auras—a visible something, usually in color, surrounding the person; the more spiritual, the wider the aura. That of the Buddha was said to be as wide as the universe. Krishnamurti's aura was seen to have the least selfhood. Word was sent to Mrs. Besant about the boy; she came, and it was she who said K was to be the World Teacher. The American boy was removed and not allowed near K and Nitya. I asked what became of him, and K said he thought he had become a lawyer in the U.S. He described the acquiescence of the young boy (himself) and how he would gaze out the window with an open mouth. This irritated Leadbeater, who one day came up behind K and slammed his mouth shut. From that day on, K turned only toward Mrs. Besant and was closed to Leadbeater, though he continued to say, "Whatever you say," to his orders.

Then K explained to us the Theosophical order of things: the seven masters, a sort of super-master, and then the Lord Maitreya, the Buddha, and the Lord of the Universe. It was believed that the Lord Maitreya was a living being in Tibet who periodically leaves his own body and enters that of a person. Because of humanity's suffering he has not gone on to Buddhahood. He is said to have entered the form of Jesus. I asked K if he could see auras. He said he used to. I asked if his extraordinary perception in interviews comes out of such powers. "Probably," he said, and told of a man who came to him. K was able to tell him all about himself, and the man was annoyed. As K described these things, he appeared to know how they occurred.

Some afternoons later, Krishnaji and Alain drove with me to Saint-Germain-en-Laye, where we took a long walk in the forest and along the alleys of linden trees. On the way back, suddenly, again, K spoke of the past. "You know the story of how this person lived in Ojai in the beginning with the brother in an empty house? There he had suddenly fits of unconsciousness, coma, that came at night for months. He would cry out. His brother was there, also Rosalind, and Mr. Warrington, a Theosophist. They never touched the body."

He repeated this a number of times. I wondered if there was a purpose to his telling us this. His brother wrote it all down: how K spoke marvelous poetry and strange things happened. We asked what had happened.

"A star appeared," he said hesitantly.

"Where?"

“Above his head.”

He had no memory of all this, then or since.

“Was he aware of what was happening?” I asked.

“Probably, he must have,” he said.

He said that Leadbeater had been written to and replied that they had experience of some phenomena but nothing like that. The experiences went on, and in 1947 Pupul Jayakar and her sister, Nandini Mehta, witnessed his being in such a state, but Rajagopal swore them to secrecy.

“I thought you knew all this.”

Alain: “No, sir.”

“I will try to get you the account of it.”

Krishnaji didn’t want to ask Rajagopal, who would ask why K wanted to see it and would show it only in his presence. Madhavachari had it, and K would ask him. I said that all I knew was from reading Lady Emily Lutyens’s book Candles in the Sun.

I asked him how long this experience had occurred before he began to speak in his own way and not in the Theosophical context. He said it happened around 1922 and the speaking was around 1925. I asked if in retrospect—not memory—he understood the meaning of the experience, and he said, “No. But it would be interesting to know.” He then continued the subject he had been explaining the other day: the concept of the Masters, the Maitreya, the Buddha, and the Lord of the Universe at the top. And the concept of the body of a living man being taken as a vehicle for the World Teacher—the avatar and World Teacher concepts. Alain mentioned the distinction of an avatar being one who changes the social order, and I asked about god becoming man versus man becoming god. In this conversation he never said these things are so; he spoke of Hindu and Theosophical belief, but he spoke of the boy having experience of masters.

Pupul Jayakar came to Paris and expressed a wish to go to Chartres. Krishnamurti had Alain ask me if we could drive there, and so we did. Quite a while was spent in the cathedral, and then we had lunch nearby. Upon coming back to Paris, we dropped Mrs. Jayakar at her hotel and then went for a walk in the Bois. K said, “I like forests better than cathedrals.” But he had seemed to like the stained-glass windows more this time than the year before. “What idolatry!” he said of a rather doll-like statue of the Virgin.

Krishnamurti gave his third Paris talk in the Salle Adyar and in the afternoon met a group of young people, gathered by Alain, for a discussion in a room we had engaged in the Hotel Pont Royal. The most frequent question was about fear.

The next afternoon the three of us drove to Bagatelle for tea and a walk, and there I heard my first nightingale. He sang his lovely sounds on a branch over our heads. We stood for a long time, listening and watching him, and then Krishnaji said in Italian, "Grazie e arrivederci," and the nightingale was silent. We walked to see the roses, but K seemed tired—perhaps from the many interviews he had given.

One afternoon, we went to a motion picture, Ten Little Indians, and afterward walked down the Champs-Élysées. He asked, "What is space to you?"

I said, "At the moment it is where we parked the car," and he smiled. We found the car, talked all the way back, and then sat in the car for a long time continuing the conversation.

"What is living? Have you ever asked yourself what it really is? Man needs what? Freedom, that is essential! Freedom and space." He asked Alain, "You are a musician. You need space between the notes, don't you? Man can't be in a prison physically or a prison of ideas. Yes! That is it, freedom and space." He waved his fingers as he did when something became clear and said, "I mustn't talk about it anymore. We'll do it tomorrow."

The next day was the twenty-ninth of May, and Krishnamurti gave his fifth and last Paris talk, and in the afternoon he held another meeting with young people. While driving him back to Avenue de La Bourdonnais, the car behaved rather oddly and just made it to the corner where I was able to park. A wretched evening ensued in which I tried to get someone to see to it, but not only was it Sunday but also Monday was the holiday of Pentecost. When K had come out of the meeting, his face had been alight with the talks being over. "Vous êtes en vacance, monsieur!"

"Yes! No, not till Tuesday." It was imperative that we get off on Tuesday for a motor trip to Switzerland.

Monday was a day of misery. The dépannage place that I had persuaded to pick up the car and fix it did not answer the telephone, so I took a taxi to the address in some eastern quarter of Paris where there seemed nothing but dead cars and locked garages. I trudged about until I found the supposed owner of the garage where my car was supposed to be. Eventually he agreed to accompany me to where he said it was. With another man and a small boy, we came to a locked yard where they proceeded to climb the fence and came back, saying, "Elle est la!" They then broke the lock on the gate, while I stood guard outside in case the police came by and disapproved. He got the car started, and we drove in its slow, sick way to his place, where he said he had worked three years for Jaguar and could fix it. Wondering if I had assisted in stealing my own car, I left. Trying to telephone car rental places in case the Jaguar had to remain in Paris was fruitless. Pentecost was inflexible. The whole point of the car, which was to make possible country trips for K, seemed about to collapse.

I woke up the next morning, May thirty-first, wondering where the day would end. The car man had failed to fix it and was taking it to the Jaguar agency. Alain kindly accompanied me there, asked to speak to the director, confidently strode into the latter's office, and politely told him that it was of the highest importance that the car be looked at immediately and fixed, as we were about to accompany a very distinguished person on a motor trip. Someone was summoned, things were done, and meanwhile Krishnaji and Alain joined me for lunch at an excellent Italian restaurant. "Why don't we eat here every day?" said K, pleased. He wondered about a couple at another table. Alain said the woman was being kept by the man. "Oh, no!" said K. "She could be my sister—what will become of her?"

By 4:00 p.m., with luggage on board, we were rolling out of Paris, I feeling rather raw but relieved that the car was running and running well. As we got onto the autoroute, K said, "You must not be disturbed if the body is faint; it happens sometimes, it doesn't mean anything. I understand what it is; just go on or stop quietly, but leave it alone. It has been tired from talking and all that." We said yes, we understood.

Shortly before the road to Versailles, Krishnaji very slowly fainted sideways, his head coming to rest on the seat beside me. Alain said, "We mustn't touch him." I drove as slowly as I could in the pouring traffic until we could get off the autoroute and pulled up off of a side road. In a few minutes he came to and said, "Let's drive on," which we did. It happened again, and we kept driving. I had asked him to wear the shoulder and seat belt, but the slow faint was to the left, and his shoulder slipped out of it. After the second time, we made a cushion of my coat to support him. He fainted a third time and was roused by the horn of a passing car and came to with a cry and gesture forward as though warding off something. After that he said, "I think I had better be sick and that will end it." So we drove until we found a deserted side road. He went off behind bushes and came back, saying, "Grass is quite cleansing if you chew it."

Alain asked if he shouldn't tell the homeopathic doctor whom they were going to see in Geneva about this symptom. Krishnaji replied that it was not a physical symptom. "He leaves the body. It happens often, usually after being very busy." There was a strange quality to it, unlike any faint I had ever seen. Like the slow bending over of a flower; a great delicacy. No collapse; just a graceful, slow coming to rest. We asked if he had warning of its coming. He said yes, that sometimes it was preceded by a severe pain in the head. "I had it yesterday." If it happened in bed he would remain in it for quite a while.

That evening after dinner in the hotel in Montbazon, Krishnaji referred again to the fainting and why it was not a physical symptom. To me he said, "Do you know what kundalini means?" I said I had only a vague idea. He said, "The ancient Hindus believed in forms of energy, which came into the body or were sent by gurus, and that they emerged through chakras [centers of the body], ideally coming out of the head. If they moved downward, one became a sort of sexual maniac and insane. Magic and psychic powers, reading the mind, and all that. There is tantric yoga, which makes use of and exploits this, but one must not let this happen." The faints were some manifestation of all that and were allied to what he had told us about the boy and his unconsciousness in the Ojai years ago when his brother was alive. Then he used to cry out and speak in poetry.

The next day, on the way to Amboise and Chenonceau, Krishnaji asked us, “If you had never heard anything about meditation, what would it mean to you?”

“A turning inward without any objective.”

“Where would you begin?”

“With the fact that I am alive—the only fact I have.”

“With the fact of eating, breathing, etcetera?”

“Something before all that.”

“Must you go through all these things? Isn’t there a primary thing that will take in all those things? That is what meditation is.”

As happened often, he seemed to want to pose the question, probe it somewhat, and then leave it.

We reached Chenonceau, walked around it for a while, and then continued on through the lovely countryside until, on a winding road, we reached the Château de Mimont, where we were to stay. It was remote, quiet, and beautiful. The owner and host made us very welcome, and we were given huge rooms looking over the valley. The supper excellently answered our vegetarian needs.

The following morning brought a shining day and a blessed sense of peace, no hurry, no anxiety, and for me the knowledge that I had brought them to a pleasant place. There were walks before lunch, rest in the afternoon, another walk before supper. At meals Krishnaji told us stories about Sir Edwin Lutyens and Mr. Baillie-Weaver, who had lived a very worldly life but gave it up suddenly on becoming a Theosophist. He had taught the two young brothers how to dress, polish their shoes, and tend to their appearance. At supper, when K was talking about his early days, there was a curious sense of silence in the room. Something in the silence had an almost tangible quality, smooth like amber. K was aware of it and asked if I had felt it before. I had when he was speaking of his life in those times. It brought a feeling of inner listening, a sense of presence.

The next day we drove on to Geneva and spent the night at the Hôtel du Rhône. There were assorted errands to be done, including what was an annual ritual: a visit to Patek-Philippe, where K had his watch regulated. He took a keen interest in this, winding it carefully at the same time every morning, checking that it kept time to the second. The watch was his one cared-for possession apart from clothing. It was a pocket watch and attached to it by a woven chain was an ancient Greek coin with the head of Athena. It had been given to him years earlier by Robert Logan.

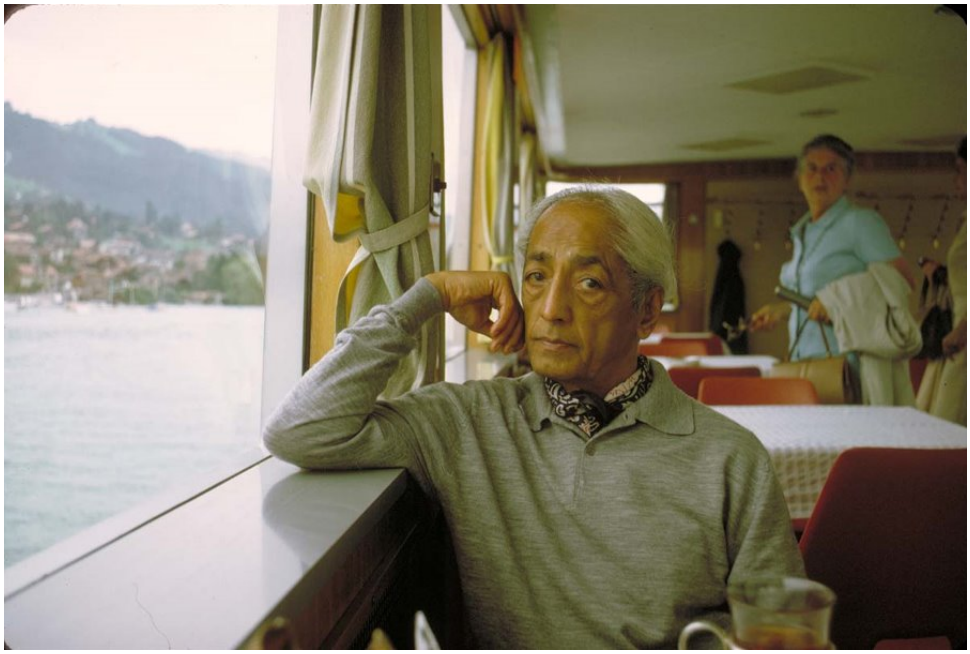
On June fourth we arrived in Gstaad, where I had the same apartment as before in Les Caprices, but this time there was also a studio flat next door for Krishnaji. Vanda Scaravelli's rental at Chalet Tannegg did not start until July, and meanwhile K stayed with Naudé and me. For the first few days, he rested in the morning and walked in the afternoons. I did the cooking. We played records in the evening, in particular Gregorian chants, which he liked and felt had qualities of Sanskrit chants.

One evening he spoke of the game of naming objects after only one glimpse. Then he had us play a game of free associations (his to "spring" was hay fever) and then from memory repeat the sequence backward. I asked him if his state of noticing everything was constant. "It always has been," he said, "except when I'm empty. I hardly look out the window of my room. I'm empty. That's why, sir, sometimes when you come in, I jump out of my skin."

He then asked us—but mostly Alain—if he had the answer to what he had asked us, beginning in the car on the way to Amboise, if we had never heard definitions of meditation, what would it mean? We had said a concern for life. He then asked how does one look at one's self—not each individual thing—but in a way in which all things are included?



He went on. "It's like being up there," he said, pointing to a mountaintop. "When you look down from there, you see everything in its proper place. So how do you see from there? Not 'how,' but you know what I mean. That is the question." And then, "Do you remember that silence…where was it?"

Alain: "The Château de Mimont."

K: "Yes, there was silence and all the sounds in it."

I said it had happened since, and he nodded swiftly. "Yes, several times in this room. Where do you start to look from? Not up there. Where you are. You must be very sensitive, do everything you can for that—right food, enough sleep, hip baths [with a laugh at me]. Be aware of everything you do. Have you tried that awareness?"

Alain said that he had. K continued, "You are not aware if there is a center watching to correct; as long as there is, you are not watching. There must be no center; then things are corrected of themselves. That is the lesson for this evening." Then he changed the subject and said that he wanted us to speak French only all through supper.

The following day, June tenth, we drove to Thun and caught the little lake steamer just in time. The Eiger and Jungfrau were white and shining above the warm green lake. We got off at Beatus and lunched on the terrace of the hotel, came back to Thun on a returning steamer, and went to the place where K's Mercedes was kept all winter. It was waiting, and he drove it to Gstaad while I followed them. It had been a golden, marvelous day, quite hot, and the snow on the mountains was part of the radiant summer. At lunch K had said, "There is no discovery in thinking; only in observation."

On June fifteenth the three of us set off in the morning for Geneva, going via the Col des Mosses, down the mountain, around the far side of the lake, in and out of France. It was a lovely morning. The fields deep in grass and wildflowers; high up the bright shine of snow and glowing green below. We had taken a picnic lunch and spread it out on a new car rug under trees. Then on to Geneva, where we left our things at the hotel and went off to a Hitchcock movie, Dial M for Murder. When in the film the murderer agrees to kill for $1,000, K spoke up, “Oh, don’t, sir! It’s not worth it!”

On the following day both Krishnamurti and Alain had appointments with the homeopathic doctor, Pierre Schmidt. Alain remained in Geneva to meet Desikachar, and I drove Krishnaji back to Gstaad. We lunched again with the Biascoecheas and in the late afternoon walked along the river by the little airfield. I made him supper and afterward played a recording of a muezzin's call to prayer, which he found moving.

The next morning he went for a drive alone in his Mercedes and came back looking eager and pleased. “It was for meditation,” he said. A rainstorm in the afternoon cleared the heat, and it was cold and raining lightly when we went for a walk, crossing the fields to the river and the path along it. The conversation turned serious when he asked, “I wonder if there is a way for people not to be so involved in families? Why does one need relationship so much? I may like a person, but why should there be a need?” Was it perhaps part of an innate instinct toward finding something beyond the ordinary level of consciousness, a movement that is misperceived as a sexual aim but doesn’t continue toward total freedom? We walked back to the chalet, and he said, “We will talk of it at dinner.”

Later he continued, saying that in sex there is a moment outside the self, but when remembering it, sensation and desire for repetition step in. It is misused. I said I could not imagine life without the experience of love. It might be the love of a person or the beauty of the sky, but it is a state of love. Losing my husband had not destroyed for me that state; it had gone beyond the give and take of two people, yet the sense of it was there.

He said, “I think it is a wrong question to speak of this or that—to divide it. As long as there is a center, one does this. When there is no center, one can have all these things, but when the center exists, these things prevent the other.” Then he asked, “Why are you here in all this? Do you see the reason?” I didn’t understand the question.

“In order for Mrs. Zimbalist to be here, to do all these things, something had to happen. Why are you helping, doing all these things?”

I said they needed doing and I happened to be here and could help.

“Oh no, that would be your doing one thing and then turning to another,” said Krishnaji.

“Do you mean that when my marriage ended I turned to something else?”

“No. Do you see something foreordained?…That is a wrong word.”

I said, “Do you mean some sort of fate, destiny? If so, I have no idea about that one way or another.”

“You wouldn’t be here if your husband were alive?” I said probably not. We talked a little, and I mentioned the interview I had with him in 1960 at Ojai. “Were you wearing a fawn coat?” he asked suddenly. Then he spoke of “that boy” and how they saw in him his past lives and his face in them; how there seemed a sort of management. “Not by me, but things seemed to be arranged, a development.” He seemed to be saying that my being there, doing what I could, was no accident but foreordained in some way. A curious conversation. There was that silence again. “Did you hear it?” he said. He got up, and with his extreme courtesy and sweetness, thanked me, asked if he could do the dishes, and went to his room, taking a tray of ice cubes to put on his eyes to lessen the inflammation from the hay fever.

Desikachar arrived with Naudé in Gstaad, and stayed nearby, but came for meals at the chalet. It was his first time in Europe. At supper Krishnaji seemed to feel expansive and told some of his stories. One was about the pupil who studied with his guru for fifteen years, felt he hadn't attained, so left and studied elsewhere for another fifteen years. He returned to the first guru and said he had now attained; it was marvelous; he could walk on water. The guru said, "Show me a little." So he did, and the guru said, "You took fifteen years to do that? If you had told me I could have shown you there is a ferry."

Another was a story of a sanyasi who went to the Lord Vishnu and said, "Lord, teach me what is truth." Vishnu replied. "It is a very warm day. Fetch me a cup of water." The sanyasi went with a cup and knocked at a villager's hut. A beautiful girl opened the door; he fell in love, married her, and had children. Then a great rain came and a flood, and the house was swept away. The man grabbed his family and prayed. "Lord Vishnu, help us!" Vishnu replied to him, "Where is my cup of water?"

Then: Two sanyasis came to the bank of a river and found a beautiful girl weeping. "What is the matter, sister?" She replied, "The river has risen. I live over there and cannot return." So the first sanyasi, who had asked the question, carried her across and left her. The two sanyasis walked several miles, and then the second said to the first, "Brother, what about that? We have taken vows never to touch a woman; you held her in your arms—didn't you feel anything?" The first replied, "I left the woman on the river bank, but you have been carrying her all this way."

Desikachar attended to Krishnaji's yoga exercises each morning. I too had lessons, and at meals K gave him meticulous lessons in Western table manners from which Alain and I learned a thing or two as well.

In the days ahead, Krishnamurti, Naudé, and I went to Geneva. Conversation in the car veered from car engines to a sudden asking of what love is. "Not all is the exchange between two people. For love there must be meditation. There must be no memory." And then, "Love is innocence." At that point he asked me if I would like to be twenty-five again. "Not back to when you were twenty-five but be that now, having had all the rest of your life." I said that, in that case, yes. "I thought so," he said. Later he admonished us about food and the good or bad of taking vitamins. He was in a whirl of energy and kept coming back to it to tell us more. He said one must make the body very sensitive by learning what foods were best for one.

On a drive, talking of relationship, he said, "I have always done what I wanted. One reason Rajagopal used to get so upset was that if I wanted to give something away, I gave it." He spoke of seeing things instantly. Why in the past hadn't I seen both death and pleasure and "stepped out of it"? I said that I had. "No, no, Madame, why didn't you see it then?" He spoke vehemently, as he often did in discussions when something was not seen. He went on to say, "Passion is its own action. In that there is discipline." And having said that, he also said, "That's it!" with the enthusiasm he had in so many conversations when he came upon something. He seemed almost to be saying that there should be passion, intensity without any need for expression. He also said, while driving back, that all effort is error. I asked if this was because effort is directed toward an end or goal and therefore away from fact or reality. He said, “Yes. Passion is its own action.” The act of stepping out of something was part of the act of seeing, was the intensity for me in the conversation.

The next morning, when he came in for breakfast, he asked me if I felt any effect of what had been said, and at lunch he looked sideways at me and laughed to himself. I asked why, and he said he was thinking of masks and how we wear them, and was wondering what went on behind my mask years ago.

The following day Krishnaji said he hadn’t slept well but wanted to go for a walk in the morning, as there was no sun. Would it interfere with my fixing lunch? It was raining very delicately, and we went down between the airfield and the river. He wanted to go where there were no people. Many were arriving for the talks. “I don’t dare look to the left or right,” he said as we drove down the main road. “You don’t mind if we walk fast?” We set off, and he immediately returned to the conversations we had had and their effect. I said the “stepping out of things” had been happening, and was it valid in immediate things or only if one had stepped out of the whole mechanism? I was afraid of avoidance. He said it was not avoidance or suppression if one was aware of the whole thing and saw the mechanism. That awareness and stepping out of the problem were one. I had had a curious and most vivid dream wherein I entered a vast, sweeping river in which I knew I would drown or be saved as equal possibilities. I had instantly known on awakening that the river represented change, and its gray color was that of the Saanen River but infinitely wide. I described the dream as we walked along the river; he smiled and said it was a symbolic dream. I said yes, it could be interpreted in various ways—either being saved or destroyed. “Oh no,” he said and asked, “How would a psychoanalyst look at all these things?” I described the process. “Oh, that takes forever,” he said.

I asked what he had been thinking of in the mask remarks of the day before, and he said we all wear them, but it should be possible to live with no mask, no defenses, directly in contact and with no objectives. The rain was almost a mist, and the earth and trees seemed to breathe. It was beautiful and intensely alive. We walked down to the end of the airfield until he felt tired, and we came back.

At lunch there was a teasing battle on marriage, with Desikachar as the audience, K and Alain attacking, and my taking the defense. I said that Alain put it alongside leprosy, and K’s tones in using the word “marriage” to the children at Rishi Valley was enough to put terror in them. He would make a remark and then look sideways to see how much of a rise he had gotten. We agreed that the whole system needed revising and suggested he reinvent its meaning.

In the afternoon, Vanda Scaravelli arrived from Rome at Chalet Tannegg and came down to supper. It was very good to see her. She met Desikachar for the first time. The following day both Krishnaji and Alain moved up to Tannegg. Krishnaji thanked me for everything and asked mischievously if he and Signora, as he called her, quarreled, could he come back and stay with me? I moved most of their things up to the chalet, and as I left Vanda said, “You must come for all lunches and suppers,” very sweetly. Krishnaji walked me to the car and thanked me again.

The public talks began on Sunday, July tenth. The tent was full. K had some trouble with his cough at first, but it passed. In between two of the talk days, Alain and I went to Divonne to hear Sviatoslav Richter play. It was with great expectation for me, for I had heard him, and Alain had not. As a musician, Alain started smiling after only a few minutes of the opening Mozart sonata, and by the end said he was the only pianist in the world, a giant among dwarfs.

A few days later, as I finished a yoga lesson, the doorbell rang, and it was Krishnaji, bringing the Mercedes down to be stabled in my garage. Could I drive him up the hill in my car? And “she may ask you to lunch.” I could, and she did. We were K, Vanda, Alain, and Desikachar. There was a big discussion of which country we should all live in and have a house together, where to go the following June, and where to go that year between the end of the talks in August and New York in September. At one point during the lunch, K turned to me and said, “I am very glad to see you.” He was full of energy and animation all through lunch and afterward. “We must live in Europe, not too remote a place, and must arrange to have “no cooking or dishwashing” in the country in Italy, France, or England. After he went to rest, I stayed and talked with Vanda about various things—his fainting in particular.

The next afternoon there was the first discussion between K and young people. About sixty to seventy people came. Chalet Tannegg was overflowing. Krishnaji came in through the dining room, saying to Vanda and me, “Sono timido.” She and I sat on the floor and listened. The questions were mostly on fear, and it lasted an hour and a half.

On July nineteenth, after the fifth talk and lunch at Tannegg, K took me aside and said that he had word that perhaps Mrs. Pinter, with whom he was to have stayed in New York, might not be well enough to receive him. I had said I would arrange to have Alain stay wherever I stayed, and K now wondered if there would be room for him? I said I would, of course, arrange it. I thought of asking my brother if I could borrow his apartment, and when later Vanda asked me to accompany K while he drove his Mercedes, I told him my suggestion. During the drive he asked me what people say after the talks—do they discuss them? I said I didn’t know because I avoided discussing them with anyone but Alain. “Are those questions helpful?” I said yes and described how in a talk such as that morning’s such a state of absorption is produced that, when he stopped or someone leapt up with a question, it is almost a physical blow.

“If I said something wrong or made a mistake, would you be aware of it in that state?”

I said of course; it was being deep in attention. But afterward there is an inability to talk, an exhaustion for quite a while.

“What did you get out of this morning’s talk?”

“A feeling of an ability to stop, to be empty without the question ‘What will I do then?’”

We spoke, too, of dreams. I asked why one dreams so often in symbols and not directly. He said, “Do you dream much?” I said not very much. I was thinking of the recent dream I had told him about, my drowning and being saved by being washed against a redwood tree, how the river was a symbol of change to me, and the tree was, of course, himself. He nodded.

“One shouldn’t have to dream,” he said.

“Please do not answer if I am being indiscreet, but do you have dreams?”

“Rarely, but sometimes I have nightmares. The other night I had one about a precipice, but I always know in the dream that it is just that.”

“While the dream is going on?”

“Yes.”

“Does that dissipate it?”

“It goes away.”

Several times on the drive he thanked me for coming and hoped it wasn’t a nuisance. In turn I said I hoped my presence wasn’t an intrusion. “Oh, no,” he said with a smile. It rained, and there was billowing fog at times. It was beautiful, and I felt very still inside and at peace.

A friend, Marcelle Bondonneau, one of the French group who had known Krishnamurti for many years, had been saying to me that when K spoke in Paris he should have a place of his own to stay where he would not have to be someone’s guest. Though she was an old friend of the Suarèses, she felt it was not easy for them to be his hosts anymore, and it would not be convenient for Mme. Annette Duché either, who might normally offer to house him. Marcelle suggested that I rent a place for Krishnaji for the time of his talks and run it for him. I felt at first that I would be intruding, but she insisted that it would be more comfortable for K. I talked it over with Vanda, who also urged me to do it, and finally I talked briefly to K. He said we would talk about it. Vanda suggested I go ahead and rent a place, “and they will come.” She also kindly asked me to stay for supper and said, “Why don’t you come here all the time?”

On July twenty-seventh I was to drive Krishnamurti and Naudé to Geneva. On the way it was decided that he would not give any more interviews, which had continued almost daily through the time of the talks. His voice was very throaty from the bronchitis. As we drove down to Aigle, he greeted the two tall cypress trees along the road in Italian, “Buona giornata, amici!” Shortly after we crossed the Rhône, I had the feeling that he might be going into a faint—not from looking at him—it just came to my mind. A few minutes later, he toppled slowly sideways. He didn't have on the seat belt; he had tried to fasten it earlier at my asking, but it didn't fit and he had said, "I will pretend to wear it." So when he fainted, I instinctively reached my arm to catch him and protect his head from touching the steering wheel. I slowed the car but continued driving; Alain was in the back seat reading and didn't see the quiet faint. I spoke his name twice to get his attention without rousing K. "Can you drive?" Alain asked quickly. I said yes, and it continued for four or five minutes—longer than the fainting in France. Then K gave a startled sound and awoke, righting himself as he did. After a short time he said, "I hope you didn't mind my head in your lap." He seemed all right, and I picked up speed.

A little before Evian, he turned suddenly and asked, "What were you thinking about just then?" I answered just as suddenly, "I was thinking about you"—which I was, with concern and a thought of not driving too quickly so that if he fainted again I would be ready to protect him. He said that he had suddenly had the feeling of mind reading, and that he mustn't, that it was like reading people's mail. I asked what he had seen, and he said that I was thinking of him but not the content of the thought. Later I asked if he could do it at will, and he said it just comes, but that as a boy he could tell what was in letters when they were held against his forehead, and once on a train he told Rajagopal the name of a man sitting opposite them, that he was from Chicago and would get a telegram. At that point the porter brought a telegram for that man from Chicago, and Rajagopal said, "For God's sake, don't do that."

When Alain went into the post at Evian, I told K that I had known he was going to faint. "You did?" I asked him if he knew it would happen. "I knew something was going to happen. It wouldn't have happened if I had been with strangers."

In Geneva he had an appointment with Dr. Schmidt and emerged looking pleased. He had had acupuncture for the first time. Coming back on the autoroute, he asked me to touch 100 mph, which I did a few times briefly. We stopped for lunch in Lausanne. He said the acupuncture had done him good, and he was full of energy. We talked about KW Inc., the need for money, and Rajagopal matters. He said that Alain must see as much of California as possible, named all the places he should visit, and that he needn't be in Ojai for the talks. Both Alain and I demurred at this.

There was another discussion with young people who listened raptly to him. His bronchitis was still bothering him, but at lunch and after the meeting, he was full of teasing Vanda about her house building in Florence. She was, as always, charming, gentle, and firm too, about the way things should be. Iyengar was to arrive in a few days for his annual visit to give yoga lessons and, as he had always stayed downstairs in Chalet Tannegg, it looked as though it would be a rather dramatic household. Iyengar was not pleased at his nephew, Desikachar, being there and being the one to do yoga with Krishnamurti.

On Sunday, July thirty-first, K gave his tenth and final talk in the tent. He spoke of the folly of seeking and that only when there is no space between the observer and observed can there be freedom, a real relationship.

On August third the daily public discussions in the tent commenced, and most of the audience remained for them. In the meantime, I had had a cable from my brother saying he wanted all of us to stay in his apartment in New York. This I told to K, who had also received a cable from Mrs. Pinter who thought it best if he stay with me. He asked me to go on a drive and said it looked as if he would stay with me both in New York and Paris. I quickly told him that, with the help of Marcelle Bondonneau and her friend Miss Elmenhorst, an apartment in Paris for the following spring would be found.

The following day K told the Suarèses that he would not be with them the next year, and Mme. Duché said he should do whatever he preferred when he said he had an offer of another place. So it was settled that he would stay in whatever I would find. After the public discussion in the morning, he met with Vanda, Alain, and me to talk about whether a permanent structure for the Saanen talks should be made in place of the rented tent. It was tentatively decided not to do this, but what was decided was a new policy to not visit anyone except Vanda but to rent temporary places when needed. I went ahead then and talked to Marcelle Bondonneau and Gisela Elmenhorst about finding something suitable in Paris. Later K asked me to discuss with Anneke Korndorffer renting in Amsterdam for the talks there after Paris.

At Chalet Tannegg, Vanda's son, Alberto Scaravelli, had arrived, and David and Saral Bohm were there. During lunch Krishnaji questioned David about the state of science. David was depressed at the lack of interest of young scientists in seeing the implications and direction of genetic research with no concern for the results. Krishnamurti was very intense in urging him to speak out against this. "I saw you were depressed [in the tent]," Krishnaji said. He sat at the table and talked until after 3:30 p.m.

The seventh and last public discussion in Saanen was held on August ninth. It was for me as if he were speaking to us from a far-off perception that reached into the heart of our lives and left me in a wordless silence. Alain rang and said that K wanted to see me at 3:45. He was asleep when I arrived. I sat briefly with Vanda and her guests and then went into his room and sat on the floor, as in India, while he told me that he had spoken to Leon de Vidas, who was in charge of things in France and Saanen. K told him he no longer wanted to be a guest of people. Mr. de Vidas approved. Then K told him that he wanted to go ahead with plans to speak in Paris and Amsterdam and also wanted to share the expense with me. I said that if it worked out with Ojai, then well and good, but if it did not, I was ready and expected to pay the whole costs. K protested and said I was going into capital. I said not yet. "But can you afford all this?" he asked. I said I couldn't do it for fifty years but had money saved up that I would use and asked if he would please not think about it and let me take that concern. I asked what part of Paris he would prefer, and he said it was for me to decide.

The following morning I drove Anneke Korndorffer up the hill to discuss the Amsterdam plans. Krishnaji was in bed, very tired but also wound up. We went over the possibilities in Amsterdam, which he knew very well. Anneke said it would be difficult, but she would work on it. Then Mr. de Vidas arrived, and I started to leave, but Alain came after me, saying Krishnaji would want to see me again.

When the de Vidas meeting was over, I went back in, and he had me pull up a chair opposite him; Alain came in, and a rather bewildering conversation took place in which he wanted to be sure I would not repent what I was doing and what all this would cost me, and that my family might be critical. I tried to tell him that I was not going to ruin myself financially, but he wouldn't let me speak. As far as my family was concerned, I was accountable to no one but myself, and how could I assure him that it was all right? He said that Vanda had cared for him for years, and when he asked what it had cost, she said, "None of your business." He repeated what he had told Naudé on their association—that each was free to come or go, and now they were friends. Now I was in all this, we were all friends, and he wanted it to last. None of my reassurances were heard; he held my hand and shook me silent when I tried to speak.

At one fairly wild moment he said that he might marry, and Alain chimed in and said that he might marry, and I said in that case I would arrange marvelous weddings for each of them, and we all laughed. But in most of the conversation it was hard to have him listen. I felt he wanted to make sure he was not imposing on me, and that was his point.

Finally it all abated. Alain went out of the room for something, and I said I wanted to spell out to him, since it was relevant, that he should know about two people close to him, that nothing but friendship ever existed between Alain and me. At this point he put his hand over my mouth and said he had never had such thoughts, such monstrous thoughts! I said it wasn't monstrous and that he should know.

"I don't want confessions!"

I replied, "There are no confessions to make, but I want you to know this." It was rather hard going, but he had brought up all this, and I hoped he had listened because he has every right to know the people he allowed near him. When all this was over, he kissed my hand and I left, exhausted.

For a few days Alain and I went to Paris to examine where it would be best to find a flat for the time of Krishnamurti's talks the following year. We also went over to London briefly. On our return to Gstaad, K was looking rested and well. Iyengar had left, and yoga continued with Desikachar. K had had an invitation to speak at Harvard University in the autumn, and he wanted to discuss whether to accept. Both Alain and I hoped he would, and Alain would see to the arrangements for Harvard when we were in New York. The subject of money and KW Inc. came up as Enrique Biascoechea said that K should have a definite and regular amount for his needs. He asked me what I thought, and I said that of course he should, that donations were sent for him. K had no idea of the cost of living, and when he asked Rajagopal about the funds in KW Inc., he received no reply except once when a copy of a tax return was sent to him in India; Rajagopal knew that K would not be able to decipher it. He said how he hated to discuss money, and Rajagopal knew it. I said rather heatedly that KW Inc. only existed because of and for Krishnamurti, and this whole situation was insane. He tapped the top of my head as though to stop an explosion.

There was a discussion of what dentist to go to in California—the one in Ojai or one in Los Angeles. K leaned toward the one in Los Angeles. “Then I can get away, which may be a good thing.” The Bohms came to tea. Krishnaji thought David should return to the United States. “A more alive world of science there.”

On August twenty-ninth I left early for Thun to leave my car there for the winter and came back to Gstaad on the little mountain train through late summer softness of air and fields of wildflowers, where the third cutting of the hay was at work. Alain met me at the station, and we found K walking toward Saanen. All three of us went to fetch the Biascoecheas up to Tannegg for lunch. Isabel, Krishnaji, and I were in the back seat. I reached behind to steady a bag of groceries, and K said, “A lady is putting her arm around me.”

I said, “Yes, the package is just a subterfuge for that.” He had the look of glee he had when amused and said, “She may kiss me!”

I said, “Oh, yes, but I am shy and have to work up to that slowly.” This made him laugh and say, “That’s right—slowly.”

Later, when I went to say goodbye, Krishnaji was in bed and said, “I am having a baby.” And so he seemed to be—a large mound on his middle, a poultice of some sort of hay, cooked and wrapped around him each night, a homeopathic something for his liver. He looked happy and cheerful as a child, kissed my hand, and said, “See you in New York. Happy voyage, happy landing!” I left Gstaad and flew to New York and then to Malibu.

Section Three

On September twentieth, 1966, Krishnamurti and Naudé arrived by air in New York, where I met them and took them to my brother's apartment, which he had made available. Their luggage was missing at the airport but later was found and delivered to the apartment. Shortly after Krishnaji's arrival he received a telephone call from Rajagopal in California. After a few minutes, Rajagopal began to berate Krishnaji for having agreed to speak in New York with such anger and vehemence that I could hear it from across the room. It was a shocking beginning to Krishnamurti's arrival in the United States.

We settled into the apartment, arranged dentist matters, and walked around the reservoir in Central Park in the afternoon. At breakfast one morning K spoke of waking up in the night and feeling "the room was full of people. It wasn't subjective. I wondered if they were angels." He had been thinking the day before about what to speak of in his first talk. He was awake for a short time, and later, when he re-awakened, it was all settled. Later at lunch he spoke of it as if he wondered what it had been. I asked him if he had seen anything visually.

"The room was dark."

It seemed to be a sensing rather than a seeing. In any case, he seemed ready to speak as a result of that night. The talks were held at the New School for Social Research. Mrs. Pinter sent a car for him, and precisely on time he came out of his room dressed immaculately in a dark blue suit with dazzlingly shined shoes. "Do I look like a movie star?" he asked mischievously, and off we went. The hall was jammed with people. He entered down the aisle from the rear and went up onto the stage. He spoke strongly and eloquently. At the end he walked out the same way and got quickly into the car, but not before an Indian follower of Dr. Timothy Leary grabbed his arm, saying Leary wanted to see him.

The next day Alain went to Boston to see about Krishnamurti speaking there. K and I had lunch at the house with Yolande de Manziarly as our guest. Afterward we called on Mrs. Pinter and later walked along the edge of Central Park. As we neared the apartment house, K said, "Naudé will arrive." And seconds later, as we reached the door, Alain was getting out of a taxi. All had gone well in Cambridge.

On the twenty-ninth the poet Allen Ginsberg and his friend, Peter something, and Timothy Leary came to talk to K, who asked Alain and me to be present. Ginsberg at first did most of the talking and said that he had not been satisfied with Krishnamurti's answer to his question about LSD. He said he was searching for a repetition of a spontaneous experience he had once had. LSD gave him something similar but not as strong. He asked K what his own state was? K replied, "With me it is different," but declined descriptions. He pointed out the conditioning process of searching and that you cannot come to the other through such means. While Ginsberg was talking, Leary sat with a sort of smirk, in an attitude of posed attention. Suddenly he interrupted Ginsberg and announced that he was about to change the consciousness of the American people in four years—predictable on a graph, stop the Vietnam war, and end racial strife—all with LSD. K said the Hindus had been using mind-changing means for thousands of years and this was nothing new. He described the search of sanyasis he had talked to; they had spent fifty years experimenting with austerities, drugs, kinds of yoga, meditation, etcetera, and after hearing Leary talk, K told him that what they had done had been illusion. At one point K said, "You know what the symbol of the cross is? The denial of the I." And he made the gesture. Leary leaped to his feet, flung out his arms, and thundered, "Yes! We come on the stage, we pluck the nails out of the hands, and fling them on the floor!" All this apparently in a performance he was giving in some theater. K told him the real "other" must be done by the individual alone, unaided by anything. Leary then said he agreed with him, which he obviously didn't, and they left.

On October third, in the car going to the New School during a ride in silence, K turned to me and said, "What am I going to talk about? I have no idea." He repeated it a few minutes later. I was reluctant to say anything. The third time he asked, I felt an impulse to say something and reminded him that he had told the audience that he would speak of death. What ensued was, to me, one of the greatest talks on time, death, and love.

During the days in New York between talks, Krishnaji saw people at lunch, went to the movies a few times, and walked daily in the park. He spoke of Alain needing a holiday, and I suggested they both needed one. K then switched the subject to considering what would happen when he died or retired. Who would carry on? I said Alain was the only possibility. K then said it shouldn't be just one person but a few young ones. How to find them? How to shape the next years when he would still be active to bring him into contact with such people? What were the best uses of his time and activity? We spoke again of living where he could have people come to him, where he could do as much work as he felt like but not be tied to his heavy schedule of talks and travel.

After the sixth and final talk at the New School, K's attention turned again to Ojai and the problems there. If Rajagopal were antagonistic or deteriorated, what should he do? How could things be continued? There seemed a famine of useful, intelligent people who could be brought into the organization. There were the finances, keeping of archives, editing, negotiations with publishers, arrangement of talks, and eventual uses of all these matters. "I can't do any of this, or if I do, I can't do the other," said K. Mrs. Besant had put Rajagopal in the job of doing all this. The money in KW Inc. was given so that Krishnamurti would be taken care of and never dependent on anyone. "And now I can't buy a shirt," K said.

He continued the conversation at breakfast the next day. Would I be on the committee of KW Inc. and stand up to Rajagopal? He seemed preoccupied with what should be done with the money after his death. I pointed out that if Alain and a small group were to continue the work, something must sustain them. After breakfast Rajagopal telephoned with all sorts of questions. It clearly made Krishnaji nervous to talk to him. The potential arguments made him shake. And he said this was one of Rajagopal's good moods.

At another breakfast he questioned us on what was the effect on an audience of his presence. Did it have some sort of hypnotic and distracting effect that interfered with what he was saying? What if he spoke from behind a curtain? "What do they see when this person speaks?" Alain and I both said that whatever had brought people to listen to him, his presence brought about a level of attention that opened the person to his words. He again spoke about the theory of the World Teacher and it all being planned. "This is what they [Theosophists] said. I don't know."

On a walk in the park, I asked him about levels of communication and how it appeared to me, at times, that he was communicating on a nonverbal level. Did he do it consciously?

"Not in the sense of intentionally, at will," he said. It happened. He didn't know how it occurred, except he knew that it did. I also spoke of the projections we all make at times: that he knew the future, could read our minds, had total knowledge of reality. His replies seemed to imply that the glimpses of the future were simply glimpses; the mind reading happened sometimes, not at will. The knowledge of reality was perhaps not implied in the experience of it. This he did not say, but when I articulated it as a possibility, his silence seemed to let it stand. Here it is difficult to distinguish between what could have been my imagination and a strong feeling of something communicated but unspoken. My instinct was that it was the latter, strongly, but verbally it was not a fact.

On October sixteenth Krishnamurti, Naudé, and I flew to Boston where, at Harvard in Lowell House, K spoke to a full group of students and professors during two days. The questions put to him were more penetrating than average. We returned to New York after a student discussion on the seventeenth, and on the eighteenth we flew to California.

We were met in Los Angeles, drove to Malibu, and it was a happy feeling to have them both there, to fix supper in my own kitchen, and to see Krishnaji in his dressing gown, sitting gracefully at the dining room table, looking out at the olive tree and the Pacific Ocean.

The following morning, we went into town to see the dentist. K had a small cyst in his lower lip, which needed attention. We came back and took a long beach walk before supper.

At breakfast the next morning, K was somewhat tense discussing meeting Rajagopal. Then he said Rajagopal must be nervous, too, at his arrival, which made him laugh with a note of slight hysteria. "It used to be the other way—I used to be shaking, now he is worrying." But the distressing thing to Alain and me was his evident nerves, even while talking about it. After breakfast he telephoned Rosalind Rajagopal to say we would be coming for lunch; then he had me telephone Rajagopal, after which he spoke to him himself. We left Malibu and drove to Ojai, where K guided me to Arya Vihara, where Rosalind had prepared lunch. She and K talked, and afterward I drove K and Alain around to Pine Cottage, where Rajagopal was waiting. The two men embraced, Rajagopal looked moved but turned his head aside as though avoiding K. We took the luggage out and Rajagopal first wished to take me to where I would stay in his old flat above the office next door to Pine Cottage. There was a small garter snake by the front door. "I hope you don't think I put it there on purpose," he said. The rooms were immaculate and curiously empty. He opened Krishnaji's cottage and the flat next door, where Alain was to stay. They, too, were empty, clean, and efficient, as though held in a vacuum. Then he went to talk to K briefly and arranged to meet the next day. Rajagopal lost his glasses and hunted for them for a while. When he left, K and Alain came over to my flat. K said he had not set foot in the apartment where I was staying, as Rajagopal had chided him once for coming in with dirt on his shoes. I welcomed him, and he looked around and at some paintings, done by Rajagopal, on the wall. "He is much worse off," said K. He showed us the pepper tree under which he lay unconscious long before, in 1922, when it all began. Mrs. Besant had said the tree must always be preserved; now it was tall and majestic, with outstretched branches protective of the cottage.

He led us through the orange grove to Arya Vihara, where Rosalind and her white poodle joined us for a walk. She and I took the road while K and Alain went through the orchards to avoid devotees who had told Rosalind they had felt his presence for two days. We walked near Thacher School and later had supper with her.

At the table a constant chivvying began. One sensed the domination of the two Rs on K for years. An argument grew over whether Timothy Leary had been present at Aldous Huxley's death. Rosalind said that she had gone to Hollywood on a hunch that Huxley was worse, and his wife, Laura Huxley, had said to come because he was weakening. She had also said not to tell him that President Kennedy had been shot that day. Rosalind said she had massaged Huxley's arm and abdomen, which eased him. The assistant doctor had come, and Laura Huxley was asked to give him LSD by injection, saying that Huxley wanted it. She had asked Aldous Huxley to squeeze her hand if he wished to take it and felt he had done so. The doctor had permitted it. Later Laura Huxley had wanted to give him more; Rosalind had looked questioningly at the doctor, who had appeared to indicate it made little difference, that Aldous was beyond all that. His pulse had been so weak it was hard to be sure when he died, but it was near five o'clock. He had had enormous courage, never complaining. K said that Aldous had told him three years earlier in Rome that he had cancer of the tongue and that up to then he had told no one else.

K guided Alain and me back through the darkness and trees to the cottages. He showed us a heater closet where he had once spent the night when he had forgotten his key and didn't want to disturb either of the Rs. "They would have been too angry," he said. It was a shock to think of him standing all night in the narrow space next to a water heater to keep warm, to avoid being berated by two people who had been given the privilege and responsibility of taking care of him. I said it must have been part of what made him ill in 1960 when he had to cancel part of his talks. He said it was his kidney, but also that.

“It mustn’t interfere with your talking now,” Alain said.

“Oh, it won’t. I had no one to talk to then. I have you two now.” It was as though he was still in part the shy child who never matured through the usual human relationships and therefore was still sometimes in the dominion of those who ran his affairs.

The following day, Friday the twenty-first of October, I drove Alain to the Oak Grove and brought back Rajagopal to see K. They talked alone in K’s rooms, and at times the insistent, tense voice of Rajagopal penetrated the wall to where Alain and I sat in his sitting room. After lunch at Arya Vihara, K, Alain, and I drove back to Malibu, then to Beverly Hills for the doctor to look at the cyst in K’s lip and for Alain to see the dentist, then home to Malibu.

The next morning we talked at length about what to do in Ojai. K composed a letter about what he wanted done: the KW Inc. board to be enlarged and active; he proposed my being on it as a start to the enlargement; no one to be the central person on it; no longer sole control by Rajagopal there or by de Vidas in Saanen; disclosure of assets; KW Inc. to provide support of $12,000 a year for K; a salary of $6,000 to $7,000 per year to Alain, and a pension on K’s death to Alain. We took a long beach walk in the afternoon, K striding ahead by himself, seeming absorbed in a far-off state.

It was a warm and lovely day following. K stayed in bed all morning writing the letter to Rajagopal, and in the afternoon my friends, Amanda and Phil Dunne, and their youngest daughter came over. It was sunset by the time we went for the beach walk.

On the twenty-fourth of October, K and I went to the doctor in Beverly Hills, who removed the cyst in K’s lower lip using Novocain. A piece the size of a fingertip came out, and three stitches were put in. We drove straight home, and at the beginning of San Vicente Boulevard, K fainted, falling to the left. I caught him with my right arm and continued driving slowly. He came to in about a minute, but fainted again twice with a slight moaning. I stopped the car on reaching the coast road, but he revived and said to continue home. There he went to bed, and we put ice on the lip, which was quite swollen. He rested in bed the remainder of the day, and I telephoned the doctor, who said the laboratory report would be ready the next day. Alain and I had a swim in the afternoon, and Krishnaji insisted on coming to the table for supper. He had considered “whether the body were protesting and feeling sorry for itself when it cried out when he fainted. It has become much more sensitized.”

On the twenty-seventh we returned to Ojai, lunched at Arya Vihara, and then I drove Alain to the Oak Grove for a microphone rehearsal. When that was done, Alain and Rajagopal sat in the car for a long talk while I sat in the Grove. I finally got so cold I had to interrupt them, but they had talked for two hours. Alain was not supposed to know what was in K’s letter, but Rajagopal said he was in agreement with much of it.

The Oak Grove was Krishnamurti’s favorite place to speak. Away from the road, under native wild oaks, there was both shade and sunlight where he sat facing the audience, who were mostly seated on the ground that sloped gently up the hill. It had been six years since he had last spoken there. His first talk was on Saturday, October twenty-ninth, a hot day, and a large crowd had gathered. Many had come out of curiosity, too ready to laugh and take photographs, but others were serious and attentive. He walked out quickly at the end, and I had to dash to reach the car and get him out and away.

The next day was again very hot, and a large crowd again came for the second talk. Afterward K and Alain lunched at Arya Vihara while I cleaned the cottage. I tried to avoid meals with Rosalind because the tension at the table was unendurable, an unceasing sniping at K: "Eat this, eat that. Why don't you finish your food? I suppose you won't like this…" and on and on. We drove back to Malibu and, as daylight savings time had ended, it was dark on the beach, but cool and beautiful. K walked ahead by himself. Alain was very upset by the nagging of Rosalind, the accusations of Rajagopal, and Krishnaji's putting up with so much from both of them. I felt Alain's justified frustration and at the same time was touched by the sight of the slight figure marching along the sand. He had lived seventy years by the calendar but seemed still "that boy" at such times.

We went to town to have the stitches removed from K's lip. All was well with it, and we came back in time for a very long beach walk, mostly in the dark. K described an insight on the beach: "To look one must see in a flash; the continuation of looking is thought and hence not seeing. The conditioning, the interference cuts in the moment there is prolongation. In the instant one can see the whole." He said something happened on the beach, but he didn't want to put it into words.

Filomena Renzi was a gentle, very dear Italian woman who helped me in the house and had been with my family most of her life. Krishnaji noticed that she looked tired, and when I told him of her arthritic pains in her neck, he asked if he should put his hands on her and try to help it. This he did, asking me to stay in the room. He stood with his eyes closed behind her, while she sat in a chair, and put his hands on her shoulders. She sat for a long time after he had finished and left the room. "Ha le mani di un santo [He has the hands of a saint]," she said. He did it again the next day, and she told me the pain had vanished.

We returned to Ojai, where K spoke to the students at Thacher School, and then he and Alain lunched with me on the terrace. The next day I took K to the dentist, and Alain lunched with me, as he was finding Rosalind so disagreeable. K asked him to bear with her for the remaining time. That afternoon K held the first public discussion in the Oak Grove.

On Saturday, November fifth, for the first time a film was made of Krishnamurti as he gave a talk. It was done by National Public Television Films Company in black and white. The inconspicuous setup was two 16mm cameras, one light and a reflecting foil in the canopy over his head, and two Nagra voice recorders. Krishnaji, tired from all the Rajagopal contention, said, "What shall I talk about?" in the car going to the Grove. Then, with the faintest glance at the apparatus, he began to speak, the fatigue vanished, and his face radiated an inner power and illumination.

The next day the talk was filmed, but on the seventh, after a night of heavy rain, a discussion in the Oak Grove was impossible, so K spoke at the Happy Valley School, and from there we left for Malibu. The rain had stopped, and there were rainbows in the valley as we were leaving. In the car K was silent a long time and then said to Alain, "Make a note of this sentence: Meditation is the emptying of the mind of the known." He again treated Filomena, and she had had no return of the pain.

In Ojai again on the ninth, Alain and I were asked by the Blackburns to listen to a tape of a 1964 talk and then compare it with the printed text, which Rajagopal had edited. There was considerable alteration from the original: omissions, additions, rearrangements, and substitutions for K's words. K was concerned. Later that day he went to the Thacher School for a discussion with the older students.

On November tenth, in the late afternoon, Rajagopal came to talk to Krishnamurti. The atmosphere in Ojai had become by then rather like that of a Hitchcock film. We were fairly sure the cottages were bugged. The two met in the small office next to the archive vault, and in a short time we heard Krishnaji return to his room. The light in the other house remained on for a while and then went out, and K came to where Alain and I were waiting. He motioned us outside to tell us, away from possible microphones, what had happened. K had asked Rajagopal what he had done about the letter he had sent him. Rajagopal replied, "Nothing. Why should I? I don't take orders from you." K asked him to pay close attention and said that he was very serious about what the letter contained; if Rajagopal didn't do something, the consequences would be on his head. At this Rajagopal said, "What are you doing? Is this a Brahmin curse?"

K replied, "Rajagopal, what are you saying? I am explaining that consequences follow, as the dentist says if one doesn't do something this is what will happen to your teeth."

Rajagopal said, "I am a Brahmin, too, and I curse you far more than you can curse me!" Then he told K that he was no longer what he was, i.e., the World Teacher, and apparently more, which K didn't quote to us, but said Rajagopal was attacking "the other." And at last K said, "Rajagopal, I am through. I am walking out." And he got up and left.

The next day, I took K to the dentist and then took Alain briefly to Rajagopal's to tell him that Krishnaji refuses further money from KW Inc. and therefore he did not want any salary, and that from then on K was going to keep the tapes. On our return to Pine Cottage, K sent for James Vigeveno, saw him alone, and, as he was a vice president of KW Inc., read him a copy of the letter he had sent to Rajagopal, which Rajagopal had refused to read to Vigeveno. He also told him he was leaving KW Inc. Later, there was a public discussion in the Oak Grove.

The next morning, while in the Ojai market, Rajagopal's second wife, Annalisa, came up to me to ask if we could talk as one woman to another. She said Rajagopal would be angry if he knew, but would I tell K that Rajagopal had been prepared to agree to things in the letter if K hadn't threatened him? She said she knew how difficult Rajagopal was, but she had known him nine years, loved him and K both, and hoped K would listen to him without reaction. Then Alain appeared, and the conversation stopped. She obviously didn't know the appalling things Rajagopal said to K and believed the untruth that K had threatened Rajagopal.

The fifth Ojai talk took place that afternoon, and afterward, back at the cottage, there was a long, harrowing telephone conversation between Rajagopal and K, with Rajagopal haranguing and shouting at K and K shaking with the violence and shock of it. Rajagopal had slammed down the telephone. Alain and I both felt ill at the sight. Another dreary supper followed at Arya Vihara. When Krishnaji, who had had about three hours of sleep the night before, said he hadn't slept much, Rosalind shot at him, "Oh! Why not?" as though he were a child who had broken a rule. The combined effect of the two Rajagopals all these years was sickening. It had been an exhausting day.

The following day, again after very little sleep on the way to the Oak Grove, K said to me, "What a life!" Then he gave his sixth Ojai talk, and it was a tremendous one on beauty and meditation and emptying the mind of the known. As he spoke, the exhaustion and marks of those awful days vanished, and that extraordinary beauty of face and voice, the depth and quality of the other, came over him.

The last meeting was on November fourteenth, a public discussion. He spoke on the shallow mind. It was filmed as before. We left immediately for Malibu, changed, and went down for a long walk on the beach. The sun had set, and the surf was soft. We came on a cormorant on the sand, possibly ill. It sat motionless as K came within a yard and gave a long plaintive cry twice.

Coming down in the car, Krishnaji said he must revoke any power of attorney he might have given to Rajagopal. He thought it might have been in the form of a letter—a gentleman's agreement—but he said he must revoke it legally and wanted to give it to me, if I would accept it. I said I would do whatever he wanted, but he must tell me explicitly what he wanted done and how far I was to go. We talked about it further at supper.

On November sixteenth we returned to Ojai so that Krishnaji could go to the dentist. At Pine Cottage he telephoned Rajagopal to say that this was the last day to settle things. A violent, outrageous conversation on Rajagopal's part ensued, again accusing K of cursing him, "Who are you to tell me what to do?" etcetera. Krishnaji asked for the tapes of the Ojai talks. Rajagopal's reply was, "You'll have to get a court order to get them!" He ignored K's request for the manuscript he had written a few years earlier. Krishnaji had the first tones of severity in his voice and wasn't put so much on the defensive, but he shook with the violence of the onslaught. Rajagopal's voice was like a drill hammer coming through the telephone so that both Alain and I, sitting across the room, could hear its fury. He finally hung up on K—the third time there in Ojai and once in New York. It was ugly, shocking, and insane.

K then sent Alain and me to ask in person for the tapes and manuscript. We drove to Rajagopal's house, rang the bell, and at that moment Annalisa drew up in her car. What did we want? She didn't think Rajagopal would see us. Alain gave the message from K. She went in and came back saying that R refused the tapes, the manuscript, and to see us. We left and came back to K. I made lunch as Rosalind had gone to Los Angeles "to hear a lecture by the best speaker in the world." K rested, and later we went for a long walk, mostly in the dark. We talked of what to do with future tapes. K would keep them and do as much of his own editing as he chose, but would this be good for him in relation to his speaking? Both Alain and I thought it would take the edge off talking and be too much of a burden. We were prepared to do it or form an editing group. If a secretary transcribed them with as little straightening of the syntax as might be needed, that was all that would have to be done. As for the power of attorney, I felt if K wished it, I would fight Rajagopal in court, but I needed to have K's instructions on how far to go. I was prepared to do whatever he wanted, even though it sounded like a nightmare. There was no consideration of not doing it. I had the curious sense of being an instrument of some other force in this. Walking up the road in the dark, there was a sense of freedom and completeness after a dreadful day. We had supper in the flat I was in. All of us were very tired.

Thursday, November seventeenth, was a day Rosalind wanted to take K to see her daughter, Radha Sloss, in Santa Barbara, so Alain and I had the day to ourselves. We drove up the coast and into the Santa Ynez Valley, the country wide, beautiful, and empty. We came back to Santa Barbara to buy books for the trip to Rome, went to a movie, came back to Ojai, and dined at the Ranch House Restaurant.

The following day we left Ojai for good by 9 o'clock. K said he had walked alone on the beach at the Hope Ranch the day before and had "a marvelous meditation." Then he spoke of what being "out of KW Inc." was to him. He would have nothing to do with it; let Rajagopal have the money, everything. He couldn't go through a battle; he was not made that way. He would just walk out. He talked about this as though none of the horrors of the past few days had happened. His defiance and then saying he would leave it to Rajagopal seemed a complete capitulation to Rajagopal to both Alain and me. I felt both dumbfounded and not surprised, both at once, as though I hadn't believed he would go all the way in dealing with Rajagopal's aggression. Alain was shaken and said what he felt. I saw everything falling apart.

We arrived at Malibu in the middle of the discussion. The television people were due but luckily hadn't yet arrived. We sat in the car talking and then went into the house and continued until they did arrive and had set up their gear on the lawn. It was to be an interview to go with the filming they had done of the Ojai talks. Dick Moore, the producer-director, sitting off camera, put questions to K. When it was finished, we went directly to the beach for a walk before dark. When we got back to the house, I went in to talk alone with K. He repeated that he wanted to be out of KW Inc., out of the Saanen Gathering, and out of the organization in India. I said that I had only one interest—his teaching and doing what I could for him personally and I shunned being part of the rest. What further could Alain or I do to come to the realization of his teaching? That was each of our abiding interests. K said that Alain needed a rest; perhaps he should stay there with me and not go to India. I said that, of course, he would be welcome. I called Alain in, and K spoke about his taking some time off. Alain said that he wanted and needed a holiday but not at this moment—only when things were peaceful. He didn't feel able to take a holiday then.

K said he would make a last telephone call to Rajagopal. We put the call in, sitting in his room, and he got Annalisa. Rajagopal was out. She seized the chance to talk to K and poured out her emotions, including asking K if he thought Rajagopal were perhaps unbalanced. K spoke soothingly and noncommittally to her but was startled that Rajagopal's own wife would ask that. I went to make supper at that point, and while Alain was packing K again rang and got Rajagopal. He reported that he had told Rajagopal that he, K, was not going to get a lawyer, as Rajagopal thought, but that he was out of KW Inc., that he didn't know what form things would take, but that he was out. Rajagopal replied that it was a blessed day.

When supper was ready, we sat down, and K said to Alain, "If ever you are disillusioned with me, you have only to say so." Alain said the same thing to K. I saw a possible edge in this, but it was over in an instant.

After Krishnaji had gone to bed, I had a long talk with Alain and at the end of it felt that things were calmer. The following day, November nineteenth, I drove them to the Los Angeles airport, where they flew to Rome. Ten days later, a letter came from Alain saying he was taking a holiday in South Africa instead of going to India.

On December first Rosalind Rajagopal came to see me. She said she wanted to tell me things and had proof of what she was saying. She fumbled with a lot of papers and then read me a letter. What she didn't know was that the "proof" she offered was actually a letter she had written and sent to K, who had shown it to me. She clearly wished to discuss Alain. I said I would talk to her about anything she wished but that Alain was a friend and I would not discuss him. The meeting soon ended.

On December third I received a very nice letter from Krishnaji saying he hoped all the contention in Ojai had not upset me, thanked me, and said, "This is more than a bread-and-butter letter." I spoke to both K and Alain on the fourth. Both sounded well. K was to leave on the eleventh for New Delhi, and on the same day, Alain was leaving for Pretoria. On the thirteenth, a letter, written in Rome, came from Alain, telling me that K would like to stay at Les Caprices in Gstaad in June. On December fifteenth Krishnaji began his talks in Delhi, and on the eighteenth he wrote to me from there.

CHAPTER 10

1967 began with Krishnamurti in India visiting New Delhi, Benares, Madras, Rishi Valley, and Bombay. Alain was in South Africa but returned to Europe in February and among other places went to Paris to help find a place for Krishnamurti to stay in April. Both of them wrote to me while I remained at home in Malibu.

On March fifth Krishnaji flew to Rome, where he stayed with Vanda Scaravelli, and I flew to London. Alain was there and told me about a house he had found and rented for our use in the Boulogne-Billancourt section of Paris. We telephoned Anneke Korndorffer in Holland and learned she had found a place for us there as well.

On March seventeenth I was in Paris and went to see the house at 11 rue de Verdun; I went over everything with the proprietor, and Alain went to Rome to join Krishnaji. On March twenty-second I also flew to Rome, took a room at the Hotel Raphael, and then went to Vanda's on Via del Casaletto, where we all four were together at lunch. Later I took a walk with Krishnaji and talked over everything that had happened in California.

In the days that followed, Krishnaji gave talks at the Istituto di Pedagogia, held discussions with young people that Alain had rounded up, went shopping for shirting material, and always took afternoon walks. On April fifth I flew to Switzerland and picked up my car, which had been stored there for the winter. Driving through a spring snowstorm, I stopped in Gstaad for some things left in the Caprices attic, bought some vegetarian groceries, and drove on into France, stopping for the night in Avallon.

By noon the next day I was in Paris, checked the inventory at the rue de Verdun house, and moved into it. On the eleventh I went to the Salle de la Chimie, where K would speak, and then, with Mr. de Vidas, I went to Orly to meet Krishnaji. He seemed pleased with the little house. It was on a corner of a quiet street, had a small courtyard, an air of a former time, and was only a few blocks from the Bois de Boulogne. We were having supper when Alain arrived in his Volkswagen.

The days before the talks began were pleasantly filled with long walks in the Bois and some ritual shopping—the matter of Charvet shirts and shoes at Lobb. We went to the cinema and had people to lunch. On the sixteenth K gave his first Paris talk. The Salle de la Chimie was a much better hall than the previous Salle Adyar, and it was well filled. He spoke largely on violence and sorrow.

We took to walking in the afternoons in Bagatelle. The winding paths past flowering trees and beds of tulips brought me glimmers of my childhood and a smiling feeling of being there once again with Krishnamurti. After a second talk on April twentieth, on the next day he spoke at a Quaker Centre on the rue Vaugirard with a collection of young people. He gave what I remember as an extraordinary talk on the twenty-third and again held a young people discussion. Various French friends of many years came to lunch, and Krishnaji, Alain, and I went to lunch with Marcelle de Manziarly and her brother, Sasha, at their flat on the rue Jacob. It was a cheerful lunch; both were very old friends of K and devoted to him. Sasha made him laugh with all sorts of stories.

His last Paris talk was on April thirtieth, and on May third, K, Alain, and I flew to London so that Alain could see his doctor and Krishnaji could have a fitting at his tailor.

We stayed at Claridge's, did all the errands, saw a James Bond movie, and flew back to Paris.

The days continued in the little house. A group of young people came to talk to K, we lunched with the Suarèses', lunched also with my father, who lived in Paris, walked daily in the Bois, and finally, on May tenth, after packing and doing the needful things about leaving the house, we loaded both cars and set off for Holland, Alain in his station wagon and K and I in my car. We went northeast and met in Arras for lunch at a restaurant called Changy then continued on into Belgium, where we spent the night in Ghent at Hotel St. Georges.

The next day we left Ghent at 10 a.m. and went through Antwerp into Holland. K appeared to like being again in the country where he had spent so much time in the past. There was something oddly reminiscent for me. The flat and tidy landscape stretched under a low sky with clouds that seemed a familiar shape until I realized I had seen them in Dutch paintings. Somehow I became slightly lost in Utrecht but found the way to Huizen, where we encountered Alain at a crossroad. Together we found our house, an old-fashioned farmhouse with a thatched roof and a large central room that must have been the barn. There was a crackling fire and a faint but pleasant barn-like smell. Anneke Korndorffer was there with lunch ready, and we sat down with enjoyment. Later we were shown where K could walk in a nearby wood; a very private place with large trees and winding, small canals busy with ducks. No people seemed to come there, and there was only the life of the wood, and Krishnaji's quick stride showed he was in his element.

We settled into our nice house. A neighbor, Mrs. Maurenbroker, who was a friend of Anneke's, showed me where to shop for food in Bussum. After lunch the second day, Alain drove Anneke back to her house in Oosterbeek while K and I walked again in the wood, and later the three of us had supper by the fire in the large room. We drove the following day to lunch with Anneke and then came back for a lengthy walk before another quiet supper. The next day was a holiday, Whitsun, and we stayed in and talked of where we might live in the future—a pleasant speculation.

On the seventeenth Mrs. Rukmini Arundale telephoned and came to tea, a rather formal meeting. She cast an appraising eye on the two newcomers: Alain and me. Krishnaji, as host, was formal, polite as always, but it seemed a cool meeting. At the next breakfast, K, Alain, and I had a discussion on whether the critical mind can be without condemnation and then went for a drive to the edge of the Zuiderzee. It was cold and wintry. We came back for lunch by the fire, and after a rest K and I walked in the nearby wood. Anneke returned. I needed to know how to drive K to the Congress Hall, where the talks were to be held, so Alain and I went into Amsterdam. After reconnoitering the route, we had lunch and spent the afternoon in the Rijksmuseum among the Rembrandts and Vermeers. I came back with eyes filled and walked with K.

On May twentieth K gave his first Amsterdam talk. Alain went ahead to set up the Nagra tape recorder and, timing it carefully, I drove K to the hall, which was filled and overflowing into adjacent halls, where television screens were set up. The three of us came back for a late lunch, and in the afternoon Mary and Joe Links, with a Dutch couple, friends of theirs, came to see Krishnaji. After tea all of us went for a stroll while talking. When they had left, K, who didn't consider a stroll to be exercise, said to me, "Come, let's have a real walk," and off we went at a fast pace into the lovely wood.

It was exhilarating to walk this way with him, talking, the air pristine with spring; there was an enthusiasm in his step as if he were joined to the life of the wood. The paths followed the stream, and we paused to watch a little crested duck leading her brood of ducklings neatly spaced behind her. We were to watch, in the days to follow, fewer baby ducklings in the queue—perhaps the work of foxes. The remembrance of this was to come to Krishnaji later, as his own life was ebbing. He said to me one morning in Pine Cottage at the end of his life, "Do you remember the little ducks and how each day some were gone?" I wept then, but his voice was dreamy, musing.

The next day Krishnaji gave a second talk at the Congress Hall and later did a taped radio interview. In the evenings he began again to heal my chronically ailing leg. On the days between the talks, he gave some interviews, met a group of sixty young people who had come for discussion, and always we walked, sometimes twice a day, Alain too. On one of these walks, Alain spun an idea of finding someone in Africa to travel with us and help with practical things—visionary plans. When Anneke was there she did the cooking or we shared it. In the mornings I made breakfast, and K would wander in after his exercises and talk to me. It was a lovely way to start the day.

The fifth and last Amsterdam talk was on May thirtieth. It began on the religious mind and moved with a clarity that seemed, as so often to me, an extraordinary wave that washed through one's consciousness, leaving a silence of revelation.

The talks being over, it was time to leave Huizen, our thatched and sheltering barn, and most of all the quiet wood. We packed and on June second said goodbye to Anneke and headed south in the two cars. Crossing into Germany, Krishnaji and I met Alain in Cologne, where we lunched, visited the cathedral, and drove on through Bonn to Königswinter, where we spent the night high on a hill above the Rhine at Hotel Petersberg. The next morning we drove along the Rhine to Oestrich, where we lunched at Hotel Schwan. We decided to push beyond Heidelberg for the night, so we went on the autobahn from Wiesbaden to Karlsruhe to Ettlingen, where we stayed at the Erbprinz Hotel. We were all tired, so after a short walk K had supper in bed while Alain and I went to the dining room.

The next morning took us into Switzerland, and at lunch in Basel we decided not to stop in Berne but to push on to Gstaad, where we arrived in the late afternoon. I had my usual apartment in Les Caprices, where Krishnaji stayed with me while Alain had a studio apartment. We left our things and went to the Olden for supper. It was nice to be back.

Unpacking, marketing, and cooking took the next day for me while Krishnaji and Alain went to Thun to fetch K's Mercedes, stored there during the winter. We learned that fighting had broken out between Israel and Egypt.

On June eighth we drove to Geneva, where K and Alain went to see Dr. Pierre Schmidt for checkups. I met them for lunch at the Amphitryon Restaurant in the Hotel des Bergues, and we drove back via Evian on the French side of Lac Léman. The war news seemed to be that Israel was winning, and by the tenth it was so. Back in Gstaad we talked and walked and took to recording conversations at lunch.

On the twelfth Alain went to Geneva to meet Desikachar, who arrived from India to see to Krishnaji's yoga practice. The days ahead continued in relaxed and pleasant ways: yoga, naps, meals at home with long talks, and always long walks in the afternoons. On one of these, K and I were down by the river along the airfield, and I was describing to him something I was uncertain how to resolve. As we walked, K listened and then said in a quiet way, "Why don't you just step out of it?" And it happened, as instantly as the dazzling sunlight touching my eye; the conflict was gone, as if it had never been. He had said nothing else, no pointing to mechanisms of thought, no seeing something on my part. Something from him had reached into my mind, and change had been instantaneous.

On June nineteenth I took my car to Thun for some repair. Krishnaji, Alain, and Desikachar joined me there, and we went in Alain's car along the Thun Lake to Beatenberg, had lunch, and drove on to Interlaken and around the lake to Gstaad. K began to think that I should change my car for a Mercedes.

David Bohm was in Gstaad for a few days and lunched with us, as did Mr. and Mrs. Gérard Blitz. K appointed Mr. Blitz to the Saanen Gathering Committee.

On June twenty-ninth Krishnaji had fever in the night, and in the morning it went to 101.8 degrees. Alain telephone Dr. Schmidt, homeopathic remedies were prescribed, and Alain went to Thun to fetch them. In the afternoon Krishnaji became what in someone else could be called delirious. He began to speak in the voice of a child and looked at me with large eyes as if he didn't know me. He spoke of Krishna going away and asked me if I had questioned him. I said I hadn't. "He doesn't like to be questioned," he replied. The child manner continued, and his gaze wandered about the room. The voice continued: "Even after all these years, I'm not used to him." By the time Alain returned, the fever was still high, but he was out of the delirium. He slept quietly.

The next day, June thirtieth, was a Thursday. K still had the same degree of fever most of the day and was very weak, but there was no altered consciousness. I gave him bed care and what Dr. Schmidt had prescribed. In the afternoon he was better and said he did not want to cancel a Sunday meeting of the Saanen Gathering Committee. Vanda arrived from Italy in the afternoon, and Dr. Schmidt said it would be all right for K to be moved to Chalet Tannegg the next day, Saturday. That morning his temperature was normal; I gave him lunch and after his nap drove him up to Tannegg in his Mercedes.

As predicted, he was well, and the Saanen Gathering meeting took place. I was made a member. The other members were Alain, Mr. de Vidas, Sr. Fresia, Mr. Perizonious (from Holland), Doris Pratt, and Mary Cadogan. Gérard Blitz was to be added later. I stayed to lunch with Vanda, and we talked at length. The same program was repeated the next day, and Sasha de Manziarly was at lunch. Vanda talked to me about looking after things at Tannegg during her absence, as she was leaving the next day. K was well enough to come down and walk by the river.

Vanda left on the fourth, and on the sixth, K and I in my car, and Alain and a friend from South Africa in his, drove to Evian and lunched pleasantly on the terrace of the Hotel Royal then continued on to Geneva and spent the night at the Hôtel du Rhône. K and Alain went to see Dr. Schmidt the next morning. We lunched with Sasha de Manziarly at Hotel Richmond, and I drove K back to Gstaad. Alain remained in Geneva to meet Dr. Balasundaram there the next day.

On July ninth the first of the ten Saanen talks began. The tent was full to overflowing. I drove K there, timing it so he could walk right in and onto the platform. At the end he would leave and walk rapidly out and up the path toward Gstaad. People would stream after him, and it was necessary to maneuver the car through unheeding crowds to pick him up. At the chalet he would rest before lunch and then join whoever was invited that day. Balasundaram came; so did Narayan and others. Pupul Jayakar came for one night, and the next morning, the fifteenth, Alain drove her to Geneva and brought back Nandini Mehta and her daughter, Devi Mangaldas, who came for a visit and stayed in the downstairs flat at Tannegg.

As usual, K spoke on Sundays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays. With flowing energy he went into the need to be without authority; to be free from all psychological structures; to see the crippling of dependency and conflict; and of the ever-compelling question of fear. He spoke of freedom that is not from something but freedom that is complete in itself, "an inward state of mind that is not dependent on any stimulus, on any knowledge; it is not the result of any experience or conclusion."

On a walk in the rain, he talked with Alain and me about a long vacation in 1968 and also said we must take the same house in Paris for the talks. That evening Marcelle Bondonneau and Gisela Elmenhorst had supper with me and agreed that the same house in Boulogne-Billancourt should be had.

On the twenty-fifth, after K's eighth talk, Dorothy and Montague Simmons were at lunch. Afterward K discussed starting a school, probably in Holland. The next day he held a meeting in the tent of an educational group and announced plans for a school in Holland. In the afternoon Nandini and Devi came with me on a drive to Interlaken, and on the twenty-eighth both of them, with K and Alain, drove with me to Geneva, where K and Alain saw Dr. Schmidt. After lunching at the Amphitryon, we drove back via Evian, stopping for tea at the Hotel Royal. It was a busy time; various people lunched at Tannegg or came to tea. Vanda's son, Alberto Scaravelli, arrived; a group of fifty came from Spain to talk to K; and there was another meeting of those interested in a school in Holland. There were shorter drives with Nandini, Devi, and Krishnaji, and on August fifth, the mother and daughter left for Geneva and Rome.

During this busy time K increasingly felt a pressure of people's attention concentrated on him in Chalet Tannegg. To somehow have respite or avoid being a target, he tried spending nights in his room at Caprices and sometimes had supper there, too. This feeling would often come over him usually when he had been in one place for a while. One of the enjoyments for him when motoring slowly through France on the way to Switzerland was that we were drifting along through quiet countryside, where no one knew him and no one quite knew where he was. Later, in Ojai, he used to speak of having a cabin somewhere in the mountains where he could be away from the sense of people's concentrated consciousness. It was something I planned to find.

Also during this time he received several telephone calls from Rajagopal, always a source of tension. And yet, with all this surface activity, Krishnamurti was talking to those who came to listen and to the whole of humanity, it seemed to me, of what lies at the core of life, behind and beyond what most of us did not trouble to see or even question.

On July twenty-seventh, in his ninth talk, he asked what the mind is; can one ask that without a desire for a result? With a mind "that is extraordinarily quiet," that can therefore enquire into the origins of thought? "You can ask this question if you are free, if you have no opinion, no conclusion, no beliefs, and in the very asking of it there is austerity…you are putting away everything except that question, which may open the door to enormous vision, enormous depths."

"I can only observe the beginnings of thought in silence. It is only then when my mind is completely quiet after having put that question—what is the beginning of thought? When it is completely quiet, right through my being, that I can begin, out of that silence, to see how thought takes shape."

And…"One can only be aware of the beginning of thought when there is silence, when there is no frontier to consciousness. All this demands a great deal of discipline in itself, not discipline for something, and if we have gone that far, we can ask, what is love?…It is necessary to inquire if love is within the field of consciousness, which is thought…or does love lie beyond this turmoil of thought? When once you have been outside that field of consciousness…then you will know what love is, love in which there is no thought, no tomorrow, and therefore no time. But you will listen to this—pleased and probably mesmerized and enchanted—but to actually go beyond thought, beyond time—because time is thought and thought is sorrow—to go beyond is to be aware that there is a different dimension called love. From there, one can act, one can be."

On August second K began a series of six public discussions, and when they were done, he began on the eighth another six discussion meetings, this time with teachers on education. The same afternoon, those interested in starting a school came, and tentatively the school was considered as being in Switzerland. Vanda returned on the twenty-second. Saral and David Bohm came for lunch.

On the twenty-fourth, Desikachar said goodbye before leaving. K, Alain, and I went to Lausanne, where they went to a dentist and I did errands. We lunched at the Grappe d'Or and drove back to Gstaad. On a walk the next day, K spoke of a place there. A few days later we went with Edgar Graf to look at chalets and land in Gstaad, but nothing was appealing, so we went in K's car to Gsteig and walked. After lunch at Tannegg on the twenty-seventh, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lippmann came to tea and later came with me to a Menuhin concert. They spoke of a moulin they owned near Fontainebleau and wanted to sell.

On the twenty-ninth Krishnaji came down before lunch to fetch his Mercedes from my garage. It wouldn't start, so I drove him up to Tannegg in my car, and he showed me what he had written that morning on meditation and ecstasy. He continued writing down at the flat while waiting for his car to be fixed. Later I walked with him and Alain, and we talked about Fontainebleau. The next day, at Tannegg for lunch, Sasha de Manziarly, who had arrived with Vanda, was there, and later after another walk with K, Alain, and the Lippmanns who again came to tea.

On September second we drove to Thun, where K left his Mercedes for winter storage and I ordered one for delivery in April. We drove back with Alain to lunch with Vanda, and later K came down to pack the things he had at Caprices. The following day Mr. and Mrs. Charles Lindbergh were at lunch at Tannegg. They were friends of Vanda, and K had known them for some years.

On September fourth I left Caprices, went up to speak with Vanda about plans for Tannegg the next year, then drove to Lausanne where I met Alain, who had gone there for the tape recorder, then we both drove to Paris and stayed at Hotel Westminster. The next morning we went to Orly and met Krishnaji, who had flown from Geneva. There were errands, and the next day, after lunching at the Vert Galant, the three of us drove to see the Lippmanns' moulin near Fontainebleau. This was part of the then-possible plan to share a place somewhere in Europe, but though attractive, the moulin didn't appeal very much, so we came back and walked in the Tuileries, where by coincidence we encountered the Lippmanns. We had supper in our rooms in the hotel. The next morning Gérard Blitz came to see K. Later K, Alain, and I lunched at Pré Catelan, walked in the Bois, went to Lobb, and to a cinema. Blitz invited us to lunch with him and Desikachar next day at Drouant, and later there was the afternoon walk in the Bois.

On September ninth, 1967, I left Paris and drove alone to Le Touquet and put my car on the air ferry across the Channel to Lydd. I then drove from there to Kingston Vale, south of London, and to a house rented for Krishnamurti's stay by Mary Cadogan. She and Jane Hammond were there. We checked everything, and I moved in. The next afternoon K flew in from Paris, I met him at Heathrow, and we went to the Kingston house. It was close to Richmond Park, and we went for a long walk there before supper. Deer were grazing and, as always, trees, grass, and space were essentials of the day.

Alain arrived in his Volkswagen in time for lunch the following day, and I went to Heathrow to meet Adriana, the young Italian who had worked at Tannegg and came to help in the house for the time in Kingston. We lunched with Mary and Joe Links at their flat the day following and came back to walk in Richmond Park. Rosalind Rajagopal was in London and rang Krishnaji. She came the next day, an hour late, to talk to him, and when she had gone, K, Alain, and I headed for the park.

K said we might try meditating together, so he, Alain, and I in the early mornings sat cross-legged on the floor in K's room. It was silent and lasted about half an hour. On Saturday, September sixteenth, K gave his first talk, which was held in the Wimbledon Town Hall, and a second was given on Sunday.

On the nineteenth, K held a young people's discussion in Wimbledon Community Centre. Mary Links lunched with us that day, and Iris Tree was K's guest the next day. On driving her back to London, she told me that her cancer had returned.

The third talk was on the twenty-third, and in the park in the afternoon Krishnaji admonished me that I was no longer responsible just to myself anymore, that I must be careful, not do possibly dangerous things, be watchful. Did I understand? Yes, I did. The responsibility was not to him, he said, but to something else, and I must take care.

The fourth talk in Wimbledon Town Hall was on the twenty-fourth. Doris Pratt came to lunch, and later K, Alain, and I went to tea with Robert Lutyens and his wife at their house on Mansfield Street. This was the Lutyens home for many years, and Krishnaji knew it well. He had not seen Robert, however, for a long time, and only that day met his wife and little girl. It was a pleasant meeting, and both men seemed glad to see each other.

On the twenty-sixth there was a second discussion for young people in the morning, David and Saral Bohm came for lunch, and afterward K, Alain, and I drove to look at a house near East Grinstead, which was for sale and had been recommended by a friend of mine. The drive was pleasant, but again, the house did not inspire us to want to live there.

In those days there was a dearth of photographs of Krishnaji. He resisted being photographed, but some contemporary ones were needed for future books. So, with his permission, I telephoned an old friend, Cecil Beaton, who was delighted, and we went to his house in London for a sitting. Cecil was using a Rolleiflex with natural daylight and kept a running chatter that made it go easily and swiftly. Two days later I went in to see the proofs and choose ones that were later used in books.

Mary Links came to the house for tea, and afterward we all talked and walked in Richmond Park. At 7 p.m. she, K, and I went to Wimbledon Community Centre for a discussion, and came back for supper afterward. Mrs. Bindley and George and Nelly Wingfield Digby lunched with K after the fifth talk. That evening K and I had supper alone and talked. "Change is total inaction," he said.

His sixth and last talk of the series was on the first of October. Mary Links came back for lunch, and at 4 p.m. there was another discussion. Then Richmond Park. The next day K had a Huntsman fitting, and we came back in time to have Mrs. Pamela Travers and Mary Cadogan to lunch. That afternoon K, Alain, and I had a different walk in Cannizaro Park in Wimbledon, known to K from his early days nearby in Miss Dodge's West Side House.

The following day, October third, we packed, I took my car to be shipped, and K, Alain, and I had our last walk in Richmond Park. The next morning we left Kingston Vale, K and I in a taxi and Alain following with Adriana the cook. Krishnaji and she flew to Rome while Alain and I drove to Lydd, flew to Le Touquet, and drove on to Paris, where I went to stay at my father's and Alain to a hotel. He then continued on to join Krishnaji in Rome. On October seventh I flew to New York and a week later to Malibu.

1968 began with Krishnamurti and Alain Naudé in India. I was in Malibu. Letters came and went. On February fourteenth they both flew from Bombay to Rome, and on that same day James Vigeveno rang asking if he and his wife, Annie, could come to talk to me. They arrived in the afternoon to propose that I become a trustee of Krishnamurti Writings Inc. I asked if they had consulted Krishnamurti about this. Mrs. Vigeveno looked startled and said they had not. I said that in that case I could not even discuss it, and the meeting ended.

The following day I drove to Claremont to meet Mr. William Rempel of the Blaisdell Institute, who had invited Krishnamurti to speak at the colleges there in the autumn. I also looked at possible places to stay during the visit.

In March I went to New York for a week and then flew to London, arriving on the tenth, and went to the White House Hotel near Regents Park, where letters from both Krishnaji and Alain were waiting. On the eighteenth I flew to Paris and stayed at my father's. We lunched one day in Barbizon, where I looked at a place for Krishnamurti to stay during a short rest between London and the rental of the house in Paris. Alain Naudé arrived in Paris with his car, and we had a long talk over tea.

On the twenty-second, I was back in London in the White House Hotel and, with Mary and Joe Links, went to the airport, where Krishnaji arrived from Rome. Alain had already arrived in his car when we reached the White House Hotel, and all three of us had supper together in our sitting room. The next morning Gérard Blitz arrived. We had discussions all day long, and much was accomplished. This continued the following morning; we lunched at the Savoy Grill and came back to the hotel to meet Mary Cadogan and Michael Rubinstein, a distinguished lawyer and very knowledgeable in publishing matters, to discuss Krishnamurti's copyright. After this Gérard Blitz left.

On the following day, Kitty Shiva Rao and Sunanda and Pama Patwardhan, all in London on a visit, came to see K, and he told them of his breaking with Rajagopal. On the twenty-sixth David and Saral Bohm, Mary Cadogan, and Dorothy and Montague Simmons came to discuss a school in England. It was decided to go ahead. A place near Canterbury was a possibility. Krishnaji, Alain, and I went to a movie in the afternoon, after which we walked back to the hotel, and there was talk between K, Alain, and David Bohm.

On the twenty-eighth K had a meeting with the editing committee and went to Michael Rubinstein's office in Gray's Inn, where K made a will. That evening, after supper in our sitting room, I took the boat train to Paris.

Arriving in Paris on March thirtieth, I had breakfast with my father then went to Orly to meet Krishnaji. In a rented car, we drove to Barbizon, where I had booked rooms at the Hôtellerie du Bas-Bréau. We unpacked and went for a walk in the forest. K was pleased by it—the solitude of the forest, the rather separate and quiet rooms we had, and the sense of being for a while completely away and at rest. This quality I had already learned was a recurring need for him. So much of his life, from childhood, had been spent surrounded by people; even if they were not physically in his presence, they were in the offing—there—ready to intrude. Often they seemed a psychic pressure, concentrating their attention on him. It was something he found wearing, and when he was away from it he could feel light, rested, and free. In subsequent years, when we motored quietly through France to Saanen, he used to exclaim happily that no one knew where he was.

The week in Barbizon was spent in long walks and talks in the forest, usually in the morning and again in the afternoon after naps. One day we drove to Fontainebleau and looked at the outside of the palace but did not go in. It began to snow, but we still took a long walk in another part of the forest. Conversations ranged over many things. One question he raised was why he had put up with what he called "the brutality" of Rosalind Rajagopal, and why maturity came to him so late. "What is maturity?" Perhaps late maturity was to keep him young to continue his work. Napoléon came into the conversation. It surprised me that he found Napoléon a somewhat admirable character. He had read about him when quite young and retained the impression of someone rising from nowhere to considerable heights. He spoke of death and what his would be to me. Coming back in the car, he suddenly fainted. "Now it starts again," he said. Whenever he is relaxed and resting, it has come. He said, "It means something is going on." But we stopped and walked again, and as he walked the pain in his head vanished. He said that when it happens, the back of his head must not be touched.

The next morning there was no pain. The extraordinary face had come to him in the night. This was something he spoke of when it happened, and it had come to him through most of his life. The face was like a recurring presence that came rarely but consistently. "I am part of that other thing," he said. "Never leave me. I am nothing, but you must never leave that other."

We spoke of style in writing, and he asked how the boy had learned such things.

One morning he resumed dictating. He wrote, “Meditation is seeing instantly the whole movement of the word; the seeing is the doing. In the interval between the seeing and doing is the whole misery of man.”

He spoke again of the boy never being contaminated; something kept him that way. “Who is that man talking on the platform? Of course it is I,” he said, “but how is he able to talk about things he has never been through: jealousy, hate, etcetera?”

Supper was usually early and in the rooms, but sometimes lunch was in the very good restaurant of the hotel. During one of these, a man came in selling newspapers. The headline said that Martin Luther King had been assassinated. “The world is savage,” K said. Watching the others glance at it, he said, “It means nothing to them.”

On April fifth we left Barbizon and drove to Paris and the house at 16 rue de Verdun. The little house seemed welcoming and familiar; we spent the next few days doing errands and going for walks in the Bois. Mr. de Vidas came by; Yo and Mar de Manziarly came for lunch, and we went to the cinema High Noon, which K enjoyed. Alain arrived in his car from London on the tenth. Mrs. Porter, sister of the de Manziarlys, also came to lunch.

April fourteenth was Easter Sunday. K, Alain, and I went to Notre Dame to listen to the music in spite of the dense crowds. On the sixteenth we drove at 7 in the evening to the Salle de la Chimie, where Krishnamurti gave the first of his Paris talks to a full audience. We learned that day that Iris Tree had died on the thirteenth.

On the seventeenth, Mr. Moser, the Mercedes man in Thun where Krishnaji, Alain, and I stored our cars in the winter, brought my new Mercedes 280SE—gray, as usual, handsome, and pleasing to K. We all went in it for a drive in the Bois and later walked there.

K gave five talks in Paris, and the days between were spent seeing people, Krishnaji having young people discussions, walks, and going to the cinema. K had talked to Mima Porter and told her, as secretary of KW Inc., of the gravity of the situation with Rajagopal, and that he must have a response to his requests by July first or he would be compelled to dissociate himself from KW Inc. She promised to speak to Rajagopal on her return to Ojai.

On May third we left Paris—K and I in the Mercedes and Alain in his car. As we drove north on the autoroute, we were unaware that at that moment a students’ revolt and strike was erupting in Paris. There had been sounds of discord before we left, and a friend spoke of students taking over a room in the Sorbonne, where a quotation of Krishnamurti was chalked on the blackboard, but that morning as we drove along, we had no knowledge that paving stones were being hurled at the police back in Paris.

We met Alain in Arras for lunch at Le Changy, drove on into Belgium, and spent the night at Château des Brides in Oostkamp, just south of Bruges. The next morning we went into Bruges and saw the Memlings and a Michelangelo statue, then crossed into Holland through Middleburg, Rotterdam, Leiden, and, with some confusion, to Noordwijk, where we found Anneke waiting in a house perched on a dune, which she had rented for the time of K's Amsterdam talks. It was a restless sort of house; a cold wind from the North Sea blew, and it was shivery to walk on the beach. We found a small wood behind the dunes as a substitute. Our temporary cook from Paris came, but the house remained unsuitable. I tried to find hotel accommodations without luck.

We went, however, to the gardens at Keukenhof and walked among the tulips. On another day we drove to Bussum, where Dutch television taped forty minutes of putting questions to Krishnamurti. He did not know the questions ahead of time, and it was impressive to watch him listen and without hesitation immediately reply directly to the close-up camera with a professionalism few actors could achieve.

There were five talks in Amsterdam at the RAI and four meetings there with young people. Then, on May twenty-fifth, we said goodbye to Anneke and, at 8 in the morning, left Noordwijk, drove across Holland, and at Arnhem crossed into Germany. On the autobahn, with cars rushing past us, I was startled to look down at the speedometer and see we were going over 100. Around lunchtime, we pulled off and had a picnic lunch in a pretty wood. We drove on, and around 3 p.m. reached Ettlingen, near Karlsruhe, where we met Alain at the Erbprinz Hotel. We had engaged rooms there, but I could sense that K wanted to reach our destination, so we decided to push on. I had driven that far, except for K driving for an hour before Karlsruhe, but said that, with some coffee, all would be well. Some tisane was brought for Krishnaji and also a large pot of the best coffee I have ever tasted, with some little cakes. I drank the whole pot and felt I could drive to Spain if necessary.

By chance we met Alain at the Swiss border, drove on to Berne, and finally reached Gstaad by 10 p.m. after 600 miles and about twelve hours of actual driving. Unfortunately, as we were expected the next day, the keys were not in the doors at Les Caprices, and we had to wait for Mme. Duperrex, the housekeeper, to let us in, but by 11 p.m. we were truly there.

Section Four

It was pleasant to be once more in Gstaad, and on the morning of May twenty-sixth 1968 all seemed relaxed and quiet. Riots and crises were still happening in Paris, but though it was followed in the news, this was a space and time for K to rest, to have his ordered, simple regime of yoga in the morning, then breakfast, sometimes reading, lunch at home, a nap, and always a walk in the late afternoon, rain or shine. Clouds would come across the mountains as if seeking the valley to empty their rain burden, to fill the rushing streams, and move on. There was the brilliant Alpine sunlight of early summer dazzling the eye at the bright window boxes of flowers, the green of the hills, dark pines, and above all the shining snow on the peaks. It was quiet in the village. Visitors were few; they would come later. Now there was a luxury of simple days.

Some very good news came from London: Michael Rubinstein had determined that Krishnamurti could recover his copyright from KW Inc. It meant a first step in untangling the knot of legal difficulties.

But on June fifth we learned that Robert Kennedy, just after hearing he had won the California primary as the Democratic nominee for the U.S. presidential race, was shot to death. Shock and violence again.

On June thirtieth Mary and Joe Links arrived; they came for lunch and spent the afternoon, including a long walk, with us. Both K and Alain were having severe hay fever, and it was very hot. On the following day Vanda Scaravelli arrived and moved into Chalet Tannegg, and Mr. C. V. Narasimhan brought Mrs. Jayalakshmi, who was to visit. I packed some things for Krishnaji, and he moved up the hill.

The Linkses left for Italy on July third, and in the afternoon K came down to Caprices. He had a 101-degree fever and his pulse was 98, but he insisted on going to Geneva as planned. I packed for him, and he lay in the back of the car as Alain and I drove to Geneva and the Hôtel du Rhône. He was feverish that night, but it was gone by morning, and the three of us took a 9 a.m. flight to London. Mary Cadogan, Jane Hammond, and Gérard Blitz met us, and we drove to Ayot Place in Hertfordshire to see a house as a possible place for a school. Dorothy and Montague Simmons, and Saral and David Bohm met us there. We went through the whole place and had a picnic lunch on the lawn, after which we went back to the airport, and caught a 5 p.m. flight back to Geneva. The tennis at Wimbledon had filled hotels in London, so we spent a second night at the Hôtel du Rhône and drove back to Gstaad in the morning.

Two days later K gave his opening Saanen talk, this time in a new plastic shelter instead of the previous tent. Michael Rubinstein was there. K had received a letter shortly before from Mima Porter in which, instead of giving the promised reply to K on the state of KW Inc. and a reasonable reply from Rajagopal, she had merely reiterated the by-now familiar evasion that when K came to Ojai in the autumn they would talk it over and settle everything. As Krishnamurti had told her that unless he had a satisfactory reply from Rajagopal by the beginning of July he would be forced to disassociate himself from KW Inc., that time had come. K held a meeting with Rubinstein, Mary Cadogan, Gérard Blitz, Doris Pratt, Alain Naudé, and myself present, and the decision was made. On the following morning, July ninth, at the second Saanen talk, Michael Rubinstein read the following announcement to the audience:

"Krishnamurti wishes it to be known that he has completely disassociated himself from Krishnamurti Writings Incorporated of Ojai, California. He hopes that, as a result of this public announcement, those who wish to be associated with his work and teachings will give support to the new international Krishnamurti Foundation of London, England, whose activities will include a school. The Deed, which establishes the Foundation, ensures that Krishnamurti's intentions will be respected."

This led to meetings with the various Krishnamurti committees to explain K's decision and what was envisaged for the future in the work. Plans were made too for the publication of a regular Bulletin. On July eighteenth, after his sixth talk, Krishnaji held a special meeting at Tannegg with all the Americans who were in Saanen—many of them in particular from Ojai—and therefore most personally interested in his severance from KW Inc. He wanted them to understand what had led to his action. Not at K's direction, but Albert Blackburn of Ojai recorded this meeting on audiotape. Another such meeting was held a few days later.

Meanwhile, the talks continued. K had meetings with young people. He came by and took me for a drive and talk now and again and on walks, too. After ten public talks, on July thirty-first K began a week of daily public discussions in the tent.

On August second Vanda returned to Rome after asking me to see to things at Tannegg in her absence. On most days there were friends at lunch. Alain took time out to go to Paris; while there he saw Gérard Blitz, who had just met James Vigeveno in Los Angeles. Meanwhile, K had seen and talked to Colonel Frank Noyes, who lived in Ojai and who hoped for some resolution of the situation with Rajagopal. K was also discussing the school in England with Dorothy and Montague Simmons and seeing David and Saral Bohm. He also had the enjoyment of driving his little silver car, which had spent the winter in storage in Thun. As always, he took meticulous care of it, cleaning it after every sortie. We went to Lausanne in it one day, and on the autoroute briefly he had it touch 115 m.p.h. "Like a bird!" he said. Alain came back and we all went on long walks, often in the rain, up the mountain, through the woods, and along the Turbach road where the river at such times became a torrent. It was cool, and the snowline was low on the mountains. On August twentieth we took all three cars to Thun for winter storage, returned to finish packing, and had an early supper after a last walk.

The next morning we heard the shocking news that the Russian army had occupied Czechoslovakia during the night. Krishnaji, Alain, and I left Tannegg for Geneva and spent the night at the Hôtel du Rhône before taking a noon plane on the twenty-second to London, where we stayed at the White House Hotel. We again had rooms with sitting space and kitchen, and I fixed our supper. We watched on television the grim sight of Russian tanks in Prague. The occupation was complete.

The following day Michael Rubinstein came for a long meeting, and later we walked in nearby Regents Park. The next day K, Alain, and I went to a meeting with the Wingfield Digbys, the Linkses, the Simmonses, and Doris Pratt in the morning, and after lunching out, we went to a movie. On the twenty-fifth we went with Mary and Joe Links to Epping Forest for a walk. Joe asked K about the future, and among other things K spoke of naming Mary and me his literary executors. We lunched with them in London, and after a rest in the afternoon, K, Alain, and I went for another long walk in Regents Park.

It seemed a good idea to take another look at Ayot Place as a possible school, so the next day after lunch K, Alain, Mary Links, and I drove there and were joined by the Simmonses and the Wingfield Digbys. We went through the house carefully again, but somehow it did not evoke enthusiasm. We came back, stopped at Mary and Joe's, and later Sacha de Manziarly had supper with K and me.

On August twenty-eighth a threatening cable came for K from Rajagopal shortly before we went to Michael Rubinstein's office in Gray's Inn, where the new Krishnamurti Foundation was legally formed and was so constituted that a Rajagopal situation could never come about in the future. Krishnamurti appointed its trustees (governors), who were present, and their first meeting was held. They were Count Hugues van der Straten-Ponthoz, George Wingfield Digby, Gérard Blitz, Alain Naudé, Dorothy Simmons, and myself. Also present were Mary Cadogan, whom K had invited to be secretary of the Foundation, and Mary Links, whom he had invited to be a trustee but who had declined for reasons of age, but now became, along with Doris Pratt, associates of the Foundation with the function of helping reelect trustees, two of whom, other than K, would come up for reelection annually.

At the meeting K spoke of the cable he had just received from Rajagopal. It seemed that conversations in which K had explained to some of the Americans in Saanen his reasons for separating himself from KW Inc. and which had been tape-recorded by Albert Blackburn had reached Rajagopal, who now was threatening legal action against K. Michael Rubinstein advised Krishnamurti to seek his own legal advice in California.

The school was discussed at length, in spite of Gérard Blitz saying it was financially impossible at that point. He then left for the airport, and K continued talking with Dorothy Simmons on starting the school as soon as a building could be found. It was one of the frequent times when K said that if what you are doing is right, the money will come.

On August thirtieth, after discussing Ayot Place exhaustively the night before, K called the Simmonses to come and told them there must be a search for another place. They immediately went to an agent and came back with lists of other possibilities. That evening Mrs. Jayalakshmi arrived from New York and came for supper, and the following day we drove to the Linkses' country house at Blackdown.

On September first the Digbys came by and said they would help with the house hunt. Then Col. Noyes came by. He was on his way to India from Ojai and said he had been sent to bring an offer from Rajagopal to turn over to K most of KW Inc. K listened, told Michael Rubinstein what had happened, and asked Col. Noyes to telephone Rajagopal to confirm it. Because of the difference in time, that had to be later in the day. Meanwhile K, Alain, and I lunched at Claridge's and came back to the White House Hotel, where various people, including Col. Noyes, came for tea. When all the others had gone, Col. Noyes went to his room to ring Rajagopal. After quite a time he came back looking stunned. One of K's stipulations had been about his archives. Rajagopal now angrily refused any "concessions" until he had met K face-to-face, denied that he had asked Col. Noyes to speak to K, and reiterated his abusive comments. Col. Noyes appeared bewildered at the reversal and left. K was not surprised.

We had postponed our leaving London, but it was too late to change plane reservations, so we spent two more days there, and on September fourth Krishnaji and Alain flew via Spain to Puerto Rico, where they were to stay with the Biascoecheas while K gave some talks at the University of Puerto Rico in San Juan. Meanwhile, I flew to New York, where I had rented a small apartment on 62nd Street for K's use. He and Alain arrived there on the twenty-third. After a walk in the park, at supper we discussed a new place near Godalming in Surrey, which had been seen by Mary Links and the Digbys as a possible place for the school, and it was decided that Alain should see it. He flew to England the next day.

On September twenty-fifth a letter and some papers came from Mrs. Lilliefelt in Ojai, showing the result of research she had done on the workings of KW Inc. As a result Krishnaji decided there should be a meeting to discuss the situation and wanted Mrs. Lilliefelt, Michael Rubinstein, and Gérard Blitz to come to New York to join himself, Alain, and me. All agreed to come, and Alain returned the next day with news of the house in Surrey. We had seen photographs of it, found it very attractive but possibly too small. Nevertheless, K instructed Mary Cadogan to negotiate for it. Alain then went to Yale and to Brandeis University about K speaking there, and Mrs. Lilliefelt arrived from Ojai. She came for tea and a long talk.

On October first Krishnamurti gave his first talk at the New School for Social Research in New York to an overflowing hall of students. On the next day Mrs. Lilliefelt came to lunch, and at 4 p.m. we were joined by Mr. Mitchell Booth, my family's lawyer, to discuss the legal situation and go through the papers Mrs. Lilliefelt had brought.

On the third there was a meeting of K, Alain, Mrs. Lilliefelt, Gérard Blitz, and myself, which went on through lunch, and at 2:30 p.m. Michael Rubinstein arrived from London. At 3:30 K and I went to the New School for his second talk while the others continued talking. When we returned, Blitz had left for Los Angeles, but the meeting continued, and Michael Rubinstein stayed to supper. A long day.

On the fourth Mrs. Lilliefelt and Michael Rubinstein came in the morning and Mitchell Booth joined us at lunch. The talk continued all afternoon, after which Rubinstein flew back to London.

There was a third talk on October fifth and a fourth on the eighth, and on that day Mitchell Booth suggested a law firm in Los Angeles to represent K. I telephoned Erna Lilliefelt, who had returned there, to give her the suggested name. K held two discussions with young people at the New School, well attended by about 400 students, and there were two more talks there. After the sixth and last talk, K went to the United Nations to lunch with Director General Mr. U Thant and his chef de cabinet, Mr. C. V. Narasimhan.

K decided against going to Yale, but on October seventeenth, he, Alain, and I flew to Boston, rented a car, and drove to the Charter House Motel in Waltham. On the following day we went to Brandeis University, where K was shown the campus by the students, lunched in the faculty dining room, and at 4:30 he gave his first talk to the student body. On the nineteenth Hugues van der Straten arrived from Brussels, lunched with us, and, after K had given interviews, joined us for supper to talk about the search for a place for the school in England. It seemed that there was another possibility in Hampshire, a place named Brockwood Park.

Hugues left, but for the next three days K held discussions with Brandeis students and gave two more talks. We also watched on television the return to Earth of astronauts after eleven days in orbit. We flew to New York on the twenty-fourth, and the next day we flew to Los Angeles and were once more back in the quiet peace of the house in Malibu.

Four days after our arrival in Malibu, a cable came from Mary Cadogan saying that Gérard Blitz had resigned from the Foundation and also that Brockwood Park could be bought. Krishnaji sent a telegram to Rajagopal suggesting they should meet to discuss KW Inc. matters at the Lilliefelts' house in Ojai. On receiving this Rajagopal telephoned K and refused. He rang back, Krishnaji had me speak to him, and Rajagopal hung up. Later he called Erna Lilliefelt and was insulting.

The next day, October thirtieth 1968, K decided that the Lilliefelts should head an American Krishnamurti Foundation. They came in the afternoon, and this was discussed. That afternoon Rajagopal telephoned and gave me a message for K that there would be no meeting unless he could talk to K alone first. The next day K spoke to James Vigeveno, vice president of KW Inc., and gave him a vivid talking-to on the gravity of a meeting with Rajagopal and the whole board. After that and talking to Erna Lilliefelt, Krishnaji invited all of them, including Mima Porter, the Vigevenos, and Byron Casselberry, to meet in Malibu. Mima Porter immediately refused, so no meeting was held. Krishnaji had made every gesture.

Rosalind Rajagopal rang to ask to see K the following day. She arrived at 10 a.m., saying she would stay an hour. I showed her into the living room, intending to leave her alone with K. Instead she pointed to where I should sit. She stayed until 1:30, tirelessly belaboring K, who listened with an aloof patience. His only comment afterward was, "Ugly people."

On November third the Lilliefelts came to talk, and a wire arrived from Vigeveno saying "a meeting can be arranged for Krishnamurti personally with the board at KW Inc. headquarters." All this was unacceptable to K, and therefore there was a rejection of this invitation. It was followed by a rude letter from Byron Casselberry, and Annie Vigeveno delivered it. K instructed our lawyer to write to Rajagopal.

On November sixth Krishnaji, Alain, and I drove to Claremont, where K was to speak on the college campus at the invitation of the Blaisdell Institute. Its head, Mr. William Rempel, met K and showed us to the house that had been provided. We unpacked, had supper, and were visited by a family of raccoons on the porch that clearly was accustomed to receiving supper, too. K was charmed, and we made them welcome.

We found long walks in the nearby canyon. K gave three talks and held several discussions with students. On the fifteenth he held a discussion that was videotaped with Professor Huston Smith and in the afternoon held another meeting with a full hall of students. The Lilliefelts came to the house, and K spoke to them about the background of threats from Rajagopal.

On the seventeenth the Blackburns came by and K told them that Al could assist Alain in his work in the future providing they could pay their own travel expenses, as there were no funds for this. This was something that they had suggested and they said they wanted to do. The next day NBC did a television taping of a K discussion with students, and in the afternoon we returned to Malibu.

It was good to be at home: to walk on the beach in the late afternoons, to go sometimes to a movie. Alain decided that for his holiday he would rather do things he liked, such as writing, instead of going away. We talked about the Krishnamurti Foundation and about the possibilities of Brockwood Park.

On November twenty-second we went to town with the Lilliefelts to the lawyers' office, where we met Mr. Berkowitz, Mr. Selvin, and Mr. Rosenthal. It was decided that they would write to Rajagopal to arrange a meeting with him and his lawyer.

A meeting was held with pessimistic results. On December ninth Krishnaji, Alain, and I met an old friend of K's, Sidney Field, in Los Angeles, who took us to see Judge Robert Kenney, a former attorney general of the State of California, for advice. He was shown evidence, unearthed by Erna Lilliefelt, of the questionable handling of KW Inc. assets by Rajagopal. Judge Kenney advised us to show this data to the then-attorney general. A day or so later, there was another telephone call from Rajagopal; K happened to pick up the phone and handed it to me. It was another demand to see K alone.

In the days to follow, K recommenced dictation to Alain and began to hold discussions at the house with interested people largely invited by Alain. Various people came to lunch at different times including Christopher Isherwood and Don Bachardy, Deborah Kerr and her husband, Peter Viertel, and Sidney Field and his brother John.

On December seventeenth a cable came saying that Brockwood Park had that day been bought by the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust. Every afternoon there was a walk on the beach before the sun sank into the Pacific. In the slanting winter light, there was a sheen on the sand where seabirds were searching for their supper. K strode ahead, often in silence, as though absorbed in air and sea.

On the nineteenth we drove to Ojai and to the Lilliefelts' for tea and to meet old friends of K. He took the wheel with enthusiasm. "I like to drive. It is a way to see nature without people around." Coming into the valley, he said he felt a welcome from the hills: "I've climbed them all. It has nothing to do with the people."

We watched the launch of the Apollo moon flight on television and followed its orbit for ten circlings and back to land safely in the Pacific. On the twenty-ninth the first publication under K Foundation copyright—Freedom from the Known, edited by Mary Lutyens—arrived, a Krishnamurti book that was to become and remains a classic.

So 1968 ended.

The new year of 1969 began with a warm, clear, and beautiful morning, the ocean rolling gently in a sleepy summer way. K was out on the lawn before breakfast, looking at the hills and far, far out to sea. He dictated in the morning. The next day Alan Watts and his wife came to lunch, bringing an especially large bottle of vodka in case our household could not provide. Alain left in the afternoon, heading north to set up K's talks in Berkeley, Stanford, and Santa Cruz. Sol Rosenthal, our lawyer, telephoned to report a visit from Rosalind Rajagopal to talk about K and Rajagopal and was told that they could not discuss it with her.

Krishnaji told me he had dreamt of Nitya, that it happened three or four times a year, and that it was always about being protected, their looking out for one another. This time Nitya was protecting K, walking ahead through a crowd and looking back. "We were friends. I was running to catch up with him. How odd to keep dreaming all these years. It is forty-four years since he died. I suppose the wound is still there, buried. Sometimes they are sad dreams, sometimes not. This wasn't."

During this time K continued to hold discussions with a group who came to the house. There was also a visit with the Lilliefelts to discuss with our lawyer, Sol Rosenthal, questions to submit to Rajagopal and the setting up of a Krishnamurti Foundation of America. An insufficient reply came from Rajagopal's lawyer. It was decided to act on Judge Kenney's advice and consult the attorney general.

Mary and Joe Links arrived for a visit that coincided with a week of drenching rain that stopped just as they left on their flight for San Francisco. I had flown there for a day to look at and engage rooms for the time of K's talks, and on January thirtieth, he and I drove north, stopping for a picnic lunch, and continuing on through green and beautiful country. Krishnaji's enjoyment was in his face. "What a country!" he would say. We went the inland route because the coast road through Big Sur was closed from the heavy rains, and we stayed the night in Carmel. The next day we went to Point Lobos before continuing on. The ocean shone in the morning light, and we watched sea otters sliding through the kelp. We reached San Francisco in the afternoon and the Huntington Hotel, where Alain was waiting. We had rooms with a sitting room and a kitchen attached where I could fix our meals.

On February third Krishnaji gave his first of four talks at Berkeley to an audience of about 2,500. On the seventh K was invited by Alan Watts to come to the houseboat where he lived in Sausalito to meet what he described as the "best minds in San Francisco." It turned out rather badly. The discussion was fairly messy, alcohol was having its effect, and we soon left.

A nicer visit for K was to call on an old friend, Mrs. Mathias, frail and almost totally blind, but warm and welcoming.

On the tenth we left the Huntington and drove north to Sonoma State College, where K spoke and lunched with the students. Then we turned south and drove to Palo Alto, where we had rooms at the Stanford Faculty Club. The next day Buckminster Fuller came to talk to K. This was taped by KPFK but was not exactly the interesting exchange that was anticipated. Mr. Fuller arrived in a rush, ebullient, voluble, wanting to know why K was a vegetarian, and after a cascade of conversation in which K, in my memory, was only able to say an occasional "quite," Fuller rushed off to catch a plane. That afternoon K gave the first of his four talks at Stanford.

On the sixteenth, after lunch and K's rest, we left Stanford and drove south to Santa Cruz, where he was to give four talks at Cowell College. He had one free day, and we drove inland, where he walked among redwood trees in quiet, solitary enjoyment. I hovered discreetly in the car, unable to walk just then because of my ailing leg.

We were up early on February twenty-first and left Santa Cruz going south via Carmel and the coast road, which had just been reopened after the winter storms. We stopped at Nepenthe to look for a while at that majestic meeting of continent's edge and limitless ocean then drove on, stopping near Cambria for a picnic lunch. K drove the next 150 miles to Santa Barbara, and then I took over until we reached Malibu.

It had rained in the night but was a beautiful morning on the twenty-second when Erna and Theo Lilliefelt came with Ruth Tettemer. We talked for a while and then in the afternoon formally signed before a notary the trust documents founding the Krishnamurti Foundation of America. The trustors were Krishnamurti, Theo Lilliefelt, Ruth Tettemer, and Mary Zimbalist. The trustees were Krishnamurti, Erna Lilliefelt, Alain Naudé, Ruth Tettemer, and Mary Zimbalist. We then had a first trustee meeting.

On the twenty-fourth Alain flew to Paris and later to Saanen to arrange housing for the many students who, having heard K's talks, were planning to go to the summer meetings.

On the twenty-seventh K and I met the Lilliefelts and Ruth Tettemer at the office of our lawyer, Sol Rosenthal, and went with him to the Los Angeles office of the attorney general of California, where we met Mr. Laurence Tapper, who was to investigate the situation around Krishnamurti Writings Inc.

The heavy rains of the winter had recommenced and now loosened the sodden soil, causing earth slides at the top of my hill above the beach. I had to leave further efforts to contain the situation when on March fourth Krishnaji and I left Malibu and flew to London and onto Paris, where Alain met us, and we spent one night at the Pont Royal Hotel. My car had been brought there from its winter storage in Thun, and in the morning, and with K and I in it and Alain in his car, we drove north to Le Touquet and flew by air ferry to Lydd, where we paused for lunch and drove on westward across southern England. I had underestimated how long this would take and was exhausted when, at last, as the sun was going down, we saw the sign "Brockwood Park."

We drove up the lane, through gates, and there at the end of the driveway was the big white house. There, too, were Dorothy and Montague Simmons, Doris Pratt, Donald Hoppen (the architect friend who had helped to find the place), Alan Hooker from Ojai, and four boy students-to-be. The house was impressive, beautiful, and Georgian, begun in 1769, large enough for the school then envisaged, and with a west wing, which was to be Krishnaji's quarters. That first night, after seeing everything inside, we had supper in the kitchen and went to bed, tired but pleased at where we had come.

The light of day unfolded the beauty of Brockwood's land. The house is surrounded by parklands, wide lawns, a rose garden, and a large, high-walled kitchen garden. The Foundation had bought only the house and the fewer-than-forty acres surrounding it (of the eight hundred it had once had), but these remained unchanged, one's eye free to cross rolling fields to woods without the intrusion of another building.

Across a field to the west there is a grove where one enters a small world of tall trees, seven redwoods, a handkerchief tree, azaleas, and rhododendrons. It is a place unto itself, quiet; as though, if one walks gently, silently, perhaps one might see a unicorn. K was enchanted.

Apart from beds and necessary linen, which I had chosen months earlier in case we found a house, the West Wing, which was, so to speak, Krishnamurti's house within a house, had no furniture, so I went up to London to start finding things. When I came back in the afternoon, K said to me very sweetly, "Well, did you get it all done?"

On March twelfth K began his London talks. Though the talk was at 7 p.m., he had decided not to go to a hotel afterward but to return to Brockwood. The hall was in Wimbledon, and we left directly afterward. This made it much easier for him. There were four talks in all. Meanwhile, people came and went, and with great help from Paul Anstee, a friend of a friend of mine, I worked on furnishings for the West Wing.

On April second Krishnaji, Alain, and I left Brockwood in the two cars heading for Dover. Outside Rye, a man on a curve crashed into the right side of my car, crushing the rear fender against the wheel. We were not hurt, and the police found the man was at fault, so with help to free the wheel enough to continue and catch the ferry, I drove on ahead with Krishnaji. For less weight in the damaged car, we transferred to Alain's car, which had been just behind, all the luggage. We made the ferry, debarked in Calais, and drove to Montreuil, where we spent the night in the Château de Montreuil, a very nice hotel. In the morning we drove on to Paris and were in the house in the rue de Verdun in time for lunch. That evening Alain and I went to hear Sviatoslav Richter play Bach's The Well-Tempered Clavier in the Salle Pleyel.

K continued dictating the so-called "Holiday Book" to Alain; there was shopping to do, movies to see, as well as discussions with young people, which were held at the Hotel Pont Royal. This year the Paris talks were held in the Salle de la Chimie, an excellent hall. There were five of these and also a taped interview with K at UNESCO and always afternoon walks in the Bois. It was spring, and Paris was en fleur.

On April twenty-sixth we left and drove northeast, stopping in Arras for lunch at Le Changy and continuing on into Belgium and to Brussels, where we were guests of Suzanne and Hugues van der Straten in the big comfortable house where they lived with five of their many children. It was a very pleasant visit, and after a relaxed morning, the next day we left in the afternoon. In three hours we were in Hilversun in Holland, where Anneke was waiting in a house at Gravelandweg, which she had rented for K and furnished with loans from well-wishers. After getting settled the next day, K, Alain, and I drove to Koekenhof to see the tulips again and order bulbs for Brockwood. On returning to the house, we learned that De Gaulle had resigned after the defeat of the referendum in France.

Krishnaji and I did some errands in Bussum and then walked once more in the lovely wood near the thatched cottage where we had lived two years earlier. It had not changed, and little ducks were still busy in the streams.

On May third K gave his first Amsterdam talk at the Congrescentrum, sometimes called the RAI. It was a warm spring day, the hall was full, and it was a very strong talk. In the car coming back, he felt somewhat faint, but after lunch he felt like coming with me to do marketing errands. The next day there was the second talk and in the afternoon a tea for all the people who had helped. There was a young people's discussion a few days later also at the Congrescentrum. As always, he seemed to have limitless energy for these many meetings, but it was discussed how he could cut down some of the travel and talking. He said, however, that he must give public talks. “Something happens in them that is different from discussions.”

One afternoon I went into Amsterdam with Alain, looking for a particular book Alain wanted. The search took us to the Theosophical Society bookstore. On the wall were two sepia-colored, larger-than-life-size photographs—one of Mrs. Besant and the other of C. W. Leadbeater. They seemed like something from another century long, long ago. It seemed impossible that those two people could have played a part in Krishnamurti’s life or to connect them in time to the living, vital, in-the-present person we knew.

On May fourteenth, K gave his fifth and final Amsterdam talk. On the fifteenth there was the last of the young people’s discussions; the hall at the RAI was filled and overflowed to the halls outside, where many more listened. On the sixteenth K and I left Hilversum and drove to Rotterdam, where we got lost trying to find the dock airport, but eventually did. Alain was waiting there, and we flew the cars to Southend, where there was the pleasant surprise of Mary and Joe Links to meet us and guide the way to London through crowded traffic. We reached Brockwood in the early evening.

In the ensuing days there was much to do about furnishing the West Wing, errands in London, K weeding the lawn, going for drives in the surrounding lovely Hampshire countryside—he was practicing driving the Mercedes before applying for a British driving license. There were trips up to London; Mary Lutyens and her family came down to Brockwood; there were meetings about the school, publications; and on the twenty-second of June, K held a first discussion at Brockwood with about 165 people. He played Frisbee on the lawn, too, and with the arrival of Desikachar, yoga lessons became the order of the days. He took some driving lessons to be sure he knew all British requirements, and when the day for the test came, he went off to Winchester with the instructor and came back looking very pleased. He had passed.

That summer in Gstaad, instead of the usual flat in Les Caprices, I had taken half of a chalet called Trois Ours. It was up the hill toward Chalet Tannegg and a little more spacious. I moved into it on July sixth. K was staying with Vanda at Tannegg as always, and he soon began meetings with young people. Alain had done his usual good job of organizing these and had gone ahead to arrange housing for the young in Schonried. Yoga lessons continued daily with Desikachar, but on the sixteenth he returned to India. The next day K began his Saanen talks.

Krishnaji had asked me to talk to Vanda about our all sharing Chalet Tannegg and its expenses the following summer, and she and I agreed to it. She asked me to look after things when she had to return to Florence, so I moved up there on the twenty-first.

1970 began with Krishnamurti in India. He wrote to me, and I replied from Malibu while negotiations with Rajagopal continued through respective lawyers. At one point

Rajagopal telephoned ostensibly to tell me he was meeting on January twenty-first with Mr. Tapper, the attorney general. The latter and our lawyer, David Leipziger, went to Ojai and conferred for six hours with Rajagopal and his lawyer, Mr. Loebl. This meeting was not very productive.

In January I drove to La Jolla, where Mrs. Martha Longenecker had offered her house for Krishnamurti's use if he came to speak at San Diego State College. I went with her to the college and met Dr. Ray Jordan, head of religious studies, and Dr. Allan Anderson. I also looked at the hall and conference rooms, and discussed possible dates.

On January twenty-sixth Krishnaji flew from Bombay to Rome, and on the twenty-eighth he came to Brockwood. He gave me his last two letters, nos. 25 and 26—the latter was written during the flight to London. On February second, at Heathrow, he met the head of the religious department of the BBC for an hour's discussion before boarding a flight for Los Angeles. It landed at 6 p.m., and we came home to Malibu and supper on trays by the fire. He had been up for 24 hours but was brightly awake and wanting to talk.

In the days that followed, K rested, slept a great deal, and in the late afternoons we walked on the beach. The Lilliefelts came to lunch, and we discussed the law case at length. On February fifth K had me telephone Rajagopal to tell him that he had arrived and would telephone himself after he had had a rest. It was a brief conversation. Part of the rest was going to movies. He especially enjoyed Butch Cassidy & the Sundance Kid, which fulfilled the criteria of Western scenery, engaging characters, and lots of action.

On February tenth he resumed dictating the book to me each morning. On the afternoon of the thirteenth, we drove to the top of Corral Canyon and walked along the ridge on a fire road. To the west was the limitless ocean, and all else was the original beauty of the California hills, which he had so long loved. We came happily back to tea and supper. Earlier K asked me to ring Rajagopal, who wasn't in, but later Rajagopal rang back and K spoke to him, inviting him to come and tell what he envisaged as a peaceful settlement. Rajagopal replied that his lawyer forbade him to discuss this.

On the seventeenth, as part of his dictations, K did a conversation with me on suicide. On the twenty-first he held the first of a series of discussions at the house with about twenty-eight people. A second one was held the following day, and it was videotaped. Alain had come for the weekend and had generated some of those who attended. On the twenty-fifth K and I drove north to Santa Barbara and back on the inland road to Lake Casitas, where we had a picnic lunch. It was a warm and lovely day. We drove on to the Lilliefelts' for a talk and tea with them and Ruth Tettemer before returning to Malibu in time for supper. On the twenty-sixth, after dictation in the morning, we went to the NBC studios in Burbank, where a live television interview of K was done by Robert Abernathy.

On Sunday, March first at 2 p.m., K gave his first talk at the Santa Monica Auditorium. The hall, holding 3,000, was full, and about 300 had to be turned away. It was, to me, a superb talk. We came home and walked in spite of a light rain. K spoke the following day and weekend, again to over 3,000 people, but on the ride home he said he had felt like someone singing to the deaf.

We sat up until quite late one evening while Krishnaji told me about the curious chain of events in his life and a seeming protective providence of which he had always been conscious. About the early accounts of his meeting masters, he said that he remembered something happened that was of spiritual significance; he knew that it happened, but could not remember details.

On March twelfth, with K driving, we went again to Lake Casitas with our picnic lunch, and then to the Lilliefelts' where, after a rest, K held a discussion with Ojai people he had known through the years—other than members of KW Inc. Alain came to Malibu for the weekend, and on the third and fourth the private discussion group came and both were videotaped. Another Ojai discussion was held on the nineteenth and still another weekend of Malibu discussions took place. In between all these, K continued his dictations and gave numerous private interviews. On the twenty-third his end lower right molar was pulled. It had been loose and infected and probably had been making him feel under par for some months. A local anesthetic, zylocaine, was used, and it came out easily, but on the way home in the car, K fainted twice.

Some friends who had just seen Rajagopal and the Vigevenos said that they were told that K wouldn't see Rajagopal. On K's behalf I telephoned R and asked him to come with or without the Vigevenos to see K. He replied he would think about it and let me know. Later that day, Sidney Field and Laura Huxley brought a group of young people, sent by Dr. Weininger, to talk to K. When they were gone we walked in the garden and saw the great horned owl who had come to live in a eucalyptus tree near the garage.

On the twenty-seventh the Lilliefelts, Ruth Tettemer, Sidney Roth, and Donald Hoppen came for the annual general meeting of the KFA board. Alain flew down from Berkeley. The next day K, Alain, and I had an interesting discussion, which we recorded on audiocassette, and in the afternoon there was the seventh private discussion group, which was videotaped. A letter came from Rajagopal saying he could not leave Ojai to see K. The group's discussion on the following day was also videotaped, and afterward, on the remaining portion of the tape, K restated something of what he had said at the KFA board meeting about the future of Brockwood and uses of Foundations.

On the thirtieth K gave interviews to Rabbi Rabin and Rabbi Lyman, then, as always, in the late afternoon we went for a beach walk. The next day K, Alain, Miranda Dunne, and I went to lunch in Los Angeles at the Bel-Air Hotel and then to see a movie, Airport. We then drove Alain to catch his plane to San Francisco. He had decided to stay in California and planned to go to Europe, gather his things, and return to San Francisco. We said a warm goodbye.

On April third it was such a lovely day we decided to delay going to La Jolla. It was too nice in Malibu, and we took a long beach walk, posted a letter from K to Rajagopal, and in the evening he telephoned K, saying he wanted to see him before K left. K replied he would ring him before leaving. It was a brief conversation.

The following day, April fourth, I packed our things, and K and I drove south on a hot, clear morning. We stopped for a picnic lunch in the car near San Juan Capistrano and then continued on to La Jolla and the house that Martha Longenecker was so kindly lending to K for his week of talks at San Diego State College. She and the Lilliefelts were staying nearby. We unpacked and then took a walk along the cliffs above the ocean. I made our supper, and we went early to bed.

On the following day, after an early lunch, we drove to the college, where at 3 p.m. Krishnaji gave a first talk in Montezuma Hall. We walked later and he spoke of the two months he spent alone in a cabin in Sequoia, of his shyness and avoidance of people, of going to buy his supplies when there were the fewest people around. He was shy even of the ranger who cautioned him to be careful on long walks and said that even as we were walking he would have been too shy to walk alone.

There was a second talk the next day, and on the seventh K had the Lilliefelts and Sidney Roth come to discuss legal matters. A past contributor to Krishnamurti Writings, Sidney Roth was concerned about what had been done by Rajagopal and offered to help in untangling the legalities of the situation. His lawyer, Harry N. Wyatt, on behalf of Sidney Roth, was offering constructive advice and did so that morning by telephone from Chicago. At this time, Mr. Tapper was having increasing doubts about Rajagopal's actions as he had failed to give answers to our questions, in spite of having reasonable opportunities to do so. The possibility of bringing legal action by the attorney general or by KFA or by both together was discussed. Krishnaji's reluctance to be in a lawsuit did not present a problem providing the trustees of KFA took the initiative. Mr. Tapper suggested that our lawyer, Mr. Leipziger, meet again with Rajagopal and his lawyer and discuss an audit. If Rajagopal was unwilling, he would be told that litigation was contemplated that would be brought by both the office of the attorney general and trustees of KFA.

On April eighth K held a large public discussion at San Diego State. In the afternoon, with Erna and Theo Lilliefelt, we went to visit the naval base in Coronado and were able to go on board the heavy cruiser St. Paul that K found very interesting. With his usual meticulous attention, he observed the ship with the enthusiasm of a young boy. On the ninth he gave a fourth and final talk at the college. At the house there was a 1929 copy of the Theosophical Star Bulletin. In it was a photograph of him; he glanced at it and said, "He must have been a very gentle person."

Back in Malibu, K followed the Apollo 13 circling of the moon. There was an inconclusive letter from Rajagopal and James Vigeveno, and a telephone call from Mrs. Porter. Nothing progressed. On April eighteenth K and I flew to England.

There was sun and daffodils at Brockwood, but the trees were still bare. K was tired and so was I, so there was rest and walks. K talked of the need for quiet, both outward and within. There were trips to London for K to see a dentist, which resulted in two teeth being pulled at Brockwood, where the dentist obligingly came, accompanied by a nurse, and the whole thing went quite easily. Mary Links talked to K about the biography of him she was writing, and he discussed the mystery, as he called it, of what kept "the boy" unconditioned and the sense of something protecting him. It was a subject he returned to many times. There was shopping to do in London, and sometimes he came with me on errands in the country. He liked to drive slowly through the lanes surrounding Brockwood, often getting slightly and pleasantly lost and having the surprise of finding our way back. On one particular day we passed a house we both found lovely, set back from the road with a donkey grazing in the foreground. I made a note of where the road emerged to join the familiar A272 to Brockwood, but in all the years since I could never find that lovely house again.

K continued the book dictation, spoke to the school, gave private interviews, washed the car, and rain or shine we walked in the late afternoons. On May sixteenth we drove to London, taking a picnic lunch, which we ate in Richmond Park, and went to Mrs. Bindley's, where K slept for an hour, then went to the Friends Hall, where he gave the first of his London talks of that year. We drove back to Brockwood afterward. The second talk was on the twentieth. K felt it didn't get going well and it was an indifferent audience. We spent that night at the Digbys' house. Mary Links came with us while K saw his dentist the next morning, then we lunched at L'Aperitif. On the way back to Brockwood, K did the driving from Guildford to the house. On the twenty-seventh we went again to Mrs. Bindley's, where K rested until the third talk, a very fine one that went well; we had a picnic supper in the car on Wimbledon Common on the way home. This pattern was repeated on the thirtieth for the fourth and last London talk.

In early June, on the sixth, two cartons of bees arrived and were put in the new hives. K said later, "Now I feel this is a real place. It has bees! Bees are a marvelous thing." That day and on the following, he held a discussion with about 200 invited guests, mostly on violence.

When I brought him his breakfast on the ninth, he said that something different in meditation had occurred in the night, that it would have been described in the old terminology as "an initiation."

On June twelfth we were invited to tea by longtime friends of mine, Virginia McKenna and Bill Travers. They lived with their four children near Dorking. We drove there, getting caught in a cloudburst, which caused the car to stall for half an hour, but it was clear when we arrived. After tea we went out to an enclosed part of the garden where they had something to show us. The background to this began a few years earlier, when both of them went to Africa to make the motion picture Born Free. In addition to acting, they found themselves working with lions, an event that made the welfare of wild animals a central interest for them both. What we were shown was a handsome young male lion in an enclosure. He had a caravan to live in, plenty of space, and a rubber tire suspended from a tree to play with. He had come there as follows: Some weeks earlier, Bill had wandered into an antique store on the Kings Road in London, and after being shown some furniture, the owner said, “Mr. Travers, I think I have something that would interest you in the back.” It was a young lion.

“Where did you get him?” Bill inquired.

“Harrods,” was the reply.

It seemed that at Christmas time, as an unusual gift, a lion cub was on offer. The young antique dealer was so appalled by this that he bought the little cub and took it home. He was able to look after it, and for a time exercise it at night in a churchyard when no one was around, but little cubs grow, and by now this young male was almost as large as a pony and his mane was sprouting. Things were getting difficult.

What ensued was that the Traverses agreed to take the lion to their place in the country and arrange to take this zoo-bred lion to Africa and teach him to live in the wild. This was what happened, but that afternoon Krishnamurti and I had the pleasure of seeing him inches away behind the wire fence. Both Ginny and Bill could go inside when they fed him, and K would have liked to do so, but they thought it unwise. For adults taller than the lion, there was an element of authority, but when their little youngest son trotted along the fence with us, he became prey in the instinct of the lion, which assumed a stalking prowl inside the fence.

In the days ahead, K held group discussions that were videotaped, gave an interview to the BBC conducted by the head of the BBC religious department, and gave individual private interviews as well. One evening he asked if I would carry on in the work when he was gone: “You have listened to all this.”

On June seventeenth K and I went to London by train for a fitting, then to the dentist, and then to lunch with Mary Links at their flat. Afterward they continued their discussion of his early life for the biography. The tape recorder didn’t work, so I took notes. On the train coming back, K felt tired and quite sick by the time we reached Brockwood. He coughed a lot and, though without fever, became slightly delirious. “He shouldn’t have gone to town. Who’s looking after him? He’s left the body. No, no, not that!” The next day he was shaking and weak at first, stayed in bed but felt better later and was able to read and watch television with a poultice on his chest. He was in bed for the rest of the week but got up for the group discussions on Saturday and Sunday.

He was well enough to want to wash the car on the twenty-sixth, and the next day we went to have tea with the Linkses at their country place in Blackdown, K doing the driving. We all went for a walk and then drove home through the lovely light of a summer evening. “Enjoy!” said K. “We had fun. Let’s enjoy ourselves.” And we did.

On June thirtieth, 1970, Krishnaji and I drove via Fareham and Brighton to Lydd, he doing about half the driving, and had a picnic lunch in the car along the way. We flew the car and selves across the Channel to Le Touquet and went eleven miles further to Montreuil to spend the night at the Château de Montreuil. We took a walk along the battlements before supper; there was a sea wind blowing and swallows flying; K seemed both exhilarated and relaxed, pleased to be in France again.

In the morning we drove on to Paris, lunched with my father, did two errands, and drove on to Barbizon, where at the Bas-Bréau we had the same nice rooms as in 1968. We walked in the forest before supper and the following morning left, heading for Switzerland on the smallest country roads. At such times K seemed at one with the passing countryside, the winding road through small villages, pleased to be away for a time from everything except poplar trees, fields, and the wide sky. He would sometimes sing in a dreamy way, as if a hum to himself, but his hum would be a Sanskrit chant from long ago.

We spent one more night en route and then via Dijon crossed into Switzerland and Geneva. We stopped at the Hôtel du Rhône and then walked to Patek Philippe to have watches seen to and do other small annual errands. K rested the following morning, and in the afternoon we took the familiar road to Gstaad. Climbing into mountains gave a special sense of return; they were a presence in whose space one comes and lives for a while. It was as if for Krishnaji there was a silent welcome.

It was a reunion, too, with Vanda at Chalet Tannegg, and with Fosca. For the next few days, K remained in bed resting. Hay fever at that season was again present, and he stayed in. Vanda and I discussed his speaking in Italy in October, possibly in Rome and Perugia. We talked of many things, including whatever it was that seemed to protect K—something he felt and she sensed, too.

On July tenth Vanda left for Florence, and K and I drove to Thun, had a picnic lunch at the edge of the lake, fetched his Mercedes from its winter storage, and drove back to Gstaad in our separate cars.

At lunch K discussed with Herry and Hilda Moorhead the Indian schools and who would see that his teachings were carried out in them if funds were provided from Ojai. Who would see that they were used for K's teachings and not to buy tractors, etc.? He felt that, in India, many of the board were old members who cared about little but the status of the schools and didn't want any interference, even from K himself. Who had the teachings at heart?

In the evening he suddenly said to me, "Think of it! I have been talking in India, spending more time there than anywhere else, and there is not one person who listens and has changed."

“It is terribly difficult for people to change. They are what they are,” I replied.

K responded, “When I die, it will be over. What will happen to you? People aren’t serious. Are you serious? I’ve been talking here for forty years; I’d be a damn fool if I didn’t realize people are as they are. I’m not depressed by it. I will go on talking.”

On the afternoon walk the following day, he said that what would happen to me after he died depended on what I did and was then—i.e., the change in me. He asked me if I felt any presence of my husband after he died. I said yes. We discussed what is evidence and what is imagination. I said that I had felt it strongly but neither saw objectively nor heard anything; it was an intrinsic sense of presence and communication and real to me, but I could not offer objective evidence to another. K said, “You can tell the difference between imagination and a something.” He said he wished he could remember how it was when his brother died. I asked how one could assess such things. I said that I could not assert certain things because I could not see how they could be proven, but I paid attention and did not deny them. I mentioned the conversation with Vanda in which she said that neither she nor I had theosophical conditioning that could account for her being spoken to through K when he was unconscious or for the words he uttered to me when he was sick on June seventeenth: “He shouldn’t have gone to town. Who’s looking after him?”

He then spoke of change and listening: that if you really listened and saw, it erases the habit, the previous imprint. The new then functions in the mind, and whenever an action of the old pattern arises, the mind alerts the conscious attention. He said that my habit of frowning remained because I hadn’t seen the importance of changing it. If I had, the old pattern would have been erased. He said the body sometimes takes time to relearn, but the mind is instantly alert. Therefore to listen, to see is to change. Lack of change is inattention. “Make a note. I will talk about that,” he said.

One day at lunch with the Biascoecheas, K asked Enrique to tell me about the dream he had before K was found as a boy in which Mrs. Besant with a young Indian said, “This is the world-teacher-to-be.” The dream was so strong that Enrique, who was addressing a theosophical meeting, told that a boy had been found before he knew of it officially. “What was he like when you saw him?” K asked, but Enrique was only able to describe what he himself thought, not what the boy was like, except that he was very warm and friendly.

“Write it down, sir,” said K, and later said it would be interesting for Mary Lutyens’s biography.

That afternoon a friend brought her nephew to see K, a boy of about sixteen who had become mentally disabled from an injury in childhood. “Are you asking me to try to heal him?” The friend was silent. K explained about healing, which sometimes works and sometimes doesn’t. The silence deepened, and then K said to bring the boy each day.

The talks had begun in the tent. K spoke on freedom, authority, and comparison as a basis of fear. In response to a questioner asking if it was possible to learn all the time, K said, "You block yourself with such a question. If you are watching there is nothing to learn." People swarmed around him afterward as he walked up the path. I had to edge the car through them to reach him. He wanted a drive before going to Tannegg, so we went toward Lauenen. The snow on the mountain at the end of the valley was brilliant in the summer sunlight.

The Lilliefelts arrived from Ojai, came to lunch, and we caught up on news. There was a letter from James Vigeveno in the usual vein—that it was all a personal matter between K and Rajagopal. K refused to touch it and had me open it. When I began to read it to him, he made me stop, had me jump through it and tell him the gist. I read most of it to him nevertheless, feeling he should know. Each of these letters had seemed something unclean to him. He would not touch or look at them. He had the Lilliefelts read it. A meeting of the lawyers was set for August sixth, and a summary of a settlement offer was due. We went for a drive in the afternoon, and K said, "Try to act from emptiness; find out what it is to do that. It is the way to live."

On July twenty-fourth K held a young people's discussion in the tent. Older people could attend but not interrupt. Almost as many came as for a talk. In the afternoon we went up over the hill and watched a machine clawing enormous rocks out of the river. We ran into Edgar Graf, who told K that he had arranged a large tent as shelter for the young—the hippies who came with little but their sleeping bags. On the walk back K asked me what I would do if he died. I asked him what he would want me to do, but he wouldn't say. Later he came back to it, saying how the line between life and death had always been a very thin one for him. Sometimes he had felt like disappearing. I asked if that meant dying. He said no, no, just going off where nobody knew him. I said that he had often told me that talking was necessary in what he was supposed to do; could living quietly, remotely, and just writing be sufficient? He said no.

The next day he gave his fifth Saanen talk, an absorbing one on fear and pleasure. He said that to be caught in them is the bourgeois mind; when you see in yourself the action of these, what happens? There is a greater sensitivity. You don't suppress or reject it; you see. The sensitivity sees joy, enjoyment that is different from pleasure. There were guests for lunch, and Mary Cadogan came and told him of reactions some people had that they could not get through to him. K listened and examined it, and said, "The speaker also feels you are not coming to him with great buckets. He says something, please take anything you want, and you say, 'Here, give me a little bit of that.' He doesn't want to push. He can pour, pour. When you say, 'This is not enough,' then he can pour."

Later in the village we passed U. G. Krishnamurti, who used to come to Saanen every year when K was talking, never coming to the tent, but speaking disparagingly of K to his listeners. As he came near K, he gave the Indian salute unsmilingly in a hunched, turned-aside way. After we passed, K said, "I felt something unclean."

During the sixth talk a young Italian shouted at K, who had been speaking about pleasure. K was quiet and then resumed, saying: "You take pleasure in violence, in anger."

The death of my father's wife took me to Baden-Baden on July twenty-ninth to be with him and my brother. I was back at Tannegg in the evening of the thirty-first. The days ahead were busy ones. Krishnaji held discussions with young people, and there was the annual meeting of the Saanen Gathering Committee; the Lilliefelts moved into the downstairs apartment at Tannegg, numerous people came to lunch. Publication matters were discussed with the French committee and Spanish-speaking one as well. Enrique Biascoechea brought Mr. Sendra and a lawyer from Puerto Rico, Mr. Faria, to these meetings. It developed that the Puerto Rico committee wanted their own Foundation, and it was rather aggressively expressed, which was not appreciated by some.

The public discussions began in the tent, and Krishnaji seemed to have enormous bursting energy. He continued to give private interviews to many who requested them and discussed future plans for talks. Anneke Korndorffer came to discuss the next year's Amsterdam talks and also spoke of the antagonism of Carlo Suarès, who was there, lecturing about the kabbalah but never coming to the talks. According to Anneke, he was filled with lies from Rajagopal. Nadia Kossiakof, of the French committee, also came to speak of this. I had rung Mme. Suarès and invited them to Tannegg for lunch, but she said she was busy. Nadia discussed the whole Suarès-Rajagopal matter with K, who was upset by it. On top of everything else, another Vigeveno letter came, saying that only K could save the situation without interference by the law. K again would not touch the letter or read it but had me tell him what was in it. K had a brief rest before another Saanen Gathering Committee meeting. At it, K asked Edgar Graf why, after he had been speaking in Switzerland for ten years, there were only about a dozen Swiss at the meetings and what to do about this. When they left we prepared for a walk, but such a thunderstorm came up with hail and heavy rain that we went downstairs and called on the Lilliefelts. K was tired. All the Suarès-Vigeveno-Rajagopal matters were a harassment to him. He slept poorly, his body disturbed, but he said, "You mustn't be tired," or it affected him.

K gave his seventh and eighth public discussions that ended the series. It seemed to me that these talks and discussions were the most intense he had ever given. All the Krishnamurti committees came for a meeting in which he talked about their function after his death. There was also much about publications, and he spelled out the fact that Vimala Thakar had no place in his work. There was a tea for all the Ojai people. K greeted them but soon went for his walk. When they had gone, I followed, saw his footprint along the muddy road and then his remote figure in his raincoat and beret coming along the path. He was tired but full of energy. The concentrated meetings seemed to bring him the necessary, almost limitless vitality. But they had now ended, and he would give no more interviews. He was restless at night. "They don't know how vast this is." He said he must start writing.

On August eleventh I brought Mme. Suarès up the hill to see K. She had sided with Rajagopal through misinformation from Mima Porter, according to Anneke and Nadia Kossiakof, and was upset. She had been told that K had refused to see Rajagopal. Krishnaji explained why he wouldn't see Rajagopal alone but had tried repeatedly to meet him. She had a story that Gérard Blitz had resigned from the Foundation because Rajagopal was right. Krishnaji pointed out that Blitz had joined the Foundation a year after he had seen Rajagopal. Alain Naudé was blamed for everything. K said his troubles with Rajagopal had been going on for ten years before Alain appeared. K didn't mention the attorney general being part of this but said that things were now up to Rajagopal if he wished to settle. He said he didn't ask her, or care what she did, but if she wrote to Mrs. Porter, to remember that it was the time for a settlement.

The thirteenth of August was a cloudless morning, brilliant in summer sunlight, and clearly the day to go for a drive. In K's car we set off down the mountain to Aigle and along the lake to lunch in Lausanne at the Grappe d'Or. We shopped for some socks and then headed back through the mountains via Bulle. The Dents du Midi shone in their crown of snow. Along the way, K said, "Shall we talk seriously?" and then said that no one had made the change; was there something he should do about this before he died? "I don't feel to blame." I began to ask what was an understanding of a statement of his, such as having an empty mind. He said he wanted to go into it but not that day; to bring it up again. The drive was a little too long for him; he was tired but still wanted to stop at the shoe store in Saanen where he found some walking shoes that pleased him. Later he said, "I come from far away."

Vanda's son, Alberto, and daughter, Paola, with her husband, John Cohen, who were staying in the downstairs flat, came several times to lunch. K was pleased to see and talk with them. On a walk along the river, he spoke to me about what he called the "second-rateness" of some of the early people: Rajagopal, Rosalind, the Vigevenos, the Suarèses, for example, who were around him because they were at hand and therefore served a purpose in a practical sense to whatever seemed to order things around K. He said the recent entourage were more mature, more thinking. In this there was his often-expressed feeling that something watched over and directed his life. He used the word "indecent" about Rajagopal and Rosalind. She once kicked him with her knee so that he was in pain for days, but he never felt angry; it left no mark on his spirit. Rajagopal had been as he was then from the very beginning. K and Nitya both felt an aversion to him. Rajagopal once told someone in India who wanted him to stay there that he must leave with K or K would forget him, "which was true," said K.

Another luncheon invitation given to the Suarèses was accepted, and afterward K spoke alone with Mme. Suarès and suggested she ask Yo de Manziarly why she hadn't attempted to find out the facts before she had turned against him.

The Lilliefelts left Gstaad. There were various people to lunch and always the afternoon walk. On one of these K said he read in a Maigret, which he was reading in French to practice French, the phrase, "his thought was faster than the words," and he realized that when he was giving talks he didn't think at all.

On August eighteenth, with K driving, we went to Thun to leave his car in storage for the winter. After a picnic lunch behind a little church at the edge of the lake, we boarded the small steamer that crossed over to Spiez. At the end of the lake, the high mountains, the Mönch, Eiger, and Jungfrau, were heavy with new snow. At Spiez we took a bus up the hill to the station. At lunch K had given most of his rice to the swans, so we went into the buffet, and he had a bun and some tonic water. The train to Zweisimmen, where we changed to one to Gstaad, delighted him. He stood all the way, absorbed as a child, with his hands in their driving gloves holding the edge of the window, lost in looking out, with a remote, absent look that silently saw all the passing valley. Later he said, "I like to go on trains; you see better. I must go on more trains." In the days before he flew, he used to watch from trains in India the vast country unroll. In Gstaad we bought our paper, took a cab up as far as the Palace Hotel, and walked the rest of the way up the hill.

The next day Mrs. Anne Morrow Lindbergh and the Biascoecheas came to lunch. Mrs. Lindbergh talked about ecology and the concern of her husband for conservation. She spoke rather intensely, both assertive in conversation and direct but with a trace of shyness, too. A very nice, very perceptive person. K was pleased to see her. We went later to the bank to arrange some financial things in which he gave me power of attorney, and he accepted the same from Enrique Biascoechea over certain funds. We then took a last walk of the season over the hill to the river. Later he said, "Since the train ride I have felt very far away."

Section Five

The morning of August twentieth, 1970, was cool and gray. We said goodbye to Fosca and drove in the Mercedes toward the Geneva airport, where I gave up my car to the Mercedes dealer from Thun as part of an order for a different one the following spring. We flew to London and were met by Dorothy Simmons and drove off through the rain to Brockwood. K was very silent and remote. He said he had been "far off" since the train ride two days earlier and that when he was in that state in the past, if the Rajagopals had asked him something, he would reply, "Anything you say." His face was an austere mask in the car, but he returned enough to greet people on arrival at Brockwood.

The next day K held a meeting with the Simmonses, Doris Pratt, Donald Hoppen, and me. There had been a dissension in Brockwood over the presence of someone who was not a member of the staff; Dorothy was tense and grim-faced. K took in the situation and really blazed at all of us. "When you have tried reasoning, talking with them, and it does no good and you don't want to use threats, what do you do?" He hammered so hard at Dorothy—the others kept silent—that I was afraid she would come apart, so I drew some of his fire and what a fire it was. "You can't walk away from it—you have to educate them!" The end of it was that we have tried discussion and they have turned that into a game of contention. "We are through with that. This is the direction of Brockwood—not your direction—but the original direction for which it was begun. Do you want to come with us? And if so, it will be an answer in action and not merely verbal." It was 7 o'clock by the time this meeting ended.

The Lilliefelts came and stayed in the West Wing guest room. A young American, who had been in Saanen, arrived and said he would like to join Brockwood. This was good news to me until K mentioned to me that this young American had expressed a feeling of K's death and that he would be present then when K was 77. This shocked me so that I felt sick and never wanted to hear of this young man again. K was impatient with all this. "You must face it," he said. "I don't know why you all make so much fuss about death." I said I would face it when it came but didn't care to face trivial references to it conversationally. Later he said, "I think I will live quite a lot longer. Or pop off anytime."

In London on August twenty-ninth, there was the first joint meeting of KF London, as it was called then, and KFA. Present were K, Mary Cadogan, Dorothy Simmons, George Digby, David Bohm, Hugues van der Straten, Erna and Theo Lilliefelt, and me. The post had brought a letter reporting in detail the August sixth meeting between our lawyer, David Leipziger; Rajagopal's lawyer, Mr. Loebl; and the representative of the attorney general, Mr. Tapper. In it we learned the disturbing news that Mr. Tapper had proposed that Rajagopal be permitted to carry on publication of post-1968 material, which all of us thought was non-negotiable. K felt that perhaps R was wanting to settle with him, was not really wanting to carry on that work but wanted a rapprochement with him and would hand over things to him personally. This and all matters to do with an India Foundation, Spanish-American one, and Australia too were discussed. The next morning there was a long talk between K, Hugues, and me about the impossibility of the Tapper publishing proposal for Rajagopal. Erna cabled our feelings to David Leipziger and drafted a stiff letter to follow.

At lunch Dorothy gave a résumé of the instant hostility of the latest pupil from the U.S. He wanted to leave after being there two hours because of his hair. It had been suggested that he keep it reasonably clean, neat, and not too long. Hair was one's most sacred subject in those days. We took a long and lovely walk that afternoon. K had dictated a conversation on the meaning of cooperation in the morning and said he had decided to start a new book on education, giving views of parents, students, and teachers. Mary Lutyens would be ready to edit it in January, so he wanted to work on this every day. He began the following morning.

Brockwood began to fill with people, and on September fifth, a bright sunny day, Krishnaji gave the first of four talks in a tent put up in the field beyond the swimming pool. About 600 people came, and the following day there were half as many. In an adjacent tent, lunch was available for all, including K, who ate standing up from his paper plate as the more confident people came up to speak to him.

He also held a meeting with the school at which he enunciated the intention of Brockwood, which was intelligence, which was sensitivity and freedom. Freedom was being free of one's own conditioning. He enlarged on this theme in the public discussion in the tent, saying that the fragmented, conditioned mind could see that it was patterned as it happened, and that instantaneous perception freed it. At the next school meeting he continued saying what Brockwood was about, the meaning of freedom, and, in this, what is discipline? What do we do if, after discussion and agreement, someone doesn't follow through, is disagreeable, and perpetually disregards what has been agreed? Do we punish—which is a repellent act—what do we do? It is the recalcitrant person who punishes himself by pulling away from intelligence, from the offer to live in accord and friendship, from the learning process. It had been almost a detective story wondering what K would come to. Later he told me that he had no idea where he was going; it just came out.

Our lawyer for the American foundation, Sol Rosenthal came to Brockwood on September thirteenth for a meeting with Krishnaji, the Lilliefelts, and myself. A proposal was thought up to make to Rajagopal by which he would be invited to join us, become a trustee of KFA and KF London, via a cordial letter from Rosenthal and David Leipziger to Rajagopal's lawyer, Mr. Loebl. It would say that K would come to Ojai on his way to Australia in the autumn and would then invite Rajagopal into the fold. The specifics of this would be worked out by the lawyers later. This was discussed as essentially what Rajagopal might want as an ultimate face-saver. Afterward the English trustees met Rosenthal, the proposal was discussed, and they gave their assent to inviting Rajagopal to join KF London.

The next day K met with the Lilliefelts, the Digbys, Dorothy Simmons, David Bohm, myself, and Dr. Balasundaram, who was at Brockwood, to discuss the Indian Foundation and relations between the three. The question of K's position on KF India was brought up but could not be settled until Pupul Jayakar arrived. K raised the question of what was his and everyone else's responsibility in all these matters and bore down on Balasundaram as to whether the Indian schools really work at the teachings. He pointed out that this was necessary if support was to be given by the American trustees.

The Lilliefelts left, but Pupul Jayakar arrived on September seventeenth. She, K, Balasundaram, and I met to discuss KF India's relations with the other K Foundations. She suggested annual meetings of at least one member from each Foundation so that trust could be built. Topics to be explored would be the needs of each Foundation, publications, matters of overall policy, and any other pressing matter. She had been shocked when she read some of the legal data unearthed about Rajagopal. K then told her and Balasundaram in complete privacy of what had been decided during Rosenthal's visit: to offer Rajagopal membership in KFA and KF London in return for all KW Inc. archives and assets. They both welcomed the idea and approved. We discussed K being on the KFI board. There had been resistance to this in India on the theory that as a religious person he should not hold a secular position, but it had also been strongly felt in the West that, after the betrayal by Rajagopal, no organization bearing K's name should exist without his having full powers in it. She said that if K disapproved of anything, everyone on the India board would do what he said. Later in the day I voiced my own doubts about my own election as an Indian trustee. She said it had been a gesture and it didn't matter if I couldn't attend meetings. She seemed to understand that it wasn't feasible to have representatives of each Foundation on all other boards but thought the idea was a good one in principle and hoped that annual meetings of representatives from each would have the same effect.

Balasundaram left on September nineteenth. K continued his dictations of the education book. In the late afternoon, taking Whisper with us, K and I went for a long walk coming back across the fields and into the Grove. We no sooner entered than there was an extraordinary silence. Neither of us spoke, and we walked as if we didn't want to tread on the grass. There was no wind, an utter quiet; the great trees were like silent, living guardians of something: witnesses. There was a sense of something sacred, a presence that was total stillness. When we came out, latched the gate, and continued across the field, K said, "Did you feel it? It was something holy; one didn't even want to step on the grass. Whatever there is about this place it is centered there, not in the house." After supper Pupul Jayakar and I talked in the drawing room. K was above in his room, and while we sat there that strange quality came in the room. We were speaking of K.

On the following day, September twentieth, a conversation began at breakfast in the West Wing dining room when Krishnaji sat with Pupul and me and the subject of kundalini came up. K questioned Pupul on whether her observation of what happened to him in Madras and Ootacamund in 1948, when she and Nandini Mehta were present, could have been kundalini. She said that at the time she had written a detailed account and given it to Rajagopal who forbade her to keep a copy. She and Nandini had been staying at Vasanta Vihar when they heard K groaning in his room and went in, fearing he was ill. He had looked at her and said, "Are you Rosalind?" She said no, and he told them to stay in the room and not leave him alone. He said, “Krishna has gone away.” And then put his hand over his mouth and said, “I mustn’t say his name. He doesn’t like me to say his name.” He was in apparent pain, sweating, and faint. This happened again later the same year when he was staying in Ootacamund with Maurice Frydman. It would start around 6 p.m. and last sometimes until one in the morning. He told Pupul and Nandini to stay in the room but wouldn’t have Frydman there. He would faint, and an extraordinary beauty came into his face. Pupul described what was happening to him as seeming a total cleansing of the mind. In reply to K’s questioning her, she said that she wouldn’t describe it as kundalini, which is a result of conscious, deliberate meditation on chakra centers, in lotus pose, and the result of great effort. She said it is the result, or rather release, of great energy, that brings about various powers, etcetera, but Krishnaji’s experiences were different. Leadbeater, who knew at least something about kundalini, couldn’t explain what it was in K’s case. She said that in kundalini there is a breaking of energy into the mind, like an explosion, but pointed out that Krishnaji never seemed to have been caught in conditioning. He was interested and questioned her at length. He had no memory of all this. In one of the episodes he had said, “The shining ones, the great ones are here.” Two days later Pupul left.

Dictation on his education book continued. There were discussions with the school, and he gave a filmed interview to the BBC. There were dentist visits in London, a fitting at his tailor, and lunch with Mary Lutyens and Sacha de Manziarly. For a change we took the train from Winchester. K was very pleased; a better train, partly new scenery, some yellow fields flew past. He was “lost” and far away. Later he tried to put it into a dictation, “an emptiness and stillness, which lasted all day. That is my rest.”

October sixth was a day of packing, but in the afternoon we left it and went for a last walk down the lane between the fields. The sky had dark clouds with bright sun illuminating the earth. There was the lovely color where the fields were plowed, honey-buff and pinkly brown. The air was bright and clean with a sharpness of autumn. We ate blackberries along the hedges and shared some with Whisper, who had learned to catch them in mid-air from K.

The whole school was out on the driveway to say goodbye the next morning. Krishnaji shook hands with each one of them. There was warmth and affection in every face. It was a touching and gentle farewell, and we rolled off to Heathrow with Dorothy in the Land Rover.

A letter had just come from Erna, which I read to K in the car. It said that Rajagopal might telephone K, and if he does, the lawyer suggests that K tell him that he will pass through California on his way to Australia and might see him then. But under no circumstances should K see him alone. Either I or Erna or both of us should be there as witnesses to what is said. We said goodbye to Dorothy, checked into our respective airlines, and sat together in the departure lounge. It was crowded; humanity was a scruffy lot, and K was all elegance and simplicity. His Rome flight was called first, and he went off with the grace, exquisite manners, and face lit with affection that only he had.

My own flight took me to Paris, where I stayed with my father. In the evening Doris Pratt rang from Brockwood to let me know that Rajagopal had called from California for K. Doris had said that K was in Rome. Soon the telephone rang again. It was Vanda's voice and then Krishnaji's telling me that Rajagopal had just rung in a very pathetic voice saying he wanted to see K as soon as possible in California. K replied that he was planning to go there on his way to Sydney. Rajagopal said he wanted to see him to tell him he loved him and to see that things were all right. K said he would think about it and telephone when he reached there. Rajagopal said that their meeting was more important than the talks in Australia; he wanted to set things right and be his old self. K said to me that he thought Rajagopal was afraid he would die and wanted to mend things with him. He asked me to tell Erna but have her keep it quiet.

Two days later Vanda and K called again to say that Rajagopal had telephoned again. Vanda had asked him not to speak to K, who was resting, so Rajagopal gave her the message that if K didn't "withdraw," Rajagopal "for technical reasons" would be forced to go to court to defend himself and K would be "exposed"; that he loved K and the reason he was calling was that K must see him in California. I asked both K and Vanda if Rajagopal had said he would go to court or it would go to court. K put Vanda on and she wasn't sure but said that Rajagopal had asked if I was there, and when told I was in Paris, said that K would never have done all this but for those around him.

There were no more telephone calls from Rajagopal. Krishnaji was resting, going to the cinema, and sounded relaxed. He was to speak in Perugia on October sixteenth. Due to my father being ill, I had postponed leaving for the United States until the seventeenth, and on that morning, K, on returning to Rome, telephoned to inquire about my father and my plans. I told him I was about to leave for the airport, and he said he was going to suggest that if I should stay that I wait and go with him later. I said that if he wanted me to accompany him I would, but that I would still have to go to New York eventually to settle everything there. So we talked a little, and I went off to the airport and flew to New York.

After seeing my mother on Martha's Vineyard, I returned to New York and arranged where Krishnaji would stay during his New York talks in the spring, talked to the management at Town Hall about the arrangements, and at Harper & Row discussed his new book, The Urgency of Change, and publicity plans for it. All that done, I returned to Malibu on October twenty-seventh. A blackened, ravaged landscape was the sad sight, but although the fire, which had poured through that part of Southern California a few weeks earlier, had burned all the brush in the canyon, the house and that of my friends, the Dunnes, was spared.

CHAPTER 19

On November first, 1970, Krishnaji flew from Rome to Brockwood, and on the third he flew to Los Angeles. He was not downcast by the fire damage but rather expected it to be greater devastation and said, “It will all grow back.” We had supper on trays in the living room, and there was a serenity and sense of peace in the house.

The next day a trip to the dentist was needed, but we came back for lunch, and in the afternoon the Lilliefelts and Ruth Tettemer came to see K, talk, and have tea. Earlier I had talked to Sol Rosenthal, who had rung Mr. Loebl, Rajagopal’s lawyer, to prod him for a reply to the offer for R to become a trustee of KFA and KF England. While still in Rome, K had had an abusive call from Rajagopal.

A quiet, peaceful day followed. K slept most of the morning and afternoon. For the afternoon walk we went round and round the garden. I spoke to Alain in Berkeley, inviting him for the weekend, and he flew down the next day. He and Krishnaji held long talks on the states of mind of people and young people in particular. A drug-oriented society was Alain’s description. Rajagopal rang and told me to give K his “personal, not my legal, greetings.” On Sunday the eighth, the three of us had a long breakfast and talk in the dining room. K said that if one is serious about inner things, the means come about—one doesn’t have to worry about it. Alain left in the afternoon, and K and I had a beach walk. He asked me to telephone Radha Sloss and give her his greeting, saying that he had not been feeling well but would ring her on his return in March.

The next evening Rajagopal rang. K wouldn’t speak to him and told me to tell him that because he had been abusive on the telephone in Rome he would not talk by telephone. If he had anything to say, he should write to him. Rajagopal replied angrily, “I will never write to him!” and rang off. Later he rang back in a different tone. Would I talk to him? Then ensued a long exchange: K had destroyed him all over the world; people think he is an embezzler, etcetera. I tried to get through and said that, first of all, K had not attacked him, on the contrary, and that if he wanted a reconciliation to reply through Loebl to the settlement suggestion we had made; that was the door to a solution that we all wanted in deepest sincerity. By his non-response we could only conclude that he didn’t want a settlement. “How can I work with people who think I am an embezzler?” Then he said there would be no settlement until there was a meeting between him and K, that it was a personal matter. I said that K had said that there was nothing personal to discuss—only what concerned KW Inc. and the Foundation. “What Foundation?” he said. “You aren’t in this; it is between Krishnamurti, Rosalind, and me.” I repeated K’s statement and that K had been repeatedly willing to see him and that in every instance Rajagopal had prevented it. His last telephone call to K in Rome was an example: He had been disagreeable and abusive. “I didn’t abuse him! He is a liar, a hypocrite, and a coward; he hides behind women.” (Vanda and me.) I finally rang off.

The next day was one of packing and also a telephone talk with Sol Rosenthal, who reported a discouraging reply from Rajagopal’s lawyer, Mr. Loebl. He wanted to know if our offer to Rajagopal rejected Attorney General Tapper’s suggestion (incorrectly quoted by Loebl) that R would get copyright to post-1968 material. In the evening Rajagopal again telephoned wanting to speak to K. K told me to tell him that he had again abused and insulted K in his conversation with me and therefore, if Rajagopal had anything to say, he should write. Rajagopal was angry and I said goodnight and hung up.

The next day, November twelfth, we had an early supper, and Amanda Dunne drove Krishnaji and me to the Los Angeles airport, where we boarded a Pan-American flight for Australia. We landed in Honolulu around midnight, and in the soft tropical air we walked forty-five minutes briskly for exercise and circulation around the airport waiting room. A different plane took us on across the vast ocean.

We landed in Sydney in the morning. The press and television interviewed Krishnaji, and then he was met by Reg and Mavis Bennett, Spencer Englich, Donald Ingram Smith, and Mrs. Marsha Murray. We were taken to Manly, a suburb of Sydney, and to a very nice apartment on the eleventh floor of a new building above the harbor with a splendid view of the bay. They had kindly thought of everything and arranged to come each morning with whatever was needed and to make lunch.

There was a television interview at some length, but the broadcast gave only about a minute of what Krishnaji had said and most of it dwelt on the story that still pursued him about his 1925 arrival in Sydney, when the Australians thought he would arrive walking on the water. The Bennetts kindly took me on a drive where I saw koala bears, emus, and wombats, all kinds of brightly colored parrots, and learned firsthand that kangaroos have soft fur, but K, who knew all this, stayed in to rest.

He held two public discussions in Mona Vale and on November twenty-first gave his first talk in Sydney to an audience of about 1,500. It was an election day, and some rather rowdy young, who happened to be passing out papers at the polling place next door, came in and called out rough questions. One came down to the edge of the stage and challenged K on a question of social change. K's answer quieted him to silence.

There was a second talk on the following day, a most intense one, and in the middle of it a young man climbed onto the stage and sat himself self-consciously at Krishnamurti's feet. K, taken aback for only an instant, asked him to move further away and continued the talk where he left off.

Krishnaji had been questioning the Bennetts on what it was like in the Leadbeater days, why people accepted him, etcetera. They suggested K talk to Harold Morton, who had been one of the group of young people around Leadbeater, and he came to lunch on the twenty-fourth, a white-haired, pink-faced man with an aged adolescent look that some men retain late in life. He spoke with detachment and a tinge of humor about those distant days. K questioned him about why people believed in CWL—as Leadbeater was called—and Morton replied that they wanted to believe in all of it, in the supernatural, i.e., his supposed clairvoyance, and no one really dared question him.

K asked him if Leadbeater had been homosexual, and Morton replied that he was. He said that he knew it was so from two sources: one from a boy himself and the other was the boy's father. K was appalled that a man would so use his position of trust with young people. The clairvoyance was discussed—its apparent genuineness in predicting Krishnamurti as the World Teacher-to-be and also in foreseeing the sinking of a ship that turned out to be the Titanic—but also the doubts when he cabled for news of one of the boys who had already died.

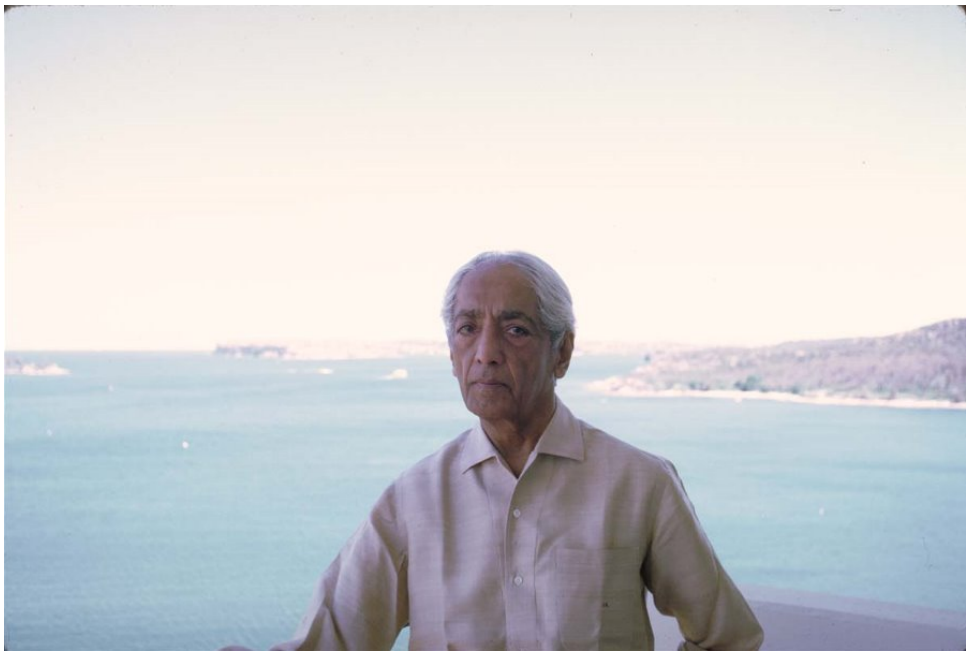
Earlier that morning K had stood on the balcony that looked out at the vast harbor of Sydney, watching the departure of the aircraft carrier SS America. He said it would be fun to be its captain. He would like that.



K gave his third talk at the Sydney town hall, and on the twenty-sixth he was interviewed on television. He paid little attention while the interviewer, named Ross Saunders, read passages from The Penguin Krishnamurti Reader on belief. Then K demolished belief and organized religion and went on with a fresh clarity until the end of the half-hour, covering a great deal with simplicity and eloquence.

The fourth talk was on the twenty-eighth. At the end he spoke of beauty, asking if it is in the object—the sky, the white sails in the harbor, a Velázquez painting (which had sold in London the day before for £2,200,000, which I heard on the radio and told him about at breakfast)—or is it in you? He said as long as there is a space between you and the object there is no beauty. Only when there is no self is there beauty. He was tired when we came back, and we skipped the walk.

But the next day, after the fifth talk, he said to me, “I don’t feel as if I have been working here.” He said he wasn’t tired because he had done nothing when not talking. He had slept, read, and walked. No private interviews. He told me to reply in the U.S. to interview requests by saying there would be no interviews.

He held a second private discussion in the apartment on the thirtieth and was pleased with a cardigan to match a beige pullover I had found for him earlier. If I were to see something I thought he would like, or some good detective stories, I was to buy them for his arrival in Malibu. “I like new things,” he said with his face alight, as a child.

On the following evening he told me to write only letters that could be read by anyone, as his mail was not secure in India, or even at Brockwood, as letters could be opened by mistake. About Rajagopal he said that I, Erna, and Roth’s lawyer must discuss what would be best to do and not wait to consult him. He would not be part of litigation, but if we decided to pursue Rajagopal, then “all the better.” He said there might be immediate decisions to make and that he trusted me to make them. If I were acting for him, according to the thing itself and not because of my personal feeling, I would be right. He said that Rajagopal had stolen, and that he, K, would not accept any telephone calls from him or any of his emissaries. He said that the questions might be about money, and we (KFA) should decide.

That was the first thing he wanted to tell me, and another was that he was feeling increasingly “far away” lately and perhaps was becoming “as I was as a little boy—vacant.” He said that I must look after things, somehow do things anonymously so that people would not resent it. “We must figure out a way.” He talked about the book he was working on and felt it should have another five chapters. I was to send him a list of questions that are asked for the student section of the book. He might add to it. I asked him about a part in which he had said, “You have raised a generation with regard for nothing.” He agreed that it was too harsh and that I must change it. He said he felt very well.

The next day was December second, and we had finished breakfast and were ready to leave at 9.45 a.m. The Bennetts drove us to the airport; I checked Krishnaji through tickets and passport control. There were people to see him off. He had that remote look, and it was hard to have him go alone on the long flight to Delhi that went ten hours via Hong Kong and then another six and a half hours to Delhi. It was a hot day, and he was wearing a gray cotton shirt. At the airport he wandered off and stared, while waiting to leave, as he so often did in airports. He shook hands very formally with all of us and went to his plane. We all waited and watched it take off and become a tiny white dot in the sky. Later in the day I flew back to California.

1971 began with Krishnamurti in India on his usual schedule of talks and conferences. I remained in Malibu, largely transcribing his dictations of his education book and sending them to Mary Lutyens for editing. During this time I was telephoned by Rajagopal, asking me to come to Ojai, which I did on February twenty-fourth. I reported this and all other matters to K, and he wrote regularly in return. The meeting was at Rajagopal's house with Mima Porter present; it was a two-hour conversation. It was in no way decisive.

Returning from India, Krishnaji flew from Bombay to Rome on February twentieth, then to Brockwood on the twenty-second, and then arrived in California on the twenty-fourth in good health and energy and looking splendid. He slept most of the following day, but we talked at length, and he taught me new breathing exercises—pranayama, which he had just learned from a sannyasi from Bangalore.

After four days of rest, K had me telephone Rajagopal and invite him and Mima Porter to Malibu on K's behalf. Rajagopal said he couldn't leave Ojai, would we come there? It was agreed, and the appointment was made for March third. In the meantime, on the second, K began a new dictation tentatively entitled This Is Meditation.

On the third we drove to Rajagopal's house—he in bare feet and K elegant in flannels, turtleneck jersey, and tweed jacket. Mrs. Porter was half an hour late, so we sat and made social chat. K, quite relaxed, talked casually of things and doings in India. This continued for some time after Mrs. Porter's arrival. Rajagopal seemed nervous and unable to begin the serious conversation or say what he had asked K to come and hear. Krishnaji was the poised and dominant one, and finally he asked Rajagopal to talk about whatever it was he had to say. Rajagopal began what became a tirade: K had attacked him, blackened his name, etcetera, etcetera. Krishnaji explained why he broke with KW Inc., said he had completely lost contact with Rajagopal due to his refusal to inform him and probably there had never been a real relation between them. This seemed to shake Rajagopal. The exchange continued, K stating facts in the situation and Rajagopal increasing in antagonism. At one point, when I referred to his inconsistencies, he tried to silence me by saying I was protecting K. I said I was replying to what he—Rajagopal—had said and for a moment it looked as if he would go to pieces. He shook. When pressed by logic he veered off and tried to muddy the issue. At the end of three hours, he said that K must retract all criticism, announce publicly that he was mistaken, that Rajagopal had done nothing improper, and apologize. Then, perhaps, the right climate could be set to discuss what should be done with KW Inc. and KFA.

The following day K wrote to Rajagopal saying that he had come to try to find a basis for some contact with him, that it was up to Rajagopal to respond in deeds—that his action would be his reply; it was up to him. There was no response until a letter came to K on March twelfth from Mima Porter hinting at "personal matters" between K and Rajagopal and that Rajagopal was hurt by K not coming openly to tell him sincerely what had happened surreptitiously. That this was the crucial matter Rajagopal wanted to clear up in private conversation with K; hence Rajagopal's exasperation when K only wanted to discuss KW Inc. affairs and not "that cadaver that is rotting between you and him." And, she added, that Rajagopal was the victim. To this K wrote to her: "If there were problems between Rajagopal and myself, I do not see that it is anyone else's business. The fact is that there are no personal matters that need discussion between Rajagopal and me. The constant implication of something personal is a very obvious attempt by you, by Rajagopal, and others to evade the serious issue of KW Inc. and your grave responsibilities to that Trust."

On March twenty-first Rajagopal wrote to K, saying that it was obvious that K wished their personal, friendly relationship to cease, but that he intended to continue his work for the teachings. On March twenty-fourth K had me ring Rajagopal to say that K wished to see him and Mrs. Porter and that he had something very serious that he wished to say. A date was set for a week later, then subsequently postponed by Rajagopal.

During this time Alain came down twice from Berkeley and stayed at the house. On March twenty-sixth he came with Professor Jacob Needleman and his wife and made an audio recording of a dialogue between K and Needleman. Over that weekend I recorded two talks between K and Alain. Also around this time K held two discussions with students at the University of Southern California in Los Angeles.

On April second the next meeting with Rajagopal took place at his house. It was a hot day, and Krishnaji said he wanted to be outside so we sat on a balcony. Mima Porter was also present. K had brought a list in his own handwriting of the points he wished to cover. He said it was his last attempt to bring order into the situation. He spoke of his reasons for the break: Rajagopal's refusal to inform him and consult; the limited activities of KW Inc.; the systematic elimination of K as the founder, plotted by Rajagopal; letters from James Vigeveno, Byron Casselberry, and Mima Porter, all of which were threatening, and those of Vigeveno and Casselberry were considered extortion by our lawyer; Porter's broken promise in Paris about the archives; the Noyes settlement offer from Rajagopal, which he later denied; Rajagopal's using KW Inc. money to fight K; Rajagopal showing letters and spreading personal stories to various people and hence publicly.

Rajagopal and Mrs. Porter were silent through all this. Krishnaji spoke slowly, almost hesitantly. Mrs. Porter then took exception to his saying she had done nothing and said she had written to him in 1968 that Rajagopal would hand over everything to him. K said he had not received that. I reminded her that she had written that Rajagopal loved K and that they should talk everything over in the autumn and settle things then, and that when K came to Ojai, this had turned out to be a brush-off and not a real offer. Rajagopal then said that he had been accused, that "your lawyer had dug up information," and that he must have the chance to refute it. Mrs. Porter continued about letters of criticism received by Rajagopal, and I said that the ending of all this, if it was so distressing, was through the open door of the settlement offer—a dignified reconciliation and joining of forces. To Krishnamurti's saying that KW Inc. funds were going to lawyers, Rajagopal replied that our funds were doing the same, and I replied that not a dollar of public donations had been spent for this purpose—only private, special money given for that purpose was used for legal fees.

Rajagopal was insistent that only a public vindication would satisfy him, that reconciliation with K was not enough. We said it was then fruitless; that he chose to push it to court. He said we were doing that—that we offered reconciliation in one hand with a gun in the other. We started to leave. Rajagopal said he wanted a private conversation with K and then the work, etcetera could be allocated in discussion between all of us. K said he would do that. He said he was too tired then and had to leave. He went out to the car. I rose to leave, and Rajagopal said he had the "Dodge papers," which I had requested for K. These turned out to be a statement from the First National City Bank in New York and a checkbook on an account in K's name in a Security Pacific Bank in Hollywood.

Following on this was a day or so of rest. Going to a movie seemed an idea, but to one possibility—a film called Wellington—K said, "What! Go to see my favorite hero defeated?!" I never quite understood his fancy for Napoleon. The afternoon walk was simply around and around the garden, and I lost my daily efforts to prevent his carrying out the dishes to the kitchen. K said, "If I can't do it, I'm going back to Madanapalle!"

“You want to be the Rishi of Rishi Valley?” I asked.

K: “Yes.”

On April fifth we went back to Ojai for a trustee meeting of KFA at the Lilliefelts’, and in the afternoon we went to Rajagopal’s. He and K talked on the balcony while I sat in the car and was joined an hour later by Mima Porter. We didn’t discuss anything serious, and in about twenty minutes Krishnaji called us to join him and Rajagopal, saying that they had completed a personal discussion and he wanted Rajagopal to repeat to me his proposition. Rajagopal described it as the offer he had made through Col. Noyes in 1968 with some modifications. I asked why he had withdrawn that offer and denied it? Rajagopal said it was because K had “demanded the archives be turned over to him.” I pointed out that that request was made after Rajagopal had sent word that K would have to go to court to get a tape of the talk he had given the day before in Ojai and had also refused him his own manuscript. “I deny that,” said Rajagopal.

“You can’t deny it to me,” I said. “I came to this very door with Alain Naudé on Krishnaji’s behalf to ask for it and was refused admittance.” I said that I could not remember the details of the Noyes memorandum and would he have Mr. Loebl send it to our lawyers? Rajagopal replied that he didn’t want to do it through Loebl and that he and Mima Porter would draw it up and send it to us. Then all of us and our lawyers could consider it with Mr. Tapper, and if we had an agreement all the lawyers could draw it up in legal form.

All through this Rajagopal was alternately irritable, ready to fly off the handle, and insistent, which made K try to stop him from hammering points, and this in turn made Rajagopal madder. I tried to quiet it in order to get him to say what it was he was proposing. He wanted, of course, a statement from K withdrawing accusations.

We left, and Krishnaji told me the personal side of their discussions. Rajagopal had accused him of injecting himself into his divorce proceedings with Rosalind. K told him of her visit to him and me in Malibu. It was a question mark whether Rajagopal knew about it but probably did. Another question mark was whether Rajagopal had secretly tape-recorded what K was saying. As we were driving up to the entrance of Rajagopal’s house, my last words had been please to remember that this might happen. “I completely forgot,” said K. “I looked at the mountains and forgot everything.”

We went back to the Lilliefelts’ and talked a while then drove home. On the way K said he felt free of a weight—the weight of Rajagopal. It wasn’t until later that he wondered if he had said too much. He said he had done everything he could to reach Rajagopal, to go far beyond halfway in trying to solve the situation, that he must never see Rajagopal alone again. “I don’t know how to deal with people like this. I would be vague and agree to anything. That is what happened in the past.”

Two days later a memorandum came from Rajagopal on the settlement basis he had mentioned. It proposed to turn over “part of the real estate,” but it was so oddly worded with “assessor’s value” and ”cash value” that it was unclear whether he would give it or sell it. There was no mention of Arya Vihara or the KR Trust or the Annie Besant Trust. He wanted funds for salaries for KW Inc. It appeared he would keep the assets he had transferred to KR, the archives, and some of the land. What KFA would get was problematical. I read it to Erna on the telephone and then to David Leipziger, who would discuss it with Sol Rosenthal. After doing so they did not think the memorandum would lead to a settlement but thought we should reply in the form of a letter from Erna, Ruth Tettemer, and me, as trustees, keeping K out of it, and asking for clarification of Rajagopal’s points while stating that we were continuing, because of the long delay, to explore other avenues of action. Erna was to draft the letter.

Erna, Theo, and Ruth came on the ninth with the draft, much of it by Leipziger. Erna and Theo had looked up the county assessor’s map and found an eleven-acre piece of land formed part of twenty-three acres of the Happy Valley School, which seemed to indicate that Rajagopal would keep most of the fifteen acres around his own house. Erna, Ruth, and I were the committee of KFA to sign the letter and with whom he would have to settle, as K didn’t want to be part of settlement negotiations. Erna retyped the letter with some small changes, and we signed it.

Sunday the eleventh began with the great-horned owl making his sound in the pale dark before dawn, and a Bullock’s oriole was bathing and preening his feathers when the shining morning grew. K had slept well and had his breakfast when he said he felt he should telephone Radha Sloss because he had said he would. What ensued was a tirade from her, hammering at K. Her father might go to jail. K said it was up to Rajagopal. He had been offered a settlement to wipe out the past, but Rajagopal hadn’t taken it. If he settled K would make a public statement of reconciliation. “You should make it first,” said Radha. “You care about money!” She repeated this over and over when K said that it was up to Rajagopal, that the way out had been offered. “I don’t accept that. You told me three years ago you wouldn’t have anything to do with KW Inc. as long as he was head of it.” Like both her parents she reiterated what was said in the past as though the present didn’t exist. Her blistering nag had Krishnaji shaking, worse than in his meetings with Rajagopal. He was exhausted by the time he was able to end the conversation. An hour later she rang back and said her father had offered a settlement and had had no acknowledgement. K said it would reach him Monday or Tuesday, “other people are busy, too.” “You’ll be gone. Who is he to deal with?” K said he was out of it and KFA would reply. When this conversation was finished, K said he would never see any of them alone again, that I must remember this and protect him from this sort of bullying. I asked if I had his permission to answer immediately, if they should telephone, and handle it directly without going to him to ask what he wanted said. He told me to do it myself.

The next day, April twelfth, we flew to New York and stayed at a small flat that belonged to my father. Two days later we flew to Washington and the Shoreham Hotel, where K had been asked to speak before the American Society of Newspaper Editors. That conference was the next day and its focus was on the future. The time was short, and though K spoke forcefully and to the point, he felt afterward that it was a waste.

We flew back to New York where, on April seventeenth, he gave his first talk. He had been sick to his stomach at lunchtime and ate almost nothing, but after a nap that lasted until four and a cup of rose hip tea, he went to Town Hall for the first of his New York talks. The hall was full, and people had to be turned away. K showed no sign of weakness and almost from the beginning his voice had the deep tone that was to me an "otherness," coming more often far into a talk. The audience had a large proportion of young people in it who seemed to listen intently. K was dizzy and far-off afterward, and seemed almost faint, but when we returned to the apartment, he wanted to sit at the table where we had supper and even wanted to turn on the television. "It helps me unwind," he said. In the talk he had said the worst crime is to be in conflict, and later he told me to remember to tell him, "Knowledge is the basis of the mind being hurt." During the talk a man had brought a brilliant red rose and put it at his feet, and later, when he seemed to cough, someone else brought him a paper cup of water. K put it on the floor of the stage and, seeing the flower, he tried to put its stem into the paper cup of water. Still later he said to me, "That man on the platform must know a great deal," and we talked of pain as against suffering. "Pain can be felt organically or through sensitivity, but suffering is when the mind holds on to it."

The next day he was feeling well and gave his second talk at Town Hall at 5:30 p.m. During the day he had spoken of Rajagopal and Rosalind and what makes people go wrong. I asked if there was ever a time when Rajagopal and he would talk about the teachings, about all the things that we talked about, and he said never.

Throughout the week we went for walks and did some shopping. Mr. Clayton Carlson, the recent head of the religious books department at Harper & Row, brought Mrs. Rosen of Time magazine to interview K, and on another day he was interviewed by CBS Radio. One evening he suddenly said to me, "Angels are looking after you. They will look after you when I am gone." He repeated it, and the following day asked me if I remembered what he had said. I repeated it and asked what he had meant. "You should have asked the man then," he said. "Probably it meant you are protected now and will be after I am dead."

On April twenty-fourth K said that in the night he felt as though his brain were being operated upon. There was pain, and the body was "frightened." Had I been awake he would have talked to me and "gone off." The odd thing was that I had been quite widely awake in the night. At lunch he seemed "off," remote, a little unconnected, and said he felt quite empty. At 5:30 p.m. he gave a very great talk (the third at Town Hall) on relationship, "corruption is the absence of relationship," love and death. He spoke for one hour this time and then took over half an hour to answer questions. He looked exhausted as we sat down to supper, still in the state of the talk, his hands cold. Then he relaxed, and television acted like an aspirin.

The fourth talk was on the twenty-fifth. We took the Lilliefelts to lunch at an Italian restaurant the next day and discussed KFA matters. There had been no reply from Rajagopal since our letter to him. On the evening of April twenty-eighth, we flew to London.

Spring was just beginning at Brockwood; the trees were still bare but the daffodils were bright. After two days' rest, we drove to have tea with Mary and Joe Links at Blackdown, their country place near Haslemere. Alain, just arrived from California, was there. We all went for a walk through the bluebells.

K spoke to the students and to Mary Cadogan and the Digbys. Then, on May fifth, 1971, we flew to Paris and stayed at the Plaza Athénée. The purpose of the trip was for me to see my ailing father and to pick up the new Mercedes I had ordered earlier for delivery in the spring. There were a few shopping errands to do in Paris, and while I was with my father, K went to a cinema with Marcelle Bondonneau. On the seventh the car was brought by the dealer, Mr. Moser, who drove it from Thun, Switzerland. It looked quite splendid, K was pleased, and we had the luggage put in and then went back into the hotel for a pleasant lunch in the Régence restaurant. In the atmosphere of such a restaurant, Krishnamurti's elegance made him the embodiment of every aristocracy the past had ever produced. He was wearing his navy blue blazer, the best cut of his Huntsman clothes, and looked superb; also as innocent as a beautifully mannered child. We felt festive: the new car, the delicate smells of a very good French restaurant, the ease, the fun, the expectation of the drive. There was also the lighthearted sense of adventure that often came at such times. For me there was the fun of providing fun for him—minor but decorative embellishments to amuse him and to which he was as responsive as that child. Then, for the first time in the new car, we drove up to the Étoile and on, heading north. It drove as though on air. K had me go slowly to break in the car, and he took the wheel for an hour. We reached the Château de Montreuil, where we had the rooms of our first visit, then had dinner, feeling very well. Later the next day, K said he had a strong meditation in the night. For some reason he seemed to have them in those odd hotels, as if his being away from people's attention being focused on him had something to do with it. I had been afraid the trip would be tiring for him, coming on top of everything before, but he said no, it broke the presence of people. We left Montreuil in the morning for Boulogne and took the hovercraft to Dover, in thirty-five minutes, our first time in one. K stood up the whole way, absorbed in looking out the window. We drove across southern England on a warm, sunny day, stopping for a picnic lunch somewhere west of Hastings. Montreuil had made us sandwiches that turned out to be huge—half a baguette with good Normandy cheese and butter. We drove along the south coast almost to Portsmouth and then inland until reaching the lane to Brockwood by 6 o'clock.

On May tenth we went to London and lunched with Mary Links and Alain. K and I went afterward to Mary's at Hyde Park Street, and he told her essential history of his years with the Rajagopals, which she had not known. He had me describe the atmosphere when I was in Ojai with him and Alain in 1966 and the reasons for my estimate that both Rs had worked together to try to dominate and control K.

The next day, after he had given the new car its first wash in the morning, K and I drove to Heathrow to meet Nandini Mehta, her daughter Devi Mangaldas, and her two young children, who had all come from spending ten days with Vanda Scaravelli in Rome. They stayed in the West Wing until flying on to Toronto on the sixteenth. Then, on the seventeenth, Krishnaji and I flew to Amsterdam, where Anneke Korndorffer met us, and we went to Huizen, where Professor and Mrs. Van der Ven were lending K their house for his visit. They were there to greet him and then left, we unpacked and K, Anneke, and I had supper. There was a meeting of the Krishnamurti Stichting the next day: Anneke, Professor Van der Ven, Tilly Von Egmond, and Mr. Perizonius. Present and future activities were discussed. For one of the afternoon walks, K and I revisited the lovely wood near the barn we had lived in four years earlier.

Krishnaji began his Amsterdam talks on May twenty-second at the RAI, where the audience overflowed the main hall into another. It was a long and strong talk. We came back for lunch, and after a rest and tea we went again to walk in the little wood. There were three more talks, and then, also at the RAI, K held a discussion with several hundred sad and disheveled-looking young people. We flew back to Brockwood on the twenty-seventh.

At tea at Blackdown, with Mary and Joe, an Indian-edited book of K dialogues was discussed. K agreed to read it and subsequently worked on its revision. Pupul Jayakar came for two days, and K discussed the dialogues with her. She corrected two of them her way. K was invited to speak at Bedales School and did so. I went briefly to Paris to see my father.

On June twenty-second Krishnaji felt ill. He thought it was something he had eaten but had no special symptoms. He simply felt he couldn't get up and so stayed in his room, either in bed or sitting in the armchair. He said, "I feel if I went through the door, I could die. The wall between living and dying is very thin; it always has been with me. Suddenly it will be there. Not today." He told me I must not be upset by his illness or it would upset him and he would not tell me. He seemed better by evening and ate a fairly good supper. He was well enough the next day to do a filmed question-and-answer session for Dutch television with a Mr. Van Praag in the hall of the West Wing, and later we went for a walk with Dorothy's dog, Whisper. Two days later K had a fitting in London, and for the first time we lunched at Fortnum and Mason. L'Aperitif restaurant, which he liked, was no more, so Fortnum was tried because it was conveniently near his tailor, next door to Hatchards for books, and because it was relatively quiet. He had been free of hay fever in town, but back at Brockwood he coughed badly at night. Two days later he was well enough to give a very good talk to the students on what was the most important thing in their lives. "For me it is to be nothing."

On June twenty-ninth we left Brockwood and drove to Dover, found the hovercraft had been canceled, and so took the ferry to Boulogne. We spent the night at the Château de Montreuil, and in the morning K said he had slept well because of the lifting of pressure, which builds up when he stays in one place and people's attention concentrates on him. With him driving part of the way, we headed for Paris, but I was at the wheel when we neared the city. On long drives I sometimes slipped off my shoes, and on that day, after rounding the Étoile and coming down the Champs-Elysées, I fished for my right shoe and bumped a car that stopped suddenly in front. Small damage mostly to the grill of my car and only a broken taillight for the furious driver, who thought I was Swiss because the Mercedes had Swiss plates. My one thought was to get K quickly and without delay to the Plaza Athénée, so with apologies and an offer to pay for the damage, I opened my purse, and the man crossly took all the visible francs—enough for a series of taillights. From this K happily admonished me through the years to "never change your shoes in the middle of the Champs-Elysées."

After I had seen my father, we had an early lunch the next day and, hoping to avoid the July first traffic, headed south. Once out of Paris we drove slowly, Krishnaji full of delight at drifting through the countryside, until we reached Saulieu, where we had a good dinner and spent the night. The next day we continued on through Dijon, stopped for lunch in Dole, and reached Geneva and the Hôtel du Rhône in mid-afternoon. Ensued the customary errands of ordering ties—carefully choosing ones for Joe Links and a few for himself, and then to Patek Philippe for his pocket watch to be regulated. He took evident pleasure in this being meticulously done. The following day, July third, after lunch, we drove along the lake to Lausanne and then up the familiar road into the mountains. The air was bright with summer, and in the fields machines were tossing the mown hay, a sunny scene, but alas hay fever for K. Vanda and Fosca were waiting at Chalet Tannegg, and it was good to see them. K spent the next few days in bed. Vanda and I talked and walked. We discussed his health, and she delayed her departure for Florence until after Dr. Pierre Schmidt had been consulted and sent remedies for the congestion in K's chest.

A thunderstorm cleared the air, and by July thirteenth K felt better and wanted to come with me to Thun to fetch my car, which was having its grill fixed from the encounter in Paris. K drove, and on the way said he had had a marvelous meditation in the night. I asked what made it "marvelous," special? Was it intensity, content? He said, "Both," but when I asked if it really had content, he said, "Of course not." Was it a feeling without content, without words? He said yes. And that it was in sleep; it continued when he awoke and got up in the night and when he went back to bed.

My car looked pristine again. Mr. Moser had a brochure on the latest Mercedes sport model, and K's eyes brightened. We drove back in the two cars, mine following. It was touching to watch the little silver car, faultlessly driven, winding precisely along the road, the head and shoulders just showing through the rear window.

In Gstaad Erna and Theo Lilliefelt had arrived from Ojai. They had no news from Rajagopal but said he had until July fifteenth to show cause to the attorney general why we should not file suit. Balasundaram arrived and so did Mary Cadogan, the Biascoecheas, and Pupul Jayakar. There were discussions on publications and various Foundation matters. Pupul wanted India to have copyright, and this led to lengthy talk. I finally suggested permission to publish for India but copyright retained by England, and this was accepted. Pupul also resisted K being on the KF India board, saying it was unsuitable for a religious man to have to do with business matters, but this was an essential to the two Western Foundations after seeing what had happened in KW Inc. In the end Pupul agreed to some special title for him such as "Founder." She and Balasundaram left, Sacha de Manziarly came for a few days, Mar de Manziarly was also there, and the talks began. On the twenty-third we picked up Dorothy and Montague Simmons and again went to Thun, where an order was placed for a future Mercedes with the present silver one being used in trade. We took the little lake steamer to Beatus for lunch.

The Apollo 15 astronauts landed on the moon, and K watched it with interest on television but found it sad that a flag was planted there. It was hot in the tent where he gave his talks, and he felt tired and almost sick but continued to see people, and when the seventh talk was over he began seven daily discussions with the audience. He invited the Simmonses to move up to Tannegg, where they could get more rest than living in their Land Rover in the Saanen camping ground. There was a meeting of the Saanen Gathering Committee; I spoke to Vanda in Rome, and we renewed the Tannegg lease for the next year. There were guests for lunch, constant things to be discussed and settled, but always the afternoon walk along the river, and another trip with Dorothy and Montague on the little lake steamer, this time to Interlaken and back to Thun. We had a picnic lunch with us and in the four-and-a-half-hour trip, K stood much of the way, watching the deep jade of the waters and the Eiger, Mönch, and Jungfrau mountains, majestic in their snows. It was a peaceful, faraway day.

On August fourteenth a cable came from David Leipziger saying he had met with Mr. Tapper and Rajagopal's new lawyer named Rothman, at his request, in which a settlement was discussed along the lines of the memorandum we drew up. In it Rajagopal and the KW Inc. board would resign, and control would pass to KFA plus two or three others with publishing or educational background. All property, archives, etcetera were to be turned over; Rajagopal was to do some limited editorial work, but the copyright would go to KFA. Tapper wanted KFA trustees to be California residents but K not to be a member because of his age and constant travel. He thought that KW Inc. might be retained as the easiest way to accomplish things rather than dissolve it. Leipziger wanted a swift reply from us that he could tell Tapper, who would present it to Rothman, who would have a reply from his client within a week. K said, "I knew something had happened." Meanwhile, Erna and Theo had left, but I caught them at a hotel in Geneva and told them that K wanted them to come right back, which they immediately did, moving into the rooms downstairs that the Simmonses had just left. They arrived in the afternoon, and the four of us talked for two hours and then rang Leipziger in Beverly Hills. Erna took it all down in shorthand for an hour.

On August nineteenth, as Erna, Theo, and I were finishing breakfast, Krishnaji came in and began a conversation until it was time for all of us to leave for lunch at the Biascoecheas'. He commenced casually by asking when we might have word from our lawyers on results of the Tapper settlement proposal to Rajagopal. Then he asked, as he had so often, what went wrong with Rajagopal. He had been intelligent, able when young, chosen for the work by Leadbeater though never really liked by him, nor was Mrs.

Besant close to him. He was the son of a district judge, had an air of expecting to be waited on. He refused to do anything with his hands. In Ojai it was K who always cleaned up after the dog, and Rajagopal always had reasons why he couldn't do the washing up. Had Rajagopal remained a Theosophist at heart or in fact all those years? Did he go with K to lead K back eventually to Theosophy? K didn't think so. Erna remembered a conversation with Rosalind about "returning" the Happy Valley School to the TS when Erna was working there years ago, and that Rosalind Rajagopal considered herself the representative of Mrs. Besant. Also that Annalisa Rajagopal (his second wife) joined the Theosophical Society after marrying Rajagopal. K spoke of the incessant quarrels vented on him by both Rajagopals and that it was surprising they had not shot him. Rosalind had taken a hammer and hit him on the head while in a car; in India she had tried to hit him with a bottle, which was witnessed by someone there; had told him to jump under a train once in a station; and had hit him in the groin with her knee so that he had been unable to walk for a day. Why, I asked, had he not turned away from such people after all this? "I don't know," he said. He spoke of the protection of the boy when he was young, always two initiates to accompany him, having the right food, the necessity for the body's protection, etcetera. But if the body was attacked by Rosalind, why was she tolerated both by him and whatever powers were looking after him? Why did no one help him out of this situation until Alain and Mary came along, and then Erna and Theo Lilliefelt? I asked him if Rajagopal and Rosalind ever tried to influence him in his speaking. "Never," he said. "I would not have tolerated that." Suddenly it seemed clear to me. I asked if it were that to a personal attack he would do nothing, but if an attempt was made to influence the teachings he would not have tolerated it for an instant. "What would you have done?" I asked. "I would have left," he said.

Section Six

We left Gstaad on August twenty-second, 1971, in the early morning while it was still dark, crossing into France and stopping to buy croissants for our picnic breakfast at a little turning by the side of the road. We reached Paris in the early afternoon, went to a John Wayne movie, and had supper in our rooms at the hotel. There were two days of rest, some shopping, and another movie; and on the twenty-fifth we drove on to Montreuil for the night before going on the hovercraft from Boulogne to Dover, and so to Brockwood in the late afternoon. It was good to be back. All was beautiful and peaceful. K resumed dictations; we went to London for K's dentist and lunched with Mary L. and Alain.

There was a large crowd for the beginning of K's Brockwood talks on September fourth, and everyone, including K, had lunch afterward in the adjoining tent. In the afternoon of the sixth, as we were preparing to go for a walk, my brother telephoned from Paris that our father suddenly had a very high fever. I reached Paris by midnight and sat with him all night. In the morning the doctor said it was pneumonia. Father was slightly improved and able to recognize my brother and me briefly. He was better the next day, and I flew back via Southampton to Brockwood by the time Krishnaji awoke from his nap. We walked across the fields.

There were four talks in all and many meetings on committee matters. George and Nelly Wingfield-Digby stayed in the West Wing, and they gave Krishnaji some of their beautiful China collection, which he placed in the drawing room. After the talks there were dentist trips to London, and then the school opened and K had regular meetings with the students and discussed plans to enlarge the dining room with Ian Hammond.

On October sixteenth there was a last walk with Dorothy across the fields, the country glowing in autumn beauty. We had supper downstairs and then, with the luggage loaded in the car, and all the school there to say goodbye, K and I drove off to Southampton, where we boarded the Normandy ferry. We had staterooms for the overnight crossing to Le Havre and debarked at 7 a.m. After breakfast along the autoroute, we reached Paris and the Plaza Athénée. Mary and Joe Links were in Paris for an exhibition and came to lunch with us. Mr. Moser came to take the car for winter storage in Thun, and then Mr. André Voisin came to discuss with K his doing an interview in French for ORTF—the French television. Krishnaji agreed. I went to see my father, who was much better, and the next day, October eighteenth, the interview for ORTF was filmed in a sitting room of the hotel. This was continued the following morning—a total of four hours in all. It was the only recording K did in French, a language he loved, but it was more of an effort for him as he had spoken it so seldom in recent years. Before going to France or Switzerland he would say to me, "We will talk only French for two weeks before we leave," but seldom stuck to it.

On October twentieth I went with Krishnaji to Orly, where he flew to Rome. On my return to the hotel there was a letter from Erna saying a counteroffer had been made by Rajagopal wishing to keep the K&R Foundation and $400,000. This was unacceptable to Mr. Tapper, who was to call in KW Inc. members in a last-ditch effort to settle. If it failed, a complaint would have to be filed. I read this to Krishnaji at Vanda's in Rome. He said that Rosalind tried to telephone him there saying she wished to see him "not about the dispute." K sent a reply via Vanda that he did not wish to see her about anything.

I stayed in Paris with my father for a week. On the telephone, K said he had made no decision yet on whether to go to India, as the political news with Pakistan was still tense. On October thirty-first he gave a public talk in Rome. By November second I was back in Malibu and learned that Rajagopal's lawyer, Mr. Rothman, had told Mr. Tapper that the KW Inc. board had refused to see him unless he had a substantially better offer to make. Mr. Tapper had no such intention and therefore authorized our lawyer, Mr. Leipziger, to file a complaint. I cabled this to Krishnaji in Rome and wrote to him. On the sixth I received a letter from him saying that he had decided against going to India, not because of war possibility, but because "the body is rebelling against it and needs a complete rest," and he would come via Brockwood to Malibu. In another letter he wrote of being very tired, worried that he might be involved in the Rajagopal case. Erna and I talked about the necessity for him to be totally shielded. I spoke to Vanda in Rome, who said he was all right and just tired. He came on the phone and I reassured him about the case and also about financing the building of what was called the Cloisters at Brockwood, designed by Ian Hammond.

On November fifteenth Rajagopal and his wife, Annalisa, were served with papers in the complaint. On the nineteenth Krishnaji flew from Rome to Brockwood, and on the twenty-fifth I went to the Los Angeles airport to meet him. During the drive I had a familiar but curious sense of awareness of every foot of the road, of the other cars, as if something was taking charge. Each action became, as he had so often told me, responsible to something other—some purpose behind his life. In some way it seemed intently important that he had changed course and was coming at last for a thorough rest. I could see him, second off the plane, and soon he was out of customs and truly there, looking bright and very well in spite of accumulated fatigue and the long flight. There was a moment in the car, turning onto the freeway, when I thought he was about to faint, but touching his arm lightly seemed to prevent it. It was only when we were unpacking in his room that he suddenly fainted toward me so that I could only break his fall. It lasted only about two minutes, then he was all right, took a shower, and insisted on having his supper tray in front of the television news. He was wound up from traveling, chattery, and full of sparks, but his simple supper came up, as had the food on the plane. He brought me a letter he had written in Brockwood and one for that day, written on the plane. He wrote, "There was a right action when the Order of the Star was dissolved; there was a right action when the castle and land were returned; there was a right action when he broke with Rajagopal, and there is right action now. We are dealing with a crook, unscrupulous, utterly unreliable, and deeply antagonistic, with considerable hate. Action—any action where he is concerned—will have in it elements of distortion. We are not concerned with him; he's unbalanced and self-centered. It is not the money we want nor that property, not the manuscripts, etcetera. I feel that money was given with great devotion, sacrifice, and love. To those people who gave, we are responsible. And what is our responsibility? People, including Signora [Vanda], have said to me, is it not violence to embark on the path of lawyers? Signora was wild about it. Personally, money, etcetera is nothing. But to leave it all in Rajagopal's hands seems and feels totally wrong and not right." And then, "Right action under any circumstances is always true and from that everything flows easily. It is like a flowing river. The flow of the river is not inaction; its action is of itself from the beginning to the end. There's a right action in this."

And later: "One must be a complete outsider and so the most true revolutionary; then action will be incorruptible. We must act as outsiders with Rajagopal."

After he had a day of rest, the Lilliefelts and Ruth Tettemer came for lunch; we talked at length about what to do with the Rajagopal matters. K spoke of right action, as he had in his letter, and asked us what was right action. So far it had been right, he felt, and so did we. He repeated that it was the devotion and sacrifice of people who gave what they often could not afford to him and to the teaching that made him act to rectify the misconduct of Rajagopal. He wondered at what point was right action complete. "Must I go through a bitter struggle to either winning or defeat, or might it be achieved by going as far as removing it from Rajagopal's hands?" All this was searchingly discussed. Each said that it was for K to decide and we were prepared to go completely in whatever direction he felt was right. It was finally felt that we should go, as we had so far, a step or two at a time and to begin with a deposition from Enrique Biascoechea, who was knowledgeable about KW Inc. history; also to ask for an inventory and seek an injunction to prevent Rajagopal from disposing of KW Inc. funds. At the end of the afternoon, walking back from closing the gate, he said: "I feel full of beans!"—which, considering he had not had a nap and talked all afternoon, was cheering. But the most compelling thing he spoke of during the discussion was the need to protect the body in order to do the work, and he spoke of the closeness of living and dying and the protection of this. When I asked him about it, he said that those who are attached and cling to things experience death, but when death [meaning psychological death] is close to life, then there is protection. The next day he said to me, "I will live twenty or more years. You must be well to take care of me and outlive me." He said it was part of a plan and that Vanda felt this too. She couldn't do it, and I had been appointed.

A trustee meeting was held in Ojai on November thirtieth at which Krishnaji temporarily withdrew from the board to avoid participating in litigation. He suggested Theo Lilliefelt as a substitute member and this was carried. It was also decided to invite Alan Kishbaugh to become a member. Earlier in the morning he had a chiropractor treatment from Dr. Edna Lay, who said his body was bone-tired, but K said his mind was bursting with energy. The need was to slow down and let the body rest and catch up.

There was rest and gentle walks around the garden, but he wanted to come with me to town one day to do errands. We had a quiet picnic lunch in the car on a shady side street in Beverly Hills and then tried to find some things he needed, but after a glimpse of rapacious Christmas shoppers—"those monstrous devouring women," he called them—we fled. In the car on the way home, he let out a cry, put his hands over his face and said, "Stop! I'm going to faint." I couldn't stop in the traffic but said I would catch him with my right arm and did. After about two minutes he was all right, and we went on home in a light rain. He said he felt lost after the ugliness in the store. "Those monstrous people." The physical sensitivity seemed to preclude going to many public places where there were extremes of roughness, crowds of vulgarity and violence. There seemed increasing disorder in people. He said the body clung to me for its protection. As so often, he spoke of "the body" not as himself but as an entity that was his responsibility to maintain in health.

More enjoyable was another day's trip to see the movie The French Connection. French lessons with the aid of recordings became a daily event for a while, and K dictated a piece for the Bulletin. Most afternoons we walked on the beach as the slanting winter sun neared the horizon. There was a solitude at that hour with few people and shore birds stitching the receding waves for their supper.

After giving one long interview to a friend, he was tired and told me "no more interviews," but the next morning he said he had awakened in the night with a sense of joy and felt the room was filled with people—"eminent, holy beings" who seemed there when something happened in his brain. We did French lessons all morning and in the afternoon went to a Clint Eastwood movie in Santa Monica. The tiredness continued, and at times he was remote, as if aware of other things in the house, "something going on in the head," he said, but then he would like to go to a movie again, which we did and the pain was relieved but resumed when we came out of the theater. Coming back in the car he fainted.

A few days later he again spoke of it being according to a plan that I was there to help him: "The body must be protected." If my husband had lived, I would not be doing this. He denied that whatever providence is in charge exercises life or death—"Not that! That would be terrible"—but, as I was free, the decision was made to have me be the guardian. He recalled his brother dying and his own feeling that Nitya wanted desperately to live in order to look after him; that if Nitya had been properly looked after and stayed in one place instead of traveling about with K he might have lived. But perhaps the boy [K] needed to be alone. He looked at a large photograph of himself when quite young and said, "He is unformed."

Alain came down from San Francisco, and we had a nice non-Christmas Christmas, comfortably at home, talking over a long breakfast, going to a movie in the afternoon, and coming home to supper by the fire. The next day at breakfast, K said, "I may go back to Madanapalle."

I replied, "How would you live in Madanapalle?"

Krishnaji, "Oh, beg around."

There was wind all night, but December thirty-first was a bright and beautiful day. In the morning Krishnaji dictated a piece on what was the bourgeois mind: self-centered, deriving ego from material things and concepts, but more than that it had a quality of inelasticity. The wind was less in the afternoon, and we walked on the beach at low tide. The sheen on the sand was a path to the setting sun and a blessed ending to the year.

CHAPTER 23

Krishnaji began New Year's morning of 1972 by looking at the Rose Parade on television, saying, "These people are crazy!" Later in the afternoon he watched the end of the Rose Bowl football game with a little more interest. The first few days were brilliant sunlight and gale winds, but in the late afternoons we could walk on the beach. K began to do some talking into the tape recorder beginning with the discovery of "the boy" and the early years and another tape on Rajagopal.

Sidney Field telephoned that his brother, John, died suddenly, Krishnaji spoke to him, and Sidney came to lunch on the sixth and described his continuing sense of his brother's presence. K talked to him at length.

On January ninth we drove to Ojai and, at the Lilliefelts', K tape-recorded his answers to questions posed by Albion Patterson, Erna and Theo, and Ruth Tettemer on his concept of the World Teacher. We lunched with them, went for a walk, and drove back to Malibu. On the next day Enrique and Isabel Biascoechea arrived in Los Angeles, were met by Theo, who brought them to Malibu for tea, and then went on to Ojai. Enrique had come to give a deposition in the suit against Rajagopal. He and Isabel came to stay with us in Malibu, and on January fourteenth I drove Enrique to David Leipziger's office, where Erna and Theo met us, and the deposition took place.

It did not go well; Enrique seemed constrained, did not appear to remember or make clear what he had to say. He and Isabel left the next day for San Francisco. K and I took a picnic lunchbox and drove to Ojai. Erna told me that Enrique had taken her aside in utmost confidence and told her of Rajagopal's blackmail in 1946. Enrique had given money for K's use and when he questioned Rajagopal's handling of it, including insisting that some of the checks be made out to Rajagopal personally, Rajagopal had told him that K was not the perfect individual that Biascoechea imagined, and that Rajagopal could prove an involvement with his wife. The implication was clear: that Rajagopal was threatening to reveal this if Biascoechea didn't withdraw his criticism of Rajagopal. Biascoechea asked Erna never to tell K about this; Erna told him that we already knew Rajagopal might try this and that our lawyers were aware of it. The sad part was that Biascoechea had kept this to himself all those years, thinking he was protecting K. It also was interesting that Rajagopal said this in 1946 and pretended to be shocked when, according to Rosalind, she had told him the story years later. I told K about this on the drive back to Malibu. He said that he was willing to give a deposition if it became necessary, but asked if we had gone as far with the case as was necessary morally—which was why the whole thing with Rajagopal had begun.

On January nineteenth Sidney Field again came for lunch, and K talked to him about reincarnation in reply to Sidney asking if it were possible that anything of his brother, John, remained. K said it would appear that the thought, the feeling of a person, if he were someone very attached to life or to some particular thing, might linger for a while.

Two days later K wanted to talk to Erna and Theo again about the Rajagopal case, so we lunched with them in Ojai. On the way home K said, "I lived in discord and degradation with those two [Rajagopal and Rosalind]. I never discussed anything serious with them. I was relieved when Rajagopal wasn't there. When in London, I stayed with Mrs. Bindley or Lady Emily. When in Ojai we led parallel lives. I lived my own inner life; I liked to look at mountains, trees, birds, to walk, work in the garden raising vegetables, plants. Rosalind has no more inner life than a chicken. She doesn't know what it means. Though she talks about art and good taste, and all that, she has no idea of it at all."

On another day K held a discussion with about sixty-five young people at the Lilliefelts', taped on the Nagra, and in the afternoon held a trustee meeting about education plans and publishing. A new KFA trustee, Alan Kishbaugh, joined us.

Alain Naudé came down to Malibu for the weekend on the twenty-fourth and, regretting that K's conversation with Sidney Field about his brother's death and its aftermath had gone unrecorded, we taped a discussion deriving from that. Later Sidney listened to it and confirmed that it was as he remembered the conversation. On the following day K and Alain talked about masters, which I also taped. Three more dialogues between them were recorded over the weekend.

On the twenty-ninth K spoke of a feeling of a fire of energy in his head during the night, that memory was the source of the self, and on the thirtieth he said, "I woke up at three with a sense of extraordinary fire, light, burning in the mind. There was no observer. I wanted to test whether there was an observer; the testing was from outside, but the observer didn't exist. There was only that and nothing else. The fire penetrated the whole being. I sat up and it lasted three hours."

Part of whatever this feeling was continued, as a few days later he spoke of waking and seeing for a brief moment that it was as if something were being done in his inner brain. The feeling disappeared and was replaced by a sense that he mustn't pursue it. These times seemed to be good ones for him, as on the fourth he told me he hadn't felt so rested since the war—i.e., the 1940s.

He liked at times to come with me on errands in town. Gravely aloof, he would stand aside but quietly observe everything. On one particular day he chose to come with me when the car needed new tires. It took us to a bleak part of town, and we tried to go for a walk while waiting, but there was a sense of danger on those flat cement stretches, and we returned to the tire place, where K stood watching them being fitted. On the way home he said, "We shouldn't have gone there."

Walks were usually along the beach, where sea wind, seabirds, and space to the horizon were his companions. One evening, at supper on trays in front of the television, I made the mistake of saying something when he was "far away." It was a physical shock that caused him to shake and he felt it all night, so sensitive had his body become.

It had been planned to film a series of dialogues between Krishnamurti and scholarly representatives of different persuasions. One of these was a professor of sociology at San Francisco University and Jesuit priest, Father Eugene Schallert, who came to lunch in Malibu to discuss the project with K. It was agreed upon, and on February fourteenth we left after lunch to drive south to La Jolla, where Mrs. Martha Longenecker had kindly lent her house to Krishnaji for his stay. The next day he rested in the morning, and in the afternoon we went to San Diego State, where the Tibetan, Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche, with two followers arrived to do the first dialogue. Alain, who had arranged the meeting, was there too, and afterward they came back to the house for tea. The dialogue was somewhat surprising, as the Rinpoche spoke very little. The next day Dr. Allan Anderson, who taught religious studies at San Diego State, did a similarly videotaped discussion, and this was followed on the seventeenth by the one with Father Schallert, after which K, Alain, and I drove back to Malibu. An audio discussion was taped there with another Jesuit, Father Daniel O'Hanlon.

After this busy week there was rest and quiet, and we were alone. One day Krishnaji told me that I should write some of the things he told me, and on February twenty-sixth he said to me, "I must have been mad to put up with those two [Rajagopal and Rosalind] all those years. It wasn't till I was away from them that I matured, that things began to flower. I wrote the Commentaries here, there, everywhere. It was like a prison with them. They had no interest in all this, only in their ugly little miseries. She wanted to degrade and humiliate me as if she owned me. In India she quarreled and made such scenes; she wanted to drag me around and sightsee, show that she could make me do what she wanted. Signora's mother wouldn't have Rajagopal in the house because he drank. I used to live there for months alone. Signora and her husband would be traveling and would come sometimes to see that I was all right."

I asked, "What did you do?"

K said, "I took long walks alone. I was shy of the peasants and used to find ways to walk where they wouldn't see me. I am affectionate by nature. I like people, but those two kept everyone away. Pinter warned me. He said, 'Look out or you will be excluded by Rajagopal from everything; find out.' He helped me write a letter to Rajagopal, who never even bothered to reply."

I said, "Why didn't Pinter help you, knowing you couldn't do it alone?"

K responded, "How could he come to Ojai? I probably would have said, 'Leave it alone.' If it hadn't been for you, the Lilliefelts, Naudé, and the Simmonses, I couldn't have done any of these things. I wouldn't have known how to begin. I feel so relaxed. It is three months since I came here. I haven't had such a rest in years. Sometimes there is so much meditation at night I can't sleep."

The next day was a soft and gentle one. K was absorbed in a detective book all morning. At lunch he said how awful it would be to have to go to an office every day—he couldn't do it. I asked what, to him, would be so bad about it? "To have to get up and go to the same place every day." I pointed out that he led a most disciplined life as it was, doing almost the same thing each day, but he shook his head. We agreed we would both have a terrible time getting a job. We considered gardening but it was too strenuous; suggested he could prune roses, but that was very seasonal and then would starve the rest of the year; he suggested he would make a rare butler, but he said he couldn't stay up in the evenings. K said, "No, I like what I'm doing, but I couldn't do it for money. I couldn't have written the Commentaries, all those books, if it was for money. It was because I liked it. I guess I would have to become a beggar, but you can't do that in this country. I'd have to go back to India, but I'd have to beg for a ticket."

I asked jokingly, "What would you do with all those Huntsman suits?"

K replied, "Give them away. Oh, I could sell them and get a ticket to India. They'd love it if I came and put on a sannyasi robe; they'd say—at last! I'd find some quiet place near a river with lots of trees."

I said, "You couldn't take the Philips razor; would you grow a beard?"

K, "Oh yes, but I'd shave my head. I'd find some very small village."

Me, "North or south?"

K, "Better the south. It's too hot and too cold in the north. But they'd find me. They'd come and say, 'You can't live this way, sir, let me get you a good cook.' I'd say no. Could I come and wash your yellow robe on a rock in the river?"

Me, "Do they have women sannyasis?"

K, "I don't know—yes, they do. There was one once; I was spending a couple of months by myself—just Mama's [Madhavachari's] cook to look after me—and every afternoon I had to pass the village where a woman sannyasi had a hut. She sat with disciples, and one came as I passed and asked me to come. I said there is no reason to come, I am nobody, but he said she would welcome whomever it was, so I had to go and sit on the ground. It was clean—fairly clean—and she spoke a little and then asked my name. I said does it matter? Must I give my name? She said it was as I wished, and so I said my name. She said are you?—and mentioned many things. And after that she was there every day when I passed. You know, I've wanted to do this—to go off. I nearly did once…when was that? Oh, long ago. Before the war; back in the '30s. Mrs. Besant used to be concerned. She used to say, 'Remember, you have a very delicate body. You must take care of it.'"

In the evening K watched Ringling Circus on television. There were seven superb tigers, and the delight on his face had all the excitement of someone very young. Later he asked me if I had written that day.

March first was a hot, bright day. We took two pots of vegetables and rice and drove to Ojai. In the car K said, "Last night that emptying of the whole vessel of consciousness went on. Out of it came a feeling of something tremendously strong. It went on all morning. I felt it when I was having a bath."

Erna, Theo, Ruth Tettemer, and Albion Patterson were at lunch. Afterward, questions were put to K, mostly by Patterson, and I recorded it on Nagra. Patterson asked if the colorful story of the boy, K, might not make people think that special qualifications were necessary for understanding the teachings and that ordinary mortals were ruled out. K said that people are generally more interested in someone other than themselves, hence the personal interest in K. He said that man is attracted to mysteries. K was clairvoyant, saw his dead mother, etcetera. Occult things attract. Then he said, "I feel we are delving into something which the conscious mind cannot understand. There is mystery which one must approach with extraordinary delicacy. Conscious mind cannot do this. I am not creating mystery out of nothing, which would be a blackguardly thing to do."

He said that to enter into this one must be aware without any illusion, not cover up ignorance with illusion. "I feel there is something much too vast to put into words, a tremendous reservoir which, if the human mind can touch it, reveals something which no intellectual effort can reach. Now what is that? Are you asking that? I hope not, but are you? That is seeking truth; the quality of a mind that can go into that would interest me if I were inquiring—which I'm not because it doesn't happen that way."

He said there is no path, no system. A mind must discard every illusion. Then only are you really honest. "What then is that which they've all talked about? Never put into words, but it is there. I know it is there."

He said the word is not the thing, and if one comes to the thing, one doesn't use the word, so there cannot be a satisfactory answer. During the session he seemed to be undecided whether to talk at all about "the thing." His expression was one of wondering intensity. Later he spoke of perhaps doing another tape in the future on that same subject. The following day he added a little tail to the tape saying he had no ill feeling toward the heads of the TS who opposed him after Mrs. Besant's death but had really no relationship with them.

In the days ahead we were quietly in Malibu, most afternoons walking on the beach. K read a report of some research that predicted the collapse of the world economy in seventy years unless growth, birth, and pollution were drastically halted. He asked what was the individual's answer to such catastrophe? He said the response must come not out of the problem, out of compulsion, but out of freedom. One must live rightly.

On a day in Ojai there was a meeting at the Lilliefelts' with John King of the Kern Foundation, Joy Mills, and Helen Zahara of the Theosophical Society Headquarters in Wheaton, Illinois. Ruth Tettemer and Albion Patterson were also present. K explained most vividly why his books should not be published by Quest—the TS publisher. After they left, other Ojai people came to question him about the Rajagopal case, and he made it very clear to them that if Rajagopal wished to settle it must be handled by the lawyers and the attorney general.

On March fourteenth in Malibu, he said that in the night meditation had been so intense that he wanted to get up. And also that at one point he had felt something evil outside and looked out the window. He said it was as if when there is great good, evil is attracted: "It comes sniffing around."

Alain came down from San Francisco to tape K's talks in Santa Monica, which began on March eighteenth. Alain went ahead to set up, but when Krishnamurti and I reached the auditorium at 11 a.m., a process server backstage handed him a summons for a deposition just as K was about to go on stage to speak. Without missing a step, he handed it to Theo Lilliefelt, went out, and gave a one-and-a-quarter-hour talk.

The summons was a cross-complaint by Rajagopal et al. against K, the Lilliefelts, Ruth Tettemer, me, and Sidney Roth. Erna telephoned our lawyer, who was shocked at service just before a talk, but not surprised at a cross-complaint. Krishnaji, Alain, and I had lunch at home in Malibu, and Erna and Theo came by on their way to Ojai. K was very sharp on analyzing Rajagopal's actions. Later to me he said of Rajagopal, "Judas isn't in it," i.e., Judas was pale by comparison.

There was his second talk in Santa Monica the next day, one with tremendous force, much of it based on a question handed in the day before on the difficulty of being free and yet part of society, and there was a third one on Saturday of the following weekend. Before the fourth, K said to me, "I have been living on two levels the past two days." The talk was a superb one on the energy that comes when thought is ended.

Afterward Alan Kishbaugh came to lunch, bringing Frank Waters, an anthropologist and writer on Native Americans. They arranged to do a taped discussion the following morning. Later we went to see the movie The Godfather.

On Tuesday, March twenty-eighth, we drove to Ojai to stay with the Lilliefelts. Erna had spent the day at Rajagopal's deposition by our lawyer, Sol Rosenthal. This was continued the next day. Meanwhile, K held the first Educational Gathering, in this case a meeting and discussion with about forty invited people, mostly professors, a few psychiatrists, etcetera. I taped it on the Nagra.

K had not slept well the first night. He said he felt "the psychic crossfire of those two across the valley," meaning Rajagopal and Rosalind. But early on the second morning, he came to me and said, "Come. I want to show you this place." We went out on the driveway and looked westward down the valley and to the mountains, and K was half in tears at the beauty of that place he loved so much. The air was filled with the scent of orange blossoms, and he had me listen to a hum, which was bees—thousands of bees gathering nectar in the groves. I said that if he would like it I would find a house there and sell Malibu. He wouldn't even let me finish the sentence, but later came to thank me. That night he hadn't felt any disturbance and slept well. The silence there was good for him; not even a sound of the sea.

That afternoon, after a walk, he told me what had happened in the night: "I never had this before, this feeling of meditation. I woke up this morning at five with a feeling from my center, from my heart, that filled the whole valley. It went on for a considerable time, and from that it went to my head and was a most extraordinary thing. It has been pursuing me on all the walk. When I was talking to him [a lawyer who had come to see him], it was just a voice talking, there was no reaction, it was just happening."

After a few days back in Malibu, we returned to the Lilliefelts' in Ojai on April fifth. At supper K brought up a subject he had raised with me earlier: what should be done by the Foundations when he died. He spoke at first of support for people who might travel and speak, but the Lilliefelts and I wondered how such people could be chosen. Only K should make such a choice. I suggested a Krishnamurti Library, to house the books, tapes, etcetera, where people could come to study quietly, could be part of the answer. The rest we all felt was to pursue very actively continuing to publish all his books. K then jumped to what should be done if KFA received the Ojai land from KW Inc. He felt the Oak Grove and adjoining land for parking should be kept while he continued to give talks, and that the rest be sold except for the McAndrew Road property. The office with the archive vault was to be kept for that, Pine Cottage could be rearranged into a library/discussion center, and Arya Vihara could be fixed for his living space. When I spoke of the sense of contamination there, he said, "Oh, one night there we will sweep it away. You must do the house; no one else." He said India should make Vasanta Vihar into its center for a library, etcetera, and continue the schools and publications; England similarly should continue publishing and support Brockwood both as a school and center. He spoke of my having the use of the Brockwood West Wing for life, which I said I couldn't possibly do, and he said, "I say you must have it. What you do is up to you, but you like England, and it should be your home there."

Erna pointed out that probably all of us only had about fifteen years to carry on. K said, "I am going to live another fifteen years." He mentioned cremation, scattering of ashes, no ceremony, no churches, temples. Erna said that all these matters should be legally recorded as his intentions.

The next day, April sixth, Erna went with Sol Rosenthal to the third day of Rajagopal's deposition and came back afterward. K was visibly shocked at Rajagopal remaining a Theosophist and at supper asked how could a man who had corrected the talks be a Theosophist at the same time.

K had also given an interview to Fred Volz of the Ojai Valley news on his views of Ojai, its quality in the years he had known it. The next morning he was out early looking at the mountains and down the valley. The scent of orange blossoms was a warm sea, and the mourning dove and the bees were its sound. K seemed absorbed in it. Later he talked again about making the eleven acres on McAndrew Road a center for study of the teachings and a private place for him during his lifetime, and again he spoke of being appalled that Rajagopal was a Theosophist.

On the eighth Krishnaji gave the first of two talks in Libbey Park in Ojai. I had set up the Nagra to record on audio, and it was also videotaped in color, arranged by Sidney Roth. A large attentive audience listened. Most of the talk was on thought, but K spoke of the beauty of the valley and preserving it. Later he came into the kitchen where I was making a soup that he liked. He stirred it and sniffed it appreciatively. At the table he talked again of Rajagopal—his refusal of K's healing, his self pity. "'People will always look after you, but no one will care about me,'" K said, repeating Rajagopal. K wondered how, with the extraordinary protection that had characterized his life, "those two" [Rajagopal and Rosalind] were allowed to come into it.

On Sunday, April ninth, K's talk was a strong one of tremendous energy. Bill Quinn, of past days in Ojai, spoke to him briefly afterward, almost in tears. In the car K was shaking from the outpouring of speaking. It had been broadcast live on radio and was videotaped. We drove slowly back to the Lilliefelts', followed by a hippie. K spoke to him, but he was too choked up to speak to K. Later, when we left, he was waiting by the gate to see K again. At lunch K gave Alan Kishbaugh a summary of what Theosophists believe—some of it very funny. We then had a trustee meeting, and K and I drove home to Malibu in time for supper. It had been a long and full day, but he wanted to watch High Noon on television, a diversion from all that had gone on.

On Monday K found Mary Lutyens's Candles in the Sun in the bookcase and leafed through it. He read to me a part in which Lady Emily and others resigned from the TS, and Mrs. Besant offered to do so too when K broke with it. "And yet Rajagopal didn't," said K. "How could he remain with it? This is worse than stealing money." At lunch, after reading Candles in the Sun, he spoke of "protecting the body," how necessary it was. That afternoon, while crossing the beach road together, K paused and a car came along very fast. I called to K, who was just out of my reach, and he said, "I see it, I see it." He had an odd tendency to not act quickly when there was danger from traffic. He would say he saw it as if that were enough.

The next day, April eleventh, we took a picnic to eat in the car. We did some errands in town and met Erna at the law office, where Sol Rosenthal and David Leipziger conferred with K about his deposition the following day. They gave careful instructions to "listen to the whole question, be sure it is understood and to answer only what you know or remember." Erna came back to Malibu and spent the night.

In the morning, before we left, K asked me again to write each day "what it is like to be with the man from Madanapalle." He said I must be able to write well. He had been reading Isak Dinesen's Out of Africa at my suggestion because its style meant much to me. He said, "Do this. It is more important than all those letters you write. Spend an hour or two each day." My notes of that day read: "Where an hour or two each day is to be found—God knows. I am drowning in desk work, hopelessly behind. There are days when I cannot even read the letters I should be answering—but he is right. Do it! As he would say." That evening he was confident about the day ahead.

Sol Rosenthal came at 9:30 a.m. Then a court reporter, then Terry Christensen, Rajagopal's lawyer, his assistant, and completely unannounced Rajagopal, Mima Porter, and Annie Vigeveno. I met them on the driveway and walked ahead to warn K and Erna. It was a shock to K and an angry one to Erna and me. We sat at an extended table in the living room with K facing the ocean. Rajagopal sat himself opposite K so I sat just behind K's shoulder to draw the baleful stares of Rajagopal. He had an ancient simian look: tense, tight-mouthed, hands clasped and twisting, an air of decay about him. His eyes were angry, moving as at a tennis match to the questions. He would stare at my stare, not wanting to cede, and I had a calm feeling of sending what I thought of him along the wire of the stares. Porter and Vigeveno sat on a sofa, Vigeveno hidden behind dark glasses with a tense, pursed mouth. Porter, with her craggy, ranch-hand face, sat in frozen attitudes, twisted or with her hands over her face. They both looked old and dead.

Krishnaji spoke in a deep, slightly hoarse voice, slowly, carefully. When he became tired in the afternoon, he had difficulty concentrating on Christensen's questions and asked often for their repetition. During the break for lunch, he went into the dining room and his body shook from head to foot. He went to his room and lay down for half an hour, and then it resumed until 4:30. In the morning Christensen had asked for long explanations of theosophy and what had happened in the early days. I thought he might be trying to tire K before the more pertinent questions. K answered carefully, giving sometimes more than necessary, and making no derogatory references to Rajagopal. It was so against his nature to speak critically of someone that even in this context he could not do it. He also, out of politeness, left margins for doubt in some of his answers, as though not wanting to contradict Christensen. After it was over he looked drawn. When we saw that the others had come, Erna had called Theo to come too and he rushed from Ojai. He accompanied K on the beach walk, and K came back looking much better. Erna and Theo both spent the night. K was shivering a little when he went to bed.

The following day was another even longer day of deposition. Again Rajagopal, Annie Vigeveno, and Mima Porter lumbered in and sat as before. These two days were the only ones in which I had ever seen Krishnaji cross his legs; at moments of fatigue he did so. Rajagopal again sat opposite, silent but with an attitude of injury and indignation. Porter stared out the window with the vacant eye one sees on senile wards. Vigeveno was controlled and hidden, but she provided the only humor for us. Before the meetings I had put a telephone in the living room and, suspecting that Christensen might be instructed to get the new unlisted number, I had removed it from the phone, leaving the old number underneath on the instrument. In late morning Mrs. Vigeveno asked if she could use the telephone, and when she had finished, she scurried back to her purse, opened it and surreptitiously wrote on a scrap of paper inside with Rajagopal looking over her shoulder—the old number, which they already had. This made Krishnaji laugh repeatedly in the evening after I told him. Christensen, in a loud shirt and tie, gold spectacles and ring, with sharp eyes and polite words ably and doggedly put forth his questions but seemed uncertain of what would come from K or how to deal with him. Rajagopal asked for a break in mid-morning because K had forgotten having seen Joy Mills of the TS a month earlier in Ojai. This was corrected.

The day before, Christensen had left copies of letters he wished to put in evidence. We had read them. K had not. Some were sad—K apologizing to R for having lied to him and mentioning a betrayal. These had been written at Rajagopal's insistence. K was asked to confirm his signature on most of them but not the content, as he had no memory of them. Christensen had shown us only about a dozen, as he was supposed to under an agreement with Rosenthal, but he offered some forty in all. There was much back and forth in all this as the deposition continued, but when we stopped for lunch, it looked as if the questioning might be prolonged into the next day.

Christensen had not yet moved into anything touching on Rosalind, but there were signs of it coming closer. K lay down after lunch, and I took Sol in to speak to him before the resumption. K was sleeping in his bed like a child, infinitely touching. After awakening, Krishnaji motioned Sol to sit down on the end of the bed, and Sol told him he was doing very well—eighty-five percent marks, he said, and K listened as if he were taking an examination in school. We went back in and it was agreed to try to finish that day. As the afternoon wore on, K, looking so frail in his jeans, blue shirt, and sweater, seemed to become smaller, and also seemed to gain a different strength. He began to speak on his own level—of trust and friendship in the early days that allowed him to leave everything to Rajagopal, of how that trust was eroded by Rajagopal until it was gone, and he had to break with him. Toward the end Christensen was asking if it could meet with K's approval that KW Inc. could republish already-published books not through the TS press. K did not accede to this readily; he continued to speak of lack of confidence in Rajagopal. Trust once broken is gone. Finally Christensen asked, if the court found that KW Inc. could do that, and KFA did the rest, would K accept it? K replied that one must accept the court's decision, and if both organizations shared the work, then that would happen and "God help them both." It was over. Sol stayed on a little while. He had got it into the record that K repudiated a letter of his to Rajagopal years earlier as a "will" saying that Rajagopal should carry on the work and appoint his own successor after K's death. Sol suggested that K draw up a separate, more binding document to counteract that before leaving California.

We all felt euphoric that it was over. Sol told K that he scored 100 percent for the afternoon, and K was both shaking and laughing as the strain was beginning to unwind. He asked Erna and Theo to spend another night, and after Sol left we locked the gate and all walked around the lawn. At supper we felt a little giddy that it was over. K watched Ironside on television and went to bed.

The next morning there were more sober thoughts on awakening. The thing was not over. Much in K's testimony could be pulled down because he did not remember things. But his evident truth and the trust that he gave and that Rajagopal abused is formidable.

Two days later K said I must have a secretary for the letters, etcetera. He said I spend all my time working when I should be quiet, think, read, write, and keep around him a serene atmosphere. If I were tired, it tired him. I must do everything to be well, to stay well. If anything happened to me—if I were in a hospital he couldn't be with me, etcetera. He joked about "the Master only speaks once!"—an old Theosophical saying—so I must pay heed. During the evening he said something was happening; as if someone were in the room watching, something was happening to him—an energy. He said he understood something about living a very, very prolonged life. He chided me about not having noticed something in the room. It was because I had not been quiet. We had watched the Apollo takeoff from Cape Kennedy on TV for another moon voyage. Phil Dunne, next door, called to say to look in the western sky and there was a sickle moon with Venus on its tip. It was so beautiful, so extraordinary; K held up his arms at the sight, his face alight.

Two days later K spoke again of something strange happening, not to be described, but an energy. On the way to the beach in the afternoon, he mentioned it again, and I asked him what he had spoken of as a very long life. He said these things were in it for him:

1: Late maturing. "I am still maturing."

2: No conflict.

3: Absolute quiet at the center of the brain. "There may be noise outside but the center is quiet."

4: There must be goodness—never hurt anyone. If you have, you must apologize.

5: Virtue.

6: Love, affection, kindliness.

Erna, Theo, and Ruth came at noon, and we held a trustee meeting. K drafted a statement, which Sol would put in legal terms to prevent Rajagopal from having any voice or control in K's affairs in the event of K's death, and naming KFA to carry on. He also spoke of certain things for us to remember:

1: His hand-written manuscript, which Rajagopal had refused to turn over, that was brought to Ojai by Vanda Scaravelli in the early '60s to be kept in K's archives. He said it was on meditation and "otherness." Its existence could be confirmed by Pupul Jayaker, Nandini Mehta, Madhavachari, and Doris Pratt.

2: Rajagopal's character, an example of which was that when Rajagopal's mother was dying he sent her fifty rupees, to which Madhavachari added some out of embarrassment.

3: Rajagopal's remaining in the TS when others resigned when K broke with it.

He talked too about an illness he had in India between 1956 and 1958 when, as a result of some antibiotic, he became paralyzed for a month. He had gone with Madhavachari to stay in Srinigar at a place put at his disposal by the Maharajah of Kashmir and had been unconscious for three weeks with very low pulse and blood pressure. When the others had left, K and I went for a walk, he on the beach and I at that point on the road above because of trouble with my leg on the slanting sands. Blackbirds were singing, swaying on the mustard stalks. It was colder. I could see K skirting the waves, having to jump aside sometimes, his firm step, hair flying in the sea wind—a slight, strong, indomitable figure having his walk and off somewhere in "otherness," though he would turn sometimes to see if I were there and wave.

CHAPTER 24

Friday, April twenty-first, 1972, was a lovely Malibu morning, clear and peaceful. Before we left the house, Krishnaji had me walk out the front door then come back in, both of us sit quietly at the table by the window, and then we left. Filomena was going with us, and she went by taxi while Amanda Dunne drove K and me to the Los Angeles airport. We took a 9 a.m. flight to New York, where my brother had a car to meet us and take us to the Ritz Tower, where again we had my father's flat plus a studio room for Filomena. The next day, Mr. Narasimhan, who was then chef de cabinet for Secretary General of the UN Waldheim, as he had been for U Thant, came at noon to see Krishnaji. Waiting for K, he told me that he was fifty-seven and had all sorts of health problems. A few minutes later K came out, quick, smiling, wearing a new brown knitted shirt, gray flannel trousers, and his sandals. He had a look of health and well-being, cleanliness, the elasticity and spontaneity in his face of a child. Twenty years older than Narasimhan, he looked thirty years younger.

In the afternoon K felt like going to a movie—"the temple," as he often called it—so we did and saw something with cops and robbers chasing each other through the canals in Amsterdam—entirely satisfying. On our return he switched on the television and watched an interview with the anthropologist Margaret Mead. He said he would like to talk to her. "She is bright, but it is all on one level. I think it takes something else." Then he said he again had been thinking that he didn't want me to do all the letters. I should read and keep track of what was being thought, scientific things, psychiatry, etcetera and tell him about them. And we should do dialogues. I should find out what to read to be informed. "Aldous used to tell me those things."

The next day K slept a lot, and I went over papers so that I could dictate replies to a kindly friend who had offered to help. During lunch he watched the Apollo 16 astronauts walking on the moon, bounding about, and exclaiming in a style that seemed to go with Americans on the moon. K thought it would be interesting if there were some beings who would say to them, "We are more advanced than you. Don't spoil our moon with your aggressive ways." Later we saw the capsule take off like a sudden balloon.

"Will is isolation." He said this the next day to some people who had come to see him. Later he said to me, "I was surprised when I heard it. He hadn't said that before. What do you suppose makes him say something new—and see immediately that it is true?"

To one of the group, a young man who was a teacher and asked how one could establish a relationship with a group of unruly students, K's answer was on bringing about a little quiet in which relationship could commence, and through that relationship one moves toward the cultivation of the student's intelligence. Then come the facts and content of knowledge.

Earlier in the day I had been to Carnegie Hall, where K was to speak, and talked to the manager about lights, recording, K's chair, etcetera. It moved me to come to Carnegie Hall for K. It was as if there were a quality; as if its walls had absorbed from all the beauty of sound that had echoed there. Toscanini concerts in my young days had given me a reverence for the place. To come there for Krishnamurti was very fitting.

On another afternoon we went to a movie, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis. K liked it in part because it was in Italian, and he was struck by the soaring sound of what I thought was Kaddish sung at the end. To me it was music that tears the heart out, and it seemed to move him very much. Suffering, greatness, and eternity are in it. On a walk afterward he spoke of it again and said that Arab music too can have that quality. "Why have Jews been so persecuted? Because they have been cleverer than others? They were not allowed to do so many things, they had to be intelligent to survive." Later he spoke again of sorrow: "Sorrow, real sorrow, is without self-pity, but for most people sorrow is self-pity."

Erna and Theo came to talk with him, and he spoke optimistically about the case, jumping to the conclusion that "Rajagopal is through." We did not share that hope. The mystery, K said, was why Rajagopal and Rosalind were ever permitted to come near him. "You've no idea how careful they [the TS] were – Masters, the body must be looked after, no one rough or rude, no violence must come near him." Listening to him it sounded like an admission of the existence of Masters. I said this to him when we went for a walk before lunch. "No," he said. "I didn't mean Masters, but something has acted, something has looked after things. I don't think, I know that." Then about Rajagopal he said, "I think it is that evil is attracted to good. Its presence is a lure."

Saturday, April twenty-ninth, was a bright and sunny day. A car and driver took us to Carnegie Hall for Krishnaji's first talk. It was at 11 a.m., the hall was almost full, and everything seemed right. I felt moved to tears when he slipped through the back curtain and sat on a chair before the microphones. He looked so slight a figure and yet he dominated instantly the entire hall. The plain orchestra chair and his sitting on it became a throne in some forgotten recognition of what was majesty. The old hall was at last a truly fitting place for him to speak. His voice joined, for me, the resonance of all the sounds that had seasoned those walls.

During the week in a room in the Cooper-Hewitt Museum made available by its director, K gave individual interviews to people who had written to request them. On the walk back from 90th Street to 57th, I asked him if preferably interviews should go to those having emotional problems or those who might have an understanding of his teachings. He said the latter but added, "but those poor people."

On arrival at Carnegie Hall for the third talk, the manager said that Leopold Stokowski was in the audience and would like to greet Krishnamurti afterward. K's talk ranged over the question of order of a new dimension, an order not to be cultivated from the outside but coming from observation, a choice-less awareness. Only the man who perceives without distortion will have the energy to change, will then, with others, make changes on the world. The understanding of disorder is order. There was much else, but afterward K waited backstage until Stokowski came. They bowed, shook hands with great dignity, and mentioned how long it was since they had last met. [K later said it had been first in Ommen and then in Ojai, when he brought Garbo with him]. Each seemed to give an appraising glance at the other as if noting what the years had wrought. Stokowski was then ninety and still conducting. He had a concert the following night, and the manager said he had made a box available to Krishnamurti and his friends. K slept in the afternoon and that evening, while having supper, the television showed an English curate doing an exorcism on someone possessed. K spoke of having done it in the past.

It was Filomena's birthday the next day, so we celebrated it at breakfast and then she came with us to Krishnaji's fourth talk. It was to me a tremendous one. He asked if there was anything beyond time—something eternal, incorruptible? He said it required a mind that is religious, without dogma, belief, or theory, free of any authority or its own. He spoke of the quality of the mind that perceives wholly being beauty. As so often happened in the depth of his talks, his voice would deepen and seemed to emanate from a source at the core of his being.

Two days later, on May ninth, we said goodbye to Filomena, who returned to Malibu, and Krishnaji and I flew to London. It was a late spring day when we drove up the lane to Brockwood. The copper beeches were unfurling tiny leaves, and we saw the fine stone path that was beginning to be laid when we had left in October. K was eager for a walk, and we went with Dorothy and Whisper through the grove, across the fields, and back along the lane. K slept nine hours that night in the marvelous quiet of Brockwood.

May twelfth was Krishnaji's seventy-seventh birthday, but so totally did he always brush it aside that we made little of it. However, it was also Dorothy's, and we made a little more of that. K and I had to go to London to sign some legal papers and, as there was a rail strike, we motored to Michael Rubinstein's office in Gray's Inn. I enjoyed the worn stone steps, the Georgian windows looking out on a great plane tree said to be favored by Francis Bacon. What we signed was the division of the K Foundation unto two entities: the Krishnamurti Foundation Trust Ltd. and the Brockwood Park Krishnamurti Educational Centre. This had some tax and legal advantages, but the same people were on both boards, so it was humanly the same.

On the fifteenth we flew to Paris, I to see my father, whose health had been declining, and K to do some errands. We stayed at the Plaza Athénée, ordered some shirts at Charvet, and lunched at Au Pactole on the Blvd. Saint-Germain near my father's. It was a change for Krishnaji, a restaurant where the food was excellent, the walls dingy, smells of good cooking in the air, and people doing serious eating. The cook was the owner, and the maître d'hôtel was not unsympathetic to our vegetable needs. K liked it, and his eye darted about, taking in everything, including a very fat priest in monk's habit who ate and drank interminably. We somehow got to Lobb for K's shoe fitting, dodging the path of Queen Elizabeth on a state visit to Paris, and so to the Plaza, where Marcelle Bondonneau and Nadia Kossiakof came to tea and to discuss the work in France.

The next day Au Pactole fell out of favor when they had no green salad. K was aghast. "How can these people live?" he said, looking about at the very copiously fed clientele. Mar de Manziarly lunched with us and Sacha, with his wooden leg and pain from a recent car accident, joined us for coffee. He came back to the hotel so that K could treat the pain. When he left we went for a walk and a little shopping at Givenchy, and when K took his nap, I went back to be with my father.

After seeing him again the next morning, I came back to the hotel and found my car there, delivered from Thun by Mr. Moser. He, K, and I discussed K's new car, the purchase of which was delayed until the following year. Mr. Moser left, and K and I lunched pleasantly at the Plaza before leaving in the car for Le Havre. About an hour out on the autoroute, the car stopped for no reason that we could tell. After about five minutes, it was all right and we continued. We found the Normandy ferry but went looking for a restaurant called Monaco. After a light supper we boarded the ferry and had the usual neat cabins and a smooth crossing.

Back at Brockwood, the days went in familiar ways: K talked to students and to staff, we went by train to London for lunches with Mary Links, Huntsman matters, and K began tooth sessions with a new dentist, Mr. Thompson. One appointment lasted an hour and a half, and he stood it very well, but that night he said, "The body feels it has been attacked."

He said, too, on another day that strange things were going on in his head. "The head is burning." On another day Mary came down to Brockwood to talk about his biography, and that evening he suddenly said to me, "Are you my brother? For a moment I felt as if you were."

On June twenty-sixth we left Brockwood after supper with, as usual, the whole school waving K goodbye, and we drove to Southampton for the night ferry. There was the same comfortable cabins and smooth crossing to Le Havre. We were at the Plaza Athénée by mid-morning, and I went to see my father then rejoined K for lunch in the hotel garden, went for some fittings, and then to a Hitchcock movie, Frenzy—not too pleasing—and we walked back to the hotel.

After more time with my father, on the twenty-ninth we left Paris at noon and found the way to the autoroute heading south. After Fontainebleau, the country unfurled in great rolling space—the beautiful stretches of middle France. K was delighted. The Plaza had provided a picnic. They didn't understand sandwiches very well, but there was plenty of fruit, and we ate it in one of the prettier parkings off the autoroute. Then on into the afternoon and rain, leaving the autoroute at Villefranche, and came to a small village, north of Lyon, where we had rooms at La Reserve, which was quiet and nice. K chose to eat in the hotel dining room and wished to order in the normal sequence instead of beginning with fruit as he usually did. So we had a good meal built around omelet and haricots-verts.

The rain was gone in the morning, and it was a lovely sunny day with drifting clouds that obligingly made parasols over the car. We stopped at Orange for lunch at Le Provencal. K was pleased because I had parked the car in a garage, and I was pleased because the restaurant was somehow real in a way that luxurious ones seldom are. This one was rather dark, and with it being very bright outside, it was cool and a refuge. There was shabby, flowered paper on the walls, very clean white table linen, an ancient motionless woman at the caisse, and a smell of good cooking. We ate local melons, so good there was nothing left but the rind, and when the cheese came, we ate local ones we had never tasted. K chose a chevre with rosemary in it. Afterward we walked to the Roman amphitheater, and K liked the massive front of it. We drove on to Avignon, where it became very hot and we were caught in traffic jams. We tried to see the Palais des Papes, but it was a confusion of cars and crowds, so we escaped after a look from the car window. We crossed the Rhône, seeing the bridge ou l'on y danse, and at Villeneuve-les-Avignons, we found our hotel, Le Prieuré. We rested and then dined in the garden. Krishnaji, elegant in his infinite dignity and grace, watched all the other diners, diagnosing their ills from the fact that they ate too much and "all that meat…Don't they know it's bad for them?" There was a wind that made the leaves swim in the trees.

July first was a cloudless morning, and we left Le Prieuré and drove westward looking for the Pont du Gard. At one point K said, "Turn here, turn here!" so vehemently that I felt struck and shaken, as if I had been about to run over a child. Being so open to him it was devastating, and I could hardly drive for a while. But we came to the Pont du Gard, a Roman aqueduct built at the time of Augustus—huge and splendid. K liked it, and we drove on toward Nimes. The countryside reminded both of us of California and so did the bright Provençal light. At Nimes we saw the Maison Carré and found it beautiful, saw the amphitheater, and drove on, K navigating the map, to Aigues Mortes in the Camargue. We left the car outside and walked through the fortress walls and into the tiny town. It looked as if it were built for very small people who lived in it and defended it until the sea capriciously withdrew, leaving it no longer the port from which St. Louis had launched his crusade. We drove on across the Camargue, less wild than we expected, came to Arles, and found the amphitheater, and went on to Les Baux and the Hotel Oustau de Beaumanière. We had rooms in the manoire—quiet with a terrace and a little pool. We rested, bathed, and went up to the hotel for a dinner of elegant excellence. Afterward we drove up the hill and looked at the illuminated rocks of Les Baux and then went early to bed.

That had been on July first, and the next morning we left and drove toward Cavaillon, stopping in a village where we bought goat cheese, black olives, biscuits, peaches, apricots, and cherries for our lunch. The country was Van Gogh—rows of black-green cypresses. A wind was blowing, and when we drove through tunnels of touching trees the leaves were flowing green waters over our heads. At Cavaillon we headed north on the autoroute but soon left it, and gradually the country was no longer Provence, and a more northern light and quality came. It was almost cold when we stopped at a little clearing and had our picnic. To stretch and not drop crumbs in the car, K stood outside with that far-off child's stance he sometimes had, "that boy" that he was and in some ways remained, a slight figure of grace, off in his own perception. We drove on, taking a small road that led through Rumilly, past Aix-les-Bains, and, according to Sacha's excellent planning, we came to the Swiss border at Saint-Julien-en-Genevois. The Haute-Savoie was beautiful: fields, farms, trees, and hills turning into mountains. The farmhouses became massive against the winters. We came immediately down into Geneva and were once again in the little narrow rooms at the Hôtel du Rhône.

The next morning held a brief visit from Narasimhan, Krishnaji's watch being seen to at Patek, two ties ordered at Jacquet, and after lunch we were again on the road along the Lac, and climbing past Lausanne via Oron and so at last to Gstaad; 1,013 miles and a week from leaving Brockwood. Vanda was there, with Fosca, and it was lovely to see them again.

Except for afternoon walks, K spent most of his time resting in bed until the talks began on July sixteenth. His inevitable hay fever at this time of year came but didn't affect his ability to give the talks. Alan Kishbaugh was there, and when Vanda returned to Florence when her daughter and family were due, K invited Alan to use the downstairs room.

In his second talk on July eighteenth, he spoke of insight, which is intelligence seeing without conclusions. The mind without conclusions is without fear. The only security is that of intelligence. It was a talk with many things in it and tremendous power. Afterward he walked rapidly up the path along the river, pursued by a man with a camera who had been asked not to film him. I caught up to him with the car, and we drove slowly toward Gsteig. "The body is too excited" to have gone back to Tannegg immediately. When we did, there were letters from Erna about the Ventura lawyer, Mr. Stanley Cohen, who was to be the local attorney with Sol Rosenthal.

Radha Burnier came to lunch. This was K's first meal at the table since arrival. He told her some of the Rajagopal case events and the background to it. He took no rest but talked until 4 p.m., when he went for a walk with Alan Kishbaugh and I drove Radha back to her hotel. After the walk we had tea, and K sat and talked with Alan and me until 7 p.m., partly on somewhat supernatural things: his sense of unease when darkness comes and he is outside. Once, years earlier, in Ashdown Forest, he was walking alone, it became dark, and he felt he was being followed. He reached the house exhausted and had to rest "for several days."

In Madras, a year before this conversation, he came to a temple and felt this threat. He said he stood and "said something."

I asked, "A special thing?"

K replied, "Yes, a particular thing, and gradually it oozed away."

I didn't ask him then what it was, but he spoke earlier of Christians making a sign of the cross and Hindus uttering the word "Om" to ward off evil. He told too of being asked, when young, to heal a "possessed" woman. He went to see her and she looked up at him and became quiet and normal. He told too about Mrs. Jayalakshmi going one night to a temple considered very holy where she felt such great danger that she fled in her car. K said it is not supposed to be good to "talk about dark powers as it somehow gives them energy." He said these things are "on dit"—i.e., gossip, but he said too that one mustn't tamper with such things, and he did have this unease about being out at night, and extra precaution being necessary for those around him, as if we were part of his protection and therefore liable to attack by whatever is evil. "Evil is attracted to goodness wanting to destroy it." Alan talked about an odd sense of threat when he camped by an Indian burial ground in the U.S. southwest and it ceasing when he put on a Hopi medicine man's bracelet. At supper he said to me that he felt a sense of being there to protect K when he was with him.

Isabel Biascoechea brought a woman who was hysterical to K; he calmed her somewhat by placing his hands on her head and told her husband to take her away from Saanen. "Take her to the movies, take her away from 'all this.'" They had been before Saanen to some meetings where people were attempting some kind of prolonged meditation.

A letter by James Vigeveno had been brought to K to be delivered directly to him. K gave it to me, asking me to read it and tell him what it was about, as he didn't want to touch it.

It belabored K for attacking his lifelong friend, Rajagopal, and had an underlined hint that it might still be possible to settle things out of court. With K's concurrence I sent it to Sol Rosenthal and showed it to Erna and Theo, who had just arrived.

Balasundaram had also arrived, came for lunch, and told K of going to talk to Madhavachari about Vasanta Vihar. He was in charge of it, ostensibly for Rajagopal, but it had been found that legally it was owned by the Dutch Krishnamurti Stichting, which had transferred it to KFA. As Madhavachari was a member of KF India, Balasundaram persuaded him to talk it over with Pupul Jayakar, but at the last moment he balked. K asked why Madhavachari was behaving this way. Balasundaram guessed that it was his allegiance to Rajagopal.

K's fifth talk on July twenty-fifth was on suffering and conflict and finally pleasure and joy. He spoke with almost explosive energy. Afterward we drove to Chateau d'Oex before returning to Tannegg for lunch. A letter had come from Sol Rosenthal on the Vigeveno letter suggesting how K might reply, should he wish to acknowledge it. In the afternoon Nadia Kossiakoff brought Miss Delachaux of the French-Swiss publishing house to see K. She wanted to do a hardcover and paperback book and asked for suggestions. We talked a little, and I referred her to George Digby. Then K came in, and she asked him if he was a mystic, and he recoiled somewhat in distaste. "What is a mystic?" She saw it as one who tries to get in touch with mystic beings. K said that implied search and explained the projection of a Catholic having mystic experiences of Jesus, or a Hindu of Krishna, "all within conditioning. Religion should be outside of that." She asked about intuition, which K always found a dangerous word that could be only projection. She asked what is the subconscious? K replied, "The repository of conditioning." He said thought other than technical thought divides, and when this was hard to see, he explained about national, religious divisions, which are all products of thought. And so it went. Through all this he sat with the relaxed grace of a young boy. As he was tired, he was slightly hesitant to reply in French, in which the conversation had gone, but he addressed himself with total attention to her questions. Apart from all that he said, there was always an aesthetic experience in watching his expression, posture, and gesture that was limitless. When the conversation was over, I drove the two women down to their hotel, went to get the Economist and some detective books for K, and on the way back had the surprise of finding him waiting on the road. He had walked down but felt too tired to climb back and thought he would see me. He had been there only a minute when I came by, as if something had neatly arranged it. We went up the hill, had verbena tea, and he went to bed.

The next morning he dictated a reply to the Vigeveno letter, keeping in mind the advice from Sol Rosenthal. To me it was all right but too long, as the Vigeveno letter had been insulting and this dignified it too much. Once dictated, K kept revising it, toning it down, and planned to discuss it with Erna and Theo.

The sixth talk was the next day, given with the same blazing energy. On the way back he said that he had had no idea what he was going to say when he sat down, but added, "He said some new things." We drove to Gsteig afterward before returning to Tannegg, where the Digbys, the Lilliefelts, Mary Cadogan, and Alan Kishbaugh were at lunch. We then had an all-afternoon Publications Committee meeting, at which much was sorted out.

Erna and Theo came the next morning and discussed the draft of K's letter to Vigeveno; it was amended slightly and sent. Then there was the annual meeting of the K Committees and Foundations. K discussed their functions after his death and mentioned the case against Rajagopal. The dates and number of Saanen talks for the following year were set. Over some protests that there be fewer for the sake of K's health, he insisted to keep to the then number—seven talks and seven question-and-answer meetings. At lunch were Anneke Korndorffer, Balasundaram, Erna, Theo, and Alan K. It was decided that the Dutch Stitching would join KF India in a case against Rajagopal for possession of Vasanta Vihar, as it, being a gift from the Stichting to KFI, had not been registered. Pupul Jayakar wanted KFI to share in the copyright and rights to publish abroad, which was what she had pushed for the previous year, and was against the existing agreement. Balasundaram put this forward, though he seemed to see the necessity of keeping copyright in one place. All this and more was discussed, and it was tiring for K, who had no nap and went alone for a short walk.

July twenty-ninth followed and was a similar day. The Digbys, Lilliefelts, and Balasundaram joined K, Alan K, and me for a discussion that lasted through a buffet lunch and tea until 5 o'clock. It largely concerned the contract with the Dutch publishing house Servire. Its head, Mr. Verhulst, came with his new partner, Mr. Fazul Inayat Khan, a leading Sufi and head of a Sufi publishing house. This was something with which K did not want an association. Inayat Khan was questioned by K and told K that he considered K's teaching and Sufism as all one as they were all searching for truth. "One moment, sir," said K and proceeded to disabuse him of this: the teachings say no ways, no methods, etcetera. Khan coolly yessed K. There were pointed words between Balasundaram and Khan, who made it clear that he was trying to establish himself through the use of K books in the U.S., where he then had no outlet. Verhulst and Khan then left, and it was decided we should not extend the contract after consulting Michael Rubinstein. The rest of the day was devoted to Indian publishing problems.

Balasundaram said that the new book, Tradition and Revolution, was not based on tape or shorthand notes but on notes made afterward from memory. This was disturbing news. Balasundaram made a strong push, once more, for a share in the copyright, which didn't succeed. It was an exhausting day.

On August second Krishnaji began seven daily question-and-answer sessions in the tent and also gave numerous private interviews to people who had requested them. There was also a tea for the Ojai people who were there. Alan Kishbaugh left, and the Simmonses moved up from the camping to the downstairs flat.

When all Krishnaji's work activities were finished, we went on drives with Dorothy and Montague, including one to Villars, where he and his brother Nitya had stayed in the early '20s when Nitya had tuberculosis. Later, in around 1957, Rajagopal had left K there in Montesano, the same hotel, giving him just enough money to pay his board plus fifty francs. It was a quiet hotel with families and children. We had lunch there where K used to have a table alone in a corner by the window. He told us of Rajagopal having written to Vanda, who was in Gstaad at the time, telling her not to communicate with K. When Rajagopal left after several days there, on one of which he was drunk in the dining room and called K names in a loud voice, he told him, "You say you are never lonely—well, now you are going to find out what it's like—what the rest of us feel." "But I never was lonely," said K. "I could have just stayed there." He went for walks all day in the hills, never spoke to anyone, even when the hotel manager wanted to introduce him to some guests. He left when it was time after about two months to go somewhere he was due. He went by train, changing twice, to Chamonix, where Mr. de Vidas had met him. I was close to tears at lunch, seeing him there where he had been happy with his brother so long ago, and then later left alone by the malevolence of Rajagopal. We had taken a table near the door; unconsciously I must have felt K's reluctance to enter the room of people. He sat, turned away from them. There was a quality to his shyness that was different in that room—the painful shyness of someone much younger, vulnerable. I could see him then behind a wall, far away, and yet content to spend his days walking in the hills, as in Ojai, in his distant state. Rajagopal's attempt to hurt him didn't work.

"But why did I put up with it?" he asked us. "I just accepted it. I suppose because there was no one else to turn to." I felt haunted seeing him there, obedient, accepting circumstance and cruelty because there was no other choice, but untouched by it inwardly. It was things like this that made the case against Rajagopal necessary. The property, etcetera was unimportant. Rajagopal must never be able to touch K.

Dorothy and Montague left, but before they did, several people were invited to lunch, including Mr. and Mrs. Suarès. A friend had said that they spoke venomously about K and his teaching. Nevertheless Krishnaji said they should be asked for lunch, along with Marcelle Bondonneau. I fetched them up the hill, everyone being very polite, and K came in the room with his eager smile and greeted them nicely. The conversational ball was kept in the air throughout lunch, but K said later that they were not at ease with him. Suarès, who looked to me like a gray rat, nibbled away with gusto at Fosca's spinach ravioli and, on saying goodbye, put his hand on K's shoulder as if in friendship, but it seemed entirely false. Marcelle stayed on a little and said that she and Mar de Manziarly see the Suarèses rarely in Paris, but when they do, K's name is no longer mentioned or they could not get on. One wondered why they wanted to get on in that case. Marcelle said that Yo de Manziarly had gone to India with Annalisa Rajagopal to see Satya Sai Baba.

I thought this shocked Krishnaji. I felt shocked that an old friend's betrayal should be seen by him. "What was it with these people?" K asked, and I wondered if it was that each one of them wanted something from him, and not getting something tangible they could grasp, they turn on him, cluster together, and reinforce each other's resentment. Rajagopal harvests this. They may have no real liking for him but their anger at K drives them to Rajagopal. Are people more neurotic around K or was this a normal level of random humanity?

With guests gone it was quiet in the house. K rested, and we walked in the afternoon up over the fields to the river and the Turbach road. I was able to go on the walk, as I hadn't since hurting my leg in Geneva. He said again, "You must take care of yourself as you must outlive me. I will live at least another ten years, till I'm ninety, probably. You must live beyond that. You do not belong to yourself anymore."

That was on August fifteenth. The next morning I went on errands and to listen to the Menuhin rehearsals in the Saanen church. In the lovely light of Mozart quartets and the sunlight on the wooden pew rail, I kept seeing K in Villars and now up in his room at Tannegg, the infinite wonder of him, fragile, extraordinary, to be cared for, served, and cherished. At lunch with a few friends, he was far away but came back to the conversation when it touched on the Buddha, the hierarchy of masters, and over them the Maha Chohan and then the Buddha. He explained where most of it came from: Tibet. And later on the walk he talked of Jesus. I asked what difference it made whether he lived or not? Wasn't what he is said to have taught either true or not? "It wasn't very original," said K, “just to love one another.” I asked if it wasn’t a way of saying no self, which seems at the core of most religions. K said yes, and that Akhenaten had said it too. He had been reading a book on Egyptian history.

The next morning he said he had not slept well. He said that meditation had been so strong that the back of his head felt on fire. It wasn’t pain—it was a flame so severe that he had to read to stop it before he could sleep again. But nevertheless he wanted to come with me to Bern, where I had to get his French visa. We reached there before noon, when everything closes, but a letter was needed from the Indian embassy, so we went looking for a vegetarian restaurant with a garden that he remembered. Only after eating downstairs did we learn that the garden was upstairs, but we had a nice meal, clean and quiet. The visa matters were eventually settled, and we were off to Thun, where we talked to Mr. Moser about a SLC 280 3.5 Mercedes for the next year’s delivery, which K wanted to be able to take in the United States.

On the nineteenth I had a telephone call from my father’s housekeeper in Paris saying that he had fainted. I spoke to his doctor, who said it was cerebral and he could do nothing about it; it was a general breakdown in the body’s functioning, and for the first time he was not responding to medication. I telephoned my brother on Martha’s Vineyard and had difficulty reaching him. K came in during a pause in this, and I told him what was happening. “Are you worried?” he asked. I said that worry is when there is something that could be done to change things; this, it appeared, could not be altered. Krishnaji then asked, “Do you feel something in this room? The atmosphere?”

Me, “I don’t want this to impinge on you.”

We went into his room and he said, “Do you feel the difference? Perhaps it is because you have been filled with this. We are all going.”

Me: “Tell me, oh sphinx, when does one stop coming and start going?”

K: “Oh, I guess at birth—no, probably at ten to twenty years. I’ve never seen someone die. I wasn’t there when my brother died; it would have been terrible. In a way, I am gone when I walk, or sometimes when I am reading, I am so far away. Not when I talk. Then I am all there. But otherwise I’m getting farther away. That is why you mustn’t let them give me a general anesthetic, knock me out. That would be the end.”

Me: “What if you are in pain? Hurt?”

K: “I don’t think it will happen like that. Then sedation, but not out. If you died first”—long pause—“but I don’t think you will. You must outlive me, and I will live another fifteen or twenty years. I don’t know that, but I feel that. And when he goes—you must not commit suicide as you did when your husband died. Should you go to Paris to see your father now?”

Me: “No, we will follow the plan we already have to go there Wednesday.”

K: “I couldn’t drive the car alone. Maybe to Bulle or Nyon, but the body couldn’t [drive] all the way.”

On August twenty-second I spoke to people in Paris. The doctor had just seen my father. Nothing more could be done; death was very near. I telephoned my brother, who was about to fly to Paris. K and I lunched quietly; I didn’t tell him the news. At 3 p.m. the telephone rang: Father had died in his sleep. Krishnaji came into the room as I was hanging up the receiver. “I felt it had happened,” he said. “I felt it from you.” I rang my brother again and told him. K made me rest a while, and then we went for a walk as far as the river.

With our packing finished, we loaded the car to leave early in the morning. On the walk K had said that for most people death is perhaps a reabsorption into their conditioning.

August twenty-third. We said goodbye to Fosca and were in the car and on our way by 4 a.m. In France we stopped at Lons-le-Saunier for croissants and had them for breakfast with fruit at the same edge of the road as the year before. K drove for about 100 miles on the autoroute. We reached Paris by 1 p.m. and had our picnic lunch in the Bois where we used to take our walks. Then we went to the Plaza Athénée, and I rang my brother, who had arrived in Paris with his wife in the morning. He came to see me, and then we went to the apartment. I got back to the hotel in time to order K’s and my supper in our rooms.

On the drive in the morning, he had spoken of death. “I don’t like to speak of your father,” he said, “but what happens to a man like Rajagopal?” We talked of this, and later in the evening he said the following, which I wrote down verbatim: “Take a man like X, who is suspicious, jealous, secretive, concerned with his security—physical security. He is, after all, the product of his environment, his culture, his pattern of behavior. He may have peculiarities, his temperament, his so-called character. His mind is conditioned by the class he was born in and so on. And when he dies, and that is what we are talking about, what happens to him? He has not come out of his environment, he has not made anything of life; he is merely reacting within his conditioning, which may be very clever, cunning, artistic, but he has not come out of it. He is part of the whole quivering mass. He may think he will reincarnate, be reborn, or absorbed into something greater, which is his hope and comfort, but basically he is still the result of his tradition, of his forefathers, his environment. He has not come out of it, so he is absorbed into his basic conditioning. This sounds cruel, but as you observe, he is part of this humanity. As he was in life so he is in death. To live with death every day is to deny totally this conditioning. So to die to conditioning every day is to live a life of a different dimension.

There was a funeral service on Friday, August twenty-fifth, and later in the afternoon Krishnaji and I left Paris and drove to Le Havre and the night ferry for Southampton.

Section Seven

Back at Brockwood, there was quiet and rest. For the first few days Krishnaji settled into doing little beyond the afternoon walks across the fields. Then came papers to fill out in the legal matters in Ojai—so-called "interrogatories." Then came trips to London for dentist and Huntsman fittings, with in between the enjoyment of lunch with Mary at Fortnum. We went also to Chichester to a matinee of Christopher Fry's play, The Lady's Not For Burning, the tickets for which had been arranged by the Frys, longtime friends of mine.

The enjoyment of all this was struck a blow by the attack by Arab terrorists on Israeli Olympic athletes, a shocking savagery. On top of this, Col. Noyes arrived suddenly from Ojai bringing settlement talk from Rajagopal. Part of it was Rajagopal keeping funds for him to carry on publications, at which Krishnaji told Noyes that, had he known Rajagopal remained a Theosophist all those years, he would never have let Rajagopal touch his writings and would have asked him to get out of KW Inc. We both said that if Rajagopal had a settlement suggestion it must be made through his lawyer to ours. All this upset K's stomach, and the following morning, when it was known that the Arab terrorists had shot all the Israeli hostages, K was moved to tears and sent for Noyes, whom he told that what Rajagopal was doing was similar in lies and violence. Noyes said he had telephoned Rajagopal, who asked him to put suggestions in writing. We reiterated that Rajagopal must make any suggestions he had through his lawyer.

On September ninth Krishnaji's Brockwood public talks and discussions began and were well attended by well over 1,000 people. As before, they were held in a large tent with a second one adjacent where food was available. Krishnaji again ate something lightly upstairs after the talk but then returned to the tent to eat a little more, which he did standing as people came up to speak to him.

After these meetings were over, he needed more dentist work. On one of these, he endured two hours of drilling in preparation for a bridge after which we were able to quickly catch a train back to Petersfield, but coming back he fainted in the car. I was able to catch him, and he was unconscious for about two minutes. His face was swollen and he had pains in his head for a few days but nonetheless spoke to the school when it reopened and, as always, walked in the afternoons.

On October eighth he had a dialogue with David Bohm, taped on the Nagra by George Carnes, with Saral Bohm, Dorothy, Doris Pratt, and me present. They discussed what was intelligence, and at one point, far into the discussion, K put the question: What is its source? David was silent, and K later asked me if I had noticed the change of atmosphere in the room when he asked that question. Then, at the end, he suddenly began to speak of another way to communicate: that is, to speak to the unconscious. "That is affection," he said, “that is love.” To me, later, he said, “I am going to speak to you that way.” The next day he did. He said that he had noticed that I had neglected my body, that for reasons he didn’t want to inquire into, I was highly nervous physically, that it showed in my face, that I had tried to correct it from the outside through will, through the conscious mind when he had pointed out mannerisms. I had responded with effort or depression, all of which were superficial responses. He said, “I am now talking to a deeper level, out of affection; it is from this level, from the inside, you must listen and change. If you do this, in a few days you will be different; there will be an awareness in your body.” He said that after my husband died I had abandoned my body, neglected it. Now I was greatly changed and was aware in many ways, but still not in the well-being of the body. He would speak at that level to me, to my unconscious, during the coming days.

The next day he again said to me, “I am speaking to your unconscious mind. I feel it doesn’t feel it is important or you would have changed. Do you know what it is to be quiet?” As he was saying this, I saw that certain habits were offshoots of tension. I didn’t feel tense or nervous but somehow to get things done I built up a steam of energy, which had a quality of tension that felt like being in high gear. I saw that this wasn’t necessary, that it actually wasted the very energy I needed, and I saw it from the inside—that quietness was what was needed and that if that core were there, things could be done without that false tension. Quietness inside. I understood. Later that morning, in the kitchen while doing the dishes, K said he felt a difference in me. Then, later in the evening, he said, “You have taken the first initiation. Do you know why you have taken so long? When you do it will be the second initiation.”

On October fifteenth Krishnaji, Dorothy, Whisper, and I went for our usual walk across the fields. We had supper downstairs, and at 8 p.m. everyone collected in the West Wing hall to say goodbye to K as he left, and so, with warmth and smiles from all, we drove off to Southampton and the Normandy ferry.

The morning in Le Havre was clear, a mist rising, and poplar trees were etched in their winter twigs against the pale light. We stopped for a poor breakfast along the autoroute but were in Paris and the hotel by 10:30 a.m., unpacked, and then went to lunch with Mar and Sacha de Manziarly in the Rue Jacob. Sacha had not been well since his motor accident in the spring. Krishnaji put his hands on him to heal.

The following day, Marcelle Bondonneau and Nadia Kossiakof lunched with us in the Régence restaurant in the hotel. They had put together a new Krishnamurti entity in France comprising four members, one of whom must be domiciled in France and own property there. They were Mlle. Isabelle Mallet, who lived in Normandy in a house designed by Sir Edwin Lutyens, Mme. Samuel, Mme. Banzet, and Mme. Betsy Debass. The purposes of the committee were strictly to disseminate Krishnamurti teachings through his talks, books, tapes, and films. Nadia had worked very hard over this, publications, and the television interview. This last was the one done in Paris the previous year, and I was able to see the broadcast of the first half of it that night. K went to sleep and so did not see it, but I stayed up and was very pleased. It was all in French, K spoke clearly and eloquently, his accent was good, and the minor trips in gender and verb tenses were inconsequential. André Voisin, the interviewer, did an excellent job—really listening, subtly smoothing words when K didn't get the ones he wanted and lightly raising essential questions in the teachings. It was professionally shot in black and white.

There was enthusiasm the next morning from Marcelle, Nadia, and Mar, who took credit for her family giving Krishnaji his good French accent years ago. She said she had just been to Ojai, saw Rajagopal, "but we didn't talk about anything, we just laughed." She asked if we couldn't put in the Bulletin that Rajagopal hadn't stolen anything; he had been doing his work since 1922 and hadn't taken a thing. I explained that we had a lawsuit going because Rajagopal refused information about finances and refused the settlement the attorney general had offered. And I pointed out that Rajagopal and Mima Porter were suing K and the rest of us. Mar said that she loved K and her sister Mima and didn't feel in the middle.

Krishnaji and I packed and took a morning flight from Orly to Rome. On the plane he said to me, "You must take care of yourself, eat properly, walk two miles a day, you must be well, you must outlast me. No unnecessary trips." I said I had promised to see two friends. "Then go quietly," he said. "You must have no accidents. It takes away energy from something else. Do everything quietly. Then everything will be right."

Vanda met us at Leonardo da Vinci airport. I went to Hotel Raphael and Krishnaji stayed at Vanda's flat on Via Barnaba Oriani. Some weeks earlier, Filomena in Malibu had had a slight stroke. It was diagnosed as a spasm from hardening of the arteries to both brain and heart. I discussed it with her and with Amanda Dunne, and Filomena wanted to go to her family in Rome. Miranda Dunne was due to go to Florence, and it was agreed she would accompany Filomena to Rome. They were both there when I arrived, Filomena looking well, and we had long talks about everything. Vanda kindly had us to lunch then and on subsequent days. K and I took long walks in the adjacent Villa Glori. "Is your subconscious working?" he asked. Miranda left, and I went for two days to Florence. On returning to Rome, I stayed at Vanda's, and on October twenty-ninthKrishnaji gave his first talk in Rome at the Teatro dell'Arte, a very fine one, to an overflowing audience.

The next day we walked in the Villa Glori, and he said, "Pay attention to your unconscious. It may want to tell you something now. Do not take too long to change. You are quiet inside now. It will tell you something and you must be alert and quick to respond—otherwise it is harmful." He also talked of what was negotiable or not with Rajagopal. A letter had come from Noyes, and K dictated comments on this to me.

The next day, October thirty-first, we walked again in the Villa Glori, and after lunch Filomena and her son drove me to the airport, where I flew to Paris. I spoke to Vanda and K the next day, and then, on November second, Krishnaji rang to tell me that Rajagopal had telephoned him to say that whatever happens he loved him as he did in the beginning. K told him he could settle things, and Rajagopal replied, "It is out of my hands." I felt sickened at Rajagopal's duplicity and attempt to manipulate K. He said to me it was no use being upset; it was done and might mean something. He was still quick to hope that Rajagopal would behave decently. That afternoon I flew to New York and, after a long wait in customs, reached my brother's flat. He and his wife Lisa and I talked until very late.

While in New York, I spoke to Erna in Ojai and reported to K. On November fifth he left Rome for New Delhi, where he gave his first talk on the eleventh. On the thirteenth I returned to Malibu.

In his first letter from India, K wrote that on the flight from Rome there had been a delay in Athens, and the airline had assigned him a room in a hotel, where he had to share it with a man who was smelly and snored all night. Never again should Krishnaji travel alone. He also described the bus trip back to the airport when they passed the Acropolis, and a woman passenger never even looked up. To K, the Acropolis was one of the greatest splendors of the world.

From Madras Krishnaji wrote that he had had to answer questions from Rajagopal's lawyers about the ownership of Vasanta Vihar and had learned that Madhavachari had given all of K's private letters to him to Rajagopal—a thorough betrayal that I had suspected.

1973 began with Krishnaji in Rishi Valley and then in Bangalore, from where he wrote and where I cabled him after a hearing in the Ventura court, where Judge Heaton granted the motions on our behalf made by Stanley Cohen, our Ventura lawyer, including access to KW Inc. records. Throughout his stay in India, Krishnaji wrote, and I in turn replied and kept him informed.

On February first he flew from Bombay to Rome, then to Brockwood, and on February ninth to Los Angeles and so back to Malibu. He rested; we talked and walked and often went over next door to the Dunnes', where Amanda Dunne was recuperating after serious surgery. Krishnaji provided healing. On the seventeenth we drove to Ojai, where there was snow on Topa Topa, the mountain K used to climb. At the Lilliefelts', there was a trustee meeting and general discussion of all plans. We drove back in the afternoon, and K said that even as far away as Ojai he could feel something happening for Amanda's health. On another day we went to a movie in Los Angeles, and on returning along the beach road Krishnaji gently fainted and then half-fainted again a little later. "I felt far away," he said.

On March seventh we drove to San Francisco and the Huntington Hotel. Alain came to tea and came again the next day when, with Erna and Theo, we all five went to Trader Vic's for lunch.

Afterward, we went to the Masonic Hall, where Krishnaji was to speak and which was conveniently next to the Huntington. He was pleased with it, did microphone and light adjustments while he was there, then returned to the hotel. The next day he rested; we lunched in the sitting room and in the afternoon drove to Golden Gate Park, where Alain joined us for a walk and came back for supper. The apartment, as well as a sitting room, had a kitchen where I could cook.

Krishnaji gave his first of four San Francisco talks on March tenth in the Masonic Hall, which seated more than 3,000 and was very well attended. Alain did the audiotaping and came for walks as well as lunches in Chinatown and in various small restaurants. K went to see Mrs. Blanche Mathias, an elderly friend from earlier days. Jacob Needleman came to see him. The Lilliefelts and Alan Kishbaugh were there; and after, we went to walk in Muir Woods and K dictated a Letters to the Schools—the first of a series he wanted to do on freedom. When he didn't want to go further afield, we walked ten laps around the little park opposite the hotel. We left on March twentieth and drove south. The Big Sur road was closed, so we came on Route 101 through rain, sleet, hail, and a touch of sun, stopping for a picnic lunch in Pismo Beach. K did some of the driving, and we were home in Malibu by mid-afternoon.

K rested in bed for two days, getting up only to do ten rounds of the lawn in the late afternoon. But on the twenty-fourth he was back in form and held a discussion with Erna, Theo, Ruth Tettemer, Albion Patterson, Alan Kishbaugh, Sidney Field, and David Hall and his wife, Felicity. At a second discussion with the same group—this one on education—he spoke of the need for a school because we were in a time of violence, a "dark age." He said there was a residue of both good and evil that exists in itself. "I am not speculating. I know this." He said we must bring up children in goodness—an umbrella of it sheltering them. As to having a school, how were we to have it? He said we were already in this goodness or we would not be there. Were we willing? We were.

There was further talk of a school in the succeeding days; we went to see the aquarium at Marineland, K dictated further Letters to the Schools, he continued giving healing to Amanda, and on April fifth we drove to Ojai, where we stayed with the Lilliefelts. At supper, we talked, and K spoke of a sense that they and I had been sent by something to look after him, that we must be responsible, keep control of the schools, and also be prepared to handle whatever a coming tide of energy would bring. We must keep things in our hands.

On the seventh, in the morning, he gave the first Ojai talk, held in Libbey Park. At supper with Erna and Theo, he spoke of the horror of his life with the Rajagopals.

A second talk took place the next day, and in the afternoon we went up to the top of Sulphur Mountain to look at it as a possible place for a school. Krishnaji gave numerous private interviews, and on the following day spoke to the students at the Thacher School. In the afternoon we drove home to Malibu.

It was back to Ojai for two more talks on the next weekend. There was further discussion of a school, and K spoke of our perhaps building a cottage in Ojai. Again, in Malibu, his head was hurting, and he rested. On the nineteenth Dr. Allan Anderson came to lunch, and there was discussion of his doing videotaped discussions with K in San Diego the following year.

On April twenty-third we flew to New York, stayed briefly at the Ritz Tower, and on the twenty-fifth flew to Paris. We had the usual rooms at the Plaza Athénée. With no sleep on the flight, K rested but had such a severe cramp in his right lower leg that he almost fainted. Hot compresses relieved it. We did errands the next morning and had Marcelle Bondonneau and Mar de Manziarly to lunch in the hotel. There was much talk of the early days with Mar, K asking what the young K was like. Sacha had been taken to the American hospital, so we went there with Mar. Sacha looked gray and seemed unaware of how ill he was. K spent about ten minutes alone with him while Mar and I talked to the nurse about tests, the results of which were not yet known. When K and I left, he said to me, "Never let me be in a hospital. I would rather die quietly at home." It was the first time he had been in a hospital in years, and the atmosphere disturbed him.

The following day, April twenty-eighth, the car was delivered from Switzerland by Mr. Moser. After lunch with my brother and his wife, we put the luggage in the car and it wouldn't start. The doorman got it going it using a cable, which I quickly bought as a precaution, and we set off for Le Havre. It stopped once on the autoroute but started again, and I left it in the ferry queue while we walked to the Monaco restaurant where we had dined before. Luckily the car started and we got on the ferry, but in the morning in Southampton, it had to be pushed off by hand and then started with the precautionary cable. It was a lovely, misty morning, and we came serenely to Brockwood, where we talked all morning with Dorothy, and then K slept the rest of the day.

On the thirtieth a telegram came from Mar saying that Sacha had died the day before.

Krishnaji's seventy-eighth birthday came and went without mention of it, as he preferred. He spoke to the school, to Mary Cadogan, to the Digbys, and gave interviews. One day he, Dorothy, Doris Pratt, and I drove to the New Forest for a picnic and went on to Buckler's Hard, a small, fifteenth-century village where Elizabethan ships used to be built. We drove on to Christchurch, but the drive was too long and K was tired. There were meetings with the staff, trips to London for errands, and K dictated letters. One of these was to the Happy Valley Foundation formally asking it to make land available in Ojai for a school. On June first Mar came for the weekend. She showed Krishnaji and me letters written by Nitya to her in the early twenties. They were very touching to me, so alive, humorous, ironic, a bit snobbish, and somehow sad, as though that world was tiresome to him. He wrote, "Theosophy is the most boring thing of all." K was moved by the letters. He said, "I saw what it was like, but he was much more mature than I."

On June eighteenth Ruth Tettemer and Albion Patterson arrived and were joined by Pupul Jayakar, her daughter, Radhika Herzberger, with her two children, Sunanda and Maya, and also Sunanda Patwardhan, Achyut Patwardhan, and Balasundaram. The next day Alan Kishbaugh and the Lilliefelts arrived. Erna reported that Rajagopal had made insufficient replies to our first interrogatory. On the twentieth the Digbys arrived, Mary Cadogan and Mary Links came, and the meeting of the three Krishnamurti Foundations began. K opened with moving words on trust and working together, and there was discussion on whether the Foundations should continue and in what form. The next day a meeting of the English Foundation and Publications Committee dealt with a new structure in which annual meetings would be called and would be ultimately responsible for all publications. Hugues van der Straten arrived, and in the afternoon, with everyone present, the thorny matter of world publications was gone into. India made a claim for sharing copyright, but it was resisted. India accepted this, but after much work it was given the right to publish in its own territories. A better feeling was achieved with more trust and cooperation.

On the twenty-fourth K spoke to the school in the morning, but the Foundations met in the afternoon and finished the agreements. Mary Links then urged that all Krishnamurti's ashes be given to the Indians when he died. The Americans thought this too sectarian but didn't speak up.

On July third we left Brockwood and took the ferry from Southampton to Le Havre. After one night in Paris at the Plaza, we drove south on the autoroute to Chalons, where we took a smaller road through Lons-le-Saunier and finally found a quiet, shady lane where we had a picnic lunch. We then drove on through Morez and via the Col de la Faucille into Switzerland. We were in Geneva and at the Hôtel du Rhône by 6:30 p.m., hot and tired. I spoke on the phone to Vanda, who had just arrived at Chalet Tannegg, We had supper in our rooms, and K said, "No more of these long motor trips—too much."

In the morning we did a little shopping—ties at his favorite place and Patek Philippe to have his watch regulated. Narasimhan lunched with us, and then we went off along the lake, past Lausanne, and up into the mountains via Oron, stopping in Bulle to buy some Gateaux Bullois. We went on through driving rain to Gstaad and Chalet Tannegg, where Vanda and Fosca had all in order. Meanwhile, in Los Angeles, Amanda was undergoing yet another operation. In the car Krishnaji had said, "I will think of it at night. One is quieter then." The next morning there was a cable signed "Dunnes" saying the operation was successful and the doctor pleased. K said, "I woke up happy." And I sent a cable from both of us.

Quiet days followed; K resting and doing a few Letters to the Schools. The first Saanen talk was on the fifteenth. Felix and Elena Greene came to lunch, and there was talk of China and India. K said, "What does it all mean, building dams and societies, etcetera? Unless I have a reason to live, all the rest has no meaning. I am savage about that."

The second Saanen talk was so intense I was exhausted at the end. He put incalculable energy into it. There was just K, Vanda, and I at lunch. Later, she and I discussed Tannegg matters over supper, and in the morning she left for Florence. That day his old friend from early days, Pascaline Mallet, came for lunch. He had not seen her for years, and it was my first meeting. She was the official head of the French committee.

Dorothy and Montague Simmons moved up from the camping ground to stay in the downstairs flat at Tannegg. They came on the afternoon walks. Various people came for lunch, for tea, and for discussions. K dictated letters to Erna about the case and to a reply from the Happy Valley Foundation, which had said that perhaps a bit of the land there might be available—maybe. To me, it was insulting, but K wished to pursue it.

The weather turned cold and wet but softened by the time of the seventh and last talk on July twenty-ninth. Then cold again for the start of the seven daily public discussions. There were many meetings for K with various people, a busy and demanding time, but finally it was over, and on a lovely August eighth, K, the Simmons, and I drove to Thun, had our picnic in a little park, and then at Mr. Moser's we took delivery of K's new Mercedes 450 SLC that was ordered two years before. K, with Moser, drove it back to Tannegg while the Simmons came with me. My car then went back to Thun for winter storage with Mr. Moser. K looked totally pleased. He drove it the next day to put a little mileage on it, and then we went, again with Dorothy and Montague, to Thun for its first service. While this was being done, we went to Beatus for lunch and then on to Interlaken on the lake steamer. The Mönch, Eiger, and Jungfrau were clear all day against the summer sky, and we came back relaxed and content to fetch the car of which K later said, "It is like a crouching tiger."

The next day we washed the crouching tiger, Krishnaji carefully, meticulously seeing to every detail. Dorothy and Montague left for Brockwood; it was quiet in the house, and K was feeling remote and "off." Packing followed; after that and final errands, we loaded the car and went for the last walk of the summer; the usual way up the hill, across the fields, and into the woods to the river. The car was ready to go before bedtime.

On August fourteenth, after saying goodbye to Fosca, we left Tannegg at 4 a.m. in the new Mercedes. A golden moon lit the valley, and then an orange ball of sun took its place as we drove along the autoroute past Lausanne. K was driving: "Now I know I can drive this car." I took it climbing the mountains. We stopped at one point, and K left his driving gloves on a tree and we went back to find them. "I could have wandered off in the forest; the body is off—I've never felt it quite like this." Into France, we bought croissants in a village in the Jura and ate our picnic breakfast in the little side road where we had done so the previous two summers. We rejoined the autoroute at Chalons. I had slept less than two hours, and K wanted to drive again, so I dozed. There was a heat wave all over Europe, but the air conditioner in the new car meant a comfortable drive. We had a picnic lunch with us, but didn't fancy the parking as we neared Paris and wound up eating our lunch in the Bois de Boulogne, near where we used to walk. There were prettier places, but K liked the familiar one, and we sat a long time under the trees. We reached the Plaza Athénée by 5 p.m., had long cool baths, and ate a delicious supper of fruit and soup. By 8 p.m., I fell asleep.

The next day was a holiday in France. After eleven hours of sleep, K felt rested, and we floated through the morning in complete relaxation, lunched in the garden under umbrellas, luxuriously, quietly. At 4 p.m. we walked to the Champs-Elysées, where a Burt Lancaster film was playing. It was the usual nonsense, but K observed the southwest desert mountains and his head pain stopped. "I didn't know what was happening. I just watched."

The following day he said of his head pains and faraway feeling, “These people usually remain in one place, surrounded by their disciples; the Buddha walked eighty miles, but that wasn’t very far. This body was made sensitive, and it rebels at being pushed around in strange places.”

I asked, “Shouldn’t it stay in one place?”

K replied, “If you mean Brockwood, no. It may come to that, but not now.”

At 4 p.m. we left and drove slowly to Le Havre, K doing about half the driving, which lessened the pain in his head. We boarded the Normandy ferry, had a smooth crossing, and landed in Southampton at 7 in the morning, August seventeenth. At Brockwood we unpacked; K cleaned the Mercedes’ engine and worried that it could not be put in the garage because Dorothy’s Cortina was stored there. “It will rust, we must cover it,” he said, but Dorothy, Montague, and Doris arrived in the Land Rover, the Cortina was moved, and the Mercedes was saved from the night’s dew. K’s head was hurting him, and his face looked drawn. “I wonder how long it will last?” he said. Later he spoke of the headaches as if the tremendous energy that went into the talks subsides and the body’s protest and fatigue then surfaces.

A draft of a settlement agreement in the Rajagopal case came from our lawyer, Stanley Cohen, which K reviewed. People began to arrive for the Brockwood talks, among them Reg and Mavis Bennett. Ian Hammond and Robert Wiffen came to inspect their architectural work on the new Cloisters building, and there was talk of an assembly hall. I was able to tell K that, after the payment due on the Mercedes, there was still some money left in the account, and he said it should go toward the assembly hall.

There were a few quiet days when, with Dorothy, we walked, pruned trees in the grove, and picked blackberries along the hedgerows.

A letter from Erna came saying that Evelyne Blau had visited the Happy Valley land that had been suggested for a school and that she, the Lilliefelts, and Ruth Tettemer all felt we should abandon that as a possibility.

Krishnaji began the first of his four Brockwood talks on Sunday, August first. As in the past, he had a little something to eat afterward in the quiet of the West Wing kitchen and then returned to the marquee where everyone else was lunching. The weather was benign, and the audience was numerous. On the Tuesday and Thursday, between the weekends, he held question-and-answer sessions. By the last and fourth talk, there were easily 1,500 people attending, but K felt there was too much of a holiday atmosphere, not enough seriousness. The next year should be more austere.

On September thirteenth we lunched with Mary Links at Fortnum. She had had queries about the text of one of his books edited in India. K was impatient with it, had dictated revisions of it to me, and said it could not be published as it was. This was discussed at lunch. K decided that I should go through it and consult him on parts I thought needed editing or elucidating. He would then correct it, and it would then go to Mary for final editing. At the end of lunch, Mary spoke of the beauty of K's letters, their originality, and asked him if he would keep a notebook in which he would write a word, a line, anything each morning. K told her of the curious thing that had happened the night before the first Brockwood talk on August thirty-first. He had woken during the night feeling as if a ball of light were being placed in his head. He stayed awake observing it for about an hour.

Lunch was followed by an inevitable dentist appointment for K, but then we did errands and shopped for a notebook for the planned writing and suitable pencils. He wanted a thick one with fine lead and was pleased by what he found. Putting down our shopping bag was a self-conscious thing. "It hasn't a bomb," said K to the clerk. London and other cities were being harassed by the IRA with bombs being left in shopping bags.

The very next morning Krishnaji began writing in the new notebook and did it daily in spite of giving interviews, speaking to the school, going further to London for dentist, Huntsman fittings, talking again to Mary for the biography, and, as always, taking long and striding walks across the fields in the beauty of the turning season.

We left Brockwood on October fifteenth and flew to Rome and to Vanda's flat on Via Barnaba Oriani. K rested and continued his notebook; various people came to lunch and to talk to him, and every afternoon he and I walked in the nearby Villa Glori. I spent time with Filomena and her family. On one day Krishnaji, Vanda, and I lunched at Villa Medici with Comte de Roland, his Japanese wife, and Mme. Cassadó, widow of the cellist Cassadó, and also Japanese. There was discussion of Krishnaji being invited to speak in Japan in 1974. Mme. Cassadó was leaving for there the next day and would write to me about it.

There were conversations about the necessity of work in Italy being handled by a committee and not by one or two individuals. Krishnaji also made it very clear that if there were a school in Italy, it must be run by that committee but not bear his name. This was consistent with his wish that only schools he could visit, and therefore for which he could assume responsibility, should use his name. He also refused the request of the Swiss photographer, Guido Franco, to be interviewed on film for use in something Franco was showing on French television about the gurus Sai Baba and U. G. Krishnamurti. This too was consistent with his wish not to be mixed with other things.

On October twenty-eighth K gave a talk at the Teatro Eliseo. It was his one public talk in Rome, and he put a great deal into it. About 900 people attended, and about 600 of them used translation devices. Afterward Vanda had around eighty people to lunch. In the afternoon I finished going through the education book, and K and I walked in Villa Glori. The film director Pontecorvo was at lunch the next day. He was making a film about Jesus, and Krishnaji suggested a more interesting subject would be why the human mind so easily falls into superstition. On the afternoon walk he again cautioned me not to do unnecessary things, not to take chances, to drive with care, and avoid unnecessary travel. Also to train my body as I would a dog.

On October thirtieth, there was a discussion for invited people at Vanda's, largely on the difference between recognition and seeing. In the latter there is only seeing and no center as the self. Another discussion followed the next day, also a good one. Then, on November first, Krishnaji flew to Bombay on Alitalia, and I flew to New York.

After visiting my family, I returned to Malibu on November thirteenth. From India, K cabled that he had received a cable from Rajagopal and asked what was happening. Our lawyer, Stanley Cohen, advised K not to reply, and he followed this counsel. A tentative draft of a settlement of the Rajagopal case was in the air, and, after discussion with Erna, Theo, and Cohen, a draft of it was sent to Krishnaji.

On the nineteenth I received K's first letter. It was written in Rishi Valley between November fifth and twelfth. He wrote every day, and when two pages were filled, they would be sent. I, in turn, did the same so that there was a flowing sense of communication. He had gone to Delhi, but a scheduled trip to Rajghat was cancelled by an airline strike and uncertainty of trains. He had told KFI that he could no longer speak in so many places. From Delhi he went to Madras.

Krishnaji left Bombay for Rome on January thirty-first, 1973, and then flew to Brockwood on February second, 1974. On the fifth Dorothy telephoned me that he had been refused a visa for the U.S. I telephoned the visa department in London to protest and was told that it was being issued at that very moment, and so he would be able to fly to Los Angeles the next day.

In the meantime, on the fifth, Erna and I met at the Ventura County Courthouse and went over points in the latest settlement agreement draft drawn up by Stanley Cohen, which had only just reached us. At 2 p.m. Sol Rosenthal, Cohen, and Deputy Attorney General Laurence Tapper arrived, and Judge Richard Heaton took them and Rajagopal's lawyer, Terry Christensen, into his chambers, where they remained for three hours. Sol was the first to come out and told Erna and me that he felt a settlement was going to occur. Mr. Tapper had been very helpful and was going to insist on a yearly audit of K&R, which Rajagopal had refused. There was talk also of making Rajagopal pay for the $40,000 vault built in his own house at K&R's expense.

All this was good news to have for Krishnaji's arrival the next day, February sixth. He was the second passenger off the plane, and after a time came out of customs carrying his Vuitton bag, looking elegant and tired but wonderful. "Travel is hell," he said. We drove home to Malibu, talked, unpacked, and talked some more. He wanted to hear Walter Cronkite on the television news, and we telephoned the Lilliefelts. It was peace to have him safely there, but the next day I spoke to my lawyer about the possibility of his having some sort of resident status to avoid visa difficulties. That evening he was too mixed up in time to sleep well. "Things have been going on, exploding in my head. Something is going on." He told of plans of the Bangalore school and that Mary Lutyens had finished the biography.

Days of rest followed; some trips to the dentist, too, and then up to Ojai for a trustee meeting with Erna, Theo, Ruth, and Albion. He reported on India and Brockwood, and we discussed the case and school plans. He asked, "How will you judge a student? Will it be with your prejudices, likes, dislikes? Will you be aware of these, of choosing with your own ego? It is a sin to turn down a child who comes to you, who may be the right one. It is a tremendous responsibility. If you feel that responsibility deeply, you will act rightly."

On February sixteenth we left at 3 and drove to La Jolla, where again Martha Longenecker had very kindly lent her house for K's use during the videotaping at San Diego State University of a series of discussions with Dr. Allan Anderson. Martha was there to receive him and so was Sidney Roth, whose interest and help contributed to the video project. Martha checked me out on how the house worked, and Tibet, her cat, made us welcome. Then Martha and Sidney left, we had supper, and K slept.

There was a gasoline shortage, and by careful driving we had used only half of the car's supply, so I was able to drive one more mile and lay in a supply of food. K rested all day until we took a walk around La Jolla. We had supper on trays by the television, and a program came on showing Baba Ram Dass (i.e., Richard Alpert), Timothy Leary's old partner in LSD matters at Harvard. There were ashram scenes of pompously serious, bearded, turbaned types doing what was billed as kundalini yoga. "God bless America," said K. "They will embrace anything." Later he watched a little of Upstairs, Downstairs and was hoping Sarah, the scullery maid, would disrupt the dinner for King Edward VII, but bedtime intervened.

The videotaping with Dr. Allan Anderson began on February eighteenth at San Diego State University in their television department. There were to be ten days of dialogues on the general theme of what place knowledge had in the transformation of man. They were recorded in color, using three cameras. That morning they did one hour, then paused, and did a second hour. We came back to the house for lunch and walked a little in the afternoon. Then supper on trays by the TV and early to bed.

At 7 the next morning, in the dark, I queued behind a dozen cars at the nearest gas station; it took half an hour, but I was able to get a full tank, and we went again for the third and fourth dialogues. In the car he said, "Energy is not thought. Remember to remind me."

K suggested that Dr. Anderson challenge him a little more and it went well. This continued through dialogues nine and ten on the twenty-second and was followed by two days of rest. On the twenty-fifth they did numbers eleven and twelve, but K was very tired. He that day decided definitely against going to Japan in the autumn. "It is too much. I am seventy-nine." We agreed also to not motor anymore to Saanen. Long drives were too much.

On the twenty-fifth, on the way to San Diego State, K said, "I think I will take charge of the discussion." It went very well. It began with religion, which he said was a gathering of energy at all levels that would bring about great attention, without frontiers, and from there move to understand what thought cannot reach. He spoke of man's original closeness to and love of nature, but priests took over as interpreters and relied on fear to influence man away from worship of beauty. He said current religion was a degradation, a circus, utterly immature; that the real meaning of religion was a state of mind being so attentive that the unnamable could come into being. Only out of that attention can one see what is actually happening. To pay attention means to be quiet. The quality of mind that can perceive something beyond the measurement of thought is religion, is sacred.

On the twenty-eighth they finished with recordings numbers seventeen and eighteen, deciding not to do more, and in the afternoon, after saying goodbye to Martha Longenecker and thanking her for her hospitality, we drove back to Malibu. K was tired, as dialogues were more tiring than talks, but he felt it had gone well.

A pleasing thing had happened: Krishnaji's Mercedes, which had been shipped from London, arrived and was already in Oxnard at Dieter's Motors, where we went to see it. The Green Beauty, as K called it. One could ask for special license numbers, and K chose KMN. This derived from the days when he and his brother had some of their things marked with both their initials. So KMN stood for Krishna Maria Nitya, though this was kept unexplained. Maria had evolved from the prevalence of Marys—Lutyens, Cadogan—so K took to calling me Maria instead of what had been "Mrs. Zimbalist."

On March eighth the KFA trustees brought about ten possible teachers who might be involved in the school, and K discussed what the school should be. The two sisters, Drs. Siddoo, who were planning a similar school in Canada, were also there, as was Asit Chandmal. He and Alan Kishbaugh stayed to lunch.

This was also the day that Krishnaji regained his manuscript of what was subsequently published as Krishnamurti's Notebook. It was a handwritten-in-pencil daily record begun in June 1961 and continued for seven months. In it he described states of consciousness and perceptions in ways he had never done before. When he ended it, for safekeeping he had asked Vanda Scaravelli, who was going to California, to carry it to Ojai for his archive. Since then, Rajagopal had refused to return it or even give Krishnamurti access to it until, in the movement toward settlement, it was exchanged for the audiotapes made by Albert Blackburn in 1968 of K's conversations with Ojai people in Saanen regarding his reasons for disassociation with KW Inc. These Rajagopal wanted destroyed. The manuscript was conveyed via Rajagopal's lawyer to Stanley Cohen and delivered this day by Erna and Theo to Krishnaji. It was something immensely beautiful and moving, perhaps the closest of any of his writings to the innermost of his mind. He asked me that day to read it, and subsequently I dictated the text onto cassettes from which it was transcribed by a secretarial service. That night he again said he had the sudden feeling that he would live another ten to fifteen years: "The body must last." And repeated that I must outlive him.

On March eleventh Erna heard from Mr. Cohen that Rajagopal wanted to know K's personal reasons for wanting control of his pre-1933 books. She gave on the telephone a substantive draft of a reply, which K rewrote and had ready for the next day's meeting of the KFA board. The re-draft by R's lawyer, Christensen, was gone over, and after a quick lunch, Erna and Theo drove K and me to Stanley Cohen's office in Oxnard, where we went over it with him. It was Krishnaji's first meeting with Mr. Cohen, and he liked his spirit of getting things done. The next meeting was to be in the presiding Judge Heaton's chambers. Erna and Theo drove us to Dieter's Motors, where the Green Beauty Mercedes was ready and shining. We drove it home at last to Malibu, with K at the wheel most of the way. That evening he said, "We've accomplished a lot today."

On the fourteenth Erna spoke to Mr. Cohen and reported that Rajagopal was balking at pre-1933 publications control by K, but Cohen was holding firm. Archives were to be housed in the K&R office and not in Rajagopal's vault in his house. KFA was to receive the $30,000 value of that vault, which had been built using KW Inc. money, on Rajagopal's death or if he sold the house. Cohen was to put all this into legal form as soon as possible.

On March sixteenth and seventeenth Krishnaji gave public talks in the Santa Monica Auditorium. Two more talks were on the following weekend. When these were completed, Erna gave a copy of the letter addressed to K and KFA from Mrs. Porter, the Vigevenos, Mr. Weideman, and Austin Bee refusing the settlement. They were in a furor over K's wanting publishing control of his pre-1933 material. Alan Kishbaugh came back for lunch, and Erna and Theo joined us. We discussed the case and also the offer we were about to make for some forty acres of Ojai land for a school. K gave us a blinding challenge whether we wanted to go ahead with the offer in spite of the settlement apparently blowing up. "If it is right, it will come right," he said but added that we each had to feel it was right apart from any other consideration. Erna and I signed the offer for the land.

Krishnaji held a public discussion in Libbey Park at Ojai on March thirty-first. The night before was spent at the Lilliefelts', and in the early morning K was outside, looking down the valley, seemingly lost in the radiance of what he saw. "This is Ojai," he said. "You must see it." I suggested that perhaps his love for it, the beauty of the land, touched his consciousness all those years in ways that had made endurable what he went through with the Rajagopals. Coming home in the car, he said I was right.

We went again to Ojai the following weekend for another public discussion in Libbey Park. Afterward, at Erna and Theo's, Krishnaji went into plans for the school and spoke most persuasively about Mark Lee becoming its director. This was agreed to by all, and when Mark and his wife Asha came in the afternoon, the directorship was offered to him, and he accepted. Shortly after this, our offer on the forty-acre piece of land as a site for the school was rejected, but discussions on what the school should be like were continued.

One evening, after the usual supper on trays in the living room, Krishnaji watched a film on television, and when I came in to mention that it was quite late, he had a staring, faraway look. He said, “Sit down quietly.” After a while he described a “precipitation,” something so strong in the room that he was prepared for it to become “manifest” (i.e., visible in some way). It kept him wide-awake, and in the night he had to sit up because it was so strong. “I never felt it like this before.” All the next day he was somewhat far-off.

On April sixteenth we flew to New York and once again stayed in the small flat in the Ritz Tower. My brother lent me his car to drive to White Plains for K to have a medical checkup by Dr. Max Wolf, who had examined him in the past. He found K generally very well. There was a slight thickening of his vocal chords but not a tumor; his blood pressure was 110/69; weepy eyes was a blocked tear duct, a common condition; the tremor in his hands was not Parkinson’s; and there was only a very slight hardening in his arteries. Blood and other samples were taken for testing.

Erna and Theo arrived and reported on where things stood with regard to land for a school. As to any attempt to get some of the Happy Valley land, K said Rosalind’s hostility to him and all of us made it highly unlikely. “I cannot do it,” he said. “I will not talk to her.” It was felt we must start clean to create whatever K wanted without strings or being beholden to the Rajagopals.

On April twentieth K began his New York talks at Carnegie Hall. At the stage entrance, there were three police cars in front and the entrance was full of policemen. A telephoned bomb threat had been made by a man speaking with an Indian accent, and the bomb was said to be timed to go off when Krishnamurti began to speak. All people with packages were being stopped. K was unaware of all this, gave an excellent talk, and the only difficulty was the inadequacy of the public address system. It was only afterward that Erna told me what had happened, though the sight of police made me guess. I didn’t speak of it to K. I was often uneasy when he was in front of large, unknown audiences, but when thinking about it then, there was a curious sense of hovering protection and reassurance.

He gave his second Carnegie Hall talk the next day. Erna and Theo came by afterward, and K said something to me about the necessity of living without shock or strain. It was then that Erna told him about the bomb threat, but he brushed it aside, saying, “I must live at least another ten years.” The following morning he spoke of “a marvelous meditation in the night” and “I must find out what to do to live another ten or fifteen years; there is so much to do.”

During the week we went to see Dr. Max Wolf and had a good report medically. He also saw Mr. Narasimhan and a number of others, including a group for a discussion that was held at the Cooper Hewitt Museum, where its director, my brother’s wife, Lisa Taylor, made available a room for the meeting. We also saw some movies, including one about some very winning dolphins. K was carried away and cried out in alarm for them and then said reassuringly to me, “Oh, it’s a cinema,” as if he just remembered it.

After two more talks at Carnegie Hall on April twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth, we flew back to California on the thirtieth. Home in Malibu on a lovely afternoon, we both felt better away from New York and in the clean and quiet peace of the house above the sea.

On May seventh, 1974, all KFA trustees came for a meeting and stayed to lunch. K asked what it was that seemed to be blocking us—the loss of the forty acres we had tried to buy for the school. Everywhere else—Brockwood, India, etcetera—things were going ahead, but in Ojai we seemed to be blocked. He said we had put too much dependence and, hence, strings to the Rajagopals, the outcome of the case, getting KW Inc. or Happy Valley land. We should go ahead without that. He went into why Ojai, the reasons for it, his affection for it, the feeling it was meant to be, trustees living there. Erna pointed to my feeling that the Happy Valley land and Arya Vihara were being poisoned by the Rajagopals and we should start anew and clean, on our own. K spoke of a center where he would spend more time. Also, as we had no response from Christensen on the settlement agreement, I telephoned Mr. Cohen saying that we were all together and felt that, if there were no response in the next few days, he might sum up these events to Judge Heaton to ask for a hearing and a trial date. The other trustees went off determined to find better land than the forty acres. K filled them with resolve and energy, as he always did.

On May tenth Krishnaji came into my room while I was at the desk; while we talked, there was that remote look in his face, and very suddenly I felt the curious sense of something present. It was as if there were an inaudible sound. His face had a look of inward listening, infinitely austere, away. He said, “It is strange. Do you feel it? Do you write down when these things happen? You should.” A little later, he said that he could sense when the two Rajagopals didn’t know where he was, that when they knew he was there, it was as if they “beamed” hate at him. I asked if he felt it at Brockwood—did it reach that far? He said no. I then asked if it would not be worse if we lived in Ojai. “No, I can turn it away. They would try to prevent us being there,” he said.

“Could they?” I asked.

“No, they couldn’t,” he replied. We could buy land like anyone else. I asked why he didn’t turn away any emanations from them if he could. He said he didn’t try to. “They might change. People do change.”

On May fifteenth we drove to lunch with Erna and Theo. Beforehand, I had telephoned Mr. Cohen, who said that Christensen was stalling and not returning his telephone calls. In view of this, he was to go ahead and sum up where we were to Judge Heaton and ask for a trial date. At lunch K again asked us what was blocking us in Ojai. He suggested that by hanging our plans on the outcome of the case, we were dependent on Rajagopal, and that was wrong. We also discussed whether we should try to get land primarily for a center, without a school, a place where K would spend three months a year and discuss with people able to absorb his teachings. Ruth and Albion joined us, and we all went to see a house nearby for sale. It turned out to be a tacky house, a messy place, and K and I both disliked it. He said to me, "You have spoiled me. I couldn't live in a place like that." Then we went to the other side of the valley, climbed a hill, and looked down on a beautiful untouched valley, rolling golden fields, oak trees, and wooded mountain—everything that was loveliest in Southern California as it was a hundred years ago. It would have been perfect.

On the drive back to Malibu, K spoke of insults he received constantly from both the Rajagopals; her first calling him "a swine" in Sequoia, his shock, and when he told Rajagopal, there was only a shrug; their forcing him to go to drive-in movies and eat in tacky restaurants, which he hated. He spoke again of the time in India when Rosalind tried to hit his head with an empty bottle. Sunanda Patwardhan was a witness. He said he put up with all this because there was nothing he could do, no one to go to. He spoke of his sense of helplessness. He said that he wondered, when I went out, if something happened to me, what would he do? I said he would call the Dunnes, who were next door, but he said he wouldn't know how and would be too shy. I realized I must never go out unless there was someone there to protect him. I felt in tears at his helplessness and sense that he must put up with whatever was done to him. There was a total vulnerability, and it was also part of what made his face light up with delight at flowers on a hill as we passed or the blue of the sea.

A few days later, we met Erna and Theo at Mr. Cohen's office in Oxnard. He had received from Christensen revisions of the draft agreement. One was to make thirteen acres of land permanently empty around Rajagopal's house, even after his death, thereby enhancing the value of his place. We agreed to some things, not to others. K signed a successor trustee document by which he named successors to himself as trustee of K&R as specified in the settlement if it were to go through. In order, these were myself, Erna, Theo, Alan Kishbaugh, and Ruth Tettemer.

Early one morning, when I pulled back the curtains in my room, there was, only a few feet away, a doe standing delicately on the edge of the terrace, an amazing sight, for that part of the garden was entirely fenced. Hoping Krishnaji was awake, I very quietly went to see, and he came. We stood very still while the doe came so close to the window that her breath misted the glass; then, after a little while, she moved across the lawn and tried to jump the nine-foot wall but failed and fell, to our dismay. But unhurt and without haste, she went around the house while we followed from within. Then she completely vanished. We never figured out how she got in or left, but it was a quite magical apparition, and K was delighted. There were deer in the hills, but they were never seen on our side of the highway.

On the twenty-eighth there was to be a meeting in court on behalf of K and all of us. I telephoned Mr. Cohen to make it clear to Christensen that if there were no settlement that day, we would not accept one on the same terms later on. Among things we were willing to accept then, but not after further delays and the effort and expense of preparing for trial, was the matter of letting Rajagopal's legal expenses be paid out of settlement funds. At 6 p.m. Mr. Cohen telephoned saying, "I think we have a settlement." I relayed all this to Erna. K and I walked in the garden; Malibu was beautiful, cool, clear air and sunlight.

The next morning Erna spoke to Cohen and said it sounded right to her. Alan Kishbaugh came, and K went with him and I went with Amanda to the airport where, at noon, K and I took a nonstop flight to London. As usual, we had the forward seats, poor food, and a movie we had seen—The Sting, but K liked to watch it without sound, seeming to enjoy it more because he knew what was coming. At that season so far north, it was never dark and there was no sleep, but we landed at Heathrow at 7 a.m. and drove with Dorothy to Brockwood, where all the school was out on the driveway to greet Krishnaji.

Brockwood was in bloom; the green of England, the May trees, the blossoms on the chestnut trees joined all the loveliness of Malibu in a blessed continuity. We saw the addition to the dining room, the Cloisters planting, and the look of the Assembly Hall, at that point a twelve-foot height of octagonal excellence. In a surprising ration of energy, I kept going and unpacked all morning, slept after lunch, and at 5 p.m., K came and said, "We must walk!" So, with Dorothy and Whisper, we went gently through the Grove where the azaleas, the rhododendrons, and the handkerchief tree were still in flower.

Settling in and catching up on rest and sleep filled the first few days for K, though, of course, he spoke to the school. Then a trip to London—the classic shape of such—by train from Petersfield. There was something festive and warmly familiar about coming up to London, especially the first time of the season. Waterloo was so exactly the same, K's immaculate elegance making his way to the taxi rank, pigeons scuttling, people cutting straight lines to the various gates, the satisfaction of seeing there were enough cabs—neat, clean, spare, and deft London cabs. We get in. K says, "Savile Row, I'll show you where." And off we go across Westminster or Waterloo Bridge. We began, of course, at Huntsman, where K had a fitting, and then walked through the Burlington Arcade to Fortnum and Mason, where Mary Lutyens lunched with us at the usual corner table by the window. She told about the biography: John Murray is to publish it in London and Farrar, Straus, and Giroux in New York. K said he wanted to read the beginning part of it, about the childhood and early days. On another day, we lunched with Mary at her flat. She showed the many photographs she had collected for the biography. Among them were some of Nitya that K looked at a long time. He remembered his love for his brother but had trouble evoking his face. This happened with other matters, an inability to conjure up the look of things or people, and yet he could readily identify long-ago faces when shown a photograph. It was at one of the lunches with Mary that he suggested the subtitle for the first biography—The Years of Awakening.

A musing remark by K: "I'd like to talk to someone who could discuss the brain with me, who can challenge me. I'll have to do it myself."

Mary Cadogan and the Digbys came to lunch at Brockwood and to discuss publications. A new book, tentatively entitled Beginnings of Learning, was in manuscript form. I gave a report on the status of the Rajagopal case. George Digby was now retired from the Victoria & Albert Museum, and it was felt that it would be nice if he were again offered the chairmanship of the Publications Committee, so K invited him. George turned peony-colored and said he would like to think about it. Later, he left a little note for K saying of course he accepted.

Lunch with Mary Links, a fitting at Huntsman, and visit to his dentist took us to London again. We stopped at an exhibition of Andrew Wyeth paintings, which K liked, one in particular, but alas it was too costly.

On June thirteenth Mary and her daughter Amanda Pallant came down to Brockwood for K's talk to the school and for lunch. Afterward, K, Mary, and I discussed his 1961 writing, the manuscript we had finally extracted from Rajagopal and which was now entitled Krishnamurti's Notebook. Mary at first thought of it being privately printed by KFT and offered only to the mailing list but then veered toward a wider field. I felt it was in a sense something sacred, a testimony of K's inner mind. In the midst of this, which took place in the West Wing kitchen, K started asking Mary things about the biography and then suddenly asked her if she would write the second volume. She said she would, and if she did it she would want to do it differently, with the personal part only a background and the main part a chronology of his teachings, told in his own words. It would be an enormous work, starting with a reading of everything he had said through all the years. "But will you do it?" said K.

"Yes, I will," she said.

"Good," said K. "Then that is settled, because if you didn't, the Indians would want to do it. I will tell them you have undertaken it." Pleased, he went off for his nap. Mary and I talked all afternoon. I felt a wave of all being well at this decision. Mary's way of working—a scholarly, no-interpretation, using the original texts to tell the tale way—was to me the right way to report Krishnamurti. The point of this second part of his life was his teaching and not the personal events. That focus would be well handled by Mary.

At another lunch with Mary in London, she and K fell to talking about Leadbeater. K said that CWL must have done something that made the young K dislike him. He couldn't remember what. She said he was a rather brutal man; she doubted it was anything homosexual—he would have been afraid to make any advances toward K—but something must have caused the aversion. He said perhaps reading the biography would bring it back. After lunch, he went to see Mrs. Bindley. She was more frail and tottery, but her mind was as sharp as ever.

Assorted K remarks: "I will live at least another ten years. After that the door will close."

On another day, coming out of his room where there was a western on the television, he said, "I'm going to Missouri to be a dirt farmer. Like everybody else." And one morning when he got up, he said happily, "I'm off to Tibet. With Mistinguett."

M: "Because of her beautiful legs?"

K: “Her legs? Because she’s so ugly!”

On June twenty-third he held an absorbing discussion with the school. Thought was a small activity of the mind. Was there another activity which is timeless? When afterward I said how good it had been, he said, “I knew something was going on in the brain these last few days.” He had mentioned having had a good meditation. I asked him about the distinction he appeared to make in the book between meditation and “that otherness, that immensity.” He asked what it said. I said that it seemed as if there were something in him—a state of perception of which he was capable, whereas the “otherness” appeared to come to him and enter his consciousness. “That sounds right, but they are not entirely separate,” was his reply. When I spoke of “the manuscript you wrote,” he said, “It’s not my book, I didn’t write it.”

On the twenty-fourth a letter came from Erna to K reporting on the state of the case. The attorney general was working out the wording of a settlement with Rajagopal’s lawyer, Christensen. Balasundaram had sent necessary explanations of what was required to end the suit over Vasanta Vihar in Madras. Then the main news of someone saying that the Happy Valley Foundation was about to lose its educational use of the land unless it got such uses going, and therefore we should again try for some of it for our school and center. Erna had decided to “take the bull by the horns” and went to see Rosalind, who had control of Happy Valley. The latter confirmed that the land had to be used for education or it would be rezoned for agriculture. Her board would consider our application at their July meeting. They would not sell but would perhaps offer a ninety-nine-year lease for $1 a year. She gave permission for the Lilliefelts to look at the available land. She also gave a long justification of her contention that Mrs. Besant had not intended the Happy Valley land for K. Erna kept her temper, didn’t debate, and stuck to its future use. Since then she, Theo, and Ruth Tettemer walked over the land and found a part from which one couldn’t see the other buildings. They thought we should apply for that if K and I agreed. I read the whole letter to K; we talked it over, but he seemed rather distant.

The next day on the train to London, he asked me to tell him again what Erna’s letter had said. There was the obvious advantage of the land being suitable and the cost being nil. Rosalind had said we were “greedy” last year and had asked for all of the land—which wasn’t true—but the impending settlement must have been a factor. K dictated a cable to Erna to be signed by us both: “Please gladly proceed with what you proposed in matter of land.” K then said, “It is strange; four days ago, when I was going down to lunch, the thought came—I said, ‘Nitya, do something about Happy Valley. They are such silly people; see that something happens about this.’”

In a conversation with K about interviews, he said, “When they are open they want you to read their letters. Other times they have a mask on, and I am deceived. It’s not my business. You come to see me and you are serious; you ask me to look. I never offer my opinion, but then it is clear—I can go ahead. But others say, ‘Look, not too deeply.’ I go as deeply as they want me to. If they want me to go a mile, I go a mile. X never did. I wish he had; that's what makes me uncomfortable. If you are able to perceive, you must be in a meditative mind."

At lunch at Fortnum with Mary and Joe, all the remaining transcribed pages of K's handwritten manuscript were given to Mary. She was to edit it, and then how to publish it would be decided. A few days later, the Digbys came to spend the night at Brockwood. K had me tell them about it and let them read some of it.

On July first we left Brockwood, and Dorothy drove us to Heathrow. We had a peaceful picnic lunch in the car at Runnymede by the edge of the river. Ducks were busy, there was wind in the willows, and K watched the aircraft in the sky. A busload of children came with food. One little Sikh boy wore a pink turban. "Nonsense," said K. "Turbans are awful, smelly; they should pull it off him." But he was feeling merry. When Dorothy offered him Ribena, he said, "I only drink champagne."

We took a BEA flight to Paris along with a planeload of the worst of tourists: fat, messy, unsuitably dressed, and talking loudly to each other about buying things. K stood observing, remote, an aristocracy of centuries about him. We came by taxi to the Plaza Athénée and to our usual comfortable rooms. It was pleasant, and I felt the sense of having brought K safely to a shelter, a necessary shell around him, clean, quiet, with adequate food, and something he is used to. The luxury was what provided those other essentials. "Without you I wouldn't be here," he said. "Thank you for looking after me." We went for a little walk and to a pharmacie for toothpaste and came back to supper in our rooms. K had stopped twice at the windows of a patisserie. "It makes me hungry," he said, so we had tarte aux pommes for supper, but alas, it came up.

Section Eight

We were in Paris on July second, 1974, and went shopping at Charvet for shirts and to Lobb for shoes, all carefully chosen by K. Then Marcelle Bondonneau lunched with us in the garden at the Plaza, and Nadia Kossiakof came for coffee. Nadia had negotiated the publication by Stock of The Awakening of Intelligence, translated by Mme. Duché. K had me tell them about his manuscript (Krishnamurti's Notebook) and left while I was describing it. Both were very moved. After K's rest, we went for a small walk and after supper in the rooms watched a television documentary of the 1939 war and a Nixon-Brezhnev meeting in Moscow. "People are mad!" said K. In the morning he had said, "There is something going on, even in this room, a marvelous meditation. That thing is going on. It started here last night. It was good to get away from Brockwood; the atmosphere was too infantile."

Mar de Manziarly lunched with us the following day. She asked K about Sai Baba, who her sister, Yo, thought was marvelous. K gave a vivid picture. Mar justified it by saying that most people couldn't do what K spoke of and hence needed to be told and given something to do. This argument was always puzzling—i.e., a false medicine is better than none. While this went on, we had the best tarte aux framboises ever eaten, and then after K's rest, he and I walked to a movie on the Champs-Élysées—Serpico—nonsense, but done with style and suspense. K was pleased.

On July fourth we left Paris by the Gare de Lyon, Mar coming to see K off. He said that the last time he was there was with his brother. We were in the last car, and K quickly found a window at the end where he could watch the fields of France go by, the green stalks of barley with golden-to-orange heads, poppies among them, and the wind twirling it all into flowing color. K stood all the way to Lausanne, looking out. The train was smooth, and he was pleased with this way of traveling. Mr. Moser met us and delivered the gray Mercedes at the Lausanne station. We put the bags in, drove up through the city, and took the Oron-Bulle road. It was a marvelous afternoon through the rolling green of fields and mountains. "We are back in our country," said K. He remembered the Gâteau Bullois, bought the past year, but the shop was closed. Coming into Gstaad, K spied two women walking ahead. "It is Miss McCann and Tapas," he said, and it was Tapas, never before out of India in all her many years. We stopped and K walked back to them. Tapas prostrating herself to touch his feet startled a passing Swiss. On up the hill, we arrived at Chalet Tannegg, where Vanda and Fosca had come the day before. K went to bed, and Vanda and I talked long over supper, bringing her all the news.

A cable came to K from Balasundaram in Rishi Valley about a letter from Erna saying that an agreement about Vasanta Vihar could not be made as part of a KFA settlement. Did K want them to continue their case in Madras? K dictated a cable replying yes, most strongly, and then dictated a letter going into it more fully. Later, Balasundaram telephoned from the Madras lawyer's office, and K spoke to him. They feared that it would be much harder for them to get Vasanta Vihar, which Rajagopal was claiming belonged to KW Inc., Ojai. I asked Balasundaram to send evidence of R's taking that position to Erna as quickly as possible. I then reached Erna by telephone about all this. She reported that the Happy Valley board meeting had taken place and she was hopeful that we might get some land. The conditions had not yet been enunciated. K thought that if we got some land, eventually we would get all of it. He was always optimistic.

On July twelfth I woke up thinking about K's weakness the day before when he had hay fever, did no exercise, and stayed in bed all day. His door was closed until almost 8 a.m., when he appeared almost shaking with energy. "I'm fine, fine!" he said; he had been thinking of the essentials of a center in Ojai and everywhere else. He had me write it down: It must produce people so intelligent they would be basically religious and with that intelligence would function in every field—politics, art, business, and every form of social relationships.

A letter came special delivery from Erna telling of the Happy Valley situation: Rosalind had drafted a letter before the meeting was held, not saying no but a yes that was in effect a no. Erna telephoned her to ask if KFA members should be available on the day of the meeting on August sixth. Rosalind said no and brushed her off.

K, still in a blazing state of energy, told me to write further about the essentials of a center: We should keep the school in a corner, separate from the center. He wanted a school for older children. The center should have a meeting room to hold two hundred, a kitchen and dining room for one hundred, and housing for thirty to forty people, there on invitation to discuss, etcetera. He wanted to keep the Oak Grove for talks, including half the land to the east of it, "in case we want to build something there and sell the rest." He said if we got the Happy Valley land he should fly to Ojai and meet everyone interested, including all the valley people, to ask for their support. This was to be somehow in September. "We must start building immediately." I pointed out that we had no funds even to pay Mark Lee's salary. "You're always talking about money," he said impatiently. I said I would never speak of it again.

I wrote all this to Erna, and K dressed and came with me to post it and visit the tent. A young boy was sitting behind bushes as we came out, watching the chalet. His face shone shyly when he saw K, and he stared until we drove off. K was pleased with the way the tent was set up, and we went to the camp to see Dorothy and Montague, who had just arrived in their Land Rover. Doris had come with them and was in her flat. K had lunch in bed, and later, on the walk in the woods, he said suddenly, "I woke up early and something extraordinary happened. It was as though this [wide gesture] were enormous, spreading out to take the universe."

M: "'This' being consciousness?"

K: "More than consciousness. It went on for more than an hour."

M: "Did it fade then?"

K: “No. You know how this is—it is there somewhere.”

We walked only as far as the river. He climbed up on the masonry bank to look at it, and then we turned back. He asked me to walk ahead and leave him to walk alone more slowly: “I must work.” In the wood, by the small stream, he called ahead to me and said he would sit there a while. I went on to where the wood ends, the open hillside begins, and one sees the splendor of the two valleys and the glaciers. I sat there on the bench for about twenty minutes, and he then passed me and went on to Tannegg. When I returned, he was coming out with rubber gloves on to clean the Mercedes engine. Full of energy!

I had been wondering, and mentioned it to Vanda, whether there was anything in the fact that almost every summer, just before his talks in Saanen, he had a low period, was weak or sick, and then a crescendo of energy before the talks—as if something puts the body into “low” in order for some other force to gather in him.

The talks began on Sunday, July fourteenth. The tent was almost full and the talk long and intense. The next day, at lunch with guests, there was speculation about where K should speak in Rome. Vanda feared the talk could be a target for bombs if announced publicly too far in advance. That day a bomb had blown up a part of the railroad station in Rome—“una bombezza,” said Vanda. Later, on the walk with K, I speculated what would happen if people really said no to fighting, to wars. The aggressors would take over, K said. You couldn’t let them do that; you would speak up; get people to not cooperate with that, do no work. The Russians or anyone else couldn’t control the world if everyone refused to work. “You’d have to talk, organize it ahead of time. At the last minute, it’s too late.”

M: “Isn’t it already too late?”

K: “Maybe. Now I must get woolly, I have to talk tomorrow.”

I said no more but walked ahead so he could be alone. In the wood he called to me, “Maria, remind me of these words: ‘Idea creates conflicting energy.’”

Later, when I went to give him some drops for hay fever, he said, “If there is a bomb in Rome, I must tell you what must be done.” At my recoil of shock, he said, “Shall I write it out or tell you?” At that moment his supper tray was brought in, and he said it wasn’t the moment to discuss it. In the evening I asked Vanda how real the talk was of bombs. “It is always possible now in Italy,” she said, and on the television news came pictures of the damage in Rome. Then why have him talk there? One talk she thought would be all right. It was his mention of it that gave me concern. In New York, with a similar scare, he had brushed it aside, saying, “Something looks after things.”

The next day, Tuesday, July sixteenth, Krishnaji gave the second talk and spoke of seeing the whole. Vanda and I lunched alone and went in for coffee when he had finished his tray and was reading a Le Carré spy story, Tinker, Tailor Soldier, Spy. We spoke a little about the talk and K’s reply to a question on how you are going to change people who are only interested in enough to eat, etcetera. K said he was talking to "you here in this tent. If a few change, the world could change. Other ways, old ways, of war, reforms, systems, etcetera have resulted in the present chaos. Only change in the psyche can alter the world…But I'm thinking of Thursdays' talk," he said. He had again spoken in the morning of thought being matter and now, sitting on the bed, he said the following: "When there is a cause, the energy created by that cause is the energy of thought as matter. Meditation is without cause, without past, time, or form. Why is thought divisive? Because it is the past, it must be fragmented. As long as there is a cause, there is the past. If there is no cause, there is no past, no time. The Greeks were concerned with form and the manipulation of matter. They made a prototype of beauty, etcetera. They never went into the question of form being matter. A prototype is the result of mentation; form is the cause, the cause is the result of time, etcetera. Everything is in terms of matter: gods, Jesus, etcetera, the symbol is created by thought. In the West, matter is most important; material and from there to God, which is thought to be nonmaterial, but it is a thought and hence matter." And, "You cannot organize the world unless there is the other; there must be the whole. There must be energy which is of intelligence, which is not of matter. For it you must negate. Form and matter are considered two different things. You need form to build a house; it is dictated by culture, economy, etcetera," and, "Food: Starvation is not a concept. Food produced needs but needs distribution. If the distributor has a concept—nationalism, for instance—there is chaos. It must be done according to idea. Organization is not according to politics but according to physical facts. One may ask what has that to do with my daily life, but daily life brings in the implication of all this." And, "Matter: Is there anything beyond matter? One sees one is on this side of the river, suffering, in misery. What is one to do? Ordinary men, living in this world, oppressed, suffering, want to break it, but don't see the whole thing is wrong. When I see it, passion makes me break it," and, "Life and death are always close together." (To MZ:) "Don't think it is only over there."

Later, we walked to the river. The reply to the KFA application for Happy Valley land had come, forwarded by Erna. A letter signed by Rosalind said the offer would be considered. K asked me to repeat what it said. He speculated that they might be wondering why we would want that land when we were going to get KW Inc. land in a settlement. He tentatively wondered if, since Rosalind's daughter, Radha Sloss, had made an overture toward him by asking to see him in Bombay, he might write to her to push the land matter. I said little, as he called it a reaction, which it was. It began to rain, and we came back soaked.

Vanda left for Florence on July seventeenth. Dorothy and Montague came up to the chalet for lunch, and K invited them to stay in the downstairs flat instead of in the Saanen camping ground where they had been. He had been having his lunch on a tray in his room when there were guests but came in before and after, which worked well, as it rested him, but he could also see people.

On July nineteenth, in spite of rain, K wanted to go ahead with a day in Geneva. Dorothy and Montague came too. We lunched at the Hôtel du Rhône. He was pleased with the food and ate a lot, for him. "I will have ice cream." He chose fraise ice cream, which had become a favored dessert in restaurants, and he ate it all. Dorothy and Montague went off on their own errands, and K and I hurried across the Rhône to Jacquet. Going to Geneva had become rather a ritual, and somehow the repetition each year was part of the enjoyment. Old and nice ways.

At Jacquet—"Bonjour, Monsieur Krishnamurti" as he comes in—the order book appears with his commandes from past years—snippets of the tie materials pasted on a page. The new samples are put in a heap until all are seen. Then he chooses. Apparently, my taste was considered reliable, so comment was sought. Seven were ordered and, yes, they would be made up and sent to Gstaad. We went back to the hotel to meet Mr. Narasimhan, who was pessimistic about the state of the world—problems were too big and close to being out of hand, but he was cheerful all the same. K had me tell him about an application for British citizenship and that it looked as if K could only get it at the discretion of the secretary of state, then Roy Jenkins. Narasimhan said that he was his friend and would go especially to London in September to ask him to act on it. We then went out to see his new Mercedes, and he left. We walked back to buy some cereals and olives, and then inevitably K thought of a reason to stop at Patek Philippe and have his watch checked. The Geneva ritual again—tie choosing, Patek, etcetera—they were something light, inconsequential, Krishnaji's fun in a life where fun played a very tiny part. He was buoyed and pleased and not tired. "Those were very nice ties," he said as we whisked past the Rhône, and on the drive back along the autoroute, he said, "Let her go 100." I did and the car did—briefly. We were back in the chalet by 7 p.m. Going to bed, he said, "Those are very nice ties. I will give the others away."

The Saanen public talks and then public discussion meetings continued and so did meetings with Brockwood people. There were reports of criticisms of Brockwood, and K invited all who were critical to come to talk to him. Except for Donald Hoppen, others never turned up. The Siddoo sisters came to talk to him about their school in Canada. He gave them permission to use his name and told them to work closely with KFA. A German group wanting to start a school also came to talk to K.

The fifth and final public discussion was held on August fourth. People were leaving, the weather was turning. Sunday, August eleventh, was a gray morning. Snow had fallen during the night on the nearby Wasserngrat. K had slept well, and after breakfast he told me there were two things I must do: I must talk to Dorothy and make her realize that she mustn't let Brockwood just go on as it had. There must be the "other"; she must give herself time and attention to be open to that. "Otherwise I won't just go on talking to these people, they must be ready for it. If not, I will withdraw, not suddenly, but instead of three months I will stay there two months, then one—you follow? Second: You must look after the whole, then everything will come right. It looks as if we will get the Happy Valley 100 acres; then I must live in Ojai, not Malibu. As long as I live, you will be with me; you must think of that, and probably you will outlive me. You would live there and Brockwood as long as you live, but you must have someone to look after you. You have no one. You must think of that and have someone."

I said that my life and activity, to the degree that I could help, went to him in his lifetime and to his work. It was the determining thing, and though I had no desire personally to live in Ojai, he and his work were my life. So we could build a proper house there for him that I would pay for, and it would belong to KFA when I was gone. He spoke of precision—watching how one lives, watching one's memory, avoiding carelessness, not letting faculties slip. He said one must train the mind. Mrs. Besant didn't; she wore out her mind, used to breakfast on coffee and bits of orange. He said he didn't think I would be ill and that he watched over me when we were apart. "I see to that, but you must be attentive."

The next day, Dorothy came on the afternoon walk. That evening, she and I went to a Menuhin concert, and I was able to talk to her as K wished. I asked her if she minded my being a sort of telephone wire between her and K, conveying not my opinions but his view. I told her he suggested she have more time to go into the things he had been talking about during the discussions of Brockwood. Later, he told me that on the walk he had "felt like almost disappearing." His head was bad, and he was physically hypersensitive.

The Simmonses left for Brockwood, and on a warm, clear morning, and K and I drove to Thun. K wanted the car checked before we took it to England. We walked to the ferry steamer, but it had just pulled away. I suggested a taxi, but K said, "Let's take a bus," so we did and went around the lakeshore to Merligen and the Hotel Beatus. We lunched on the terrace, and K observed the people. Two sparrows alit nearby, and K surreptitiously fed them crumbs. As we finished, the steamer came by and we went across to Spiez and back to Thun. The Eiger, Mönch, and Jungfrau were clear and splendid. "Goodbye until next year," K said to them. The car had been found in good order, and we drove back through the valley. A quiet, pleasant day, but after he got back, K's head began to hurt: "This has been going on since 1922."

Tapas came for lunch the next day. In spite of the heat, he and I walked, and he said, "I feel far away, as if I didn't want to speak or touch anything."

On another day, I was reading a Castaneda book, and K asked what it was. I told him the part about "entities" in the wilderness and at night the feeling of danger. K nodded and told of the sense of antagonism he had felt in a park in Madras when he went there at twilight. Also a similar feeling in Ashdown Forest years ago. He said that Mrs. Jayalakshmi had told him about going to an ancient temple at night and the sense of evil there. I asked if darkness opens the mind to such perceptions because the limited senses make one feel vulnerable. Partly that, he said, but more than that. He said he wouldn't walk at night on the path we took every afternoon, that many forests have a menace at night. I asked about Sequoia, where he lived alone in a cabin. "I never felt it there, it was a friendly place, but I never went out at night. I was always back by 6 p.m."

That evening, K said that the story of Rajagopal should be written down, telling all that he had done. K said perhaps he would do it, a bit at a time. He also said that if we did the house in Ojai he wanted to make a document "as chairman," ensuring my living there for my lifetime and also at Brockwood.

The next day, on the walk to the river, I asked him if he had seen psychological changes in me. Did he think I was caught in conditioning? "No," he said, "you are not attached. Not to me, not to your house, or any ideas. You were attached to your husband, but not now. That is why you must consider carefully this matter of building in Ojai." I asked why it was important. What was of sole importance was what was needed for him. "Because there is no one to look after you; you must carefully consider. I shall write a letter, as chairman, because of that, to Mrs. Lilliefelt about your having the house." That morning, he had me send a letter to Evelyne Blau asking her to keep in confidence what I had written about our thinking of building a house in Ojai for K's use. Until we are sure of getting the land, it might cause added antagonism and prevent it.

Further on the walk, he said that if one is not attached one cannot be hurt. I pressed him for some psychological noticings. He said that sometimes the mind is slow to see things: to think about that. Then he said that when he died, there must be someone to see that everything continued—not the organizational part, but the spirit. Later in the evening, he looked far-off and said, when asked, that his head was "going." I felt it was somehow not restful for him there after the Saanen meetings were over.

Tapas walked up the hill with two delicate little handkerchiefs, for me and for Fosca. K persuaded her to stay to lunch. They talked of magic in India. Tapas was Bengali and was in the Ramakrishna movement in her youth. She walked 500 miles once as a sannyasi, though she wasn't wearing the saffron robe. Leaving Saanen, she was going to Brockwood with Frances McCann. K and I were leaving too, so it was a day of packing. We loaded the luggage into the car before going for the walk. The weather broke as we were coming back from the river: thunder, lightning, and rain. It would be cooler for the drive. K spoke again of the intense physical sensitivity he was having—overly sensitive to touch, especially his head. "Something is happening," since the intense meditation three weeks earlier.

On August nineteenth, the alarm clock rang at 3:15 a.m. Krishnaji was already awake. Fosca made me a cup of her good, strong Italian coffee. She would stay to clean and close the chalet before returning to Florence. We said goodbye and were winding down the hill in the clear, clean night air by 4 a.m. The storm had changed the weather and had gone, but all day there was cloud cover shielding the sun and keeping it cool. We were on the autoroute when K, who lately had been a little uneasy in the car, said he would drive to settle down. He drove until we began the climb to Saint-Cergues and the border. It had calmed him, and we stopped at Lons-le-Saunier for croissants, hot from the oven at that early hour. We had these with our picnic breakfast at the roadside place of the last years, but it was rather cold, and K had seen an inn a mile back, so we went there for something hot—verveine tea for him and café au lait for me. Feeling better, we drove on through Chalons-sur-Saône, where we joined the autoroute. We reached Paris by 1:30 p.m. and once again ate our picnic lunch in the Bois, where we used to walk. A woman who appeared to be a prostitute stood on a corner, and when we drove past her, we were both shocked to see she had a misshapen face, that of a dwarf. "I feel as though she were my sister; what would I do if she were my sister?" By 2:30 p.m. we were at the Plaza Athénée.

We spent a quiet morning at the hotel before going near the Champs-Élysées to find a place that sold thin jeans, but the place was junky, crowded, and it all made K queasy—not good for him to be in such places in the state he was in. So we returned to that example of another style, the Plaza A, and had a slow, relaxed, and delicious lunch in the garden. After a leisurely departure for Le Havre, K drove for a while, which relaxed him further. Unfortunately, we passed a bad accident involving a car that had rushed past us earlier, but police were in charge, and we went on, reaching Le Havre and Monaco, the restaurant of past years. We dined, but K kept saying, "This is the last time here. After this we fly. No more driving." We took the Normandy ferry at 9 p.m. and had the usual cabins and a quiet crossing.

It was August twenty-first, 1974, and a gentle summer morning when we debarked early in Southampton. Mist was rising in the hollows. Krishnaji said, "You are back in your England again," and so I felt, smiling, and full of affection for that lovely countryside. As we drove up to Brockwood's front door, Dorothy was opening it, and we had breakfast together in the West Wing kitchen. Then we slowly unpacked and later had a walk in the late afternoon. Days of rest for K followed, the large tents were erected, and other preparations for the talks went on, and on the twenty-eighth, Mary Links came down for lunch and to talk to K. There were questions on his occult powers not dealt with in her biography. K described it as a faculty he could have but didn't choose to use: "Like reading other people's private letters." We went over with Mary questions on his citizenship application form. Later, George Digby signed the form, and later still, K signed it before a commissioner for oaths in Winchester.

The opening Brockwood talk was on Saturday, August thirty-first. The tent was full, and the weather was forbearing. Krishnaji ate lunch afterward in the food tent. This meant his standing up while bolder people came up to speak to him and others stared. On the next day, after the second talk, he again had fruit and salad upstairs in the kitchen and then went back to the tent for the main dish. On Tuesday there were gales and heavy showers, but he held the public discussion nevertheless and said afterward that it was a good one. There was continuing steady rain on Thursday, so we filled the tents with straw to sop up the mud and a good discussion was held. Two large beech trees were uprooted by gales, but the third talk was held on Saturday, and in the afternoon, undeterred by mud and heaving canvas as the wind tore at it, Lakshmi Shankar sang in honor of Krishnaji. The sun came out at last on Sunday for the final talk.

On September twelfth, we went to London, bought six detective books at Hatchards, and joined Mary for lunch at Fortnum. K questioned her on what Nitya was like and later said to me, "I was interested to see what the brother was like because the last few days it's been haunting me. Am I very polite? The last few nights I dreamt of him, a peculiar dream. He and I were talking, Rajagopal came in, and we pushed him. [Was it] a deep-rooted distress, or pain, or suffering, or a sense of fun?"

M: “Were the dreams painful?”

K: “Sometimes he’s on a train, I try to catch it and can’t, or he’s falling into a river, and I try to catch him and can’t.”

M: “What about fun?”

K: “Sometimes we’re laughing.” K told me to watch him “as I’m very far off.”

M: “When did this physical sensitivity come about?”

K: “Before Gstaad.”

M: “All of a sudden?”

K: “Slowly. It began with the head, of course, when we came back to Brockwood. Sometimes the sensitivity precedes the head pain; sometimes they go together.”

M: “Did you have it today in London?”

K: “I was lost.”

M: “And at lunch?”

K: “A little bit.”

M: “Did the haircut bother you?”

K: “Little bit. I told the barber to go slow.”

On the thirteenth Mr. Narasimhan flew to London from Paris after writing to the home secretary, Mr. Roy Jenkins, about Krishnaji’s application for British citizenship. He spoke to someone at the Home Office and telephoned K from the airport before flying to New York.

During the next five days, K held continuations of the Tannegg-Brockwood discussions begun in Gstaad. The German would-be school group attended and so did the Siddoo sisters. He met with the latter and Tapas, and they called their organization the Krishnamurti Education Centre. K was to be honorary chairman, J. Siddoo to be president, S. Siddoo vice president, and a Mr. Smith secretary-treasurer. I was asked to be on the board but suggested Erna instead. Its constitution was discussed.

On the twenty-third we lunched again with Mary at Fortnum. The subtitle of the biography was discussed. The tentative one was The Years of Unfolding, but K didn’t like the word “unfolding.” Afterward, we went to the dentist, Mr. Thompson, who had warned K that he might have more tooth troubles needing extraction. I was worried, and K was prepared, he said later, to have them all out in one terrible swoop that day. I waited outside and then was called in to help decide to pull one upper left molar, next to the eyetooth, which was infected. Yes, said K. So Novocain, X-rays, and a firm pull, a horrid noise, and it was out. I was again awed by K's hands—fingers outstretched and relaxed through it all. Mr. Thompson commented on the rarity of this—how it makes muscles relax. K then had to lie down for ten minutes after which he said he felt fine. One more tooth might have to go. It was raining, and the nice secretary helped me snare a cab to get K quickly to Waterloo. He didn't have to wait, and in the cab he said that he had told the body what it must prepare for if all the teeth were to come out. "I have trained it," he said. On the train we were able to get into an empty carriage. He looked perfectly well and read a detective story all the way back. I was glad when he was safely into bed and had his supper tray. I was suddenly very tired by 9 o'clock. He said I had suffered for him. Maybe, but I went to bed thankful it was over.

On September twenty-fifth K said the subtitle of the biography came to him in the night. It was The Years of Awakening. He was pleased, so was Mary, and so was the publisher, John Murray. K also said he had awakened at 4 a.m. "as though I was completely purged of everything. The mind was washed out, clean, and healthy, and much more than that, a tremendous sense of joy, ecstasy."

The school term began, and K talked to staff and students. On September thirtieth John McGreevy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation arrived to do a half-hour television recording of Krishnamurti to be part of a program entitled People of Our Time. He began filming the next day in the West Wing drawing room and walking on the lawn. It required K to speak on a subject for a specified number of minutes and also to do a voiceover audio recording of his reading passages from the Penguin Reader. K said he had never done that, but he tried it; he seemed to think his own words, which he hadn't read, were rather apt, and so it was easier. When he had to talk to the camera in a close-up, it was suggested he talk as if he were looking at a person. K said he didn't look directly at people when he talked, as it might be an intrusion; he didn't want to read their minds.

The filming continued for another day and a half. K was getting bored with it, but it seemed to have gone well, according to John McGreevy.

I had asked a Brockwood staff member, Harsh Tankha, to get for Krishnaji's room a good hi-fi system, and it was installed on October fourth to K's satisfaction. We played various records, including ones by Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli and Sviatoslav Richter. When I asked him what they were to him, after a pause, he said, "One has sun, the other snow."

October tenth took us to London, and after fittings and Fortnum lunch—ice cream! His face lit up when he ordered it. We bought some recordings for the new player and then to the dentist. Mr. Thompson said further extractions could wait until spring. A cable had come from Erna saying an agreement to settle the case was on its way for K's and my signature. "I feel nothing about this until we know the other side also has signed," he said. And then, “I don’t know why I’ve been dreaming for the last two days. Long ago and far away.”

A scientists’ conference with Krishnaji had been arranged, and David Bohm, as chairman, went over the agenda at the first meeting on October fourteenth. It was held in the West Wing drawing room with long tables set up in a rectangle. The participants were Dr. David Brett (physics), Dr. F.J. Capra (physics), Dr. Elizabeth Ferris (alternative medicine), Dr. Gordon Globus (psychiatry), Dr. Brian Goodwin (biological sciences), Dr. Julian Melzack (philosophy of science), Dr. Robin Munro (biophysics), also representing and reporting on the conference for the Canadian Broadcasting Corp., Dr. Karl Pribram (research in brain structure), Dr. David Shainberg (psychiatry), Dr. Montague Ullman (psychiatry), Dr. Sudarshan (physics) Prof. Maurice Wilkins (biophysics, DNA Nobel prize), Dr. David Bohm (theoretical physics), and Dr. Joe Zorski and Harsh Tankha (teachers at Brockwood in physics, chemistry, and math respectively). Present as observers were Saral Bohm, Dorothy Simmons, George Carnes, Ted Cartee, and Mary Zimbalist.

The general topic was “What Place Has Knowledge in the Transformation of Man and Society?” Each participant in turn gave a talk. K listened and occasionally asked questions. It wasn’t until the fifth day that K gave his talk and continued on the sixth day speaking of meditation, and after a discussion he spoke on death, which the group had asked him to address. The meeting ended on the nineteenth, and by the twentieth all were gone.

While this was going on, K received a letter from Enrique Biascoechea saying that he had lung cancer and was having chemotherapy. K immediately wrote to him. Also received were the papers on the settlement agreement, so on the twenty-second K and I went to London to have our signatures notarized. On the train coming back, he spoke of Mrs. Besant long ago telling him he was protected by two angels, but he mustn’t be too demanding of them. He said that the body must live much longer “because the brain is untouched. I see the body must be much more protected, more alone.”

The scientists who had met at Brockwood, had met with the students at the students’ request, and the students had told them that there was fear in the school. Dorothy was upset and depressed by this, and Krishnaji talked to the school about the whole question of fear. He also persuaded Dorothy into coming with us to Rome, and we flew there on October twenty-fifth. Dorothy went with Frances McCann to stay at a pensione, and K and I stayed with Vanda in her flat on Via Barnaba Oriani. K rested for the first few days and walked in the nearby Villa Glori, but on the thirtieth, he had a sore throat. A doctor examined him the next day and said he had viral laryngitis and prescribed a cortisone inhalation and aspirin. K did not look well and was to give a public talk the next day. I took his temperature at 7 that morning; it was 100 degrees F, and his throat was very sore. He also had a pain in his right ear. The talk was canceled for that day, but he forbade canceling the next one. He switched to homeopathic remedies, the ear pain disappeared, the throat pain lessened, but in the late afternoon his temperature was 101 degrees F. The fever dropped to 98 the next morning, and he was determined to speak the following day, though he had hardly any voice. Vanda and I were strongly against it, but he said, “The body is getting ready. It is my job.” In the morning, his temperature was unchanged but he was scarcely able to speak. Vanda and I continued to be opposed to his attempting speaking, but we remained silent to not influence, and it was his decision. He decided not to speak that day or the next and went to bed. Some of us went to the hall, where a recording of his third talk at Saanen on July twenty-fifth was played to the restless Roman audience who walked about, chatting and smoking.

On November fourth Dorothy heard from Montague that Enrique Biascoechea had died. K recoiled when I told him. He was surprised at how soon it had happened and kept thinking of Enrique. Dorothy returned to Brockwood.

The next day, a cable came from Erna saying that the settlement agreement in the lawsuit had been signed. At last this long matter seemed to be ending. K discussed what to do with the land, Arya Vihara, etcetera, at length with me so that I could bring his views back to the other trustees. He also, that day, did a filmed interview of questions put to him in Italian by a Dr. Modugno, answered by K in English.

The following day, November sixth, Krishnaji had a very serious talk with me. He said that I would be going to Ojai as his representative, that I must keep my mind open without personal opinions; I must be in relation to Krishnamurti a thousand miles away, have a feeling for it. Decisions would have to be made in a very non-personal way. I must have an alert, very quiet body capable of reception. He said Krishnamurti could not decide from India, that I must decide about what was right and then telegraph him. The whole body must be quiet all the time to know what was right. If I represent K, I could not allow other elements to enter consciousness. I must telegraph my arrival in New York and in Ojai. “K would be watching over.” I must train the body to be still, to sit for half an hour without moving for a feeling of quiet, and this was very serious.

The next morning, November seventh, Vanda and I drove with Krishnaji to Fiumicino airport. Frances McCann, who was also going to India, met us there. We watched K walk out across the tarmac and board the huge aircraft. Waiting for takeoff, we suddenly saw coming down the center of the terminal a parade of a very large carabiniere walking ahead of a very small Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, smiling coyly and carrying a large bouquet of flowers. Suitably pious and humble-looking devotees followed their master, and all headed out and across the field. We realized with hilarity they were on the same flight as K. It was only later that we heard what ensued. Krishnaji had the seat furthest forward; the Maharishi and devotee sat several rows back. A while after being airborne, the stewardess brought the flowers to K, who expressed thanks but gave them to her. In time, K had to walk down the aisle to the toilet, whereupon a devotee leapt up to give his seat to K. Politeness won for the moment, and the Maharishi said he was going to change the consciousness of India and invited K to go with him. It took some disentangling, but K escaped and regained his seat.

The following day, I flew to New York, and after talking to Erna in Ojai, I cabled Krishnaji in Delhi that the attorney general's representative, Mr. Tapper, had not yet signed the settlement agreement, but when he did, it would all be formalized in court.

I stayed with my brother when in New York, went to see my mother on Martha's Vineyard, and then flew to California on November twentieth. A cable came from K on November twenty-fifth in Benares saying all was well and that a letter was on its way. From then on, he wrote daily, posting letters when two pages were full. From Benares he went to Madras on December second. From there he wrote that he had seen Mr. Madhavachari and told him without mincing words about what he had done [in siding with Rajagopal in the lawsuit]; that he "cannot wash his hands of the business, it is immoral, not Brahmanical. One has to do penance to wipe all this before one dies."

On December twenty-sixth Evelyne Blau joined me in Malibu, and we drove to the Ventura County Courthouse, where we met Erna and Theo for the hearing on the settlement of the lawsuit. The presiding Judge Heaton met in chambers with the lawyers for both sides and Mr. Tapper of the attorney general's office. Then, in open court, Judge Heaton announced approval of the agreement and the closing of the case. After speaking by telephone to Rajagopal, his lawyer Mr. Christensen told us that keys to the buildings on McAndrew Road were to be had at a real estate office. We went there, but there were no keys and no telephone call had come. We went to Pine Cottage and Arya Vihara, where a caretaker refused us entry. We then left and telephoned Stanley Cohen, our lawyer. Later, after I was back in Malibu, Erna rang to say that the real estate office had the keys.

I wrote all this in full to Krishnaji. On December twenty-ninth, in Ojai, Erna, Theo, and I went through all three houses—Pine Cottage, Arya Vihara, and the office building, all empty of furniture except one table, a day bed, and a leather suitcase initialed KJN with the address Adyar, Madras, India. It was from the days when K shared clothing and possessions with his brother, Nitya, and combined both their initials.

It was a cold, clear, and marvelous day in Ojai with snow on Topa Topa and all the mountain range. I walked all around the Arya Vihara land and found higher up, among the avocado grove, a large majestic oak tree that seemed to reign over all that was there. After lunch, we went to the Oak Grove, talked at length, and I drove home.

So ended the year with the sense that Krishnaji had regained outward things that had been taken from him and been freed from the exploitation of those who had betrayed his trust.

CHAPTER 31

The year of 1975 began with Krishnaji in India, from where he wrote of daily happenings, and I reported back to him. At one point he wrote that the government was trying to appropriate Vasanta Vihar and asked if we could get a quitclaim from Rajagopal to the property. We had agreement from both lawyers involved to send a copy of the court agreement. Meanwhile, I saw to painting and basic furnishing of the cottage.

In Bombay, Krishnaji had a fever that prevented his talks on the eighteenth and nineteenth of January, but on February second he flew to Rome and I spoke to him at Vanda's. He said he was over the infection, his voice sounded well, and he was flying to Brockwood on the fourth. After four days there, he arrived in Los Angeles looking better than I had feared after the fever in Bombay and all the traveling since. We came back to Malibu and he had supper in bed, but, though tired and half-falling asleep, he wanted to go on talking and staying up. The next day he had meals on a tray, slept most of the morning, but after lunch he gave an account of events in India. He also said he had felt sick through most of his time there, never really over the flu he had in Rome in October. He had found India socially and politically in greater disturbance. He spent two hours talking to Mrs. Gandhi, felt sorry for her and the enormity of problems. There was conflict and indifference at Rajghat between students and teachers. Students walked out in the middle of one of his talks as a demonstration, not against him but against teachers. He met both sides and found much antagonism, but hoped that Ahalya Chari and Upasani would pull the place together. He also found deterioration at Rishi Valley and told Pupul Jayakar, Sunanda Patwardhan, Achyut Patwardhan, and Balasundaram that unless there were a change in the schools, they would "not see my face again." This had the effect of a bomb.

On February eleventh, a lovely clear day, with Krishnaji driving his green Mercedes, we went to Ojai, where we met Erna and Theo and went to the Oak Grove and adjoining land. K had forgotten how beautiful it was; he was surprised and very pleased. We then drove to Arya Vihara, and for the first time since 1966, K went through the house. In the west bedroom on the ground floor, he said, "My brother must have died here," and "Dr. Besant used this room." In the hall he said to me, "What quarrels went on here!" We walked through the orange grove to Pine Cottage, and K went through it and the office rapidly as though wanting to get away from something repellent. "I couldn't spend a night here. Too small and closed in. I have been spoiled by Brockwood and your house; I need space." We went to the Lilliefelts', and with them, Ruth and Albion, and later Mark Lee, we discussed everything at length. K thought that the land at the west end would be good for a school, but he asked if any of us wished him to try to get the Happy Valley land. None of us did; so it was to be the west end. We set dates for his talks in April in the Oak Grove. Coming home in the car, he said that he felt the houses were contaminated, but if he lived in the cottage, it would change.

The next day, we drove to Los Angeles and the office of Dr. Lailee Bakhtiar, where he had his first appointment and checkup. She said his blood pressure was 130/80 and there was excellent circulation in his extremities. He also had a cardiogram, and blood was taken for testing. While this was going on, I told her of his wish never to be in a hospital. She said she understood and respected that, and if ever he were ill, we would try to manage at home. Later, he told me he must never be given anesthesia that would make him unconscious—only local. "I might not come back," he said with a small laugh.

On the fourteenth we went again to Ojai, met the Lilliefelts, walked again in the Oak Grove, and spoke with an architect about having a school building nearby. K spoke of concentrating everything in the west end and keeping the McAndrew Road property private. He said that he didn't like the cottage or office building, and if he were to use Arya Vihara, it would have to be pulled down and begun all over again. But later, going home in the car, he spoke of trying the cottage and using it part time, but keeping Malibu as the main place.

Another day, he said he felt like saying something he didn't know how to tell me. It was a feeling recently, like one that he had years ago at Adyar, standing outside and looking up at their chambers before his brother had died. It was a feeling of emptiness, of no association at all. We unpacked two suitcases found at Arya Vihara—one a magnificent crocodile bag with his initials. It contained some kurtas and lots of socks. Some had JK woven in them, and one pair had the initials JKN. It was as if they had been left there years ago by his brother when they shared their clothing. The cupboard was lined in cedar and smelled cedar-y. K was interested in the clothing but wanted to give most of it away.

Erna telephoned that she had just discovered a land easement made by Rajagopal and the Vigevenos a few months earlier running between their land and Krotona, making that part of KFA land virtually unsalable.

Dr. Bakhtiar reported on results of K tests—all excellent. His lung X-ray showed all was clear but bore old scars, probably from his youth when he surmounted infections. His cardiogram was normal, as was blood count, blood sugar, kidneys, and liver. His only difficulty was allergy, for which she suggested remedies.

During these days, K rested and did most of his walking around the lawn. Movies took us to town occasionally. On February twenty-sixth, we drove to Ojai with a truck behind us carrying things for Pine Cottage. The Lilliefelts, Ruth, Albion, and Mark came to go over an article on the meaning and function of the school that K had written the day before. Erna stayed to lunch—a first meal in the cottage. Theo joined us, and K asked them, "What is the right thing for Maria about a place to live in Ojai?" I was a listener, not a participant, in this conversation, K silencing any comments. His feelings about the cottage were quite different that day. When we had arrived he had walked in and out and off among the trees. But during the meeting he kept looking at the room, exclaimed at the comfort of the chairs I had installed, and for the first time noticed the curtains recently hung. "The feeling is changing," he said. He mentioned it again on the way home and said "the body" was now feeling relaxed, sleeping was better, and meditation was coming again. It hadn't in India; the body was too tired.

On March third we drove to Ojai and moved into the cottage for the first time. On the way, with K driving, we stopped to buy a notebook as the sight of the bright yellow wildflowers along the beach road had made him feel like writing again. On arrival we took a walk up toward Thacher Road, and people passing in cars recognized him and smiled to see him there again. After supper, he seemed disoriented, had that look of listening to something. It had begun in the car, though he was driving, and by bedtime he looked as if he didn't know where he was. All was strange; he wanted me nearby, and I slept on the couch in the sitting room.

Before we left Ojai, Theo came over to tell me that he and Erna wanted to lend K their house if the cottage wasn't right. They came for lunch and there was a useful discussion of a center for several purposes. One was having a sort of retreat in which we would offer quiet and a chance for people to go into themselves, with K's teachings, on their own, with an absence of outside structure or program. At 4 p.m. we drove home to Malibu, and K discussed our redoing the cottage completely into a proper house.

Discussions continued in Malibu on the school, a center, the arrangements of buildings on the land, etcetera. Trustees and Mark Lee took part in this. K felt there was a need for a place where people could come to explore the teachings in their own lives during the months he was not there. To begin with, trustees should be available, not as interpreters, but to discuss and explore. Later I asked him if he thought them capable of that kind of discussion in his absence. "That's what I was trying to find out," he replied.

A second meeting was held, with architects also present, in which a master plan was discussed for the Oak Grove land. K had earlier dictated a memorandum on the quality of buildings, which would convey protection, security, space, and freedom. He spoke of a monastery he had seen outside Florence that was so much a part of the land that you did not see it until you were very close. It had quiet and dignity and was a sacred place. It was decided that there should be a maximum of only two students to a room. Later he warned Erna that he felt Rajagopal would try to prevent KFA from getting the balance of KW Inc. funds through K&R.

That night he didn't sleep well, so he stayed in bed the following day. We had supper, as usual, on trays. When a noisy western came on television, K's face changed, eyes became heavy-lidded, far-off. I felt the change, motioned to turn off the television, but he shook his head. "Do you feel it?" There was something electric close at hand. He didn't want to speak of it.

The next day, March fourteenth, he had slept well. The "something" had continued. At lunch he asked if I was keeping a record of these things. "You should keep a complete diary." I asked what relation there was between what had happened and the noisy television. He said that a movie rests and relaxes the mind, then the other comes. He used to go to movies deliberately for this rest. Later, we washed both cars. In the evening, he said, "It is still going on—I wonder why? Maybe because of the talks—I don't know, I don't ask."

On March seventeenth, in the afternoon, we flew to San Francisco. Alain Naudé met us and drove us to the Huntington Hotel. We had the same suite as on previous visits—quiet, dignified rooms. We went for a walk, bought some fruit, and Alain stayed for supper. K told Indian stories. Alain suggested that so much yoga might be making K over-sensitive, leading to his hay fever. The next day, the three of us went to Ghirardelli Square and had a Chinese lunch, which K liked. Alain took K back to the hotel for his rest while I shopped for groceries. Later, I walked Krishnaji to Mrs. Mathias's and did some more marketing while he visited her. She had become almost blind, and he put his hands on her head to help her eyes. He was walking up the block when I went back to meet him, and there was once again the extraordinary feeling of seeing him walking toward one—the whole meaning of the world seemed centered in that advancing grace. We walked six times around the small garden in the square in front of the hotel. In the evening he said that there was a great deal of evil in the world; then he added that he didn't like to use the word "evil." "Discord" was better. And it was caused by organized belief. "For instance, Christians say Jesus is the only one, our god is the only one. It excludes everything else."

In another conversation, he said, "Dogma always makes for division and therefore is evil." We spoke of killing, and he said that organized killing results from dogma. Christianity had resulted in organized killing. I spoke of human responses to things that intrude—insects, rats, etcetera. K said there was a difference; it was not organized killing, but done because they came into a place not theirs. I said they considered it theirs and if an intruder came, for instance, with a knife to attack him, I would do anything to defend him. He said the difference in that is a spontaneous reflex to protect. But killing a human being is still wrong and the destructive animal—the gopher, coyote, etcetera must not be allowed to destroy whatever it wants. He told of a fox he saw stalking chickens in Ojai; he watched it come slowly close then let out a great shout. The fox disappeared and never came again.

Dorothy and Montague had come to San Francisco for the talks and came over to the hotel with Erna and Theo. K had gone alone to Mrs. Mathias to treat her eyes. She lived across the square, and he came back carefully, crossing with the traffic light as he said he would. When with me, he wanted to cross anywhere. We all went again to Ghirardelli Square and had a Chinese lunch, then returned, and he rested before we walked down and back up the hill in the late afternoon. At supper there was the curious otherness in the room. To me it was like clear, invisible running water in the air. K noticed something in me and asked if I were upset about anything. I didn't try to say more than that I was fine because it was the night before his talk and silence seemed best.

On March twentieth K rested all day, and at 6 o'clock walked next door to give his first talk in the Masonic Hall. It was a good audience. He used a new word—the "scaffold" of the self. Afterward, he had to wait a little backstage to recover. Later, he said, "Knowledge is always the outer." The following day, we lunched with Mrs. Mathias. Though almost totally blind but knowing where everything was in her apartment, she moved about without hesitation. In talking, she looked at one as if she could see. Conversation went eventually to the Rajagopal case. She said many were hurt by K. He asked who. She said, "Well, I was." K explained that what he considered in this, as he had when he dissolved the Order of the Star, was what was the right thing to do. Mrs. Besant had been hurt, though she came to say, "If the World Teacher is doing this, it is right." K said that he had tried for years to get Rajagopal to inform him, consult him, etcetera, and that he had received either nothing or abuse. Were people hurt or was it their image of how things should be? K had me tell my conversation with Rajagopal in 1971 when he said that working together was a plot against him. I also told her about the conversation with Judge Kenny, who told us to go to the attorney general, who eventually said that Rajagopal must be pursued because of "grave impropriety with regard to a charitable trust" and directed us to commence litigation in which he would be co-plaintiff. I told her that K was not involved in this but was brought in when Rajagopal and his people countersued and served papers on K as he was about to give his first talk in Santa Monica. When we left, there was a tearing gale and rain. K was almost swept off his feet, we clung together and managed to go the two blocks to the Huntington, half-drenched and with an umbrella turned inside out. Later, Alain came to tea and stayed for supper.

On Saturday, March twenty-second, K gave a second talk in the Masonic Hall, a vivid, splendid one of tremendous vitality. I made lunch in our rooms, and he slept all afternoon. The third talk was on Sunday, and afterward Alain, the Simmonses, the Lilliefelts, Alan Kishbaugh, and Kathy Harris came to the hotel, and we all went to lunch together in Ghirardelli Square. K had no rest, as when we came back, he saw a Dr. Feldman from Argentina, who was interested but had never heard K speak until that day. On Monday we went again to Mrs. Mathias for tea. She said she "now knows us," but I wondered if it had made a difference.

The last talk was on Tuesday, March twenty-fifth, completing the series. Alain joined us for supper. We packed the following morning, and K went to give Mrs. Mathias one more treatment. I walked over to accompany him back, being still queasy at his crossing streets alone, then made lunch out of the remains of our larder, and Alain came to drive us to the airport.

It was good to be back in Malibu. Work done on the lawn, new shrubs, and orange trees looked at home. K said, "This is a nice house," and he was eager to see the barn owl, which looked down on us owlishly on arrival. Krishnaji seemed to like being there more so than in the past. Talk of selling and moving to Ojai had subsided.

Section Nine

After returning from San Francisco to Malibu on March twenty-first, 1975, within two days Erna telephoned that Mr. Cohen doubted that Rajagopal would listen to his lawyer about the easement on KFA land and wanted a meeting of all of us. That day at lunch Krishnaji said suddenly, "I realize now how they deliberately forced me to go to cheap places, to try to break my dignity. I had to go to those places where you eat in the car [drive-in restaurants], ride on buses. I didn't care, but that is what they tried." Then he said, "It is extraordinary, I feel such an energy. It must be having good food." So we went to town, did some errands, and he went to the dentist. Coming home, when we turned up the coast, the hills were very clear against the blue sky, and he said, "Look at those mountains. That is God."

On another trip to town, while he was again at the dentist, I went to get some special lined paper for his notebook. He had been wanting to start writing again. "Must I write every day?" Of course not, I said, only when you feel like it. "But I like to do it in an orderly way," he replied. When we came home, Erna telephoned that Barbara Lama, a stepdaughter to Albion Patterson, had been killed in a plane crash near Katmandu with Edmund Hillary's wife and daughter. I told this to K; he listened, and after a few minutes he asked me to repeat it. A little later, he said, "One shouldn't die violently. It is too much of a shock."

M: "Is it a shock to the one who dies?"

K: "Yes. It should be willingly, healthily."

M: "Few people die willingly."

K: "I'll talk to you about that another time."

But he went on to tell me of a time, years earlier, when Kitty Shiva Rao was with him on a flight from Delhi to Benares and the plane came into thick fog. Kitty, sitting beside him, became panicky, and K took hold of her hand, saying, "If we're going to die, we're going to die. Let's do it happily." She calmed down, but soon the plane lost altitude and she began to get hysterical. K spoke to her again, and then they came below the fog and landed.

On April first Krishnaji began to write again. He wasn't comfortable at the desk, so I arranged a folding table in front of his window. He said he wanted me to read what he wrote and to "correct it" without consulting him. There were only very minor bits of syntax that went wrong, because he probably didn't read what had gone before when he paused. I doubted that he reread any of it when he was through. He again began with descriptions of nature and then went to what he wanted to say. That day it was on space and division. In the evening, on the television news, there was such anguished suffering of refugees in Vietnam that K stopped me from watching, as I had wept so on another night.

The next day he wrote again in the morning, “the skill of intelligence is to put knowledge in its right place” and “intelligence comes out of the understanding of the whole consciousness of man—yourself,” and “freedom from the known, every minute, is the essence of intelligence.” He wrote this before a meeting with trustees, etcetera about the school. In the afternoon I went to meet Dorothy and Montague at the airport to bring them back to stay a few days at the house.

I had sent a formal letter to Rajagopal saying that K wished to see his archives. Erna telephoned that afternoon and read the reply to Stanley Cohen from R’s lawyer, Christensen, saying yes to seeing “books and manuscripts” but that letters and archive material were “not yet in order.”

In the morning, on April third, K said, “Something has been happening since that day in San Francisco. My head is almost to the point of bursting—full. All last night it went on and the night before—a tremendous attention inside the head, a physical feeling. It’s going on now.” (A far-off look on his face.) “All energy is concentrated there inside, in eyes, head.” After doing his third notebook piece, he stayed in bed all morning reading a book about whales and dolphins but got up for lunch with the Simmonses. Afterward, we listened to a recording of the singing of humpback whales.

On Saturday, April fifth, we took Dorothy and Montague to Ojai, K driving part of the way. We went first to the flat in the building next to Pine Cottage, where they were to stay, and then to the Lilliefelts’ for lunch. Erna had telephoned Rajagopal to confirm the appointment to see archives. Rajagopal had sent his reply through his lawyer—“as Mrs. Zimbalist is represented by counsel”—but this time he had been unable to speak immediately and had to call back (after fixing a tape recorder? as we inevitably wondered). He wanted to know who was coming. Erna replied she hadn’t asked K, but it would probably be K, MZ, and herself. Afterward, we speculated about Rajagopal setting out to try to upset K before his talks. I suggested he postpone his visit and only Erna, Theo, and I go the first time. K was to decide.

On the seventh, K and I stayed in Pine Cottage. He again wanted me nearby, and I slept in the sitting room. In the morning, I went with Erna and Theo to talk to Mr. Cohen about the easements Rajagopal had given himself and the Vigevenos in 1974 over the land that had now become KFA’s. These easements would stay in effect indefinitely and prevent KFA’s use of the land. We agreed that we did not want, as we could, to reopen the case on the basis of fraud but to first put it to Mr. Tapper of the attorney general’s office, as this represented a dissipation of charitable assets to private persons and was self-serving. If nothing came of this, we could start a separate motion to right an illegality. Mr. Cohen felt it was good that we exercise our rights under the settlement agreement, which would occur in the next day’s archive visit, and we should keep a record of any noncompliance by Rajagopal. When we got back, Krishnaji had decided he would go to that meeting. He had spent the morning writing in his notebook.

On Wednesday, April ninth, K, Erna, Theo, and I went at 11 a.m. to the K&R office to see the archives. Rajagopal met us and sat at a table in the greenish, prison-like office. K sat behind and slightly apart, and did not look at Rajagopal after the initial greeting, Indian-style. Rajagopal had an angry, simian look, the glare of the disturbed. He talked resentfully for forty minutes. Why did we want to see certain things? The case was over, but he had been held up to vilification all over the world; he was friendly, but we were not—I had refused to talk to him on the telephone; he couldn't say when the archives would be ready; he was very busy; why did we want to see archive material edited by Mima Porter? He said there were no manuscripts left over from the Commentaries; said all archives had been turned over to K&R; said a large shipment of archive material, shipped from Holland by Folkersma at the start of World War II was lost; that Jinarajadasa had agreed to send him letters that were in the TS but never did. He wanted to go into our archives since we could go into his. He went on and on, mentioned the Indian case still pending. Neither Erna nor I said the obvious, as the purpose of all this seemed to be to talk endlessly and show us nothing. He kept making references to K, who spoke not a word until Rajagopal said he had once had friendly relations with K "but now he won't speak." Then K stood up, looking very tall and rather tense and aloof and said, "I will speak. If you want that friendship, you will resign from everything and do penance. That is all I have to say." He crossed the room and went out the door. Somehow everyone was standing; Erna, Theo, and I stayed. "What did he mean?" asked Rajagopal angrily. We said he had heard what K said; we weren't there to explain or interpret, we were there to see archives. He started to say something like "it is all off," and I said, "Are you refusing to show us archives? We are here for a very simple physical thing—to begin to see the archives." Angrily, reluctantly, hit by what K had said, he opened a couple of file drawers. They contained thorough, well-kept files, transcripts of discussions. He seemed to turn to showing things as an escape from K's statement and, as if dealing with a sick person, we showed admiration for the way things were kept. We then were let into a back room of book stacks from all over in various languages. We asked for what K had requested: Mrs. Besant's letters to K as a boy, and he even offered to photocopy them for us. Then there were albums of photographs, tiny wonderful pictures of K and Nitya as children. R denied having letters between Mrs. Besant and Leadbeater about "the boy." Erna during this was laying bases for future visits. Earlier, Rajagopal had claimed archive material was given to him personally, which we thought might result in much being in Rajagopal's own vault in his house. He claimed that day that all archives were in the K&R office.

We left and met K down the road; he had been in the Oak Grove. Our first comments were that Rajagopal was a sick personality. Theo felt sorry for him and later at lunch said he wanted to go to see him to point out what his resigning would do. K enlarged to us that Rajagopal's resigning would be the penance. Theo telephoned a number of times, always getting a busy signal, and finally reached Rajagopal, went to see him, received a diatribe, and left. K wanted Erna to tell Rajagopal that he—K—wished to come to see certain things without Rajagopal being there.

During the rest of that day, K did a videotaped interview on school plans and education for the local station; Dorothy came with us on a three-mile walk. Mark Lee said Rosalind had telephoned, and when asked about rugs that K said should be at Arya Vihara, as they were given to him, she said they had been stolen, and she was sorry K thought she was a thief. She said they were stolen from Arya Vihara. Theo said the reporting of the theft gave the place as Upper Ojai, which meant she took them with her when she moved.

A disagreeable letter to K came from James Vigeveno. K wanted it answered, so I drafted a reply, though feeling it was not worth answering. K also again wanted Erna to telephone Rajagopal that K wished to see archives without Rajagopal being there. He did not want to even see or speak to Rajagopal. Erna felt it preferable to delay the call until after the coming weekend of the talks. Reg and Mavis Bennett arrived from Australia, and it was a pleasure to see them again.

Saturday, April twelfth, was a cloudless day with warm sun but a frosting of snow still on Topa Topa. In the green Mercedes, we drove to the Oak Grove, where, at 11, Krishnaji gave his first talk there since the autumn of 1966. There were many people, many children, and many dogs. It was profoundly good to see him once more in his own place. Afterward, he walked down the road a bit until I could catch up with the car. He said he liked talking in the Grove but had no familiar feeling about it. We had lunch in the cottage, and he agreed with Erna and me to ignore the Vigeveno letter. Erna telephoned Rajagopal to say that K wanted to come to see the archives we had seen, the Besant letters, photographs, and also Pupul Jayakar's account of what had happened to K in Ootacamund in 1947 or 48. This was something she wrote for Rajagopal, and he had not let her keep a copy. At first Rajagopal said he didn't have that—then, well, he couldn't remember, then Tuesday was not convenient for him, and he hung up. Erna rang back and said they must have been cut off and that it wasn't necessary for him to be there. He got very angry and said it was a personal thing with him and he had to be there. "Supervision is not required," said Erna. "I will be the judge of that, you must write and give me time to think about it," he said.

Erna: "We are giving you notice now."

R: "You can't come Tuesday."

Erna: " You are refusing?"

R: "You can bring a sheriff and break down the door." And then he hung up. A footnote was Al Blackburn saying that the Vigevenos were more antagonistic than ever.

The following day, Sunday, April thirteenth, K gave a magnificent and powerful talk, number two in the Oak Grove. Among other things, he spoke of the difference between reality and truth. Reality is of the mind and thought; truth cannot be touched by either. He came back to the car saying, "That talk exhausted me," as well it might. Later, he said jokingly, "In the old days, they would have said, 'The Lord spoke today.'" He wanted to eat on the hill where the Hookers, at his request, were putting on an inexpensive vegetarian lunch. He sat a long time in the car before we walked over there. Later, after a nap, he saw the two Siddoo sisters. They were planning to open their school on Vancouver Island in the autumn of 1976. We walked to the Lilliefelts' for tea; Erna had sent a letter via Byron Casselberry, to Rajagopal saying that we were coming on Tuesday to see archives and did not want supervision.

The Monday was all gray skies and drippy rain. K wrote in the morning and gave a taped interview to Donald Ingram Smith for Australian Broadcasting. Mr. and Mrs. Kornfeld saw K afterward and, while waiting to see him, talked to me about his being filmed. At supper he asked about a magazine, Ananda, that Tapas had sent him. I read him parts of an article in it by E.A. Wodehouse about George Arundale, criticizing him for carrying on ceremonies in Benares in 1929 when Mrs. Besant had asked K to preside at the TS congress in her absence. Out of politeness to him and his views, she had decreed no ceremonies. K remembered it vaguely and smiled. He said Wodehouse wrote very well but gradually died of laziness. He looked at the magazine. "We were all very young then." He said that some of all this should be put together in a book. I read him another chapter on Hindu versions of the Lord Maitreya. It said that Maitreya was foretold by Gautama to refuse Buddhahood until humanity was enlightened. I asked him, "Will you become a Buddha?" "You mustn't ask that," he said. "It doesn't work that way; those people made it all into a hierarchical affair."

On Tuesday, April fifteenth, Krishnaji, Erna, Theo, and I went at 11 to the K&R office. Rajagopal was there and so was Austin Bee, who was seated at a desk and never rose or gave more than a glance. We went in the back office, the safe was open, and there were some things we had asked to see. Rajagopal stood there, and Erna said we wished to look at things in private. He bristled—"This is my office," but finally went out, refusing to close the door and saying he probably didn't have to mention it but things couldn't be taken out. Erna and I just looked at him, and he went away. K felt pain in his stomach from the violence of Rajagopal. I got him to sit down and went through photograph albums with him, pictures in 1913 and 1914 in Taormina and Cornwall, and very early ones in 1909. There were many more that K looked at, but Erna handed me five pages to read, handwritten by Pupul Jayakar, describing the events in June 1948 in Ootacamund, when K was "off," in great pain, saying, "They have burnt me so there can be more emptiness"; of being so close to death but not wishing it "as there is so much to be done"; of something happening on the walk but not being able to remember it; of fearing that pieces of him were left on the road; and of a great power filling him. It was overwhelming to read. We were to ask R for a photocopy, but, to be sure of having the text, I read it quietly to Erna, who took it down in shorthand. K by then had finished looking at the photographs and wanted to leave. He did so and walked down the road while Erna and I gave Rajagopal a list of things we would like copied. There was back-and-forth on his copying versus our taking them to be copied. We suggested that Erna and Byron Casselberry go together to the photocopier, but apparently he didn't trust Casselberry either, as he preferred to copy them himself. There were questions to me on when we were leaving, was Erna going too? We left.

Being firm had been the effective move that day. We came back to the cottage for lunch. K asked how those people's minds possibly worked. Austin Bee, for instance, with his rudeness.

That afternoon there was a meeting on the schools with K, the Lilliefelts, Ruth, Albion, the Lees, the Simmonses, and the Siddoos. K went into relations with parents, participation of trustees, etcetera. It lasted until after 6. He still had pain in his stomach from the morning, but a simple soup made it better.

It was cold in the Oak Grove the next day when K held a public discussion on education. Questions were not to the point, but, as always, he drew them into a whole. He wanted to sit quietly in the car afterward and have me do the marketing, so we had a late lunch. He slept afterward, and we took a long walk with Erna and Theo. During supper he looked back at the years in Ojai and said he could have been killed or injured on his long climbs in the mountains, but "they" [Rajagopal and Rosalind] didn't think of it or care. He said he used to like to drive around Santa Paula to Ventura and back, about fifty miles. He said he used to go alone to places like Cleveland, Toledo, and Seattle to talk. Somebody must have bought the ticket, but then he went. Maybe Jadu was there. He told of staying with Theosophists in New Zealand, who washed all the dishes in a pan but didn't rinse them. This so appalled him that he told them he was very good at washing up and could he do it? "If you insist," they said. "So I got two pans. They were nice people and caught on."

There was a trustee meeting, and it was decided to go ahead with one building on the Oak Grove land without waiting for a donation drive. K wanted to get going there, and also he wanted to redo the cottage, to which I agreed. We talked about how to arrange it into two bedrooms with two bathrooms and to keep his front sitting room, which he said was a good place to write. On the north side we would have a new wing with a living room, kitchen, and dining space, a guest lavatory, and a small office.

A letter came from Nelly Digby saying that Mrs. Bindley, alone in her house, fell on the stairs and broke her femur. Poor lady—she was discovered the next morning lying at the foot of the stairs. Distressing news.

It was a lovely day for the third talk. Driving through the valley, the beauty of the morning, of the earth in all its faces, of other mornings driving with Krishnaji was a radiance of Ojai, Malibu, Hampshire, France, and Switzerland; a shine of beauty everywhere. The talk was on the meaning of time, suffering, and death; a talk that washed the mind clean. There were many people and those immediately around him appeared hypnotized. We sat in the car about ten minutes before K felt like moving.

It was another cloudless morning with a rising scent of orange blossoms on April twentieth as K gave his fourth talk in the Grove on the religious life. To be psychologically nothing. Afterward, he stood for a while by the car, Alan Kishbaugh standing guard and walking him through the crowd. After lunch, K rested a little, saw some people, and went briefly to a tea party at Arya Vihara. After supper, he went there in his dressing gown to say goodbye to Reg and Mavis Bennett, who were returning to Australia.

The following day, April twenty-first, we packed, the cottage was put in order, and K, Erna, Theo, and I went to the K&R office at 11 a.m. K remained in the car, but we went in as Rajagopal opened the door. Austin Bee, at the typewriter, looked up, and this time I made him reply by saying, "Good morning, Mr. Bee." Erna did the same and he muttered a good morning without rising. Rajagopal said, "Isn't Krishnaji with you?" I said he would remain in the car and would like to see the manuscript of the Commentaries there. "I haven't got them," said Rajagopal. "I think they were destroyed." We stared at him in shock. I said did he mean that he had destroyed K's original manuscript, written in his own hand? He said it had been published, that was their custom, and he wasn't sure what had happened. I said he kept very orderly records—how could he not be sure what had happened to such an important archive? He said he didn't wish to answer questions, we had come without friendly spirits, with all sorts of interpretations of the agreement; the court would have to settle it or we could bring the sheriff; there were things that had to be settled about Harper and Row. This was a reference to their putting KFA as the entity to be written to in a new edition of the books. He implied that K had broken the agreement by telling him to resign. I said that we had shown considerable politeness and forbearance in the face of his tirades, which he had offered instead of our seeing anything. The word "forbearance" apparently registered. We said that he had repeatedly jibed at K for not speaking to him and that finally, when he did it again, K had said, "I will speak," and that if Rajagopal really wanted to be in their old state of friendship he must resign and do penance. I said that K now wished me to tell him that, until he renounced everything and established a relationship with K that was not based only on the legal settlement, K did not wish to see him. And that if he had anything to say to K, to write to him directly and not through other people like the Vigevenos. By this time, Rajagopal was so angry that I couldn't tell what he took in. He started to say, "This is my house—"

"House?" said Erna. "Office."

He caught himself. We said it was the K&R office and under the agreement we had the right to come there and to see the archives. He implied we had seen the archives—he decided what was archive material. Erna said that so far we had not seen anything in Krishnamurti's hand; where were other manuscripts? He said, "You have the manuscript" [meaning the one that became Krishnamurti's Notebook]. We asked if he meant he had nothing else, and he said he would say nothing more and wouldn't answer questions. I said he was both refusing to show us things or to answer questions. Erna turned to Bee and said, "You are a trustee. Do you concur in this?" Bee replied, "Whatever Mr. Rajagopal says, I agree."

Erna: "And the other trustees?"

Bee: "They agree with Mr. Rajagopal."

Rajagopal had typewritten transcripts of the Commentaries, which of course were not what we had asked for, and other material for which he wanted signed acknowledgements from K and Erna. We refused for K, and Erna signed for herself. Rajagopal said his lawyer had told him to make these available and he was doing so as a favor to K. He said we should leave and he would not speak further. Somewhere in this I said that we had no wish to discuss anything with him and had wanted to see certain things without his supervision. This, he said angrily, he would not allow. We left in a blast of his anger and semi-hysteria. His rages were like tantrums. All this took place in about fifteen minutes. We found K down the hill and went back to the cottage to collectively try to remember all that was said. Erna made notes and we telephoned Stanley Cohen. He agreed that Rajagopal deciding what constitutes archives was untenable and he would begin by telephoning Christensen.

Dorothy and Montague left for Los Angeles and a flight back to England. K and I left for Malibu but stopped in Oxnard to look at a suggested car for me. At that point we were using K's green Mercedes, but I needed a car for my own and everyday use. A large station wagon was tried and was just what I didn't want. K's interest in cars was engaged, and he went and talked at length with Dieter, the car man. He came back looking quite pleased and said he knew just what I should get—a diesel Mercedes. Not another Mercedes! All that was needed was an economical, small car that could carry things, a Volkswagen, but K felt it was unsafe for either of us to go about in too small a car, and the excellence of Mercedes was firm in his mind. We put off further car talk, and he took the wheel for the coast road to Malibu.

While driving, he asked me if I was too tired for a question. I said I was tired only of the car question. He then asked me if anything had happened to me in the preceding two weeks—was I changed in some way? I asked what he meant—what was he asking about? And I went over various things that had happened from my point of view: firstly that the Rajagopal matter, though unpleasant (and here K apologized for my being subjected to it) didn't really bother me. He said, "I could see something must have happened when you came out, but you hadn't reacted." There had been some behavior on the part of Al Blackburn, but that wasn't to me worth talking about. But his talks had had an extra stretch of something in the Grove—something in them seemed to open up in his words, and I had felt that. The school seemed to be rising, and things were beginning to happen. Staying in the cottage I had liked, and I explained that I reacted to places, to their beauty and character, more than to the people around. He listened to all this but said he felt there was more. Something had happened to him. "I haven't been tired—an added vitality," and that he felt something I was perhaps not aware of had happened to me. I said that what had meant most to me in his talks was his speaking of nothingness. "That's it!" he said. "Now we won't talk about it for the moment." But he went on to say that we must make a change, have more leisure and quiet. So we came home to Malibu, the new grass had taken root, the flowers were bright, and the ocean murmured.

Krishnaji rested the next day and was reading the book on whales—their enormous brains, and the fact that, until man, they had been menaced by nothing—and it had made him see something. He called me in and asked me to remind him to tell the others that "the school must provide security to the students—a vast protection in depth." Then he added, "That's what they did with me until those two monsters came along." A letter had come from Anneke, enclosing a copy of one she had written to Rosalind. It was full of friendship and warmth but also put a few home truths. K thought it good enough but said she didn't realize it would be ignored. To me, though I understood Anneke's fondness for the past and her wish to find good in old friends, all that was washed away by the evil that had been done to K. I said that though I did not hate or wish ill to them, there could never be a question of affection. It would be hypocritical to say otherwise. So we got out the Oxford Dictionary and looked up "affection." In the end, Krishnaji said what he meant was "compassion," and that I understood.

On April twenty-eighth, 1975, Krishnaji and I flew to New York, where we again stayed in the Ritz Tower in what had been my father's apartment. The next day, we went to the Carnegie Endowment Institute, where Dr. David Shainberg had assembled about two dozen psychiatrists, psychologists, and social workers to meet Krishnamurti and talk with him. The very first question raised was on fear. Krishnaji immediately went beyond theories and specific fears to examine and ask what was fear itself, its central root? Was thinking a central cause? One questioner said thinking is how we master fear and cope with it. K suggested that without understanding the nature of thought one couldn't understand fear. Some thought fear was helpful—i.e., about danger. K asked if that was fear, and also asked could we not be totally free of fear? He said that self-preservation in the face of danger was not fear. Someone raised fear of the atom bomb. K asked, what could one do as an individual against a monstrous system, and what was the good of being frightened? What was one to do? Could human consciousness be affected—not consciousness of India or America, but human consciousness? He said it could be affected very deeply. "If my consciousness is transformed, it will affect world consciousness." Someone spoke of helping others, and K said, "I wonder if I can help another," and asked, what was desire to help, what was the motive? He was asked if it were possible to be free of fear. He said that, for him, yes, it was possible. To do that, it was necessary to go into deeper levels and find what is fear. One questioner said he worried about being free of fear because fear was the start of evolution. K said there was no evolution; in becoming, there is uncertainty, insecurity. "I question the whole idea of 'me' evolving." It wasn't a process that involved time, distance, length, volume. He went into concepts, abstractions. The word was "wastage" of energy. He said that where there was choice there was no freedom. He questioned that anyone was an individual. Someone brought up mysticism, and K said that in describing a thing as mystic you are putting it away, out the window. "Time was necessary to grow," someone said, and K said, "I question that."

K spoke of energy when there is no choice, but only awareness. The "how to do it" is the eternal question and that implies time, conformity, authority—all denying freedom. He went into images, experience (projection). He said, "There are no truthful answers to a hypothetical question." A man said that K didn't read books, but why did he write them?

Why didn't Buddha [do so], call it quits, and leave the world? K replied, "Tradition says when a man reaches the highest he is concerned with humanity. Out of love he teaches."

Questioner: "Why do you talk, write, have foundations, etcetera? Is it with hope someone might hear you?"

K: "That's it."

Questioner: "What are the chances someone might hear?"

K: "I don't care."

Questioner: "But you are interested in humanity."

K: "I put my heart into it. If mankind is transformed, they could lead a different life. If they don't want it, what can I do?"

He went on to tell the story of the young robbers covering their ears as they passed a teacher talking of goodness. The youngest trod on a thorn and accidentally heard, "Be good, don't rob," and thereafter was changed. One therapist said he loved to help. K said, "If you love, you will find a way. Then everything will come right."

That evening we watched on television the ending of the Vietnamese war as the U.S. completed the evacuation of encircled Saigon. The long and wretched U.S. involvement was over. The next morning, though he had not slept too well, he spoke of "ecstatic energy in my head" and said he had never had it before.

He certainly gave outward signs of extraordinary energy in the second session of the psychotherapist meeting. It was a continuation of the previous day and began with the question: Can thinking know when thought is relevant? K asked, what was relevance? Reality was that which you think about; was truth to be thought about? He said there was knowledge, reality, and truth. Truth had nothing to do with the real; was there action not based on knowledge? He said that all our actions were based on concepts projected by thought, and therefore all action is non-action. He asked if there was an action, which was not analytical but perceptual, not acting according to conclusions. And he asked if they saw that analysis was not whole. He spoke of Vietnam and asked, "How do we observe it? If you are not different from it, you are responsible for it. As long as I remain a Hindu, I create war. When there is division, there must be conflict, as long as I have a formula, a belief, I create division. The negation of division in me is whole action." Then he questioned there being such a thing as psychological security. We need physical security, but because we seek psychological security, we invest it in things—my house, my wife, etcetera. "I seek psychological security in another and find it in an image I have created about that person. I question there is any security for 'the me.'" One questioner said, "We reinforce what the patient brings in." Another disagreed and said, "Eventually, we negate the divisions." K then said that brought in time. "Discarding means negating now, not in the future."

Someone asked if growing wasn't in time, and K asked if there was psychological growth for "the me." A questioner said yes. K asked, "What is 'the me'? A word, a conditioning." Someone asked about the role of emotion in wholeness, and K asked why one separated feeling from thinking. "Don't they all belong to the field of thought? Can you separate the moment from the past or future? Who is this entity we wrangle with until we find it is created by thought and therefore not truth?"

A questioner said, "You are challenging some bases of our work. Gestalt says pretty much the same thing. If we can apply what you say, we can help our patients to this wholeness." K then said, "In dialogue both you and the patient see that neither is whole and, in that, there is no longer the analyzer. Neither understands the whole, but because both are really serious, something is seen. So is there a 'me' at all?"

Later, he asked, "Is there action which is not me acting? As long as a 'me' is becoming something, there is no security. Becoming is insecurity. See that there is no security in the idea of 'me'; the 'me' is nothing. If there is nothing of the 'me'—that is security. In nothing there is security. It is the psychological search for security in the 'me' that creates division, which prevents security for mankind." And later still he asked, "Is there a 'me' in truth? In reality there is, but in the knowing of the self there is no 'me' at all."

The next day, May first, we took an evening flight on Air India to London, arriving the morning afterward to a warm welcome from Brockwood. The new assembly room had been completed and was found handsome. Krishnaji spoke to the school there for the first time four days later. He was relaxed and pleased to be at Brockwood again and to be able to walk across the fields in the afternoons. I found him sorting out some of his things and standing in his toweling bathrobe, wearing a black woolen hat Fosca had crocheted for him. "This is my life style!" he said, laughing. Later, in Dorothy's office he said, "Look, the spirits are after it!" Outside the window, the head of a broom was waving back and forth eerily in the wind. He laughed as no one else could laugh—all laughter and merriment.

On May ninth Mary and Joe came for lunch, and she gave K the first and only copy at that point of the biography Krishnamurti—The Years of Awakening. On the dust jacket was the upper part of the photograph of him taken in front of the Gobelins tapestry at Eerde. I read all afternoon while K slept, and then we went for a walk and talked about the book. He asked, if it would really interest people, what would they make of it? I said that in the first part, which was all I had read so far, there might be inevitable questions about Theosophy and masters: If masters existed, why all those communications from them were reported then and nothing since. K said, "It is simple; the Lord is here."

I asked, "Do you mean that those communications were necessary to prepare for that?"

K replied, "Obviously," and then added, "I just thought of it."

I then asked what was one of the don't-answer-me-if-it-is-a-wrong-question categories: "Am I being dense or insensitive not to perceive such things, or am I simply not being spoken to?"

He replied, "You are doing what you should—looking after K. There may be no need to communicate. You have been with me how long? You are perhaps used to certain things."

I began to tell him of the account in the book of the curiously full reporting by the young K of his "initiation"—so unlike his descriptions later, but Dorothy came along the lane to join us, and the conversation about the book ended. K did speak about wanting me to attend school meetings, which I was not doing because of Dorothy's reluctance—embarrassment, she called it. But when he told her he wanted it, she of course accepted nicely and with a bit of humor.

The next morning, I put the biography beside his breakfast tray. He said he wasn't going to read it, but I thought he might read parts of it, and so he did, starting with the discovery of the boy. He asked how far I had read in the night, which was up to 1920, and how it seemed. I said that so far the mystery of his becoming what he grew up to be was deepened by the book. Working from his letters to her mother's and the latter's diary, Mary drew a picture of an entirely immature, partly Victorian child, surrounded by jealous and competing friends. So much talk of love seemed childish and unreal. His endless letters to Lady Emily seemed odd. "I write to you every day," said K. Hardly in the same vein, I pointed out: not "dearest Mummy." K said the boy was not conditioned, that he was fed all the TS stories, but it was superficial; it went into his head and out. If he had been conditioned, he said, he would have gone on in the TS way. I pointed out that many people had changed belief or views, but he said this had been different: he was empty, moronic. What made him awaken? He said he thought that slowly, drop by drop, he was awakening, changing, that there had been no real conditioning. He was untouched, and the very slow maturing was important; care of the body was important. "I have right food and all that. I may live to be a hundred. We'll celebrate that instead of eighty," [his birthday being two days later]. I went later to a staff meeting for the first time.

The next night, I read until I finished the biography, moved to tears by what he went through, the extraordinary fact of his enduring all that early time, the chicanery and pretentiousness of so many of the people around him, and his becoming all that emerged. Or was it there always, dormant, slowly growing like a delicate plant in him until it, or he, was ripe? It was midnight when I finished, and I realized it was almost exactly eighty years since that child was born in the small house in Madanapalle. The story, or perhaps Mary's telling of it, made it seem very close, not long ago. His brother Nitya seemed someone I knew then, not decades in the past. It was an odd sense of knowing something from very deep in the subconscious, and what moved me most at that moment was "that boy's"—K's—tremendous optimism, enthusiasm. At eighty, he shone with it even more than when he was quite young, but then he was always younger in spirit than anyone, young in a radiant way.

On his eightieth birthday, he waved aside all greetings and said, “I think I will live another twenty years, and then you can celebrate.” I said I would hold him to it, but who would push my wheelchair to the celebration? He said the body should last because it was looked after, because there was someone who cared who looked after him. Someone who didn’t want something. Later in the day, Dr. T. K. Parchure arrived from India. It was his first visit.

The next day, we went by train to London and, in the pleasant groove of things, went straight to Huntsman, where K disappeared in the fitting room and I read Country Life until he reappeared. Some patterns [samples of material] were looked at, and then we walked to Fortnum to meet Mary for lunch. We talked all the way through about the biography, which K was reading in pickings. He was pleased by it and showed that he was to Mary. I gave her a copy of the notes Erna had taken of Pupul Jayakar’s account in the Ojai archives of the 1948 events in Ootacamund.

Back at Brockwood, there was a review between K, Dr. Parchure, and me of K’s health matters. K had asked Dr. P to be with him as much as possible and look after his health. In the meantime, Doris Pratt had read the biography and asked K heatedly why he had had to suffer so and did we all have to go through that? He replied that to come upon something new, to discover, one person had gone through it in order to be able to point [it] out to others.

On the eighteenth, after talking to the school, K did a taped discussion with David Bohm on what was reality and what was truth. He was enthusiastic and wanted to continue such discussions each weekend. He was also continuing to read the biography each morning, and his liking for it was growing. Of Mary, he said, “She must have worked very hard.” Mary’s meticulous research had made her ask Doris to look up an old book of records she had kept in 1961 showing where K was and what were the references in the beginning of his Notebook manuscript. In it, he spoke of going to an airport, others noticing something, etcetera. The airport was London, and the others were Mrs. Bindley; Doris herself, who had forgotten; and Anneke Korndorffer. K himself remembered nothing of it.

May twenty-first was a warm summer’s day. I made a picnic lunch, and we drove through lovely countryside, smelling of sun, fertilizer, and growing things—a delight for me. Less lovely but familiar to K was Wimbledon Common, where we had our picnic sitting on a bench under trees. K looked as young as when he walked there fifty years before and lived at West Side House with Miss Dodge. We went on to Putney Hospital, where Mrs. Bindley had been since she fell on the stairs in her London house a month before, broke her hip, and had lain on the floor all night until the cleaning woman came in the morning. Her hip had been operated upon, and she was convalescent. She was asleep when we came in. I took her hand and told her quietly that Krishnaji had come to see her. In her sleep, she said, “Lovely, lovely, lovely,” touchingly responding to the words she must have understood subconsciously. K took her other hand and looked at me with distress, wondering if she were perhaps only half-conscious, but then she woke up and was her old bright self, delighted to see him, eager with questions, and banging her hearing aid to make it work. We told her a little about the Ojai school plans, the visits to the archives, and meetings with Rajagopal. She said she would be going home as soon as her son could find someone to care for her. We left, K saying we would come to see her there. “I would rather die quietly than be put in a hospital,” he said when we were outside. It had been a considerable thing for him to have gone to this one, and it was a convalescent hospital and relatively less distressing, but his feeling was keen.

K had told Dr. Parchure that I must outlive him. When I asked him why, he dismissed it with, “You know very well why.” Dr. P told him what he was trying to do to my leg in massage to help the blocked circulation. It was helping but differed from what K did, which was to heal. Dr. P had hearing difficulty, and K treated his ears and told him not to think of his hands, or a cure, not to want something, just to be quiet and open. Then perhaps something could get through. K told him that his own energy was not depleted when it went to someone this way.

Amanda Pallant, back from Rome, said that Vanda had been struck by a car in Florence, was bruised but all right. On being telephoned, she characteristically said it was nothing. K spoke to her, getting almost no information. David Bohm came for the weekend and did a two-hour dialogue with K, continuing the subject of truth and reality. Dr. P. participated a little. Dorothy, Saral, and I were present. K spoke again to the school the next day, perhaps a bit over their heads, but it was very interesting. On thought: Is there thought without word or image? To see something is true is an action outside of thought. When I brought K his supper tray, he said cheerfully that he had a message for me from the Great White Brotherhood, thanking me for looking after him, but I mustn’t spoil him. He spoke again to the school a few days later and said afterward, “I will teach them in spite of themselves.”

There was another lunch at Fortnum with Mary and Joe, in which Joe asked K about Theosophist beliefs in masters and “that Scots one” [Maha Chohan]. It could be difficult, listening to K, not to think he put credence in their existence, though he did not say so.

On June sixth there was a scientists’ meeting at Brockwood. Included were Professor Maurice Wilkins, David Bohm, David Shainberg, Drs. Goodwin, Butt, Peat, Munroe, and Parchure. Also Harsh Tankha and Joe Zorski and some students, chosen by the latter two to be observers, as was Michael Rubinstein. No formal papers were read this time; they went straight into discussion. Two days later, Dr. Julian Melzack and his wife, Dr. Elizabeth Ferris, joined the meetings. K gave a private interview to Dr. Ferris, whose father was very ill. The meetings ended on June ninth.

K’s hay fever kept him in for several days. Usually during his breakfast he listened to records, and one morning he said, “I was playing the Beethoven [ninth symphony], that loud part, the demonic energy part, not reading, lying here like this, and I felt this odd feeling, as if death came—everything was going through a little hole, and I realized it mustn’t happen, and so it came back. I have felt a little of it for a couple of days—as if death were like that.”

M: “So near?”

K: “Like that. Through this little hole.”

M: “Was it different from when certain things happen in your head?”

K: “Maybe.”

M: “What was it made you realize it shouldn’t happen?”

K: “Oh, you know.” [Laughs.] “I have to try on that suit. I remember Sasha had a fitting, and he died without it. That mustn’t happen. You must go now [to Winchester], and drive carefully because I have to live. I am tired. I must be getting old. Of course I am old, but I feel tired.”

I went off to Winchester and errands but was feeling that the day, which was factually bright, had gone gray, as if the light had gone out of it. It shook me. It was too soon, he had too much to do, and he was more alive than anyone.

The next day, K was sick to his stomach and stayed in bed. A letter came from Erna describing a hearing for a use permit by the new owners of the old Zalk house on the hill above the KFA land. KFA was protesting this, and Rosalind had testified for the permit. K’s explanation of her hatred was the old one of “the fury of a woman scorned” and added that went for Rajagopal, too. Erna said that stories were being circulated that Rajagopal had felt harassed by us during K’s visit and had had to be looked after by Austin Bee and his wife.

Krishnaji was well by the twenty-sixth when George Digby telephoned with the sad news that Mrs. Bindley had died the day before while still in Putney Hospital.

Section Ten

CHAPTER 34

On June thirtieth, 1975, Krishnamurti and I left Brockwood and flew to Paris. Coming in by taxi from Orly, the familiar road signs were reminders of past arrivals by car, but K said, "I am glad we are not going to drive." It had been fun when we did, and those long drives across the wide summer spaces of France were deep in my affection, but they had become, for K, more effort than was necessary. We had our usual rooms at the Plaza Athénée, unpacked a little, and then K wanted to walk—his first in over three weeks. There was no pollen in Paris—just good whiffs of benzine. We made two small purchases on the rue Marbeuf and came back. "That is enough," he said. Supper was in the rooms, and we listened to President Giscard give a talk to the French people before their summer holidays. "La France est solide! Ne vous enquiettez pas; soyez calme." It was ironic to hear such lofty assertions in a time and world where chaos was always possible.

The next day I met Nadia Kossiakof downstairs in the hotel, and we talked until K joined us. Nadia had been working with Mme. Duché on the translation of The Awakening of Intelligence into L'Eveil de L'Intelligence and had done a great deal for its publication. She wanted to tell me this and to speak of a meeting that afternoon between K and journalists. Nadia had been ill and was worried about her mother trapped in the civil fighting in Beirut. I gave her a copy of the biography. K appeared and was warmly sympathetic, inviting her to stay at Brockwood and rest. She didn't want to eat and so left, but Marcelle Bondonneau joined us for lunch in the garden. K had a small nap afterward, and then we went to Mar de Manziarly's flat in the rue Jacob for the meeting with journalists, chosen and arranged by Nadia and the head of Stock, the publishers of L'Eveil de L'Intelligence, a M. Christian de Bertillat and M. André Bay. There was also a youngish man named Bernard Chevalier, who wanted a twenty-minute radio interview with K, and a François Closets of television, who did most of the questioning. K had been reading L'Eveil to activate his French for this meeting, and it worked well at first. In the taxi, he had said, "I'm going to talk in English." I suggested he start in French as it appeals to the French even though one makes mistakes, but as he became tired he spoke less readily than usual. It was better when he explained more complicated things in English. He spoke of the conference theme: What is the role of knowledge in the transformation of man and society? And what will change man since knowledge hasn't and can't? There was much on la pensée—hard for them to see its limitations. K then came to "Time must have a stop" and there being another energy when it does. He left them with that hint, and we walked to the rue de Beaune and a taxi back to the hotel.

On July third we flew to Geneva and were met by Mr. Narasimhan, who took us to lunch at the Palais des Nations, after which we went to Patek for the annual watch regulating and to Jacquet, where several handsome silks were chosen to be made into ties. K was very pleased. One more old-world grace and skill was still possible. We then drove in a rented car via the route du Lac, then up around Lausanne, and the familiar road to Oron, Bulle, and through the valley to Gstaad. It was warm and sunny all the way, and we kept exclaiming at the brightness of colors, the many greens, and the blaze of flowers. Geraniums in window boxes seemed on fire. We reached Tannegg, where Vanda and Fosca had arrived and all was ready and welcoming.

K rested and took all his meals in his room but "put his hands" on Mar de Manziarly, who was there for the talks, when she lunched with Vanda and me. She had had a heart attack during the winter. The Siddoo sisters also came and showed their plans for their school on Vancouver Island. Krishnaji reiterated his suggestion that architecture should be "not Canadian, not American, European, Japanese, but totally new." By the eleventh, he was up and went to see the tent and also the Simmonses, who had just arrived. In the evening, he said, "Do you feel a different atmosphere in the house? It is because I'm about to talk."

It was on July thirteenth and a perfect summer day that K began his Saanen talks. The tent was set up in a different way with benches on the ground and a raised platform on the south side. Isabel Biascoechea was there and came for lunch afterward—the first time we had seen her since Enrique's death the previous November. A letter came from Erna recounting that the Ventura court had ordered Rajagopal's lawyer and ours and one trustee from each side to meet to iron out the remaining difficulties—the matter of land easements, archives, and details in the K&R charter. K said that he wanted the activities of the Ojai educational center to be decided by himself, plus David Bohm and me. This he communicated briefly to David when he came to lunch. Vanda's brother and sister-in-law were also there, and on another day Isabel brought Enrique's daughter and her husband, Alfonso Colón, to the house. The latter agreed to stay on as president of the Fundación Krishnamurti.

I felt rather childish when a slight fever and swollen gland was diagnosed as mumps by the two Drs. Siddoo. Where and how I got that was unknowable, but, as Krishnaji was immune from having had it in the past and I kept away from others as much as possible, it didn't amount to much.

On July nineteenth Radha Burnier came to lunch. Krishnaji talked to her in private beforehand, asking about conditions in India and saying he needed advice he could trust before October on whether it would be safe for him to go there and to speak, as he always did, freely. He trusted her opinion and that of Achyut Patwardhan. He lunched in his room but joined us afterward. Simonetta di Cesaro was there, and he questioned her and Radha on their reactions to the biography. In particular what were the reasons "he"—"the boy"—had remained untouched by conditioning, etcetera? He put forth various explanations: ill health, malaria, etcetera keeping the boy too weak and unimpressionable; reincarnation, evolution through lives; Maitreya keeping him uncontaminated, vague, backward. Simonetta said with a definite voice that she believed in reincarnation. Radha asked, if so, what reincarnates? K took it up and wove possibilities: The self is thought, memories, conditioning, etcetera; when the body dies, a strong ego is part of the stream of selfishness, a manifestation of that. That manifestation may occur again, but why call it K—i.e., a particular individual? It is that stream manifesting. Also genetics, social conditioning, all sorts of other factors could be in it.

When Leadbeater saw no selfishness in the boy, how was that? As selfishness can manifest, so can unselfishness, but then what kept him that way, untouched? A protection? Protected by whom? K left it there. But he seemed intent on pursuing those matters, examining the mysteries surrounding those early years. He also said that, within the "selfishness" stream, an awareness of that state can occur, and there is no longer the selfishness. This could happen at any time to anyone, he said, if the person truly looks.

The next day there was the fourth Saanen talk. Dr. Dagmar Lichti came to greet K. Vanda had a young German physicist, Dr. Fritz Wilhelm, to the house, and K met him briefly. Vanda left for Florence on the twenty-first. On the twenty-second, K gave his fifth Saanen talk, he slept before lunch, and in the afternoon he saw Dr. Colón and Mr. Sendra. He had summoned them to find out about reports of Mr. Sendra's "guru" behavior while touring South America. I put on the cassette recorder and left. Sendra described his "meditation." "So you became a little guru," said K. Later he said the conversation tired him. "That man is not straight."

Radha Burnier came to lunch the following day, and again K spoke to her at length about his going or not going to India. He said he would not go if he could not speak freely or if an exception were made for him. He would not speak "with the permission" of Mrs. Gandhi. He looked to Achyut Patwardhan for advice on whether to go and felt that Pupul and Sunanda took it too lightly or impulsively.

Dorothy and Montague moved up to Vanda's room at Tannegg from the camping, and K had me tell them that he didn't intend to talk twice a week to students who don't understand or don't care. He would talk to staff and to serious students who would treat it as a privilege.

After the sixth talk on the twenty-fourth, K discussed further with Radha Burnier the conditions in India that would prevent his going and repeated that he would not talk if others were not also free to talk. I took Radha down to her hotel. She was flying to India that night.

Mary Cadogan came for a lunch, and I added Fritz Wilhelm, the young German teacher K had noticed as "looking serious" in the tent. He stayed afterward to listen when K and David Bohm did a taped discussion. Saral and Dorothy were also present. Another visitor was Mr. Mirabet of Spain, who came to give K a donation for the work. A gentle, generous man, he did this annually and reviewed with me that day a list of funds he intended to go to K for his work when he died.

To give Fosca some needed rest, Krishnaji and I took Anneke to lunch at the Park Hotel. We told her some of the Rajagopal story since the settlement. She was appalled and said that she had written to Rosalind telling her to return Happy Valley to K but unsurprisingly never had a reply.

On the twenty-ninth of July, I went with Isabel Biascoechea by train to Geneva. Enrique had set up in her name an investment to which she had the income for life. He had given power of attorney on it to K, and he was to receive the principal on her death. Isabel wanted me to have a similar power of attorney, and it was executed at the National City Bank. In case of K's death, it was to go to his work. During the day, K had rested and gone for his walk. After supper, he talked very seriously and critically about Brockwood. "Why should I go there and talk to these empty-headed students? What is the point of it? It is going to become a third-rate school. You are a trustee, what are you going to do about it? It's not my job." I asked how I could change what he hadn't. "Find out," he said. "What am I doing there? Not one student after three years!" I said that I had never been optimistic about the schools. He said that schools were right. "What will I do? I may never go to India again. I like Brockwood, it's a nice place, but I'm not going to talk to those morons who don't know what it's about. I'm not going to stay there three months. It's your responsibility—if I'm gone, what would you do? This afternoon I felt like going off. I can't talk to you unless you are objective." I said I would call the other trustees who were still there—Dorothy and David Bohm—and talk to them. "There's no creativity," he said and then tried to change the subject by asking about my lame leg.

I kept waking in the night thinking of what he had said and what was needed. But when he came in the morning to do my leg, he was in a changed and bright humor. Had I got over his "tirade?" he asked. At breakfast I told Dorothy that K wanted the three trustees—herself, David Bohm, and me—to meet about the policy of choosing students for Brockwood and what to do to bring them close to the teachings. Then I telephoned Edgar Graf and said that K wished me to make an announcement about the KFA school and that I would be in the tent to answer questions the following day. When I told K about this, his face lit up, pleased, with the look that makes anything doable. "Doesn't it make you nervous?" he asked in the car. I said I didn't look forward to it but didn't mind. His look earlier was my talisman. On arrival at the tent, I went in and spoke briefly before he came in, and then went around and sat inside, as that day my mumps quarantine was over. This was the first of the public discussions. There were no questions on the biography. K took one mainly on the "stream of selfishness." When you really see that you are that stream, that there is no self apart from it, the impact does something to the brain cells, and one is out of the stream. Mar de Manziarly came to lunch. K ate in his room, but we talked and she asked me a little about Rajagopal. I told her about the disagreeable archive encounters, his withholding part of papers saying he had burned K's manuscripts. Mar was in the middle—close to her sisters but devoted to K.

The second public discussion was the next day, and at 5 p.m. I went to the tent and talked about the Ojai school to about fifty people. On August second, after the fourth dialogue, Narasimhan came to lunch. He was to give his opinion on whether K should go to India that winter after his return from there in early October. After supper, Krishnaji dictated a letter to Pupul Jayakar, which I typed and gave to Padma Madholkar to take to Pupul in Delhi. The fifth and final Saanen dialogue completed the very fine series.

Mme. Duché and Marcelle Bondonneau lunched at Tannegg, and K talked alone afterward with Mme. Duché. Afterward, Dorothy, David Bohm, and I had a KFT trustee meeting on choice of students and interest in the teachings among students and staff at Brockwood. K joined us later. On another day, we took Nadia and Nicolas Kossiakof to lunch at the Park, and on August sixth K and David did a discussion, taped by Yves Zlotnicka, with Saral, Dorothy, Montague, and me present.

Quiet days followed. Various friends came to lunch, K rested, and we walked. On one such day, August seventeenth, it was lovely to wake up and not look at the clock, realizing the day was empty. K looked rested, young. He read and slept all morning. At lunch I asked him about things he had said in the sixth talk on the "stream of selfishness." When a person dies, he had said, the stream goes on. I asked if that meant the stream was outside and independent of the human mind—it having been created by thought? He seemed to be saying yes, but that I wasn't putting the question properly. He said he would go into it with David Bohm. He said you could talk to a consciousness. And then unexpectedly, "I talk to the tiger." There was a large, colored poster of a tiger that I had pinned to the wall in his second room where he did yoga. "I think you can talk to consciousness. I talk to tiger consciousness—be careful, avoid man, kill discreetly." We each read detective stories and slept in the afternoon, then went for a walk. I dined with Hugues and Suzanne van der Straten and daughter Marjolaine, who was coming to Brockwood as a student. I brought Hugues up-to-date on general KFA matters, including the situation with Rajagopal. Both he and Suzanne had liked the biography. Hugues inevitably was curious, he said, about K's account of masters, initiation, etcetera. Suzanne was not curious. It was nice, as always, to spend an evening with them.

The next day at lunch, K asked me what the van der Stratens had said about the biography. Hugues's question was one that would inevitably arise. We began to talk about it, and K let me fetch the cassette recorder to tape the rest of the conversation as we sat at table. About the events in the book, he said he literally had no direct memory, that much of the time his brain was empty, the recording of thought was not there or was only superficial. He said the boy's recording system was deficient, and he questioned whether there had been an imprint in his brain cells. There were peculiar phenomena, and one should go back and question not so much what the boy experienced but why that boy was not conditioned. He said that, on the day we were talking, something similar was happening with regard to his going to India in the winter. He said he was not going to make a choice; that would be wrong. "What will happen will be right."

The starting point of examination was that the boy was untouched—as an actual fact. Then we could start examining the description of the initiation. He couldn't see how the boy could stay in the room three days. He wasn't drugged. Peculiar things were going on. The whole starts from a mind that was not conditioned, not "diseased." He said the rest was all minor—like going to a cinema and repeating what he saw or dreamed, but though it must have been extraordinary, it left no mark. I said it must have left a faint mark deep in the mind. "I doubt it," he said. "I've tried but I can't get it." I said that he seemed to have forgotten important things yet trivial things remained—for instance, his recognition of people in photographs of early years. I asked if there were an inhibiting action—not suppression—but because, unlike other people, he looks directly without a screen of memory acting. He said again that from the beginning the boy was never conditioned. It was a whole phenomenon from birth. And he asked why he hadn't wanted power, money, when he was surrounded by such. None of it apparently touched him right from the beginning. He said, “Unless you answer that, the rest is meaningless.” He spoke of his brother’s death, which he could not remember. Why was he not conditioned when everything around him worked to condition—the Order of the Star, the adoration, candles, etcetera. “That is what I would like to investigate.” No imprint on the boy, though he was ill, had malaria, all the happenings up to age thirteen, the “peculiar head all the time.”

Later, on the walk, we spoke a little more. I said his lack of interest in power or money was not necessarily so mysterious. It could simply not be his nature, as it wasn’t in some people, though they were exposed to it, but no conditioning at all was more mysterious; as if his mind never took the stain that experience leaves on other minds. He agreed to this simile.

K dictated another letter to Pupul questioning, apart from the then political climate, his coming to India, for what purpose or value. He pointed out his physical organism was now over eighty and should consider how best the next ten or fifteen years should be spent. He said he had the right to ask and should ask why in all the years not one person in India had been totally and completely involved, dedicated, to living the teachings. He said that those in India, and those in America and England, must consider how most usefully he should spend the rest of his life for the teachings. He also asked if they had received Mary Lutyens’s book. She had sent copies to several of them in India and, in a letter he had received that morning, Mary said she had not had a word of acknowledgement or comment, nor from Pupul, to whom she had given a copy at Brockwood in June. Only Shiva Rao wrote. K said that this was Indian. “They don’t thank, they take things for granted, feel themselves superior.” Pupul looked at the Lilliefelts and Brockwood people as “middle class,” Madhavachari looked down on all non-Indians, and Shiva Rao was distrusted by Pupul and others who thought he was an American spy. She and others would never answer political questions in front of him and, when she had Mrs. Gandhi to dine with K at her house, she never included Kitty and Shiva Rao. K was feeling severe toward all this. He had read in the Herald Tribune that India had cut off telex and telephone for the correspondent of the New York Times for not “self-censoring” and had also refused entry to an Israeli member of a textile convention to be held in India in November. The other members consequently canceled the meeting. K said with vehemence, “I would like to start a political party—not left, not right, a global party!” He repeated it while watching the evening television news. We looked at each other, and then more quietly he added, “God forbid.”

On Friday, August twenty-second, Nadia Kossiakof telephoned from Paris that Marcelle Bondonneau, who had left Gstaad on Monday, was in an intensive care ward in the hospital with gallbladder trouble. Mar de Manziarly also telephoned that the outlook was grave. The next day the news was not good; she was on an artificial kidney machine. On Sunday, on return from the walk, K received word from Nadia that Marcelle had died that afternoon. K said he had not foreseen it (when I asked) during his conversation with her six days ago. “I could not get through to her, she was too nervous.” She had been a warm and longtime friend.

The next day, August twenty-fifth, we said goodbye to Fosca, drove to the airport in Geneva, and flew on SwissAir to London. Dorothy met us, and we were soon in the warm and sunny beauty of Brockwood. The quiet seemed extraordinary, and K said how noisy Gstaad had become.

1975

Back at Brockwood, Krishnaji was increasingly doubtful about going to India. All the advice from Radha Burnier, Achyut Patwardhan, and even Pupul was to wait until things were clearer. By September fifth, people had arrived for the talks, the house was full, and the field to the south held the two large marquees and tiny tents of the campers. The Digbys were in the West Wing guestroom. Anneke had come, also Pascaline Mallet, Madrisa Samuel, Gisela Elmenhorst, and Mme. Banzet, who brought a large and welcome donation. This brought cheer, too, as Ian Hammond and Robert Wiffen gave the doleful news that there had been extra bills from the builders for work costing between £8,000 and £10,000—money we didn't have. I offered to sell the Mercedes, but K and Dorothy both said to wait and see how things stood after the Gathering.

On September sixth Krishnaji gave his first talk in the marquee, which was overflowing. The weather was good. He began by asking what was correct action for survival with freedom in a disintegrating world. It was a topic he had suggested to David Bohm for a conference in Ojai in the spring to follow. Dorothy was cheered by the fact of having cleared £1,300 from the sale of food provided in the other tent after the talk. In the afternoon, there was a meeting on German publications. In the second talk the next day, he spoke of fear and pleasure, and it seemed to me the most complete one ever on those questions. That was on Sunday, and on Monday K talked to Balasundaram about Rishi Valley and all the work in India. As he was talking, he made the decision not to go to India that winter. At his instruction, I made notes of all that was said at that meeting and a subsequent one with Balasundaram two days later.

On Tuesday K held a discussion in the tent, and, in spite of rain, many came. Rain or no rain, we walked across the fields in the afternoon. A second public discussion went well on Thursday, and a third long discussion with Balasundaram followed on Friday on matters at Rishi Valley and the work in India, which K approved and added to. He discussed all this in a letter to Pupul as well.

A third talk was held, and the fourth and a final one was on Sunday, September fourteenth. In spite of rain, Terence Stamp brought Ravi Shankar, Alla Rakha, and their group and all had lunch in the tent, after which Ravi Shankar and Alla Rakha gave a benefit concert enthusiastically received. By suppertime, it was all accomplished. K had poured out energy, had had no rest, and no walk but was nonetheless very well. Balasundaram left for India, taking all the notes of what had been discussed.

The talks being over, there was time for a little rest before the small tide of young student faces returning to school. As always, Krishnaji spoke to the whole school.

It was time for a trip to London on the twenty-fifth. K had eaten breakfast too quickly, had pain in his stomach, and was walking bent over. "I may not be able to go," he said, but it passed, and he went. Having to catch a train sometimes made him tense and hurried though having ample time. Topazia Alliata, who had been staying at Brockwood, was on the same train and talked all the way to Waterloo about the Italian "committee" and the antics of one of its members who appointed people no one else knew to head "K groups" all over Italy, at which no one seemed to know what was going on. A more old-fashioned member was distressed by all this and the fact that no one on the supposed committee saw any of the financial accounts nor seemed to take any action about it. K said, "You are all irresponsible," and that it was preferable to have nothing going on than things as they were. He wanted the Bulletin discontinued in Italy, the mailing list turned over to Pietro Cragnolini, who was titular president, to send out any necessary notice of meetings, etcetera. With most of this Topazia agreed, but then the subject of Rajagopal came up, and she voiced the opinion that he should not have been pursued at law. Both K and I pointed out as strongly as possible that the common thread in these matters was the legal responsibility and accountability for charitable funds. If someone steals from one personally, one may or may not choose to call the person to account, but no such personal decision is permissible by a trustee of a charity. We put it thoroughly and clearly but did not seem to get it across. Bringing trouble to Rajagopal was "making people unhappy." I asked if she saw K in trouble, would she go to help him? Yes. Well, that was precisely why action had been taken to protect Krishnaji and his teaching. We finally arrived at Waterloo, got her into a taxi, and went for a separate one. K bumped the top of his head on the doorframe and sat down looking dazed. We proceeded to Huntsman and its more soothing atmosphere, and then to Fortnum and lunch with Mary and Joe Links. Topazia had said that Vanda was distressed at thinking Mary wanted Krishnaji's letters for the second volume of the biography, and Mary was distressed at this interpretation. She said she wouldn't ask for letters but only memories of events in K's life. The new volume was to concentrate on the development of his teachings.

The next day, I flew to Rome for a brief visit with Filomena. At lunch with Mary and Joe, K had seen her mother's turquoise rings on her finger and wore it for her during the meal. It was believed that he "magnetized" things, so that morning before I left, he wore my rings for a short time, told me to come back safely, and then put them back on my finger. I felt they were indeed a talisman, his protection.

Vanda, who was to have come to Rome from Florence, was prevented by a train strike, but we talked by telephone and I told her about Mary not wanting private letters but only reports about K for posterity. Vanda agreed and said we would talk about it in Gstaad the next summer.

I flew back to England on September twenty-eighth and had K's supper tray ready when he came in from his walk. The next day, I told Mary of Vanda's willingness "to do whatever" for the biography. Mary told of her mother's ring becoming "dazzling" after K had worn it through our lunch. Joe, who wasn't given to imaginings, said it was the first time he had known firsthand of such a thing. I told K, who nodded and said it worked better with precious stones than gold, and is best if worn at night. We went for a walk with Whisper through the softness and smell of autumn leaves. I felt such a love for that countryside and was deeply grateful to be there. In the evening, I listened to the tape of the dialogue K had with David Bohm (#10) two days before, when I was in Rome.

The next morning, K came in saying he had such a strange feeling he couldn't describe it. He had woken at 5 a.m. "feeling something strange" and that it increased when he got up at 6:30—"a tremendous energy" flowing inside. Part of it might have been a premonition of a cable that arrived, signed by Pupul, saying that Achyut, Sunanda, Balasundaram, and she agreed that "under present circumstances" it was better that K go to California that winter. He said he was glad of their agreement and was going to do that anyway but preferred not to go against people.

There were further talks with David Bohm and to the school. I was to go ahead of Krishnaji to the U.S., and so, on October fifth, I left Brockwood. The ring episodes with Mary's and mine had put it in K's mind to act on one I had with a stone in it. This he wore for several nights and then instructed me to wear it until he rejoined me. I went to Heathrow by taxi and flew to New York. After a visit to my mother on Martha's Vineyard, and a few days with my brother in New York, on October fifteenth I moved into the apartment in the Ritz Tower that I had used for Krishnaji's previous visits. After putting in some food for our supper, I went to the airport to meet him. Most of the passengers already had come out of customs when suddenly he was there, glancing about for me, all grace and shine in his new tweed jacket, flannels, and jersey shirt. He had asked for the visa to last until May fifteenth, longer than they generally gave for a tourist, so he had to see a special immigration inspector who questioned him: Would hostess (me) be responsible for him all that time if he should be ill, etcetera? Where would he stay in New York and with whom? (With Mrs. Z.) Did he have any funds? Luckily I had urged him to carry his travel checks. He apparently won over the inspector, who gave the desired time. We took a taxi to the city and went for a slight walk and to a health food store, where he chose various things. We had an early supper, and he was soon in bed. It had been cold at Brockwood that morning; he had awakened very early; the time difference and travel were taxing. I was tired too, but life was in order and peaceful again with his presence.

The next morning, we went to see Dr. Max Wolf, who had treated him in the spring. He lived in White Plains, and on the drive the color of the autumn leaves, still on the trees, delighted K. On the way, we talked about possible filmed dialogues that were being urged by Mrs. Kornfeld. David Bohm, of course, but who else might be good? K finally thought of Naudé, who he said had the capability: "He's our man." With Dr. Wolf, he discussed meditation, not medicine. Wolf had a book on Transcendental Meditation from a patient. "Throw it out," said K and told him about the process of desire on brain cells. Also K showed him some breathing exercises. Dr. Wolf said K's heart was very strong and was in proper position. It had apparently been slightly pushed to the center. His arteries (seen through the eye) were those of a thirty-year-old. A test showed that the implantation he had given him on the last visit was seventy-five percent successful, and he gave him another. We came back to the city and were feeling tired of New York. K suggested we do everything necessary and then stay in all afternoon. While I cashed a check in a bank, a woman bumped into K, who said to her, "I beg your pardon." "Why should you beg my pardon!" was the belligerent reply. We had lunch and a feeling of relief at being through with New York. "The body is galloping to Malibu," said K. He took a nap, and later my brother came by. They discussed the state of the world.

After another trip to Dr. Wolf to learn the results of some tests, on October eighteenth we were packed and ready before breakfast. C.V. Narasimhan, just returned from India, came by to see Krishnaji at 9:30. At 10:30, in heavy rain, we left for the airport and flew to Los Angeles. On arrival, on a gently sunny California afternoon, we were met by Alan Kishbaugh, who remarkably got all seven bags into his BMW, and, after stopping to greet Amanda and Phil Dunne, we were home in Malibu. The house and garden were in perfect order, well kept by Elfriede. Alan stayed to tea, and then we had supper on trays and so to bed in the blessed quiet and peace of that house. Only the ocean made its murmur. I felt deep thankfulness to be there again with K.

It was that same sound that told me where I was in the morning. Unpacking and putting things in order were the unwinding that gave the sense of being at rest, at home. K felt rested, too, and glad to be there. In the afternoon, some of the younger Dunnes came over. K talked with them for a while, and when they left we drove down in his green Mercedes to the market. Later I listened to the tape of the K and David Bohm discussion on being without desire they made on October eleventh after I left Brockwood. We talked about his being, as he said, unable to visualize, to imagine with a picture in the mind. It seemed as if in him memory communicated in the conscious mind without images.

October twenty-third was a clear and beautiful day, and we went to Ojai, K driving happily and exclaiming at the coloring of rocks and mountains. Lunch was with Erna and Theo, and discussion was about the school. Ruth and Albion joined us, and we went over to the school. Mark Lee and teachers, David Moody, and Elaine Needham were there. We drove home in time for supper. Two days later, Mark came down to Malibu and K talked to him alone.

We went again to Ojai and again to the school. K saw some of the changes at Arya Vihara, met three of the children and Michael Krohnen, who was doing the cooking there. K talked to the teachers and trustees and asked how they would cope with a child, such as one he had just seen, aged ten, who, when introduced to K and me, didn't get up? How to bring about consideration, not by coercion, example, etcetera? Mark, Moody, and Needham had no answers. K's was mostly to get to know the child, find out his interests, etcetera, and then, through relationship with the child, be able to encourage these other qualities. K drove us home, even though it was dark, slowly with great attention.

On October twenty-seventh Evelyne Blau was invited to become a KFA trustee, and she accepted. Alain came down from San Francisco for the weekend. Krishnaji, he, and I went over to the Dunnes' and later walked on the beach. It was good to see him, but to both K and me he seemed to have moved away from the work, no longer as interested, and not really at ease. K said he felt Alain no longer could do the videotaped discussions he had envisaged. He was too far from it all. There was regret in this.

In another conversation, I asked him what he meant by a remark against giving a part of the body to someone else—organ donation such as a kidney or eyes—after death? He said he was against it for himself "or anyone around me." It was hard to get his reasons. They seemed to be that giving part of one's body, especially if one had been concerned with sacred things, would give some sort of power to the donee to effect a residue in consciousness. Equally, accepting something, such as a blood transfusion, was to be avoided. One would have to know a lot about the donor. K would not take a transfusion, he said. He spoke of responsibility for the body and especially the brain. He felt remiss if he cut himself, for instance, and the time in September in London when he hit his head in the taxi, he checked himself carefully: "Have I hurt it?" He spoke of the ring he held and had me wear from the time I left Brockwood until he rejoined me, and asked me to wear it then if I went to town without him. A quality of protection.

Some quiet days followed. There were trips to Ojai. Radha Burnier was there and lunched with us. There was talk of India and the work. There was also suggestion of a separate trust being set up in Madras to which Vasanta Vihar could be conveyed. K cabled his approval to this. Radha was named one of the trustees.

In Malibu I asked K about what level in the brain does the ordering of "duty," what wakes one up and points to things to be done, etcetera. How much of it was simply memory, conditioning, a notion of order, but this could have too much activity? Should things be seen, dealt with, and then there be a space of emptiness? He told me I was sometimes slow to drop conclusions, and that I pointed out difficulties rather than let things unfold. "You are dealing with something different here" (meaning him and what surrounds him). Also he said that he would like in the discussions with David Bohm to go totally into one subject and not "jump from thing to thing." At lunch, after listening to a bit of his October fourth talk with Bohm, he said, "I have wondered if, when I talk, I think. I don't. No memory. Language is memory, you have to use it. You see the tree and you describe it, you use the words, but perception has no thought. There is no thought operating except that of language."

We spoke about imagination, and he said, "When there is total detachment, there is not imagination, it is a picture without any content, any distortion." He said that he had woken up that morning at 2 a.m., couldn't sleep; then meditation began, "a feeling of elation, exultation."

That afternoon, he started a possible series of discussions on education with those involved in the school, and in the evening he turned on a television broadcast of the motion picture Judgement at Nuremberg. I had to leave it at the scenes of the concentration camps. K watched and then came in to me: "What is the matter with humanity? This is monstrous! People are this way everywhere." He was shocked.

November sixteenth was a more cheerful day. We went to collect the car I had ordered in the spring to replace my old car. It was a gray 240 diesel Mercedes sedan. K was pleased with it, and we drove it home slowly in the way he thought correct. “It is a new car! We must take care of these two cars and make them last for years.” We came back, showed it to Amanda and Philippa Dunne, and went for a walk on the gleaming beach. He was pleased and full of laughter, so that day shone.

The following day we left for Ojai in the new car with K driving. At first, he said, “I am a little shy of it,” but, looking very pleased, he proceeded slowly—not over forty miles per hour and laughing at our pace. “One sees everything this way.” We talked about American people “being taught to be selfish and need pleasure” by movies. We had been looking at some on television. Out of this came mention of the school, and I questioned teaching being able to do anything but minimize mistakes, feeling that the most that could be done was to point out and remove impediments, the mistakes of thought, conditioning, ambition, ego, etcetera. It seemed to me that perhaps its widest reach makes a better human being, but for a Krishnamurti or a Buddha, there must be something inherent in the child, something in the direction of but beyond genius. Nothing in K’s education or surroundings had influenced what he was. K then said that it was like oil in the earth, there waiting to be reached. The children we teach cannot be taught to reach it, but there are young people capable of touching it. He implied we must find them, or the ones we can teach might have such children. They must be turned in that direction. He seemed to agree, or at least not disagree, with my saying that even if a person were able to shed all the “mistakes,” the errors, it would not bring “the other.” He spoke of an extraordinary meditation the previous night. I asked if he could describe it a little, and he said it was not describable. I asked him if there was a quality of light in it, that so many reports of religious experience spoke of light—enlightenment? He said that it did not seem light but the closest description would be emptiness. As he said that, it seemed to me that the light I had experienced was just that—still in the realm of experience. And that there was no experience in what K spoke of.

In Ojai, K spoke for a while to people at the school and then we lunched with Erna and Theo. We had to leave before 3 p.m. because of slow driving and K not wanting to drive in the dark. We stopped at Dieter’s, where K’s green Mercedes was having its 6,000-mile service, and he drove it home while I followed at forty miles per hour.

During this time, Mrs. Gita Sarabai and her daughter, Palevi, had been coming to lunch in Malibu, and they brought the painter Lee Mullican and his wife. Evelyne brought Cynthia Wood, whom she had met at one of the Krishnamurti talks in San Francisco. There were further meetings with those involved in the school and architect discussions about buildings that would be needed.

December sixth was a beautiful morning, and up I was early to cook a pot of the Spanish rice K liked. I packed the green car for Ojai. We left at 10 a.m., with K driving it, and I following in the gray diesel. We left the latter at Dieter’s for its 500-mile service and went on in the green. K said he had awakened in the night with an intense feeling and the sentence, “Suffering and the remembrance of suffering are still in the field of the self.” At the cottage, we unpacked and then walked to the Lilliefelts' for lunch. At 2:30, in the schoolroom of the cottage, K held a discussion with parents and teachers. It went well. We took a late walk as the sun was setting and came back by moonlight.

On the seventh we went to the Oak Grove for a meeting with architects and trustees, walked all over the land, and discussed school buildings. Philippa Dunne and her husband, David Nelson, joined us and came back to the cottage. K showed them the place, Alan Kishbaugh came too. After lunch there was a trustee meeting and then another meeting with architects in the Oak Grove. A further meeting was held the next morning, and the architects left. They were to send suggested plans and estimates. Erna, Theo, and Evelyne Blau lunched with us in the cottage, and later we walked with Erna and Theo. The following morning, a Mrs. Katie Marx was introduced to Krishnaji. She had come from Michigan to be able to put her two boys in K's school. We then left Ojai, stopped for the grey car, and were home in Malibu for lunch.

On December tenth, we flew from Los Angeles to San Francisco to lunch with Mrs. Mathias, and then flew back in the afternoon. It was a nine-hour expedition, but K was not too tired. We drove again to Ojai for K's education discussion and spent the night there. Back in Malibu, on December fifteenth, Jackie and Sarjit Siddoo came to talk to K about their school in Canada. During lunch, a cable came from Kitty Shiva Rao, and one from Balasundaram too, saying that Shiva Rao had died that day of a heart attack. A further cable came from Balasundaram the next day, saying Subba Rao had just died. The latter was, in the early days, an old Theosophist who left the TS when K did, and later became principal of the Rishi Valley School. K felt his death very much, he said, because "Subba Rao has always been with us." Shiva Rao had been part of those around Krishnaji and his brother in India, and was sent by Mrs. Besant to teach them Sanskrit in England. He later was a politician in the Indian government and, together with his wife, Kitty Shiva Rao, was host to K when he was in Delhi.

On December nineteenth we drove to Ojai in the afternoon. On the road, K said to me, "Watch and have the mind empty." And then, "It is beginning—the head. A pressure from the back of the head in the brain."

We met Erna, Theo, and Mark Lee in the Oak Grove and walked about looking at a site for the assembly building. K was not satisfied with the architects' suggestion for it to be on the hill among the trees. He liked a place near the Grove itself at the edge of the meadow. We walked across Besant Road and around Rajagopal's place. "That crook!" said K in a resonant voice. Over at the cottage, we looked at a newly made copy of film made in 1925 that was found in the cottage basement, hidden away. The laboratory to which the Lilliefelts took it said they had not seen such old film and that it was nitrate film and dangerous to keep. They copied it well and it showed reels taken in Ommen by a Swedish man in which were Krishnaji, Mrs. Besant, Rajagopal, Jadu, Lady Emily, and many familiar faces that K recognized. It was amateurishly filmed and shot in such brief lengths that it was hard to see, but it showed the young K as very much a boy, though he was all of thirty. K said later, "He must have been developing slowly, the mind wasn't mature yet." He asked afterward how it seemed to us. Mostly rather childish. The Liberal Catholic Church processions looked rather shocking in a K film. Mrs. Besant seemed old, feeble, and not at ease. K seemed more curious about our impressions than having any of his own.

That night, K slept until 8 in the morning. “Eleven hours in bed—that’s good!” In the afternoon there was another discussion at Arya Vihara, but it didn’t go very well. There were too many who weren’t versed in his teachings and awkward in discussing. We walked afterward.

On the twenty-first we spoke with an architect about enlarging the upstairs flat in the building next to Pine Cottage by extending both rooms to include their exterior porches. K then saw two Italian boys who had flown from Turin to see him, and at 3 p.m. there was a tea at Arya Vihara for old Ojai hands. K soon slid out and went for a walk. On his return, Mark Lee showed the second batch of the old films from the Pine Cottage basement. These were in Adyar 1925. There were Leadbeater, Arundale, Wedgwood, Jinarajadasa in robes and miters; K, beautiful in Indian clothes; then a brief shot in 1924 of Nitya. Watching all this there were exclamations of surprise and recognition and from K: “Slowly! Slowly!” when the film was too quick and abrupt. He sat and talked afterward to Erna, Theo, Mark, and me. He hadn’t wanted to watch the film with anyone else present. For me, the young K, though eager and smiling, was being polite rather than part of it all. The short glimpse of Nitya moved me very much, and during the meeting at Arya Vihara I kept thinking of him there, the sadness of his dying there without his brother. I kept wanting to say to him, “See how it has all turned out—K has become everything, listen to him.”

Before lunch, K had a very far-off look while sitting with Erna and Theo, and at lunch he said to Erna, “You asked about the process; it began here—pains, fainting. It was probably kundalini, but I am very skeptical about these things. I doubt most who say they have had it.”

We went back to Malibu. Fritz Wilhelm arrived and stayed a few days before going on to Ojai. On Christmas Eve all the Dunnes came over for dinner. K came to table and sat up the whole evening until it was over. On the twenty-sixth K held a discussion in the afternoon. Present were the Lilliefelts, Evelyne Blau, Alan Kishbaugh, Ruth, Albion, Fritz, Ted Cartee, and Philippa and David. Tea followed.

We were alone again on the twenty-ninth; a lovely, quiet day, warm as summer. On the beach walk we watched the pelicans fishing. On the thirtieth K said we must “do something extravagant,” so we went to the movies for the first time since the previous spring. In the car going to town, he said that the feeling he had in his head “left it feeling more powerful.”

M: “You mean more energy?”

K: “That’s it. Much more energy. I never felt this before.”

We stopped at the health food store for some things and then met Alan Kishbaugh at a Mexican restaurant. K had enchiladas and tostados, and it all seemed to agree with him. He had suggested Mexican food and that morning he had resumed an egg for breakfast and more kefir—all for added protein. We then went to the Westwood Bookstore for a supply of "thrillers" and saw a movie, The Man Who Would Be King. It was satisfactory, and K vouched for the authentic look of Indian trains during the British Raj. We came home to a long letter from Balasundaram about the settling of the Vasanta Vihar case and the Krishnamurti Trust Madras.

December thirty-first was a quiet day at home. We walked on the beach at sunset, the sand shone with reflections of the sky. One walked dazzled in the slanting light, floating, lost. We had supper on trays as usual and listened to a television broadcast of K's favorite—Beethoven's ninth symphony. Von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic were playing, and K watched carefully the way he conducted, eyes closed, with an inward look that seemed to shape the music. So the year ended in the peace and blessing of Krishnaji's presence.

The new year of 1976 began with a clear morning and the quiet joy of Krishnaji's presence. His face was the first seen, his voice spoke the first words. Then each did exercises. We made breakfast together and played a new recording of Gregorian chants. One of the Dunne girls lunched with us and we talked while Krishnaji napped. On awakening, he and I washed the new gray Mercedes. It was cold, and fingers grew numb inside the rubber gloves. We walked across the canyon to wish Amanda and Phil a happy new year.

The next day, January second, we drove in the new car to Ojai and settled into the cottage. It was cold there, too, but was snug with the heater on. The following day a meeting with architects was held in the Oak Grove, and at the Lilliefelts' there was a discussion with teachers and parents. Afterward, K went for a walk with Fritz Wilhelm and asked him if he would like to join us and be the director of the educational center in Ojai. Fritz accepted. This was discussed over lunch in the cottage with Erna and Theo, and afterward there was a small group discussion in which K came to a new expression of what can happen when conditioning is understood and stopped. He said that then there is something original.

"Eleven hours of rest," said K happily on awakening on the fifth. Over breakfast he talked at length about seeing what his presence had done in Ojai and the need to spend extended time there. This pointed to a need to expand the cottage to be a proper house, and we talked about this and what architect to choose. He said that Ojai, Brockwood, and India should be brought together. He said he put faith in Sunanda and Balasundaram, and wanted Sunanda to come to Ojai and to Brockwood to be in contact with the rest, and for him to work on her. He said that David Bohm, Fritz Wilhelm, the Lilliefelts, and I must talk in the spring about what the centers were to be. He said Brockwood had reached a level as a school, but that was not enough. It was too limited, it must "flower as a European oasis. I must do this [the centers] before I die."

I was to go into the hospital for a minor operation on my leg, and K said that he wanted to stay alone in the cottage on the weekend I was in hospital rather than stay with the Lilliefelts. "Something is happening here. I feel safe here now; I don't want to interrupt it."

We came back to Malibu in time for lunch and looked at samples of curtain materials for the expanded apartment over the office next to Pine Cottage. The walls of the bedroom and sitting room were to be pushed out to include their porch area, thereby doubling them in size. K was pleased by this and chose a chintz rather like the one in his Pine Cottage sitting room, which he still exclaimed over on each arrival. After lunch he said his head was "beginning again." We walked on the beach and gave persimmons from Ojai to the Dunnes.

January ninth. We again went to Ojai, K driving the green car. It was another cloudless day, though rain was predicted. One was impatient for rain at that season. We traded seats halfway, and I drove while K chanted in Sanskrit. We stopped for cheese and special coffee. Erna came on the walk and said that she and Theo would stay next door in the office if K were to stay alone in the cottage the following weekend.

At supper, K said I was slipping into habits of not controlling my body—why? Was I worried about something? My operation? I said no, only fatigue sometime. I feel well, have plenty of energy mostly, but it runs out sooner than it had. He said I was much more energetic at Brockwood. "What will you do if I die? Will you stay with it?" Yes. "No, I am asking it wrongly," he said. "Do you feel something in the room?" I had and did, and strangely the tiredness I had felt disappeared, as if a transfusion of strength had been given.

The next morning at breakfast, he said to me, "I once saw a face. I have been feeling that face all night. Something happens to me here."

M: "Something curious happened to me last night when you were talking to me. Did you know that?"

K: "Yes. I will tell you sometime. Not now."

He went on talking about being there, in Ojai, it was important, and that he might return while I was in the hospital. He talked about living in Ojai—without Malibu. Would I mind giving up Malibu? I said I loved Malibu but was not attached. My home was where it was best for him and the teachings.

After lunch, I went to meet Mar de Manziarly outside her sister Mima Porter's place where she was staying and brought her to the cottage. Then, with K, we walked to Arya Vihara for his discussion with teachers and parents. After returning Mar to her sister's gate, K, Alan Kishbaugh, and I walked in the dark. K told Alan more young trustees were needed. “I want to involve you more.” At supper he said to me, “I will live another fifteen years and you another twenty.” He had an intent look and I asked what it was. “I feel that other thing,” he said. I was aware that I had not felt tired at all that day.

The next day, January eleventh, Krishnaji asked Erna to come to the cottage to talk about my remodeling it and perhaps living there for good. How to handle it? Erna felt Louis Blau, Evelyne’s husband, could advise. I made lunch and again fetched Mar de Manziarly at her sister’s gate. She, K, Erna, Alan, and I ate and afterward were joined by Ruth Tettemer, Albion Patterson, Mark Lee, David Moody, and Ted Cartee.

K continued the question of if there is something original and not in the realm of knowledge and self. Do we see that we live in conditioned thought? Have we dropped concepts? To see the false and ask the question, remaining only with the question and not accepting answers “even from God himself.” To truly ask is to not know and from this something different can be. It takes great energy and attention to remain in a question.

In the car coming home to Malibu, I asked about the face. He said he had seen it often, “out there like that bush there.” A face only, not a body. I asked if it moved or spoke. “No. I have been seeing it since that night [January ninth] not outside, but inside. It usually means it is moving into this body.” I asked if it could presage his “going off” and, if so, should he stay alone in the cottage while I was in the hospital? “That will not happen when I am alone. The body must be looked after.” I was still feeling an absence of fatigue. We talked further about the cottage and living there. Philippa Dunne and her husband David were waiting for us when we reached Malibu. They were to stay in the house with K until he went to Ojai.

The next day, January twelfth, Amanda drove me to the UCLA Medical Center in Los Angeles, where I checked into the hospital and the following morning was operated on for a skin graft on my ailing leg. I had a spinal anesthetic and was conscious throughout. It took about one and a half hours, the biopsy was negative, and I was able to telephone K by 1 p.m. He telephoned me the following day before going to Ojai with Theo, where he stayed alone in the cottage and took his meals at Arya Vihara. He held teacher–parent discussions. The graft on my leg took, and I was able to come home in an ambulance on the nineteenth. That afternoon Theo brought Krishnaji back. There was a sense of peace and blessedness in the house.

At breakfast the next day, Krishnaji talked further about remodeling the cottage. Charles Rusch, one of the architects who had been consulted about the school buildings, had spoken to Charles Moore, who apparently had said he would be delighted to do something about the cottage. This was very good news, as Charles was one of the finest architects alive as well as a very congenial person. K was concerned about my finances. “You must be able to live as you do now, be able to travel.” He agreed that my job was to look after K. Then he said that at Ojai he had had a feeling that he must offer a chance to Rajagopal and Rosalind to redeem themselves, to expiate their sins before they die, that he must do it so that they could not refuse, for if they did, it would be worse. A greater damnation? asked I. “Yes,” said K. He had talked to the Lilliefelts the day before, who must have been shaken. I listened without comment. “Rajagopal was a Brahmin. I want to tell him that.”

In another conversation he reminisced about Aldous Huxley, remembered his telling K that it was nice to hear English spoken again after all his years in California. He remembered too a time in Rome when Huxley came to attend World Health Organization meetings. “We used to walk in the Borghese Garden in the mornings, and then Huxley went to the meetings. I think they bored him.”

K went to Ojai with Alan Kishbaugh to hold discussions and spend one night. I was still confined to bed because of my leg but was able to dress for the first time and get up on the twenty-sixth, when K returned with Theo in time for lunch. During this, he talked very seriously to Theo about my having the right to live in the cottage during my lifetime and his wish to ensure this. At 3 p.m., Charles Moore and Charles Rusch came to start talking about redoing the cottage. The conversation led toward using thick adobe walls, Italian patterned floor tiles like those used in the Malibu house, and possibly solar or radiant heat. All this pleased K. In the evening, he treated my leg and later told me he had felt a presence as he did it before his trip to Ojai and that it remained in my room instead of following him “as it usually does.”

In another conversation the next day, he said, “My life is uncertain and because it is uncertain it is enduring. You must carry on. There is something more in my life than K, and that operates. It will do what it wants; no one can prevent it. What I feel for you is without attachment and therefore it will endure. I am coming with you to talk to Blau. I want to tell him this property in Ojai is to be yours. I may be there. Because you have taken the responsibility for K, you must be protected.” He said he had felt I should not be alone without him. He felt it on the weekend when he was away, and he wanted to come with me even on errands for a while, and even with me when I went next to the doctor. He felt that place [Malibu] was no longer safe; the city, its violence, was spreading. “This house is no longer the refuge it was.” He spoke of the possibility of his “going off”; he said that once at Brockwood only Whisper’s presence prevented it. I asked what it meant. Did it mean he would die? “Maybe,” he said, but it seemed as if he dismissed that as minor. The “going off” seemed the point, and a different sort of disappearance. But he spoke again of the body living another ten or fifteen years. He spoke too of the importance of Balasundaram and Sunanda carrying on the work in India. He said Pupul was finished, “too pulled by selling cloth.” Her being able to spend only three days at Rishi Valley showed her boredom. It was important that Sunanda be around K in Ojai and Brockwood to learn. Also Alan K., Fritz Wilhelm, and Mark Lee should be in on discussions between him and David Bohm about what centers were to be. “It will come out; it always does.”

He spoke about rescuing “those two” [Rajagopal and Rosalind] from damnation. Why? I asked. “Because they have been close to the teachings and have rejected them—therefore the greater damnation.” Mar de Manziarly was still in Ojai because her sister Yo had a car accident. We had spoken to her that morning by telephone. K dismissed Mima and Yo as selfish people but seemed to find that petty alongside the evil of the two Rajagopals. The larger the sin, the more he seemed to feel they should be rescued from its consequences. Later, after lunch, he said he was tired and his head hurt. It had begun when we talked seriously. But he added that "if it were not for K" my operation would not have gone as well as it did.

The next day at lunch, he said, "I have had two things going through my mind all morning. One was a Buddhist temple at Adyar with a pond where he [K] used to go. And the other—do you remember the rooms where I used to live? Below that, by the river—the boy used to go there in the early morning when he first lived there. He would stand there, lost. I wonder why this memory has drifted up?" He had looked a bit "off" all morning. He picked up Mary's biography in my room, opened it, and stood smiling faintly at a very early photograph of himself and his two brothers.

It was January twenty-ninth when we went to Beverly Hills in the afternoon. For two and a half hours, we talked with Louis Blau in his office, firstly about K getting immigrant status in the U.S.—the "green card." We should try to obtain it under the special category of religious leader. There were endless forms to fill in, and I said I would undertake to give all possible data. Then Lou went into a strong statement that sounded like the one K had come to make—i.e., that I must be in a position where I could live in the Ojai cottage the rest of my life with privacy, protection, etcetera. To this end, he and his office would advise me on how best to buy the house and land legally from the Foundation, and also how to dovetail a sale of the Malibu house and the tax matters involved. I was to provide three years of my tax returns, brokers' statements and cost base of Malibu. I was rather taken aback by all this but saw that it would result in expert professional guidance. I had a moment of thinking it was going a bit far but then realized there was this odd phenomenon of events happening around K. Things start to move and then comes a curious going with them—and it being right. K was rather amazed at the complications of business, but he liked and has confidence in Lou. It was after 7 p.m. when we got home.

The next day, with K driving, we went to Ojai, where Charles Moore met us at the cottage for lunch, Michael Krohnen providing it from Arya Vihara. We figured out the floor plan for remodeling the original cottage, which was to be kept as it was except for minor changes to make it a bedroom wing, enlarging K's bedroom and bath and keeping his sitting room. To this was to be added a new wing of adobe brick containing a living room, a small study, and a dining room combined with kitchen. Charles Rusch joined us later, and a lot of progress was made.

The next day was cloudless, warm, beautiful, and disturbing, for it was the last of January and no much-needed rain had fallen. There was to have been a Happy Valley board meeting to which Erna was to have gone, but a touch of flu interfered. Theo went in her place with Evelyne Blau and Mark Lee. K talked to them, saying, "We are the righteous, they are the unrighteous," but it was felt that if there were any opening of their wanting to be more friendly, we must meet it. When they returned, they reported that the Happy Valley lawyer had held forth, but that Rosalind had seemed more friendly. Evelyne and Theo told them that we were starting a school in the west end but might be interested in part of the Happy Valley land for a future high school and suggested a possible lease. The lawyer objected to parts of this, so we were to consider his points, but generally the matter was left open on both sides. Both Erna and I took a dim view of all this, feeling it was a waste of time and energy dealing with Rosalind, and what would we do with the land if we had it? We had enough problems with the west end plans. "We would hold it," said K. Evelyne and Theo lunched with us in the cottage, and in the afternoon K held a discussion with teachers and parents at Arya Vihara.

February first was again cloudless. "Another beastly day," said K. Alan came to lunch with us, and K held a discussion in the cottage. Present were Ruth, Albion, Evelyne, Cynthia Wood, Mark and Asha, Dr. and Mrs. Greene, Dr. and Mrs. Marx, David Moody, and Michael Krohnen. K spoke on the mind being within the field of knowledge. Later, he and Alan walked and I rested. We had our usual supper, and each was deep in a book.

Rain came at last on February fifth. We drove to Ojai in the afternoon, and K said, "Do you feel the atmosphere here?" The next morning, it was bright, and we walked down the driveway to look back through the orange trees, heavy with fruit, at the mountains crowned with snow. Topa Topa and the whole northern range was white. Later, clouds gathered, and it rained all day. Erna and Theo lunched with us in the cottage, and K brought up "saving the souls" of Rajagopal and Rosalind. I had said earlier that I was without hatred for them but personally would prefer to have nothing to do ever with either of them. K said they had both spat on the teachings, which was such a dreadful thing that he felt they should be given a chance before they died to expiate it. All of us seemed to feel that Rajagopal was incapable of that, but K felt he should have one more chance. I pointed out that Erna, Theo, and I had gone to considerable effort to extricate K from the swamp he had been in with those people and that even a touch of it again was repugnant. K said it was not a question of that, but, because they had been close to the teachings and betrayed them, they were damned. That was a word I had begun but he now used. Later, when we were alone, I told him that everything I had said for myself personally I meant all the way, but these were things he must decide, and in responsibility to him I would do things I would not do on my own. We left it at that.

Rains fell for the next few days while we were in Malibu. K came with me when I went to have my leg checked by the doctor, but stayed in the car. I was able to go for walks when we returned to Ojai, where meetings with architects and the discussion groups continued. On one night in Ojai, K walked in his sleep. I must have heard him bump into something in his room, for I woke up suddenly and totally. He came into the sitting room where I slept on the sofa. I spoke to him and he said, "Maria?" I put on a little light and he was standing against the wall, facing it. He woke up with the light and went back to his room and bed, falling immediately and deeply asleep. I could hear his breathing—that of deep sleep. I stayed awake a long time. In the morning, he said, "I must have walked in my sleep. I've never done that." At breakfast he said, "My head here [back part] feels as if it were expanding [in] great silence, air, and light." He gestured and laughed. In the night, he seemed to have walked in his sleep again. I was again instantly awake at 1 a.m. when I heard him walking in his room, spoke to him, and he responded and came in. "I wonder why I do this?" He went back and slept immediately. Later, on the drive back to Malibu in the car, he said his head was suddenly bad and asked me to drive at 50 miles per hour. Suddenly he said, “I almost fainted just now.” Several times he put his hand over his eyes and groaned. “It’s pretty bad.” Along the coast road, near Decker Canyon, he fainted for about two minutes. The seat belt held him gently, so he didn’t fall into my lap as in past times. When we reached the house, he said he was all right and jumped out to open the garage door. We carried things in and, in his room, when I asked, he said, “I’m all right, don’t worry, I never faint when I’m alone.” So I went to fix our supper.

His head was bad in the night and, though better in the morning, there was still some pain. The deed for the new Krishnamurti Trust Madras arrived, and Krishnaji signed it. This was the entity formed to hold Vasanta Vihar as a result of the court case there against Rajagopal. We went to have it notarized and mailed it to Radha Burnier, now one of its trustees. We walked on the beach, but K was tired on return. News from Balasundaram was that he had hepatitis and his coming to the U.S. was impossible.

Section Eleven

CHAPTER 37

On February twenty-seventh, 1976, we left Malibu in the morning with Krishnaji driving his green car. Along Zuma Beach he said, "Have you any paper?" I found a scrap and wrote what he then said: "A strange thing happened this morning. I was sitting quietly—a sort of meditation—and suddenly there was absolute silence, a withdrawal of everything, and it was like death. There was this body sitting quietly and this truth of not existing anywhere, a complete death; and if I hadn't felt, by Jove, this is getting too far, I don't know what would have happened. It was absolute nothingness. It felt as though if that state continued the body would die. There would be an end of everything."

M: "Was it similar to the times on a walk alone when you felt like going away?"

K: "It was much more intense this morning."

M: "When did it happen?"

K: "After I'd seen you." [About 7 a.m.]

M: "Before breakfast?"

K: "Oh, long before breakfast. There was a period when the back of the brain was tremendously ventilated, as though taking deep breaths and being filled with air. It went on for some time."

M: "How long?"

K: "It may have been two or three minutes or more, I don't know."

M: "When you felt it was getting too much, was it then instantly out?"

K: "Oh, instantly out."

M: "What do you think it is?"

K: "I've had it before but it was in the sense of going away—withdrawing is the wrong word. It was absolute stillness. I think it has to do with what happened in the brain, the expanding, getting ventilated, really air going into it; a slight strain as though a new, fresh brain had been put into it. It sounds so damn silly." [laugh] "A totally uncontaminated… [brain]."

He drove on in silence for a while. I watched the ocean and then tried to describe what was for me the reality of seeing, a wholeness in which are all the senses—the seeing of color, its depth, movement, and form are felt not only in the eye but with all the body, and it comes when there is no thought going on. It is the same with listening—to music, to wind, to the sea, to a voice. K listened carefully and seemed to understand and said it was so.

In Ojai Evelyne Blau and Cynthia Wood lunched with us, and afterward Cynthia told K that she was willing to become a trustee. He said he would raise it with the rest of the board. He then held a private discussion in the cottage. It was on thought and its three realities: that of nature, of objects created by thought (machines, discussions), and that of thought itself (ideas, imagination). Understanding the illusion of thought is truth. In this K began a dialogue with himself. "Since you won't question, I will do it." And he did both ends of a dialogue. He was pleased with this device, and in the evening said he was going to do this in future sessions.

He had been annoyed with Albion Patterson, "not annoyed but jolted" by his comments and felt Patterson was interpreting. "The beginnings of a high priest." He also said that he had been thinking of Rajagopal and Rosalind and no longer felt an attempt on his part to help them "repent," undo the evil they have done, would work. "I think I will leave it alone." Descriptions of Evelyne and Mark Lee on meeting Rosalind seemed to have brought the picture of the same petty, conniving woman. He described her anger when he used to heal: "Why do you do that!" and her walking out when he used to talk to the Happy Valley School teachers. She didn't come to discussions. "She was too stupid to understand." And he retold her comment when Commentaries on Living was published: "Did you write that? You couldn't have. It must have been Rajagopal." A friend told Erna that after many conversations with people in the valley that she thought the aim of the Rajagopals had been to destroy Krishnamurti and the teachings. K was somewhat struck by her thinking that, and he said on this evening that it was probably true. He came in before going to bed and said, "When there is understanding of reality, there is infinite order. And law and justice are inherent in reality."

The next day, March first, Erna and Theo came to lunch, and K told them that he felt Albion Patterson was becoming an interpreter. He had Ruth Tettemer come over and talked to her about it. She suggested K talk to Patterson.

We drove back to Malibu, and on the way he said his head was bad most of the time and had been bad that morning. Then: "I feel like doing something extravagant; what shall we do, Maria?"

M: "Shall we go to a movie? Go dancing? To Las Vegas?"

K: [laugh] "That would be punishment."

M: "What would be extravagant?"

K: "I don't know."

He was tired after supper.

On March fifth we were again off from Malibu to Ojai, Krishnaji driving. After a while he said, "The curious thing is happening. A new thing is being added to it. This morning it was so easy; it has become quite ordinary, it is there—nothingness, a vast nothingness. The new thing I've felt [for] a few days—something, that word sacred—something totally holy, sacred. I don't know what it is."

We were driving along the coast and when we came around the big rock, there across the flat plain was the mountain Topa Topa above Ojai that K cherished and had climbed in past years. It was that day white with snow. "What a country this is! Real California. I wish I could remember what it was like in 1922." Then, "Maria, we must have that house, a jewel, austere, holy. Nothing extravagant or showy." A pause, then, "Thank you for having me here."

The night before I had gone to bed tired and distracted from searching through papers concerning my inheritance of the Malibu house, which would be needed for tax purposes when it was sold. The papers were sad, and K must have felt it, for he said in the car that he had felt very close. And when we spoke of the coming arrival of David and Saral Bohm and my going to the airport to meet them, he said he must come. "I must be near you as much as possible." Did he feel a danger to me? "No, but it is good for me to be with you."

At lunch with Erna and Theo in the cottage, he talked about the house we would build and someday he might live only there and at Brockwood. Not India, he said. He asked if, "when we have K&R," if Rajagopal's name could be removed from the Commentaries. "It doesn't belong there." He again spoke of the remark that the two Rajagopals were out to destroy him and his teachings. "I think that is so." Then he told Erna not to worry about a thing.

"It's all worked out. Everything will come right." He laughed as he expounded on this exuberantly.

In the afternoon he held a discussion in which he went into how to handle a child who is self-centered and gets attention by behaving badly. "Can you move his attention from himself by creating another attention which he will want? Instead of giving him the personal attention which he wants, you move the attention away from him with the same intensity; you divert his energy…I talk to 8,000 people in Bombay about things that are the opposite of what they want. This is my problem—how to reach them. I point out something that is true, get them to look at it, not as opposed to something else. I appeal to their unconscious. There may be an unconscious movement for change, and this same thing may affect parents to send their child to this school. The same quality may affect the child. There may be an unconscious demand, urge, that we cannot go on living as we have in violence. So there are two things: to direct his attention, and talking to his unconscious. You mustn't put him in a position of resisting. He may be here because of something else, sent here—not by parents. Therefore, my responsibility is much greater."

Further discussions took place on the next few days, and on March eighth K talked alone to Albion Patterson and faced him with his speaking against people. He said a religious person should be gentle, patient. Patterson said K was impatient. K said, "I am not impatient, but you repeat over and over things I've already said." He told Patterson that he was criticizing Brockwood and the Ojai school to others. Patterson denied it all and said it was just his way of talking—hyperbole—exaggeration picked up from his years in Latin America. K told him he was setting himself up as interpreter of the teachings. When Patterson denied saying things about the school to the Lilliefelts, K called them in and they had it out. Then we drove home to Malibu.

A cable came from Balasundaram saying that Vasanta Vihar now belonged to the Krishnamurti Trust Madras. On March eleventh I went to Louis Blau's office, where he, Erna, Theo, and I discussed KFA finances and Lou suggested that, for tax reasons, I should buy the whole McAndrew Road property before enlarging the cottage. Later it would be returned to KFA. I came home late and found Krishnaji waiting in the dark at the turn in the driveway in his white bathrobe.

Architects Charles Moore and Charles Rusch came to Malibu the following morning with tentative floor plans which we discussed until it was time for K and me to go to meet Saral and David Bohm at the airport. We brought them back to Malibu for the night. The next morning we took them to Ojai and the newly enlarged upstairs guest apartment next door to Pine Cottage. At 11 a.m. there was a KFA trustee meeting at which Cynthia Wood was elected and which lasted all day except for lunch at Arya Vihara. I went out of the meeting when the question was discussed of selling the McAndrew property to me, prior to my enlarging the cottage to make it a proper residence for K, and the terms of its return to KFA. They agreed, the meeting ended after 5 p.m. and we all went for a walk.

The next morning K talked with David about what a center should be, and in the afternoon they did a dialogue together, which I taped. During it, K said, "All causation is mechanical" and "All thought leads to sorrow." Again there was a long walk. On March sixteenth Sunanda and Pama Patwardhan arrived and spent two nights at Malibu, and then we took them to Ojai.

A conference had been planned to discuss the theme: "In a Disintegrating Society, What Is Right Action for Survival?" The participants were mostly scientists and largely chosen by David Bohm. It was held at the Lilliefelts' house. The first meeting was in the morning on March nineteenth. David was chairman and asked K to open the meeting. He spoke of the essence of religion being to discover what is truth, reality. When that doesn't exist there is degeneration. The transformation of the individual is the transformation of the world, using the word individual in the sense of whole, indivisible. During the discussion, Professor Sudarshan asked whether there was such a thing as another state, and K replied, "I would say there is, but not to be experienced." K said all thinking leads to suffering; all religion is based on thinking. Does death lead to immortality, can a human being learn what death is, a state of timelessness? He said, "A man who suffers lives in darkness." He said that there is a quality of mind which is free from thought; everything based on thought is time-binding; time is the essence of suffering. If thought spills over into timelessness, then it is illusion. So thought must see its limitations and stop there, without any effort, or compulsion. “If I see the limitation, then begins real meditation, then I can explore what suffering is. If I see the whole, it is not suffering.”

Krishnaji easily dominated the meeting without wishing to. Most of the group was silent. He spoke with forceful eloquence and an occasional gesture for emphasis of fist with thumb up. The morning meeting ended and moved to Arya Vihara, where Alan Hooker and Michael Krohnen had lunch ready on the patio. The afternoon session was joined by Margaret Trudeau, wife of the Canadian prime minister, who was there at the suggestion of one of the participants. She had asked to be incognito, and the Lilliefelts had invited her to stay with them. She listened attentively and took notes in a small book.

On the second day of the conference Dr. Anthony Wilden, professor at Simon Fraser University in Canada, arrived with a young woman and man. Erna explained that no more observers could attend, but since they were there they could stay, sitting by the door. Wilden seized a folding chair and stormed in, placing it and the girl just behind K and next to Mrs. Trudeau, saying, “Hello, Maggie” to her. He then went to his place at the conference table and sat looking baleful.

K began the conference talking about the mind and consciousness not being separate. After a short time Wilden made a lengthy, scornful speech about all present consciousness being a result of socioeconomic conditions since 1720. Apparently there were no egos before that, and we were all middle-class mentalities. That was what should be discussed. His behavior continued to be increasingly scornful, rude, and he told David Bohm, who disagreed with one of his statements, that he didn’t know a goddamned thing about what in hell he was talking about. Krishnaji was gentle, firm, and tried to lead him into reason but without much success. Luckily he was not present at the afternoon session.

Margaret Trudeau said she had never met him and that no one ever called her Maggie. She said that some weeks earlier in a television interview she had been asked what had influenced her and she had mentioned Krishnamurti. Wilden heard it, telephoned, and invited her to the conference. She wanted to come but was uncertain about the invitation and wrote to K, which caused me to telephone her and clear it.

The afternoon session was calmer. Krishnaji spoke of part of the mind being mechanical because that which has cause is always mechanical. He asked if there is a portion that is not mechanical. He said that understanding pleasure and ending fear and sorrow is necessary in order to go beyond thought. He asked if living without ego is possible—can we act without conclusions, images? Can we prevent image-making and wipe away ones already there? Thought is always limited and because of that it creates images. It is insanity that creates images. A question was raised on why perception doesn’t always work the first time. K asked if we are conditioned to the process of time, to gradual seeing. He said, “If we gave complete attention—but we don’t. We are not willing to give our lives to this. We are concerned with our own clarity, not clarity itself. If you listen with no resistance, if there are no barriers, then you have it, you’ve seen it. In total listening the problem is finished." He said we rationalize first and then try to perceive. Perceiving is direct insight. "Let the question answer you, not you the question. Perception is timeless. Correct action is always timeless."

March twenty-first was the third day of the conference, and Anthony Wilden turned up. He had met Margaret Trudeau outside and spoke to her so aggressively that she was shaking and said to me that she was frightened. Before I could reply, the conference began. Krishnaji commenced by asking what was correct action that is not born of an idea, and what follows when there is action in perception? Wilden listened only briefly and began a tirade about his having been met by violence when he had arrived. He had been told his friend couldn't attend, but others had wives there. I said he had brought two people uninvited and because of the size of the room we had been unable to invite many who wanted to attend, etcetera. He said he didn't know the man who had come with him. I said that he—Wilden—was a guest of the Foundation and was being asked to go along with the circumstances provided, but he ranted on, refusing to calm down, began stuffing his papers into a briefcase, put on his jacket, got up, and shook a book at everyone, saying something about "If you want to learn—read this!" (a book by him) and then defiantly pulled out a cigarette and lit it. David Bohm pointed out that no smoking had been requested. "That's what I mean!" said Wilden, then threw up his hands and said, "Let me go!" A small chorus of "Well—go!" went up, and he left. It took most of the rest of the morning for the conference to settle down. It turned out that David Shainberg had only thumbed a book by Wilden and got the impression that he was interested in Krishnamurti. On that sliver, he had invited him.

The fourth day produced its own slightly different problems: One of the participants felt that Mrs. Trudeau should be made a participant and this led to all observers being included and some wished that personal problems be discussed. Two in particular wanted to go into the "violence" that had arisen on a personal level. This colored the fifth day, and on the sixth and final meeting, David Bohm came beforehand to the cottage to talk to Krishnaji about how to proceed. At the start of the meeting, K talked about silence and then proposed everyone being silent for fifteen minutes. At the end of this he asked the person who had raised personal matters if he still wanted his problem gone into. The man replied that he had seen it was in himself and so the discussion was released and went on to considerable depths. In the afternoon it was ended, and most people left.

March twenty-sixth, the next morning, David Bohm and David Shainberg came to the cottage to discuss videotaping dialogues that they would do together at Brockwood in May. Erna came in afterward while we had breakfast. "Thank God for Mrs. L.!" said K later. At 12:30 he gave an interview to Dr. Renée Weber, who had been in the conference and taught philosophy at Rutgers University. She stayed to lunch at Arya Vihara with the Bohms, Lilliefelts, Patwardhans, Mark Lee, and Michael Krohnen. The conference was discussed and, in certain Hindu concepts, K explained the TS hierarchy. While doing so he realized he was describing a version of his own. "Mustn't mix it," he said. There was that curious atmosphere as he was speaking. We drove home to Malibu.

CHAPTER 38

A few quiet days ensued in Malibu. Sunanda came down from Ojai to stay, there were walks on the beach, we went to a movie, and I went to talk to an immigration lawyer for information on K obtaining legal residence in the U.S.

On March thirty-first, 1976, we returned to Ojai for Krishnaji's public talks. Besides Sunanda and Pama Patwardhan being there, Narayan, Shakuntala, and their daughter, Natasha, arrived; so did Mavis and Reg Bennett, and Asit Chandmal. There was a sudden cold wave on the day of the first talk, April third, but the audience was large. K noticed the Vigevenos and greeted them nicely. Rajagopal was seen in the crowd at the public discussion on the sixth.

On April ninth at 11 a.m., Sunanda, Pama, Asit, Erna, Theo, and I went to the K&R office to see Krishnamurti's archives. As according to the legal agreement we were to give notice of visiting, Erna had told Mrs. Vigeveno nine days earlier that we were coming. She said it was necessary to ask Mr. Christensen. Erna replied that we were coming under the settlement agreement and nothing further was needed. Mrs. V. was to let her know the next day and didn't. Erna spoke to Mr. Cohen, who said to go ahead. We arrived at the K&R office, which was locked. We all walked up to the Vigeveno house and an agitated Mrs. V. opened the door, saying that Christensen had tried to reach Mr. Cohen and Mrs. Lilliefelt and couldn't (Erna had been home all day and no call came to the office); and we couldn't see the archives. We introduced the Indians, who were trustees of KF India and only in Ojai briefly, etcetera. No. Erna then suggested her telephoning Christensen then, since he had tried to reach her. Mrs. V. then reluctantly let us in and was a long time finding the number, dialed it, Erna spoke to him, and then I did. He said it was not convenient for his clients; "reasonable" rights of visiting must be settled before we could go. I asked what they could consider more reasonable than nine days' notice and an 11 a.m. weekday visit. He reiterated that it was not convenient. I said that convenience defined by them could prevent our ever having access. He said we must settle this, and I suggested he be more responsive to Mr. Cohen's letters and telephone calls so we could end this charade. I put Erna back on, who was much gentler, and we left. On getting back to the car the Indians suggested going directly across the street to Rajagopal. Erna and I said we would not go, but urged Theo to accompany them, and they went. Unshaven and in a bathrobe, Rajagopal met them, greeted Sunanda enthusiastically, they sat on the porch and he said he was helpless—it was his lawyer's advice. Then he invited Sunanda to come the next day and he would show her everything. Asit said he was leaving that day and would like to see his Aunt's [Pupul Jayakar] account of the Ootacamund K's event. R said he didn't quite know where anything was. Sunanda said she would let him know and they left.

Over lunch at Arya Vihara, we recounted it all to Krishnaji. Sunanda, Pama, and Asit were shocked by what they had seen. Sunanda became tearful. K said that Rajagopal was a scoundrel, that it was insulting to invite her while refusing entrance to the rest of us. Sunanda said it was awful to see a man so deteriorated, a tragedy for him. I said it is always a tragedy when a person behaves evilly, Hitler was a tragedy, but my sympathy went to the victims of such people. Rajagopal had in the past and continued to spit on something we all considered sacred. That was what we had seen. Later Sunanda telephoned Rajagopal that she wasn't coming.

K gave his third and fourth talks on the weekend and held education discussions in the afternoon. The Siddoos, Tapas, Patwardhans, and Narayans, etcetera were there, and afterward Sunanda and Pama left. Mrs. Mathias, who was staying in Ojai with Mrs. Porter, came several times to see K. I went to meet Charles Moore at the Pacific Design Center to look at tiles and appliances, and went over plans for the cottage, returned to Malibu for supper with the Dunnes, and was back in Ojai by 8:40. On the fifteenth, at the public meeting, K tried holding the discussion with three—Fritz Wilhelm, Narayan, and David Moody—in which the audience could join. The subject was the same as that in the scientists' conference: "In a Disintegrating Society, What Is Correct Action to Survive in Freedom?" In the afternoon he held another meeting at the cottage on activities in the center and then had a walk down Thacher Road. There were similar discussions the next day. Erna and I talked to Stanley Cohen about whether to sue Rajagopal for noncompliance with the settlement agreement and decided to try first through Christensen with implications of a suit.

The sixth and final talk was on April eighteenth to about 5,000 people. He spoke on religion, meditation, and beauty. We came back to the cottage and packed before one more meeting with David Bohm, Fritz Wilhelm, the Lilliefelts, and Alan Kishbaugh on plans for the Adult Center, which Fritz was to move to Ojai to direct. We then left Ojai and came back to Malibu in time for supper.

During the next ten days, there were more meetings on enlarging Pine Cottage, I went to collect forms to fill out for Krishnaji's residence permit, we went to movies twice with Alan Kishbaugh, walked as always on the beach, and the Narayans came to lunch. He had been to Canada and it was decided that he join the Siddoos and create a school and center there.

On April twenty-sixth, on a clear and marvelous morning, we were packed and ready to leave for the airport when Alan came at seven. Krishnaji drove with him, and Amanda followed with me after goodbyes to Phil and Philippa. K and I flew to New York. My brother had sent a car to meet us and we were back in the familiar little flat in the Ritz Tower by 6. The next morning Narayan's brother came to see K, and later my brother took us to lunch at Côte Basque. He had been reading Mary Lutyens's biography of K and talked at length about it. The reason for stopping in New York was for the psychiatrist conference put together by David Shainberg to which we took Sunanda and Pama and later to lunch afterward. They came back to the flat and talked at length. On April thirtieth we flew to England and were met the next morning by Dorothy, Doris, and Ted Cartee. The trees were just beginning to leaf at Brockwood, the school term was beginning that day, and it was good to be there once more.

Krishnaji decided that in addition to talking to the whole school he would also have meetings alone with the students. This they liked very much. Apparently they all sat on the floor and emerged for lunch looking very pleased. People came to stay—Pascaline Mallet for a few days, and Aditi Mangaldas, Nandini's granddaughter, came for three weeks. It was Krishnaji's eighty-first birthday on May twelfth. He came in as I was ironing in the pre-exercise dawn. A disdainful "Oh" was all he said in dismissal of his birthday. He was jokey and shiny in the kitchen while we made breakfast. Later the Guardian book review department rang up wanting to interview him about the Notebook, about to be published, and the BBC was sending a radio interviewer too. "Why are they interested?" K asked and brushed aside the obvious reasons. He spent the morning in bed, reading and sleeping, but when he saw Dorothy later, as it was her birthday too, he was full of "happy birthdays" to her and then, "That takes care of that!" In a great wind, he, she, and I walked four miles across the fields. K was glowing with vitality. In the evening we watched a long Kojak on TV.

Two days later I went to the U.S. embassy in London to file Krishnamurti's application for an immigration visa for permanent residence—the "green card." When I got back to Brockwood, Jackie Kornfeld had arrived to stay during the videotaping of discussions between Krishnaji, David Bohm, and David Shainberg. She had suggested these and had arranged and donated the costs of the project. The video equipment was set up in the West Wing drawing room, and on May seventeenth, the taping began. It continued daily that week, seven dialogues in all. It was done with professional equipment and skill, and the results were very good. It was done on two-inch color tape, using three cameras. K had a large clock off-camera and kept the timing and pace on track. These discussions form the series entitled The Transformation of Man.

On the second day of the taping, K said to me in the evening, "I had the most extraordinary meditation while sitting at breakfast. I went off. I must be very careful. You know death is very close. You mustn't look like that when I mention death. It isn't that. It is a complete emptiness, nothingness."

The videotaping was completed on May twenty-first, and the following week Krishnamurti was interviewed about the publication of Krishnamurti's Notebook by BBC radio, and also by Angela Neustatter for the Guardian newspaper. K, who had hay fever during the taping, was finally able to go for a walk again. On June first I went to London and the Indian High Commission for a police clearance needed for K's immigration application. Narayan came with me and was very helpful. We saw a Mr. Vethakhan, secretary for education, who expedited the whole thing and took us for lunch at an Indian restaurant nearby. I later went for K's and my tickets to Paris.

In the days to follow, K talked to the school, and we went to London for his dentist and to Huntsman for fittings. When the Guardian review of the Notebook appeared, K gathered it wasn't much, and said, "I will review it!" and dictated an anonymous splendid review, laughing as he went along.

A few days later, on June twenty-first, we lunched with Mary Links at Fortnum and K gave her his review of the Notebook to read without telling her who wrote it and watched her read it with a merry look. I thought she would guess, but she didn't. At the end, she asked, and there was much laughter. After lunch K took a taxi to his dentist and returned by himself to Huntsman, where I met him. These solo flights made me nervous but seemed to please him. Back at Brockwood we watched tennis at Wimbledon and golf at the U.S. Open. He said he had dropped golf totally when he moved away from where he played. "Interesting," he said. "I was very good at golf and playing the flute [in Paris] but that went away too, as if I was only to do this, everything went into this." [talking]

A heat wave settled on southern England, but life at the school went on. K talked to the students, and in one interesting discussion he spoke of registering only at the biologic or technical level but not at the psychological—a "thin, thin surface registering without reaction, or the psychological me." The heat continued climbing, 104 at Wimbledon and 95 in London—said to be the highest ever, but it was time to pack.

On Tuesday, June twenty-ninth, we were up early, all was in good order, and Dorothy drove us to Heathrow, pausing for a picnic lunch at Virginia Water, where we found some shade and a wisp of breeze. British Airways took us to Paris, landing for our first time at the new Charles de Gaulle airport. Paris was even hotter than England, and only the lobby at the Plaza Athénée was air-conditioned, but in spite of the heat, we took a walk to stretch our legs. Then supper in our usual rooms.

The next day we lunched under parasols in the hotel garden on melon, gazpacho, tiny haricots verts, tagliatelle au gratin, and fraises des bois. Nadia Kossiakof joined us for coffee, gave publication news, and health reports too. Mme. Duché, who had a slow cancer, was working on three translations: Krishnamurti's Notebook, Tradition and Revolution, and Krishnamurti on Education. She also said that Carlos Suarès had terminal cancer. I later asked K if he wanted to do anything about the Suarèses? He said no. They didn't want contact with him.

The heat was withering again the following day. We were able to do a few small shopping errands, and lunched again in the garden, which managed to seem cool with flowered awnings, shrubbery, climbing vines, and birds, impeccable service, and very good food. It was a popular place with people who seemed to have walked off the pages of the nonsense thrillers we read. After a small rest, we walked to a cinema showing Butch Cassidy et Le Kid that I thought K had seen, but if he had, he had forgotten, so it was a success.

CHAPTER 39

On Friday, July second, 1976, we flew from Paris to Geneva, picked up a blinding green Opel instead of the expected BMW, and drove into town for the annual errands: to Patek for watch inspection, to Grand Passage for a few small things, and then to Jacquet, where K chose silks for ties for Joe Links and himself. Then, going along the lake, we set off for Gstaad. The air became clean and cool. Switzerland was dry but without the scorched look of France. K was thirsty, and we stopped for apple juice. The country above Lausanne was beautiful as ever, and the air tasted of mountains. Finally Gstaad, cool, green, and rained-upon. Vanda and Fosca were in the chalet, and all was clean, quiet, and serene. The mountains were imperturbable, as ever in snow. I unpacked and disappeared into sleep.

How narrow the limits are in which the body can function properly. K and I were both revived the next day. It rained a little, there were a few errands to do in the village, and K had his hair cut. On Sunday there was news of Israeli commandos rescuing 100 hijacked hostages on an Air France plane held by terrorists in Angola, while in Gstaad K was visited by the two Siddoo sisters and their guest Tapas. They brought mangoes and told of buying thirty-two acres and a house by the sea on Vancouver Island for their school. They showed photographs and wanted to start it in September. Narayan was discussed as director. K had received a letter from Sunanda saying that Balasundaram was thinking of relinquishing the principalship of Rishi Valley.

On Tuesday, July sixth, Mr. Rusu came to see K in the afternoon and said that he had been at the point of death in the hospital several months ago and that K had come to him for eight hours and saved his life. He also claimed to have met the Lord Maitreya. K didn't comment to Mr. Rusu on this but was dismissive about it later to me. He went for a walk, and I drove Mr. Rusu home.

In the morning, K told me of "a strange happening" and then, while at his lunch, spoke of it again to Vanda and me and dictated the following: "Before beginning asanas, he generally sits quietly, thinking of nothing, but this morning a strange happening took place, most unexpected and in no way invited, and besides, you can't invite these things. Suddenly it appeared as though in the very center of the brain, the head, right inside, there was a vast space in which was unimaginable energy. It is a part, or it is there that nothing whatever is registered—for that which is registered is a wastage of energy. If one can call it, it was pure energy in a limitless space, a space that had nothing but this sense of immensity. One doesn't know how long it lasted, but all during the morning it was there and, as this is being written, it is as though it was taking root and becoming firm. These things are not really the thing itself. Basta. I'd better go and eat."

On Wednesday, July seventh, K received a letter from Pupul saying she had just met the prime minister and "have arranged everything regarding your visit here this winter. I told her that KFI was anxious to invite you to come and hold discussions and talks in India this year, and we wanted to talk it over with her so that there would be no embarrassment on any side. She assured me warmly that 'Krishnaji is most welcome to come and speak here.' I then told her that you would be holding discussions and public talks and she said there would be no problem and that this arrangement would be 'perfectly all right.' She knows of your talks and has read several of your books. I have also told her that if any local arrangements have to be made in Bombay and Madras, where the public talks will be held, I will tell the chief minister that this matter has been cleared with her and she has asked me to do so. There is, therefore, no problem of any kind and you should go ahead and fix your pregame to come to India accordingly. I am prepared to stand absolute guarantee."

K also received a separate letter from Pupul, dated twenty-fourth June, 1976, from Bombay, saying that she and Nandini had been writing all they could remember of the incidents in Ootacamund in May–June 1948. This was an attempt to fill in the missing parts of the record written by Pupul at the time and given to Rajagopal for safekeeping, but missing from the photocopies he provided KFA in the spring of 1975, as called for in the settlement agreement. Pupul stated that during the incidents she wrote down every night what had taken place. She and Nandini were living at a nearby hotel. K was staying with Miss Hilla Petit and Maurice Frydman. She described K's pain in his spine, nape of neck, and tooth. K had asked her and Nandini to sit quietly, not interfere, and not be afraid, not to touch him except to close his mouth if he fainted. And on no account to leave the body alone. He tossed on the bed, had fits of shivering, would call out for Krishna, and then put his hand to his mouth saying, "I must not call him." The body appeared to be only a shell. In this state the voice was frail, childlike. Then, suddenly, the body appeared to fill with a vast presence. K would sit up cross-legged, his eyes closed, the fragile body would appear to grow and fill the room, and there was a palpable, throbbing silence that poured into the room and enveloped them. They remembered one incident vividly: "K in great pain, his stomach swollen, tears pouring down his face, suddenly fainted, and his body became intensely still. The traces of pain and fatigue were wiped away. The face was greatly beautiful; there was a radiance, a light that illuminated it, and a sense of vastness that we had never witnessed. A quality of sacredness filled the room. For moments he lay unmoving, then his eyes opened. He saw us and after some time he said, 'Did you see that face?' We said yes but could not say anything else as we had no words. He lay silently and then 'the Buddha was here.' And then after some time: 'You are blessed.' Most of the time in the room we had no part to play in what was happening, and yet we had a role we couldn't understand. We questioned him during the day, but he became vague and would not explain. On most occasions, while the pain racked him, he spoke of trees and wind and rain, nature, its storms, and its vast silences. There was nothing personal in him during the incidents, no emotion, no relationship to us. The ordeal appeared physical and yet next day left no traces on his face or body. Not a word said by him had psychological overtones. What he said was totally impersonal. The sense of the sacred permeated the room and the atmosphere on every occasion." It is signed by Pupul Jayakar and Nandini Mehta and dated 23 June 1976.

Krishnaji didn't read it for quite a while. He said, "We'll read it together later." And then put it off. When I asked him about it later, he said, "I've seen it. I'd be shy to have it read out loud."

The next day, Edgar Graf came to lunch with Vanda and me. Later I went to tea with the Siddoos and Tapas. K wanted me to talk to them informally. I didn't bring up the subject of Narayan, a situation I would sooner stay out of, feeling they should work it out for themselves.

Vanda had been urging K to see Iyengar, who was in Gstaad for a few days. K wanted nothing to do with him and would not take a lesson from him. Vanda had showed him the yoga stool which he said was all right for K, but to avoid the rush of blood it gives to the head, part of the weight should be on the forearms. Vanda persuaded K to let Iyengar come to greet him before leaving. Later K said he was a man full of arrogance and self-importance.

Sunday, July eleventh, Krishnaji's first Saanen talk of the year took place in the tent at 10:30. I had exchanged the fearfully green Opel for a smaller pear-colored Fiat, and sitting in it waiting by the chalet door, it was a time of wonder come again; another year, the Alpine shimmer of light, a sense of such quiet blessing, the immanence of his stepping through the door and into the sunlight, all grace and on his way. The tent was almost full. I found a seat near the book table. In the evening Scott began showing the videos in the tent of Krishnaji's discussions with David Bohm and David Shainberg. These continued throughout the week, as did the talks. Topazia Alliata came to lunch. Evelyne Blau came to talk to me about KFA matters, then Mary Cadogan joined us and they met for the first time.

On the fifteenth, Krishnaji gave his third talk, an extraordinary one on seeing with all the senses, a total seeing that is without psychological registering. Vanda's brother, his wife, and Suad Al Radi came to lunch, and K questioned her on the Near East. The next day, Mar de Manziarly gave Vanda the news that Carlo Suarès had died that morning in Paris of cancer.

"Poor man," said K.

On the sixteenth, there was the annual meeting of all the K committees. K began it by telling of Suarès's death. Scott Forbes gave a report on videos, Evelyne Blau spoke about the Ojai school, and Jackie Siddoo spoke of the Canadian one. Mme. Duché came in a wheelchair. She had not been well and, according to what was quietly said, she had cancer but was hoping to complete the translation of three of Krishnamurti's books: Krishnamurti's Notebook, Krishnamurti on Education, and Tradition and Revolution. The Notebook, she said, was the hardest. "How do you put 'otherness' in French?" She came to talk to Krishnaji privately on the nineteenth.

July twenty-first. Vanda left for Florence. The talks continued, people came to see K, and he watched the Olympics on television. One early morning, while I was doing yoga, Fosca tapped on my door and said there was a young woman "come to see Signor Krishnaji." I went to the front door and there on the doorstep she stood, rather pretty, dressed in a dirndl skirt, organdy blouse with nothing under it, but with a determined look on her face. She had come for her appointment. I explained that there was no appointment and that Mr. Krishnamurti was probably sleeping. "Then wake him up." I said I was sorry, but one never disturbed him. She held her ground, and I finally ran out of things to say and politely had to close the door. On going back to my room I began to wonder if she had really gone and went around to the kitchen, which looked out on the driveway. There in the center, on the cobblestones, she was lying flat on her back. Realizing that at any moment the milkman might swing around the corner and, not expecting to see a body lying there, might bring about a disaster, I went out and spoke to her. No reply, just staring eyes. I wondered about epilepsy, but at that moment Mme. Matti, the caretaker of the chalet, appeared, took a look and said, "Elle fait du théâtre."

She went to summon a taxi, which quickly appeared, and luckily the driver was a woman. There was no response from the body on the cobblestones, but the owner of the chalet came out and with his added help we were able to hoist her into the cab and send it down to the office of the doctor who was also something official in Gstaad. It seems that on arrival she stepped nimbly out of the cab, saying there was nothing wrong with her and she could not be held. I believe tea and soothing words were provided. Otherwise it was a quiet day.

The next day, July twenty-fifth, K gave his seventh and final Saanen talk, and Dorothy and Montague moved up to the chalet from the camping ground. K rested, but on the twenty-eighth he began the first of daily public discussions in the tent. He also talked with Fritz Wilhelm about the adult center in Ojai and also with the Siddoos and Narayan about Narayan's going to their school in Vancouver to be its principal and form an adult center there as well. K dictated a memorandum of agreement. He also dictated a letter to India saying that he would be coming there in November.

On August seventh Mar de Manziarly rang from Paris to tell Krishnaji that Nadia Kossiakof was ill in the hospital, but though very weak, wanted him to know that she was resolved to live because she still had work to do for him.

The following is a quote from my notes:

"On August tenth, Dorothy and Montague left Tannegg, steaming stylishly down the hill in their Land Rover to pause and collect Doris in Saanen before setting off for Brockwood. The house became immediately quiet; withdrew into privacy. Krishnaji felt it. Curious how we make divisions. Mme. Walsh and the Mattis are below and the proprietor creaks overhead and plays Mozart piano pieces to himself at suppertime, but here in the middle, our territory has its own dimension in space and atmosphere. Yesterday Krishnaji found me in tears reading about his brother's death. I had been sifting through Mary's biographies for K's addresses and whereabouts. The U.S. visa people had sent a revised application form, which called for listing every address at which he had lived, even for less than six months, since 1911. Mary's meticulous biography has made it possible. But I read parts as I go, and finished wanting to cry and cry. 'Why?' asked K. I tried to tell him it was because of all the pain he had to go through, the physical pain, Nitya torn away—why? He was left with all those foolish people, but most of all, it was for his own undimmed, undeterred passion to convey the teaching. I have never seen a moment of discouragement in him. I think I cried at the wonder of his existing and it was what I felt in India, where it seemed as if there were an enormous scale with all the pain, confusion, and suffering in that country of millions on one side, and on the other, balancing it all, the slight and infinite figure of Krishnamurti. So it was today with the whole of humanity with its ghastliness and K balancing it by his existence—one human being in whom beauty and goodness shine. I felt the wild wish to be able to give everything, to die for that. So when he asked me what I felt, this is what I tried to say. He asked me if I was still keeping a diary and to put it down. Did I do so? I said no, that I wasn't writing about myself. 'But you must,' he said. 'It gives it a bite—what you see, what you feel.' I wonder if I can. I write all this under severe restrictions at times. I should change."

By August eleventh, for Krishnaji's visa application papers, I was up to 1965—my own time—but it is pages long! Endless travels. I ache with a protective impulse to smooth, to make everything right for him. Vanda rang from Florence and said she will return Friday or Saturday for a week of checking his yoga. We walked to the river and saw its flow on a certain rock that is its pulse for us. K watches the water run and his face is alive and eager, as that of a child. There was thunder as we came through the woods and drops began to fall as we reached the chalet.

In the next couple of days, I was able to complete the list of K's addresses from 1911 to 1976, needed for his visa papers, and sent them off to the U.S. embassy in London.

On August thirteenth he came into the room, picked up a copy of Krishnamurti's Notebook, opened it at random (page 180) and after a few moments said, "Quite good." Then, "Is it as good as that?" pointing to a book by Laurie Lee that I had said I liked. I read him a sentence of his own describing a rock in Rishi Valley, as pure writing style quite apart from what he had to say. He made dismissing sounds as he did when one says something he considers a compliment. I said he should write some more. "Maybe I will. But if I start I won't do anything else. Talking is what I do, not that."

Radha Burnier had arrived in Gstaad and came for lunch. K had his on a tray in his room but came in afterward and talked to Radha most of the afternoon, mostly on India. Things were outwardly smoother, more efficient there, but fear still existed underneath. Pupul seemed to see only the positive side of what was happening and didn't seem to want to look at realities. Radha and Achyut had difficulty in talking to her freely, but Radha felt that, with the prime minister's statement to Pupul that he was welcome to come to talk and with the personal guarantee of the prime minister, that Krishnaji could safely come. I took Radha back to her hotel later, and K took a nap until 6 and then sleepily realized it was too late for a walk.

In the evening, Jackie Kornfeld telephoned from the U.S. to say that station KGBH in Boston was enthusiastic about the K-Bohm-Shainberg videos and tentatively wanted to broadcast them. She asked about editing and suggested Sunanda to do it, but I suggested they submit transcripts from the tapes with any changes they might want, and they would be submitted to the KFT publication committee for decision.

On August fourteenth, Radha Burnier came again for lunch and K did not want to miss his nap and walk time. The conversation was in part about C. W. Leadbeater: Did he have real insight? They thought he had a little, which, because of his conditioning, etcetera, he embellished and made personal. "He was a materialist," said K. Radha said Arundale was an intensely possessive, jealous man who didn't want his wife Rukmini (Radha's aunt) to go anywhere without him. "Amma was the only real one," said K. Radha said that in the Vasanta Vihar court settlement, in the spring, a small cash sum was to come to the Krishnamurti Trust in Madras. When she went to collect it, she was told that Rajagopal had had it sent to him in Ojai, in spite of the court order. It was less than $100. She also said that Rukmini was trying to get on the board of trustees of Vasanta Vihar with other of her people in order to try to get it for herself. We all three wondered if this was also a Rajagopal ploy. Then the conversation went to other things: the meaning of yoga, karma, what dies at death? K put it that the stream of thought, self, conditioning, etcetera continues and it manifests again. The individual consciousness, as we know it, is of that stream, and unless a person changes he contributes to that stream. When he dies, matter dies; thought is matter and so dies. What he was remains part of the stream. That stream becomes part of a newborn human being, and so it goes. The stream is the karma, not something individual. Only when one steps out of the stream is there a new dimension.

On August twenty-first Vanda had returned to Gstaad and was there when we said goodbye to her and Fosca on a lovely morning. The day before, I had exchanged our little car for an Opel large enough to carry our luggage. We drove via the Col du Pillon down to Aigle to join the autoroute along the lake. K had chosen this route because he liked to see the two large cypresses just above Aigle. “Ciao, amici!” he would say. The new road brought his child’s smile and absorption in looking. His sense of interest and wonder is part of the joy of being with him. His pleasure, too, in the Patek clock in the airport, exact to fractions of seconds.

We flew British Air to Heathrow, where Dorothy, hot and distracted, met us when we finally emerged after an endless wait for the luggage. The change in England since we left in June was dismaying. Drought had withered the fields, grass was brown, tired leaves on trees, the sun was malevolent. Brockwood was tepid in the downstairs rooms, but the brown lawn felt like steel wool. I hadn’t the heart to go in the grove. We unpacked and didn’t walk.

Section Twelve

CHAPTER 40

Soon after our return to Brockwood in late August 1976, we went to London to lunch with Mary L., then a dentist inspection for K, and Erna and Theo arrived from Ojai. There was much to discuss in the days ahead. Fritz Wilhelm also arrived and so did Margrete Heising, whom he was soon to marry. The Digbys arrived from their new home in Dorset, and Pascaline Mallet arrived from France.

The weather cooled a little in time for Krishnaji's first Brockwood talk on August twenty-eighth. The tent was filled and overflowed outside. Mary and Joe were there and came upstairs for fruit and salad before we all went back to the tent for the main course. I was included in the publications committee meeting in the afternoon, and in the evening the videotapes of the Bohm-Shainberg discussions with K were shown. The next day, K gave his second Brockwood talk, and in the afternoon he walked with Dorothy, Erna, Theo, and me in rain, rapturous rain. That evening, he watched The Bridge on the River Kwai on television.

On Tuesday and Thursday, K held the public discussions. Radha Burnier had half our lunch upstairs in our kitchen. K gave a tremendous talk on September fourth, and there was discussion of his wanting meetings of trustees in March in Ojai to examine the work of the schools, their future, etcetera. The next day he gave his fourth and final Brockwood talk for the year, and again it was an overwhelming one. Mary and her daughter, Amanda Pallant, were at the book table; I joined them, and we all had tea upstairs later. People began to leave, the house became quieter, K dictated letters and discussed KFA matters with Erna and Theo. K and I signed a revised KFA charter and revised agreement of the law case settlement. On the ninth, K began meetings with the staff on applying his teachings while giving academics.

On September thirteenth, in spite of having had a cold for three days, K declared he was well enough to go to London. Mysteriously, he seemed able to throw off colds in contrast to his hay fever, and so we went to London: Huntsman and the dentist. His face looked pinched on the train, and it was a cold day with light rain, but the Huntsman fitting pleased him, and we went on to lunch with Mary at Fortnum. She had a copy of the Avon paperback of the biography to show him, which looked quite nice. He told her of the two meetings with the staff at Brockwood, the first of his plan to teach them, and all of us, how to convey his teachings mingled with academic subjects. He also talked very seriously about a month of meetings in Ojai in March on the future of the schools, the work, etcetera. He and Mary thought a few—perhaps three—should be responsible for seeing that the teachings were kept alive, active, unaltered, and un-interpreted after his death. K thought Sunanda, Fritz, and I might be the three. To my own surprise, during the two meetings with the Brockwood teachers, something had begun to come alive about this where a blank had been. K wanted Mary to think about this—could she come in March? We went to Hatchards next door for books, and then Joe very thoughtfully came and picked us all up. K had his appointment with Mr. Thompson, the dentist. Two lower front teeth were loose and would have to come out. We had luck with a quick taxi to Waterloo. In the train, K again spoke about Sunanda, Fritz, and me. I said he would have to educate me. He feels people would accept and trust me. I had no such optimism. He said he would have Sunanda take notes of anything he tells her and Fritz in India during the winter, and send them to me. I was to keep the Lilliefelts informed.

I asked him about what had come up at one of the teacher meetings: his demand that we transform the students instantly, completely. Was that possible? How was it that he had not done it while speaking for so many years? "I've wondered about it," he said. He thought that Mrs. Besant had once said that the teachings were so enormous, the light was too strong. "It is too much, and people go blind. But when you die, the light will be there but the personality won't."

On Wednesday, September fifteenth, we went to London and directly to Fortnum for lunch, and talked about the immediate assessments the mind makes on seeing people. For example, at a glance one recognizes Americans. K watched a man at a nearby table and guessed he was an artist. I asked if these images that were so instantaneous were a part of data gathering by the mind and wrong in terms of his teaching. "With me, I am vacant most of the time except when I'm talking," he said. "I see someone, I may know it is Miss Pratt, but my mind is empty." I said it seemed as if one sees facts and images but keeps the score open, so to speak. One keeps looking, not letting the image obliterate what was seen. K seemed to assent to this, but I was not sure, in case he was feeling a little vacant that day.

We walked to Huntsman, where he fitted a pair of thin trousers and chose a greenish-beige tweed for a warm pair. Then we struggled for a taxi—he on the corner of Cork Street and I on Savile Row. We got to Mr. Thompson's, where K went in to have his two lower middle teeth pulled. They were loose and worn away. Sitting in the waiting room by the door, I could hear him and Mr. Thompson laughing. Soon the nurse came out to say he would soon be through, which was my signal to find a taxi. One wouldn't wait but a second was cheerful and sympathetic, and I sat in it to be sure. Then, in a minute, out came Krishnaji, making a gesture that it was all nothing. He had a little Novocain, no pain, and the bridge now had new teeth that looked totally natural. I asked him if his own teeth might have a healing quality. He said yes, we should have saved them. He said too that healing cannot be taught or transmitted to another. It is strongest in a person with the least self. I asked if he could heal himself. "No, but if you put your hand on me and I touch your hand, it helps."

Monday, September twentieth, 1976, Erna telephoned from London, where she and Theo were pausing between Majorca and their return to Ojai. At 11:30 a.m. K held an intensive two-hour discussion with staff, mostly on fear, putting himself in the role of the student. It was a good discussion. Later, Balasundaram, just arrived from India, came on the walk with K, Dorothy, me, and the dogs. It was a warm day; the earth breathed with the damp smells of autumn. It was for me a lovely land that moved me, and I felt dissolved for moments in its rolling fields. The air, so filled with earth and sky, was everything. The day before, coming back from the walk, Jim Fowler was there with the horses and persuaded me to get up on the little bay. Being suddenly on a horse again after so many years was a delight. I rode over to K with all the instantly alive reflexes and pleasure of long-ago horse days. It would have been marvelous to ride at Brockwood, BUT the stirrup leather and flap of the saddle was exactly where my most fragile skin graft was, where the ulcer was a year before, and where there was hardly any cushion of tissue under the graft.

On the twenty-second of September, we went by train to London and the U.S. embassy to have affidavits by K and by me notarized on the particulars of his birth. These were in lieu of a birth certificate required by his U.S. immigration visa application. An eager older woman worker appeared to introduce a shy younger one who had recognized K. He shook hands and made his slight bow. I wished it had happened in the immigration section, which was as impersonal as a factory. We walked to Fortnum, where Mary and Joe joined us for a pleasant lunch. Afterward, Joe took K to Truefitt for a haircut. I did some errands and joined K at Huntsman for his fitting. By then it was raining hard, and the taxi world was elsewhere—what to do? But luck manifested in the person of the father of a Brockwood student, who caught sight of Krishnaji through the Huntsman window and had a car parked across the street. He kindly drove us to Waterloo, and all was well. I was sleepy in the train and dozed but woke to watch K reading a detective novel we bought at Waterloo, his lips moving faintly with the words, his fingers seeming polished as he held the book. The grace and beauty that was so limitless in his face could be watched endlessly, wonderingly. In the evening, we watched a television interview of a Soviet dissident writer. “We are talking about the same things,” said K when the latter said that change could not come from without but from within.

On the twenty-sixth, K gave his first talk of the new term to the students. He looked quite splendid in his new beige trousers and brown jersey, and seemed no more than thirty years old. His face was alive, quick, full of laughter and shine. He spoke about listening and what it can be. In the afternoon, Mr. Santhanum from Madras came with his son to tea. When they left after 5 p.m., K, Dorothy, the dogs, and I walked down to the lodge and across the fields. There were many mushrooms in the fields. The air was soft, warm, and moist; the grass was green, green at last—all the delights of England.

On the twenty-ninth, we went to London, did assorted errands, and joined Mary for lunch at Fortnum. Mary was uneasy about using the K–Bohm discussions as the main part of the next book of talks. She said they sometimes sounded as if David was interpreting K’s teaching to him. I described how these took place in the afternoons after K’s nap and that he often came in rather sleepy, and David would recapitulate where they had left off previously. Mary still felt it shouldn’t be a book at that point. K seemed to see this but said he let David do a bit of the talking at the start. I told her that the videos of K’s discussions with David Bohm and David Shainberg had been accepted for broadcast by station KGBH in Boston.

K then began to talk rather intensely about India: that nothing had been done there in all those years—would Sunanda be able to handle it? He felt she was still immature. We all doubted that India would accept a Westerner being in charge one day. He suggested a group—David Bohm, the Lilliefelts, Mary L., Mary Z., Dorothy, possibly Fritz W., but it didn't sound too good. In the train later, he said to me, "I want to talk to you."

October first. K saw Tapas in the morning. After that he told me that we must have a serious talk about the work. He said that I block myself by defending and saying that things are impossible. I am not free. The Lilliefelts had not gone into things deeply; the Indians were good at repetitive inquiry but not free. "That is what is left at the end of sixty years. So really there was actually no one. Perhaps someone might turn up, but actually there was no one then."

What to do? "Mary Links could not do it either, nor could others. We must take things as they are and work from there. There's you and Sunanda. In India I will meet Sunanda, Achyut, Pupul, Ahalya, Radha B., and Balasundaram. The best are in England—you, David Bohm. In Ojai there is only the Lilliefelts, you, and Fritz Wilhelm, if he proves right. He will be on trial in India this winter. India sometimes makes people crazy." I asked if there had ever been anyone. He said, "Jadu and Rama Rao had capacity but Rajagopal drove them away. In India—leave it open. Radha might have something but Theosophy is her job; she can't leave it. What to do with these few? Build everything as though I'm going to die tomorrow. At Brockwood there is David Bohm, Mrs. D., and you. At Ojai there's the Lilliefelts, you, Fritz, Mark Lee, and David Bohm. You and David Bohm are kingpins between the U.S. and England. Both are liked and trusted. In India, Pupul may be finished or might come out. Sunanda will cooperate with you."

He said I must remind him in India to talk to those who would come to Ojai in March to have complete confidence in each other. He said, "The point of all this is to keep the teachings fundamentally and vitally in the schools. If the schools don't vitally reflect the teachings, they are better cut loose." He wanted me to talk to Mrs. D. about her defensiveness, lack of pliability. I pointed out that her qualities and David's complemented each other and might succeed at Brockwood, and since he was stuck with me, would he please hammer on my head? "I will," he said. He didn't want me to go to India that winter, saying the climate was too difficult and that I must keep healthy for all this.

October third. It rained all day. K spoke to the school and visitors on love and suffering and the connection between them. Tapas left after lunch. David B., Scott Forbes, Joe Zorski, and I finished editing the transcripts of the videotaped discussions Nos. 4 and 5 between K, David Bohm, and David Shainberg. In spite of the rain we walked with Dorothy in the afternoon. In the evening I asked him why he was talking so much about "after my death"? I reminded him he had said recently that he would live another ten to fifteen years. "That still stands," he said. "Luckily my brain is alive as ever and will be until I die."

On October seventh I went ahead of K to London to get his Italian visa and then met him after he had come in on a later train at Mary L.'s for lunch. We spoke of publishing some of the K–Bohm discussions in a book of mainly Saanen and Brockwood talks. The Digbys had suggested it as a compromise to publishing all the discussions which some—mainly Mary—felt gave a wrong effect on paper of David interpreting the teachings to K. Joe came in after lunch and drove K to the dentist. When I met him there, he had a gleaming new and spare bridge. We caught a taxi to Waterloo and the 2:50 p.m. K dozed on the train and kept waking himself up with what he calls shouting—more of a sudden start and cry. "I don't know why I do it. I've tried to figure it out and never could." It happened when he was in a light sleep, dozing. There were no dreams in it, and he had done it for years.

The next day I fetched Mary Cadogan at Petersfield. K spoke to the school, and after lunch he talked with Mary, Dorothy, and me about David Bohm "assuming the mantle" when K is gone. All felt that David didn't want it, was a good man, and was devoted to K and the teachings. The difficulty was one of being able to talk and go into things without assuming authority. K was bothered by Dorothy's "defending" and not having new ideas. And he said again to me that I see difficulties and not how things can be done. He spoke of getting good teachers from Brockwood, Ojai, and India together. Later, we watched a television series on "Victorian Scandals," and that particular one on Annie Besant and Charles Bradlaugh's trial for publishing a tract on birth control. "Amma didn't look like that!" said K, and the same of Bernard Shaw. "She never talked to me about Bradlaugh. She talked about other things, but not about him. She said, 'Jinarajadasa shouldn't be the head of the TS because he liked to look at naked women.'—Oh, Amma!"

On the following day, October ninth, K reviewed his statement written in June for the Bulletin on his being responsible only for schools under his direct supervision and therefore only those could use his name. It was to be printed in the next issue. He then talked to Narayan at some length. He was pleased with Narayan and felt he would do well. K had asked him if things didn't work out in Canada, would he go to India? Narayan said of course he would, which pleased K. He was pliable, which was lacking at that point in Dorothy. "She isn't moving forward. What will we do if something happens to her? Brockwood will fall apart." He was disturbed that there wasn't anyone else and she had not found anyone else as a backup. He wanted me to talk to her, as she became so upset when he did.

Professor Maurice Wilkins arrived for the weekend and stayed in the West Wing guest room. David Bohm held a meeting in the afternoon. Only six students attended with staff and visitors. After supper, Dave, Scott, Joe, and I worked on editing of Nos. 6 and 7 of the K, Bohm, and Shainberg video discussions.

The next day, Krishnaji spoke to the school—mostly on what love is (i.e., when there is no self) and on beauty (when there is no thought). The students seemed to see the latter more easily. It was a tiring session for K, as he had to put very much energy into their understanding. Then there was much talk at lunch. A French lady, Mme. Maroger, visiting the school with her son and his daughter, Ariane, a possible student at Brockwood. Mme. Maroger had long been interested in K's teachings and discussed it with a group of her grandchildren and their friends. Both she and her son spoke fluent English. After lunch, the son, Jean-Michel Maroger, gave me a cassette of one of K's Saanen talks into which he had inserted a French translation between sentences in the natural pauses in K's speaking. He asked me to give my opinion of it and said it had come about for French friends who attended the talks but needed some help in English. They found it very helpful, and he wondered if he could have permission to do this. I listened to it and was enthusiastic. It was like having someone beside you quietly translating verbatim into French what K was saying without interrupting. The listener still had the full sound and content of K's voice but with help into the other language. I thought it should be welcomed, and so it was. It became the way of translating into various languages thanks to Jean-Michel Maroger's imagination and skill.

Fritz Wilhelm arrived at Brockwood. He and Margrete had married, but she was to remain in Denmark while he went on the Indian tour after which they were both to go to Ojai for his duties there. On the afternoon walk, K raised with Dorothy the question of who would run Brockwood if she and he were not there. Dorothy thought a group would try it in March when she would go to Ojai for K's meetings. She suggested Joe Zorskie, Scott Forbes, Stephen Smith, Shakuntala Narayan, and Ingrid Porter. K was very urgent and also belabored her about not taking enough rest. Everyone at Brockwood had too long of hours and much work. Later, he charged me with the same. He seemed to raise this when he himself was tired and when pressure was inescapable and he was about to leave with many things to be done. It seemed as if my own fatigue affected him, though I tried to keep it to myself. His objection to both Dorothy and me was that too much energy went into the necessities of everyday work and not enough to the teachings. He was right, of course.

On October eleventh we went to London, where, after the pleasure of a fitting for K of a pair of handsome tweed trousers, we walked to Fortnum, where Mary Lutyens joined us for lunch. K took the conversation again to the question of who should see to the teachings being kept alive in the schools and centers—Sunanda, me, and possibly Erna? Mary felt three a better number than two and said that K should leave it as a request and instruction, as it could only be done that way and not as a legal matter. K then needed a look at his new bridge by dentist Mr. Thomson, and in no time we were off in a taxi to Waterloo. Such a day, so much the familiar trip to London with K, had an added fondness because it was so familiar. He dozed a little in the swaying train, "shouting" twice but only a little because there was another passenger in the compartment, also dozing. I felt sleepy, too, and quiet in the warm happiness of seeing him opposite, the beauty of his sleeping face, the grace and neatness of his hands. There was a wordless peace in such moments.

On the evening news on television, we saw in Rome on Via Barnaba Oriani that three Palestinian "Black Tuesday" terrorists had broken into the Syrian embassy, which was downstairs from Vanda's apartment. They were after the ambassador, who wasn't in, and they were captured. Vanda rang the next day from Florence and was leaving for Rome to see what had happened. She telephoned again when there and said the building was an armed camp and she had to show her passport to get into her own apartment. She was uncertain whether K should come there. He talked to her, and it was decided to postpone coming until October twenty-second.

The next morning—October fourteenth—K decided to talk to the students and then rest until his departure. I changed all ticket reservations and went to the student meeting. A question they asked was on meditation, and K talked about thought, a chattering mind and quiet mind, and mentioned seeing with all the senses. This gave me a chance to ask what he meant by that: Was not memory involved, i.e., I see the wind in the trees, hear it, feel it, but the tactile sense of rushing wind, cold, is partly knowing that feeling. I was not out in the wind, etcetera. K replied that looking with all the senses implies looking without a center, a self that looks.

There were gale winds and heavy rains all day. We stayed in and rested a little; the pressure of leaving was off for a few days. I wrote to Pupul about K's increased need for rest and described how he then was living while talking: meals alone, one day a week in bed, etcetera.

On October seventeenth, Narayan, David Bohm, and Fritz Wilhelm had planned to have a discussion, and K said he would sit in "as an observer." Dorothy and I were also present. Once there, K, of course, participated. The three began by discussing how a child learns: by motor learning, action learning, through touch, etcetera. After a bit, K jumped it way forward to insight. Can consciousness be aware of itself? He said if insight is not acted upon, it dies. He spoke of observation in which there is no distortion; distortion is the me. And he said there was no action before insight; if there is action, it is the action of learning. Dave said that humans handle their lives through the action of learning, therefore insight must be of a different order. To K, he said, "You say insight comes before action. What is it? Perception?" K replied that it was fragmentary perception. "Insight implies holistic action which affects my daily life, the way I live, feel, love." Dave said that then motor learning is a limited perception and insight is what is whole. K spoke of having picked up his biography by Mary Lutyens and read his dissolving the Order of the Star "and I said, 'How did he do it? He had tremendous insight—he did it.'" He went on to say that insight doesn't come out of learning. Dave pointed out that K emphasizes observation, learning. Was it not necessary? K replied that it helped free the mind. Narayan said that K had once spoken of the art of listening, the art of looking, the art of learning: the three arts—do they precede insight? K said, "They open the door, but it doesn't mean there will be insight, K didn't do these, he simply said, 'This is absurd.' The point is how we move out of the pattern. Looking, listening, learning is in the pattern. Can you have insight without compassion? But K then didn't know the meaning of the word. There is an outward going and an inward going. Most of us are outward going, linear. That man, K, was entirely inward going at that time. He was not an extrovert; there was insight. That is what I want to get at. I wish I could study him…Can consciousness become aware of itself? Is there a mirror in which consciousness sees itself—the three arts?"

Dave asked, "What does it learn?" K replied, "Its content. I think it can. I say yes it can. Can consciousness listen to itself without an outsider listening in? Can consciousness listen to itself? What happens? Nothing happens. There is empty space—absolutely nothing. No observer, only that."

"What is insight? If memory will not lead to insight, if it is not totally different, what will bring it? Thought won't. There must be a certain foundation: the foundation is non-self. Insight is in the absence of self. When consciousness is aware of itself and there is nothing, then there is insight. That nothing is insight. Insight is emptiness and non-self."

"Consciousness becomes aware of itself and there is nothing. No content. How am I to communicate this? If education isn't the flowering of human beings, it has no meaning. Without love, compassion, there is no fine mind. No fine mind without insight, observation."

At the end, he said, "This morning, when I played Sutherland's Bellini [a CD of Joan Sutherland singing excerpts of Bellini] there flashed a great delight I missed in my youth. I said, 'what the hell are you looking for out there? It is here.' That was insight."

There was packing to be done and last-minute matters, but by breakfast on October twenty-second, all was in order, and, as always, everyone in the school was out by 9:45 to wave goodbye to Krishnaji. Dorothy's car was ailing, so it was in Doris Pratt's mini that she drove K and me to Heathrow while Ted Cartee followed in his own car with our seven bags. The girl at the Alitalia check-in asked me if K was the author of Commentaries on Living. I said yes firmly; she was dazzled, and for whatever reasons, our bags went through without charge. At passport control a white-haired immigration man recognized K and said, "My wife will be thrilled to hear I've met you" with such enthusiasm that he forgot to stamp K's passport. The flight was delayed, but Vanda and Topazia Alliata were there to meet us in Rome. K in a crowd looked like a falcon, aloof and very beautiful. At Via Barnaba Oriani, only two bored police were outside, the terrorist raid of twelve days earlier seemingly forgotten. Fosca was welcoming, and lunch was waiting.

On the following day in the afternoon, Vanda drove K and me to the edge of Villa Borghese, where we walked across the gardens to Piazza di Spagna, and we caught a taxi back. K was ready to walk the whole way, so enthused was he at being there, but it would have tired him.

The day after that, October twenty-fourth, we walked twice around the nearby Villa Glori. I spoke to him about the pattern that so often seemed to follow insight, leading to breaking of concepts and freedom, but then there could be a stiffening into a new pattern, which becomes dogma. It happened in religion, society, etcetera. Mao advocated perpetual revolution every five years or so, and this became violence and power struggles. In religion it was obvious and seemed the peril to K's teaching. He picked it up immediately. "Freedom is movement," he said. "When I am gone it must go further, deeper." I said that between the Buddha and him there had been 2,400 years. Who was then to go deeper than he? "Write it down, write it down! We must talk about this in March when there is the meeting."

We came back to the flat, where there were about fifty people to meet K. He spoke on a question someone asked—what is the now? After an hour and a half of careful explanation that the now is the past meeting the present and not carrying over to color the future, a young man said he didn't understand, there was no change in him, and why did K have organizations, foundations? K answered, but others said that was off the track. Pietro Cragnolini was there, looking thin with some sort of leg trouble. Barabino was also there. I asked him to please hand over the Italian mailing list, which he was resisting doing. He was aggrieved at Cragnolini, abruptly telling him the year before that he was no longer the Italian secretary and that I had said so. I said that I had delivered the message from K that the Italian committee should decide if Barabino, who was too occupied with Biella [the school] should be replaced. It did not communicate. I urged him to talk to Vanda, as he was still a member of the committee. Finally everyone left, the lights failed, and we had supper by candlelight.

October twenty-fifth, Vanda was very friendly and warmly bade me goodbye. I sat with Krishnaji while he had his breakfast and said that I had the talk of the day before in Villa Glori very much in mind. He had me repeat it and write a memorandum of it to take with him. "First, there is freedom, then insight, then revolutionary action. If it stiffens into a pattern, then follows dogma and power. Freedom is movement. When or if insight becomes knowledge, then dogma follows. Freedom from self brings insight. When there is insight, there is radical transformation. When fundamental change does not take place, then there is pattern, dogma, power. It is the function of the Foundations to see this does not happen." I added the word "psychological" before "revolutionary action" in his memo—which, of course, was what I thought was meant, but in that time and world he should not have been carrying notes on revolutionary action. Words used in a religious sense could be viewed differently in the violent eyes of the time. He blessed me, as always, silently, deeply. I was to be careful about unnecessary travel. Travel in his service was watched over. I felt empty of or removed from anything but his service, his teaching, and its purpose.

I left Rome for New York and, on a flight that left half an hour later, Krishnaji flew to New Delhi.

Krishnamurti was still in India when the year of 1977 began. I was at home in Malibu, and letters went back and forth. On January fifth, I was able to reach by telephone the very helpful person at the U.S. embassy in London with whom I had filed Krishnamurti's application for residence status, and learned with enormous relief that he had an appointment for a visa interview at the consulate in London on January twenty-sixth. I cabled this to him in Bombay. Fortunately, the date fell just within the few days between his arrival in England and his continuing on to California. On the eleventh, I received a form for K from the embassy, forwarded to me by Dorothy Simmons, and after studying it I felt I should be there, as Dorothy, who would otherwise be the only person to accompany him, knew nothing about the detailed application that I had made out. Before going to sleep that night, I decided to go and booked an air ticket the next day. A letter from K said he would not stop in Rome but fly directly to Brockwood on January nineteenth. This was followed by a cable saying he would do that on the twentieth.

I spoke to him on his arrival at Brockwood and flew there the following day. Dorothy kindly met me at Heathrow in spite of my asking her not to, and by 9 a.m. we pulled up at Brockwood and K, who was watching, met me in the front hall. I made breakfast on trays, and we talked all morning. He told me about meeting Mrs. Gandhi alone for over an hour before a dinner party in Delhi on his arrival, her nerves and tension, the trouble in her eyes, his offer to put his hands, her becoming quiet, her weeping, her eyes becoming better. She asked to see him again the next day, came, and sat a long time without speaking. She said she was "riding a tiger," was not afraid of being eaten but didn't know how to get off. K did not reproach her for what she had done but was gentle with her and held her hand while she wept. On joining the others, she refused to sit until he was seated. A friend who had known her for years said she was visibly changed after the meetings with K. That week she freed political prisoners, lifted some censorship, and called for elections.

K also described enormous crowds at the Bombay talks. Rajneesh sent his people to listen and if possible touch him because "he is a living Buddha." Film people were coming to the talks, and he was mobbed afterward. Further news was that Balasundaram was giving up the principalship of Rishi Valley, was to take six months off, then travel around kindling interest in K's teachings in India. K said he was going to offer the principalship to Narayan. He said Sunanda had too much to do at Vasanta Vihar to come to the March meetings, but Radha Burnier and Ahalya Chari were coming for India.

After lunch, I took a nap and then walked with K, Dorothy, and the dogs. The clear, gray, wintry air cleaned the lungs and took away all trace of sitting all night and yesterday for 6,000 miles. The austere light, bare trees, and smell of leaves touched something deep in my head. This walk on that winter road with K seemed to contain all of life.

That night, I slept ten hours and could have done more but heard K open the door, so we made breakfast and talked. K then had David Bohm join the conversation to speak of the adult centers and their possible pitfalls—the danger of people expecting "explanations" of K's teachings—the delicate perils of interpretation. K said one could take a position saying, "I have some understanding of what Krishnamurti said; I am interested; let us explore, examine together." He later talked alone to Narayan and offered him the principalship of Rishi Valley. Narayan was concerned about whether all KFI members would back him and said he would think it over and answer in a few days.

The following day, I went to London and the U.S. embassy to confirm Krishnamurti's appointment to present his visa papers. I had the file with me, but it was not looked at then. I telephoned Mary Cadogan, had coffee and a pleasant talk with her, and caught a slow train back to Brockwood. K had been speaking to the school.

Wednesday, January twenty-sixth, the long-awaited day began at 4 in the morning. Brockwood had no hot water at such an hour, so baths were out, but we had a proper breakfast in the kitchen and, with Dorothy in her car, were off to London before 6. K's first appointment was with an embassy doctor at 9, but we had come into town so swiftly that we reached his office by 7:30. There was one parking place on the street, and we sat in the car until 9. Others had the same appointment, but they ran things quickly. K had a chest X-ray, some blood taken from his thumb, and we were out in half an hour to Grosvenor Square where, again, there was one vacant parking space. Dorothy stayed in the car while K and I went in to the consulate, gave the whole file to a clerk, and waited. Krishnaji sat by a window, quite relaxed, and observed the traffic. Another half hour went by and then his name was called. I went in with him to the interview. The imagined opponent of the last months, the possibly hard-eyed, indifferent bureaucrat—the consul on whose whim everything swung—turned out to be a vice-consul, a young woman with long, blonde hair and blue, starry eyes who went to school in the San Fernando valley and rose out of her chair saying, "Oh, Mr. Krishnamurti, I've been looking forward so to today; I asked to be allowed to process your papers!" There wasn't a question. Everything was in order. "This is about the biggest file we've ever had!" It would all be ready in the afternoon. We were finished by 11:15. It was done!

We all went to Mary Links's, who was waiting to give us shelter, a place to eat our picnic lunch, and for K to rest. I urged that afterward he return to Brockwood with Dorothy while I stayed to pick up the papers at the consulate. "No," said K. He had a better idea. "We'll go to a cinema!" He had seen Raid on Entebbe as we passed the Marble Arch theater—just what he wanted to see. It went on at 2:15 p.m., so I drove K, Mary, and Dorothy there, left them, and went on to Grosvenor Square, where, once again, on this fateful day, parking luck held. I took a walk, but my mind was so on the visa and papers that I couldn't go to look at paintings or drop in at Mallets to be enticed by furniture, so I soon went and sat in the consulate. At 4:30 p.m., I was given the precious papers—an enormous sealed envelope to be given to the immigration officer on arrival in Los Angeles, containing, among other things, K's X-ray. I got back to the car before the parking meter ran out and just got to the theater to pick up the moviegoers. Dorothy drove us back to Brockwood, and I fell a little asleep on the way with relief and exhaustion. My job was done. I telephoned the good news briefly to Erna. Then a blessed feeling of bed and real sleep.

The next morning, it was good to wake up knowing it was accomplished. For K, the high point of the day was the cinema. He dictated some letters and received one from Narayan accepting the principalship of Rishi Valley. K then wrote about it to Pupul and Pama Patwardhan. Mary and Joe drove down to lunch, and we talked most of the afternoon. Krishnaji told them in detail of his meetings with Mrs. Gandhi and the feeling among some friends that changes in Mrs. Gandhi as prime minister took place after her meetings with him. He also described enormous veneration toward him that winter by crowds in India.

The weekend was quiet. Relaxed after the accomplished tasks of the short and unexpected stay at Brockwood, it was pleasant to tidy things and be ready on Monday, January thirty-first, to be off to Heathrow and accompanying K to Malibu. He smiled when he said good morning and saw that I was alert and ready to go. It was a cloudless morning with frost, white in the shadowed edges of the fields. Dorothy was driving, and we waved goodbye to the assembled school. There was plenty of time at the airport to case WHSmith for paperback detective novels. We were carrying the enormous and precious visa papers, sealed by the U.S. embassy, to be delivered on landing in Los Angeles. We had the two seats K liked—all the way forward—where one can put up one's feet on the bulkhead. There was a movie, but K's headphones were not working, and he would not use mine. Sitting across the aisle I could see him fetch some writing paper and begin writing me a letter as he always did on this long flight and the last leg before Malibu. I had written one to him too, but watching him holding the pen so carefully seemed at that moment as extraordinary as the vast sky out there or the Greenland mountains we had just passed, the curving crust edges of buff scalloping the endless snow. The sun turned some of it pink as it tried to set, but we were faster than the sun or turning Earth, and it would outrun us only when we turned out of the race to land.

We went into immigration together and handed over the envelope. "The thickest we've had," said the officer shuffling through it. I saw a copy of Krishnamurti on Education in the file. The man then stamped something, handed K a little card with K's photo on it and said, "You are now a resident of the United States." Clutching at last that precious "green card"—which wasn't green—we went on to find our two bags, passed through customs, and out to where Alan Kishbaugh was waiting. He drove us home to Malibu and left. K, at last in his room, sat on the bed and said, "I may faint." He stayed there quietly for a few moments, then got up, turned, facing the bed, and fell forward on it. It lasted about a minute and then he came to. Later, he said he had thought in all the noise and confusion at the airport that probably he would faint later. K spent the next day in bed, sleeping and reading. He said, "I don't dream anymore. Somewhere in Madras or Rishi Valley—I forget which—I dreamt Rajagopal was chasing me and when I woke up I said this is silly to keep thinking of that man: that is enough. So I went into it and I haven't dreamt since."

On February third, Evelyne Blau and the Lilliefelts came to lunch in Malibu. Krishnaji talked about India and various plans for the schools there, but later he spoke to Erna, Theo, and me very seriously and challengingly. Were we flowering, and, if not, why not? Who would be responsible in the future and right then, as if he were dead? He said he had realized in India for the first time that there was no one to carry on. He spoke of the Buddha having had only two disciples who understood, and they both died before the Buddha. Why was there no one? He said he knew the easy answer—that nothing grows under a great oak, etcetera, but what would we do? He knew what he would do if he was one of us: he would say, "I have listened to that man, and I have understood a little bit, I am going to talk about it." He said we must make the new trustee, Cynthia Wood, understand, be serious. Talk about it. Then he said, "I'll be around to help for another ten years—maybe fifteen." The next day, he asked me if I had felt the change in the room when he had talked seriously to Erna, Theo, and me.

On the tenth, a midsummer day, he had slept nine hours and said he woke up feeling as if he "had been dancing." In late morning, Charles Moore and his fellow architects, Bart Phelps and John Rubel, came, bringing a maquette of the proposed changes to the cottage in Ojai. K made some suggestions, and they stayed to lunch.

The next day, on another lovely morning, we left early for Ojai in K's green car with him driving. Near the big rock, he said, "You must see into this brain, learn how he thinks. Amma and Leadbeater said this brain had been prepared for a thousand years. It is a special brain, it will probably get better the longer I live, and I will live another ten or fifteen years. You are twenty years younger and you must outlive me. I must find someone, maybe it is you, someone to carry on who has understood something. It is useless to say it now, but I wish I had met you forty years ago."

We went to the Oak Grove School building, where the pavilion was almost finished, then to the cottage, where all the little children were waiting to greet him. Everyone was on the shy side. Mar de Manziarly, who was staying with her sister, Mima Porter, came and joined K, Erna, Theo, Evelyne, Ruth Tettemer, Mark and Asha Lee, Ted Cartee, and Michael Krohnen for a nice lunch at Arya Vihara. Later K talked in the cottage to Erna, Theo, and me, asking if I should really build onto the cottage—was it worth it? He raised the question of whether he would get as much rest there as in Malibu. The factor was the psychic pressure people concentrate on him. Few know he was in Malibu, so he rests well, but everyone assumes and thinks Ojai is where he is. This is what happens in Gstaad. He said he could cut off the feeling but didn't like to. We discussed this, and he finally said he could avoid it by going away for a day occasionally to Santa Barbara or somewhere, as he does at Brockwood by going to London. Erna and Theo said they felt it vital that I live in Ojai. K said again some of what he had said to me in the car about getting inside his brain, etcetera. "We are responsible for the teachings, carrying it on. One has understood something and speaks out of that." I raised what he had said about only two of the Buddha's disciples having understood what he said, and both of them died before he did, yet Buddhism had been alive and a force all those years. K's teaching exists, is living. But he wanted more—someone or some group who could speak out of its own understanding. I felt Erna and Theo were troubled by this, not feeling they could speak, only back up K or someone who had that capacity. K asked if we could see into his mind. I said from long listening that, often when he was questioned, I felt I knew what he would answer but not how he would bring the questioner to understand it. Apparently the Lilliefelts wanted my help and presence.

As to the rest and privacy, it was agreed that all activities, including the adult center, must be as soon as possible concentrated in the west end of the valley, leaving McAndrew Road private. We then came home, K driving part of the way.

On the thirteenth, he greeted me with a "Happy Birthday" unexpectedly, as it was a fact I tended to ignore. Then, looking mischievous over lunch, he said, "I am feeling TISMIC." It seemed that was what he and Nitya said about people putting on "mystic" airs. On the fifteenth, a hot and beautiful day, at lunch he said, "You believe what you already know, you see what you have already seen. Therefore you never see anything." We were discussing how people equate everything with past events. Also he told me how he wanted a letter answered that came from a library lumping him with Vimala Thakar, U.G. Krishnamurti, Bubba Saint John, etcetera. He suggested, "Krishnamurti has made it very clear for the last fifty years that he does not wish to be connected with any group or person, for he considers that they are all reactionaries, traditionalists, and accepters of spiritual authority. They allow themselves to become followers and so deny totally what he has been saying for years, which is to be a light to yourself. Do not follow anybody, don't accept the authority of any guru." We then went to movie The Cassandra Crossing—nonsense, but enough suspense to divert and rest. At home, he said, "I feel rather tismic."

We went again on the eighteenth to Ojai. Going along the beach road, K said, "During the last three or four months, something has been happening during sleep. It sounds silly, but it is a sense of ecstasy, as though the brain were trying to assimilate a depth. A depth usually means shallowness. It isn't like that. It is a depth that is the opposite of shallowness. Dreams are usually superficial and have very little meaning. I have hardly any dreams."

I asked how he perceived it.

K: "When I woke up, there was a strange feeling that I haven't had before."

M: "Is it that the brain is touching something it hasn't touched before?"

K: "Yes, that's it. It is something the brain hasn't touched before. It isn't an experience. In that sleep there is a greater penetration into something thought can never touch."

M: "What happens to most people is that something is seen and the brain tries to understand what it is. How is this different? Is it outside of what the brain can investigate?"

K: "The brain is trying to understand it, trying to find out what it is."

M: "When you say the brain, do you mean thought, or is the brain without thought?"

K: "No, not thought."

A little later, he said, "Do you remember that night when we were sitting quietly and there was something in the room? That has been happening more. It happened in India a little."

I asked him about the pain, and he said it was going on slightly all the time. I asked if the "otherness" of the Notebook and this that he was speaking of was the same. He said, "Yes, yes. But I don't remember the other. It is gone."

M: "Though you don't make a comparison, you know what I mean?"

K: "Yes."

In Ojai, we met with other trustees and discussed going ahead with building plans and school matters. K went into the intent of the school. He said if he were a parent he would send his child to us so that he would be intelligent enough to live in society as a total being. It was after 7 when we reached Malibu.

Krishnaji spent the next day in bed, except for a walk around the lawn in the afternoon. In the evening, I read a review of a book about fairies and asked K when was it that he used to see them. In England, he saw them when they lived at Ashdown Forest; he saw them all the time. Sometimes he was afraid to walk at night, but he couldn't describe them to me. He had forgotten. Could Nitya see them? He couldn't remember. Did he see them in India? Probably. Could he see them today if he tried? Maybe. Probably I could see them in the grove at Brockwood. Why then and not later? "It was after coming from India. Later probably he became more sophisticated and didn't see them."

Going to a movie had its attractions, and we drove to some in afternoons—preferably ones with a little action, not too much amour and, if possible, handsome scenery in the background. Usually there was a pause at the health food store on the way back. In the car, a query: "I was wondering how you came into all this? It must have been planned."

On February twenty-fourth, we left early for Ojai. Conversation in the car turned to atmosphere, the good or the bad. I said that for me there was in the village of Ojai a strong sense of something disagreeable, of nasty people. I asked, "Do you know why?"

K: "There is that."

M: "You can see it?'

K: "There is animosity, there is conflict, there is envy."

M: "Why is it there?"

K: "Because people who feel that way go there, contaminate it. That's all."

We talked a little further, and K asked me how I met it. I said I did nothing about it, just sensed it, but the larger relation for me in a place was to the land, the beauty, the hills, the ocean, the light. And K said there must be no resistance, no antagonism. "There is compassion. There is no self, nothing one was defending and there was the extraordinary beauty of the hills and light. There is no self in this, but there is a goodness that can be invoked or be allowed to form a circle through which the other does not come. But as long as one resists or has some antagonism to the bad, the good cannot be."

We met with other trustees, as well as Charles Moore and Murray Silverstein to look at designs for an assembly/adult center. It seemed more or less to please. They were to do a model and make several additions—plans for single rooms where thirty could stay. All lunched at Arya Vihara. Moore, etcetera left, and trustees agreed to ask Zelma Wilson to design the classroom building. Then K, Erna, Theo, and I walked down Grand Avenue. It was dark when we came back, and a car swerved to avoid a bicycle without lights and came very near K and Theo walking about twenty feet behind Erna and me. K and I spent the night in the cottage.

In the morning, K said he had slept badly, had nightmares. “Evil ones were trying to push me, fight me, and I was trying to make a circle around myself but it didn’t work and finally I woke up. I was trying to make a circle around the house. I knew you were in there, and I was trying to a make circle.” When I asked him about why the circle didn’t work, he said, “Well, it did, because I woke up.” He had cramps in his right foot and had to crawl on the floor with it. Then he went to sleep, and the other foot had a cramp and again he had to crawl to relieve it. Then we started to talk again about making the circle, and he said it was something he didn’t want to talk about. I said was it magic? He said, “Yes, sort of it.” I asked if he had learned it—was he taught it? He said no, but he knew things like that. I asked why it shouldn’t be told to other people. I said I wasn’t asking him the magic itself, but why it shouldn’t be told? He said, “I have an instinct about it. I’ve never talked about it.” Then he said, “Do you remember when we first came to this house? [Pine Cottage] I wanted to run from it, it was bad, it was all wrong. And then we came and stayed and it became all right and it got better. Do you remember that?” I remembered. And out of this he told me he does this thing whenever he comes to a house—Brockwood, Malibu, the cottage, or presumably Chalet Tannegg, or a hotel room, he does what he called drawing a circle around the place, and he said that when he is not with me it is difficult for him to do it—when I am traveling or away, yet even when I go to town in the car alone he does it to some degree to protect me. In this there was what I gathered was the crux. One does not protect, as he put it, “Maria or one’s self. There is no self in this because there is no opposition. The intrinsic part is the non-self and non-opposition.” He spoke of angels—not angels as sentimental beings—“that blah,” as he put it—but an invitation to the good, to beauty. The subject we had discussed before of my feeling antagonism in Ojai came up again and my not reacting to that but being open to the reality of the beauty of the valley, the hills, in which there was no self, and he said, “Yes, you know that now, now move from that; no opposition, no center, but invitation to the beauty and the good.” And he spoke of there being the forces of good, the forces of evil. “The forces of evil are enormously widespread. You sense it tremendously in the world today, you see it in the brutality of the wars, the killing, the torments, the hurting of animals, and destroying of the loveliness of nature. But there is the enormous force of good.” He wanted me to talk to the Lilliefelts about it, not from him but to talk about this non-centered, non-self fed sense of the other. He said that he did many things but that magic mustn’t be taught. There were things he could do that if I learned on my own I think he implied I could not do. He spoke of arriving at Vasanta Vihar the year before, and the house was filled with the bad, and they made the mistake of not taking him to his old rooms but to his new rooms upstairs. Somehow, he fainted, and Sunanda, who didn’t understand those things, left him alone, but finally when he came to, he did this thing and it became good. I said there would be great pressure of the bad on the places in Ojai, and he said it was simple to change that. “It is not strong enough. One makes something different and good.”

At 11 a.m. he held a discussion with parents and teachers at Arya Vihara. We left at 4 p.m. and drove slowly home. On the way, he said that I must learn to heal. “It is to be without self, with compassion. Not for the person—but compassion." I asked if he could heal himself? He said no, but then said, "Perhaps I could if you put your hands and then I put mine on yours."

The next day, the Dunnes were having friends to lunch, and Krishnamurti's doctor, Lailee Bakhtiar, was one of them, so I asked her to stop by ahead of time. She examined his chest, compared the X-rays taken recently in London with ones taken two years earlier. All was well. His blood pressure was 120/80. She said he had chronic bronchitis, which an antibiotic could clear, but it would probably recur. She gave a prescription for a cough mixture to thin mucous and suggested it was time he saw a urologist.

On February twenty-eighth, Dorothy Simmons and Mary Cadogan arrived from London and were met by Mark and Asha Lee, who brought them briefly to Malibu on their way to Ojai.

On March first, K and I went to Beverly Hills for K's appointment with the urologist Dr. Marvin Hausman, recommended by Dr. Bakhtiar. He took K's medical history and examined his prostate. He found no enlargement but recommended an IVP (dye and X-rays of the bladder) for further checking. K found Dr. Hausman a quiet, gentle man, as Lailee had said. We went on to K's barber for a haircut and then parked in the back of the Los Angeles County Museum of Art, where we had our picnic lunch in the car. We then drove to Westwood, where K saw a movie, Network, while I had a meeting with Charles Moore and Bart Phelps on designs for Pine Cottage. I was back at the theater by the time the movie was over, and we drove home to Malibu.

Section Thirteen

CHAPTER 42

On Wednesday, March second, 1977, we packed in Malibu and after lunch drove to Ojai and moved into the cottage. Dorothy Simmons was in the downstairs guest flat next door, Saral and David Bohm were in the upstairs flat, and Mary Cadogan was staying with the Lilliefelts. Margrete and Fritz Wilhelm, Radha Burnier, Ahalya Chari, and Alan Kishbaugh were at Arya Vihara. At 11 the next morning, Krishnaji held the first meeting, to which the two Siddoo sisters also came, as did Evelyne Blau, Ruth Tettemer, Albion Patterson, and Mark Lee.

K began by saying that he wished to discuss what would happen when he died. The books, the tapes, etcetera were not enough. Who would be the overall guardian to see that the teachings were protected and that there be no division between the Foundations? There should be a group who had known K, been with him, who had the perfume of knowing him, had understood something of the teachings, who will go about and convey that understanding and talk about it. The group should be formed during K's lifetime; a group of those who have not only known him but are respected by others and who have no other interest but this. Only such a group will hold things together.

We lunched at Arya Vihara. Later K, Radha Burnier, Ahalya Chari, and I went for a walk, and Erna joined when we passed her house. In the evening, they all dined at Arya Vihara, but Michael Krohnen brought soup and salad to the cottage so Krishnaji and I had our supper on trays as usual.

It had been suggested that all but K meet on our own on the days between meetings with K. So we did, and there was the beginning of a good discussion. Meanwhile, K received David Weideman in the cottage, and he was invited to join us for lunch. A television was installed in the cottage, and K decided we would watch only news, not just anything that comes up. K felt he would sleep better.

The second meeting with K was held in the morning of March fifth. He raised suggestions made by India for an "apex group" of representatives of the Foundations without power or authority but as guardians of the purity of the teachings, to discuss major problems and hold Foundations together in spirit and structure. This rose the hackles of some. It was clear that K wanted it to guard against separation and do what he had been doing, know what was happening in each place, pointing out what was needed, and urging improvements, etcetera. But equally clear was an initial pulling back from what was seen as a "special body." The word "apex" was especially bothersome. Theo, in particular, saw in it all sorts of implied spiritual authority.

In the afternoon, Ahalya came and sat on the front verandah of the cottage, and we talked intensively about the work, the schools, and the need for teacher training; the matters that affected us all. K came out after his nap and he, Ahalya, Radha, Dorothy, Alan Kishbaugh, and I walked down to Reeves Road and back.

On our return, K switched on the television, and there were President Carter and Walter Cronkite answering telephone calls from the public. K kept saying, "This man will change a lot in this country." He would have liked to telephone in a question—through me. The question was: "This country and people are lacking respect, integrity, and morality. What can be done about it?" K said no one had asked a moral question.

Without K, we met on the morning of the next day, and there was continued contention about the "special body" suggestion, with Theo unable to let go of his fuss about the word "apex." He also challenged, somewhat aggressively, Radha Burnier's continuing position in the TS and its Esoteric Section. She said she would give a reply but not then.

The third session with K followed on March seventh. He asked what their reaction would be if he appointed one or more "at apex"?

"Dismay," said Erna.

"Grave psychological disturbance," said Theo.

"Well, I'm not going to," said K. "The idea of apex was a group to hold all this together. No apostolic succession. Don't suspect India is trying to put something over. But how will these Foundations be held together?" As the discussion progressed, the idea grew that people from each Foundation should go to India with K that year, and in addition there should be annual meetings of the whole group. This was tentatively agreed to, and we were to discuss it among ourselves. We then went on to talk about the adult centers—a name K didn't like. He said he knew what he would say to people who came to it if he were Fritz or one of us. "'I've heard K talk. I've understood what he said. I'm not speaking my own feelings. I've put aside my own capacities and am here to convey what I have understood.' Discuss it, work at it so that they catch something of that. Not my own notion—totally impersonal. The trustees are representative of what they have heard, understood, and live." K slept after lunch and was tired on the walk with Dorothy, Ahalya, and me.

At the next session with K, on March ninth, he asked what would prevent someone, when we were all gone, from taking over everything? How could we ensure that would not happen? What will keep everything moving, flowering? "What am I to do? Everything else is secondary. It is the main thing occupying my mind. I'll go on talking as long as I can, travel as long as it is physically possible, not to the end—I don't want to die on the platform—but it is my responsibility. The Foundations haven't felt this, so it is my responsibility. What am I to do? This has been in my mind for a couple of years." He then went into the analogy of a baby: If one has a baby, one cares for it, etcetera. "This is my baby," he said, and it became clear that the rest of us felt it was his baby, not ours. No one had an answer to what the Foundations could or should do with his baby. He spoke of the disintegration into ritual, etcetera after the deaths of the Buddha and other teachers. How can it be kept alive? He said, "Because it has never been done, it is possible. That is the challenge." He said the Foundations are the vessels in which the thing goes on flowering. "Can A hand it to B? I will find the answer. It may be that there is no answer.

If that is so, it is the right answer." The power he put forth in this was overwhelming. I felt turned inside out, unable to move for a while after it was over. Others just sat motionless. I felt emptied of everything but the stream of it. How often a river image describes, and did in that most vivid dream, years earlier, in Gstaad of the rushing gray river and the majestic redwood tree. K's purpose, his teaching, was the stream. I entered it long ago and there was only the stream in my veins, mind, heart. The bits and pieces of self wash away. I walked back to the cottage and sat on my cot. K came in and quieted me when he saw I was shaking. After lunch, he saw the Siddoo sisters, who told him of their plans for starting their school in Canada. We then drove to Malibu.

On the way, I asked him if there were such a thing as genius, in its real sense, in the field of religion—an innate, born genius, as in other fields, and, if so, could it perhaps be necessary to be able to do what he was suggesting? He understood my question and seemed to be pondering it. Could this explain the not catching fire when he had lit the flame? I told him of my own image that morning, as he talked—the feeling of my strange and compelling dream. He was the spring, the clear pure water had become a vast lake. The Foundations could keep the water clean and pure, but only he was the spring. So we came home to Malibu.

The next day, March tenth, we went early to Beverly Hills, where K had an X-ray of his kidneys and bladder. We returned for lunch to Malibu, and after a rest drove back to Ojai. Krishnaji held his next meeting with the trustees and said that his and the Foundations' responsibility was to the light of the teaching. The Foundations were to understand the tremendous depth of it. He said, "I feel responsible to see this thing is conveyed fully, not partially. It is your responsibility to understand it. It is not a one-way street. If you feel total responsibility, you will have capacity, then it happens. Capacity comes as one gets into it. So my responsibility is to see that each member of the Foundations understands. If some are not so involved, what shall we do together? What is preventing it? Is not flowering a tremendous issue to you? It may be there all the time—this crisis. Crisis has no motive. To ask how to bring about a crisis is too silly. Either it is a crisis, or it is not at all. If it is a crisis, it will happen. Crisis is a tremendous need to understand. I would be at it, watching, questioning, seeing if my mind is conditioned, ambitious. I would work at it, investigate, feel I've got to find out. If flowering is not happening, it would be a crisis, a challenge. If Foundation members realize it is not a crisis to them, then it will take place. My responsibility is to feel the tremendous crisis. I've been wondering the last few days what it was. I see it now. If that is my responsibility, what will I do if you don't [realize the crisis]? Walk out? Or work at it? Give it a time limit? What is my responsibility? To go to a new group and go through all that again? My tremendous responsibility is to see that you flower, and yours is to see that it becomes a crisis in your life. But if it doesn't, what shall I do? Another group? Same problem, so I can't leave this group. I'm beginning to see something: knowing if I leave this group it will be worse, utterly futile, a waste of colossal energy. I can't divorce. Do I put up with it? I refuse. I have to do something to make you change. I am going to stick to it."

Everyone seemed stunned, silent, and deeply moved by this, sitting without moving.

After lunch, K and I drove Ahalya Chari and Radha Burnier to Malibu, K doing most of the driving. Everyone was having the weekend off. On arrival, I spoke to Dr. Hausman about the results of K's X-rays. He found a "small obstruction," was 85 percent sure it was in the prostate but said there was a 5 percent possibility of a tumor and wanted to do a cystoscopy to find out. An appointment was made for March twenty-eighth to discuss it.

We spent a quiet weekend, K resting in bed, except for coming to the table for lunch and walking in the garden. Ahalya, Radha, and I talked, rested, and read. We didn't leave the place until Sunday afternoon, when we drove back to Ojai.

March fourteenth, at the trustee meeting, K asked what would bring people to the centers. He said that if he had come to the Buddha, it would have been to find out how he thought, how his mind worked, why he said certain things, to understand his mind, to be in that atmosphere, to see the quality of the Buddha. He said that when K is gone, people would come saying, "'You have spent time, gone into it with him, so being there you must have captured something.' This is fundamental: then you can discuss fear, etcetera." He said the books were all right, but greater depth is not reached that way. Some other quality was necessary; some quality that cannot be reached through this [effort on this level], though one must be without fear, sorrow, etcetera. That is not the end. He said, "You haven't asked for this. When you want it, you get it. And don't spend a whole life laying the foundation. Something much more must take place."

Again the impact of what he said left most of us silent and overwhelmed. It was cold, and we had lunch inside Arya Vihara. I went to Ventura for electric blankets. It was so cold in the cottage it was hard to sleep.

The next day, March fifteenth, K and I drove to Cynthia Wood's in Santa Barbara. The trustees were there, and so were architects to show revised plans for the school building. These were approved, and a go-ahead was given. We drove back to Ojai slowly through the hills, and K smiled all the way and was amazed at the profusion of avocado trees newly planted.

Mary Cadogan came to the cottage to talk to me, and K joined us. She mentioned the worry of some over Radha's position in both the TS and K Foundations. K said he would talk to her privately before it was brought up again in meetings. We spoke too about the implications of what he had been telling us and asked if his presence would make it more possible for us to carry on. Something more than what we had learned would be at work. Later, alone with him, I tried to say what I had seldom mentioned but was the ground for me—that, with all my being, I wanted to go all the way in this. I said too that throughout it I had seen that wanting, willing, seeing is not the way, that it moves against realization, but that there remained a burning center that cared only about what he called "much more." I spoke of "opening the window," and he said to speak of it in the meetings.

March sixteenth, at the trustee meeting, I asked about the "open window" through which the wind may come. K said that "laying the foundation [understanding fears, etcetera] demands the other. If one understands a part, one understands the whole. Laying the foundation brings about a movement. The volume of water brings the movement. Movement brings energy. In laying the foundation, not taking too long—compress it, then there is momentum, energy, movement. Then discussion would take place on a different level verbally or nonverbally." Later, he said, "Can we act as if K were no longer here? What would you do?" and "If you have imbibed the teachings, you are the teacher."

Then, "You have a deep well; don't go to it with a little bucket. For God's sake, use K. Learn. You've got a short time. It's the responsibility of the Foundations to suck that dry." As it continued, it was clear that one went to the well with no bucket. In the afternoon, K had a long talk with Radha about her positions in both the TS and KFI. She seemed not to have realized that there might be a contradiction. He told Dorothy and me afterward that he had not advised her how to act but to look at the whole of it. He pointed out to Dorothy and me what a difficult decision Radha faced.

The next day, Krishnaji talked to Mark in the morning on the difficulty of finding teachers. In the afternoon, he talked alone with the Siddoos. Erna went with Stanley Cohen to the planning commission hearing on a permit for K's talks in the Oak Grove. Also present were Annie Vigeveno, Austin Bee, and Mr. and Mrs. Kelly, who had bought the Zalk house. Mr. Kelly voiced opposition because of noise, pot holes in the road, etcetera. We received permission in spite of the objections. K was shocked at Rajagopal sending Bee and Vigeveno to oppose the Oak Grove talks.

The trustees' meeting on March eighteenth began with David Bohm suggesting we start with where the video series he and David Shainberg with K had ended. The subject was the "sacred." What followed was considerable exploration of guilt and responsibility. K rather denigrated responsibility in favor of the much larger and encompassing compassion. "Compassion can never be wrong," he said. "Compassion can never be inadequate in any circumstances. If action comes first, it leads to guilt. Let compassion act. If you are the world, which I feel most profoundly, compassion arises. Sacred is the sense of wholeness. To live at the point of wholeness is a tremendous thing. The teaching is concerned with all of life, and out of that comes compassion. K feels you should enter into this sense of compassion, so he is working at it. You are asking what do we do about this and that—the school, administration, etcetera, and K says stop all that and come into this and you will answer rightly. I won't feel guilty if you don't. I want you to, but it would be a horror if I felt guilty or disappointed. So it is my job to see that you come in. And isn't it your job to see that others come in? But first come here."

"Do we feel guilty because we can't do it? Churches have said you must renounce and there began the guilt. Are you listening consciously or unconsciously? Conscious is reaction. Deep listening is without response. That may be the answer. At that deep level, there is no you and me. At this [superficial level], there is. There is something extraordinary in this. You are listening to K on the surface and you are making an effort to go down there and listen. It doesn't work that way. Can you listen without movement? That may convey what K wants to say." He said that, for instance, he had listened to Hitler that way and saw instantly what he was. “If you listen at a deeper level [without words] as Foundation members, something entirely different takes place—about the schools, centers, etcetera. Then you are the teachers because you have moved from the periphery to the very center of it. If you really listen in silence, you are there because there is no me, you, the world.”

After lunch at Arya Vihara, we drove back to Malibu, and the following morning, March nineteenth, we flew from Los Angeles to San Francisco and went by taxi to Mrs. Blanche Mathias’s apartment, where K talked to her in private for an hour. She had been having distress over what seemed hallucinations and had appealed to him to understand what was happening. He said her over-sensitivity from illness had made her pick up these things. He didn’t say what else he told her but indicated to me that I already knew how to deal with such things [no center, no self]. We had lunch with her, and afterward Alain came and drove us to his flat, where he took down K’s symptoms to suggest homeopathic remedies. He then ferried us to the airport, and we flew back to Los Angeles, the car, and so to Malibu in time for supper.

The next morning, after an early breakfast, we drove to Ojai in time for an 11 a.m. meeting with the trustees. After an hour of discussion on procedural matters, Krishnaji asked if responsibility for flowering rested on all Foundation members. Would we all help each other to bring about in the center a sense of otherness? He said we all talked about guilt, but it was an enormous subject we had not dealt with thoroughly. He said, “I do not think we are demanding of ourselves the highest. We are still saying we can’t do it, it’s yours, we will explain your teachings. If it is yours [the Foundations’], it will not be polluted. I thought yesterday, how do we go through with this? K says, come over in this and drink as much as you can, involve yourself totally, and I fear you are saying it is too much—we don’t know how.”

“In the centers, when someone asks, will you be able to deal with it—not as individuals? Have we solved what we met to discuss—what will happen when K is gone? Or is it insoluble? It has become something I have to do something about.” He spoke of a mine of gold; were we going to stop at the edge of the cave? What are we going to do about the mine of gold? “I’m going to pursue this for the rest of my life with the Foundations. It has happened that we are together. My job is very clear for the next ten years. Whenever we meet I am going to push this thing. What is your dharma? A good word, but spoilt. Dharma means sustain the original, if I may use that word with tremendous hesitation. It is not understood in the West. So what is one to do as a member of the Foundation when K is gone? K has said this mine is a sacred treasure. I leave it to you. What will you do with it? My dharma has become very clear in these meetings. Apart from the public meetings, it is to pull and push you into the cave. I feel this tremendously. I accept that. What will happen at the end of fifteen years? What will you do?”

March twenty-first. Mrs. Gandhi and her son, Sanjay, both failed to win parliamentary seats in the Indian election, and the Congress party was defeated. K was not surprised and wondered what she would do. That afternoon, Radha Burnier, Mary Cadogan, Dorothy Simmons, Erna, and I went to the K&R office to see the archives. Mrs. Vigeveno admitted us but was totally unresponsive when we asked for material. She said there was no inventory and that she was not there to help us. We saw no manuscripts, no letters to K. Mary tried to telephone Rajagopal but was refused use of the telephone. Radha asked to see material sent from Adyar and received no answer.

The news on the twenty-second was that Mrs. Gandhi had resigned as prime minister. K felt a certain responsibility as he had told her to do whatever was right. And apparently she did.

At the trustee meeting, there was discussion of the relationship between K's teachings, K's words, and truth. Was there such a thing as K's teaching or only truth? Was he talking out of the silence of truth or out of an illusion of truth, the "noise" of illusion. How to find out? Who was to judge? Was it out of the silence of truth or out of reactions, conditioning? "As I don't know, I listen, putting aside personality, influence. I am questioning my own questioning. Can I listen to what he says with an abandonment of the past? Then there is a different relationship to him. I see all the dangers of thought. I am listening out of silence."

The twenty-fourth of March was the eleventh and final trustee meeting. There was a continuation of how we know whether K is speaking truth. David Bohm said insight might see it was true, and having seen it, one can logically work it out. So perception comes at intervals, or is there one perception that never ends? When K dies, the Foundations were to be "guiltlessly," totally responsible to their own perception, insight of the truth K has spoken. One perception is enough; it opens the door. So there is insight all the time. There is never confusion. Would further action confuse perception or would perception never be confused? Mind seeks security in insight. In real perception [complete], there is no confusion. Perception is never partial, but there could not be perception if one's daily life is in disorder. Any conclusion is detrimental to perception. So what is perception? It is without attachment, fear. There is perception only when there is no division between the observer and the observed. In the act of exploring, the act of watching, there is insight. There was the analogy of washing a window through which one looked. The art of watching cleans the window. K said he had never done this, it was never necessary, and David Bohm asked, how then did he know if someone else could? K said, "Because you see it instantly. Must you go through all this, or do it instantly? In seeing the observer is the observed, seeing the working of it, one sees the totality. I think that is the only way."

He was asked if was possible for a human being to see it all at a glance—total perception? K said, "No human being had refused to go through all this [fear, etcetera] and said I won't operate in my conditioned response. If he did, something other might take place. Something other does take place when you look at the whole thing. Yet that man [K] never said that; he just did it. Demand for the essence of excellence washed everything else away. It is possible. One must have a passion for excellence. Total insight is the flame that burns away all confusion. Don't you then act as a magnet when you are passionate to bring about transformation? Passion may be what is missing. It is missing—ask for it!"

After the meeting, we all went to the Ranch House, where I gave the luncheon. The Hookers arranged it nicely, and we ate indoors as a light rain was falling. Later at the office, there was a meeting on brochures. K talked to Ahalya, then he, she, Dorothy, and I took a short walk. It rained too in the night.

The next day, March twenty-fifth, there was snow above the valley on Sulphur Mountain. Mary Cadogan and Dorothy Simmons left for England, and Ahalya Chari went to San Francisco. David Bohm gave a radio interview about Krishnamurti on station KPFK, which we listened to with Erna and Theo at their house. K held teacher and parent discussions on the two following days, and then we returned to Malibu.

K had an appointment with Dr. Hausman at his office in Beverly Hills, where he showed us the X-rays of K's kidneys, which were fine, but the bladder was affected where the prostate was enlarged and exit narrowed. There was a thorough discussion of what should be done. I asked for the prognosis if nothing were done, and he said there would be an eventual stoppage. If done soon, the operation was relatively simple and minor but more complicated if postponed as infection would occur, the kidneys would be affected, also these dire consequences could happen suddenly during travels or in some place without adequate medical facilities at a time when K would be not only older but not in his, as then, excellent overall health. This decided K that it must be seen to here and soon.

K expressed his wish not to be unconscious; his mind must not be made artificially unconscious. Dr. Hausman said a local (spinal block) was very customary and would be done if K wished. K agreed to this. Dr. Hausman explained that there is often a loss of blood in this operation and would K accept a blood transfusion if necessary? K said no to someone else's blood. Dr. Hausman then asked if he would accept his own blood, and K said yes, of course. So he was to give a pint on two different occasions in advance in case it were needed. I said I wanted to be able to stay in the hospital near him, and Dr. Hausman said this would be arranged. The date for surgery was set for May second, and K agreed to convalesce in Malibu for the month of May. K made all these decisions as Dr. Hausman presented them. He saw the necessities, and afterward said he was watching the body to see if it accepted. One other thing he explained to Hausman was that his body had never been invaded—i.e., cut into, and Hausman explained that in this operation there is no incision; entrance is made through the natural opening, the interior of the bladder is looked at, and a small section of prostate around the neck of the bladder is reamed out. The stay in the hospital should be four or five days, then rest at home. K said the muscles of his bladder were very strong, due to yoga, and this makes urine push back into the kidneys when the exit is blocked. We left and did some errands on the way home.

Two days later, K said he was determined to attend the Shainberg psychotherapist conference in New York at the end of April, before the surgery here in May. My brother said we could stay in the Ritz Tower apartment. We went to town and, while K had his hair cut, I fetched cheese enchiladas at the farmer's market, and we had a picnic of them on a shady side street in Beverly Hills. Then we went to a movie, The Domino Principle, and came home in time for a walk in the garden. There was a telephone call from Blanche Mathias: her hallucinations were gone after K saw her in San Francisco.

On March thirty-first, 1977, Diane and David Shainberg and their children, Steven and Nancy, who had been staying in Ojai, came down to lunch in Malibu with Krishnaji and me. It was a pleasant visit.

The next day, Alain Naudé rang on his own behalf and Theo's to say that May second, the proposed date for surgery, was bad astrologically. "How superstitious are we?" said K, but on the ignore-nothing-for-his-good theory, I asked Dr. Hausman to change the date to May ninth, which was all right, according to Alain.

K and I drove to Ojai in time for lunch. Afterward, we took Ahalya, who had returned from San Francisco, to look at the Oak Grove, which was ready for Krishnaji's opening talk the next day. Everything seemed in order, and there was fencing neatly around the perimeter. We had to get permission to hold the talks from the county that year.

Saturday, April second, had clouds but no rain, and at 11 a.m., K gave his first talk and spoke on the need for security—the only security being intelligence. The talk was recorded in color on video by a Santa Barbara television station for the Foundation. A Mr. Sperling of the Ventura County Planning Commission that gave the permit was there to inspect. An estimated 3,000 people attended. Afterward, K went over to where Alan Hooker had organized lunch, but after appearing, K came back to the cottage, where we had lunch quietly.

April third. K gave his second Oak Grove talk and we lunched there. In the afternoon, I typed letters to Pupul and Sunanda for Ahalya to take to India. I gave them the news of Krishnaji's coming surgery. Ahalya came on the afternoon walk with the Lilliefelts and Alan Kishbaugh, and then we said goodbye. Her presence had been a pleasure.

The next day, the Bohms came to say goodbye. They were to go to New York, but before leaving, K and David talked and the conversation turned to the subject of evil. My notes of this missed some of the beginning but the following is what I have:

K: "There are other forces. You may use the word evil. There are people in the world who are evil."

DB: "Would you say force penetrated beyond the ordinary communication?"

K: "They penetrate only when that interest is not in charge."

DB: "What is not clear to me is, suppose there is an evil person making evil through his words and actions, but suppose I don't see him, he is somewhere far away."

K: “But there is a very well-known phenomenon—I can think about you happily with affection and care—or I can hate you.”

DB: “Now does that hate affect you when you are far away?”

K: “Yes, that’s what I mean.”

DB: “Then there is a transmission of thought?”

K: “Oh, obviously, obviously.”

DB: “Yes, well, it’s important to get it clear because it contradicts what people usually accept. But you are quite clear on that, quite sure of it?”

K: “I’m quite sure. Personally, when I go to a place with which I’m not familiar, where I haven’t lived—say, when I first came here after ten years—I came through that door, I felt appalled. I said it to her; I ran out.”

DB: “How is it now?”

K: “Nothing. It’s all gone.”

DB: “But what happened?”

K: “The other thing is stronger. It cannot be touched. That’s why, when the doctor said to me do you want it [anesthesia] by injection or total anesthesia, I said I did not wish to be unconscious.”

DB: “It occurred to me, you say these people are caught in confused thought, nevertheless there is a transformation possible whereby they get [something] out of it. Would you say, suppose you took an anesthetic and were caught and an evil thought took hold of you…”

K: “Oh, but I don’t want to go through all that, of course.”

MZ: “Is it relevant to ask what is the difference between the unconsciousness of anesthesia and sleep?”

K: “Oh, that is entirely different. There it is natural. This is unnatural.”

MZ: “Because it is imposed?”

K: “You’re forced, you’re driven out.”

DB: “Now, with sleep, would you say there is a kind of attention?”

K: “Oh, yes, that intelligence is watching.”

In the afternoon, Isabel Biascoechea, Alfonso Colón, Mr. Riesco, and Sendra came to see K and more or less had things out. Sendra had an elaborate plan by which the Fundación would do all the work of his publishing ventures and pay him and his wife for life. It was rejected. K left whether Sendra should remain a trustee to other members of the Fundación, but with a strong implication that he resign or be asked to leave by the others.

On April fifth, K held the first of the public discussions in the Grove, and on the following day, while he spent the day in bed, he dictated a letter to Rajagopal saying he would be coming to see the archives on April fifteenth and was concerned by the report of trustees that none of his manuscripts were there. He would be coming to see them and also letters of Mrs. Besant, C. W. Leadbeater, and Aldous Huxley.

After the next public discussion, various people came to lunch, including Pascaline Mallet and Gizelle Questiau. There were public talks on April ninth and Easter Sunday. In the evening, with great seriousness, he told me that I must be watchful of him after the operation, that the line between life and death was very thin for him, and that I must remind him to be watchful.

The next day, I wrote to Dorothy and Mary Cadogan about his plans to have the operation and to stay in California through May. K saw Sendra alone, who tried to undo agreements made at the last meeting with other Fundación members. K said no. We walked later, and in the evening he spoke to me again about not letting him slip away in the hospital. I must talk to him, remind him “to be very watchful after the operation.” He said that the body for the last three days had been resisting the operation, and that the danger was that he—K—might suddenly say, “that is enough,” and slip out. He said that the line between life and death was always there; it had happened to him in the past, it happened there in Ojai when he was walking in the mountains, it had happened in India where he “goes off” and “wanders away,” as he put it, and it could happen. He said he must not take any sedation, but in particular I must be watchful. I asked what I could do, and he said to talk, talk to him. It wouldn’t happen with strangers about, but after he comes back to his room after the operation. I must talk to him and remind him too in the morning before the surgery. I must also remind him before he donates his blood. I must be watchful. The night before, we had been joking about something—“a home loan,” which was being advertised on television—and I said, “Do you wish to apply for a home loan?” and he said, “Yes.”

“For what purpose?” I asked.

And he said, “For an operation,” which threw me because, since he made the decision to have it, he had not referred to it except factually, and suddenly in the middle of this joking conversation it came up. Later, I asked him if he didn’t want to have the operation: Did he wish to cancel it? He said no, it was decided. I asked him once more and he said, “No, if one neglects it and if there were a stoppage, it would be much worse.” But I must remind him.

He held the third public talk in the Grove on April twelfth. There were guests at lunch at Arya Vihara, and a question was asked about thought being matter. K said that thought as matter dies with the body, which is matter, but he implied that thought in some form enters a stream of consciousness and continues. I tried to ask him to clarify more specifically how this happens, but this did not seem the moment he wanted to do it. A question was asked about reincarnation, and K said that the body and mind die, but thought is like an energy put out by the mind; it is matter and continues, as evil exists, as the good put out by man exists.

In the afternoon, he called in Colón, Isabel Biascoechea, Riesco, and Sendra and chastised Sendra for his mixing Theosophy and K's teachings. He told the Fundación members that they must deal with this and with Sendra.

The next morning, he again spoke of my being watchful when he donates blood too, and that I must tell the Lilliefelts of the possible danger. At 9:30, Charles Moore and Bart Phelps came with a mock-up of how to link the cottage with the new wing. K liked it and a sample of gray roofing. While I was with the architects, K talked to Mark Lee about teacher problems. He remained in bed but had the Lilliefelts, Mark, Alan, and Evelyne come in to discuss teachers' salaries and other dissatisfactions. He said they must understand that what is being done is the main thing. Then, suddenly, he asked me if he could tell them what he had told me about the operation. He told them he had always lived a very fine line between living and dying, that he "mustn't slip away" in the hospital, that he had told me what to do. They were in tears. When others had left, he called Erna and Theo back and talked to them a little more about it.

April fifteenth. In line with our legal rights in the settlement agreement with Rajagopal, Krishnaji had written to Rajagopal informing him that he wished to visit his archives and mentioned planning to look at certain letters, manuscripts, etcetera. So he, Erna, Theo, Ruth Tettemer, and I went to the building on Besant Road. Austin Bee admitted us and Rajagopal quickly appeared. He said he didn't know where K's manuscripts were, and all the other material was his personal property. Krishnaji then left, but before he did, I asked K to look at the two first photographs I had found in an album, apparently put together by Nitya, as the writing underneath was his. These were of "Krishna, aged about five" and "Krishna's mother"—a separate photograph. K looked at them and then left.

There were quiet days, K resting, walks, and one movie expedition, and May eighth, 1977 began with Krishnaji doing his exercises very thoroughly, and then Erna and Theo came to lunch. We spoke of the apparent immaturity of teachers in the school and of Erna having written to Mr. Cohen about Rajagopal's flouting the agreement on visiting the archives. She had also written to Rajagopal that she and Krishnamurti would come on May seventeenth to start an inventory of archives. There was discussion of the JK–Leadbeater letters and how one judges the credibility of them. I pointed out that there was then only one witness one could ask—K himself. He said that he didn't really accept his own youthful testimony of seeing masters, etcetera as reliable. He didn't remember at that point, but he also pointed out that at that age he was very young, younger than his numerical age, was impressionable, etcetera. We had to interrupt this conversation and be off. The Lilliefelts went to a motel near the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital so that they could be there the following morning. K and I drove through a downpour of rain to the hospital and checked into the eighth floor, where Dr. Bakhtiar had ordered a private duty nurse who was on hand, a nice quiet young woman, sensitive and understanding. K had a large corner room with a table and couch, but they had also provided a room next to his for me. K did whatever he did to somehow "cleanse" the room to make an atmosphere, a protective something, and later he went alone into my room to do the same.

Lailee Bakhtiar appeared and talked alone with K, taking more medical history. Then the hospital pre-surgery routine unrolled: chest X-ray, blood chemistry, EKG, etcetera. It made it smoother to have Miss Mitchell, the private nurse. I talked to the dietician.

When we were alone, K asked me if I felt something in the room. I did immediately. A strong sense of—how to describe it? A presence, an intensity very quiet but there, perceptible to nerve endings, a perimeter in which there was something alive, vital, strong. It was something un-assessable, un-provable. I was aware of the danger of imagining, but it was clear and part of what I had been sensing in recent days—a strength in which emotion and self were absent.

K had said that morning that "the body resists this"—meaning the operation. I asked how the body expressed this, and he laughed and said, "I don't want to go," but in the evening he said, "It is all right. Can you feel the atmosphere?" and I could. Something was strongly around him. I spoke to him as he had told me two weeks earlier, to be attentive. He said it was not necessary, he had talked to the body. I was only to remind him in the morning to be careful "while I am in their hands."

Earlier, the anesthesiologist, a woman named Dr. Stoka, came and described carefully the spinal he was to have. She examined his back, discussed normal medication, which would be a tranquilizer and something to have a good effect on blood pressure, but because Krishnaji had never taken tranquilizers, there was the factor of his not wishing his consciousness to be lessened. I talked to her, explaining this and, without going into it too much, spoke of the good of her keeping a contact conversationally with him during the operation. All this seemed to be well handled. Cedars Sinai is an enormous building, but because it had only been completed and opened less than a year earlier, there was less of a hospital atmosphere. When K had his X-ray, we walked for exercise, K in his new gray viyella Charvet dressing gown, with the nurse leading the way, briskly up and down the very long empty hall. It was as it had been in airports between flights, like the one to Australia. There were Redon reproductions in the hall that K liked and stopped to examine, and he recognized the Van Gogh sunflowers as we passed. By this time, he was ready to sleep, had seen the sequences of hospital life, and seemed to think everything was well handled. So he said he was ready and felt "all is taken care of."

May ninth. Neither of us slept too well, and each got up at five. K did his breathing exercises and a few asanas. I spoke to him, “Be attentive, remember, be careful.” He said he knew the body was ready, everything was all right. He had shaved but didn’t have time for a shower. A bored attendant came with a gurney, and K climbed onto it on his own. He smiled at me. I said, “Stia attenta, non dimenticare.” He replied, “Non abbia paura.” I: “Sto con lei.”

As he was wheeled off down the hall, I followed until he went into surgery. It was 7:30 a.m. Erna and Theo came, and so did Evelyne. A private duty male nurse was able to find out that he would be out of the recovery room by 9:30, but before that, the surgeon, Dr. Hausman, appeared and told us that the operation was a complete success; K had come through it perfectly but he had found that the neck of the prostate was congenitally smaller than normal, so that with enlargement of the prostate there was almost complete blockage. The condition must have existed for years, and the operation should have been done long ago. He had enlarged the neck of the bladder. TURP is the name of this operation: trans-urethral-resection-prostate. It would take some time for the bladder to relax and readjust. Dr. Hausman would give medicine for this later. K had not lost much blood and transfusion of his own, which he had donated, was not needed.

He was back in his room by 9:45. Erna, Theo, and Evelyne came in briefly to greet him and then left. He had intravenous glucose all day and saline in and out of a catheter. Various testing went on, and K kept saying they wouldn’t do all this in India or in England. The thoroughness impressed him. He did breathing through a bottle to keep the lungs exercised. He drank fruit juice all day and said he was thirsty. He said he had some pain and was given Tylenol and codeine, but was inclined to go too long without it. Dr. Hausman came by just after noon and repeated that if he himself were having this operation, he could not want it to go better. K was interested to see the surgical instruments. When we were alone, he asked me if it had been my imagination the night before about the room. He said the body had not wanted to go through with it when he waited in the surgery, but he talked to it. The spinal went easily and wore off quickly. The operation actually took fifty-five minutes, he said, and time in the recovery too was not long. He told me that after quieting the body, he was without thought until he was back in his room. At his urging, I went out briefly and bought him Time and Newsweek.

Miss Mitchell came on duty at 3 p.m. We sat for a while, and then she went to order K’s meals for the next day. He wanted spinach and cheesecake. After she left, he took my hand and said to sit near, but not too near the bed. “This is the danger point. I feel like going off—not fainting, you understand.” I talked to him quietly as he has instructed me, but then he stopped me: “No, no, you mustn’t say anything, you mustn’t interfere. You mustn’t think about anything.” He had me move to the foot of the bed opposite him. His face became inward-turned, a slightly hallucinated look. This was interrupted by Lailee coming in to see him. Dr. Hausman had left orders for Demerol, if needed, and Lailee told the nurse, Miss Mitchell, to give him a tiny dose—what one would give a child. It was given to him, and he began to feel a dizziness from it. “Is this normal?” he asked several times. It cut the pain but soon made him sick to his stomach, vomiting several times. The hallucinating look increased and he kept telling the nurse to go and have her supper, which she had done earlier. It was by now a little before 9 p.m. While she was out of the room, he told me, "I felt the body floating and there was a dialogue between death and the other, and death was winning." The nurse had returned to the darkened room, and this seemed to bring him out of the state he had been in. We were able to talk about this in spite of her comings and goings. He said there was nothing I could do, not to interfere. I pointed out that the presence of the nurse had brought him round, but he said, "It will come again tonight until it is settled." Soon he lapsed again into the "off" state and said, "Since 5 [a.m.] so many people have touched the body." And he began to count them. "About ten have touched me." There was a sense of violation in all that had been done to him, and soon he began to look about as though seeing things, making random gestures, raising his right arm, then, "Where am I?" [pause] "I've been wounded" [looking about]. "Where's my brother Nitya?" The voice was light, higher, almost a boy's. Then, "I want to join you, Nitya." And then, "I'm going away."

I had said nothing until this, but then said, "No, Krishna, you are going to be well, and strong." After a few seconds, he gave a deep-sounding cough, his normal cough, and his voice dropped to its normal level. He said, "That's better." And then, "I'm not going. I'll join you later, Nitya. Much later. Another ten years."

Later, he said, "One mustn't be burdened with the past." And still later, "You and I mustn't be in an automobile accident, so drive carefully." And again later, "I'm not a philosopher." Finally, after about an hour, he seemed to come out of it and spoke directly to me. "I'm all right now." The nurse had called Dr. Hausman, who said no more Demerol and had her lessen the size of the balloon in the bladder that kept the catheter in. This lessened the pressure and the pain. He was able to go through two more irrigations of the bladder without pain. After telling me he was all right, he fell asleep, and I felt assurance that he was through it. I slept on and off in the adjacent room, coming in to check. There was a young male nurse on duty.

May tenth. Krishnaji was reading when I came in at 6 a.m. No pain; the irrigations had not hurt. Lailee came in early and so did Dr. Hausman. K didn't want a solid breakfast, but I made a little of his usual muesli, and he ate it, saying, "Appetit vient en mangeant." Dr. Hausman ordered that the intravenous glucose be discontinued as well as the saline drip. K still had the catheter bag but was able to get up and walk in the room while the bed was being made. Hausman had ordered probanthine to relax muscles, but after one tablet K threw up again, and so all medications were stopped. After Dr. Hausman's visit was over, K dictated A Dialogue with Death as follows:

"It was a minor operation not worth talking about though there was considerable pain. While the pain continued, I saw or discovered that the body was almost floating in the air. It may have been an illusion, some kind of hallucination, but a few minutes later there was the personification—not a person—but the personification of death. Watching this peculiar phenomenon between the body and death, there seemed to be a sort of dialogue between them. Death seemed to be talking to the body with great insistence and the body reluctantly not admitting what death wanted. Though there were people in the room, this phenomenon went on, death inviting, the body refusing. It was not a fear of death why the body was denying the demands of death, but it realized it was not responsible for itself; there was another entity that was dominating, much stronger, more vital than death itself. Death was more and more demanding and insisting, and so the other interfered. Then there was a conversation or a dialogue between not only the body, but the other, and death. So there were three entities in conversation. He had warned before he went to the hospital that there might be a dissociation with the body, and so death might intervene. Though the person was sitting there and a nurse [came and went], it was not a self-deception or kind of hallucination. Lying in the bed, he saw the clouds full of rain and the town below stretching for miles. There was spattering of rain on the windowpane, and he saw clearly the saline solution dripping drop by drop into the organism. One felt very distinctly and clearly that if the other had not interfered, death would have won. This dialogue was expressed in words with thought operating very clearly. There was thunder and lightning, and the conversation went on. Since there was no fear at all, neither on the part of the body nor the other—absolutely no fear—one could converse freely and profoundly. It is always difficult to put a conversation of that kind into words. Strangely, as there was no fear, death was not enchaining the mind to things of the past. What came out of the conversation was very clear. The body in considerable pain was not apprehensive or anxious, and the other was discerningly beyond both. It was as though the other were acting as an umpire, [in] a dangerous game of which the body was not at all aware. Even if it was, there would be no withdrawal from the scene. Death seemed to be always present, like one's shadow. Being concerned with the whole movement of life, death cannot be invited. That would be suicide, which would be utterly foolish. But death and life, or rather the living, in this peculiar phenomenon that was going on, the three were never separate. During this conversation, there was no sense of time. Probably the whole dialogue lasted about an hour, and the time by the watch did not exist. There were no words used but an immediate insight into what each was saying. Of course, if one is attached to anything—ideas, beliefs, property, or person—death would not come to have a conversation with you. Death in the sense of ending is absolute freedom."

"The quality of conversation was urbane. There was nothing whatsoever of sentiment, emotional extravagance to distort the absolute fact of time coming to an end, and the vastness without any border when death is taking part in your daily life. There was the feeling that the body would go on for many years, but death and the other would always be together till the organism could no longer be active. There was a great sense of humor amongst the three of them, and one could almost hear the laughter. And the beauty of it was with the clouds and the rain."

Here Krishnamurti was interrupted by the hospital routine. He said he would review it or add to it later. During the day, he got up and walked several times, and ate well. I went out and got some fresh cherries, the first of the season, which he said were very good. Evelyne came by for a minute. In the evening, he fell asleep naturally around 9 p.m. and slept well. I transferred to a room that connected to his and so had no nurse for the 11 to 7 shift. I went in almost every hour to check, and he was sleeping like a child.

May eleventh. K looked well in the morning and thought that a cheese enchilada from the farmer's market would be nice, so needing exercise and remembering it to be closer than it was, I walked there and came back with three lunches and some grapes and cherries. The afternoon was harder on K. He had spasms each time a clot passed. Irrigation relieved it but only until the next one. Dr. Hausman came by in the evening just when all was well, said K was doing well and ordered the catheter removed the next morning. He had no sooner left than K had a bad spasm, which Miss Mitchell relieved by irrigation but it was a rough night for K. The floor nurses were not too good. I can't remember if I did more than doze.

The next day was Krishnaji's eighty-second birthday. It began quite miserably at 12:30 a.m. in the morning with pain. At 6 a.m., the catheter was removed by the floor nurse, not too efficiently, but it was out. The male morning nurse came on just before the first normal urination, which was painful and several more caused further pain, but each time it was slightly less. Dr. Hausman appeared and said K could go home the next day, but then Lailee came at noon and thought it might be wiser to wait another day until the fourteenth, giving more time to get used to things while still here and more time to rest before leaving the hospital. This was agreed upon. The afternoon nurse came as usual.

May thirteenth. Lailee came just after 9 a.m. to see K. Dr. Hausman came in the afternoon, saying K was fine and could leave the next day. He prescribed pyridium to ease the pain of voiding. Then he told us that the results of lab tests showed on one "chip" a tiny dot of malignancy. He said it was in the center of normal tissue, was just beginning, and was now out. He said that 80 percent of autopsies of men over eighty years show cancer of the prostate—it was very common, but the men usually died of something else. It is not a swift malignancy. In K's case, it was as if he hadn't had it: no need for special watching. He would examine K on his return to California next year, and because he now knows what K's bladder is like, he would be able to easily tell how he was. All this was further evidence of why it was a good decision to have had the surgery. K listened to all this with equanimity. Miss Mitchell was not really needed, but the continuity of care until his leaving seemed a good thing. She was very helpful in getting bits of equipment we would need at home.

The fourteenth. Lailee came by early. Her evaluation of the lab report tallied with that of Dr. Hausman. We were ready to leave early, but Dr. Hausman was delayed in coming to sign out Krishnaji. Dr. Stoka, the anesthesiologist, came to say goodbye, and so did Dr. Shkolnick, whom Lailee had called in to examine his chest. He said that K was doing well in bronchial matters, (i.e., doing headstands during yoga). He could be given antibiotics, but he was not sure they would help permanently, and they could have possible ill effects, so better to leave well enough alone. He then asked K about meditation, and K gave him a wealth of reply. Dr. Hausman finally appeared in late morning and signed K's discharge. K went in his dressing gown by wheelchair to the car, and so we came blessedly home to Malibu. On the drive, he observed everything as though for the first time, missing nothing. We had a late-ish lunch. All was quiet, and instead of air conditioning there was a gentle freshness from the ocean, the garden smelled of flowers and moist leaves, and quail called from the canyon.

May fifteenth. Each slept a lot. We telephoned Alain and Blanche Mathias and told all that had happened to both, including what K calls "the dot." We also told the Lilliefelts. K walked a little in the garden—it was quiet and beautiful. We played Mozart; the sea made a sleepy summer sound. Hospitals are anti-life—walls, plastic food, and air. The grass, sunlight, and ocean air were healing. K said he felt quite "washed out," but it seemed like the lassitude of relaxation after all that had happened. I too was losing the strain and slept as though deprived for a month.

In subsequent days, Krishnaji rested, walked in the garden, and read. On one of the days he glanced at a photograph we had copied from the archives of himself aged about five, as Nitya's handwriting indicated. Then he asked me what the face said. "I wish I could talk to you without words. Words distort. There is something I want to convey. I've told you about this other face that is somewhere there, there is that, and that boy's face, and then this" [pointing to his own face]. Then he changed the subject.

Alain visited and spent one night with us on May twenty-second, and we took him to the airport the next day on the way to see Dr. Hausman in his office. All was as it should be, but the normal feeling of weakness suggested postponing our return to Brockwood from June seventh to the fourteenth. Then, on the way home, K changed it to the twenty-first. On May twenty-fifth, he resumed doing his asanas and increased walks around the garden to eleven laps.

On May thirty-first, Krishnaji finished dictating the Dialogue with Death that he had begun in the hospital on May tenth. He didn't reread what he had said, saying, "I would only rewrite it," so began dictating: "Of course it wasn't death, K and the body, three separate activities on their own, but it was a humorous whole moving together without distinction among them." When in the evening he did have me read the whole piece to him, I pointed out that he had been speaking of death, the other, and the body, and now he referred to death, K, and the body, so he changed that sentence, putting the other in place of K.

"You know what I mean by the other?" he asked. I nodded, and he said, "The mind that is inhabited by K." Then he continued the dictation: "Words cannot describe this strange movement, which is essentially timeless. Putting this down in black and white on paper is the expression of thought, is the expression through words, and so the movement of thought and time. But the movement of death is not of time. So the description is not the described. However cunningly thought may try to capture it, death is beyond measure. It was a conversation without word, without thought, and so not of time."

Here he paused, searching for words, and said, "Don't look at me." Then he continued: "The sound of this conversation was expanding endlessly, and the sound was the same at the beginning and was without end. It was a song without a beginning or an end. Death and life are very close together, like love and death. As love is not remembrance, death has no past. Fear never entered this conversation, for fear is darkness and death is light."

When I reread this part to him in the evening, I couldn't continue for a bit as I was on the edge of tears, too moved. Then I went on and finished, and he asked if I had felt something then. I said I had felt something there, something listening. He said, "I had tears in my eyes." Neither of us had looked at the other; it was of course "death is light" which lifted something in me that was like a rising light. He finished the dictation: "This dialogue was not illusory or fanciful. It was like a whisper in the wind, but the whisper was very clear, and if you listened, you could hear it, you would then be part of it. Then we would share it together. But you won't listen to it if you are too identified with your own body, your own thoughts, and your own direction. One must abandon all this to enter into the light and love of death."

The architect Charles Moore lunched with us. A likable man. Among other things, we talked about the atmosphere in houses, and surprisingly K spoke of what he did to make a certain atmosphere when he stays in a new or strange room. He told Charles about things done in India that are mysterious: the story of a raving woman, the priest bringing a branch from a certain tree, carrying it around the woman, she quieted a little, then the branch was nailed to a tree and the woman was cured (i.e., the bad was captured out of her into the branch and nailed to a tree); then the holding up of the cross in Christian practice—"only it doesn't always work because the priest is not really religious." And, "You've heard of all these? Well, what I do is none of these." Then he smiled and said nothing more. Moore seemed pleased.

On June second we drove to Ojai for a trustee meeting and lunched at Arya Vihara. On the seventh, K saw Dr. Hausman again, and a slight bladder infection was found, which was the reason K was feeling tired. Sulfa tablets were prescribed. On another day, K came with me to town and looked at marble for the bathroom counters in Pine Cottage. Building bids were coming in on the remodeling. K had a haircut, and we came home.

Going to Ojai on June fifteenth in his green Mercedes, K drove more than halfway. We met with the architects about the plans for the school administration building, and Erna and I went to Ventura about a change in the conditional use permit for the McAndrew Road property. On our return to Arya Vihara for lunch, the school architects received the first bid on its construction and turned white. It was twice that of the professional estimator's figure and our budget. This was the same contractor who was going to send an estimate to me for the work on the cottage. It was so gloomy that everyone began to laugh, and K and I thought it time to leave. I couldn't turn the key in the ignition. K tried, Theo, Erna, Mark Lee, and Michael Krohnen tried, and so did the two architects, and the auto club man. So Erna and Theo drove us home to Malibu, and we had supper in the kitchen. After they left, I searched for something in my handbag and there was the key to the green car. I had been trying to use the one to the gray car. Total idiocy. K was very nice about it and saw I was tired and not functioning.

The next morning, he proposed that we go back to Ojai in the gray car on awakening, no breakfast, just dress and go, so we did, leaving at 6:30 a.m. There was mist along the ocean. "Be without thought," K said (i.e., just look, no reactive thought, no associations to what one saw). We went right to the cottage, where Theo was waiting and invited us to breakfast, but we came right home. K drove his green car, which started right up with its own correct key. We had breakfast at home by 9:30 a.m.

On June nineteenth Albert Blackburn telephoned from Ojai that James Vigeveno had died of cancer two days earlier. Krishnaji asked me if I thought we should telephone Annie Vigeveno. I said I thought we should. I rang and spoke to her briefly. We both used first names. I said I hoped she would accept my sympathy, and she thanked me. Then Krishnaji spoke to her and said he remembered what a kind man her husband used to be.

The rest of the day was given to packing and to complicated telephone calls about Louis Blau's legal advice that I should acquire the McAndrew Road property before altering Pine Cottage and before selling the house in Malibu to offset certain taxes. Then Bart Phelps, Charles Moore's associate architect, came by with a copy of the specifications for the cottage. All this put me behind in packing, so I tried to persuade K to go to bed and leave me to finish, but it disturbed him for some reason and he kept coming in. So I stopped at 10 p.m. and when around 11 p.m. his quiet "Maria? Maria?" came from the hall, I was already in bed in the dark. He was pleased and went off satisfied to his own room and sleep.

June twenty-first. I rang TWA at 7:30 a.m. to ask if our flight would be landing in London or Paris, as there was some sort of rumor about this. They weren't sure, so I telephoned Dorothy at Brockwood for her to check before going to the airport. We were ready to leave by 10:30 a.m., when Alan Kishbaugh came. K went with him in his car, and Amanda drove me to the airport, where K and I left on TWA at 12:30 p.m. K slept a little before and after lunch. We had our preferred seats, all the way forward, and K exercised by walking in the aisle. Flying eastward, the sun soon set, but that being the longest day, it would soon rise. Amanda had kept remarking how well K looked, and so he did. It filled my heart to see him in his proper health.

Section Fourteen

CHAPTER 45

On June twenty-second, 1977, we landed at Heathrow and were met by Dorothy, Doris, and Ingrid. By 9:30 a.m., we were at green and beautiful Brockwood. Krishnaji went to bed for the rest of the day with lunch on a tray. I took naps but after supper went for a walk. The handkerchief tree was still in bloom, but the grove was somewhat devastated by rabbits after the fence was wired. What had been four garages were now classrooms and could be temporary sleeping quarters during the September talks. The place seemed ever better and always beautiful. I talked to Mary Links.

On June twenty-fifth, Mary and Joe came to spend the night in the West Wing. We had tea with K and then all went for a walk before supper. In the evening, Mary, Joe, and I talked at length.

June twenty-eighth. Borrowing Doris Pratt's mini, Krishnaji and I drove to Petersfield and went then by train to London. The city was in banners for the Queen's jubilee. K left trousers to be altered at Huntsman, and we walked to Fortnum, stopping to buy a jersey for Vanda. K was shocked at the price of £65 for this one. We had a pleasant and leisurely lunch with Mary L. While I went to the lavatory, K started one of his questionings: Was it chance or otherwise that someone turned up to look after him? Example—me. And he repeated again that the only thing he regretted in his life was the association with Rajagopal and Rosalind. He said what an extraordinary life he had had. This remark came after my return, when we were talking about the difficulties facing young people—Mary's grandchildren for instance—in finding jobs, etcetera. He said he had been so fortunate, looked after, always cared for. Did something arrange it all? Did it or they foresee someone (me) to come along who was interested and able to care for him? I asked him, without asking him to tell us anything he didn't want to discuss, if he knew more about this? He said he did, but, "It is not my job to go into that." Yet he had raised this question frequently. It seemed as if there was some mystery in it for him too, as there continued to be about "that boy"—his younger self.

We collected some detective stories at Hatchards and so back to Waterloo and Brockwood.

The next day, K rested and read. I packed, but he only started his packing at 5:00 and did it energetically in short order. All my letter writing was done—a rare summit. We watched Wimbledon—Virginia Wade defeating Chris Evert. K was for Evert. "Come on, Chris! I have fifty pounds on you! What's the matter, Chris?"

June thirtieth. Dorothy drove K and me to Heathrow, stopping for a picnic lunch in the car on the way. On the flight, an obnoxious man sitting across the aisle from K refused to stop smoking, though he was in a nonsmoking seat. I asked the steward to enforce it, but he seemed servile to the man, apologetic to me, suggesting we move seats. I spoke freely, which upset K. "It doesn't matter, it doesn't matter." Then to me: "If someone is boorish, what can you do?" We landed at Charles de Gaulle and went by taxi to the Plaza Athénée. We took a walk around the block and then had supper in our rooms.

The next day, we rested all morning and lunched in the hotel garden where Nadia Kossiakof joined us for coffee. She and her husband, Nicolas, had enthused over their visit to the United States. Freedom was there, they felt. "Tout est politique en France." We spoke of Mme. Duché and her quiet death.

The next day, July second, we flew to Geneva, rented an Opel Record, large enough for the five bags and two camera cases, and found our way to the Intercontinental Hotel, where Narasimhan met us and guided the way to his apartment building; he provided lunch, vanishing into the kitchen and refusing any help from K or me. A South Indian friend had provided the curries. He was pleased to entertain K, and soon we left and went down the hill to the underground parking garage opposite Patek Philippe, where watches were left to be demagnetized. We walked to Jacquet, which, alas, was closed, but K had the idea that we could find the Braun quartz travel clock he saw in Paris, and so we did at Grand Passage. He was very pleased because it only varied by sixty seconds per year. We made some other small purchase and at 3:30 p.m. set off for Gstaad along the lake, up through centre-ville Lausanne, at K's suggestion, so we came down into Oron by the long road that is like a toboggan run. We both remembered simultaneously, laughing, the place where we had seen the Swiss army with lights on their bicycle pedals looking like a caterpillar in the pre-dawn dark the last time we had motored from Gstaad to Paris. At Bulle, we stopped to buy gateaux Bullois and a glass of apple juice for K.

We reached Chalet Tanneg at 6:30 p.m.; Vanda and Fosca were there. K's room had lost its view of the valley to cupboards and a dressing table, and there were red Wagnerian carpets in the hall. Too tired to unpack, K went to bed. I took a shower and had supper with Vanda. We talked at some length, and I told her more fully about K's night in the hospital after surgery. I was staggered by her telling me that some years earlier, "before you were there," he had been examined in Geneva and the doctor told her that K had a tumor in his bladder that might be cancer. She never told K, and nothing further was done.

The next day, as a result of the drive, K had hay fever. It had been too hot to close the car windows—at least, he had refused—and so the pollen reached him. He stayed in bed and took homeopathic remedies. This continued the following day. I exchanged the Opel for a small Renault. Edgar Graf came to see K, who was trying to help his back. Vanda said that K's TURP operation had only been invented recently and therefore K would have had to have a full operation years ago—therefore, it was right to have ignored the Geneva doctor's diagnosis. Though this ignored the fact of two different organs—bladder and prostate—it seemed to have obliterated for her the possibility that if K had had cancer, as the doctor told her, he might not have been there that sunny day in Gstaad. My brain shivered at this sort of thinking. It became non-discussable, as she believed what she wanted to believe.

July seventh. I had received from Erna copies of various requirements from the Ventura building department for alterations to Pine Cottage, and a hearing was to have been held that day. Frances McCann, Simonetta di Cesaro, and a young Italian painter came to lunch. The Siddoos came at 4:00 to have K sign a lease of their school and adult center buildings for KF Canada from them at $1 for three years. They, of course, own the buildings. Scott arrived in the new Mercedes van rigged as a video center. He brought K's books and sun umbrella. As it was raining lightly, K walked down the hill while I went to the post office to pick up the K–Anderson video cassettes, air-freighted from Ojai to be shown in the tent during the talks. I then met K by the bridge, and we drove to look at the tent. He liked the yellow Renault.

July ninth. Dorothy, Montague, and Doris arrived in the Land Rover with no mishaps. I went by to see them; and Kathy, who bicycled with six other staff and students, came by, sunburned and smiling. Vanda, who is eating almost nothing and refuses all urging to eat more, looks ill. She ate a little at lunch but nothing at supper. K has scolded her, I have urged gently. It is worrisome. K and I walked to the river. A policeman stopped us, asking if we had picked wildflowers or mushrooms. They seemed to be protecting them. We felt very approving. Before retiring, K had me pick out his clothes for the next day's talk. He said goodnight with a thinking-of-something air, said, "Tomorrow I have to talk," and stretched his eyebrows. He was wearing the orange silk kimono dressing gown that stays here for the summers, a sannyasi color and very becoming.

July tenth. The day began with clouds, but the sun appeared before it was time to go to the tent for Krishnaji's opening talk. Vanda went with Mrs. Walsh, who had the downstairs flat. K and I arrived just before 10:30. In spite of the expected rain and it being the first talk, the tent was nearly full. Scott had four monitors and all the video set-up in the new Brockwood Mercedes van, and Mary Cadogan had brought from London the third Sony video camera that was needed, ordered ten days earlier in Los Angeles and brought to London by Donald Hoppen. So all was ready, and K looked well and full of energy. He gave a strong opening talk, laying the basis for there being no security in thought and coming to the fact that the actual and real seeing of this was the action of change and intelligence. In this there is real security.

K walked up the road right afterward. Scott had warned me that the mad girl who had lain in the driveway the previous summer in Saanen and appeared naked in the Oak Grove after an April talk, was lurking by the river, waiting "to cut him off at the pass"—as Scott put it. I asked Scott to walk with him a ways, and so nothing happened.

Vanda brought Mar de Manziarly to the chalet for lunch. In the car, K said, "I had no idea what I was going to talk about when I began." He had lunch in his room, though he sat with us beforehand. In the afternoon, Dorothy brought Mrs. Billimoria and Mrs Puri with things they had brought from India for K. Mangoes too. He talked amiably with them for a while. I took Mar to Caprices, where she was staying, then walked with Vanda and K to Alpina and back. K's face looked thin in the evening, but he did not appear to be over-tired, just normally tired.

The second Saanen talk, on July twelfth, was an intense one on authority, etcetera—a very strong one. It was hot in the tent, and the video lights made it hotter. When I picked him up on the road, he wanted to go to the shoe store in Saanen. It was cool there, and Mr. Kohli found a pleasing pair. We came back to the chalet, and at lunch there was Suad al Radi and a friend of Vanda's who wanted her son and daughter to go to Brockwood. At 4 p.m., I fetched Narayan up the hill to talk to K, and then the three of us walked to the river and back. Narayan stayed to supper with Vanda and me.

In the third talk on July fourteenth, K talked about skill, clarity, and compassion—new material. Later, he said it was like a triangle: the base was compassion. Hugues, Suzanne, and Marjolaine van der Straten, and Simonetta di Cesaro were at lunch.

A letter came from Erna saying the Ventura Planning Commission had approved a zone change on the McAndrew Road property for an adult education center and religious retreat, including permission to add onto the cottage. This, at last, opened the door to building. Also, a contractor named Max Falk offered "to build a house for Krishnamurti" without a fee, but when he saw the plans he said it was too extensive to donate his time. However, Bart Phelps, Charles Moore's architect assistant, was pursuing it as Falk was highly recommended by other architects. Narayan came again to talk to K about Rishi Valley, went on the walk, and both he and Edgar Graf stayed to supper with Vanda and me.

On July fifteenth there was the annual meeting of the International Krishnamurti Committees. Mary Cadogan opened it, Dorothy gave a good report on Brockwood, the Siddoos spoke of a September opening of their school in Canada, I did Oak Grove School, and Narayan spoke well about Rishi Valley. K handled his health question very well: "About my health, I'm fine. I had a very minor operation—nothing worth mentioning. The doctors say I'm fine and I expect to live another ten or fifteen years." Scott spoke about video matters. K also spoke about the March K Foundations' meetings but didn't mention why only four K Foundations were there. I added a footnote that it was only for Foundations with schools, hoping to make it explainable to the Spanish group present.

Mary C., Jane Hammond, and Mar de Manziarly were at lunch. Later, Graf brought two women from Lugano radio, and there was a taped interview with K. Later still, we walked. On the sixteenth, Vanda left for Florence. Krishnaji spent the day resting.

He gave his fourth Saanen talk on July seventeenth, full of fire. In the afternoon, Mr. Mirabet came to give his annual donation of $4,000. Krishnaji decided to give $3,000 to Brockwood and $1,000 to a Rishi Valley fund Narayan wanted to collect and keep in the West for book purchases and also for teachers' travel. I was to open an account for it in Ojai, and K wished to donate $500 of his Miss Dodge money to it. Narayan came at 4 p.m. and was told all this. Krishnaji was so full of hope for Narayan to make Rishi Valley what it was meant to be. He exhorted him, calling him "old man." We all then walked to the river, K saying, "This operation has done me good. I have more energy." Narayan stayed to supper.

On July nineteenth, Krishnaji gave his fifth Saanen talk. He spoke with great intensity on discontent, the necessity for it leading to passion and compassion, which is intelligence, and also on suffering, and has that to do with love? (No.) He ended with his story about a teacher addressing a room of pupils, a bird comes to the window and sings, the teacher listens, and when the bird finishes and flies away, he tells the pupils, "You have heard the lesson for today." It was one of K's talks that leaves me in tears.

After the talk, when he got into the car, he wanted to go again to the shoe store in Saanen for another pair of the lightweight shoes. We lunched in the dining room, and then he slept. At four there was a tea to which came the Patel family—all eight strong—as well as Narayan and Edgar Graf. There was talk of Indian politics between K and father Patel, disappointing to two sons, two daughters, and a son-in-law, and a daughter-in-law, who wanted to talk on other matters. The mother sat monolithically, the father voluble. After they left, we walked to the river with Narayan, who stayed to supper. K asked me to take Narayan shopping the next day for shoes, jeans, and a Lamy pen. K again said, "That operation must have done something to me. I feel such energy!"

The shopping expedition took all the next morning but was considered a great success, and Narayan went off looking pleased. Dorothy and Montague left the Saanen camping and moved into the downstairs flat at Tannegg. Edgar Graf brought a Swiss editor of a radio station and magazine to see K about doing an article on him and the newly translated Talks with American Students. He brought a translator to the meeting who recorded it all on tape, but most of the conversation was in German, with K gazing out the window. Dorothy came on the afternoon walk to the river. On return, an aggressive man from Granada came waving a letter from Fresia saying that "Princess Alliata" would arrange for him to see K. My saying that Topazia Alliata was not there only increased his insistence, so finally K saw him for a few minutes. Apparently, he had come all this way to ask on behalf of a woman K knew years ago the question: "Why did I marry my husband, who is now dead?" K replied, "How would I know?" and the man left, satisfied. "People are crazy," said K, and so did I.

On July twenty-first, K gave a sixth talk—an extraordinary one on death and love. Afterward, I fetched Mrs. Billimoria, Mrs. Puri, and Narayan to the chalet for lunch, and the Simmons were also there. Krishnaji came in before and afterward but ate in his room on a tray. At 4 p.m. he talked to the Siddoo sisters, Narayan, Dorothy, and me about having a teachers' training center in Bangalore. Dorothy took exception to "training," saying it couldn't be taught as a method, etcetera; it must be learned by doing. She got tense about it. "Defensive," K calls it. He rephrased it into a "teachers' educational center." Narayan spoke enthusiastically about it. Later, K asked me to speak to Dorothy about this defensiveness, as she gets too upset if he does it. She would become intense and somewhat defiant about things, and it annoyed K. He wanted me to "talk to her about it."

July twenty-second. Jean-Michel Maroger and his mother came to lunch, and K joined us at the table. Jean-Michel was inventing a way to insert the French translation in between natural pauses in K's voice on the audiotapes, and it worked very well. He invited

Krishnaji to where he and his wife, Marie-Bertrande, live near Blois. Later, K said it would be nice to go there. At 4 p.m. Edgar Graf brought a Mme. Geiser of the Swiss journal Femina to interview K. He was sleepy at first, rather vague, and then gave her an absorbing lesson in his teachings, leading her step by step into what thought is, conditioning, religion, belief, the future being a projection of the past, the observer and the observed. He said, "To see the whole is to see more than the parts." She asked, "You have talked for fifty years. Are you tired of it?" He replied, "I am not tired because I don't expect anything."

The next day, K received some Spanish people and a donation for the work, which he decided to divide equally between Saanen and Brockwood. He had lunch in bed, and at 4 p.m. Edgar Graf brought a German journalist, Silvia Schafer, to interview K for her paper. He was tired that day.

The twenty-fourth was a shining, cloudless morning, and I went at 6 a.m. to the river and back. All the earth was alive with the smell of new grass in the meadow and pine in the forest; the little stream and the bigger one down in the valley were louder, as if it was their time and all of nature was awake. It was a delight. Krishnaji had slept well and was feeling better. We went to his seventh talk and the final one of that series in Saanen. It was on meditation but began on decisions, went on to what it is to be without ambition, goals, will. He spoke of the space of the conditioned mind, but when there is no center, space is limitless. As he spoke, I saw him living in that infinite space, the rest of us tied in our pens, but in such a talk he lifted one high above the mountains to his sky. At the end, he put his hands together and said to the audience, "May I go now?" and left. I picked him up along the road, surrounded by people. We went for a short drive to Gsteig but then came back to the chalet, as Dr. Dagmar Lichti and her head nurse, Sister Laurie, came to see him for a half-hour. They left as Narasimhan and Simonetta came to lunch. K slept until 4 p.m., when he gave an interview to a Swedish man who had a brain tumor that had recurred.

July twenty-fifth. I walked from 6 until 7 up the mountain. It was wild and beautiful, and two deer bounded out of the woods, over a meadow, and were gone. I felt marvelously after all that and yoga. Krishnaji rested. Anneke, Doris, Dorothy, and Montague were at lunch. K came in afterward and reminisced with Doris. He asked why they didn't try to stop Rajagopal; see what he was doing. This upset Doris, who became argumentative, interrupting K, finishing his sentences for him. It tired K.

On the twenty-seventh, K began his daily discussions in the tent. The Reg Bennetts and Simmonses came to lunch, and K talked at length with them afterward. On the twenty-ninth, architect Bart Phelps telephoned me that the contractor Max Falk had submitted the lowest bid on redoing Pine Cottage. I asked him to talk to Louis Blau about it, but that I was for going ahead with it as soon as possible.

Discussion five was on July thirty-first. It was pouring rain, and unruly people made it difficult for K, but he dealt with it. Anneke came to the chalet for "hands." K slept until 4 p.m., when Dr. Frederick Leboyer, the author of Birth Without Violence, who had been sent by Vanda, saw K briefly. K and I walked to the river, thundering with rain and boulders colliding. The next day, K gave Doris a two-hour interview in the afternoon.

August second was a shining morning, and we took an early train to Geneva. We were in the cabin next to the engineer's, and one passenger was allowed in, so K rode all the way down the mountains to Montreux in that forward cabin and emerged smiling: "I felt like a boy." At Geneva, we went to Jacquet, and he chose patterns for four neckties for Joe Links and four for himself. Then to Grand Passage to look at quartz clocks, and then we crossed over to Hotel des Bergues and lunched pleasantly in the Amphitryon restaurant. It was cool, quiet, snowy linen and flowers at the table, attentive waiters who served nice food with care—a little pool of vanishing amenities.

The next day, I went with Edgar Graf to look at possible quarters for the following summer if Tannegg were not available. We saw nothing satisfactory. A letter came from Bart Phelps saying that Max Falk, the contractor, would start work on the cottage the following week without waiting for my signature on the contract, which was still in the hands of Louis Blau. So we were launched, and it was interesting that all this seemed to flow of itself.

Frances McCann, Padma Mudholkar, and the Simmonses were at lunch. Frances described having seen a film by Guido Franco with bits of illicitly shot glimpses of K in it. On the seventh, Dorothy and Montague left in their Land Rover for Brockwood. Nadia and Nicolas Kossiakof came to lunch, and K came to the table. To give Fosca some respite, K and I lunched on another day at the Park Hotel.

Vanda returned on August tenth. She kindly tried to help my always-ailing leg with stretching exercises. Quiet days followed. Various friends came to lunch. The Menuhin concerts were on, and it was settled that we could rent Chalet Tannegg for the next summer.

On August nineteenth, Krishnaji and I said goodbye to Vanda and Fosca, and drove through rain down via Col du Pillon and Aigle to the autoroute to Lausanne where K urged going by the route du lac to Geneva. Our Swissair plane sat on the ground for over an hour due to an air traffic control strike at Heathrow, but Dorothy, Doris, and Ingrid were there to meet us, and we reached Brockwood by 6 p.m. The house was quiet, almost empty, and very welcoming.

CHAPTER 46

August twentieth, 1977. Unpacking at Brockwood was the first order of business for me, and for K it was resting in bed, and reading a good detective novel. On the second day back, he came downstairs to lunch. He, Dorothy, and I inspected the vegetable garden, immaculately kept by Alasdair Coyne and Jean-Michel. K was very pleased too by the "garden rooms" made from garages into classrooms, but about to be used by houseguests during the gathering. We went then with the dogs for a walk across the fields, beautiful and wide with the enjoyment of being there.

A trip to London took another day of accustomed fare—Huntsman for a fitting, Hatchards for books, and to Fortnum, where Mary and Joe lunched with us. Joe drove K to his dentist appointment with Mr. Thompson, and later to Waterloo, where we caught a train. K gave Joe his Jacquet ties. All very pleasing.

On Saturday, August twenty-seventh, Krishnaji began his first Brockwood talk in the marquee. Mavis and Reg Bennett were there and so were Asit and Minakshi Chandmal. It rained, which made for some confusion, but K had fruit and salad upstairs before returning to the marquee for hot food with everyone. In the evening, Dorothy and I rearranged the chairs in the tent where Krishnaji spoke, and it went more smoothly the next day for the second talk. Mary and Joe came with her daughter, Amanda Pallant, and granddaughter Nikki. On that Monday, K held a taped discussion with David Bohm, Asit, and Dr. P. Krishna, professor of physics at Banaras Hindu University.

On Tuesday, August thirtieth, there was to be a public discussion, and K wondered how to work it out with so many people: appoint a few and let the others just listen? He spoke of this in the tent and then suddenly said he thought he would have a dialogue with himself. And so he did, most eloquently. The audience was very moved and many said, "At last he has someone worthy with whom to discuss."

On Wednesday, K talked with Reg and Mavis Bennett about the future of the work in Australia and also spoke with a Dutch woman, paralyzed with multiple sclerosis, who was attending the talks.

Thursday, September first, was the second public discussion day. K took questions from the audience and wove the subjects into what he wished to say. There were two more public talks, and then they were over.

On September ninth, M. S. Subbulakshmi, her husband, T. Sadasivam, and daughter Radha Viswanathan with her little daughter came to stay at Brockwood and for Subbulakshmi to sing for Krishnaji as she did in Madras. K welcomed them as the car drove up, both Subbulakshmi and Radha prostrated themselves at his feet, forehead to floor. They settled into the West Wing guest rooms, and at 6:00 in the school assembly, she began to sing. It was of extraordinary beauty, deeply moving; the sound seemed to float through consciousness, stirring a sense of forgotten memory beyond what one had known. She seemed to sing her heart out for K, and he followed it, telling me later it was more than she had ever sung at Vasanta Vihar. They left the next morning. Brockwood went back to normal, and K stayed in bed all day.

He had trouble sleeping during the night, felt a little dizzy briefly, had a pain in his right thigh, which was relieved with a hot pad, but all was well on the following day, and we walked with Dorothy across the fields. There was a sense of quiet presence in the air.

On another day, K said, “Let’s go out for lunch,” so he, Dorothy, and I drove south to look at the Channel and then inland a short way to Wickham where, in an old Georgian house on the square, we had a nice meal of vegetables from their garden, a mushroom omelet, and cinnamon ice cream. We came back, took a nap, and then went for the afternoon walk.

On September seventeenth, K talked to the staff for over two hours on what it is to live with intelligence, though what attitudes to talk to the students about sex was the precipitating question. Later, he saw the little Jenkins child he had seen the year before. She had leukemia and he had “put hands,” and this year she was better.

September twentieth. K talked to the staff on how to convey that intelligence is the absence of self. New students started to arrive. There was a welcoming tea for them, but also K talked to the staff on how to tell students that pleasure is an isolating thing. He also saw the little Jenkins child again.

By the twenty-fourth, all students had arrived, K spoke to them at noon with everyone present, but the next day he had a meeting with only students.

On September twenty-seventh, we flew to Cologne to visit the Janker Klinik in Bonn. Hard-faced men were staring at the disembarking passengers, looking for suspicious arrivals. One felt how close ordinary life had become to violence and horror. We went by taxi to Bonn and the Hotel Bristol, telephoned Dr. Scheef to confirm the next day’s appointment, and lunched in the largely empty dining room, where the head waiter turned out to be from Delhi, so Namaste, etcetera. Then we went for a walk to locate the Klinik, which was nearby, and K wanted to find a Braun clock to give to Pama Patwardhan. We came upon a Braun shop, and K’s face lit up with pleasure. We came back feeling successful.

We had supper in the rooms. Very suddenly, in the middle of soup, K’s face changed. He looked about with a listening expression. “Do you feel it?” I hadn’t, but then the room seemed vibrant, charged. He closed his eyes and I wondered if he would faint, but he didn’t. He came out of it, said his head was beginning to hurt, but finished his supper. He didn’t want to talk about it.

September twenty-eighth. He had slept well: “I had to, I was tired.” It was a scurry, but we reached the Klinik by 9 a.m., waited a bit—“We needn’t have hurried”—and sat observing the other people. I heard German spoken musically instead of the singsong of Swiss German. Then, suddenly, Dr. Scheef was there to greet us and show the winding way to his office. I had written a medical memorandum for each of us. He reviewed Krishnaji’s first and then sent him for relevant tests and discussed with me. He told me that K had clear sinuses but a bit of emphysema, normal for his age, and that we would meet the following day when results of tests would be known.

K and I walked back to the hotel at 11, rested and lunched, and during the lunch, he said, “It isn’t superstition, but I think I know what it was last night. Nobody knows this person here, except a few nuts, and it is like the jewels" (put in the foundation of the houses to bring about an atmosphere). I asked if he meant that this something and his presence would have the effect, and he nodded.

September twenty-ninth. We had a noon appointment with Dr. Scheef. K's X-rays showed clear head and sinuses, only slight emphysema—"fantastic for a man his age." He gave him some medications to take and said he would like to see us the following summer to know the results of what he had prescribed. We returned to the hotel for lunch, and K said he was realizing how much more he could rest in a place where no one knew him. He spoke of going to France, somewhere in the country for a week or two. And said that he couldn't rest at Brockwood. Too many people. So we rested, walked to look at the Rhine, and then came back to supper in our rooms.

The next day, we left the Hotel Bristol and Bonn, went by taxi to Cologne, and flew to Heathrow four hours late due to air traffic slow-downs. Dorothy and Doris were patiently waiting, and we were back in Brockwood by 7 p.m.

K rested but spoke alone to the students, too. On October fifth, we went to London for his dentist appointment. He had a faraway, meditative look but came with me for a fitting I had, and then he had one at Huntsman. We lunched with Mary Links at Fortnum and told her about the medical meetings in Bonn. Both of us felt good effects from the medications prescribed by Dr. Scheef. Joe came by and drove us to K's dentist session, and we later went by taxi to Waterloo, browsed through paperbacks and magazines, and returned to Brockwood. K was still feeling far away.

In the days ahead, K talked to the students, and gave an interview to Maurice Wilkins and another to Alan Rowlands. There was another trip to London for his fitting. Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrande Maroger came for a weekend, and Mrs Billimoria from Bombay came for lunch and K's talk to the school.

I was unable to get K's Italian visa in London because his passport was due to expire on November sixteenth. The Indian High Commission said they needed a week to issue a new one, but K said he would fly from London to Bombay directly. I rebooked his air ticket and found that his Air India flight paused for an hour in Rome. Vanda thus could see him at the airport. I telephoned Vanda about all this and also told her what was learned at Bonn.

1978 began for me on a beautiful morning in Malibu. There were pleasing amounts of rainfall in the days ahead. I was back and forth to Ojai on house matters. I don't know how he got my telephone number, but Rajagopal rang to say he had "no ulterior motive" in calling, just wished a happy new year and had "always loved me since years ago." This was while Erna was writing from Madras, saying that Krishnaji had telegraphed a reply to Rajagopal after receiving my cable. She added that the talks went marvelously, were strong and new, and K looked well and rested but had been in bed all the time in Madras. On January twelfth, Krishnaji cabled that he planned to fly from London to Los Angeles on February fifth, so I booked his ticket. Later in the day, his letter #5 came, written December twenty-seventh. It said Rajagopal had telephoned him that day. K later went from Madras to Bombay on January eighteenth, and began his talks there on January twenty-first. K's sixth letter took eighteen days to come.

Mark Lee telephoned to report on his and Asha's visit to Rajagopal, who had asked to see him. He had many questions about the schools, both in Ojai and India, and about the buildings on McAndrew Road.

On January thirty-first, K arrived at Brockwood from Bombay. On the telephone, his voice was strong, eager, and full of energy. It was so extraordinary to be talking to him that I forgot to ask more than "Are you all right? Are you well?" He had been and was, but I did remind him that he was now a U.S. resident with his "green card" and so must fill out a customs declaration. He asked me to find a porter who last year had said he could go into the customs area and help him with his luggage.

On Sunday, February fifth, there was a light rain. I went to the airport well ahead of time. Krishnaji's TWA flight was on time at 4:15 p.m. I saw him through a glass as he went into customs—smiling, bright. I had found a porter and tipped him to find and help K. Apparently all went well with the green card, and he came out smiling and hugged me in the lift where we went down and had a long wait for his bag. The highly tipped porter never appeared. We drove home through the rain, K talking a streak all the way. We had supper on trays in his room and, full of energy, he wanted to tell me everything that had happened since he left for India in November. In spite of getting up early, hours ago in Brockwood and the long flight, he was not sleepy. We talked for a long time about everything.

Krishnaji spent all the next day in bed alternately sleeping and talking. There was a stream of energy in him that he said had begun in Rishi Valley, as if something had opened in his head. I felt it strongly when with him. For the next few days, he continued to rest while heavy rains began, quite wild at night; the roar of the ocean and tremendous winds sounded like a devouring force. I went out at 1 a.m. with a flashlight to see if there was flooding, and K followed me. In the morning, the wind shifted to the west and the rain stopped, but there had been enormous damage all over southern California. Flash floods swept away cars and houses. Bridges were unsafe, and the Lilliefelts and Mark were unable to come down for lunch. So we stayed in all day, being quiet, reading. The television was not working, which made for peace and music.

The next day, February twelfth, Erna, Theo, and Mark were able to come. At lunch, K asked if "the schools were worth it." Mark gave a firm yes, so did Theo, but Erna didn't. I demurred. K said they had asked him in India to whom he talked. He said "to nobody" and because he was speaking to nobody, not seeking a result, there is greater energy. It was also evident that if one was nobody, one hears. He asked about Fritz's meetings, but both the Lilliefelts and Mark didn't want to talk about it until K had talked to Fritz himself. Erna brought a statement written by Donald Ingram Smith at Rajghat recounting a meeting last April with Mrs. Vigeveno and the Blackburns in which it was said that the archives were in an air-conditioned vault under Rajagopal's house. No mention of his agreement with KFA.

On February thirteenth, it had rained heavily in the night, but after lunch at home we went to town, where Krishnaji had a medical checkup with Dr. Bakhtiar. All was well. The next day, the weather was clear and beautiful. Alain telephoned, just back from London, where he had visited Mary and Joe, and Florence, where he had stayed with Vanda. K and I drove to Ojai in his green Mercedes, himself at the wheel, smiling. The skies smiled, too. It was a perfect day for his first trip to Ojai and first glimpse of the new Pine Cottage building. He looked at it shyly. He met Max Falk, the builder, Erna and Theo were there, and Radha Burnier came. She was lecturing at Krotona. K looked at everything. "It is stupendous," he said. We lunched at Arya Vihara with everyone there to greet him. Afterward, he talked alone with Fritz Wilhelm. He talked about the cottage all the way home. He was pleased.

On the fifteenth, there was another trip to town, where he had a haircut. We lunched on Mexican food at the farmers market, and then at his urging went to choose material for clothes for me to wear in India—kurtas, bundis, etcetera—and took the results to the dressmaker, where he explained how they should be made. On the sixteenth he rested in the morning and spoke of the necessity for people to carry on, especially young people. This had become urgent to him. He wondered if Fritz could do the adult center. He spoke of the Buddha having had only two disciples who really understood his teaching—and both of them died before the Buddha: "That is sad." The following day, Radha Burnier came down from Ojai for lunch. We talked of what sort of people come to hear her talks and why, and from that to what people expect from K.

My brother and his wife, Lisa, came for a brief visit and, as it was his birthday, we celebrated at lunch. The Dunnes were there and left afterward, but later at my brother's invitation Artie Shaw and a friend came, and they all went out for dinner in Malibu while K and I had our usual supper on trays. Then next day, I drove my brother and his wife to Ojai, where they had never been, and saw the new house. We drove back to Malibu in the afternoon, and that evening I took them to the airport to return to New York. My brother offered the use of his apartment in Paris to K and me to use whenever we might be there.

After what had been a busy weekend, all was quiet, and K said, "The last two or three days in my sleep, in the brain, there is a quality of dreadful seriousness." In the morning, he dictated letters, including one that I was to sign to Rajagopal saying that Krishnaji had asked me to write to ask what his intentions were with regard to the exchange of telegrams with K in Madras about a meeting between them. The suggestion was that this be held in Malibu or at Arya Vihara.

Sarjit Siddoo telephoned about K's visit to the school in Canada. K said he would fly there on April nineteenth and return on April twenty-fourth, staying only at the school on Vancouver Island.

On February twenty-third, we did letters in the morning, and Krishnaji talked to me about the adult centers; the need for people. While we walked around the lawn, he spoke about giving me "understanding." There was nothing I could "do" to enhance that. It seemed foremost in his mind to transmit something: a profound understanding of his teachings.

The next day, the Lilliefelts, Evelyne Blau, Ruth Tettemer, and Mark Lee came for a trustee meeting and lunch. The next day, Krishnaji and I drove to Ojai, where he spoke to Fritz Wilhelm and others. Radha Burnier came to lunch at Arya Vihara, bringing a Mr. and Mrs. Perkins, both Theosophists. She felt they might influence the giving of some of the land at Adyar for a K school.

In the cottage, the floor tile in the living room was done and K was very pleased with it. It gave "a feeling of lightness," he said. He also liked it more than the floor tile in Malibu and felt there was already an atmosphere in the house. At 3 p.m. he talked to Fritz, Erna, Theo, Mark, and me about the adult center. Then he and I drove home to Malibu.

Two days later, we were in Ojai again to talk to the architects. K talked again to Fritz and then had Theo fetch Radha Burnier to discuss her accepting Rajagopal's invitation to visit him. She did see him on March first, and telephoned K in the evening to describe what happened. At first it had been chitchat about her family, then questions about how she got from Krotona to his house. He pretended not to know of the gate on his back property. Then Radha asked him what he was doing.

Rajagopal: "I'm very busy."

Radha: "Are you writing"?

Rajagopal: "I'm busy with the teachings."

Radha: "What do you mean?"

Rajagopal: "Busy distributing books."

Radha: "Are you going to see Krishnaji?"

Rajagopal: "Is he here?"

Radha: "Haven't you received Mrs. Zimbalist's invitation to Malibu?"

Rajagopal: "Oh, yes."

Radha: "I was in Madras when you telegraphed Krishnaji. Are you going to see him?"

Rajagopal: "That is personal between him and me. I don't want to talk about it."

Radha: “I want to talk about the archives. I was here last year when you wouldn’t show them. I have proof that letters were sent from Adyar. They were sent to Krishnaji, not to you.”

Rajagopal: “I don’t want to talk about this with you. You don’t know about it. It is personal between K and me.”

Radha said to K and me that she thought he might flare up. He didn’t, but he was like a stone wall she couldn’t penetrate. He had little subterfuges in conversation like pretending he didn’t know about the gate. She also said to Rajagopal that she had seen his recent letter to K and asked what he was quoting. He wouldn’t say. K asked her if she felt his mind was losing ground, becoming demented. Radha said it was clear, sharp enough, but demented in some way. “He is off the track.” She said he was nervous when the telephone rang twice. She was there an hour, between 5 and 6 p.m. She said he was without conscience; there was something evil about him. She was glad she went because she could tell the others in India that she had had a certain hope to be able to talk to him, reach him, and knew now it was impossible. In India, they had always had the feeling that we didn’t know how to deal with him because he was Indian, and that that had led to all the difficulties. She could now tell them, and they would believe her. She left the following day for India.

Rain dominated the next few days. Houses along the beach were damaged, earth started to slide along the ocean side of my hill, and Malibu was cut off from roads to the north and south. During lulls we could walk round and round the soggy lawn, but otherwise it was a quiet time of rest for K.

Finally, on March eighth, after an early lunch, we were able to leave for Ojai, going through an inland road, and reached the Lilliefelts’, where we were to stay until the thirteenth. All four of us walked up to Pine Cottage. Its exterior painting had been finished and was pleasing; David and Saral Bohm had arrived and were staying in the upper guest flat.

The next morning, there was the first of a five-day group discussion among about twenty people. Its subject was “Does knowledge deform the psychological structure of man?” The trustees, Bohms, etcetera, lunched at Arya Vihara. In the afternoon, there was a meeting with K of David B., the Lilliefelts, Evelyne, and Mark to discuss what was being done in the adult center and Fritz’s discussions. A second group discussion took place the next morning.

For the Pine Cottage living room, instead of curtains, I had planned sliding wooden inside shutters on which there would be a painted sunburst. Fritz’s wife, Margrete Heising, who was a painter, had kindly agreed to do the paintings similar to exterior shutters I had seen on an old chateau in Rougemont, Switzerland. K had chosen the color, a sannyasi orange for the living room, and she had done it very well.

K had talked alone with Fritz and Margrete about the adult discussions. They felt nothing was wrong and rather rejected the implications of K's questions. Later, I went with Alan Kishbaugh to Fritz's group discussion at the Pavilion. Evelyne, Erna, and Theo were also there, and all trustees felt it was going in the direction of group therapy, personal problems being aired, not Krishnamurti's teachings. I talked lengthily about it with K at supper.

The next day, there was the third group discussion at which K put the question: "Why do we make demands?" It was to be continued. After lunch, I met with Alan Hooker and Alasdair Coyne to plan the planting around the cottage. Alasdair had been in charge of the garden at Brockwood and had moved to Ojai. At 4 p.m. there was a meeting at the Lilliefelts' with K, David Bohm, Evelyne, Mark, Fritz, Margrete, and me. Everyone aired his or her views, and an improved relationship seemed to come out of it. Then all went for a walk.

On the twelfth, there was the fourth discussion meeting to which Mar de Manziarly came. She was visiting her sister, Mima Porter. Krishnaji went into incompleteness and what is completeness. Incompleteness was the root of demanding. In the afternoon, there was yet another meeting about the adult center, and it was more or less decided to continue it with more participation by trustees and less one-man control by Fritz. His self-confident certainty that he could handle it all was making K and some of us uneasy.

On the fifth group discussion the next day, I had a curious feeling, as if I were floating in the consciousness of K's voice, almost fainting at times, and moved to tears when he spoke of insight—different from understanding, which is arrived at slowly by degrees—insight was instantaneous, nothing to do with thought but the action of intelligence. When he spoke of this, it was as if he had taken off into the sky, a hawk soaring, free of where Earth people trudge along, and it pierced something in my mind. Insight is never partial—it is whole. Mar was at this discussion but left afterward. There was lunch again at Arya Vihara. I went over some building things with Max, and then K and I drove home to Malibu. The coast road had been opened that morning, and we came along it in the usual way, K driving. The native daisies that grow along a part of the road had burst with rain into a blaze of yellow. We arrived to find that Elfriede had done an enormous packing job, boxes and boxes. A worsening crack had come in the lawn near the slide. The drain had broken. At supper, Krishnaji said, "The house feels abandoned," and I couldn't bear to talk about it.

Some hot weather followed. On March fifteenth there was packing all morning. K stayed in his bathrobe, but we lunched in the dining room, watching the one remaining baby hummingbird in its tiny nest just outside the window. I went over to the Dunnes' in the late afternoon. K, walking on the lawn, waved across the canyon and then resumed his rounds, a bright clear figure in his white terrycloth robe. I came back to supper. Was this to be our last night in that very dear house? K felt this, and said he was thinking of it as he watched me walking over to the Dunnes', and thought of how many memories the house had for me in the twenty-five years it had existed. He hoped I would be happy in Ojai. "Nothing will ever be wrong between us."

The next day, packing began at 5 a.m. for me, but we had a quiet lunch while the baby hummingbird sat on the edge of his nest. He would fly in a few hours. At 4 p.m. we left in the grey car for Ojai and to the Lilliefelts' in time for K to see the evening television news, in which the former Italian premier had been abducted by terrorists in Rome.

At the cottage in the morning, stone masons, an electrician, a plumber and an alarm service man were all working, every room a mess. In a corner of the kitchen, I cleaned drawers and cut shelf paper. K came at lunchtime, we ate at Arya Vihara, and then I went back to the cottage. Ted Cartee and Laura Martin helped clean closets, etcetera, and curtains were hung in the bedrooms. By 5 p.m. there were the beginnings of some order. K said with some feeling, "It is a marvelous house," and that there was special atmosphere in it.

The next day, March eighteenth, I made K's breakfast at the Lilliefelts', where we were staying, and then went to the cottage. He held a meeting for parents and school staff, and I spent the day with cleaning and shelf paper linings, helped by Laura Martin. The bedrooms were clean and ready. At 5 p.m. Elfriede, her husband Fred, and Lorry, who looked after the Malibu garden, arrived with a huge moving van. An enormous job was done by them in moving almost all the contents of the Malibu house. There would be one more trip the next day. All Ojai friends came to help the unloading, and K came as we were finishing. Everything was piled in the cottage to be unpacked the next day. K again pronounced it "a marvelous house." At supper, he questioned the quality of the teachers in the school. "Where do we find people? What is happening to Americans?"

March nineteenth for me was unpacking, putting K's clothes in closets, etcetera, and K again held a meeting with parents and school staff. Lou Blau came with Evelyne to lunch at what we thought should then be called "the old house" instead of Arya Vihara, as that name seemed to upset some people. K said it meant "abode of noble people," but that seemed off-putting, too, so it was to be "the old house." Pine Cottage remained Pine Cottage, and the office building became "the guest house." Lou discussed various things with Erna and me and saw the cottage. Elfriede had brought the remaining things from Malibu, including tubs of camellias and other plants. I was glad to have them follow us, as they seemed living parts of Malibu. K slept all afternoon and walked up with Theo just as I was locking the cottage.

The next day was one of unpacking, putting K's room in order, making up the beds, etcetera while K held meetings with teachers in "the old house." We had supper with the Lilliefelts then came to the cottage and stepped through its door to live there. We had moved in. K asked me to leave him alone for a few minutes in my room to do whatever it is he does to bring something wordless—protection? Blessing? "Do you feel the atmosphere?" I did and felt it even more in his room. So we slept in this house blessed by K, his life there, and his presence.

Section Fifteen

CHAPTER 48

On March twenty-first, 1978, Krishnaji and I had our first meal in Pine Cottage's kitchen. He held another meeting at the old house with the teaching staff. Renée Weber arrived to do an interview with K for the new magazine Revision. Rajagopal telephoned the office and left a message for K to ring him. This K did the following day with Erna and me present. Rajagopal said he wanted to see him; K asked what he wanted to talk about, and Rajagopal replied, "For your own good, and mine," and that he wanted a two-hour talk alone. K replied that unless it was about Rajagopal returning everything to K, as he had said in his cable to Madras, there was nothing for them to discuss. Rajagopal hung up. He had stressed "for your own good," which sounded like a threat. K had also asked him if he were taping their conversation.

At 4, K held a first discussion in Pine Cottage with trustees, teachers, the Bohms, Alan Hooker, Frances McCann, and Sidney Field. These meetings were continued by K in the days ahead. The living room held a good number of people, and the acoustics were satisfactory.

On the twenty-eighth we went to Los Angeles on various errands and came back to Malibu. The Malibu house looked beautiful in spite of its emptiness, its serenity untouched. But part of the lawn had sunk a bit, and there was a large crack in the terrace. We went over to see the Dunnes and then returned to Ojai, K driving part of the way. We went to the "old house" to greet David Shainberg, who had arrived from New York.

On April first the sun was out, but the Oak Grove was too wet to be used, so Krishnaji gave his opening public talk in the Nordhoff school gymnasium. It was not a bad place but "not as nice as under the trees," said K, a little wistfully. "I don't know what to talk about," he said on the way there, but then, as always, it came to him. He spoke of the pressure of language: "It uses us—not we using it," and also the pressure of ideals. We had lunch in Pine Cottage, and, later, David Shainberg came on a walk. After supper, I went over to the "old house" and saw Carol and Joe Zorski from Brockwood, and Michael Mendizza showed slides of still photographs he had taken of K at a teacher discussion, used over K's voice.

The second Ojai public talk took place the next day, again in the Nordhoff gymnasium, an intense one, K making a razor-subtle point that thought is always old, knowledge is out of the past, but the awareness of this lets insight and intelligence in. When insight and intelligence take over, it is the razor edge of transition out of thought.

On April fourth rain made the outdoor public discussion impossible, so it was held indoors in the Ojai Art Center. Though a small, rather gloomy building, it produced a good, closer atmosphere. K gave an intense exposition of the observer is the observed. In the car coming back, he said, "I put a lot of energy into that." He slept after lunch, and I struggled with the mountain of paper at the desk. Later on the walk he asked me if the people listening in the morning understood—what impression did they get out of it? I had a feeling that serious ones listened intently, some seemed to see it, but from a few remarks it seemed to slip away. Observer is the way to say it, it is K's way, but perhaps harder for most to grasp. K asked how else could it be said. I said that psychological terminology was inferior, and not his, but people mostly seemed to understand the word projection, the mind projecting its accumulated thought or knowledge onto what it observes, colors it with that, and thereby doesn't see. He said he would use the word projection.

We came back in time for Walter Cronkite and the news. Suddenly, in the evening, while watching a Hitchcock movie, he said, "I must have been born this way. I have never been through all that [thought, images, divisions]. What makes me see all this?" I suggested he never thought about those matters except when he was talking seriously. He nodded.

The next day, April fifth, we drove to Carpenteria, with Alan Hooker and Alasdair following in a truck, to choose plants for around the cottage—vinca, pittosporum, podocarpus, etcetera. In the afternoon, Alasdair, with an all-Brockwood team of helpers, planted everything. K said of his visit to the nursery, "I get absolutely vague." He had to retreat to the shade of the car when the sun became too bright, but he was pleased by the beauty of the hills, the full waters of Lake Casitas. The rains had furred the hills with green as we had never seen it, ceanothus was in bloom everywhere, pink wild flowers grew on steep banks.

There were countless people for lunch at the old house the following day. The Hookers helped Michael with the cooking. I went for roses and other flowers, and K helped me unload the car. He said, "In spite of all the people working, do you feel the atmosphere of this house? It is extraordinary." He was pleased, and for me this was like sunlight.

On the eighth there was snow on Topa Topa. The third talk was held in the football field of Nordhoff High School, K standing on a small stand in front of the bleachers, a shelter over his head but not from the sharp wind. K spoke further on pressure and toward the end asked how the whole of consciousness can be seen. Only when the mind is quiet, without thought, can this be seen.

We lunched alone. K slept all afternoon while the rest of us held a trustee meeting. Cynthia Wood's resignation as trustee was accepted, and she was made an honorary trustee with whom reports will be shared but not responsibility. Her generosity in donations had been very great.

On, at last, a beautiful sunny day, April ninth, K gave his fourth talk in Libbey Park Bowl. In the afternoon, various friends came to Pine Cottage and seemed to like its changes. Finally, we had our supper quietly. K said, "What a strange life—talking all the time."

On April thirteenth, K held a fourth public discussion in Libbey Park Bowl. These seemed arduous for him. It was as if he had to lift the whole weight of the audience's mind. We lunched alone afterward, and then Evelyne came to report on her meeting with Rajagopal. The Lilliefelts and Alan Kishbaugh were present. The meeting was at Rajagopal's suggestion and was held in the K&R office living room. She had never met him before and said her initial impression was of an old, shuffling man, unable to find the light switch and dressed in a windbreaker and slippers. He sat in silence, putting it on her to explain why she had come, so she described KFA building plans and wondered if K&R could contribute. He listened, questioned her on details of the placement of buildings, etcetera, and then took over the conversation. He described his "martyrdom," his being faithful to the "real K," he himself had been "vilified" but "you will get it all when I am dead but only over my dead body." He said he must "settle personal matters" with K. Evelyne was there almost two hours. It ended with his agreeing to think over whether he could contribute anything within the rules of K&R. Erna said he couldn't because we had hedged him in so thoroughly in the settlement of the lawsuit. He could only use funds as specified—i.e., for donations of books to libraries, etcetera. In the afternoon, Ralph Gardner took photographs of K.

On the fourteenth, members of the Fundación came to see K—Alfonso Colón, Armando Riesco, and Juan Colell. Also Silvia Cardenas, publisher of Orion, Hugo Baldi from Argentina, and Mrs. Raquel Drassinower. K and I walked to the dip and back; it was cold and gray. The newspaper said it had snowed from Scotland to the Channel and was nineteen degrees in London.

On April fifteenth, K gave his fifth Ojai talk in the Nordhoff school gymnasium. It was a deeply moving one. He was tired afterward, and we had lunch alone. He slept until five, when there was a tea for all who had worked on setting up the talks, and K came to it for a little while. While I was there, I was telephoned by Jackie Kornfeld in Tuxedo Park, New York. She was in great distress at the death of her husband, Joe. We talked at length, and I then came back to the cottage, told K about it, and he spoke to her. It was rare for him to talk on the telephone and especially about such a serious thing, but he talked to her at some length.

His sixth talk was on the sixteenth and was again in the Nordhoff gymnasium—an extraordinary one that caused the audience to sit silent and transfixed at the end. Many were in tears, as was I. There was a sense of something overwhelming, sacred, of his having spoken from the depth of truth. When we reached McAndrew Road, hail fell and then a downpour of rain, and we were soaked getting from car to house; it rained all afternoon but finally stopped in time for a short walk. While K slept, Evelyne, Erna, Michael Mendizza, and I discussed a plan for which Evelyne said she could raise funds for outside the KFA mailing list. It concerned Mendizza doing a 16mm hour-long film on K. Mendizza would film K wherever he would be speaking that year, intercut with stills of the past—a sort of biography. It seemed a promising idea, though to me there were sensitive areas, such as the event of the pepper tree, which should be touched with caution.

On April eighteenth, we each packed a bag and left Ojai for Malibu. Theo was with us, and we had a light lunch from Elfriede and continued onto the IRS office for K's tax clearance, which was needed before he could leave the country. We stopped for books—an Indian art book for Margrete Wilhelm and some detectives for K, and drove back to Malibu, where K and I remained and Theo returned to Ojai. The Dunnes's garden, mine, and the canyon had never looked so beautiful. The rains had made every wildflower bloom, every leaf a deep green. The house was beautiful by itself with almost no furniture. It seemed serene, blessed, and felt like my very skin. There was still a bed in each of the two bedrooms, a few dishes, towels, etcetera, so we could have supper as always and spend the night. K said his Ojai meditation came at 3 a.m.

The next day, I woke up to hear softly the ocean sounds; the quail came bustling across the lawn, which had sagged curiously in places. So much rain had caused it to settle. K said to me, "I'm glad they chose you to look after me. It might have been someone else." And then he said, "This room must have many happy and unhappy times for you." I saw the Roman nails in the beams and remembered how Sam had found them in Ostia Antica and told me to put them in the Malibu house "so it will last a thousand years." I told this to K, who said, "Why don't you take one out and put it in the house in Ojai?"

Alan Kishbaugh came and drove us to the airport, where K and I flew at noon to Seattle. We had a two-hour wait there before taking Pacific Airwest to Victoria. The vegetarian meal was so poor that in the airport we had a salad, some ice cream, and a Danish. K had never heard of that, but it came when he asked for a sweet biscuit. He spoke again about a Roman nail from Malibu for Ojai. He said, "When we came there yesterday, I felt Mr. Zimbalist." We reached Victoria at 5, both Siddoo sisters met us, and we drove to their school by the sea. K met only a few of the teachers and students and went to bed. I brought him supper on a tray.

April twentieth. Jackie and Sarjit gave me a tour of their place—well-kept gardens, lovely places above the shore with the lapping sounds of water, dear to my island ears. They had two cows, a newborn heifer, and the school has more milk and their own butter than it can use. And it is milk that tastes like milk. At 11 a.m. K spoke to students and staff on what a school is about: learning, freedom, and what those mean. The ten students were nice-seeming children. They seemed at home, pleasantly saying good morning. There was please-ing and thank you-ing, and they listened to K. The meeting was videotaped by the school, by a local television station, and Michael Mendizza, who was there to begin his filming of K, to be continued at Brockwood, Saanen, India, and Ojai. K had lunch with the children at one table, took a nap until 3, and then we went in one car with Jackie and Sarjit, a second car following with Michael M., Terry—a handy man at the school—and Mary Whitehouse, who tended to many things. We were on our way to see Wolf Lake itself. It was several miles into a thick forest, logged thirty years earlier, and thickly wooded with Douglas fir and alder. We walked to the lake, which was about a mile long, and we walked to the end of it—a two-mile walk each way, which K stood very well and chided me for suggesting to the Siddoos that it was a bit much for him. It seemed a crowded forest, perhaps because it had been logged, and all trees grown since were identical, unlike a natural forest. It would not have been my choice for a school's placement, but K tended to like large pieces of land. This one was 5,000 acres, and K spoke of it not only as a school but a college—an enormous outlay, when it would probably cost half a million dollars just to bring in electricity, before the cost of clearing, roads, buildings, etcetera. “One mustn’t think of the money, but whether it is right,” said K. The two sisters listened willingly; Jackie seemed prepared to go to any length, Sarjit looked more to the practical problems. It would be a tremendous undertaking. I wondered if they were up to it and would have the energy to carry it through. They were not young, but K’s visions were undaunted.

On the following day, K spoke to the Wolf Lake staff in the morning, and in the afternoon Saral and David Bohm arrived. He had been lecturing in Vancouver. The rest of the day was spent in discussions. K talked alone with the children and later, in a milky sun, we walked with the Siddoos as Michael Mendizza filmed. Down along the gray pebble beach there were beautiful driftwood logs and the gentle lapping sound of the edge of the sea. K said to me, “One should only come here in summer.” He felt the cold perhaps because he was tired.

After a day in which he spoke to the whole school and guests, on April twenty-fourth we left Wolf Lake at 9 a.m. Jackie and Sarjit drove us to the airport, we flew to Seattle, changed, and flew on to Los Angeles, where Alan Kishbaugh met us and drove us to Malibu. K and I changed to his green Mercedes and drove to Ojai, arriving by 5. He said he did not intend to go to Wolf Lake again and felt that the Siddoos did not really understand what it was all about. He had done a thorough job there, but neither of the sisters, as he called them, really understood what was needed nor had the staff a clue.

Back in Ojai, there was much catching up to do with the house. In the evening, at one point, while watching television, I asked K whether mankind’s impulse toward religion was a plea to make things better or something deeply inherent. “I think it is inherent,” he said.

On April twenty-seventh, 1978, we had a daylong trustee meeting. K came to it and made a statement on the future use of Pine Cottage when he and I are no longer alive. It is not to be lived in but used as a library, a place of study of the teachings. The night before, Rosalind Rajagopal had telephoned Mark Lee that she was selling the old Weideman property next door and offered KFA first refusal. It had two acres and two houses in bad repair. The price was $110,000. It was discussed at the meeting, and it was felt we should buy it. Her agent then tried to raise the price, but Rosalind said we should have it. We would have had to raise the money, for we had only enough for the buildings Max was doing at the school. The old Logan house is also for sale for $165,000 and should be bought, but we hadn’t the means. There was also much discussion about publications and some criticism of the choices of material. It went on until after 5—wearying.

The next day, Michael Mendizza filmed in 16mm a discussion between K, Fritz, Evelyne, Alan, Mark, David Moody, Laura Martin, and Carol Ondre. Later, he filmed K walking in the Oak Grove. I went to the bank with Erna and Ruth to sign before a notary the agreement between KFA and me and temporary transfer of title to me of the McAndrew Road property. All this had been carefully worked out by Louis Blau. I was to pay immediately $10,000, then owe $165,000, paying 7 ¾% interest until that was paid, lease Arya Vihara and the orange groves to KFA, then give the whole place back to KFA, retaining a life tenancy.

On April thirtieth, Rosalind Rajagopal reneged on the sale of the Weideman property and tried to raise the price with higher interest rates and mineral rights. She told Mark it was "because I have so many trustees," a meaningless explanation because it is her personal property and doesn't belong to the Happy Valley Foundation. KFA's offer stood, but we would not change the price.

K dictated a statement to go in the minutes of the board meeting about the uses of Pine Cottage when he and I died. No one was to live here; it is to be a KFA library, a place of study and meditation, "as carefully explained in my teachings." It must not become a shrine, and as long as the KFA exists, it must not be sold.

On May fourth we were up at 5 a.m. Mark rang to say that Rajagopal had telephoned him saying he had to speak to K. Mark said that K was leaving this morning. Rajagopal said he would telephone through the office at 9. K had me ring him and say that he was calling. R thanked me rather unctuously, K came on the line, and the conversation was short. R said he sent his love and that he had not had the privilege of seeing him that year. K said he accepted that.

Mark had the school van to drive us to the airport. Everyone said goodbye, and we were off, going along the coast road. Mark asked if I wanted to stop at the Malibu house, and K said, "Let's," and we drove in. Elfriede and Lorry were working along the driveway, thinking to see us pass; we went into the house and Max, who was going to Brockwood too, saw the interior for the first time. I saw the partial cleanup of broken pipe, etcetera in the slide, done mostly by Lorry and Elfriede. The house again looked serene, beautiful, as part of me as my skin, its look, its feel, its sounds—not because of memories but because it is to me something alive, as is each tree and plant, a sort of trust that I have cared for from the beginning and when it was hurt by the fire. The feeling that day was probably the absurd one—not of losing it but of turning away from it, not caring for it anymore.

K, Max, and I took a night flight to London.

K slept a little on the flight, and when he woke up he watched the sun rise and chanted a little to himself, very quietly in Sanskrit. We landed at 7. Dorothy and Doris met us in the Cortina, and Scott came with the van. Spring was still young, leaves were just beginning on the beeches and oaks, and the daffodils were still there. Everyone was out on the driveway to greet K, who walked around a little and then went to bed. Dorothy brought lunch trays. I bathed, unpacked, and slept most of the afternoon in my lovely Brockwood room, feeling how blessedly fortunate I had been in places to live, how generous life was in this.

On May sixth Mary L. said that Vanda was in England visiting her daughter, Paola, and her daughter's husband, Jon Cohen, in Cambridge. I telephoned her, and she said she would come to Brockwood the following week. K got up for lunch but rested otherwise. He said he felt "washed out." I did too, but we took a gentle walk with Dorothy and the dogs up and down the driveway.

The next day, Mary and Joe came to lunch, and they, K, and I sat talking then strolled in the garden. They planned to summer at Brockwood again. For supper, K and I dined as guests of Dorothy in the theatre workshop, where the students taking a class in restaurant management served the meal. There were tables for four, candlelight, an excellent menu, live music (i.e., harpsichord and recorder by two students), and the food was very good. We dressed for the occasion—skirts for women and jackets for men. K said afterward, "I watched their faces; it is a hard world for the young: exams, O levels, what to do in life. Thank God I'm not young."

On May eleventh K, Max, and I took a train at Petersfield; Max got off at Woking to catch a bus to Heathrow and a flight back to California to start on the two school buildings. He had made friends with everyone at Brockwood and had helped the students build a solar pool heater out of two old radiators. The announcement at supper that a donation had been made by a kind friend of a pool cover started all the students turn smiling and clapping toward Max, who colored and made a shy bow. He took everyone's warm feeling with him. K and I continued on to London, looked in at Huntsman briefly, had his hair cut at Truefitt, and we then walked down the Burlington Arcade, across Piccadilly to Fortnum, with its smell of very expensive groceries, and so to join Mary at our window table for three, and the invariable lunch of fruit salad, cheese flan, grilled mushrooms, fresh spinach for K, and his gaterie—ice cream. He talked, and we talked about the uncertainties of people: who will be responsible when he is not there to hold all the work together as he then did. Mary raised again the need for him to clarify his will so that his letters will not be under the jurisdiction of the publications committee. All this has to be gone into. K took a cab alone to Portland Place while I went for some good cheese, new detectives at Hatchards, and then followed him to Mr. Thompson's. K had had X-rays, and they both came out to tell me considerable repairs were needed. K was worried about the expense. Mr. Thompson said he was sick that it would come to around a thousand pounds. I obviously said K was not to think about the cost, only what was best. Thompson said K was clearly going to live to be 100, and the new tooth work would last that long. So we left, caught a cab to Waterloo, and reached Brockwood just before Vanda arrived by car with Paola and Jon from Cambridge, where Jon was teaching economics for a year. This was Vanda's first visit to Brockwood. K took her on an immediate tour before he went to bed. Frances McCann and various Brockwood students, and Shakuntala and Natasha, who have visited Vanda in Florence, greeted her. It was nice to have her here. We talked at length.

The next day was Krishnaji's eighty-third birthday, but as usual he brushed aside any mention of it. I made breakfast for Paola and Jon before they left for Devon, where one of their boys was in school. K talked to Dorothy and me about members of Brockwood who are felt to be dependable and responsible. He wanted to talk to them right away, so at 4, in the West Wing dining room, for privacy, K met with Dorothy, Scott, Harsh, Stephen Smith, Shakuntala, Ingrid, and me. The subject was responsibility for Brockwood now and after he is gone. Joe Zorski and Carol were about to leave, as they wanted to try living in the United States. Later, there was a staff meeting, and Narayan arrived.

On May thirteenth Pascaline Mallet came for the weekend; I explained to her why Krishnaji had decided not to go to Brittany as originally planned. She had made inquiries about quiet places there. The Marogers also arrived, bringing their youngest daughter, Diane. This was the first meeting with Diane, who was eleven but appeared much younger because of a disease from birth in which cells in the bones makes them very fragile and inhibit their growth. She was unable to walk but was a dear little girl, very bright, eager, and friendly. It was her parents' hope that K could cure her.

In the evening, Vanda and I talked. She had brought her record of the times in Gstaad in 1961 and 1962, when K fainted and another entity seemed to speak to her through him. Mary L. was to come the following day, and Vanda was wondering whether to tell her about it. They had met only once at lunch at Chalet Tannegg a few years earlier. I felt they should know each other and told Vanda I hoped she would wish to tell Mary about the notes she had kept. She said she had only recently come across the notebook while moving from her flat in Rome and felt that, though it was private and she had kept it to herself, she had not the right to do this indefinitely. "It is not mine." But she didn't know Mary L. "With you I feel like a sister, I can tell you."

So the next day Mary and her daughter, Amanda Pallant, came in the morning. Krishnaji talked to everyone, and then, after lunch, what I had hoped for came about: Vanda began to tell Mary about the events that began July 1961 at Chalet Tannegg—the period at the start of Krishnamurti's Notebook—when he was staying with her. K was in his room and suddenly fainted and then, as Vanda described it, his eyes became enormous and another being spoke to her through K's body. An extraordinary change came over the face. It happened on July eighteenth, 1961. The voice said, "Don't leave me until he comes back." Then, "He must love you if he lets you touch me as he is very particular in this. Don't let anyone come near me until he comes back." On the following day, it happened again. K fainted after trembling, the eyes became larger and deeper, and the voice said, "I feel very strange, where am I? Don't leave me. Will you kindly stay with me until he returns? Are you comfortable? Take a chair. Do you know him well? Will you look after him?" It was this last question that Vanda said, "Is why I am here." She felt she gave her word on this. She said that, for the whole month, K's face continued to change. There was no return of the other being but a "different look" would come over his face. He fainted once in the woods on a walk across the Turbach stream. She described these looks and the feeling around K at that time in language that seemed to copy K's own in the Notebook, which she was reading as he wrote it. Coming from her, not him, it sounded a little overdrawn, but she read most of it to Mary and me from her own handwritten account. Part of it described a time a year later, on May twenty-first, 1962, in Rome when K was ill with fever and became delirious. "It has been told to you to look after him; he should not have gone out, you should have told him. Do you know him? You cannot know him. How can you know the running water? We repeat a newer question: tell him, take a pencil, tell him, 'Death is always there very close to you, to protect you. When you take shelter, you will die.'"

Mary and I guessed there were four entities in all this: the one who goes away—presumably K; the one who tells what should be done; the one with the great eyes; and then, probably, the childlike one who spoke to me in Gstaad when K was delirious. Mary and Amanda had to return to London, but it was a good meeting, and a bond was formed. Paola and Jon returned from Dorset just before they left, so Amanda met them too for the first time.

Paola and Jon spent that night at Brockwood and, before they left after lunch the next day, Jon had a long talk with K. "I lit a bomb under him," said K. The bomb presumably was to lead Jon to see he was wasting his life teaching economics.

I met Mary Cadogan at Petersfield, and we talked shop for most of the day. Vanda was staying on a few days. In the afternoon, K put his hands on the little Maroger child. "She is an extraordinary child. She sat absolutely still with her eyes closed," said K afterward. He both did and didn't want to talk about it. "One mustn't talk about it."

May sixteenth. The house was quiet, relaxed with only a few of us there. Vanda gave yoga lessons to Dr. Parchure and others. In the evening, she read parts of her notes on the 1961 and 1962 events to me, and I typed them.

The next day, Krishnaji put his hands on the head, arms, legs, and various bones of little Diane Maroger—something he has never done at such length.

On the eighteenth, K, Vanda, and I went by train to London. We lunched with Mary L. and Amanda at Fortnum. Afterward, by taxi, Vanda dropped K and me at his dentist and she went on to catch a train to Cambridge and Paola's. Mr. Thompson had studied K's X-rays and decided five teeth should come out, two to have crowns, and two bridges were necessary. He pulled two then on the upper left. There was scarcely any bleeding, and he said it was a good thing, as there was pus underneath. K said he was all right. Vanda had tried to persuade him not to have Novocain, and when I remonstrated in the taxi, K pinched my arm so I realized he would pay no attention to her. He had the Novocain and said afterward he couldn't have stood it otherwise. We got a taxi quickly to Waterloo and were back in Brockwood by 5:30.

The next morning, he had some pain but no swelling. He got up for lunch and treated Diane Maroger. "An extraordinary child," he said each time. Again it was a long treatment. He walked with Narayan and went to a staff meeting. A letter came from the man who in December had written to him about Padre Pio. In January, I had answered that he was in India, but that Krishnamurti knew about Padre Pio. I had added a p.s. that Padre Pio knew of Krishnamurti. The new letter appealed to me to explain the relation of mystical states of K and P.P. I read the letter to K and asked him how he considered the record of mystical experiences described in so many religious writings. He was skeptical of most. He said, “I question that it is total vision. It is a partial vision, like a little harbor, the waters are of the sea, but it is without the width.”

On May twentieth, K gave another long treatment to Diane, who wept afterward because she said she felt so happy with Krishnaji. The house began to fill with weekend guests. Dr. Parchure and K decided that he might live to be 100, and therefore, said K, “I must live to be eighty-two or so.” Dr. P. worked on my back and foot each day, activating nerves, he said. It seemed to be helping. K spoke to the students alone. He was tired afterward, rather cold at lunch, and we only strolled in the grove. His teeth were hurting, eating was difficult, but he was without complaint and took it all as fact. His face was thin and tired, but with it all he had me send a letter to Pama Patwardhan giving his agreement to a schedule in India that included Rajghat and Bangalore—two more places than the previous year. This far ahead he would agree to anything, and then it would be too much when he came to it. Pupul wrote that she was coming to Brockwood in June.

On the twenty-fourth, I met Mary Cadogan at Petersfield, and there was a publication committee meeting, which K joined after lunch. The often touchy matters between Foundations arose; the next Indian book, Insights, was discussed—a compilation of discussions with K in India edited by Pupul and Sunanda. It was felt their English was unacceptable; what to do? K said that they claimed their English “showed how the Indian mind worked”—whatever that meant, and hence mustn’t be changed. It just seemed illiterate and hence an everlasting argument to placate the Indians. There was also more discussion of whether to publish further K–Bohm dialogues, which Mary Lutyens was still against. Erna and Theo had joined the fray in favor of them. K had been present in the afternoon throughout the discussion of the Indian book. I took the two Marys to the train afterward. The Links were going shortly to Venice. I came back to join K for a gentle walk in the grove.

There was another trip to London on the twenty-fifth, for accustomed reasons: K to Huntsman, I to the bank, lunch at Fortnum, book browsing in Hatchards, and with difficulty catching a taxi to Mr. Thompson, where he pulled a third tooth. K said the Novocain was painful; so was the extraction. “I yelled,” he told me later. I ached apart in the waiting room. We had trouble getting a taxi, too. K resisted fiercely all efforts to persuade him to wait until I caught the taxi. Especially when he was tired, my concern irked him, and he would try to carry every package, etcetera. He had made another appointment with Mr. Thompson. He did agree to let me ask Amanda Pallant to drive him to Waterloo afterward, but did not want to be driven all the way to Brockwood. The tooth that day also had pus under it. It had been hurting since we were in Victoria.

K said of the Maroger child, “I have never done it so intensely.” Both parents said Diane had more energy, more strength. He spoke to the school on the twenty-eighth, very movingly, from far off—that the religious life is to be free of the self. I was moved to tears, but later he felt that it had not been understood. “They are not able to see it.”

May thirtieth was going to London for another dental session of almost three hours. Four teeth were prepared for crowns; two teeth were extracted. K bore all this with total fortitude. Amanda Pallant came to drive him straight to Waterloo. We immediately caught the 6:20 train and, though there were men standing in the aisles, we found two seats. I sat opposite and felt physically beaten by his face—drawn but bearing it quietly. It was 8:30 when we reached Brockwood. "I'm so glad you have a nice room to come to. Not one of those awful houses in Wimbledon," he said.

We went again to London on June first, and in the train he spoke again about the hours, two days before in the dentist chair, during which his mind was "empty." It hadn't struck him until afterward. In the taxi on the way to Huntsman, he said that only when Mr. Thompson asked if he was all right, if it hurt, he would reply, but otherwise his mind was empty. Then he said, "All this way in the taxi, coming from the station, there has been nothing in my head. It's getting more and more this way." Then he said that when he puts his hand on people, sometimes it was as if there were a flame. A little flame in the middle of his head. And that when he started treating little Diane Maroger, there was none for a number of times and then slowly it began to happen, and then he felt he was able to help her. He said that, for instance, when he put his hands on Sacha [de Manziarly], when he was in the hospital and dying, there was no flame and from that he could tell that he could do nothing.

At Huntsman, he chose material for two pairs of trousers, and then we walked to Fortnum. At lunch I asked him about his own response to seeing suffering in India or a poor bent man we saw shuffling along the Strand: Was what he felt a "reaction?"—and I knew he was thinking of his chiding me for reacting to his pain at the dentist. I mustn't because he feels it in me and doesn't want the burden on me. He spoke about going back to India in 1922 and the sights of misery were so appalling he could only walk at night.

June fourth, a man named Jeffrey Nicoletti in Philadelphia had been writing urgent letters to me, to David Bohm, and one came for Alain Naudé, which I forwarded. He was concerned with resolving K's teachings with the life and implications of the life of Padre Pio, whom he greatly revered, the latter having physical signs—stigmata, the ability to heal, being in two places at once, etcetera, which he regarded as evidence of sanctity—and then Krishnamurti's denial of faith, etcetera, and all that is involved in faith, belief in Jesus, etcetera. I read the latest letter to K, and he suggested that he and I have a conversation in which I put forth the question in the Nicoletti letter and see what happens. We did that then and there and taped it on the Uher recorder. K said that the phenomena of so-called sainthood were familiar in various religions and they could come about without the person having truly perceived truth. He spoke of waters in a harbor and waters of the sea: they are the same waters, but those in the harbor are contained—i.e., still within a framework—whereas those of the sea are boundless. He questioned any perception that didn't discard all religious dogma. It is partial and therefore not the ultimate. Nicoletti had mentioned kundalini and assumed that K had experienced it and that Padre Pio's experiences could be so described. K objected to the term, said he questioned most descriptions of kundalini as not being the real thing. Nicoletti also asked if Padre Pio would have considered K as a profound thinker but incomplete in not having perceived the meaning of Jesus, and would K consider Padre Pio as one who had helped people (through healing, etcetera) but who had fundamentally done them harm through urging faith and belief? K said this was a question he didn't want to answer, to assess someone, "to say he is or is not." And he questioned comparing Krishnamurti and Padre Pio. I planned to have the tape transcribed and send a copy to Mr. Nicoletti.

On June eighth, 1978, Krishnaji and I went again to London. At lunch at Fortnum, he said, "There is something in the head that is absolutely still, and that center of energy looks and sees. And when that is happening, the rest of the body is quiet, as though it were nonexistent." I asked, when that silence looks, does it record? He said no, and that is the point of it. I asked, "If I were to ask you what you see, do you know what you see?" He said yes. "The center of energy doesn't record—the tape records, memory records, but not the center of energy." He said, "A few days earlier, when news came about the Weideman house in Ojai being sold, he thought of Rajagopal. It kept coming back into his mind, and he said to himself, 'Why is this happening? No recording!'" And from then on he had not thought of it. I asked him if there was an action in this. He said, "Yes, there is, but I don't know what it is. In the center of the head, there is a sense of great space, stillness, and energy."

He said, "I discovered when I was putting my hands on little Diane—usually when I do that, I just put my hands on the person and look at the sky or the trees—but I discovered when I was doing it to her, that energy was not doing it, but that energy was there and is still continuing." I asked him if this were something new, something different, and he said, "Entirely. I am just watching it going on. It is an extraordinary kind of stillness. A quietness I have never had before. I mustn't talk too much about it." And as he said this, he gestured with his hand across his forehead. "I shouldn't talk about it. I talk about it to you, but it is something totally new; I haven't had it before." All this I recorded at the table on the Dictaphone. After lunch, we went to Mr. Thompson, who prepared a fifth tooth of K's for a crown, and installed a crown on one already prepared. It took two and a half hours, and we got back to Brockwood at 7.

June ninth, Dorothy met Pupul coming from an early flight from Bombay. She seemed more relaxed than in the past. On the eleventh, we talked all morning, and in the afternoon she and K did a taped dialogue in which she asked him if there had been changes in his teaching. He said no. This was held in the West Wing drawing room and was attended by five teachers, Dorothy, and the Digbys, who had lunched at Brockwood and earlier talked to Pupul about Indian publications. Also there were the Marogers and their cousins, Jean-Claude and Lucie de Grémont.

On the fourteenth, Pupul, Dorothy, Doris, and I drove to Stonehenge, which Pupul had never seen and wanted to. In spite of tourists and being kept at a distance, the stones retained their strange atmosphere, timeless presence, and silent mystery. We drove on toward Salisbury, looking for a place to have our picnic lunch, and chose a little slope by a small river—the Avon. We spread out rugs and ate as we watched the swiftness of the river, a sleeping swan on her large nest with her mate on guard in the river, eyeing us sternly. There were little mud hens and their chicks diving for eatables; there were willows and wild roses, and I was lost again in the loveliness of this land. We went on to Salisbury and its cathedral. A pleasant day, which Krishnaji spent in bed.

The following day K, Pupul, and I went to London, K to Huntsman, Pupul to Hatchards, and all then to Fortnum to lunch with Mary L. Joe kindly came afterward, as it was raining, to drive K to the dentist and me to the Swiss embassy for K's visa. Unable to find a taxi afterward, I walked to Portland Place, where Pupul arrived too after rain and taxi problems. K had four crowns and a new bridge installed. Joe reappeared and drove us to Waterloo.

David Bohm came for a meeting in the afternoon on the seventeenth. Pupul gave a talk on India to the school in the evening, and left on the next day for New York, en route to Toronto and her daughter, Radhika Herzberger. Meanwhile, we had a visit from Lailee Bakhtiar, who met Dr. Parchure, and planned to send various vaccines for him to give to Krishnaji before India.

On the nineteenth a cable came from Mavis Bennett saying that Reg had died very suddenly. K, Dorothy, Doris, and I sent cables to her. I felt Reg was something rare in the original meaning of the words "a good man." I drove to Nelly and George Digby's in Sherborne, Dorset, eighty-three miles from Brockwood. They had made most attractive a sixteenth-century inn that was part of the Digby estate and lived in by George's mother until her death. It was charming as arranged by Nelly and George. There was another friend of theirs for lunch, and afterward we all went through Sherborne castle, built by Sir Walter Raleigh in 1594 and owned by George's older brother, who didn't live there, but it was open to the public. To me it was an ugly and depressing place, with towers and heraldic beasts like gargoyles, long corridor-shaped rooms looking out on a lake and a large park, considered splendid but to me bare of trees. George's father had been fox hunting-mad, with masks of foxes everywhere and the sporting drawings commemorating horses and famous runs. It had tinges of my own youth but seemed depressing and gave me a sad imagination of what George's childhood might have been like for him, such a different sort of person. I fretted too because I had trouble letting Krishnaji know that I had arrived safely, as I said I would. I finally got a message through that I was leaving, didn't stay to tea, but came whizzing back, passing Stonehenge again with young people streaming there for the summer solstice. I reached Brockwood in an hour and forty minutes, in time to fetch K's supper, but such jaunts were not enjoyable.

On June twenty-second Dr. Rahula, the Ceylonese Buddhist scholar, and Dr. Schlogel, a German woman sociologist who went to Japan and stayed twelve years in a Zen monastery, came for lunch; and at 4, K, they, Narayan, and David Bohm had a discussion, which was videotaped by Scott and student helpers. Rahula talked for fifteen minutes without pause at the beginning, was pedantic and not easy to understand. There was a sequel the next day both in the morning and afternoon. Much was evoked from K, but less from others.

There was one more dentist trip for K, a brief one, and then on June twenty-seventh K and I left Brockwood at noon with Dorothy and Doris, and Ingrid brought the luggage in another car, and once again we stopped for picnic sandwiches near Heathrow. K and I flew to Cologne and went by taxi to Bonn and Hotel Bristol, a totally charmless hotel with vile wallpaper in which I tended to see Rorschach test heads of ugly animals, but nevertheless, it was convenient and clean. I confirmed out next-day appointment with Dr. Scheef, and we went for a walk, K remembering more or less where we had been the previous September. We had supper in the dining room, thinking it would be quicker. It wasn't. The headwaiter was Indian and hence tolerant of our vegetarian peculiarities. K saw across the city a huge, revolving Mercedes star. He was pleased. I had the Raj Quartet by Paul Scott to keep me busy.

K liked sleeping under a continental quilt, which kept him nicely warm, though it was cold in Cologne. We walked the two blocks to the Janker Klinik shortly after 10. We saw Dr. Scheef at 11—a man in a hurry. Various tests were done, including a phosphatase said to show any cancer cells. We were out of there in a little over half an hour. While waiting, I began to wonder what it was that makes people and all nature cling so to life. What wants to survive? I spoke of it to K, who said he had never asked that; must consider it. He began to speak of pleasure, the always turning to it, and life being seen as pleasure or its possibility. I asked if it was the root. K said, "I'm not in it now; it's too big a question now." In a few minutes, he said suddenly, "The rock roses must be in bloom, and the creeper must have reached the trellis." So we talked about Ojai a little. We left the clinic and walked to a bank, where I got Deutsche marks for travel checks and walked back to the hotel for lunch, served quickly this time. After naps, we returned to the clinic at 3:30. Dr. Scheef said that K's tests were all right; he thought K's trouble was possibly a weakening of the sphincter in the bladder and gave a prescription to strengthen this, also 350 enzyme tablets. He was in a hurry, the telephone ringing constantly. He was to leave the next day for Jamaica. He didn't have the pink pills that helped K's hay fever but said he would send some to Gstaad. I was to keep up with enzymes and Vitamin E, and so was K, and we went off after paying K's bill of 155DM ($73). We tried unsuccessfully to fill the prescription as the chemist was closing, but we bought some cherries on the street and ate them in our rooms before going downstairs for supper.

On June twenty-ninth we left the Hotel Bristol and Bonn for the Cologne airport, and a Swissair flight to Zürich, where we changed planes for Geneva. There was a very thorough searching before boarding the plane. Good security. Two tough-looking women ran hands up and down every inch of me, and when the plane took off it wasted no time gaining altitude. Zürich was smiling in summer sunlight. In Geneva, we took a taxi to the Hotel des Bergues, where we had nice rooms, adjoining but not communicating, newly redone in an old-fashioned French style. K approved. "I like this hotel." Better than the Hôtel du Rhône, where we used to stay. We lunched in the Amphitryon dining room where, once again, it was pleasing in an old-fashioned way—snowy linens, two waiters serving deftly with style, quiet, mostly men lunching together, dignified, serious. K said to the waiter, "Nous sommes en regime," to cushion our vegetarian menu. We rested a little after lunch and then walked across the bridge to Patek-Philippe, where we fetched Krishnaji's steel watch, sent in March for cleaning and adjustment. K watched with fascination the young technician who checked his gold watch. We walked on down to Jacquet for the annual ordering of ties; K choosing carefully ten, first for Joe Links and then for himself. The last two were at my urging. He didn't want more than Joe had, and at the end, his attention fled, as it often did in choosing material for suits or other things for himself. But he was pleased with his visit, spoke of Huntsman to the owner of the store who assisted at these annual choosings, and so with cordial handshakes and escortings to the door, we emerged on the rue du Rhône, walked past the fish store, and across the bridge to a chemist, where Dr. Scheef's prescription was filled. We rested a little at the hotel. I rang Tannegg, got a happy-sounding Fosca and then Vanda. They had just arrived.

We dined in the Amphitryon and had crème caramel—K's choice for "protein." I asked him at supper what was his earliest actual memory. He thought it was standing in his room in Adyar looking out at the river, utterly oblivious of everything else. Did he directly remember Nitya? Yes, but, as with other faces, it was hard to evoke. "I can recognize a photo and say yes, that is him." He seemed to remember more the feeling of the relationship. I asked him if he remembered Rosalind, and he said he remembered her beating him, hitting him "in the groin. Those two must have set it up. I was made to feel guilty all the time for something. I wondered if it was my fault. I didn't want to have those two in my consciousness."

The next morning, June thirtieth, they were digging a large excavation outside the hotel, and K was standing at the window when I brought him his vitamin tablets. "I like to watch all that." He noticed too a splendid Ferrari. We stayed in all morning. The concierge sent our bags to the station, and after a pleasant lunch on vichyssoise and omelet, we took an afternoon train, K watching the lake all the way to Montreux, where we changed to the little mountain train, and so up to Gstaad. From Monbovan on, K recognized every glimpse of the road we usually drove. "Now we are in our country." It had been warm in Geneva and was too when we arrived in Gstaad at 6, but recent snow had left white patches on the mountains.

Fosca, a bit too deaf to hear the bell, nevertheless looked well and her usual nice self, and Vanda appeared, welcoming and warm. Soon K had his tray in bed, Vanda and I ate in the dining room as always, and I unpacked before going to bed. Was it a sign of age to find ease in the familiarity of things? I thought not.

Section Sixteen

July first, 1978. I woke up with the pleasant feeling I didn't have to get up but did. At noon, a Hertz man brought from Berne a bright green Renault—our summer's lift up and down the mountain. Just after noon, the Brockwood mini appeared with Donald Dennis driving and Dr. Parchure, Narayan, and Natasha. They were calling in before going to a chalet in Schonried arranged by Edgar Graf. "So healthy a place," said Dr. P., "how can anyone be sick here?" In the afternoon, K walked down to have his hair cut by Mr. Nicolas, who did it well. I drove him up the hill after we had bought some almond butter he had seen in Pernet's window. He was still off dairy food, in case it encouraged hay fever. I was waiting for Scott to bring a jar of Nagari from Brockwood so I could make tofu.

We settled into summer life: Dr. Parchure coming each morning to massage Krishnaji, and we began the familiar walks up the hill and through the woods to the river. Frances McCann came to lunch with Vanda, and K came to the table and talked to her for a while. I went to the village for assorted shopping, and K took an interest in what was in the shopping basket. Even a tube of toothpaste was noted as if it were a present. "Soon the new ties will come," he said. And, "Little things please little minds."

The tent was put up in the valley for the talks by the boys from Brockwood, who got free space in the barracks for their efforts. The opening talk was on July ninth, a very fine one on the sense of self. The tent was full in spite of cold, rain, and the value of the Swiss franc. Evelyne and Lou Blau arrived and were staying at a friend's chalet. They came to lunch the following day, and Lou told me they had gone to look at the Malibu house before leaving. He wanted to see the slide area, which was making the place difficult to sell. He felt I should do something immediately and suggested Max Falk should do it. K agreed with this and said that, if necessary, I should fly back there, and Lou agreed I should do so in order to arrange how it looked. In the evening, I telephoned Amanda and Phil Dunne, and told them what Lou had said and that I was going to ask Max to go and assess the problem. I asked if they would meet him there and think about the look of it for me. Of course, they said yes, and I was able to reach Max, explained it all, and he said calmly in Max fashion, "I will do it." K was pleased. "At last!"

On July eleventh, I fetched Dr. Parchure as usual at 6:30 a.m. The weather was clear for a change. K gave his second Saanen talk in the tent with enormous energy. At lunch were Simonetta di Cesaro, who had just bought a house in London, as she felt Rome had become too dangerous to live in, Dr. Parchure, and two friends of Alain, Dr. and Mrs. Mustart. He was a geologist, teaching at San Francisco State. K joined everyone after lunch and sat talking until six o'clock about all kinds of things, including the movement of continental plates, earthquakes, and ancient Indian history. When they finally left, K and I went for a short walk down the hill and back. K said it was possible that some sort of disasters might occur in the next year, and we should plan where we should be. Ojai, we both felt, would be best. We could live there as simply as elsewhere. We should plan it a little and talk to the Lilliefelts. He said "Where I am, this body is, will be safe."

The next morning was fairly clear when I fetched Dr. Parchure at 6:30. I later went down to see Dorothy and Montague, deliver letters, and ask them if they would prefer to stay in the Land Rover in the camping grounds or move up to Tannegg when Vanda left. Doris had said they would sooner stay put. I suggested they do whatever really suited them. They seemed to lean toward staying in the Land Rover. I brought Natasha up for lunch, and Frode and Julie Desnick when I found them toiling up the hill. Vanda had invited them to lunch.

Max Falk telephoned to tell me he had been to Malibu, met with Amanda and Phil, also a County Building and Safety man. All had agreed to cut a three-foot terrace and put in railroad ties to hold the slide area. I agreed to this and whatever he felt was necessary. He said he would also put in steps down to the beach, which buyers were interested in. K was very pleased by all this. I took Natasha back, then interviewed a woman and her child for the Oak Grove school before going for the afternoon walk with K. In the evening, I telephoned Amanda and Phil and heard their agreement to the slide plan. The day ended in feeling all was well in hand and wonder at how helpful friends can be.

July thirteenth was clear and sunny. I fetched Dr. Parchure as usual, and K gave his third Saanen talk. It was more on the self and identity. "Where there is identity there is no freedom." After, we went to the shoe store, where he received his new walking shoes. At lunch were Suad al Radhi, Evelyne Blau, Narayan, Dr. P., Vanda, and me. K came in for coffee. Evelyne and I talked about Foundation matters until 4. Later K wore his new shoes on the walk and was very pleased. He started to say, "Do you think…?" and I said, "Yes."

"You caught my thought?" he asked.

I did. He thought he should have a duplicate pair for Ojai.

The next day, Vanda left for Florence but would return soon. Dr. Parchure helped arrange chairs in the sitting room for the annual meeting of the K international committees. Scott came early to regulate K's watches. At 11:30, the committees' meeting began, and K joined. Reports on the schools were given: Dorothy for Brockwood, the Siddoos for Canada, Evelyne for Ojai, and Narayan on India. It went on until almost 2 p.m. K had lunch alone, but Mary Cadogan, Evelyne, and Dr. P. had lunch at the chalet with me, and we talked fundraising. I fetched Narayan to walk with K while I took Fosca to the market. A hot day and tiring.

Dr. Parchure moved up to Tannegg, and on the sixteenth K gave his fourth Saanen talk to a packed tent. Afterward in the car, he said, "A lot of energy. How did you all stand it?" Jean-Michel Maroger and Diane were at the tent and came up later for K's healing. She was able to stand and walk one or two steps on her own though still wearing a brace.

I went to fetch Anneke to Tannegg for a K treatment and to have lunch. K gave Brian Jenkins an interview. At supper, I had a long talk with Dr. Parchure about K's health. He was watching carefully for any change to try to offset and minimize it. He questioned me on any changes I might notice. K's balance was not very good. Parchure said this was controlled by the anterior part of the brain and would be caused by a lessening of the blood supply. He had asked K about this: Would he continue throughout his life to have clear mental faculties? K, who put large responsibilities on Parchure for the rest of his body health, said yes, his mind would be clear. Something else was looking after that.

In that morning's talk, K was on the verge of talking about yoga and then veered away. I mentioned it after lunch while we were having what passed for coffee—i.e., a brown cereal called Pionier, and K said, "I am going to destroy it." We had talked about it on the walk. I had spoken of what seemed to me a yoga neurosis: endless preoccupation with it, hours doing it, teaching it, talking about it, as in the case of Vanda, Frances McCann, and many others. It seemed almost a narcissism in yoga, and yoga had become, according then to K and Dr. P., a form of gymnastics, not yoga.

Krishnaji's fifth Saanen talk was on the eighteenth of July. The Marogers came to the chalet right after for K to put his hands on Diane. Then, with K steadying her, holding one arm and her father the other, she walked from K's sitting room, across the hall, into the living room, and climbed into an armchair. For the first time in her life, she was walking, carrying her own weight. It stopped the heart to see. I thought, though how could I know, that Krishnaji put a greater healing power into that child than any other I had known about. Certainly at Brockwood he was intent on doing it. And she walked that day. Narayan was a witness, and after the Marogers left, he stayed to lunch and later left for India.

On the twentieth, K gave his sixth Saanen talk, a very moving one. He said everything one could want on "You Are the World"—the subject of the film that was planned. Michael Mendizza was shooting it. K wore a little microphone inside his shirt and a battery in his belt that broadcast his voice to the sound recording and camera. Later, Scott came and recorded on audio K talking on the subject with all of us joining in the discussion, but mostly K, which was to be used in the edited voiceover in the film. I walked the film people up the hill to show them K's usual walk place across the fields for filming the next day.

It was gray the next day in the afternoon, but after seeing Diane at 4 p.m., K went up the hill and was filmed by Michael, with Evelyne and Scott helping. Then K sat on the first bench and spoke for one to two minutes on nature: "If you are not sensitive to it, how can you be related to human beings?" Then he moved along to the other bench by the edge of the wood and did one minute on what brings people to those mountains, to the talks—the common problems that all mankind shares. It was cold, and there were spatters of rain as he finished, but, as usual, he did it superbly, altering what he said with each take, unable to repeat himself.

The cold the day before had tired K. He gave a treatment to Diane in the afternoon. I had ferried Anneke and Mar de Manziarly up to lunch. Anneke brought a book by Rajneesh in which he said some incorrect things about K, which she found funny. I did not find malice about K funny. Mar and Anneke chatted about the old days, Mar meaning to amuse, but putting on such an act that it was wearisome. There was something forced and a little desperate about it. It is sad when age doesn't bring ease. There would be a filmed discussion with K, and Jean-Michel Maroger, Anneke, and Scott Forbes.

On the twenty-third, K gave his seventh Saanen talk. He spoke for an hour and a half very movingly. Jean-Michel brought Diane to the chalet right afterward. I fetched Simonetta di Cesaro, Suad al Radhi, and Dr. Mark Brandes up the hill to lunch. The latter, a German archeologist, teaching at Freiburg University, had come twelve years earlier with Suad to lunch and had come that day especially to hear K's talk and again have lunch. Beforehand, K had joined us and talked intently with Brandes about the Sumerians. Brandes described how, before 2000 B.C., they began writing at first with little clay objects, then putting the imprint of those objects on clay, then drawings of the same objects on clay. K asked Brandes for an archeology view of where our present civilization is. There was a pessimistic reply. Civilizations destroy or tend to be destroyed. K asked if he saw, or some saw, what was happening: the enormous technological advances and lack of religious perception. Brandes asked, "What do you do?" K replied, "What will you do? Talk about it? Make people see?" K ate in his room and came in for coffee. Brandes had to catch a train, so I took them down and then picked up Scott, met Jean-Michel and Anneke, and guided them to Evelyne's chalet, where we discussed with the Mendizzas and Evelyne the content of the next day's dialogue between K, Jean-Michel, Anneke, and Scott. I came back as K was returning from a walk by himself. He was quite tired from the length of the morning's talk.

The next day, K was tired and didn't do exercises. He had a long talk with Dr. Parchure about India and Parchure's plan with K to search for people interested in the teachings. How to finance it? I did errands in the village and found books for K. At 1:30 p.m. Evelyne and Mendizza came to set up the camera and lights for the dialogue in the sitting room. At 3 p.m. Anneke, Jean-Michel, and Scott came as participants and discussed their opening question on what can an individual do in the face of a disordered world of violence, chicanery, etc.

At 3:30 Diane was brought for K's treatment after which the Marogers left for home. Later, K said to me that when he touched Diane's issue in her elbow, it was as if it were dissolving, becoming soft. After the dialogue was filmed, K went for his walk while close-ups of the others were done.

On July twenty-sixth, K held his first public discussion in the tent. There was rudeness and aggression from Mrs. Lulu Ani and the Norwegian boy, Christian. There was a loud complaint from Mr. Edward Ani that he had listened for forty years without any change in himself. Mrs. Ani harangued K that Mr. Ani's problem was because K hadn't explained things properly. K, Dr. Parchure, and I lunched quietly. We talked about a headline in the Herald Tribune that said the world had spent $400 billion in 1976 on armaments, and from this he said that the question that morning was one he must answer. "I shed a tear inwardly when I heard it." He asked, as Edward Ani had, "I've listened for forty years and nothing has changed. What will make me move? A crisis? Sorrow? Pain? A devastating event? These are all outer. We depend on things to shake us. How am I to say 'Be intelligent without the event'? They won't listen. They will ask 'How am I to be intelligent when I'm not?' I would say, 'Do you really think you're not intelligent now? You, Maria, are a very good example. Would you have listened years ago, before your husband died? You went through a devastating event before you came to this. Take Mima Porter—all that money. She took the opposite direction because of money and money destroyed her. Look at Signora—yoga; it's her life now. Which means there are only a few who can be intelligent before the event, not after a motor accident, to say, 'I must drive carefully.' How do you help them before, not after? Only by walking with them."

Dr. P. and I had supper with Dorothy and Montague in their Land Rover. It was very nice and a delicious supper cooked by Dorothy on her two-burner camping stove. It rained outside, but we were snug and warm, and it was very pleasant. Dorothy was dismayed to find the Anis had reservations for the Brockwood gathering.

The next day, in the second public discussion meeting, Krishnamurti began by speaking of the $400 billion spent on armaments and then went on to answer a question on change. "See what is happening without seeking; then intelligence can enter."

I fetched Pascaline Mallet, Gisela Elmenhorst, and Magdalina Jasciuska up to the chalet to lunch. K came and sat with them afterward. At 4, Mr. Mirabet from Spain came, as in past years, to smile, shake K's hand, and give 7,000 Swiss francs, which K then gave to Brockwood. We walked up the hill, where Michael Mendizza and Scott were waiting to film K walking along the path and sitting down on the bench at the edge of the wood. It was done for use with a voiceover.

On July twenty-ninth, K gave his fourth public discussion in the tent, and afterward he had me speak to Mrs. Ani. I asked her why, in view of her hostility as shown in her aggression toward K and what he was saying, why she wanted to come to Brockwood. I also mentioned her association with U.G. Krishnamurti, and her joining in his malice toward K. She called her husband and I repeated my questions, and pointed out the limited Brockwood space made it desirable to give rooms to as many interested people as possible, so I questioned her coming. She said she didn't accept my descriptions. I said her behavior in the tent came across as anger toward K and, though I knew little about U.G. Krishnamurti, people inevitably brought tales of his animosity. As I had to pick up K walking in the hot sun on the road, this conversation was short. Her husband asked if he could walk me to the car and said his wife was abrasive. I agreed. The behavior of the Norwegian boy, Christian, was dismissed as, "Oh, we are all somewhat childish." I said we are all old enough not to be childish, and Christian's childishness can also be called common rudeness. I caught up with K and went back for Frances McCann. She and I lunched alone, and K joined us for coffee. Later, I took Dr. Parchure to a meeting with Evelyne Blau. The Mendizzas were there, and so were Dorothy Simmons and Suzanne and Hugues van der Straten. Evelyne was enthusiastic about two films about the K schools but made it clear she could raise funds only for a KFA one. Dorothy was cautious about Brockwood, and Dr. Parchure was doubtful about India.

K ended this year's Saanen meetings with a fifth public discussion. Mr. Ani handed me a letter with a check to Brockwood for £150 "in case we couldn't fill the room" and a lot of other nonsense. Dorothy and Montague came for lunch. K and they were talking beforehand, and I was thinking that we had got through this year without any especially crazy ladies when at the door appeared a young German girl in a pink sari, demanding to see K. I made the usual spiel. "But I want to see him!" she burst out and tried to push her way in. It was the first time I had to stop anyone physically. I held the door and blocked her way. She was alternately cajoling and angry, then K sent Dorothy to back me up, and we stood firm until she was outside and we locked the door. Fosca reported that she stood around for quite a while. She was perhaps the "crazy one" Dr. P. had reported in the tent, and K said she pursued and grabbed him on the road.

K said he was against doing films about the schools, thought them a waste of monies needed for other things. Dorothy was not disappointed, feeling it would be difficult to convey the special quality of Brockwood on film.

Life became quiet in the next few days, familiar faces came to say goodbye, and different faces were walking about the village. Edgar Graf came to lunch and to report that everything seemed to have gone well. In spite of currency, he had received enough donations to cover the next summer's gathering.

A shy French boy, a musician, came to the chalet asking to see K. When told it was not possible, he said "Pourai-je parler avec vous?" So we did for a while. Shyness is so seldom seen. K saw Mr. Rusu briefly, and then we went for the walk. I reminded K of the safe box in Gstaad, and that the money in it belonged to him. He said, "As long as I am alive, nothing will happen to you, if you are careful."

On August fourth, Nadia Kossiakof came in the afternoon. We talked, and later K joined us. She described horrors in Beirut where Red Cross people were deliberately fired on, and old women and children shot. She asked what should be one's response to this? K said, "What can one do? If you see a child being beaten, you act, but are you committed to something? If you have commitment you are part of all that. If you see the danger of commitment, then you are free, and that intelligence acts."

On the sixth, a letter came from a man in Texas who asked, among other questions, why one slips back from moments of clarity. K dictated the following for me to quote in a reply to him: "If I may point out, time as movement is not involved in having insight into one's own nature and structure. Time is our conditioning, which is essentially thought. To perceive the whole movement of thought, in that very perception, thought is aware of itself as being limited. And any action born of this limitation must inevitably bring about conflict, pain, and suffering. If one actually, not philosophically, perceives the truth of this, the truth of the nature of thought, there is no falling away from that and coming back to it. One must also bear in mind that there is no path to truth, and it can never be charted."

K had not slept too well the previous night. He skipped his morning exercises and rested all morning. He lunched with Dr. P. and me and then took a nap. I too slept after lunch. The air was moist and heavy, rather enervating, but we went for our walk to the end of the wood. K stopped as usual by the chickens, leaned over their pen and said, "Pourquoi vous ne sortez-pas?" There was a white cat in the new-cut field, K approached it, but it flattened itself in a wild way, prepared for takeoff, and shot away toward Elizabeth Taylor's chalet when K came close. Rain began as we reached Tannegg. In the evening, Vanda arrived from Florence and Crans, where she had put her grandson in a camp. On the television news, it said that the pope had a heart attack at Castel Gandolfo and had received extreme unction. K made no comment. When he said goodnight to me, he said, "Tomorrow I will send two angels with you, but not till tomorrow." I was to go to Rome in the morning to spend two days with Filomena.

August seventh had a gray morning. Krishnaji had slept well and was feeling rested. I felt secure in leaving him in Vanda's and Dr. Parchure's care, but there was an unease at leaving for outside reasons. He waved as I drove off at 10. It rained all the way down the mountain, and halfway down there was a sign: Le Pape est mort. At Geneva, I read that he had died the night before at Castel Gandolfo after a heart attack. My flight was an hour late in leaving and flew through clouds and rain to Rome. Filomena and her son, Mario, were there, despite my having said I would take a taxi. Filomena looked a little older but totally her dear self. All the family were waiting with a big greeting. I gave little presents to each; there were smiles, jokes, and the warm chatter of Italian family life. Filomena and I had supper alone—the perfect meal for me: fruit, including fresh figs, and then a mozzarella. We talked and talked.

We spent the next day talking at further length, but after that we went to St. Peter's as I wanted to see the Pieta, which had been restored after the attack by a madman. It was now behind glass, not very well lit, but moving as always. Preparations were being made for the lying-in-state of Pope Paul, whose body was to be brought to Rome from Castel Gandolfo in late afternoon. Many Japanese tourists were milling about. Filomena touched the foot of the San Pietro statue, worn to no toes from countless touchings. Rome, more than any city I had been in, seemed to reach further in time into a measureless past. Michelangelo and Bernini once again were a gift to eye and spirit, and the Baroque gestures of the saints and puti once more made me smile. Papal deaths seemed a part of my comings and goings to that city. It had been Pius when I left in 1958, and Sam used to stop by the piazza to see if white or black smoke would float from the chimney above the Sistine Chapel.

Filomena and I went on to Ponte Milvio for figs, mozzarella, and Parmigiano to take to Gstaad. The open air market, noisy and cheerful, made me feel there again: Filomena, intent, suspicious of every fruit; the salesmen young, relaxed, wooing the customers. "Even if you don't buy, vi ringrazio!" shouted one. At the cheese counter, Filomena said, "See that you give me the best!"

“Si, Signora, pensa a me.”

We had to go to another place for the freshest figs. Filomena packed then in grape leaves in a box, figs and cheeses wrapped and packed so perfectly they could ride in my suitcase.

Back at Filomena’s, Sofia Sanguinetti, who used to be at Brockwood, came to meet Filomena. Sofia then did acupressure, which was said to be very good, and it was my hope that she could give some relief to the pain of arthritis in Filomena’’s neck and shoulder. She was just right with Filomena, cheerful, confident, asking just the right questions, and explaining just enough. After examination, she said Filomena’s energy was good. Energy was the ingredient in everything at that point. It put me off somewhat, but I reached for any hope of any relief for Filomena. Sofia would start treatment at the end of the month and told me there would be no charge, which I said we couldn’t let her do but thanked her very much, and I left enough funds with Filomena to pay for the treatments. It would then be up to them, but I hoped. Filomena and I then had a nice supper and watched on TV the papal cortege come through Rome to the Vatican. The piazza was filled.

August tenth. After breakfast, I said goodbye to the family, and Filomena and Mario drove me to the airport, where, without delays, Alitalia left at 12:50 p.m. for Geneva. I felt glad to have been with Filomena and felt some good for her in my coming. She was relaxed and smiling. Mario was the one who looked older, not Filomena.

In Geneva, Hertz provided a strident green Opel station wagon, which I drove the Bulle way to Gstaad. When I left, K had said, “It will be fun to go off alone,” and that was usually so for me, but going away from him geographically for something out of the ordinary and therefore avoidable—it had a shadow in it. But now I was heading toward him; the drive wound its familiar way, and I arrived at 4:30. He was awake, and we went for the walk to the end of the wood. There had been snow and much had remained on the high mountains; very white and clean. K said that he and Dr. P. had demolished much of the nonsense about yoga to Vanda, and Frances, who was present, had heard it too. He seemed pleased. And he gave me the letter he wrote to me on the two days I was away.

Dr. Lichti was at lunch on August twelfth with some young people too, but their questions were trivial and a waste of K’s time and obviously a lost nap. We walked later and came back and watched the funeral of Pope Pius in St. Peter’s Square. K, watching, said, “I can’t feel a thing, can you?” A helicopter appeared, tiny over St. Peter’s dome. “Le Saint Esprit,” said K.

The next day was a packing day. A young American appeared on the doorstep wanting help with some project on a Greek island. He was full of energy and purpose but slightly mad. K saw him through the window and talked to him a bit but then turned him over to Dr. P., as he had some other notion of writing a book about the human body. Dr. P said he knew nothing about it. We brought the boy plates of food, he talked a streak, and finally accepted my saying that the Foundations couldn’t offer money or sponsorship of his project. It would have been nice if all that earnest energy could have been turned in K's direction, but he couldn't see beyond his own view and lost the chance.

The next day was a sunny morning, and the mountains shone. Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I said goodbye to Vanda and Fosca and drove via Les Mosses and the autoroute to Geneva, leaving the car and flying over Germany and Belgium to avoid French striking air controllers. Mary and Joe, Dorothy, and Doris met us. We drove to Brockwood with Mary and Joe, who had spent the summer there but were staying one more night to be with us. Brockwood was green and beautiful after the heavy rains of the summer. We all had supper downstairs with the few who were there.

CHAPTER 52

August sixteenth, 1978. Mary L. and I talked most of the morning in the kitchen, and after lunch got the Mercedes out of the barn and gave it a little exercise. We talked about volume two of her biography of K. She had been making notes and wanted to go ahead but was wondering how to handle the Rajagopal story. We talked about it, and I said I hoped urgently that she would do it. Mary had turned seventy at the end of July, which was further reason to want her to continue.

K was awake from his nap when we returned, and in their car we went with Mary and Joe to Ovington and walked by the river. The clear, swift water, green water weeds, little ducks diving and swimming along the bottom, the slow sail of the swan, and warm smells of growing summer are things that gave a rapture. I watched the water and felt dissolved as though it ran through all my senses. That day, this countryside moved me beyond the splendor of the Swiss mountains.

We came back to the news that Mary and Joe's flat in London had been broken into. They left immediately; later Mary rang to say that nothing was missing, a crowbar had been used to force the door, but inside the burglar alarm went off and the intruder fled. Immense relief, for their flat was filled with personal treasures collected with their unerring taste throughout their lives.

The next morning, we went to London, where Mary and Joe met us at the station. Joe was given by K the Jacquet ties so carefully chosen and ordered for him in Geneva, whereupon Joe said he wanted K never to have to take a taxi in London again and drove us to Fortnum, where he left Mary, K, and me for lunch. During it, Mary questioned K on the schools. She had heard in a letter from Erna that KFA would need $950,000 by the spring for building the school and the yearly $100,000 we must raise over tuition fees to keep it going. K had not yet seen the letter about this but listened to Mary about the effort all this would entail. Joe drove us to K's dentist appointment, and I came back to their flat, saw the damaged door, now fitted with new locks, and was glad to see their charming things all there. Later, Joe drove K and me to Waterloo, where we bought detective stories and took the train home.

The day after that was warm, so K, Dorothy, and I walked the dogs in the grove. K asked, "Where are we going?" He spoke of Erna, who came into all this because of the teachings and now has to spend all her time worrying about money. Dorothy was, as often, immediately defensive, which hinders K's enquiry. Brockwood had reached a fairly firm footing, but he wondered if we should go ahead with the Ojai school—late in the day. "I could be wrong," he said. "Everyone is so busy making all these outward things happen that there is no time or energy for the inner." He long ago had been impatient with me for these same questions he was now asking. He seemed troubled but yet, that morning, when I played records during his breakfast, he was smiling, listening with enjoyment to Joan Sutherland singing Bellini. He said, "It is sentimental but it brings tears to the eyes." He rolled his eyes to the music. A romantic.

August nineteenth, after lunch upstairs, he said, "What am I doing here? These are children. I need someone to talk to, someone who will mine it out of me. I feel there is much more to get out. Someone who can discuss these things, but they can't."

M: "Has there ever been anyone?"

K: "No. Aldous was Christian in his upbringing; then he went off into Buddhism, Vedanta, and all that. He couldn't."

M: "Anyone else?"

K: "Rajagopal hadn't got the brains for this." (Shrug.)

M: "What about India?"

K: "They discuss but sometimes it forges something out of me. Achyut has gone into this, but he is too old now. He says he has failed me. Perhaps I will go away, leave all this. I must be careful or I will do that. I will do whatever is decided. Don't you worry about this or I can't talk to you."

I did not worry, was very still inside, but I too was failing him in this, and to fail K was a knife through one.

It was warm the next morning, and he was not feeling like the morning walk but slept instead. He was thinking about what we had talked about the day before. He said, "I will write to Achyut to get some pandits, and we will have a discussion and make a book out of it." My spirits rose a little. I worked in the tent set up for the public talks, and when K came down, he, Dorothy, and I walked in the grove and pruned bushes. We did it again the following day. He was fired to clear all deadwood, brambles, nettles, foxgloves, etcetera. There was work to do in preparing the West Wing for the gathering, and then a work party of everyone in the house, including K, attacked the weeds in the grove.

On August twenty-fourth, Evelyne Blau arrived from California just before K and I went to London. Joe, true to his resolve, met us at Waterloo and took us on to Huntsman. K had his fitting, we lunched at Fortnum, and K then had an appointment with dentist Thompson. I did errands and went at 4:00 to Portland Place, but K wasn't finished until 6:00. He had been four hours in the chair. Mr. Thompson prepared five more teeth for crowns. Joe blessedly drove us right to Waterloo, where we caught a train quickly and were back at Brockwood by 8:30. A grueling day for K, but he said that he had "thought of nothing" the whole four hours.

August twenty-sixth was a clear, fine day for the first of the Brockwood talks. The larger tent of two thousand chairs was full, everything was very orderly, people came in groups of fifty—no racing for seats. K's platform was on the north side this year, with a little curtained space where he could tidy his hair. He was in fine form. We ate fruit and salad upstairs after the talk, and then returned to the tent for the hot course. He kept moving about so he didn't get hemmed in.

In subsequent days, the talks, which went well, alternated with prodigious continuing pruning. There was also a day when Mary and Joe came for lunch, and K continued the conversation with Mary and me about the necessity of fundraising taking the energies of everyone at the expense of the teachings. Mary had suggested the Ojai school project be stopped, but K said he had thought it over and it must continue.

The fourth and last talk was on September third. He spoke on meditation; the tent overflowed with people. I made an appeal for donations. K ate upstairs and then returned to the tent. Jean-Michel was there, and K set the dates for a visit to their place in France. In the evening, we watched on television the newly elected Pope John Paul I celebrating mass in St. Peter's Square. The we watched The Goodies.

In September, K began dictating the first of a new series of Letters to the Schools to be sent to Brockwood, Oak Grove, the Indian schools, and the Canadian Wolf Lake one. This continued daily, and weeding too was resumed. On the eleventh, there was another visit to London for fittings and assorted errands, while K had another two-hour dentist session. Joe again was the kindly transporter. When we reached Brockwood, Maurice Wilkins had arrived with others for a seminar.

The next day, K held the first seminar session. About seventy people participated. The topic, "What does it mean to be a light to oneself?" began things, but it soon veered off. The second day went better. The subject was fear. After lunch, K called Dorothy to discuss organization drowning the teachings—how to prevent it—but all this seemed too much for the staff after the gathering. Jean-Michel joined the discussion. K later said his time was underused during the European part of his year, he wants to talk less to students and more to the public and people capable of going with him.

On the third seminar day, relationship was gone into, but it was again mostly on fear. A perennial subject. A quote from K: "Thought is deviation."

Another London day on the fifteenth; mostly for the dentist. In the evening, Maurice Wilkins, David Bohm, and David Shainberg discussed science and K's teachings. The rest of the seminar went well, and, for K and me, the afternoons were pruning and pruning.

On September nineteenth, there was the sixth and final seminar meeting. K discussed with a panel of David Bohm, David Shainberg, Dr. Parchure, Harsh Tankha, and me. Then it was all over, and all visitors left.

K spent two days in bed resting. I went to London for visas on the twenty-first and that evening took Frances McCann and Brian Jenkins to a performance in Chichester Cathedral of Christopher Fry's play A Sleep of Prisoners. The next day, we both went to London, where our lunch guests were Mary and Joe, Mary's daughter, Amanda Pallant, and Alain Naudé, who was there for a week before going to see his mother in South Africa.

Dr. Parchure left for India. Mary Cadogan came to Brockwood to discuss publication matters, K continued dictating Letters to the Schools, and with Dorothy we continued pruning in the grove.

On September twenty-ninth, Pope John Paul I died after a thirty-three-day reign. K dictated letters, I typed, students returned for the start of the new term on October first, and K talked to them very movingly.

On October second, Dorothy drove K and me to Heathrow, stopping for our usual picnic lunch in the car in a meadowy place. K and I then flew to Paris, where Jean-Michel met us and drove us to his and Marie-Bertrande's place in Montrichard near Blois. Diane, Marie-Bertrande, and Jean-Michel's mother were waiting for us. We all had supper and retired. K slept well and in the morning dictated a Letter to the School. It was number eleven and on corruption of the mind. His head began to ache toward the end. In the afternoon, he treated Diane, then Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrande drove us to Amboise. We walked in the woods and along the Loire. In the evening, K had supper on a tray and we watched on TV part of the funeral in St. Peter's Square of Pope John Paul I—an echo of the one in August. The next day, K continued dictation, and in the afternoon, we all walked in the Fôret de Chaumont. Warm and gentle weather for the next few days allowed luncheons on the terrace under a parasol. He did dictations in the morning, treated Diane, and on one afternoon Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrande drove us to Chambord. K went into the chateau to see the staircase. We came back to walk in the woods.

There followed two more similar pleasant days, and on October eleventh, after dictating in the morning, when all the Marogers were at lunch in the garden, K talked to them all afternoon, explaining his early history, Theosophical theories, etcetera. There was then a walk in a lovely wood filled with beginning autumn smells.

On October twelfth, K and I left La Mahaudière, the name of their house, with Jean-Michel and his mother, had sandwiches in the car, and at Roissy K and I flew to Heathrow where Dorothy met us and we were at Brockwood by 6 p.m. The days ahead were filled with their gentle contents of letters dictated, talks with students, meetings with staff, and afternoon walks. One day I went to London alone to see my brother and his wife Lisa. We went in the afternoon to the Victoria and Albert Museum to see an exhibition that Lisa would have in her museum, the Cooper Hewitt in New York in January. They were flying to Paris the next day.

On October twenty-fourth, K talked alone with the students, and Louis Blau telephoned me that there had been a fire in Malibu but the house was all right. He said he was sending me papers to sign about a sale. I spoke to Amanda, who said the fire had come within three miles, and I telephoned Elfriede too.

On the twenty-sixth, we went to London, where Joe met us and drove us to Fortnum for lunch with Mary. I took legal papers from Lou to be notarized at the U.S. consulate and walked back to Bond Street as K was finishing his haircut at Truefitt. We caught a taxi to Waterloo and were back at Brockwood in time for supper.

The next days were spent doing last-minute things, and on October thirty-first, with Dorothy driving, K and I left Brockwood for Heathrow and flew on Air India, stopping for an hour in Rome, where Vanda, Filomena, and others came to the transit lounge to meet K before the flight continued on to India.

November first, 1978. We landed in Delhi about 4:00 in the morning. Sunanda and Pama Patwardhan met us with a car at the aircraft itself, drove us to a VIP lounge where K, Sunanda, and I sat while Pama and Mr. Murli Rao took our passports through immigration, and fetched our luggage. The latter took quite a while, as one bag didn't turn up for about an hour. We then went to a floor above, to a sort of transit hotel for passengers, where there was a room and bath for each of us to rest in while waiting for the Benares flight. K wanted to change to his Indian clothes, which they had brought, and I was glad to shower, change to fresh clothes, and lie down a little. The room looked like a prison cell, but Sunanda had brought their own linen for the beds, and in spite of no sleep, it was refreshing. They had also brought a picnic breakfast, and then we went on to the other flight. Frances McCann was on that same flight. I dozed as we made bumpy landings at Agra and Kajurao, then to Benares, now called Varanasi, where hot, tropical air filled the cabin as the door opened.

Pupul, Ahalya Chari, Radha Burnier, and Upasani were there to meet Krishnaji. He and I drove to Rajghat with Pupul and Upasani. It was then I felt in India again. Before the eye saw, one knew it: the curious, intricate smell of India. Of what? Dust, spice, wood smoke, smoke from cow dung fires, incense, a tinge of oil in the air? As complex as Indian cooking, it would tell me I was in India if I were blind. The land was very green from the recent floods, the air much more moist and warm. The children, wandering cows and buffalo, dark faces, and brilliant colors, potholes, almost all faces turning to watch the car pass, the eternal presence of poverty, life lived there against odds that would probably destroy me. So we came to Rajghat.

The school was on holiday; Diwali had begun the day before, but there was nevertheless a crowd to meet K. A young, shy girl gave me two bunches of tightly tied flowers. Ahalya, intent on making up to me for the lodging there in 1965, had prepared two rooms for me to choose between. Both were in K's house, and I took one on the floor below his, which only later I learned was Ahalya's own room. It was the familiar, high-ceilinged, plaster-walled room, cement floor with fresh-smelling matting, bed with mosquito netting, a dressing table, writing table, and a metal cupboard with a lock. The bathroom had a geyser; I could heat my own water and fill a bucket—a great luxury there. There was also a stool to sit on while soaping and pouring water which flowed across the floor and into a drain.

Pupul was in her own cottage not far away, and the others were in various guest cottages. Parameshwaran, who cooked everywhere for K in India, was on hand, and before going to bed that night, I gave him the recipe and ingredients to make tofu. We had a late lunch. K slept, but I unpacked, and by suppertime I was falling asleep at the table. They said the river had risen almost to the rim of the cliff in the September floods, but now the Ganga was quiet, sleeping, mild, returned to its ancient ways.

The next morning, I helped Parameshwaran with his first making of tofu. Then Dr. Parchure brought his wife for me to meet—a shy, charming, and lovely woman. I also met the young woman principal of Vasanta College, a Miss Sehgal. Our meals, cooked and served by Parameshwaran, took place in an upstairs dining room on K's floor. We had salads and all manner of very good food, immaculately clean, and carefully prepared. He was, of course, a Brahmin.

In the late afternoon, Krishnaji, with Ahalya, Upasani, and me, walked around a new-filled ravine, then down to the playing field. He did five laps, but I came back after three. Dr. Parchure gave me a foot massage, as both are swollen from the long flight and the heat.

On November third K held a small group discussion. Present were Pupul, Sunanda, Pama, Ahalya, Achyut, Radha Burnier, Narayan (who had just arrived), Dr. Parchure, Upasani, Rajesh (a nice, bright young man), also Krishnakutty, Frances McCann, Mrs. Parchure, a few teachers, and Mr. and Mrs. Deshpande. Mr. Deshpande couldn't see the relevance of discussing the self. Krishnaji had at him, but it only silenced him. K asked what had we all done with the gift of something true?

The next day was twenty years since Sam's death. How extraordinary life had been. I couldn't judge it, assess it from the outside. It was as if it was not mine to speak of; it had happened not at my planning. I went out early and stood watching the sunrise on the river, the slow, silent casting of nets from the fishing boats. There was something curiously still inside. The mind seemed to be silent, without much movement, listening, and it somehow wasn't mine. The possessor was absent, or had it merely stepped away?

K rested in the morning but was at the lunch table. Achyut and he had been discussing religious centers apart from the K schools, perhaps in cities where books, tapes, etcetera would be available and where people who were serious could be found to come to other small centers for a sort of retreat.

In the afternoon, Dr. Parchure came and walked me to his house, where his wife gave me tea. After tea, he left us alone to talk. She seemed very nice, unsure of her ability in English, which is quite proficient. I was touched by her wanting to talk to me.

On November fifth K held another small group discussion with the same cast. He used the analogy: "You have been given a baby. What have you done with it? Have you cared for it; is it the most important thing in your life?" Pupul spoke of "clouding over"—one has clarity, then it clouds over. K said, in effect, that you let this cloud over because you are not serious, you have not accepted the responsibility of the baby; you have not given your being, your total energy to this; this is not the whole of your life. It hit hard to most of the people there. He spoke with great force. At lunch, he lingered at the table, discussing whether Nagarjuna and Shankara had the insight of the Buddha, whether intellect brought saints to see the limitations, the futility of intellect, until there came an insight. Of the Buddha, and possibly Nagarjuna, he said that they were not intellectuals, though they had great intellect. He felt that they had insight born of compassion and from that came intelligence. He was doubtful about Shankara. Radha Burnier, Achyut, Sunanda, and Pama were at table. Radha said there was too little to be clear about Shankara, as all the subsequent Shankaracharayas wrote, it was hard to be sure what writing was original.

In the afternoon, Amru and Nandini arrived from Bombay. Nandini looked somewhat older, but her manner, as always, was gentle, friendly, and graceful. K was rather hoarse on the walk, did only two laps, said he was tired, came back, and started to talk to Nandini, but gave it up. I sent for Dr. P., fearing fever. It was 100 degrees. Parchure mobilized things, spent the night in a room nearby, prepared to fight the fever if it rose.

The next day, K's fever was normal. He said he had slept very well but his throat was sore and his voice hoarse. He was mostly interested in the tailor coming for a fitting, but he stayed in bed all day, and in the evening his fever went to 99.8. I walked around the campus with Nandini, Amru, and Mrs. Santhanam. Elections were imminent, and the country seemed fascinated by whether Mrs. Gandhi would be elected to parliament. If so, she would apparently become leader of the opposition.

On November seventh I went into Benares with Ahalya, Sunanda, Parchure, Narayan, and Upasani and bought some cloth for kurtas. The city seemed a nightmare of people, dust, dirt, crowding, noise, and a torrent of life that would be destruction if I were dropped into it. It seemed like the edge of a volcano, watching beings in it barely surviving, a ghastly carnival celebrating nothing. There were clouds of dust, refuse, every vehicle with horns screaming at each other; carts with shrill and deafening music wandered the streets pulled by tiny horses or a human being; donkeys carrying gravel and herded by thin little boys. There were bicycles everywhere. It was an ordeal just being driven through it.

We stopped at the TS headquarters to pick up Radha at Shanti Kunj, where K and Dr. Besant used to live. The garden there, in its age, had a luxuriance and quiet that was astounding after the terrible streets. Radha, calm and clean in a white sari, didn't seem to mind the dust that poured into the car coming back. I had to wash out eyes, nose, and throat before going on with the day. But K had slept all morning and had no fever. He approved the three cottons I had bought for kurtas. Mrs. Gandhi had won her seat in parliament.

On November eighth K was much better, but he rested in bed, except for attending a KFI trustee meeting, to which I was invited. I explained the state of finances in Ojai; also the point of view of the U.S. and English Foundations that Krishnamurti and his teachings are one and our responsibility was to that.

In the afternoon I went with Pupul, Nandini, Amru, and Sunanda to a tea at an agricultural college. The German girl who had tried to force her way into Chalet Tannegg the previous summer was hanging around the gate. Pama stayed to dissuade her from being there except at the public talks. We drove then through villages of ruble, dust, swarms of people, and wandering animals, past camels slowly putting their large, flat feet down on the dirty road. Then, suddenly, there were fields of green that were a wave of beauty. We were on the road the Buddha once walked to Sarnath, and I thought how beautiful India must have been then with very few people and the land in its pristine freshness. I walked back in the twilight in a pair of what Krishnaji called sand shoes—sneakers in my childhood.

The next day, K was entirely well, and he held a discussion with all the students in the assembly hall. It was preceded by the children chanting as K sat cross-legged on a small dais facing them. The rising beauty of the chant and extraordinary grace and majesty of Krishnaji brought tears. There are times when this is limitless. The children were good at speaking up in spite of their shyness. Their sing-song English and heavy consonants required that K use Rajesh as interpreter.

In the afternoon, a motorboat ride up the river past the ghats was laid on. Nandini and Amru came, and so did Mrs. Padma Santhanam, Frances McCann, Rajesh, Krishnakutty and his wife, Mrs. Drassinower, and a Mr. and Mrs. Levitton—she handicapped from polio and who had to be carried or wheeled, a very affable woman, an instant first-name user. The great and sacred river was brown, and one realized that the city sewer was gushing into it just upstream from where the dhobis for the school washed the laundry. The bathing, teeth cleaning, and plunging in that goes on along the ghats made me feel green. Bodies wrapped in bright cloth were neatly queued at the burning ghats, waiting their turn. Seven fires were burning as we passed by; the air was heavy with smoke. Buffalos were being scrubbed by their owners half-submerged in the river, goats picked at invisible weeds on the cement. We returned in mid-channel. I felt no further impulse to visit Benares.

On November tenth, an Indian television crew that had filmed Krishnamurti's discussion with the children (in 16mm black and white) filmed another question-and-answer session with K. The questioners were Achyut, Pupul, and me. I was in for international effect. The man in charge had done his homework and made up the questions. We were each given two to ask. Mine were "What place has knowledge in man's search for enlightenment?" and "You say conflict arises out of desire and choice; they structure our lives. Can we be free of this?" In the afternoon, they photographed a similar session between K and a few students. This I missed as, before lunch, Dr. P. gave me something "for dust allergy," which turned out to be an antihistamine that made me sleep as though hit on the head. I came to at about 4 p.m. and walked with K, Pama, and Upasani around the perimeter of the place. K was tired in the evening and didn't eat much supper.

The next day, K gave the first Rajghat public discussion in the assembly hall. It too was filmed in part by the Indian television. He spoke on disorder. Afterward, he lunched at the table but went quickly to rest to get up later only to greet the governor of Bengal. Later, while he was having supper upstairs, Nandini, who with Amru had eaten at Vasantashram, came running upstairs saying that Mr. Levitton was in a temper at being told that he and his wife could not come to Rishi Valley, and had charged in, demanding to see K then and there. I went down and spoke to him. He was furious. I said the obvious things and that Narayan's decision was due to the physical limitations of the school, etcetera. He argued. I asked him why he couldn't accept it with grace, which seemed to choke him with rage, and he left. Narayan came a little later and said that he had told Mr. Levitton that at Rishi Valley they would not be able to provide aid for his wife's infirmity (i.e., someone to carry his wife around during K's stay when the school is so busy, as was happening at Rajghat), but that they were welcome to spend a few days later when some help could be provided. It was after this, while Narayan was eating dinner, that Levitton came to the table and said, "I hope you don't get a stroke and have to learn to live in a wheelchair." "He cursed me," said Narayan in a matter-of-fact voice.

On November twelfth K gave his public talk at 9 a.m. in the hall, overflowing with all kinds of people. It seemed a superficial audience, easily inclined to laugh. At times the questions came in such heavily accented English that K could not understand. K spoke further on disorder, on the seeing of it, which can bring about order. A man asked about dying. K said, "Have you ever tried it?" and reproved the laughter, going on to speak of dying to the self.

He lunched at the table, rested, then talked to Ahalya, Upasani, Parchure, and Rajesh about Rajghat. After supper, Pupul, Nandini, and Sunanda reminisced about K in the 1940s, his gaiety in those days, how Rajagopal came to hear of K's strange events in Ootacamund through grilling the servant then making Pupul swear never to speak of it; of the nastiness of Rosalind to K when she came to India in 1956, her berating him, yelling at him; of her convincing him that the CID was opening his mail; of her speaking ill of him to Pupul when Pupul visited Ojai. Pupul spoke of papers she had: notes of meetings between K and Jawaharlal Nehru; with Indira Gandhi; of marvelous things K used to say in discussions, which were not recorded.

The next day, November thirteenth, in the assembly hall, K held a discussion with the Tibetan Rinpoche and three other Buddhists, Achyut translating the Hindi when necessary, and Pupul, Radha, Sunanda, and Deshpande participating. The Rinpoche began with a quiet, almost whispered question about the observer and ending of thought. Another Buddhist held forth in Hindi and it took forty-five minutes before the basis of his question was accepted by all. K kept having to ask what actually happens in daily life in relationship, and the Hindi-speaking Buddhists kept going off in theory. More and more K was emphasizing the actual and dismissing the theory, the idea. This seemed the point where people balk, escaping into the idea of something and away from the thing itself.

Evelyne Blau and Michael Mendizza arrived to film K in India.

November fourteenth was a day of rest for K. Professor Krishna of the Benares Hindu University came with his wife for lunch. Afterward, he talked with K and told of what was happening then in university conditions, where threats with knives and guns were being made by students on teaching staff for grades, and when cheating on exams was detected. Later, I walked with K and Upasani around the playing field.

The next morning, Krishnaji called me before breakfast. He had had a feeling in the night that I was upset about something. I assured him I wasn't. At 9:30, he held a discussion with students in the assembly hall, which seemed over their heads. One Muslim girl asked, "Sir, what is religion?" K said it was what is when you know what it is not. They had trouble too with comparison and understanding that there cannot be love when there is fear. Again, he had trouble understanding their questions. Perhaps it was not only the heavy Indian accent but also a bit of deafness. I spoke to Dr. Parchure about it, and he said he would suggest hearing tests when we reached Madras. There was a certain critical stance toward the school at Rajghat. K often said, "This is all too difficult for you. You are not used to this," which, of course, was true, but it came across as criticism.

In the afternoon, he was filmed by Michael Mendizza with the littlest children outside the house and then at a tree planting. K, Upasani, Nandini, and I walked, then came back, changed, and went with K and others to a chanting by Brahmin priests.

The next day, Nandini and I visited the school art department, and in the afternoon Michael Mendizza filmed K walking along the path with the Ganges in view, and when it was done, K, Nandini, and I walked along the perimeter road. A village man came up the cliff from the river, saw K, and prostrated himself, touching his head to K's feet. K raised him up, greeted him silently, and walked on. A look of wild wonder and emotion was in the little man's eyes as he watched K, as though he had seen God. There wasn't adulation, as in seeing a famous person. It was wonder and adoration.

In the evening, Oopali, a former Rishi Valley student and now a professional dancer, gave a recital, and we went to part of it.

On the morning of the seventeenth, K talked to the teachers. I didn't go, thinking the less outsiders, the better. In the afternoon, Michael filmed K walking with his big sun umbrella on the other side of the Varuna, the little stream running into the Ganges, and along the farmland. When this was done we walked to the eastern end of the KFI land and came back past the Sanjivan Hospital, where Evelyne and I went in. A Dr. Sharma and the one and only nurse, a most hardworking woman, showed us through. It was pitiful to see how much was needed. Later, Dr. Parchure talked to me at length about it, and about his early life as a country doctor living with his wife and two-year-old son in a thatched hut with poisonous caterpillars on the wall, crabs the baby reached for scuttling on the floor, and snakes falling from the ceiling.

On November eighteenth I went with Achyut, Radha B., Pupul, Nandini, and Evelyne to the Sarnath Museum. Pupul and Nandini left before lunch for Bombay. In the afternoon, I had Mrs. Krishni, now retired to Poona, to tea. I remembered her tireless kindness in looking after foreign guests' meals in 1965. She had an eagerness to talk that was part of her friendliness. Meanwhile, K was visited by the Maharajah of Benares. I did some packing easily and quickly, as the dhobi brought clothing well folded.

Section Seventeen

On November nineteenth, 1978, the Rajghat school was out to see K off when we left for the airport at 8:45 a.m. Michael Mendizza filmed the departure, and Evelyne, in spite of fever yesterday, was there too. K, Achyut, and I flew to Calcutta. Friends of Achyut and admirers of Krishnamurti came to the airport with their families. They brought a three-course lunch, which was served to K, Achyut, and me in a private airport apartment. Wives, daughters, and sisters served it. A stubby, rather intense psychotherapy woman seized the opportunity by the throat and asked K intense questions, the answers to which left her face scrunched up in puzzlement. The last one was "Do you believe in God?" K replied, "Who invented God?" Shocked silence. Then, "Obviously man invented God." Everyone looked like a frozen frame in a moving picture. We were driven in a large private car to the aircraft, and at 2:30 we were off to Madras.

We were met by Pama and Mrs. Jayalakshmi, who gave K and me each a huge garland of roses and tuberoses and bead necklaces. Others were there, too, including Mrs. Santhanam, who lent her air-conditioned car to drive us to Vasanta Vihar. Madras was warm and humid but green and cleaner-looking than Benares. The air was soft and pleasant, not dusty and polluted. Vasanta Vihar had been painted white, which gave it a stately beauty instead of the stained yellow of 1965. There were shrubs and plants everywhere. Waiting on the porch were Sunanda, Prema Srinivasan and her daughter, and Vatsala, the latter arrow-thin with large, dark eyes that veered away when looked at, her speech and movement rapid and tense. She immediately asked me if I would like to take a walk, so down the drive we went in the dark and up the road a bit before returning.

Krishnaji's rooms were above his old ones, charmingly done—a sitting room with blue and white cushions, and a bedroom beyond a small porch. I was given his old rooms on the ground floor, a small sitting room, and a large bedroom and bath. It was clean, attractive, comfortable. I took a luxurious bath with ample hot water to fill the bucket. In that heat, bathing became almost a rebirth. We dined in the new dining room and kitchen building, once a garage, in the back of the main house with K, Achyut, Sunanda, Pama, and Vatsala, who had been living there for the past ten months. Early to bed after the day of travel.

The next day, K wanted to talk to Achyut, Sunanda, Pama, and me. We no sooner started than Mr. Santhanam walked in and sat down on the floor with the rest of us in K's bedroom. K was irked and wanted him gone. K got up, and Sunanda and I sorted his clothes for Rishi Valley. Achyut and Pama eased Mr. Santhanam into the sitting room and talked to him about land for the school his wife was running but which belonged to KFI. He finally left, and we resumed talking. K felt the schools had overshadowed the Foundation and the teachings by taking all the energy and resources. He wanted to change all that. Rajghat was discussed: the north splitting from the south one day and how to prevent it. Should KFI run the hospital, the rural school, etcetera?

Achyut gave the pros on this. Later, K came down and talked to me alone. “Do they know what I’m talking about?” At Rajghat he had felt “like going away.” Also, one night in meditation, he felt a tremendous force descend on him.

Later, he talked to me, wondering if what he spoke of was only words to the older people there, Pupul in particular. He wanted more young people in the Foundation. He then took me and Pama on a rather harried walk in the dark down the road, past a place where gypsies were cooking their supper on open fires, and it was again dusty and dirty. At supper, he talked about tradition. All religion is based on tradition and is therefore meaningless. I asked him if he was against tradition because it is secondhand, a pattern, formula, etcetera, or did he also deny the original perception of the first teacher, such as the Buddha? Did he deny that there had been truth for them, which might subsequently have been corrupted into tradition by those who heard it, didn’t understand, but passed it along? “Truth cannot be given to another,” he said. I asked what of a person who read in one of his books “the observer is the observed” and instantly saw the truth of it—not intellectually, but truly saw it? Tradition is not in that.

Achyut spoke of a conversation years earlier in which K had shown him the falseness of something that was weighing on him, and he had totally ended it. “But I have had other blindnesses.” K then said that insight in one thing shows in the totality of things. This seemed to upset Sunanda. “It is not one thing at a time,” said K. He asked, “What happens when I say that conflict harms the brain?” I said that I instantly see it as true, but it is memory and because I have experienced it. One swiftly finds it is real because it would recur—but I didn’t have to finish the sentence because, as K was sitting across the table from me, there was the nonverbal exchange that so often took place.

His statement that truth could not be given to another was clear. The person must see it for himself, but truth about the factual and psychological implications in his writings can only be communicated by one who has seen it. He further said that the understanding and therefore the wiping out of one impediment makes one see the whole field of impediments, and they cease to exist.

On November twenty-first I got up at 3:15 a.m., bathed, dressed, and had the luggage ready to load in Mrs. Santhanam’s car. Dr. Parchure, who had arrived the previous night by train from Benares, took my bags. Sunanda, Pama, and Mrs. Jayalakshmi were up to see Krishnaji off. Parameshwaran sat in the front, Achyut, K, and me in the back; and we left at 4 a.m., going westward on roads where lorries were coming from Bangalore with produce, and bullock carts, mountainous with hay, came slowly toward us. Bullocks’ eyes shone in the dark like cats’. As it became lighter, the village huts of mud and thatch, though very poor, didn’t have the squalor of the north. K took pleasure in the large tamarind trees along the road, telling me the villagers did not cut them as they gave valuable fruit, and each tree belonged to someone. Pale green rice fields appeared and the soft mauve plume of the sugar cane. We stopped once for petrol; little thin-legged boys were carrying pots of water on their shoulders to huts along the road. Some were of brightly polished brass, but too often it was a plastic copy. As we came near Chittoor, the landscape was like parts of California—low, rocky hills, but here the monsoon had left river water and small lakes. K pointed to a shrine on a fairly steep hill and said he used to climb up there as a boy, or so he had been told. In Madanapalle, where he was born, there was all the comings and goings of a market town. “Beautiful downtown Madanapalle,” he said, laughing. Achyut explained to me how Rishi Valley came to be: Mrs. Besant had a Theosophical college in Madanapalle and offered it to K, who didn’t want a city school, so they searched and found land in the valley near the mountain Rishi Konda. The valley then had no name, but the choice was obvious. The school grounds became green with many new trees. Near the house where K lived a stream ran through a stone channel.

The school was waiting in front of the guest house to greet him. Frances McCann had arrived. Narayan gave me a room across from K’s on his floor. It was cool, clean, quiet country after cities and I felt very glad to be there. Parameshwaran, with two helpers, provided meals in the kitchen and dining room next to mine. K had been a bit hoarse on leaving Madras, and this was worse at lunch. He went to bed, admitting reluctantly that his throat became sore on the flight to Madras. The walk on the previous day in the heat and dust was a large mistake. Dr. Parchure arrived in the afternoon and said K’s vocal chords were inflamed. His temperature was 99, but it dropped to 98.8 in the evening. Earlier in the afternoon, I walked about, met Narayan’s sister, Indira, and then Narayan showed me the new guest houses.

On November twenty-second K had no fever. I went to a chanting assembly with Narayan, walked around with Frances a bit, and then came back and unpacked K’s trunk of clothes. Narayan brought Prasad, Indira, and Mrs. Thomas to lunch, and later to see a new thatched building for the lower school. It cost only $1,000 and was very handsome.

On the twenty-fourth I went to Madanapalle with Narayan and walked past the house where Krishnaji was born. It was on a narrow street of narrow houses and open drains. His house appeared very small; a tailor lived and worked in it. Upstairs was what a small sign said was “Sadhana Tutorial School.” The house must have been deeper in the back, for it seemed tiny. It was hard to imagine that little baby being born there over eighty-three years ago. It seemed mysterious. Perhaps it was a nicer street then. The smallness of everything made it seem part of another time and, of course, so it was. K showed no interest at all when I told him where I had been.

At lunch, he came to the table with a Mr. Gandhi, an architect, and Narayan. I had an idea to make the large end room where meetings were held into a handsome bedroom for K. It would have light on three sides and could easily be done. His present bedroom was small and dark. In the mornings he needed a lamp to read. Then I suggested enlarging the center room to include both verandahs, making it a large space for meetings. The architect said it was all feasible. In the afternoon, Vasanthakumari, a woman singer who was going to live and teach at Rishi Valley, sang for K. Palgat Mani Iyer, the great mrdangam player, also then living at Rishi Valley, was there.

The next day, Evelyne and Sunanda arrived from Madras. At lunch, K bore down very hard on what the Foundation was actually doing, questioned what he was doing there after forty or more years of talking, and there was not one person “who will work at it, who will carry this flame through India." Narayan suggested an order such as a monastic order. K said, "He has no disciples. Don't call it that. Call it a group of people." He said again that he had probably another ten or fifteen years to live and didn't want to just go around. He questioned whether he himself had been "irresponsible" in not meeting half a dozen people and seeing that they had this thing. It was a knife in me to hear him raise a question that it could be his fault, after all he had poured out to others for so many years. Toward the end of the conversation, it was tentatively planned that he should divide his time in India between Rishi Valley, Vasanta Vihar, and Bombay.

Pupul, Nandini and her daughter, Devi Mangaldas, Achyutji, Nelly Digby, and Elinor Hawksley from Brockwood arrived in a van from Bangalore. K went for a walk with Narayan and me and met Jayalakshmi, her sister, and Narasimhan, who had come from Madras for one night. We continued the walk, and K saw the new thatched building at the rural center. Mr. Naidu, who was in charge of the farm, planting, etcetera, came along and pointed out new trees, which pleased K. Later, everyone but K had supper in the visitors' dining room.

K was ill in the night from something he ate, and so were others. He stayed in bed. Jayalakshmi and Narasimhan had breakfast with me and left after seeing K briefly. He felt better after rest and a semi-fast, and in the afternoon walked a little outside. By evening, he seemed well.

Scott and Pama arrived from Madras, having extracted from customs the video equipment Frances had donated to KFI and which Scott had come to set up and show people how to run.

On the twenty-eighth, K held a discussion with all teachers and trustees. Afterward, Achyut and I had a long talk on problems in the KFI, and in the afternoon K held a meeting with all KFI trustees to which I was invited. Krishnaji asked whether he should become its president, and Pupul said she wished to resign in his favor. She said she had once opposed his being president but now was for it with all her heart. K said that, as things stood at that point, he was holding everything together, that there wasn't a spirit of cooperation—why not? He said again that the schools had swamped the teachings. Why was there division in the Foundation? Pupul made an attempt to bring her differences with Narayan into the open, but she did it in such a challenging way that he flared up. I was asked how differences were handled in the USA and England, and I said that they were discussed and never became issues; that K was president in both the U.S. and UK because after the KW Inc. affair, we were intent on his having as complete power as possible legally, and beyond that we felt totally responsible to him. He spoke of cooperation—the feeling of cooperation coming first, and from that, everything must flow.

In the afternoon of November twenty-ninth, K held another meeting at which he again wondered if he were not being responsible for seeing that a few came to total understanding. He spoke again of the Buddha, who had only two disciples who understood and they both died before he did. It is an ache to hear him wonder if it is his fault after sixty years of pouring light on everyone.

Narayan, Nandini, Devi, and I walked with him. A little village boy brought him a newborn baby goat, black and white and tottery. He held it, and the brown mother bleated protectively. A tiny flute sound came from the rocks on the hill, the player invisible; but it was a faint thread around our walk, and in the evening, sitting and talking with K, I could still hear it faintly somewhere.

November thirtieth, K spoke to the whole school in the assembly hall. It was filmed by Michael Mendizza. The young students spoke right up: "Sir, what is will power?" "Sir, what is desire?" This last from a tiny boy. K talked on learning and comparison and had a young boy and girl sit beside him, both of them entirely unselfconscious. A little boy with heavy glasses was utterly serious and honest. When K asked him if he saw something, he wouldn't say he did until he had considered it carefully. The children were wonderful, and K enjoyed it. "Tell your teachers NO COMPARISON!" he said, and Scott, who was recording the sound for Michael Mendizza, was laughing afterward, for K had a microphone under his kurta, and Scott could hear the children clustering around K and telling on their teachers, who do, of course, compare.

In the afternoon, K held another KFI meeting, which got so heavily psychological that it went nowhere. Narayan spoke of an area of loneliness that resists all awareness, and at the same time he insisted nothing was wrong with his relationships. Pupul before breakfast told me of nightmares and fears that affected her. There seemed to be an Indian tendency to turn things into abstractions, philosophic concepts, and not look into personal problems. In many ways, they seemed unable to see themselves.

On the walk there was K, Scott, and later Sunanda and Rajesh. We met small, dark-as-twigs gypsy women crossing the fields. Instant begging and chattering at us. K pulled out his pockets and so did Scott and I to show we had nothing, and they laughed and kept chattering. A second pair came along and the performance was repeated, except that K gave one his clean white handkerchief.

After supper, nine village men danced outside the dining hall. A tall one with a rattle moved to the center, calling the tune; the eight others danced in a circle, two older ones playing flutes with tassels on them as they danced. The others had cymbals. K came and stood watching, and soon the students began to join in, at first the older girls, then tides of little boys in their white pajama suits jumped in, then older people, some of the Brockwood students, then Devi, and even Nandini for a few minutes. K was laughing, his face alight with fun. He urged Pupul to join, and in a burst of enthusiasm for a few minutes, she did. "I want to dance!" said K and did a little, standing in the dark behind the circle of onlookers. At 9 p.m., we walked back to the guest house, and he was pleased and full of fun.

On December second K held a discussion with teachers, including some from Bangalore. It was mostly on comparison. I wondered how many understood. In the afternoon, there was a concert: Palghat Mani Iyer on mrdangan, a little albino fellow on a little drum shaped like a camembert, and Vasanthakumari singing, accompanied by a young woman on violin. K sat in the center on a mat surrounded by young students.

On the third there was another teachers' discussion. It was, I felt, a difficult one for them; for instance, when he spoke of knowledge as "a means to livelihood and status," he kept putting the question, "With ten students in front of you, how will you see that they have no distraction?" And at one point, he asked them how they will make the ten students understand the whole existence of man. He also seemed intimidating in dismissing almost any reply with "You're not answering my question." At the end of an hour and a half, he made me feel thankful I was not a teacher. In the afternoon, he, Narayan, and I visited the dairy herd—graceful-eyed cows rhythmically chewing their hay. Little calves were shyly friendly.

On the fourth, at breakfast, K talked vigorously about forming small groups of religiously committed people. He swept aside the value of the schools. He was drastic. In the afternoon, with Nandini, Devi, and Narayan, we walked about four miles.

On December fifth, Krishnaji held a second discussion with students. Scott Forbes had set up the new video equipment was training three teachers to man the three cameras and one to be the director. It was used that day for the first time. K again had a little boy named Sanjay sit on his left and a little girl on his right. They were very bright children. K asked what causes fear, and Sanjay replied, "It is all in the mind, Sir." The older children didn't speak, but the young ones were quick and really listening. At the end, K asked everyone to sit quietly and asked if they understood why he suggested it. A little girl piped up: "Sir, it is to build up our energy."

On the sixth, Nandini and Devi left for Bombay, Sunanda and Pama for Madras, and K held a meeting for teachers at which he spoke of seven things to give students:

1) Protection in freedom

2) A sense of the religious and righteous behavior

3) Expectation of highest excellence

4) Love-affection, which is security

Then he added last years' list, which was:

1) A global outlook

2) Concern for man

3) Religious feeling

He kept asking what can we do as a group to give these to the children and how one is to have unyielding rectitude. He pointed out that other groups have a belief, an authority to hold them together, to give them energy, but he said the very denial of authority gives energy. Narayan spoke of a brotherhood of teachers, an absence of fear. K asked how he would bring this about. "By working you will not get it. You must get it and then work at it." Pupul brought up compassion as the central thing, and Narayan said, "If I see that I am the world, there is a root of compassion." K asked how they would prevent the children from being swallowed up by society. "Do you have a deep religious feeling? That is a rock and from there you live. Compassion means love, intelligence, an end to sorrow. Have you that intelligence? You can't give something you haven't got. You have to have this quality of creation, newness; not innovation or invention, but an endless source. A river with no beginning and no end."

Krishnaji, Narayan, and I crossed the valley and climbed a stone path to a flat mesa. It was dark by the time we returned.

On December eighth, Mrs. Jayalakshmi brought violinist T. Krishnan and he, with Mani Iyer, gave a concert. K held talks with teachers during the next two days, and on December eleventh, Pupul did a recorded question-and-answer session with Krishnaji. Present were Ahalya, Upasani, Rajesh, Pama, Scott, and me. Toward the end, he said there must be: 1. no comparison, 2. problems must be solved instantly, and 3. no sorrow. And he said that if someone were to ask why one should keep listening to K, he would tell him to listen constantly, as often as he could because "The flower is always new."

In the evening, the annual school ballet was held under the banyan tree. K sat on a mat with the children. Three little boys played mrdangam fiercely during the intermission.

December thirteenth, at 4 a.m., I was bathed, dressed, and ready to go with Mr. Anantaswami who came to drive K, Narayan, Pupul, and me to the school in Bangalore. Evelyne, Michael Mendizza, and Dr. Parchure went in a separate car. We left at 5 and arrived at 8 and were given breakfast in the Valley School guest house by Mrs. Anantaswami. We went to the school at 10, where Krishnaji spoke to the students, then returned to the guest house where he spoke to the teachers. The children were under twelve but spoke right up.

K: "Do you like your school?"

Children: "Yes."

K: "Are you afraid of your teachers?"

Children: "No!"

K: "What would you like?"

Children: "To have a hostel."

K: “Don’t you want to go home to your parents?”

Children: “No! Parents are always busy.”

The teachers were new at it but intent on having a good school, leery of having a principal but saw the need for one. While at the school, Michael Mendizza photographed K with the children. After lunch at the guest house, there was a short rest, then Mr. Hari Khoday, who had given the money for the school, and Pupul brought the first minister of the state to meet K. It was a sticky beginning, as nobody spoke, but finally K began to question him on whether there were people in India who saw what was happening to the world and were concerned. K spoke with charm and intensity, and the minister had the intelligence to appreciate it. Then we left and were driven back to Rishi Valley by Mr. Khoday, who had most kindly not permitted Evelyne or me to pay for some silks from his factory, which we saw and wanted to buy.

The next day, K, with two of the younger students sitting beside him on the little platform, spoke to all the students, and it went very well. At lunch, there were Mrs. Jayalakshmi and her sister, Dr. and Mrs. Parchure, Pama, and Narayan. In spite of a boil on Krishnaji’s neck, he walked down for a coconut tree planting. He planted the first one near the swimming pool. I planted one nearby, then he led a crowd down to the bridge and had each person plant one tree along the river. Jayalakshmi, Ahalya Chari, Upasini, Rita Zampese, Mr. Deshpande, Narayan and his sister Indira, the Parchures—all planted and most had to wade through the stream. Only Pupul evaded it by leaving.

The next morning, she left for Delhi to see Mrs. Gandhi. K’s boil was hurting him. He stayed in bed, but a Dr. Krishnamurti from Madanapalle came to lunch, and, with Dr. Parchure, the two doctors decided on an antibiotic, Doxycyline 100 mg, which K took in the evening. He was better the next morning as the boil softened and began to drain. He was able to sit in the other room and hold a teacher discussion. “A fact is never a fragment.” In the afternoon, I climbed the hill behind the playing field.

On December seventeenth, in the morning, K held a teachers’ discussion, and in the afternoon he held one in front of the guest house that was filmed by Michael Mendizza. Participants were Narayan, Prasad, Krishnakutty, Indira, Mrs. Rajan, and Venkatraman. Ahalya and I packed K’s clothes in metal trunks to take to Madras. Someone said that the U.S. and China had announced opening of diplomatic relations. News was as remote as the moon.

On the eighteenth, K held a discussion with students of the two upper classes with Narayan as the only other person. Afterward, Dr. Parchure opened K’s boil, using a freeze anesthetic that was so short-lived that he had considerable pain. But as soon as it was over and bandaged, he said the pain was gone and it felt much better. The question remained how he got it. He spent the rest of the day in bed reading. I, too, read all afternoon then went for a walk. The sky was beautiful, with round, rolling clouds. A sparrow hawk fluttered in place over the rice field, dove, but rose with nothing.

On the nineteenth, K spoke to the school, I packed, and it was learned that Mrs. Gandhi had been jailed for four days by the parliament and denied the seat she won in it a few weeks earlier.

CHAPTER 55

On December twentieth, 1978, at 4 in the morning, Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, Parameshwaran, and I left Rishi Valley in the Santhanam car for Madras, arriving at Vasanta Vihar by 8:30, to learn that all the others—Evelyne, Nelly Digby, Frances, etcetera who were to have left at 7:30 a.m., were prevented from leaving by danger of riots over Mrs. Gandhi going to jail. She was stronger in the south than in the north, and followers had attacked trains, newspaper offices, etcetera. Four people were killed in Bangalore, where Achyut Patwardhan, Ahalya Chari, Mrs. Parchure, Upasani, and Rajesh were to have left at 7:30 but were immobilized yet able to come the next day by train. Rajesh said he had questioned boys who were making trouble in Bangalore and asked what political party they represented. Their answer was fifteen rupees a day and assurance they wouldn't be arrested.

On the twenty-second, Dick Clarke was at lunch and presented K with the book he had just written about the early days. I asked him what he had meant at the end when he said that Theosophy took in Krishnamurti, the K Foundations, etcetera. He replied that Theosophy covered everything.

In the afternoon, the Rishi Valley vans and car brought the missing persons. It seemed that their troubles began in Madanapalle, when Ulrich Bruger, Gisèle Balleys, and Mrs. Ridley arrived there by car from Rishi Valley to catch a bus. A mob crowded around the car threateningly. A man said no buses were running and to return to Rishi Valley, but another group closed in and tried to force the doors open, telling them to get out. The driver edged the car over to the curb, as though to comply, then gunned the car, and they escaped to Rishi Valley.

After everyone had tea, I went for a walk with Krishnaji and Pama, driving past the TS entrance and Damodar Gardens, which KFI was thinking of leasing, to the beach. We walked then toward the river, a wind blowing in from the Bay of Bengal, but the wide beach was not entirely clean. The fisher folk lived on the beach and relieved themselves along the edge of the surf, so one had to walk along a road leading to the bridge that once crossed the river. K strode along, vital and indomitable-looking, past the TS, past the part of the beach where this strange story began and the young boy and his little brother were noticed. The road we took goes around the TS land, as K then did not wish to set foot on it.

Back at Vasanta Vihar, Pupul had arrived from Bombay after a crowded time at the airports. Everyone, including K, had supper at tables in a coco palm hut put up outside the dining room in the back garden.

On December twenty-third, there was a KFI trustee meeting in which there was discussion of Krishnamurti becoming its president instead of Pupul. He would give his answer the following day. A small college at Rishi Valley was also talked about. K underscored the need for new, good people. Rajesh said that a full sense of responsibility seemed to fade, perhaps because of the enormity of the teachings. K said that if he saw the truth of the teachings, he would start in a small way: "That, after all, it had taken [himself] fifty years" and "I can't do anything tomorrow. If I want to do something, I want to do it today. If I had heard the Buddha and his mind was too big for me, I would take what I understood and keep moving. He said, 'no time.' I would work on that. I don't know what he means. I would ask him. He says, 'I will do this.' I say no time. If I am angry, I end it now, not tomorrow. I won't let anything enter the field of time. I would ask if I have understood that—the word, meaning, the inwardness of it. I can't capture the immensity [of it all] but I can begin with that."

The next day, December twenty-fourth, Krishnaji accepted the presidency of KFI but wished that Pupul and Achyut, as vice presidents, would act as "buffers" with regard to legal and other matters in his absence or during any periods in which he would delegate his powers to them. Achyut demurred because he had accepted to start religious centers all over India and therefore felt he should not take on an official position, but Pupul made a plea to Achyut to accept nonetheless because he was uniquely able to protect KFI in Indian conditions at that time. He felt he wanted to do religious work on his own so that, if he made mistakes, they would be his personally. Pupul refused to be a vice president without him. K said that was blackmail. And he asked about his own responsibilities as president. Achyut said he would do whatever K wished, and K said that was not enough. Achyut then accepted. Krishnaji then asked what we could do to make all the K Foundations more responsible and active, creative, alive, and living the teachings. He asked if there were too many members too casually involved. He was concerned with the possibility of separation when he died. I asked about K's powers as president, and received their agreement that he could at any time, whether he was in India or elsewhere, overrule the vice presidents. K asked at length what were the responsibilities of the Foundation members and what do they do. "Am I spilling my blood on a rock? It's not worth it." K said our trust was in the teachings. "And that trust is your life." Our responsibility was to each other, to keep in contact not only verbally but inwardly.

At five, Shankar drove Evelyne, Nelly, Julie, and me to where M. S. Subbulakshmi was to sing. We had to queue to get in, and it was a moment to observe the audience: a high preponderance of what I thought of as South Indian Brahmin faces: rather fine with a distinct dignity. The event was like the opening of the opera in New York—women in their most gleaming saris, lustrous colors, diamonds in ears (and regrettably in noses). Subbulakshmi sang for almost three hours marvelously. So passed Christmas Eve.

December twenty-fifth. Between 8 a.m. and 8 p.m., the monsoon poured over five inches. At 9:30 a.m., Krishnaji held the first of combined Foundations meeting. The only non-Indian members were Evelyne, Nelly, and myself. Speaking of the responsibilities of the Foundations, K said, "The religious mind is without illusion." And later he said, "Sorrow is illusion." In the afternoon, Sunanda, Pupul, Pama, Nelly, Evelyne, and I had a publications committee meeting. India had agreed to Harper bringing out the Meditations book in the autumn of 1979, in time for Christmas, and their own book, now titled Exploration into Insight, to follow early in 1980.

At 5 p.m., when the rain slacked a little, Lakshmi Shankar came to sing for K. It was held in the hall, and about thirty of us were there. Mrs. Jayalakshmi brought Mani Iyer, who sat beside Krishnamurti like a carving in dark wood. Their combined presence evoked singing that seemed to come from deep inside a reverie of devotion, substances of longing, sorrow, supplication. Lakshmi Shankar, sitting in the dark hall, became an ancient monumental figure. Her voice seemed to come from whatever was the Indian mind and heart, a distillation of centuries. At the end, she came forward, touched her forehead to the ground before Krishnamurti, and turned slightly to touch Mani Iyer's feet: obeisance to God and to greatness. That was that Christmas in Madras.

Rain continued in the night and all next day. There was flooding. K wanted to have others at the 9:30 meeting, but I reminded him that the K Foundation members had come all that way for meetings on Foundation matters, so the meeting was only with them.

On the twenty-seventh there was the final combined Foundations meeting. It was on subtleties of interpretation and what it meant to spread the teachings. He said we must speak out of what we understood. It might not be the totality of the teachings, but what we have seen we can communicate. The rain continued, and in the afternoon we finished the publications meeting.

The next day, though the rain continued, Pupul took Evelyne, Nelly, and me to the Handicraft wholesalers, where they proudly showed samples of their lovely cottons but almost all were unavailable. In the afternoon, I went again to town with Evelyne and Scott, who were looking for presents. The sights of the slums in the rain were numbing. Women were washing their cooking pots in the filthy street waters. An old beggar outside a shop angrily waved away a man and child, wanting to keep the foreigners (us) as his to beg from, and a snake charmer, catching sight of me in the doorway, waved his wretched cobra.

Nandini arrived that night, and so did David Shainberg and his son, Steven. The rain continued—fifteen inches had fallen during the week, but K was optimistic that even a little sun would dry it out for the opening talk the next day. He was bored with the rain and inaction, and wanted to talk.

On December thirtieth, wisps of sun gave hope in the morning. I walked down with Krishnaji to look at the driveway, where a lake there seemed to have diminished, but later, rain began anew, and it became obvious the talk could not be held in the garden, so K held a discussion in the hall.

On the last day of the year, the sun returned at last. At lunch, there were K, Sunanda, Nandini, me, and a Dr. Ravindra, a professor of physics and religion at Halifax University. In conversation, K said that a person with a total view could not be concerned with the particular—i.e., such a person could never be a scientist, artist, etcetera. He or she would only be concerned with the totality: he would teach that; nothing else.

I asked about a person of genius, like Beethoven (as K liked him so much) who might be an egocentric man, but at moments of creation, could his ego be in suspension? This led to a discussion of relationship versus actuality. Actuality cannot touch truth, hence no relationship, as K defines relationship as a two-way thing. But truth can affect actuality.

CHAPTER 56

January first, 1979 Krishnaji came down to wish me a Happy New Year. He picked a little white blossom from the vine on the verandah and gave it to me. These have an intense, sweet smell. It was another clear, sunny day and a quiet one as K rested until his talk in the garden at 5 p.m., his second Madras one.

The next morning, he held a discussion in the hall with a small group sitting in a circle while a large group sat as observers. The subject was "What is a religious life?" and participating in the discussion with K were Achyut, Pupul, Sunanda, David Shainberg, Evelyne Blau, Nelly Digby, Narayan, Rajesh, Krishnakutty, and me.

In the afternoon, I went with Pupul and Nandini to tea at Mrs. Jayalakshmi's. Though she lived only around the corner, she came quite formally to fetch us in her car. There were two houses, one for her son and daughter-in-law, and the other her own. The two houses were separated by a pretty garden of flowering shrubs and stone statues of Nandi, the cow god. Parameshwaran was there to serve. "He belongs to me," said Mrs. Jayalakshmi. Apparently, she employed him first, and one felt that each played a correct and pleasing role in the other's life. It also seemed that there had been some barrier between Jayalakshmi, Pupul, and Nandini, and I had unwittingly brought about this tea party by asking if I could come to see her and bring Nandini. She showed us rather formally photographs of Krishnaji, at my request, which led to looking with admiration at her collection of bronze and stone statues; but what really broke the ice was our asking to see her collection of saris. She brought out superb saris of heavy Kancheepuram silk. Both Pupul and she knew the very weaver of some; she knew that Pupul's knowledge of them equaled her own, and her face lit up while talking about them. We were a proper audience. I spoke of one she had worn the previous week, a beauty of dark blue with turquoise panels, and she brought it out and gave it to me. It was splendidly beautiful and, with Nandini's help, I wore it that evening. Nandini put it on me, and then we went upstairs for Krishnaji's inspection. He looked very critically, walked around me, and then said, "Excellent. You can wear them." I relaxed into the sense of wearing something beautiful and therefore felt at ease, and was told I looked right by the critical eyes of the ladies, so I abandoned my assertions that Western women looked in fancy dress costume in a sari, and went off in this one to Prema Srinivasan's house to dinner. All but K went. Her house could have been in Beverly Hills but reflected her taste and care. There were flowers and sandalwood, a woman sang before dinner, and we dined at tables on a terrace. The food was meticulous and delicious.

January third brought another discussion with K and the small group while the larger group listened. At lunch were K, David Shainberg, Professor Ravi Ravindra, Nandini, Pama, and me. At 5 p.m., Nandini, Sunanda, Pupul, and I went to Prema's to see another sari viewing. This one was of samples she was collecting for an October showing in Bombay. I ordered a very pretty one, and Sunanda gave me a creamy cotton one she had from the previous sale.

On January fourth, there was a continuation of the previous discussions with the continuing theme of "What is a religious life?" but a professor from Madras University slowed it down with questions on technique.

During the discussion, Evelyne received a telephone call saying that her sister had died suddenly of a heart attack. She was deeply upset. Her husband urged her to fly home immediately, but she hesitated, wanting to finish the film work of K she had come to do. I arranged for her to telephone from Sunanda's room. K came in with me, saying to me, "You be there when I see her." He spoke to her, holding her hand with both of his. She didn't come to lunch but made her decision to complete her work there and then fly home.

In the afternoon, we went to look at a stretch of beach south of Madras, where there was land to build an enlargement of the school KFI. It was a flat expanse of sand, no trees or vegetation, and it was too far to bring children. K didn't like it at all. We came back past the TS Damodar Gardens, which was for sale, and K was keen for that. Evelyne joined us for supper.

The next day, while K spent the day resting, some of us went to Kancheepuram. I was with Nandini, Prema, and Scott. Prema was very informative historically, and she had arranged the day. We visited the big temple, seeing the temple elephant first. He was confined with leg chains, we threw him a large bunch of bananas, which he ate as if it were one, and seemed to sense our sympathy, holding up a leg that had a sore. I had a first glimpse of Brahmin priests—heads shaved to a pigtail or bun in the back, earring in right ear, of course a sacred thread, complicated dhotis swaddling them, then a large V of white ash with a vertical red line on foreheads, chests, and each upper arm. We were shown by the light of a paper dipped in oil that lit the statue of a deity in a dark shrine, then the head priest put in our cupped hands water with saffron and camphor to touch with lips and pour the remainder on one's head, a round crown was touched to each head, and some leaves put in each hand—all this a blessing. Prema had arranged a showing of the temple's jewels, which were carried forth in chests and taken out for us to see but not touch. There was a crown of gold for the god, inlaid with uncut diamonds and a huge emerald, smaller goddess crowns, some long necklaces, and—most exquisite—a little hand of gold with the palm encrusted with diamonds. All these were to be shown only at certain festivals when they ornament the statues of the deities.

We then went to another temple with a large and splendid Nandi facing it. Inside courtyards, there were niches with bas-reliefs of Siva and Parvati, many of Siva dancing, a smile on his face, right leg straight up alongside his ear and a bashful Parvati kneeling beside him. This was Siva's dance when he out-danced his wife. Everything he did, she did until finally he won by the leg straight up. She was too bashful to do that. In another most charming niche, there was a Nandi dancing beside Siva, all smiles.

Then we went to a sari shop for the very South Indian and famous Kancheepuram heavy silk saris. I bought one for Mrs. Parchure, one for Evelyne, who hadn't come, and a green and red one for me. Then, amazingly, we were served lunch in a back room, brought by Prema. Lunch for fourteen! And even water, soap, and towels to wash our hands.

We then went to the weavers where these saris were made, and Pupul was greeted as an empress. She had known all of them when she was doing the handcraft business. The best weaver of all, now retired, was sent for and came quickly to greet and be greeted. Present wares were shown, and Pupul noted that the level had deteriorated since she was no longer involved. There were three saris left from her designs; Nandini bought two and I bought one to give to Sunanda. We came back to Vasanta Vihar, and K came to inspect the loot with interest and approval. Vatsalaji (Mrs. Parchure) was very shy but I thought pleased with her sari. So seemed Evelyne with hers—a red, very traditional one, and she wore it to the Santhanams', where all of us, except K, dined. I wore a gray printed sari, which Nandini brought and helped me put on.

January sixth. As I seemed to have embarked on wearing saris, I was glad to go to town with Prema to arrange the making of blouses and extra petticoats. In the afternoon, I put on a cotton sari by myself, which amused K when I appeared, but he approved. At 5, he gave his third talk, to me a very great one, which seemed to engulf the mind and dissolve it. I felt silent and disembodied afterward.

The next day, Ooma, a sister of Narayan, and her husband, Ramaswamy, were at lunch. She was shy, smiled slowly when you talked to her, but then withdrew into a quiet melancholy. K was teasing her and wooing her to leave a good teaching job at Delhi University to come with her husband and start a college at Rishi Valley. He was sweeping in his enthusiasm and disregarded all the practical problems involved. At 5, he gave his fourth talk on "Order is sequence in space." He had cough problems. Dr. Parchure brought him water and laid it on the dais, but K didn't see it until Kathy pushed it forward. The talk was tremendous. He went into fear, thought, the foundations of order.

On January eighth Mrs. Gandhi came to Madras to see Krishnamurti. She arrived with Pupul at 10:45 a.m. and spent an hour with him. She rested afterward in Pupul's room and before lunch met in the hall those who were lunching there—Evelyne, Nelly, Frances, Scott, etcetera. Then Pupul brought her to the upstairs dining room and left her with me while she went to speak to K. I asked her about the recent jail she had been in for a week and what it had been like. She answered quite readily: It had been a cell for six but she had it to herself. Beds were raised stone shelves. Hers had no mattress but a quilt to lie on and one as a cover. "I am used to a hard bed, so it was all right." Food was brought to her from her home, newspapers were allowed, and she brought books. The bars on the windows bothered her, which was a little surprising, as most houses in India seemed to have barred windows. She had hung blankets over the ones in her cell. It was the cell in which she had put George Fernandes. On Christmas Day, thinking that the Australian girl in an adjoining cell might be a Christian, she invited her to lunch. The girl turned out to have converted to Islam and was in prison on a drug smuggling charge.

Krishnaji, Mrs. Gandhi, Pupul, and I were at lunch. K went out of his way to be the host, to entertain her and told some of his best funny stories. She listened expressionlessly until the joke at the end, then smiled. It was as if she were barely listening until a cue came to smile. K told these stories with such charm and enjoyment that it was always fun to listen, but there was no relaxation in Mrs. Gandhi. She was a smallish, very held-in woman, wore a black and white sari—not the taste of Pupul, but neat—had nice feet with cared-for toenails. She was uncertain about removing her sandals outside the dining room and followed what Pupul did. After lunch, she went off in her car, accompanied by an enormous, tough-looking bodyguard.

She reappeared in the big hall shortly after 5 p.m., when M. S. Subbulakshmi had begun to sing. Pupul went to sit by her. She listened without expression. One sensed a woman in whom there was little enjoyment or affection. After about forty minutes, she left quietly, and K got up to see her to her car. In the morning, she had spent an hour with him, and he said that they had talked for only about ten minutes of that time. The rest was sitting silently. I had the impression that if she gave up politics she would be left with nothing, without inner resources. The concert was very fine but too long.

On January tenth, Pupul left for Bombay. I went with Nelly Digby to the Madras museum to see bronzes and wood carvings, which I enjoyed very much. Nelly tended to twitch with criticisms, but in part I thought she enjoyed it. We stopped to cash travel checks, which took a long time. Between the heat and standing, my leg ached. K rested that day, and Scott left for Brockwood. We would soon all start moving westward.

January twelfth brought another expedition; Sunanda, Prema, Nelly, and I went in Prema's car to Mahabalipuram. En route we paused to look at a large hotel called Fishermen's Cove on a beautiful stretch of beach. There were temples by the sea. We wandered in, and then, sitting in the shade of a huge rock, we had a picnic breakfast supplied by Prema. She did everything so nicely and with such enthusiasm. We also saw the long rock carving of Lord Krishna, holding up a mountain against a storm, and a lovely carving of a cow being milked and licking her little calf nestled against her. There were other carvings too of gods, men doing difficult austerities, and a Nandi copying them. We came back with air conditioning in the car, stopped at Prema's beach house for coconut juice, and were back at Vasanta Vihar in time for lunch. Evelyne left in the afternoon for Los Angeles, and at 5 there was a concert by Palghat Mani Iyer and a Professor Ramanathan, who sang very well and told me he was teaching at Wesleyan.

The next day, there was a discussion at breakfast between K, Achyut, Sunanda, Radha, and me on what Krishnaji meant by "no recording." I asked him if he meant no recall. He said that in insight there is no recording. I asked him about his Notebook in which he described events that took place earlier. He said it was not written using memory. The words happened at the moment of writing.

Before K's fifth talk in Madras, Narayan spoke about the schools, and I made an appeal for donations, explaining a little about the English and American Krishnamurti Foundations. K gave a deeply moving talk on a religious life.

On January fourteenth Krishnaji called me, Achyut, and Sunanda to talk to him about the TS and Damodar Gardens, which he wanted to get for an enlargement of The School. Radha Burnier had told Achyut that the TS might want two of their members on the board, and K wanted to know what I thought. I said that, speaking for myself and perhaps for those like Erna and Theo Lilliefelt, it might feel that a TS member on a K Foundation board would be a blurring of his break with the TS. He was impatient with what I said. I stayed with it and pointed to his statement that he would not have allowed Rajagopal to edit his books if he had known he was still a TS member. K wanted this land and said I was being stupid. I said that might be, but he had asked me what I thought and so I told him. Achyut tried to minimize the importance of it, trying to make their demands acceptable. I said that Radha, because of her personal qualities, had been accepted in spite of being in the TS, but this rankled with some. Finally K said, "Do you feel it?" meaning something else at work. I said I didn't have his perception and the decision was clearly his, but he wouldn't accept that, saying, "It is your responsibility." I said he was trying to force me to say something I didn't feel. Either I said it or kept silent. Finally, we were interrupted, and so it ended, but later he told me he had felt "a presence" in the room as we talked, that one must remain open to "something" being at work. "The TS was meant to help the work of the World Teacher, perhaps this was an opening."

At lunch were K, Mr. and Mrs. John Coates, Joy Mills, Radha Burnier, Achyut, and me. Only at the end of lunch did Krishnaji bring up interest in getting some land. John Coats and Joy Mills said they thought it a good idea. It was agreed that some of us would look at land the next day. On leaving, Joy Mills asked K rather archly if he would like to live in his old rooms at the TS. He looked startled and a little suspicious.

At 5 p.m., he gave his sixth and final talk of that series, a long, profound one on many things. His voice was deep and from far off. He put tremendous energy into it and at the end sat in silence while the large crowd seemed not to breathe. As he moved toward the house people flowed in a tide around him, touching him in worship. He went upstairs alone, and some impulse made me follow. He stood in the dark and held me when I came to him. I felt he would faint, and he sank down on the floor. "Don't touch me now." I sat near him, and in a few seconds he fainted slowly toward me. He lay there several minutes, then came to and said he was all right, went into the bathroom, washed, changed from dhoti to pajamas and said he wanted to walk. The crowd had streamed away, and he went out and walked with Mrs. Jayalakshmi. At supper, he ate with everyone as usual and stayed far too long talking to the Bangalore school people—Kabir, Anantaswami, and one other.

At breakfast the following morning were K, Nelly, Radha, Achyut, Pama, and me. There was discussion of Sanskrit meanings, Buddhist doctrine, etcetera. At 10, Achyut, Pama, Sunanda, and I met Radha Burnier and John Coats and went to look at Damodar Gardens and then Besant Gardens as school sites. I surmised the TS needed money and would like to sell. The price then was two lakhs an acre, which would have been prohibitive. Damodar Gardens had thirteen acres and suitable houses, but there was then a plan by the city to enlarge a road, which would ruin it. Besant Gardens was larger—about forty-to-fifty acres that could be used, but I had a feeling their demands would be stiff. During all this, K was meeting some students. He needed to rest but was not taking it. There was a quiet lunch.

On January sixteenth, at breakfast there were K, Radha, Sunanda, Pama, and I. A discussion began on reincarnation: There is the stream in which is thought, attachment, etcetera. Thought is a material process. When the body dies, if attachment has not been understood and ended, that attachment, that thought continues as part of the stream. It can manifest in another, but it is not reincarnation of a total person—ego. Ego is an illusion. The desire for reincarnation, the wanting another chance, is part of attachment, thought, the stream. Karma, cause and effect, is meaningless if one sees this.

At lunch there was a man from the newspaper Indian Express named Goenka. When Mrs. Gandhi came to Madras, she said she had come to see Krishnamurti and it was printed, so people were asking what he had said to her. Goenka asked K, but he smiled and shook his head.

Later, at 6 p.m., Sunanda and I went to a Kalakshetra ballet. Rukmini Arundale, hard-faced and swollen-looking, lumbered about in an orange sari, looking something like Marlon Brando in The Godfather. She didn't return Sunanda's namaste gesture. I didn't expect any recognition from her having come to tea at the thatched cottage in Huizen in 1967, but she eyed us as we sat waiting for the performance to start. We left after one act as we were due at Prema's for dinner. Krishnaji was there, as were the Parchures, and Prema's children. We also met her husband, who was something of an invalid.

The next day, Mr. and Mrs. Rex Henry came to breakfast. Afterward, Amru, then Sivakamu and her brother, Yadnya, came to greet K. Sunanda and I went with Padma Santhanam to visit The School KFI. It was a nice building of plaster halfway up, then lattice sides, and palm leaf with thatch on the roof. The children were ages two and a half to ten. They sang, danced, and did a little play—most endearing children. One little boy with enormous black eyes was as beautiful a child as I'd ever seen. A little French girl, looking at pictures by herself, not understanding English, was touching when I spoke to her in French, and came and sat next to me when the other children were dancing. Padma Santhanam was responsible for this school, and it was a fine job. She and her husband lunched with us at Vasanta Vihar.

At 4 p.m., I went to tea with Mr. and Mrs. Rex Henry at Olcott Bungalow in the TS. We sat on a porch and were joined by Dick Clarke. He was more than willing to describe an ES (Esoteric Section) meeting when I said I knew nothing about it. He said they met weekly, members only, and they had to be punctual at 8 a.m., give a password to get in, sign an attendance book, and then, facing "the Pictures" (of Masters), recite together some sort of salute, sit, and then the one conducting the meeting (Radha Burnier) would address them on something for forty-five minutes, after which there is some sort of pledge, and the meeting is promptly over. He said she would speak on something like probation and Masters, and he had once asked her how she reconciled such things with her interest in Krishnamurti but got an inconclusive reply.

The next day, January eighteenth, Radha came to breakfast, and the conversation turned to George Arundale and his wife, Rukmini. Radha described Rukmini's neglect of him when he was ill and dying. Though a diabetic, he was fed sugar by some quack doctor. Rukmini would hang around with the musicians in the days when she still danced. Arundale would sometimes accompany her on tours, and young Radha was brought along to fill in a dance program when Rukmini began to be too heavy. It was Radha at these times who tried to help Arundale when he was ill. In his last days, he said to Rukmini, "You are a hard woman." So went the reporting of all this ancient history. K said he would like to ask the only surviving person "who knew the boy" what happened when he was found, which, of course, was Dick Clarke, so it was arranged that Jayalakshmi would invite him for lunch.

It was a very hot day and a little cooler at Jayalakshmi's when we went there at 12:30. K wore a dhoti and looked resplendent. Present were Mr. and Mrs. Rex Henry, Mr. and Mrs. John Coats, Dick Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Santhanam, Sunanda, Pama, and me. There was at first singing by a man from Kalakshetra accompanied by flute, mrdangam, and tamboura. During this, Subbulakshmi, her husband, Sudarshan, niece, Radha, and the latter's little girl, who was mentally disabled, came to listen. The child crawled over and sat half in my lap, the little empty eyes looking up at me.

After the singing, nine Brahmin priests chanted. They wore swaddled dhotis, had shaved heads, Vishnu marks on forehead and arms, earrings in one ear, hand rings, etcetera. They looked a little like Iroquois. The chanting went on relentlessly. At one point I thought they had gone beyond stopping and would continue all day, but some sort of high sign was given and it slowed down to an "OM" and ended. K handed out the rewards like diplomas: to each a dhoti, banana, and certain traditional leaves and a piece of paper money. They all plucked at the money. Somehow it seemed a business affair. In spite of their extraordinary appearance, they could all have come to sell insurance. They looked around, scratched themselves while chanting, everything was perfunctory, and they left.

The Subbulakshmi family departed, and the rest of us sat down to one of Jayalakshmi's sumptuous meals. I counted over nineteen separate things apart from sweets or drinks. Toward the end of lunch, Krishnaji began to ask Dick Clarke what it was like when they found him. Clarke seemed to remember it all clearly. K kept at him with questions, holding Clarke's left hand and ticking off the questions on his fingers. Sunanda took down in shorthand the whole conversation, which went on until 5 o'clock. The Coatses listened raptly to it, but he and Radha had to leave midway for a TS meeting. K seemed to feel that what "the boy" was like, and what went on in his mind, eluded him, for he kept asking questions. But for me, there was a true line throughout: the dreaming child who, when punished by the wretched school master, would stand on the verandah until told to leave, and who often had to be fetched home by his little brother, was the gentle, compliant boy who replied to his elders, "Whatever you say" when he was asked to do something. He was polite and accepting but not really touched by their world. He learned outward things—manners, speech, witnessed the TS happenings, but it left little mark; he was elsewhere. He remembers vaguely standing by the river for hours, staring at it, vacant. This vacancy may have been some "otherness" that protected him and let whatever he became grow, mature very slowly. It protected him from much of the ugliness in later life, from the brutalities of the Rajagopals. It is there in the present when he is "off," when he sat in Hamish Thompson's dental chair for four hours without a thought. His reality, his native place is elsewhere.

I said all this to him later and at supper when we all talked somewhat about it. In the Rajagopal times, he said he was sometimes physically beaten, but he didn't resist their violence, as he had not resisted the ignorant schoolmaster as a child. It all left no scar, nor did the Theosophical beliefs condition his mind.

Later, on our return from Jayalakshmi's, we walked near the beach—K, Sunanda, Pama, Vatsala, who goes to Rishi Valley to teach, and me.

January nineteenth was very hot. I packed. I talked to K and suggested that, though he didn't speak definitively about what happened to him as a boy, and what the concept of Masters is; unless he makes some statement now, what he is supposed to have written as a boy (recounting initiations, going to visit Masters, etcetera) will stand as his testimony. I asked if I could read those words to him and let him consider if he wishes to comment. He thought for an instant only and then said, "All right. Remind me about all this when we get to Ojai, and I'll make a statement."

The next day, we were up at 4 a.m., dressed, and ready to leave by 5:15 a.m. Sunanda would be coming the following week, but K, Pama, and I said goodbye to Parameshwaran and all the staff and left for the airport. The day before, I had given Parameshwaran a dhoti and 700 rupees, and he seemed pleased and talked of what he would buy for his son, Mani. Ganesh, who cleaned my room, touched my feet in farewell. Nataraj had gone ahead with the luggage and tickets, so when we arrived at the airport, there were only the farewells. Jayalakshmi had more beads for Krishnaji and for me. I felt a renewed sense of friendship with her. The Henrys were there, and various others. We boarded, had a bit of wait until some fog burned away, and then flew off. The captain invited K, and me because I was with him, to come up to the cabin. The view there was a shining one. The complexity of the instruments at the controls of a Boeing 707 was beyond me.

We landed in Bombay and coolness—a marvelous, life-giving cool. To meet him were Nandini, Pupul, and others, and Asit Chandmal, in whose apartment we were to stay. Asit drove us into the city, which seemed part of the West with twenty-story buildings and traffic to match. Asit and his wife, Minakshi, and daughter, Clea, who was then at school in Rishi Valley, lived in a very modern apartment on the sixth floor, and had kindly given it over to Krishnaji during his stay in Bombay. He had one bedroom, I had the other. The servants of Nandini and Pupul's mother, who had cooked for K for years, were there—Vimabhai, a thin, ancient, smiling woman, and an equally ancient toothless man, and there was also the Chandmals' maid. It was very comfortable, and there was also the extravagance of being cool. We had an excellent, simple lunch, and then Nandini's sons, Gamchan and Vikram, came to see K.

January twenty-first. The conversation at breakfast included Krishnaji, Pupul, Nandini, Achyut, Pama, Asit, and me, and was on whether "the flame" of the Teachings can be handed on. Is insight total, or can it be confined to a particular area or subject? A nap in the afternoon was followed by a walk around the racecourse, a good place to walk and the only open space for miles around.

On the next day, a handful of psychoanalysts, led by a Mr. Nathani, came to talk to K. They didn't seem to have a clue. Afterward, Pupul and Nandini took me to Cottage Industries, where I bought a silk sari. Another nap in the afternoon, and again we all walked around the racecourse.

January twenty-fourth. Krishnaji's first Bombay talk was in the evening at 6:15. I went ahead with Pupul. There was a huge crowd with the usual familiar faces in the foreground, Rajneesh's U.S. followers smoking pot, all kinds and ages of people. I sat with Nandini and family members behind and to the side of K on a small platform in order to be able to get quickly to the car parked behind. K came with Asit. In his talk he answered his own question, which he had been putting to us for days: "What is the cause of degeneration in this country and the world?" It is the intellect, its overuse. Everything is reduced to a theory, a concept. We do not see things as they are, holistically, but as theories. When K stopped speaking, he sat silently for a few moments. Nandini and I went to the car, only yards away, but as K rose, so did a wave of people pressing forward to touch him. He was caught against the wall by people kissing his hands, touching him with a hysteria of reverence. Asit fought to keep the door open and let him get into the car. It took minutes, and when he managed it, hands came through the window to touch him. K was a figure of compassion, touching as many hands as he could, saying, "Be careful, be careful." Nandini called out, "You will be hurt!" and the answer came back in Marathi: "It doesn't matter!" The chauffeur edged the car forward, but the crowd ahead obliterated the road. It took about ten minutes to drive the hundred or so feet to the street. In the morning, K had said, "What will I talk about? Well, I suppose it will come. The day it doesn't I'll shut up shop."

The next day, January twenty-fifth, K talked with Pupul, Nandini, Asit, Dr. Parchure, Achyut, Radha Burnier, Pama, Sunanda, and me about the events in Madras and Ootacamund in 1948 and similar instances in Gstaad and Malibu. This was in response to the question: What did these events mean? He said he remembered none of it. Pupul described her and Nandini's witness to the 1948 Ootacamund happening, and I described similar things that had happened to Krishnaji in my presence. K asked if we could have imagined it, and this was ruled out. There was too much similarity in our reporting, and there was also something similar in Pergine and when he was with Vanda Scaravelli. The conversation lasted until 12:45 and was taped on cassette by Asit. It was felt that it was a confidential record and should be kept confidential for a while in the three archives. No clear answer emerged, but the subject needed further talk, and K seemed disposed to continue it.

Mr. and Mrs. Patel came to lunch, bringing fiery food. At 5 p.m., I went with Sunanda and Pama for a drive and had tea at an enormous new hotel, the Oberoi Sheraton. It could have been in Los Angeles, New York, or Las Vegas. I was dazed to find the Herald Tribune on sale, the first sighting since October. Apparently, England was deep in snow; Heathrow and Gatwick were closed. I dined across the street with Sunanda, Pama, and Radha on the twenty-fifth floor VIP penthouse of the Indian Express building. The flat had been lent to them and Achyut by Mr. Goenka, owner of the Indian Express newspaper.

On January twenty-sixth K held a discussion with about sixty invited guests. Not a good group for a discussion. At lunch, Radha gave me a list of the manuscripts, letters, etcetera sent to K in 1950 and part of the archives from the TS that Rajagopal was withholding from KFA. Nandini brought me a lovely brown-and-black cotton sari. There was a walk in the late afternoon on the racecourse. People had discovered K's walking there, and one determined family of three marched ten feet behind him all the way round.

On January twenty-seventh, Krishnaji gave his second Bombay talk in the late afternoon to an immense crowd on "Fear is based on thought and time." Again, he was engulfed by a crowd afterward. A man rubbed K's hand all over his face, another put K's fingers in his mouth, so that, when I finally reached the car, K was sitting in the car with his palms up and Nandini had to get his handkerchief and rub the itch on his nose. Hands—hundreds of hands—were thrust through the window, and K patiently touched them all as the car crept forward. People marched behind with their hands touching the car as though in that way they kept contact with him. One man before the talk demanded to be allowed to come and live on the landing outside the door to the flat. When Nandini said it was not possible, he said, "You are keeping me from my God!"

The third Bombay talk was the next day, an overwhelming one, deeply moving. The crowd again poured toward him afterward with what seemed a thousand hands stretching to touch him. He looked dazed, as he so often does after talks, but seemed to want to give something to each of them. His palms together, he turned to face them all and, when finally in the car, through the partly opened window, he let the thrusting hands touch his, as the car moved slowly forward. I felt unable to speak after such a talk but later had to go to dine with Mr. and Mrs. Parekh, Rishi Valley parents and hosts to Narayan, Prasad, etcetera. Radha, Achyut, Pama, Sunanda, and Frances were there. I came back directly afterward. K was in bed reading and feeling all right. That vast energy that is in him is beyond explaining.

On January twenty-ninth, there was an all-morning KFI trustee meeting to which I was invited. K had a letter from Jean-Michel Maroger saying that Diane had fallen down a stone staircase at school in Blois and broken her left femur, a clean fracture. As this was a shorter leg, there was hope that because of the fracture it might be made equal in length.

It seemed extraordinary that no other bones were broken in such a fall. Could it be that K's healing had made the child stronger?

January thirtieth. Devi took me on last-minute shopping for presents. We lunched with the Chandmals, and later, after a nap, went for the afternoon walk on the racecourse. K's voice was getting hoarse, the racecourse was windy, but he wanted to walk anyway. On our return I learned that in the morning he had told the KFI board that he would give six talks in Bombay the following year, instead of four, and would stay in India into February. I asked why as many talks in Bombay as the whole of the U.S.? I tallied the talks and discussions with schools and groups in India (thirty-seven) and said I was not asking for an equal number in the U.S. but two less in Bombay. K said, "We'll see," which was evasive, so I appealed to Pupul to cut the program for his well-being.

January thirty-first. I went with Nandini, Sunanda, and Frances to Bal Anand, Nandini's school for small and very poor children. Rajesh took me to the nearby home of two of them—a room about twelve feet square where twelve people lived. It was so dark I could scarcely see. A woman was washing clothes on the pavement under a water spigot. The mother and father made signs of welcome; they had offered Rajesh food. At 6:15, Krishnaji gave his fourth Bombay talk, and again the crowd was immense and surrounded him afterward. With some, there was a delicacy and reverence in touching him, not grabbing his hands, but touching them quickly and lightly.

After the talk, I would have sooner been quiet, but after several postponements, there was a dinner for Nandini, Devi, and me at Mr. and Mrs. Tantia's. It was late; the younger daughter, Sudha, came for us with a car. They lived nearby in a large, dark flat. We dined at a long table with the men all on one side, i.e., Mr. Tantia, Gancham, and Vikram, and opposite Devi, Nandini, Mina (Gancham's wife), and me. Sudha and her mother were at the ends. Mrs. Tantia, whom K is treating, has emerged from being almost totally withdrawn to a semblance of normalcy. She looked somewhat like a ship in sail in her sari, had great, soulful eyes in which little seemed to be going on. Her daughters seemed more adult. Mr. Tantia was pleasant and chatty. They wanted to come to Brockwood and Saanen. I gave information but feared they envisaged being with K constantly, which might be disappointing.

February first. I packed and had a long conversation with Dr. Parchure, who reported his talk with Krishnaji in the morning. As his doctor, given the responsibility for K's health, he needed K to tell him whether he wished to do everything as fully as he wants and then "disappear," or did he wish to live a long time and conserve the body strength? If it was the latter, said Dr. P., the intelligence of the body was either not functioning or not being listened to. "Your body is giving you signs," but K pays no attention. The falling sick to minor infections here in India was a sign of a lowering of the bodily resistance. K wasn't giving it the necessary rest to build his strength. His feet were constantly swollen in India, another sign of lessened function. K was somewhat impatient with all this but listened. Dr. P. said he must have a day of total rest after each talk, no two-hour discussions at the breakfast table. He must have at least one meal a day in bed (feet up, not hanging down), and he must rest before traveling to a new place and also on arrival.

K's voice was hoarse, a sign he was overusing it. That day, he should have rested, but tides of people came to pay respects and say goodbye, bringing useless presents of huge boxes of dried fruit. In the afternoon, I found the mad German girl who had tried to force her way into Tannegg sitting in the dining room. I put her out. Mrs. Billimoria sent a mother with a son who wants to be a woman, and K talked to them both. Finally, they all left, and only Pupul and Nandini were at supper. K went to bed afterward, and so did I. I managed to sleep intermittently until midnight.

February second. Pama had taken the luggage, tickets, and our passports last night, so there was little to do but dress and be ready to leave the flat at 1 a.m. Asit drove K, me, Pupul, Nandini, and Vikram to the airport. A crowd was waiting to see K off—Achyut, Ahalya, Upasani, Frances, and many others. A VIP lounge was provided. Krishnaji was dressed in his Huntsman jacket and trousers, and I was back in slacks, sweater, and shoes and stockings—my native costume again. The flight was called but not for us. When the British Airways plane was loaded and ready to go, the signal came, and K, Pama, and I drove in a chauffeured car to the foot of the aircraft steps—very VIP. We didn't have the first row in first class but the second. Not quite so VIP!

The flight was to have been nonstop to London, but after three hours, we came down to refuel in Bahrain. K and I for exercise paced the length of the very well-kept air terminal. We had left Bombay at 3:20 a.m. and were due at Heathrow at 7 a.m., but it was 9:30 a.m.when we landed. We had to wrestle our seven bags—not a porter in sight. I went looking for a trolley, and in my absence K lifted six of the bags off the turntable. He then found a trolley and was annoyed when I wouldn't let him load and push it alone. Doris was waiting inside, and Dorothy and Ingrid were with the cars. They had brought overcoats for us. The cold air and wintry beauty of the countryside made my spirits soar. Snow and ice had kept cars from using the lane, but it had warmed and rained the day before, and the sun was out. There were only patches of snow, and a warm welcome at Brockwood. We both felt dazed from travel but there was a sense of coming home. Everything looked so clean; it was a luxury to drink water from the tap, to read news of the world, to eat simple food. It was a delight to be there. I slept in the afternoon after K had had lunch downstairs and then gone to bed. It was happiness to put his tray together for supper. Everyone is smiling, but, alas, Scott is ill in his cottage with hepatitis. He must have caught it in Damascus on his way back.

Section Eighteen

February third, 1979. It was lovely to wake up in Brockwood, to light a fire in the fireplace of my bedroom, exercise a little, then make a delicious breakfast of buttered toast, porridge, etcetera, and eat it slowly at the table in our little kitchen. The tall trees were bare and beautiful, and the sun came to spend the day, wiping away the silver frost that covered the fields at daylight. My whole organism felt different, somehow back to normal, the swelling and pain fading out of my leg and foot. The constant heat was a relentless physical attack in India, or was so for me. How narrow is the margin of health in these matters and obviously different for each body. K's swelling is leaving his foot. He thinks it is due to the carrot juice he now drinks. I think it is the absence of heat. He got up for lunch, after which he took a long nap, and then with Dorothy and the two dogs we walked up and down the driveway. The cold air felt as if it were cleansing my blood. I telephoned Filomena in Rome, and it was good to hear her voice. I also telephoned Vanda in Rome, and K spoke to her, too. Earlier, I had spoken to Phyl Fry. The sounds of friends' voices make one smile inside.

February fourth. Yesterday's sunshine went off behind clouds, but the day stayed dry. Mary and Joe drove down in mid-morning, and we talked at length. K joined us, and we went to lunch. Afterward we sat upstairs in the little kitchen over coffee, biscuits, and talk. After they left, K took his nap, and neither of us felt like going out for a walk.

The next day, Doris lent me her little car, and I went to Petersfield and caught the 9:20 a.m. train to London. There was a dustman's strike, but the English are tidy and pile their refuse neatly in black plastic bags. The city seemed otherwise normal and more relaxed and quiet at that wintry time of year. It had the gray air I remembered from the two winters Sam and I spent in London when I had the private pleasure of exploring the city in that misty vapor that seemed the breath of London.

This day I met Paul Anstee, who did the furnishing of the West Wing when we acquired Brockwood, and at Christie's we looked at a Japanese vase he had seen as lamp material I had asked him to find for Ojai. We had a sandwich in a basement place nearby, and went back to the auction, bid and bought the vase, and I brought it back to Brockwood in a shopping bag in time for the afternoon walk.

On February sixth, Jean-Michel and Marie-Bertrande Maroger arrived for two days. Mary Cadogan came to lunch. We talked to them all, and Krishnaji agreed to go to France sometime that year, probably in October, to do a video interview answering questions from French students. We discussed Indian matters with Mary Cadogan. At lunch, she described her meeting Rajagopal with her husband when they were in Ojai. He was the kindly old gentleman and spoke only well of K. All the rest of the day I packed, washed, ironed, and all was in order by bedtime.

On February seventh there was a foggy morning. I made our breakfast and was ready to leave early. The Marogers said goodbye as they were going to London before returning to France. Elinor Hawksley provided a shopping bag on wheels to carry the just-bought vase by hand to Ojai. Dorothy drove Krishnaji and me, and the Carneses followed with the luggage. We left at 11:30 a.m. and went past the cottage so Scott, isolated by hepatitis, could wave goodbye.

At Heathrow, we learned our flight at 1 p.m. was delayed due to fog preventing its landing. We sat in the TWA lounge reading and surviving on two cheese sandwiches until our flight came in at 3:30, and we took off an hour later. We had the two single seats in the nose that K likes, and he took the one on the left, which he prefers. We read newspapers, magazines, and thrillers all the ten-and-a-half-hour flight but also slept fitfully. We landed in Los Angeles at 9:30 a.m., but it took an hour to get our luggage and go through customs. Mark Lee was waiting with the school van and drove us along the coast road through Malibu. I was too numb from travel to feel the difference, if any, of not coming home to Malibu. Erna, Theo, Michael, and Ted were waiting to welcome K to Ojai. The house was filled with flowers, in exquisite readiness, Elfriede's doing. They left quite soon, and K, quite wide-awake, walked from room to room: "Do you feel the atmosphere? I'm glad you have a beautiful house to live in. It is more beautiful than Malibu. And you have a beautiful room to live in—what's that place we've just come from?—Brockwood." And so we had come back.

February tenth. At first K stayed in bed most of the time, and naps assailed us both in odd hours until inner clocks were adjusted. K said he had felt full of the atmosphere of the house almost to the point of fainting in bed yesterday. He said when he goes in the living room, it is so strong "it is like a temple: one goes very quietly." It is interesting that it is the living room—a new construction, unlike his bedroom and sitting room, which are the old cottage where he lived for so long. The living room is the new wing, built in 1976/77.

The next day, Krishnaji wanted to talk to Erna and Theo, and so we did, all morning, and in the afternoon we visited the new school buildings, which are handsome, larger, and better than visualized. The school classrooms are woven among the oak trees in a random way that can be added on to and don't look institutional. We saw the new vegetable garden and wandered through the Oak Grove. Jackie Kornfeld was urging K to speak in New York. I repeated what Dr. Parchure had said in Bombay about K's health, and K let us agree to say no.

On the thirteenth, I drove to Malibu and talked at length to Amanda and Phil Dunne, a quiet joy to see them again after nine months. I then went across the canyon and saw what had been done to terrace the lawn space after the earth slippage. It looked nice but there were disquieting new cracks in the ground. Elfriede showed me fine-line cracks in the tile in the living room. It moved me to tears to see the much-loved house again, but it had been well cared for by Elfriede and Lorry, the gardener who was there, weeding along the entrance. The garden was healthy and tidy. It remains a blessed place no matter what geological strangeness was going on.

I left and went into town on errands and came back to Ojai through rain. It was dark, but K came out with an umbrella in his bathrobe and helped carry in the packages. He said there had been an interesting talk at lunch. My brother and his wife, Lisa, telephoned as I got in to wish me a happy birthday. K doesn't remember or consider birthdays, which is as it should be. Michael had left salad and soup, so we had our supper. During washing up in the kitchen, Krishnaji said he had become uneasy alone in the house when it became dark, had locked all the doors and windows. "I don't know what I was afraid of, but it was gone the moment you were here." Then, a little later, he stood suddenly still and said his head was bad, giving a cry: "What is happening? Why is it so bad?" I watched lest he faint as he returned to his room. He sat on the bed, several times appearing to start to faint, and then coming to. Then he was sick to his stomach several times, vomiting in the bathroom. "Is this going to start again? Why?" At one point he wanted to go back to the kitchen to finish the dishes to interrupt what was happening but was persuaded not to. He was able to do his teeth, wash, etcetera, and then went to bed promising to call me if it got worse.

February fourteenth. K's head was bad all day. He got up for lunch and later walked with Erna and Theo. Lou Blau rang to tell me of an offer on the Malibu house. He will make a counter offer. K's head was too bad for him to get up in the evening. He watched television, looking tired and in pain. He said it had not been as bad in years.

February seventeenth. K's head was better, though pain was still in the background. It subsided when he was doing something and returned when he was quiet. But in the morning he suggested starting a new series in his Letters to the Schools, so he went to it, dictating to me letter number 25, which would be sent out next September first. He had completed the twenty-fourth, capping off a year's supply, before we left Brockwood for India in October.

New teachers and the Hookers were at lunch at Arya Vihara. After an afternoon nap, we walked down to the Lilliefelts'. K had said to me, "We should see more of them and gossip together." So we took them the pot of soup Michael delivered every evening, and had a pleasant supper there. Conversation got onto the TS and the ES (Esoteric Section) and what the young Krishnamurti had thought—Masters or not, etcetera. K said of his memory that he chiefly did not remember things about himself. He did remember and corrected Erna on where people were living in the TS headquarters but said that wasn't about himself. He repeated the one vague memory he described in India of standing by the Adyar River, "utterly empty and having a good time." I asked if he could directly remember Dr. Besant, and he said he could a little, but only in her latter years.

On February eighteenth, K was dictating Letters to the Schools number 26 when the doorbell rang and there was the Russian physics teacher, whom Vanda brought to the Rome airport to meet K as we were in transit to New Delhi in October. His name was Alexander Ledigenski. I telephoned Theo, who came right over and talked to him in Russian until we all met for lunch at Arya Vihara. He sat next to K, who questioned him about Russia. Afterward, Fritz Wilhelm took him to find lodging and introduce him to other Russians.

On the twentieth, a Mr. G. N. Dalal from Bombay, who had been here for two days, left, and Professor Ravi Ravindra and his Canadian wife, Sally, who had once taught at Rajghat, arrived at the Lilliefelts'. They had been shown around, and we all lunched at Arya Vihara. Fritz taped a discussion at the table on what was meant by "knowing." After K had his nap, everyone went for a walk around the block. The Ravindras were to leave the next morning to return to Halifax, where he teaches and where they live with their two children.

On February twenty-fifth, Krishnaji lunched with the Lilliefelts and spent the afternoon looking at the school buildings and walking all over the land there. I had left after breakfast for Malibu and the Dunnes'. We spent a happy morning sitting on the terrace and talking, then had a lunch of toasted cheese sandwiches, which Amanda said I had taught her to make years ago in Los Angeles. Malibu was beautiful, the sky and ocean quietly blue in a clear, golden air. Across the canyon, the place was green and silent. It was a very happy day. I left at 3 p.m., marketed, and was making soup for our supper when K returned from his afternoon with the Lilliefelts.

On the next day, there was the last eclipse of the sun this century around 8 in the morning. The garden was in a curious twilight. From the kitchen window, I saw Krishnaji in bare feet and only his nightshirt out on the path. "I wanted to see the eclipse!" I persuaded him into warmth and a denatured but closer view on television. Later in the morning, he talked alone with the Siddoo sisters, who had arrived the night before. In the afternoon they, K, the Lilliefelts, Mark, Fritz, and I discussed the problems of Canada and the Wolf Lake School. It was costing them a great deal of their own funds, just as it was then, with only twelve students, and unless they spent millions more on land and building, it could not expand on the present site; exactly what I had foreseen—and how annoying such foresight is and what had happened. They had no idea what a school entailed. In summing up the situation, K said he was not urging them to do anything, but his descriptions of "If you are serious you will ask what is right, not the cost" carry an overwhelming pressure. He was impatient when I pointed this out, and he denied it was pressure, then gave the example of his telling Narayan to be willing to give his whole life to Rishi Valley "or never mind, die, starve, it doesn't matter." The Siddoos said they could afford to carry on, but if they then fold they will be impoverished.

During the next few days, K held discussions with parents of Oak Grove, and we went to Santa Barbara the inland way, where K was pleased at the fullness of water in Lake Casitas. The Siddoos left, still wanting to do something about their school. Louis Blau telephoned me that I need to "do something" about improving the condition of the earth on the ocean side of the Malibu house. But how?

On March seventh, I went to Malibu and met a geologist, Richard Ramirez, about the earth movement. He said there were two remedies: a huge earth removal to ease the weight, or draining underground water via pipes similar but more extensive to what had been done before. He said he would draw up plans and get a rig to do it. The county had plans to do something, but it might take three years. My needs were immediate. He left. The house was quiet, beautiful, and alive. Its familiar sounds: one's foot on the steps down to the bedrooms, door sounds, wound around my heart. Fred, Elfriede's husband, was there, and together they lifted one of the ocean stones in the garden into the car, and I brought it back to Ojai, meeting K walking with the Lilliefelts.

The next day there was a KFA trustee meeting, all about finances, so K stayed in bed. We continued in the afternoon. Professor Ravi Ravindra arrived from Halifax. K had asked him to come back, as he wanted to talk to him about being involved in the work somehow. He hadn't said what he had in mind and threw it back to the Lilliefelts and me—what did we think he could do? K talked to Ravindra alone.

I talked to Louis Blau about having Ramirez go ahead with a geologic plan, and so the house was temporarily taken off the market.

On March ninth, Krishnaji, Ravindra, and I had breakfast in the kitchen; then K said they would continue talking in the living room. I lit the fireplace in the living room for the first time since we moved here; and when K came in and saw it, his face lit up with pleased surprise, which is my pleasure to see. Around 11, he called the Lilliefelts and me to join the conversation, and while we talked, he stood, thumbing Mary Lutyens's biography with the familiar look of an abstracted child. At 4 p.m. there was a K, teachers, and parents discussion, and afterward we went for the walk.

The next day, Ravindra had breakfast here. I did not think he was interested sufficiently to change his life and join us in Ojai, and he left after lunch for England but agreed to K's suggestion that he might become a trustee of the Canadian K Foundation, since he lived in Halifax. This would come as a surprise to the Siddoos. He said he would "help" in finding scientists to discuss with Krishnaji. He was to visit Brockwood on his present trip to England and would speak to David Bohm, whom he knew slightly. K said, "We don't want to lose you."

March thirteenth had both of us, without breakfast, going to our doctor, Lailee Bakhtiar, to give fasting blood samples for our annual checkups. K had a slight earache, and she gave him a prescription for drops. When I asked him on the way home how the ear felt, he said, "Better, I think the antibiotic scares it." After the blood giving, we had the prescribed breakfast at Lindberg's, which was acceptably quiet, and spent the required two-hour interval before the second blood sampling shopping for books. When all was done, we drove to Malibu to meet the geologist, who said there was a need to drill four or five wells in the lawn to pump out the water. I told him to proceed. It seemed as if everything had gone wrong there since we left the house. After stopping to see the Dunnes, we returned to Ojai, Krishnaji driving and looking pleased and at home behind the wheel. In spite of the long day, he said he wasn't tired. The outing may have diverted him.

On March fourteenth, there was political good news from Israel and Egypt agreeing to peace proposals at last. It seemed that President Carter deserved immense credit for having gone all out to bring this about.

I took K to the Oak Grove School, where he talked with the children, and meanwhile I fetched Mar de Manziarly, who is staying with her sister for a month, to join Erna and Theo and us for lunch. There were a number of telephone calls about the necessary drilling in Malibu. The next day, Elfriede telephoned that the geologist, Mr. Ramirez, said that rain was coming and the lawn needed to be covered by plastic. She wanted my permission to go to the hardware store to get this, and luckily she and Lorry, the gardener, were able to spread it in time. Meanwhile, in Ojai, Krishnaji talked again with the children at the school, and it was photographed by Michael Mendizza. At lunch at Arya Vihara, there was a Jerry Dunn who interviewed K for a Santa Barbara magazine.

On the sixteenth, Dr. Rahula and Professor Jacques Maquet, head of anthropology at UCLA, and his wife came to lunch, and afterward there was a taped discussion.

On March twentieth, K and I drove to Malibu, where Elfriede served us lunch. Philippa Dunne came over to say goodbye before returning to Connecticut. I watched her walk up the path as she and her sisters had done all their lives. We left and went to Dr. Bakhtiar, where both of us had the completion of our medical annual checkups. K's blood pressure was 130/80, cholesterol 190, uric acid 7 (it was 10 the year before), blood sugar 90 fasting, and 110 after food. His blood count was fine and so was his EKG. The only question was a stomachache which occurred at times. When he showed Lailee where he felt the pain, she said it was the gall bladder area and suggested an upper gastrointestinal X-ray. This he resisted, saying the barium swallowing would make him sick. We were finished by 4, but K wanted to do some shopping for jeans and another track suit to wear while doing his morning exercises. We came back to Ojai along the beach, with K driving his usual stretch. It had been a rather strenuous day, but he said he wasn't at all tired.

In the days ahead, the Bohms arrived; K and David resumed their discussions with some participation by a group from San Francisco selected by Fritz. There were seven of these meetings. And considerable rain kept falling in Malibu. But April first was a beautiful, clear day, both warm and cool, clean and shining. K had planned to come with me to Malibu. He wanted to wander around the place while I went across the canyon to see Miranda, who had just arrived, but the night before he had felt tired, as well he might after the past week of group discussion with people who contributed little, so he stayed home, lunched with the Lilliefelts and Bohms, and talked with them until 4 p.m. Meanwhile I drove sedately in the green Mercedes, as I had been feeling poorly, and also didn't have a full fuel tank. Due to the gas shortage, many gas stations were closed on Sundays, but a hunch that I would find one in Oxnard enabled me to fill up, and I went on to Malibu.

Though I hadn't seen Miranda in almost two years, it seemed no time to either of us. We sat on the terrace and talked of her life as a news reporter at a television station in Buffalo, New York, where she had been investigating the chemical dumping in the local Love Canal, which disastrously affected people living there. I sat with Amanda and Phil for a while, and then went over to look at the earth situation. Elfriede's husband, Fred, was trying to siphon the previous week's rain out of the plastic sheeting. The cracks in the earth were deeper and wider, and nothing had stabilized, though a week had passed since more drainage pipes had been put in to carry the water to the bottom of the canyon. In spite of this, Malibu was at its loveliest, the hillside covered with wild daisies and nasturtiums blown down from seeds we had planted years ago. The ocean and air were shining and, but for the earth cracks, it was all peace and beauty, a quiet beckoning to stay in a trance of light and spring on this deceptively lovely edge of the continent. Instead, I left, bought food we needed, and drove back to Ojai. K had discussed the Fritz situation with the Lilliefelts and the Bohms. It was not yet clear. I made soup and artichokes for our supper.

On April seventh Krishnaji gave his opening Ojai talk in the Oak Grove. Though it was cloudy, no rain fell, so for the first time in two years he was able to speak there. He looked quite splendid. He consulted me on what he should wear, and I urged his heavy mustard-colored Huntsman corduroy trousers with a cream Indian cotton shirt and taupe cardigan; all very becoming. Age vanishes, his face unlined. He began his talk differently, speaking of goodness, what it is not, why man doesn't have it, how no system, belief, etcetera will bring it about; how only in understanding oneself can a different dimension come about and man can go beyond. He spoke quietly, with that depth of voice that usually comes toward the ends of his talks, but that day it was there from the start. A large audience, in spite of the gas shortage, came and listened intently. I sat on the ground where I must have sat years ago when I first heard him. His presence, his voice, the atmosphere of the Grove made me feel my life had begun there all those years ago—was it thirty-five?—on that day. Later my life became close to his. I cannot say how it came about; it happened. I did not imagine it, seek it; it happened, and I have been blessed beyond describing. On the way back in the car, he said, "I was so filled with that I was trembling." And coming through the village, he said, "Drive slowly, I want to faint." He bent slowly forward but didn't quite faint. He was all right when we reached the house. Alan Kishbaugh lunched with us. I had cooked early the first lunch since we returned from India. It was pleasant to be cooking again; it is part of the itinerary of home. Later, we walked with Erna, Theo, and Alan.

The second talk in the Oak Grove was on April eighth. He stopped neatly after an hour, and ours was the first car to leave. We came back on the winding quieter roads, and K said, "The minute I stop talking my head begins." He looked close to fainting but didn't. I had made lunch earlier, and again the Lilliefelts and Alan ate with us. Though tired, we walked, but on the way he felt sick to his stomach and said he had eaten too much. At the Lilliefelts, he took some bicarbonate of soda, vomited, and felt better. Only a little vegetable juice for supper.

K's third Ojai talk was to a large crowd in the Grove on April fourteenth. I sat on the ground up the hill, and could hear as perfectly as if I were a yard away. The beauty of the trees, the fresh grass, air alive with ripening summer, and something blessed in that Grove was the substance from which his words emerged. We drove back slowly and, as usual, he lay down to rest while I finished cooking our lunch. For the first time, Alan Kishbaugh brought a friend, Stella Resnick, a psychologist. K talked to her a little about what she does. At 4 p.m., some of the South American members of KFL came by. In the evening, on television we watched a film of Virginia McKenna and Bill Travers about the young lion we had seen at their place in Sussex.

April fifteenth was Easter Sunday, and K gave his fourth talk in the Grove on another perfect spring day. Lakshmi Shankar and her entourage were to have arrived for the talk, and Evelyne had arranged for her to fly back from her singing engagements in Chicago to sing in Ojai at a benefit for the Oak Grove School. After the talk, Krishnaji seemed close to fainting in the car but didn't actually faint. He lay down at the house while I completed cooking. Erna, Theo, Alan, and Stella Resnick lunched with us, but Theo had to go off to cope with Lakshmi Shankar, who had gone to Rajagopal's by mistake. Mark brought her, her daughter, and son-in-law, an older man who played tabla, and his wife, here to greet K briefly. They touched his feet, and we all sat for a while before Mark took them to Evelyne's cottage to freshen up. K and I drove to the Oak Grove pavilion, where at 4 o'clock Lakshmi sang most beautifully to Krishnaji and an audience that had donated to the school. Refreshments were served afterward under the trees, and K stayed until Lakshmi had left. She seemed a nice woman. She sang shlokas and bajans that she knew K would like.

On April seventeenth, Krishnaji held a third public discussion in the Oak Grove. Michael Mendizza photographed it and had David Moody ask, "What is the relation between love and freedom?" and to this K added "responsibility." Walking out, K passed Austin Bee, who was standing behind the cassette stand. K stopped and asked, "Who are you, sir?" Bee gave his name, and K shook hands with him. When I reached the car, a figure was standing in the shade behind it. At first glance, I didn't see who it was, and then, as I opened the door, I saw it was Rajagopal, rather shrunken, face more wizened and monkey-like. He stared at me, and I said, "How do you do, Rajagopal," but didn't go to him. K was approaching, and before he reached the car he greeted a Frenchman who was waiting to salute him. K then went to the side of the car, saw Rajagopal, but didn't recognize him. "Who are you?"

"I'm Rajagopal." He gave K a package. "This is for you."

K took his hand and held it, and then R said he must go, people were watching. He walked up the road, and K stood looking shocked and disoriented as he sometimes does after a talk. He had sent word to Blackburn to speak to him, but now told him to go to the cottage. He got into the car and urged me to drive away quickly. He looked at this hand, which had some sort of a scent that R used, and it disgusted K. "What is the matter with my hand? It is not my hand." He held it out the window and said several times, "It is not my hand. It has touched something unclean. That man is evil!" He held it without touching anything as he did in Bombay when the mob had soiled his hands. Both Blackburns were waiting when we reached the house. Krishnaji asked them to wait and we went into the laundry, where he washed his hands thoroughly. He then spoke to Blackburn and asked him not to use his name when giving talks.

At lunch, with Erna, Theo, Alan, and Michael there, he dictated a letter to Rajagopal suggesting they talk things over. Only then did he open the package, which turned out to be a quartz wristwatch. “He knows I don’t wear a wristwatch. I will give it to Narayan.” He felt clean again after washing, and later we took a walk.

The next morning, while I was out, Rajagopal telephoned and called again during lunch, and when I answered he said he just wanted to point out that instructions for using a quartz watch were in the box. I asked him if he wished to speak to Krishnaji after lunch. He said no. I asked him if he had received K’s letter. He said, “What letter?” I said that it had been posted the day before, and if he hadn’t received it, it was probably in his letterbox. K made me rest after lunch. He claimed I was overtired, and this seemed to irritate him. Later, he said I made gestures and faces. Possibly I did, but his irritability seemed to me a sign of his own fatigue as well.

April nineteenth was another beautiful day for K’s fourth public discussion in the Grove. It lasted for an hour and a half. After a quiet lunch, forty people came later to a tea, mostly for people who had come from a distance for the talks—from Canada, New York, South America. A letter came from Rajagopal, or rather an envelope addressed to me, but with JK initialed under my name. It was a brochure about the watch.

April twenty-first. K said I was still moving my hands and mouth unnecessarily, and he was determined to stop it. He sat opposite me on the floor and was absolutely still for some minutes. He said Brahmin boys used to be taught this. I found it very easy. At 11:30, he gave his fifth Ojai talk in the Oak Grove. We had lunch alone at home. He napped briefly, and at 4 p.m. we went to a formal dedication of the Oak Grove School buildings. We went through the main house with Mark and architect, Mr. Gammel. Then, with a large crowd looking on and helping, K planted a sizable fig tree, a kind that becomes enormous: ficus macrophilla. Next, with architect Zelma Wilson and builder Max Falk, K went through the school classrooms building. K wanted and designated where a wooden fence should be put around the Oak Grove itself. He said he would make a statement for posterity that this part of the land must not be built upon or used for purposes other than quiet, serious ones, etcetera. We came back and showed Mr. Gammel and colleagues Pine Cottage.

The next day, April twenty-second, K gave his sixth talk in the Oak Grove and completed the year’s series. A very beautiful talk. Mrs. Vigeveno was standing behind the car when I came out. I went up to her and asked her how she was. She said she wanted to greet K and give him a note from Rajagopal, which said that he, Rajagopal, knew of nothing that needed to be settled between them but wanted to see K “once more.”

At 4 p.m., there was a trustee meeting, mostly to discuss Fritz Wilhelm and the adult center. Present were K, Erna and Theo, Ruth Tettemer, Alan Kishbaugh, Mark Lee, David Bohm, and me. K was uneasy about Fritz, had had no contact with him, feared it was all intellectual with him, that he might be serious about the teachings but has no passion in it. He suggested that Margrete, his wife, had lessened the spirit for it that Fritz seemed to have had when he joined us. The next day, K had an hour of talk with Fritz. I went to the first meeting in the main house at the school where parents and staff talked with the Brockwood people who were there.

On April twenty-fourth, Krishnaji dictated letters, including one to Rajagopal saying he was sorry that R had again closed a door between them; that K had wanted to talk over, among other matters, the archives, which were his and not R's. He said the door was always open "wherever I am."

Dr. Balasundaram had arrived in Ojai for the last two talks and was staying with Colonel Noyes. Mark Lee had invited him to lunch at Arya Vihara. Krishnaji had another talk with Fritz on the twenty-fifth.

The next day, during lunch, Rajagopal telephoned me to ask what K was doing "during the next few days; when was he leaving?" I told him he was leaving on May fifteenth. "I hope I will see you," said Rajagopal, and he hung up. In the afternoon, K held a discussion mostly with David Bohm, but trustees and Oak Grove school staff were present, and some joined in. A question was whether separateness was caused by desire.

On April twenty-seventh, Krishnaji asked Erna and Theo to come after breakfast to talk about the Fritz Wilhelm question. He felt strongly that it was not going to work out, that Fritz didn't have a feeling "for all this," had no communication with him, and that it was all talk. We questioned the whole adult center activity.

On the twenty-eighth, there was a trustee meeting, which K attended, and so did Mark Lee, Fritz, and Margrete. Arya Vihara was discussed, who was to live there and what activities would take place. When Mark and his wife, Asha, would move to the Oak Grove School, Fritz and his wife would move into the upstairs flat. Michael Krohnen would remain where he was; the west room would become a library for Krishnamurti books to be available for visitors; the east room would be for listening to tapes, and the center room would become a quiet room. There was talk of the need for a certain atmosphere. Also K raised the question of deciding whether visitors or teachers could share rooms with unmarried partners, and it was decided they could not. Then it was decided that only permanent residents, i.e., Fritz, Margrete, and Michael, could live there except for times when Krishnamurti talks were on and there would be visitors from other K Foundations. Fritz and Margrete agreed to all this, but perhaps too readily. Later K was full of doubts about them, and increasingly felt Fritz did not understand the teachings and saw it all only intellectually.

The next day, April twenty-ninth, K asked Erna and Theo to come after breakfast to talk about the Fritz situation. He felt strongly that it was not going to work out, that Fritz did not have a feeling for it, had no communication with him, that it was all talk. Erna and I felt we should let Fritz and Margrete have a try. Theo was more pessimistic. Fritz and Margrete were not at lunch, and walking back from Arya Vihara, David Bohm told K in confidence that Fritz was quite upset and, though Fritz didn't say so, Dave felt they may want to leave. K told this to Erna and Theo, so that we could consider what to do if they were to leave. At 4 p.m., K held a discussion with Dave, the rest of us, and Oak Grove teachers—a continuation of the subject "Is thought based on desire? Is there an action not based on this?"

May first. Each morning K would sit opposite me on the floor to teach me to be still, not move my hands and face unnecessarily. Then he did a vigorous massage of neck and back to help circulation in my leg and avoid headaches. Sometimes he joked with me when I thanked him. “I must help my benefactress.” This particular morning, he said, “I wouldn’t do it if I didn’t care about you. Remember that.” Pause. Then, “Well, I guess I would, but you know what I mean.”

Evelyne and the Mendizzas were at lunch, and at 4 p.m., K and I joined them at the school where K was filmed walking in the Oak Grove. He was bored with so much filming, but luckily this was the final chore of it for him, though it took almost two hours. A note came for K from Rajagopal containing a sentimental poem on friendship with two blue lines underneath that this was what he would feel all his life “and afterward.” K was so disgusted he barely glanced at it. It was one of those “Friendship is when…” etcetera cards. Temptation to reply “friendship isn’t when one steals” was resisted. Balasundaram had come the day before to talk to K for an hour. He had seen Rajagopal and said he had urged him to return the archives and be friendly before he dies. He said Rajagopal refused to discuss the archives, was keeping things to defend himself “in case they attack me” and said “they are hoping for my demise.” Balasundaram himself headed off Krishnaji’s asking him for the return of the Rishi Valley tapes that he had taken when he left by weeping and saying that K and his teachings meant everything to him.

On May third Krishnaji talked to Fritz and then was joined by Margrete, Mark Lee, Erna, Theo, and me, and we talked anew about the adult center and use of Arya Vihara. There was a different atmosphere and more constructive talk. K “really worked,” he said, at getting through to Fritz, and everything seemed better.

The next day we learned the British elections had resulted in a defeat for Labour and win for the Conservatives, with Margaret Thatcher becoming prime minister. K took a dim view. In mid-morning, we went with Erna and Theo to Santa Barbara where, in less than five minutes at the IRS office, we got K’s tax clearance, which he needed as a resident each time he left the country. We drove back along the beach and then through the mountains, passing Lake Casitas.

At lunch, K asked what each of us would do if we had lots of money, “something extravagant!”? None of us could come up with a sufficiently frivolous answer; good works were out. K, laughing, said, “I would probably keep buying the newest Mercedes, not going anywhere, just washing it every week.” I thought I might keep Rajagopal tied up in law courts until he handed over everything and did penance.

We queued up for gas in Ojai behind about ten cars. The shortage was beginning to tie up California. At the house, Balasundaram telephoned to say goodbye and that Rajagopal had rung him six times the night before, asking if we had sent him as an emissary.

I was to go to Malibu the next day for the start of earth moving on my hill, and K wanted to come. He wanted to drive his green car but had been shy to do it the day before with the Lilliefelts, as “they might worry.” I had to skip lunch to go to the bank for a cashier’s check for the county engineer as surety for pilings to be put in the "toe" of the hillside in Malibu. Amanda and Phil Dunne came in the afternoon, and we spent a pleasant time talking. Phil took the check to deliver to the county office in Malibu for me. All this had become an unending problem.

May fifth. We left the next morning in the green car, with Krishnaji driving the part he liked from the poplar trees on the Pacific Coast Highway. We went right to the Dunnes' and walked down into the canyon, where I discussed and signed an agreement to move earth. I came back up to the Dunnes' terrace, where we ate with Amanda and Phil the rice salad and fruit we had brought. K was amused by a newspaper article Phil read about the antics of California's "Governor Moonbeam." We watched the Kentucky Derby on television, won by Spectacular Bid, and then went over to our side of the canyon and looked at the deterioration of the earth. In some places the cracks were eight to ten feet wide and five feet deep. It was hard to know how to cope with it until the slippage stopped. Except for the disaster area, the place looked beautiful. The roses were in full bloom. We gathered an armload and drove back to Ojai, Krishnaji again at the wheel for the first part. "May I talk seriously?" he asked as we were a way's up the quiet, empty road. "Because I care for you, I could never leave you. That could never change. There is something sacred in it. People don't understand this." He was thinking about what he would say the next day in discussion with staff on the business of relationship. He had been sorting out in conversation the differences in the seriousness of relationship.

In the afternoon of May sixth, there was a discussion with staff, which was a continuation of the meeting a week earlier, an examination of relationship in which there is no self. Afterward, Theo brought K five little silver boxes, gilded inside, and put in each tiny pieces of jewels. This was Theo's gift and project, and he was very intense about it. We sat around the table as he arranged it all before K, then K stayed alone with them for about five minutes, and did whatever he does, while we sat in the living room. K closed the boxes, then called us back, and the boxes were put in a bag, which K would keep on his person for some days. Later, a box was to go in the school building in some secret place, and one in the Oak Grove; the others to be kept for the future. There was, of course, one in Pine Cottage, put in the foundation by Theo when it was being built, and one was similarly put in the main house of the school. This is an ancient Indian notion of bringing a certain atmosphere, a religious quality, to a place. K joked about it lightly but it was his idea to do it, eagerly accepted by Theo as his task.

On May ninth K dictated letters, including one to Rajagopal replying to the clipping R had sent him on friendship. Alain Naudé telephoned that he had had to turn back from driving to Ojai for lack of gas. He had just received his U.S. citizenship.

Later in the day, K received another letter from Rajagopal, and had me telephone him to refute his accusation that KF India had published a collective works "in complete violation of the letter and spirit of the settlement"; also his statement that he had not removed anything from the archives. Ensued an interminable, impossible conversation. Points made included that KFI had not published any collected works, that the only collected works I knew of were by Chetana, the publisher in Bombay. I had met its head in Bombay and asked him if he were publishing with Rajagopal's permission, and he said he had done it "up to a point." R didn't pursue this, and said, "Never mind about it." I then spoke about his denial of having removed archives; did that mean he was restoring the missing material? He replied, "All the letters that you and others have been claiming do not belong to the archives. Everything that belongs to the archives is there." He said the archives were not defined. I said that, on the contrary, they were spelled out in the settlement agreement. He denied that the letters, the material sent by Jinarajadasa for K, belonged to the archives. He replied that if there were anything specific that K wanted to see, he should list such things specifically, and he would make a copy. He denied that he had withheld part of Pupul's account of events in Ootacamund, even though Pupul had said much of it was missing in the copies he had given. R replied that if K wanted something he remembered, he would make a copy if it were there, but they must know exactly what it is, and it still may not be there. "I don't claim anything as mine, but everything that has been sent for the archives is already in the archives." I asked if, as he had once said, originals had been destroyed by him. He said, "I may have. If they are gone, I have not got them; I can't produce them. For the last fifty years I have been doing this work. What is the reason you question me now?" I said that he was not giving reasonable answers; if he had the manuscripts, was he willing for K to look at them? He replied, "He can see anything he wants in my house." He said there were only typewritten manuscripts not in Krishnaji's handwriting. I asked what had happened to the originals; they are the most valuable and precious part of any archive material. Rajagopal replied, "He can see whatever there is, but he must ask exactly what manuscript, not generally this or that. He must be specific. Whatever is not there cannot be produced. If you don't believe me, I'm sorry." I asked again about Pupul's statement, and he said, "Why should you accept her statement? She may have forgotten. Anyway, nothing can be done about it. I can't produce them. If you don't believe it, and he doesn't believe what I am telling him, it is too bad. I do not want to talk to him indirectly. There is no point in talking. For ten years I have been trying to talk to him not in connection with these things. I have been treated as someone who has done something wrong. I am not coming to him as a penitent. I am talking of that. It is not possible to divorce the work I am doing, to live completely isolated; there are things which are of concern to both of us." I said that we are all trying to find some way so that things can be sorted out in a friendly way and to establish an amicable relationship among us all.

The twelfth of May was Krishnamurti's birthday, though, as usual, he waved away any mention of it. It was a very hot day, but the adobe walls kept the new wing of the house comfortable. I did desk work, including a letter to Rajagopal putting on paper variously what I had said in our latest conversation.

On the fourteenth, K washed the gray Mercedes before it was put up on blocks in the garage for the summer, and the next day I finished packing when the telephone rang; it was Rajagopal, saying he was "verbally acknowledging" my letter. He also asked if K and I were going to New York. "I just wondered in case I want to telephone."

The next day, we left after lunch at Arya Vihara and drove with Mark to LAX, checked in, and I sat, guarding our hand luggage, while Krishnaji wandered with Mark to the window, looking out at our 747 aircraft. He noticed a crack near one of the doors. Pretty soon, it was noticed by some of the ground crew, and instead of loading and taking off at 5:30, we sat until 9 and left at 10 in a substitute airplane, which stopped to refuel in New York at 5 a.m. K and I walked around the airport for exercise, re-boarded, and flew on to arrive at Heathrow at 6 p.m.—a relatively quiet time there, and we quickly had our luggage and met Dorothy. It was 9 p.m. when we reached Brockwood, but it was still light. Students and staff were on the driveway to greet K. We had supper alone in our little kitchen. "How quiet it is," said K. And how green Brockwood was, though the spring had been cold and late. We went straight to bed and deeply to sleep.

CHAPTER 58

It was good to wake up in Brockwood. Though it was only a little after 4 a.m., I felt like getting up, and so unpacked, bathed, dressed, and all was in order before getting breakfast—a satisfaction. Krishnaji slept most of the morning but got up for lunch. Narayan was there, and so was Venkatachalam and Mrs. Premilla Rajan. Dr. Parchure arrived from Bombay in the evening. I talked to Mary L. She and Joe had just come back from Venice.

The next day, May eighteenth, 1979, I talked with Dr. Parchure at length. Later, Krishnaji, Dorothy, the dogs, and I walked across the fields. I felt again the wordless love for and beauty of that land. I went to a staff meeting at 5 p.m. and eased into Brockwood life as if it were an uninterrupted thread from Ojai which, of course, it was.

On May twentieth, K talked to the school in the morning. John McGreevy, who had done the Canadian Broadcasting film on K, and his colleague, Jennifer Pancher, came to talk and stayed to lunch. He had just done a series on cities of the world seen through the eyes of various people: Leningrad with Peter Ustinov, and a just-completed one on London with Jonathan Miller. McGreevy said Miller was going to do a series of his own and should talk to Krishnaji. At 6 p.m., the students performed Anouilh's Antigone in the Assembly Hall. Daphné Maroger played Antigone. K attended and stayed for all of it. He thought they were "very good." There was a Greek supper afterward. The whole school seemed happy and united.

On the twenty-fourth we had a London day where, after errands, we lunched with Mary L., and she told Krishnaji she would do a continuation of his biography after she finished a book about her grandfather, Lytton, when he was viceroy of India, then one on her father, and then do K's. She said she had figured out a way to do it without it being a whitewash of the troubles with Rajagopal. It would be on Krishnaji's teachings with much less personal material than the earlier one. K was pleased, and I felt a large sense of something good happening, for I had feared she might not want to continue. Joe had met us at Waterloo, and kindly came again after lunch to drive K to the dentist, and then drove us both back to Waterloo.

In the next few days, K spoke to the school, dictated more Letters to the Schools, and held a meeting with all the school—both students and staff, and discussed student exchanges between Brockwood and India with Dorothy, Narayan, Dr. Parchure, Venkataraman, Mrs. Rajan, Scott, Julie Desnick, and Kathy Harris.

Meanwhile, I spoke to Dr. Scheef in Bonn. We did not plan to go there that year, but he said he would send medications to Switzerland. There was another trip to London and the dentist, where some pus in K's gum was treated. We had lunch with Mary and Joe at their flat, and K talked to Mary about the biography and the question of what gives him insight. Was it the Maitreya theory, K's own development, or was it some other thing manifesting? K said he didn't know; had a feeling he shouldn't ask, but perhaps in going into it with Mary and me he could find an answer. Mary was eager to talk to him about these matters and planned to come to Brockwood in a few days.

On June first Radha Burnier arrived for a fortnight. Krishnaji still had some pain from all his dental treatments, but he was cheerful and laughing when he read in Time magazine that some called Mrs. Thatcher "Attila the Hen." That afternoon, he held a staff discussion on what is opinion.

The next day, Dorothy drove K, Radha Burnier, and me to London with a picnic hamper of lunch we intended to consume in the car in Hyde Park, but it was crowded, so we found a shady spot on a side street. After lunch, we went to an Indian film, highly recommended by Pupul: The Chess Players. On the way home, Krishnaji intently quizzed us "what has man done in these thousands of years?" Developed outwardly but not inwardly.

On June third the Marogers, with their daughter Diane, arrived. K spoke to the whole school at noon, and in the afternoon he treated Diane and then had a long talk with Jean-Michel, Marie-Bertrande, and me about Diane. Her bones were getting stronger, but she had not grown in height and her classmates in school were shooting up. It was becoming acute for Diane; she had talked to her sister, Ariane: "Will I marry and have children?" Marie-Bertrande was afraid she might become seriously depressed later on. K was very intense: "I would give my life to her, if I could." I had been silently thinking the same. K talked at first as if he were telling the parents what Diane was facing—something they had faced and worried over for years. He told them about Isabelle Mallet, who was disabled and fell in love with him. "I was too young to understand what she really wanted. I liked her, went to see her every day, but was too innocent then to understand." He spoke of a woman in Madras with a broken hip whom he saw, and she was cured. There was also Fresia, whose cardiac X-rays changed overnight. "What we need is a miracle," he said.

On the fourth, Mary L. and her daughter, Amanda, came at 11. K, Mary, and I sat in his room, and he talked about the biography—what kept him "vacant" as a boy? Either some power that wanted to manifest—the Maitreya theory, or something in the boy, an evolution through incarnations—(which K said let in superstition) or a power of goodness that entered the boy? "I've always felt protected," he said. "If I enter an airplane, it will not fall." But he kept asking the same question: How was it that the boy was vacant, and what kept him that way? We stopped while he got dressed, and Mary and I talked alone in the drawing room. After lunch, we resumed there, with K continuing the same enquiry. I took notes. Toward the end of the discussion, he said that perhaps he could not answer it, but perhaps Mary or I could, and if we did, he would know if it were right. He said the Maitreya, or reincarnation theories, were "suspect." It would mean that it was restricted to him and the teachings "are that all can achieve this, it's not worth it otherwise." In the evening he talked to Narayan, with Dr. Parchure and me present. K was concerned that Narayan might become authoritarian, set in his ways, as others had before him.

June seventh. K and I went to London, where Joe Links generously met K and drove us to Huntsman. We shopped for presents for Vanda—a beige jersey from Peal's, and bought some books at Hatchards. Then to Fortnum, where we lunched with Mary L. and Alain Naudé, who had just arrived from San Francisco. He was going to see Vanda in Florence and then see Dr. Kunzlie about a homeopathy book translation. It was a pleasant, talkative lunch, but K felt he had lost touch with Alain. "He has left us." I thought K meant the teachings as well as us, though on the surface we were friendly and had much to laugh and chat about. Joe, again the endlessly kind man, drove K and me to the dentist, Mr. Thompson, who removed the stitches from K's previous week's gum operation, and in fifteen minutes we were off to Waterloo station.

K continued to treat Diane each day. On June tenth he spoke to the school and Balasundaram arrived. He and Narayan had not spoken for some years or since Narayan took over the principalship of Rishi Valley from him. It seemed a good thing for them to be thrown together. K asked the Marogers to stay another three days. He told me that when he treats Diane, the room becomes "filled with something."

In subsequent days, K dictated more Letters to the Schools, talked to the school, and held videotaped conversations with teachers. Mary L. also came to discuss and talked to K about what she will write in the further biography, while I took notes. On June twenty-eighth he held a video-recorded conversation with Shakuntala, Scott Forbes, and me.

Then it was packing time again, and on July first we flew to Geneva and the Hotel des Bergues. We rang Vanda at Chalet Tannegg, where she and Fosca had just arrived. The next morning, we did the annual Geneva errands, and then in a rented Ford Fiesta drove off along the lake to Lausanne and so via Bulle up into the mountains to Gstaad and Chalet Tannegg.

K rested in the immediate days. Dr. Parchure arrived and came daily to supervise K's exercises. He brought saddening news of Verna Kruger at Brockwood, who has a malignancy, which was worsening. K wrote to her, as did I.

On July eighth Krishnaji gave his opening Saanen talk on "thinking together." Later that day, Dorothy, who was by this time in Saanen, rang Brockwood, and was told that the doctor had judged Verna having only days to live. Ingrid went up to give Verna messages from Dorothy and told her K's and my letters were on their way. She responded and then quietly died.

July tenth. Krishnaji gave his second Saanen talk. It was largely on "what is a good society?" He was bothered by hay fever. In the afternoon, he saw Diane, who was stronger and able to walk and stand without support. In spite of his having bronchitis the next day, he saw Diane and also Anneke Korndorffer. Dr. Parchure came in the evening and slept in the adjoining room.

On the twelfth, K had no fever, his voice was very hoarse, but he would not cancel his talk. His voice cleared somewhat. Diane fell from her cycle and fractured her upper right leg. Jean-Michel telephoned to say that she was in traction and they would stay there until she could be moved to their home in France.

On the thirteenth there was the annual meeting of all the Krishnamurti committees from different countries at Chalet Tannegg, at which K spoke about the role of the committees and on the prevention of interpretation. The meeting was continued in the afternoon without K but at Chalet Haldi. Jean-Michel came to look at the downstairs apartment in Chalet Tannegg for Diane and her mother. This he rented, and we provided a middle room where her traction bed could get through an exterior door. A van brought her in the bed, and Brockwood young men carried it carefully down, where it just fitted. K came down to see her. The next day he gave his fourth Saanen talk, and Dr. Dagmar Lichti lunched with us and Dr. Parchure.

On the sixteenth, the Siddoo sisters came to see K and he dismissed Sarjit Siddoo's notion on a monastic aspect of a school: celibacy was not required.

K gave his fifth Saanen talk on the seventeenth, and in the afternoon he was interviewed for Dutch radio. A letter from Erna gave news of a generous donation from Mrs. Essie Bates to start a school in Ojai, and a Mrs. Abravanel came to tell K she wanted to start a K school in Greece. Mar de Manziarly and Anneke came to lunch with K. Dr. P. was there too, and later Pascaline Mallet came to tea.

On July nineteenth, K gave his sixth Saanen talk. In it, he asked, "Can we discover a central fact that will answer all our problems?" and "Knowledge is part of ignorance because it is always incomplete." He spoke of observation, action, intelligence "from these come love, compassion. When there is compassion there is no pain, conflict, suffering."

Later, on the way to the tent for his seventh talk, he said, "What will I speak about?" And when he began, he asked, "Why are you so quiet?" and went on to speak about that, also what is one searching for, and that a healthy mind is a still mind.

The talks ended, but on July twenty-fifth the five daily discussions began in the tent. In the second one, K spoke on love, what it is and what it is not, and then on listening and what prevents listening. On the fifth and last meeting, a young Norwegian boy was loud and insulting, demanding that Krishnamurti "reveal his secret," something he supposedly withholds. It was ugly, but K held the meeting together and went on. So ended the year's Saanen meetings.

The next day, July thirtieth, Jackie Siddoo came to say goodbye to K, who told her not to hesitate to close the school in Canada if it didn't work out. The Marogers, who had been there in Saanen throughout the meetings, came to lunch. K had been seeing Diane each day, and an X-ray showed her leg was healing well.

On August fifth, a cloudless, shining morning, K "did" my foot and said it was less swollen. He ascribed it to my exercise the previous day, when I had climbed the Wasserngrat with the Marogers, and said I should walk more. I said yes. He responded, "You say yes—when?" So I went up the hill and into the woods, where it was so cold my hands were numb, and then in the sun I held them out and the sunlight warmed them.

At breakfast I had had a long talk with Dr. Parchure about K's health. He has low blood pressure, slow pulse; with age metabolism slows, and Dr. P. tries to keep K's body fit and stimulated through exercise without tiring him. K inclines to overdo, push his body; he was no longer a good judge of its capacities. He would seldom stop an exercise on his own. Dr. P. watches his face. If K glances at him, Dr. P. interprets it that he needs to call a halt. He explained to me what might cause Krishnaji's fainting; the vagus nerve controls the heartbeat. K's pressure and pulse being low—fatigue, shock, a trying atmosphere, etcetera—can cause insufficient blood to the brain and precipitates a state below consciousness and so unconsciousness. He spoke of the likely manner of K's death: he didn't feel it would be caused by disease or of a heart attack in a sudden seizure way but rather a slowing down of the body. He told me if K became unconscious with cold hands and feet, I should rub them to stimulate circulation, lest he slip away, but he thought K will know the time of his death and tell me, and then there should be no interference. During that day's massage, Dr. P. talked about some of these things and K brought it up at lunch. Dr. P. was able to get Krishnaji to see the problem of getting him to realize his own capabilities, to harbor his strength and energies.

We brought up the subject of the public discussions. K had come to think it was the unpleasantness in the tent on the last talk that had left him so tired, and he agreed that we should try the old way of having written questions from the audience and his answers rather than the recent "dialogues that don't work with a thousand people." We also brought up the "interpretation" problem—his having told trustees to speak had the danger of interpretations. I told him of my recent conversation with a man who seemed pleased when I cautioned him that I was speaking without any authority, and I could see him going off and saying that the people around K don't know what he is talking about. K laughed and said, "You can't win!" He went back to the health question and said he had always felt protected. Something—a "they"—was looking after him for the purpose of the teachings. He felt "they" would decide the time and manner of his death, and he would know it. He asked Dr. P. how the Buddha died—apparently of eating bad food, but who knows, really.

K slept in the afternoon and so did I. We went for a walk to the river, and after supper I read to him excerpts from Mar de Manziarly's diary, which she had given me for the archives. There were parts of letters from Nitya, one in which he spoke of tiring things—"And the most tiring of all is Theosophy"—and his descriptions of Leadbeater's boys in Australia: "They were all kings and saints in former lives, but now, unhappily, Australians." K's face lit up with laughter and youth. "It's strange I can't remember him," he said, but his laughter had a bright flash of recognition in it. "I wonder what he would have done if he had lived? But that is speculation, and we mustn't speculate." There is, for me, a feeling of sadness when I read about or think of Nitya, whom I never met, but for whom there is a sense of loss.

On August sixth, I taped K's replies to a letter from Pupul wanting to know about his "missing years"—the war years, 1939 to 1947, when he was in Ojai—what did he do, whom did he see, etcetera? She said he reappeared in India in 1947 "differently."

Vanda returned on August ninth, and on the tenth I flew to Rome to see Filomena, returning to Gstaad on the twelfth. On arriving at Tannegg, K was looking out his bathroom window, which looked out onto the driveway. "I knew you were coming; the Deva told me."

The thirteenth was a lovely morning, but I felt more like moving slowly than climbing the hill, so I started packing for our departure on the fifteenth. Dr. Parchure said he had talked some more to Krishnaji about looking after his health, and K had agreed to be mindful of draughts, etcetera and listen when I suggest covering his throat when he walked at Brockwood.

In the afternoon, I drove K to the village for a haircut, and we came back and walked to the river. He said, "I want to talk to you seriously. Please listen. You must outlive me. I am going to live a long time, and you must be well. I can't have another person look after me, so you must take care of yourself. I am looked after"—he pointed up—"by the clouds. You understand? You need to rest, to be alone. I see that is good for you; so when you go back to Ojai, you must arrange it and not be typing Foundation things, dealing with the everlasting letters. I will write to you but you mustn't have to deal with all the nonsensical letters people send. I will give those to Sunanda." I asked him if, apart from looking after him, was there another reason I should survive him? "I have no one else but you; I'm not being selfish." I asked, apart from that, was there something I must do when he is no longer alive? "Could be," he said. "Someone must see it doesn't go to pieces." We talked about the responsibility of Foundation members to talk or not talk, but he didn't make it any clearer. There shouldn't be a ban on talking, but there mustn't be interpretation of the teachings. Other people will, but Foundation members must not, but where is the line? He was critical of Pama Patwardhan for having spoken on a tour he and Sunanda had just made with the videos, because he felt Pama didn't understand the teachings. It was all right for Sunanda to have talked. Pupul wouldn't talk. But she was about to write a book. It will inevitably be seen as a book written by someone close to K and the Foundation: Where was the line in all this? He said he would go into it and had changed his mind about urging people to talk, but he seemed then to drop the subject.

Talking of Ojai, he said he wished we could find a little place we could get away to where no one would know where he was. Somewhere near the beach? Near Santa Barbara, perhaps.

The following day, August fourteenth, was the familiar packing. After lunch with Vanda and Dr. Parchure, then a bit of nap, we went for the last of that summer's walks to the end of the wood. He paused by the bench at the edge of the field, stared at the mountains, and said, "A l'année prochaine." The packing was finished, and we were ready to leave in the morning.

That morning was clear. We said goodbye to Vanda and Fosca, and left at 10 a.m. for Geneva, going via Les Mosses, Aigle, and the autoroute. We flew to London and had a lengthy wait in immigration amid crowded returning vacationers. Dorothy was there to meet us, and Jim in another car took the luggage. Brockwood was in deep summer beauty. We all had supper downstairs, and K wanted to take the Mercedes around the lanes a little to be sure the battery was charged. We both felt the good of being back.

The next day, Krishnaji, Dr. Parchure, and I took a morning train to London. Joe met us. Parchure went his way, and K came with me to the bank and to Culpepper for sundries, after which we lunched with Mary and Joe at Fortnum. It was good to be with them. Afterward, Joe took K to the dentist while I had a haircut, and then Joe drove us back to Waterloo.

The subsequent days were quiet. We did some weeding and pruning in the grove, K gave an interview to John Briggs for an article, the Digbys came to lunch and to discuss publications. There was another day in London for dentist reasons, and on our return Scott and Kathy arrived from the U.S., having just gotten married in Maine. Preparations for K's Brockwood talks kept the house busy, and by the twenty-fourth, there were 140 people at meals in Brockwood.

On August twenty-fifth, after his usual oil massage by Dr. P. before breakfast, Krishnaji gave the first of his 1979 Brockwood talks. After fruit and salad in the West Wing kitchen, we went back to the tent for another course, and I announced a change of discussion plans, asking for written questions, which would be given to K. We walked later with Dorothy, and I made yogurt in the evening.

The next day, the weather was better, and K gave his second Brockwood talk, a deeply moving one on "Senses have no past and knowledge is part of ignorance as it is always incomplete." Mary Links and Amanda were there, also the Hamish Thompsons, and John Briggs. K, Mary, Amanda, and I had coffee in our kitchen before a short walk at 5. Dr. Parchure had asked me to observe K's exercise, which K thinks is unnecessary.

On the twenty-seventh I did exercises with K. Later, he and I sorted the more than ninety questions that had been handed in for the discussions, and I typed the ones he chose. The news was full of an IRA bomb killing Lord Mountbatten and a grandson in a boat in Ireland.

The following day, K held that year's first Brockwood public discussion, using the new arrangement of his reading a question, answering it, and going on to the next one. He covered five that day, and it went very well.

On the twenty-ninth there was a KFT trustee meeting with K, Dorothy, David Bohm, the Digbys, Mary Cadogan, Dr. Parchure, and me. We went into what K wanted us to do about speaking on the teachings. The decision was to speak only out of one's own understanding, making it clear to others that it is only that. The Foundations are not spiritual organizations and have no spiritual authority.

K gave the third talk on September first, had no lunch, as his stomach was upset, but sat with Mary and Joe while we had coffee in the kitchen. At 2:30 p.m. there was a publications committee meeting at which it was decided not to publish at that time the rest of the K–Bohm dialogues but to make them available at centers for people to read on request. Tentatively, the next published book might be on questions and answers. K came in at 5 p.m. to take Dorothy and me away for a walk.

K's Brockwood talks were completed on the second, and on the fourth, Dorothy and I drove Dr. Parchure to Heathrow to fly to Bombay. On the fifth, the Mountbatten funeral was held in Westminster Abbey and broadcast on television. I watched it on K's set while he read a detective story in bed, now and then glancing at the screen and making caustic comments on how silly it all was. His objections to royalty were all he saw in it. I found it moving in the sense of something deep in the bones of British ways and feelings, splendidly expressed in a kind of language of form that is part of this country, a majesty of tradition in the squalid face of the evil of the murder and an affection for the man himself, a pageant of honor to an uncommon Englishman. K had no use for it but endured my watching with an occasional comment. We walked in the afternoon.

We went again to London on September sixth. Looking out the train window past office buildings, K shook his head: "I could never do that, I couldn't." What would you do? I asked. "I don't know," he replied. "Something else!"

I continued, "What if there were no choices? What if you were on the dole, or were a black eighteen-year-old unable to get any job?"

"I'd do something about it. I am a revolutionary."

Joe met us and dropped us at Huntsman. K fitted two trousers, we walked to Hatchards, then joined Mary L. for lunch at Fortnum. The second volume of the biography was discussed, the question of how he got to be the way he was. He said the choices were: 1) a biologic freak; 2) a medium; 3) a late maturing mind. He said that if he were writing, he would consider very carefully; or was it something else? He would be with the person and study him, question him. He (K) would discard the freak; the medium. He said he had matured very late, really when he was sixty-five! After that, he would never put up with what Rajagopal and Rosalind did. He would throw them out. Mary said that Rajagopal didn't realize how K had changed, and so attributes the problems to "wicked influences"—mine. Later, we walked to Truefitt, where K had his hair cut. I bought some coffee, and cheeses and chocolates for K, and Joe drove us back to Waterloo.

In the next few days, Krishnaji dictated more Letters to the Schools, we worked on rhododendrons in the Grove, and walked. On September eleventh, after the dictation, he told me that earlier in the morning he had been sitting very straight in bed, mind empty, and there came a feeling "as if something were pouring into my head. It lasted almost a minute and was not imagination." In the afternoon, we went for an earlier walk than usual, and then Dorothy, K, and I went out to dine at the Old House Hotel in Wickham, feeling very festive. I ordered our vegetarian fare ahead of time: we had an intricate salad, then a quiche of spinach and tomatoes, new potatoes, string beans from their garden, and for dessert K chose crème brûlée with amazing relish and no ill effects. We were back by 9:30. A fine evening.

On September thirteenth, Krishnaji began a seminar on "The world is becoming increasingly violent and disordered. What can we do as human beings to change it?" About eighty people took part. In the afternoon, K talked to David Bohm and me about Erna Lilliefelt's suggestion that K reconsider accepting the Templeton Award. He still felt it would be wrong to accept an award for teaching. He also talked at length about KFA's financial problems with the Oak Grove School. He continued the seminar each day, but on the seventeenth he changed the subject to "What happens when there is no sense of individuality? What is action without the actors?" That morning he had said a curious feeling came on him. "I felt like a young boy." The sixth seminar on September eighteenth completed it.

On the twenty-first he dictated a long letter to Erna about the Ojai school, work in the U.S.A., and his continued aversion to accepting the Templeton Award. We continued work on the rhododendrons. On the twenty-seventh Jean-Michel Maroger arrived with his daughter Daphné—she for the school and he to assist in a videoed discussion to be held the next day between K and Jean-Louis Dewez. It was a one-hour discussion in which the questions were in French and K replied mostly in English. Jean-Michel was to translate these for broadcasting in France. In the afternoon they did a second hour on education.

On September thirtieth, the Brockwood school term began, and K spoke on what it was all about, and the next day he spoke alone with the students. He did this again on October fourth. I went to staff meetings. On October seventh, K spoke to the whole school, and in the afternoon, when we walked with Whisper, he said, "How lucky we are to live in this beautiful place."

There were a couple of trips to London in the days ahead, dentist inspired for K, and on the sixteenth, Pama Patwardhan telephoned from Bangalore saying that K's Benares meeting was cancelled due to electricity and water shortages. Plans were for K to go to Madras and then to Rishi Valley.

On October nineteenth, Mary L. came for the weekend with us, and by 11 she, K, and I were seated around our kitchen table to go into questions Mary had for the second volume of the K biography, which she was to start when she had finished the Lutyens one on her father. I was reading her book The Lyttons in India, which had just been published. K talked to her and me on material for his biography, in particular that the teachings are for everyone. Mary went over many parts of his life, but one important clarification was K's explaining again that though he was perhaps born with a certain temperament, apparently egoless, free of most human's usual shortcomings, and though he went through the suffering of the "process," this didn't mean it had to be the same for others. Out of whatever he was, he had spoken, and if one understood it, a change could come about. There was much talk about the "emptiness" of the boy and why the adoration and all that went on didn't corrupt him. We tried to find out what he means by "no memory." It was clear that he had very little memory as we usually think of it, but he seemed to mean "no reaction" rather than a blank. He also remembered things in his life as a result of being told about them by someone else. In the evening, Mary and I talked at length. It was good to have her stay with us, and the next day K, she, and I met again on the biography questions. It was his language that was Theosophical in the early days, not his beliefs. Later, he found his own language. We lunched in the West Wing dining room and later walked across the fields. David Bohm arrived at suppertime. The next morning, we had one more conversation about K's life, and then Joe came and fetched Mary back to London.

We saw Mary again on October twenty-third when we lunched together in London at Fortnum. Mary brought it out strongly that if Radha Burnier remained both head of the Esoteric Section and a KFA trustee, especially at that point when Damodar Gardens and some of Besant Gardens were leased to KFI for a school, no one would believe that Krishnamurti was not connected to the TS. K said he would discuss it in India, and did not want this connection in any minds. I gave Mary the typed notes I had taken of K's and her conversation at Brockwood about the biography. It developed further in talk at lunch that, in Mary's view, Rosalind and Rajagopal didn't care if Krishnaji lived or died. K told a new anecdote I had not heard, that Rosalind had knocked him down the concrete steps in the patio at Arya Vihara and he was unconscious. It seemed there was no end to the ugliness to which he had been subjected.

Two days later he received a letter from Mary again strongly questioning Radha Burnier being a KFI trustee while she was also head of the ES. He did further dictation on Letters to the Schools.

On October twenty-sixth, K remained in bed, we lunched on trays, and then I drove in mist and rain to East Dean for tea with Phyl and Christopher Fry. Christopher came out to the car, welcoming and showing me changes in their garden, which was blooming with dahlias, snapdragons, and roses. Phyl, very dear as always, was perhaps a little more abstracted, but she remembers all sorts of details. It was her manner that sometimes made her seem to come from far away when she spoke. They had some new paintings to show me and planned to go to Vienna in the spring of 1981 for Christopher to direct The Lady's Not For Burning. As always, I felt deeply glad to be with them. Our once-in-a-while afternoons, having tea by the fire, meant very much to me.

I drove back carefully through the rain. Krishnaji had admonished me intently to drive carefully. He had seemed increasingly to want me on guard. “Do nothing unnecessary and be careful.” At 8 p.m. Mary Cadogan telephoned. She had been rung by Erna who, on her and Theo’s return from Canada, had received the text of a book of Krishnaji’s poems being brought out by Rajagopal. They were disturbed to find The Path (1924) included in spite of the settlement agreement statement that K didn’t want anything pre-1926 included in further editions; also there were “insane” changes of text—sequences and words. They wanted a protest letter from the publications committee if K agreed. He stood beside me as Mary Cadogan told me all this, and said he would absolutely not agree to any changes. Mary Cadogan telephoned this to Erna. In the meantime, it appeared that Rajagopal had learned from Clayton Carlson, editor at Harper’s, that Erna had seen the text and objected. Rajagopal said he had the right to edit. Erna said he had tampered, had no right to change words, etcetera. He said, “You are trying to frustrate me. We will have to see our solicitors.”

The following day, October twenty-seventh, Krishnaji dictated a letter to Rajagopal refusing permission to make any changes. He and I both talked to Mary Links about this and also about her letter to K on Radha Burnier’s trusteeship in KFI and position in the ES.

He said that morning that the past three weeks of rest had been remarkable. “Something extraordinary has been happening. I can’t describe it.” He said he must remember it and do it in the future. The doing his exercises in the morning, then spending all day in bed, including lunch on a tray, then getting up for a good walk, then back to bed, seemed to be the recipe. His reading, sleeping, watching television, seemed to let him relax and rest at a more thorough level. But he did say at one point that as soon as he really rests, his head starts the usual pain. However, his seeing and saying how good the rest was made me happy to the point of tears.

October twenty-eighth. There was frost on the lawn, and it was fifty-nine degrees in my room. I kept my electric heater in K’s bathroom to turn it on when I got up at 6 so it would be warm for his bath. In my own room I lit a little fire in the tiny fireplace. It was nice if you sat right in front of it, and K liked it when he came to me for help with two of his exercises. He would sit and I stretched his elbows over his head, also pull his arms straight up while pressing his back in with my knee.

I talked to Mary L., who suggested The Path might be acceptable to K as it was written in Ojai after his experiences began there. I fetched a copy from the archives and gave it to him. He thumbed a few pages and listened to my reading a letter in the biography that he had written to Lady Emily in 1922. Later, I read it all—a strange and beautiful outpouring. K agreed, and so did I, that it could be republished providing Rajagopal made no changes in any text. I rang Mary Cadogan to tell her this so she could tell Erna when the latter called. K lunched downstairs with the school. Summertime had ended that morning, so we walked at 4 p.m. across the fields. It was cold and became dark soon after we came back. The earth smelled of autumn, the grass in the fields was dry as hair; we heard the whistle of the steam-powered Watercress Express that went between Alton and Alresford. I began to pack.

K rested in bed the next day. We lunched on trays. Much of the morning went in telephone conversations with Mary L. about Rajagopal, The Path, etcetera. K revised his draft of his letter to Rajagopal, which I was to send to Erna and in which he said the agreement called for no changes in text and, that while The Path was written before 1926, he might consent to its republication providing no changes be made in any of his writings. Mary Cadogan had learned from Erna that R had revised The Path into poem format. Mary Links suggested that K appoint me to make decisions on these publications matters during his absence from the U.S. K then gave me a written letter of appointment.

The next day, October thirtieth, K had me make a note to do a Letters to the Schools when he returns on "When attention is profound, it includes everything." I suggested he do one on man's impulse to worship—what is it? It was a gray day, and though K's hoarseness had gone, it was better not to go out. He packed, I packed and went over things to be done by Edna Cleeve, the housekeeper, and kept packing, doing laundry, ironing, putting things in order until all was done by 10 p.m. K came in, as usual, before bedtime to put his hands on my head, and eyes—the delicate blessing of his touch. He went to sleep at 8:30.

The next day, I was up at 5 a.m., made our usual nettle tea, sterilized the dishes, as we had been doing each day, K did his exercises, and so did I, against the long hours of sitting in the sky; bathed, dressed, and had the bags ready by 7:30. I also packed two large cheddar cheeses for Krishnaji to take as presents; India then was not great on cheeses. We had our breakfast in the kitchen. He had been telling me I must be very careful, very attentive when I drive. I asked if he had a feeling that I was to have an accident? He said that when he is with me nothing will happen, but I must be careful because there is danger to someone very close to him. "Where there is good, the evil wants to get at it; can't touch him, but will try to hurt the one who is close to him." So I must be watchful, attentive. At breakfast, he said, "Give fifteen minutes a day to sitting quietly, finding out what is attention. Go into it deeply." He gave me a letter to read on my flight. His flight to New Delhi on British Air was to leave at 1:45 p.m., and Dorothy and Doris were to take him. Mine to Boston was two hours earlier, and Ingrid kindly offered to take me in her car. All Krishnaji's things were in order. He blessed me. My whole life with him was a blessing. Some of the school were out on the driveway to say goodbye, and Krishnaji was standing in his white bathrobe in the kitchen window above. It was an aching pain to leave.

K's flight was to arrive in Delhi, nonstop, to be met by Pama and Pupul. They were then to continue to Madras, arriving there by 9:30 a.m. local time. My TWA flight was only slightly late leaving, and once airborne, I could read K's letter, as he instructed me. It was short and said everything I cared about. He had written, "Partir est un peu mourir. Be exceedingly watchful. Be very attentive driving. This attention must flow from the inner to the outer. What a beastly day. Stia bene e sempre sia benedetta." It was as if his hand was touching me, coming with me; the piece of paper carried his care and blessing.

Landing in Boston at 2 p.m., one saw below the new Kennedy Library, opened ten days earlier. It was a struggle to get three bags to the customs inspector. There was only one porter for the whole hall, but I was able to get a taxi driver to help me get to Air New England, where my brother had booked a flight across to Martha's Vineyard. It was dark as the small plane stopped at Nantucket and continued to the Vineyard. My cousin Lorna Livingston met me and put me up most comfortably in her little house. I went over to see my stepfather, who was upstairs in bed and sadly deteriorated from my last seeing him two years earlier. He was almost blind and seemed only marginally aware, as my own father had been in his last days. Lynn, a very nice nurse, was looking after him and there was a nice young cook and relief nurse.

This is as far as Mary got with her unfinished book. She completed this chapter in 2007, at the age of 92, and she had been diligently writing this book since soon after Krishnaji died in 1986. She had expressed how physically difficult it had become to write over the years (her eyesight failing, her ailing leg not liking the upright typing chairs), but she was content that all she had wanted to say about her being in Krishnaji's presence had been expressed in our interviews and her readings of her diaries with me.

This chapter ends the project of In the Presence of Krishnamurti, unknowingly begun in August 1994.

Notes for the Reader

The conventions that are used for this unusual material may not be familiar to all readers, so that a few explanations at the start may be useful.

Almost the entirety of the material is transcribed conversation. Consequently, the American convention of double quotation marks (“) to denote conversation could be used, but would be so pervasive as to clutter the text. Therefore, the convention of leaving them out but only implying them is used. As a consequence, the next set of quotation marks denoting quotes within quotes (‘) is used as the first set of quotation marks the reader will see. However, as Mary is often reading from her diaries in these transcribed conversations, and it seems important to distinguish this from general conversation, the single quote punctuation mark (‘) is used mostly to distinguish such material.

Whenever Mary is quoting Krishnamurti or anyone else, double quotation marks (“) are used.

The transcribers of these conversations have agreed to another convention that seems useful in understanding this material, and are consequently being passed on to the reader. All five transcribers of this material have commented on the joy and especially the laughter is these conversations. While the joy seems impossible to denote, laughter is not; and it seems important to do so as laughter can change the meaning of what is read (e.g., “Oh, we can’t do that” reads differently to “Oh, we can’t do that” [Mary and Scott laughing]). There was so much delight in Mary’s life with Krishnamurti, and they often had such fun doing small things together (and this, again, has been commented on by all the transcribers) that it seems important to translate this to the written page. Transcribers have denoted non-verbal aspects of the conversation they thought were important by writing out what they heard inside square brackets ([]).

The transcribers also, in trying to maintain as much of the voices as possible, wanted the readers to know when there were significant or poignant pauses, and this they did by putting three dots (…) between words.

Of course, as in most conversation, there were in these conversations a great many of what linguists call “place holders” (e.g., um, ah, hmm, etc.). These clutter written text, so they are, for the most part, left out. However, sometimes, they denote that a person is thinking, or that one person in a conversation in agreeing with what the other person is saying (e.g. mm hmm); and when it seems germane to the conversation, they have been left in, though usually with a transcriber’s note (e.g. [affirming]).

An important part of our verbal communication is how emphatically we say a thing, and it seems right to give the reader of these conversations some sense of that. While we have many ways in conversation to emphasize what we are saying, this material only uses three: a normal emphasis (e.g., “I was very unhappy.”), a greater emphasis (e.g., “I was very unhappy”), and the top emphasis (e.g., “I was very unhappy.”) This denotation of emphasis was not done by the transcribers, but by the editor when proofreading all the transcripts. So, although there is clearly some subjectivity in the use of this denotation of emphasis, it is at least the consistent subjectivity of one person.

Many people might disagree with all of the small every-day details that are included in this account, feeling that they are insignificant next to the esoteric aspects of Krishnamurti's life. But this is an account of what it was like to be with Krishnamurti, and that was a seamless blend of the every-day and the esoteric. In fact, Mary felt very strongly that due to the nature of Krishnamurti's presence, every-day things often seemed unusual. This phenomenon is discussed twice. At any rate, small every-day things make up a large part of all of our lives, so it didn't seem right to leave those out of an account of being in the presence of Krishnamurti.

There are also various names used for Krishnamurti. In India, ji is frequently put after at least part of a person's name when speaking about someone for whom one has affection as well as respect. Consequently, Krishnamurti was often called "Krishnaji" by many, and is usually done so in this text. In the same way, Mary was often called "Maryji" or "Mariaji" (Krishnamurti called Mary "Maria") in India. Also, Krishnamurti frequently referred to himself as "K," and those around him sometimes did the same. Mary did not often refer to Krishnamurti as "K," but she did occasionally. However, in her diaries she often calls him "K" for what usually seem to be reasons of brevity. In this text, whatever version of Krishnamurti's name ("Krishnamurti," "Krishnaji," or "K") is actually spoken, that is the one that appears.

A Sample of Readers' Responses

I just finished reading Issue #1, what a joy – a half and then full smile on my face the whole time. What a witty sense of humor she has. I was there, sitting with you both, quietly, listening. Thank you for this opportunity. She seems to be one of the few people that can talk about K and what he was saying with… a grasp that only someone who … oh, words fail me – but I'm sure you understand what I mean… without distortion. I really, really love her sense of humor and feel something unique and special is happening in those interviews, K seems there, in a sense.

Washington, USA

I am so appreciative of the work being done of making Mary's diary available. It is the highlight of my week to read each issue. I feel as though I am right there listening to you and Mary talk about her extraordinary time with Krishnaji. The diary is providing much to ponder, and causes me to reflect, sometimes, painfully, about what I am doing with my life. It is such a blessing to have encountered Krishnaji, and I cannot imagine what was like for her to be so close. I feel such a responsibility to live what he pointed to, as it was such a great fortune to meet him, and study what he talked about. It is not often that a human being gets to meet another human being like he was, and I can feel each day I do not pay attention, or live fully, I am failing to live at all. Thank you for the prodding that comes from this project.

New Hampshire, USA

In the Presence of Krishnamurti transports me to a time when Krishnamurti was alive, speaking and energizing the schools in India, England and the United States. It was a unique time when a great teacher travelled the world speaking intimately to thousands of people with no other objective than to show them the true meaning of freedom and what it means to live responsibly in this world.

In this truly remarkable work, we see the great care and concern for Krishnamurti by those around him. Mary Zimbalist's observations are loving, gentle and respectful. Yet, these are not the remembrances of an unquestioning "disciple" but rather chronicles by someone who was there at the center of things with questions of her own.

She, like others, knew that this was rarefied air and she took particular care to record it accurately without distortion so others might one day have access to it.

As one who was close to Krishnamurti for many years, and to Mary and Scott and others around him, I am thrilled that this document exists. It gives the reader a sense of who Krishnamurti was. It serves as both an introduction and adjunct to the body of his work.

California, USA

Thank you. Am very appreciative of your hard work, for your assistance in getting subscribed. Super grateful. I read some the other day, beautiful and elegant.

New York, USA

The reason I wanted to get in touch with you was to tell you how much I have enjoyed reading excerpts of In the presence of K. It has really brought the person alive in a way that no other book on him has. 'The man from Seattle'[1] cannot complain any longer. I thought the presentation itself is brilliant. The conversations between you and Mary Zimbalist enriching the diary entries and bringing them to life. Much thanks.

Bangalore, India

When I first heard about the project to publish on the Internet the "Memoirs of Mary Zimbalist", I was against it. For me those precious Memoirs needed a book, or several ones, easy to consult. Nevertheless I took a subscription. After the 7th or 8th issue, I realised that, for the first time in history, we could follow – practically day by day – the life of an exceptional person. As I kept on reading, I discovered in Mary Zimbalist a superiorly intelligent woman, constantly working with only one priority: Krishnaji. And at the same time as she assumed so many different task, she had a bad leg wounded since infancy...!

I consider that she contributed an essential part to Krishnaji's teachings and that her devotion and love was essential. Furthermore, the Memoirs' reader is able to consult the transcript of several Saanen talks and at several places benefit of the possibility to hear Mary reading her diaries.

Mary's picture in the issue # 42 conveys for me a blend of inside quietness with enormous strength. It is exactly what I felt the few times I have been in contact with her. It is with a deep love and respect that I conjure up her image.

In conclusion, thanks to her, we benefit from an exceptional document of the life and teachings of Krishnamurti.

Paris, France

We are lucky and blessed for the opportunity to read the memoirs of Mary Zimabalist.

India

Sorry for my poor English…

The work of making public the day to day of Mary beside K brings me life. Probably will have more when all who had a direct relationship with K have gone.

I think it is a good idea for the links with public talks … that help to better situate the story of sometimes very ordinary life … also the inclusion of unpublished private images.

I remember my first encounter with Mary in the summer of 1985. I was working with Len Peters erecting the platform for the talks in the big tent at Brockwood. Mary came to take a look at the works with Dorothy, and I could not avoid thinking that K had a very attractive partner.

(Len told me ….G. you have a dirty mind…!!)

My second encounter was 16 years later at the Centre, during a breakfast. She came to my table and I immediately recognized her. We had a friendly conversation and for first time I was aware of the tone of her voice… the same that now I listen in every issue.

My appreciation of the records … is of a huge support of Mary to K... and a beautiful love story…

Italy

The 100th anniversary of Mary's birth is in a few days and as I sit here writing about it, I feel the veil not lift exactly, but become thinner, into that atmosphere that is "other" (not "The Other", just "other").

I have learned something more about relationship. Mary's memoir doesn't simply speak of relationships, or relate stories – the relationships actually come into being as I read: Mary and Krishnaji, Mary and you, you and Krishnaji. There is an extraordinary care in these relationships. Love, affection, friendship, of course – and a level of care that makes me want to care for my relationships in a more precious way, in a way more like that. I think this has to do with "state of being" that you and Mary talk about. Remarkably, some aspect about "state of being" as I understand/experience it comes through in the memoirs—with you, with Mary, with Krishnaji.

There is a heightened realness that comes through. Mary is so present with herself, with the past, with you. She is so willing to talk about her own limitations frankly, honestly; she is fierce at times, and opinionated, and frustrated, and funny. You have used the word "devotion" at times in the issue introductions (as in "Mary's devotion to Krishnaji") and I have struggled with this because what comes through to me is something more mutual than devotion, less separate. What is that? What is devotion and love and deep affection and mutual regard all rolled into one? I think that there has not been a relationship like this in my experience (even though I have been blessed with many wonderful relationships) so I have no words to describe it.

Reading issue by issue, chronologically, the reader watches Mary's internal development. She changes, before our eyes. The questions she thinks to ask Krishnaji later on take on a depth and probing absent in the earlier issues. She becomes less tentative and steps fully into her role and life with him. She becomes.

And I often laugh out loud. This happened just last night when I read, "M: The next day was the seventeenth. 'Krishnaji saw Palevi and Mrs. Sarabhai at 9:30 a.m. A professional tree pruner began work on the big eucalyptus trees along the driveway. After lunch, Krishnaji and I went to town in the new diesel Mercedes to order mats for it. It drove very nicely, and we were both pleased.'

On the eighteenth, 'Krishnaji again saw Palevi briefly. I was at my desk all morning. Tree pruning continues. We walked on the beach.' See, there's nothing on these days.

S: Well, it's still nice to have it.

M: You don't think that boredom has long since paralyzed [S laughing] the listeners to this saga?!'

S: It's an endurance test."

The ongoing joke with you insisting on every detail and Mary rolling her eyes and teasing you for being so meticulous (to put it nicely) allows us eavesdroppers to feel the affection between you. I know of no other way to say this. Listening to Mary play off you is delightful.

It is so different to read of the esoteric aspects of the teachings through this dialog. When you and Mary engage in a sidebar (so to speak), working through an aspect of what K said, as a reader and as one who has tried to understand and practice the teachings myself, this is enormously helpful to my own ability to contemplate the teachings.

In the Presence of K is not simply an outsider's peek into what it was like for Mary to be in Krishnaji's presence. Through the memoir, I too am in his presence and in Mary's. In a world that seems to be coming apart more and more, this is my gravitational pull, the place I return to. You told me once that when you asked Krishnaji why he was here now, meaning on this earth at that particular time in history, he responded, "The tears of humanity called." They are still calling, and through the memoirs, Krishnaji is still here. I am not talking of solace, but of the possibility of freedom.

One passage is a brilliantly portrayed description of the most mundane aspect of daily life, the next is a less interesting description of daily life, and then without warning I am reading something truly profound that I have never heard in quite that way anywhere else. Like any conversation, or any diary, it has its own pacing with thoughts and tasks that come and go, but the real treasure is that it is just life. And in being "just life", we see how profound and astounding "just life" really is. Even as extraordinary a life as the ones that they led, it is still "just life".

There is information we would never otherwise know – we know of the "Process" from other books, but let me tell you I have had a fraction of what K went through with his teeth and it is almost unbearable. All those trips to the dentist, the teeth out, the bridges, the crowns – if one has never gone through that, it is hard to convey just how difficult bad teeth and ongoing dental work can be. And more than any writing of K's, or transcriptions, or recordings of talks, one gets a sense of what sensitivity is, in a coarse and dangerous world. We want to develop that sensitivity and yet know that there is a price to pay, even for someone like K. He suffered, and still he gave and gave and gave. That comes through in a way that hadn't in other sources, due to Mary's concern and documentation. Having this knowledge makes him more remarkable, not less, for all he did and how he lived.

California, USA

Being allowed to share in this personal conversation between you and Mary and silently sitting in on Mary Zimbalist reading her diaries continues to move me and makes me feel very fortunate. My wish to get to know as much as I can about K and how he lived his life…to soak up everything K did, said and wrote is strong and ever present, and at the same time gently answered as we go along with the memoirs.

These memoirs are also allowing me to learn about Mary's role … in the caring and facilitating K to do the work and much more… something which Mary sounds so modest about, just like the personal physical discomfort of her leg.

Reading about the caring for each other, the intensity of their travels, the meetings, the organising, and correspondence dealt with, the sporadic moments of privacy and Mary's sensitivity to all K's physical needs make me realise time and time again how very special it must have been to be in K's presence for Mary and all of you belonging to the inner circle.

My thanks to K, to Mary Zimbalist, and to all those who have been, are and will be involved in this special and historical project are immense.

Gouda, Holland

Thanks for dialogue with Mary on "In the presence of K" and making it available to us! Since K died I have been waiting for Mary's biography to come, but the way you have done it is much better than a book!

Apart from the teaching to explore K's daily “normal” life and to see the facts of it and how he related to practical problems is a great inspiration to be even more rational with the verbal and practical activity.

The Issues also gives important hints to published or unpublished documentation in the archives that would have been very interesting to look into.

Oslo, Norway

This is a great record. For those who have really studied the Teachings, each episode has meaning far beyond the mere words with which the recollections are recorded.

Australia

Just writing to thank you again for these memoirs, Scott. They are truly fascinating, and to be honest a bit addictive. Mary writes so well – often poetically, evocatively, touchingly. We look forward to their resuming in the new year.

England

I want to add my voice to all those who deeply appreciate the publication of the Memoirs, and for the knowledge of the extraordinary part Mary had in Krishnaji’s life. I think her contribution was immeasurable both in helping Krishnaji bloom, and in helping us to understand Krishnaji in expanded measure. Thank you for taking on this project.

England

Thank you for this opportunity and for helping bring this wonderful work to fruition. Humanity is forever indebted to Mary for her invaluable contribution; her immense love for K and the teachings and by extension for humanity. There are no words that can adequately express our gratitude other than to earnestly live the teachings with the same unconditional dedication and love as she cared for K and the teachings.

Florida, USA

For me Mary’s selfless devotion washes away the bad taste of the Rajagopals.

England

The Memoirs of Mary Zimbalist provide a rare historical glimpse into the mundane, the profound and mysterious life of Krishnamurti beginning in the late 1950's. Personally I find great value in how Krishnamurti is perceived and reflected in the mirror of the relationships that surrounded him, the composition or character of each mirror affecting uniquely the image being reflected. The essence of the so-called teachings, what Krishnamurti's insights and descriptions point to, is unknowable. The wind can't be caught in a paper bag. What can be known is what the unknowable is not. Scott and Mary's efforts help us discover the difference.

California, USA

The MZ memoirs will forever remain a mirror through which people can see themselves. In the end, readers will view the work, and the events described, through the prism of their own conditioning.

For those who are capable of unflinchingly facing the "what is" of human existence, I strongly commend this enterprise as a valuable tool of enquiry and self-discovery. The work contains unpublished photographs of Krishnamurti as well as links to the Teaching itself and many will find this aspect rewarding as well as enriching. I read the MZ memoir every week first thing on Tuesday mornings.

Western Australia

We're grateful for making these memoirs available. Not only do they fill in blanks regarding some aspects of Krishnaji's life, but they're poignant. Mary's phenomenal dedication to looking after Krishnaji, with such steady energy and obvious deep affection, made her a godsend to him, it's clear. For us the memoirs succeed in fulfilling Krishnaji's wish that Mary convey what it was like to be with him. Thank you so much.

England

I think this is an extraordinary project. These are intensely personal memoirs, told in an easy humorous conversational style. They give enormous insight into the teachings of Krishnamurti because they include so many details about daily life. I think learning about what made him laugh, things he liked, people he was close with, illuminates what he taught and wrote. The love and respect that is involved in this project gives us a unique perspective on Krishnamurti and his teachings, and on two very special people he trusted to tell his story. Thank you for completing this project after so many years of work.

Upstate New York, USA

Knowing JK made me believe in extreme spiritual beauty.

Knowing MZ gave me a lesson in austerity, delicacy, punctuality and her devotion for JK was like a fresh breeze of the unknown.

Mexicali, Mexico

The thing that is remarkable about Mary's memoirs is really her integrity. I get the sense she seeks to be this white background that protects and just lets K be himself. You know, no ego, no self-interest. And she is an avid listener, very intelligent, and her humor is quite sweet (and wicked) too. And you know, where she did not know the details she says so. Your camaraderie is very sweet, and the interviews style has the perfect balance of letting her speak and probes.

I always thought there was an element of "gossipyness" with some of the biographies, and a little bit of smugness about having access to K. I am amazed, again, with Mary Z just being present. I do hope there are more of her conversations with K about the teachings as those sections are really fascinating. I think he sought to teach her in a particular special way and we get to share that.

Anyway, these are my first heartfelt responses!

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Krishnaji frequently used 'the man from Seattle' as what seemed to be a rhetorical device in discussions with teachers in his schools indicating that people from remote places might ask what it was like to have known Krishnaji. Interesting discussions often ensued.

About

Jiddu Krishnamurti (1895—1986) was perhaps one of the most original thinkers of the twentieth century. A man of extraordinary insight, a speaker, and writer, he was also an educator who started ten schools internationally in his life-time. He has been a remarkable source of inspiration to people in a great many fields, including education, psychology, and philosophy.

Mary Zimbalist (1915—2008) was an actress, model, and the wife of Sam Zimbalist (producer of many films including the Oscar winning Ben-Hur) who began asking serious questions about the nature of life and death, and first came across Krishnamurti in 1944. When she returned to this interest fully in 1963, she became Krishnamurti's friend and then his assistant. From that time until Krishnamurti's death, she accompanied him through most of his travels around the world and helped organize his talks and the publication of his books. Mary became the closest person to Krishnamurti since 1923, when Krishnamurti's brother, Nitya, died.

In the Presence of Krishnamurti: The Memoirs of Mary Zimbalist is the direct result of Krishnamurti asking Mary to write about what it was like to be with him. Mary struggled to write this account for more than two decades. I was concerned that, with her frail health and slow progress, she might not complete this task for which she cared so much. To try to help her, I suggested that she and I recount our memories of Krishnamurti to each other, and record them.

We began a series of conversations in 1994 that continued for fourteen years, until 2008, shortly before she died. Mary was happy that we both talk about our memories because I had traveled a bit with Krishnamurti, and worked with him for many years, but especially because I knew many of the places to which they traveled, so I could ask detailed questions; questions that helped stir her memory and bring to life, in her own words, what it was like to be in the presence of Krishnamurti. These discussions have produced exhaustive documentation (over 100 recordings of 1.5 hours to 2 hours each) through Mary's reminiscences and her reading of her detailed diaries.
